“Many months ago, I told you the plight of Stetriol,” Gar said, cutting through the laughs and mutterings of the assembled Conquerors. “That the Greencloaks have ignored our continent and left its people to suffer in isolation. And I wasn’t lying to you. But we are through asking for assistance. A war is underway. Once, Zhong might have given us the most trouble, but we have been victorious there. The royal palace lies in cinders. Amaya and Nilo are falling, and Eura will be ours soon after. It is inevitable which way this war will go, and once it does, Kovo the Ape will be released. Then, with the united talismans, the new age of order for Erdas can begin.”

At the mention of Kovo, Meilin perked up.

“History will have only one right side,” Gar finished. “You can join us, or you can die!” The Devourer raised his hand triumphantly, and the assembled Conquerors roared.

“Never!” Meilin screamed, tears of frustration and anger in her eyes. “The only fate for the man who killed my father will be death at my hand!”

Abeke held silent, wishing that Meilin could hold back her rage. They would never join the Conquerors, but it might be wise to play along, if it meant staying alive.

Gar chuckled grimly. “I might have expected as much. You probably think of this little show of yours as an act of courage. But I see only foolishness. The tides have turned, and yet you insist on swimming against them. You know what happens to people who swim against tides for too long, don’t you? They drown.”

He made a great show of laying his hand on the grip of his greatsword. “I will give you one day to change your mind. After that time —”

“I will do as I will,” Gerathon finished. She opened her wide jaws and extended her hollow fangs from the pink flesh of her mouth. A muscle in her throat flexed, and a drop of poison emerged from each, shining green-yellow in the sunlight.

At the sight of Gerathon’s fangs, Abeke experienced a fear stronger than any she’d felt before. It was fear without exit, fear without hope. A pall descended on the courtyard. Even in her panic, Abeke noted it to herself: The Conquerors are scared of Gerathon, too.

Slowly, Gerathon retracted her fangs and closed her mouth. A drop of venom was still hanging from her lower jaw; her long forked tongue emerged and flicked it away.

It landed right on Drina’s foot.

The girl shook her boot frantically, trying to get the noxious fluid off. Once she had, her lips curled back in disgust. “So foul,” she muttered.

At the sound of her words, the assembled Conquerors went silent. Drina seemed to realize her breach, and put a hand over her mouth.

“Drina,” Gar said, breaking the bleak spell holding the audience still. “Step forward.”

“What?” Drina said, her voice quavering. She shot a worried look to her brother. He clenched his jaw, eyes wide. He was powerless to help her.

“Step forward,” Gerathon hissed, circling her huge body around Drina’s ankles, the scales cutting her flesh as Drina struggled to keep her feet. “Do as your lord requests.”

Drina staggered toward Gar. The spider on her shoulder skittered around her neck to the other side and back again, agitated. “I’m sorry, General Gar, if I have offended —”

“Now,” he intoned. “Come to me.”

Abeke watched in dread and confusion as Drina, head hung low, stepped toward Gar. “Hold out your hand,” he ordered.

Drina did as she was told, palm up. Her fingers trembled.

“You were tasked with recovering the talismans the Greencloaks have accumulated in Greenhaven. You have failed.”

Drina stood motionless and wordless, terror on her face. “Uncle, please!” she cried out. “Their defenses were too strong.”

Gerathon’s eyes went yellow again, and the spider on Drina’s shoulder — her spirit animal — reared back, raising its front legs. Enthralled by the Great Beast, it rocked from side to side, as if it were in an invisible current. Then, it skittered down Drina’s body, walking out over her shaking, outstretched arm, until it was at the pale exposed wrist. It paused again, forelegs in the air. In striking position.

“There is only one punishment for failure, niece,” Gar said, his voice soft with resignation. “Even for you.”

The spider peered at Gerathon with its many eyes, rocking back and forth in its mind-controlled trance.

Almost imperceptibly, the grinning cobra nodded.

When the spider lifted its fangs, Drina’s eyes narrowed. Abeke could sense her trying to control her spirit animal.

But the giant arachnid was under Gerathon’s control now. Drina must have drunk the Bile, just like all the other Conquerors. Drina gave up on controlling the animal, and instead flailed her arm, trying to get the spider off. It clung on tight, all its legs circling her wrist.

With surprising speed, Yumaris stepped forward. She grabbed the girl’s hand and wrenched it cruelly, forcing the arm still. “Now!” Yumaris hissed. “Finish her now!”

“Please, Gerathon —” Shane began to say.

But his words were lost as, silently and cleanly, the spider sank its fangs into Drina's wrist.

Drina bled like she'd been stabbed; the spider's fangs were that large. She gasped at the pain, and her knees buckled. Almost immediately, her eyes fluttered and rolled back. Then she collapsed, quivering, on the ground. Within seconds, she was still.

The assembled Conquerors were queasily silent for a moment.

Then Yumaris raised a cheer, her old voice quavering but loud. "All hail the Reptile King!"

The crowd yelled out, stomping their feet. "All hail the Reptile King!"

Abeke could see fear on many of the Conquerors' faces. None of them wanted to be the next victim of Gerathon's rage. It was then that she realized the truth: This awful display had been as much for the assembled troops as it had been for her and Meilin. Every one of the Conquerors, from their soldiers to their leaders, were prisoners in this war.

They were all Gerathon's puppets.

The only one not joining in the cheering was Shane. He remained silent, his face slack. He took a step toward his sister's slumped corpse, when Gerathon snapped her head toward him, hissing warningly.

"Do not make us suspect that brother is like sister, Shane," she said, barely audible over the crowd's roar. "This is the time for you to prove your loyalty."

"Yes," Shane said, so quietly Abeke could only barely hear him. "You are right."

Shane's head rose, and Abeke was shocked to see him look right past Gerathon — at her. Within the tumult of the cheering Conquerors, the creaks of their armor, and the clanging of their weapons, Abeke saw Shane's lips move. It took her a moment to understand what he was saying.

"Six, five, four ..." He was counting down!

Nothing got past wise old Yumaris, though. Her eyes widened when she saw Shane's lips. "Beware!" she cried, shaking her gnarled staff at him.

The boy sprang into motion, lunging toward Gar. With surprising agility Yumaris stepped into his way, and the two tumbled, rolling into the Reptile King. Gar barely budged at the impact, but the elderly Conqueror didn't get up. Shane was soon on his feet before a stunned Gar, unsheathing his saber and taking a fighting stance. Shane didn't attack his uncle, though: Instead, he sprinted toward Abeke and Meilin.

Uraza darted in front, as if to fight him, but Abeke cried out for her to fall back. The leopard faltered, confused, frozen with one paw in the air, peering at Abeke with her violet eyes. Shane surged past her, tossing his saber to Meilin. She caught it handily.

"They killed my sister," Shane said, his features contorted in rage. "They made her —"

"We saw!" Abeke cried as she crouched, fists out. There was no time to think. The Conquerors were recovering from their surprise and surging forward. If Abeke and Meilin had any hope of escape, they had to act now. "Where do we go?"

Shane pointed to one spot in the courtyard. It was swarming with Conquerors, but Abeke would have to trust his judgment that they could somehow escape that way. They dashed across the sandstone flagstones, Jhi taking up a defensive position on one side, Uraza on the other. Meilin whipped the saber through the air while she ran, testing its weight. She was preparing for battle.

Gerathon opened her mouth wide, fangs as long as lances. With muscular side-to-side motions, she arrowed across the courtyard to cut them off. The serpent was horrifyingly fast — she'd be on them in a moment. "Shane ... !" Abeke warned.

"I know!" he barked.

As soon as they reached the Conquerors at the edge, Abeke realized why Shane had chosen this spot. There were five enemies at one portal, but two lowered their weapons in confusion when they approached — they must have been Shane's friends.

The other three were not.

They fell into defensive positions, crouched with swords raised.

Uraza was on them first. She'd built up a fierce sprint across the courtyard, and hit the nearest Conqueror like a spear, striking his chest and pinning him to the ground. Immediately, she wheeled to face the next. Meilin already had her, though, dropping to her hands for a kick to the Conqueror's knee. She then grabbed the Conqueror's own sword and came up sharp with the hilt, knocking the woman out cold. That left only one blocking their escape route. Again Abeke longed for her bow. But she didn't have it. Without martial arts training like Meilin's, she struggled to figure out how to best contribute to the fight. When the last Conqueror brought her sword blade slicing toward her, Abeke was rooted to the ground.

Shane had it under control. Using his shoulder as a battering ram, he came in sideways, slamming the Conqueror in the gut and rolling to the ground with her. Within a moment the Conqueror was unconscious on the ground and Shane was back on his feet, motioning them forward.

Aware of Gerathon's giant black shape bearing down, Abeke stuck close to Shane's side. Meilin, though, had whirled to face the crowd descending on them, Shane's saber brandished in one hand and the Conqueror's sword in the other.

"Meilin, what are you doing?" Abeke cried. But then she saw where Meilin's attention was focused: Gar. The general of the Conquerors, the man who had killed Meilin's father, was marching toward them. Her face furious, Meilin crouched in a fighting stance, her blades held out parallel to the ground.

Jhi stood on her two feet between Meilin and Abeke, looking between the pair of them. Gerathon was nearly in striking distance, and the panda slowly turned to face her. It would be hopeless to try to fight the giant serpent and the Devourer — Meilin had to realize she was putting not only herself, but the rest of them in danger.

"Now isn't the time!" Shane shouted. "If you want to escape, you have to come with me!"

"For Jhi's sake, Meilin!" Abeke cried.

Meilin turned, saw Jhi right in Gerathon's path, and lowered her weapons. Jhi joined her as she ran toward Abeke and Shane, bringing her blades up just in time to parry a Conqueror's mace. She grunted under the impact and fell to the stone floor, then rolled and was back on her feet in an instant.

Shane led the charge through the archway. It gave out into a ditch skirting the exterior wall of the manor house. Uraza followed after, the others racing behind.

“The boat that took you from Okaihee,” Shane panted as they ran. “It’s my family’s ship. It’s moored in the harbor, on the far side of this town. If we’re the first to get there ...”

“Got it,” Abeke said, breaking into a full sprint.

They passed along the manor’s wall, past what looked like the Conquerors’ armory, until a large Niloan port town came into view, an assortment of blocky baked-mud buildings leading down to docks. The Conquerors must have all been assembled at the manor courtyard, and they’d managed to break ahead of them — the way forward appeared to be free of enemies. Shane knew just the turns to take through the winding streets, and the tumult behind them began to sound farther and farther away. They raced past shuttered shops, empty dining tents, and unattended training rooms.

Abeke heard seagulls, and realized they must be nearing the dock. Shane began to slow, and led them through an unmarked door into a dank building. He shut the door behind him, then began sifting through stacks of damp, sea-rotted crates piled against a wall. “Before the Conquerors took over this town, this building used to be the customs house,” he explained. “I wasn’t expecting a voyage, so there won’t be any fresh food for our trip. But there’s enough to eat and drink in these old shipments, if you don’t mind hardtack and lots of fermented Niloan cherry. Grab a box, each of you, and we’ll head straight for the ship.”

While Uraza paced, Abeke took the largest crate she could handle. She followed Shane through the cavernous, musty hall, and only realized Meilin wasn’t with her when she reached the far door. She turned and saw Meilin with Jhi, sitting motionless by the crates, head bowed and hands clasped. “What is it?” Abeke said impatiently. “We have to leave now, Meilin.”

Meilin looked at her, tears in her eyes. “I’m not coming.”

“You have to be kidding me,” Shane said. “They’ll kill you for trying to escape, you know that, right?”

“Gerathon can use me any time she wants. She can make me kill myself, like she forced Drina’s spider to kill her. Or she could make me kill Abeke. I can’t come with you. It’s not safe.”

“I don’t care!” Abeke said. “I’m not leaving you.”

“Think reasonably,” Meilin said. “This is for the best. You have no chance if I’m with you. Gerathon will use me to find out where you are. Or worse. Admit it.”

Jhi took a step toward Abeke and Shane, looked forlornly at Meilin, then stepped forward again. It was clear she was torn on the matter.

“She has a point, Abeke,” Shane said quietly. “Meilin is compromised. You and I never drank the Bile. Our bonds came naturally.”

“Meilin, you want to stay here to get revenge on Gar!” Abeke said. “You admit that.”

“Of course that’s part of it,” Meilin said. Tears fell from her eyes as she stared down at the saber in her hands. “But mainly I don’t want to hurt you again. Help me stop myself from hurting you. Please.”

Abeke’s jaw trembled, and she had to clench her muscles to keep the shaking from passing to her whole body. In her heart, Abeke knew Meilin was right. In the Conqueror base, Gerathon had no use for Meilin as a spy or a murderer. The moment Meilin escaped, though, Gerathon would possess her. Abeke reluctantly nodded. “We’ll come back for you,” she said. “I promise.”

Meilin walked over and hugged Abeke. “I’m sorry,” she whispered hoarsely. “For everything. You were a better friend than I deserved.”

Abeke’s eyes stung. She closed them tight, and clasped Meilin to her.

“I’m sorry too, Meilin,” Shane said from behind them. Abeke turned, taking the boy in. He rubbed his shoulders. There was a new softness to him that was surprising in someone so tall and strong. “If I’d only seen my uncle for what he was earlier ... maybe your father, or Drina ...” His voice broke. Shane sighed, shaking his head. “Thank you for this sacrifice. I’ll do my best to live up to it. I’ll protect Abeke, and we will find a way to stop my uncle.”

Meilin watched him silently for a moment, measuring him. Then she gave a single affirming nod, apparently satisfied with what she saw.

Shane worriedly scanned the dockside quays. “I hear footsteps approaching. We need to get going.”

“Enough talk, then,” Meilin said, wiping her eyes. Beside her, Jhi leaned her head against Meilin’s hip. “Get going!”

Shane creaked open the dockside door. At the other side was the town’s small port — it was almost vacant, filled with the noise of creaking boats and flooded by morning light. Abeke hefted a crate and followed Shane out onto the docks. Uraza paced beside her, body slung low, ears flat and violet eyes alert.

“If we somehow make it to Greenhaven, will the Greencloaks kill me the moment I appear?” Shane asked.

“You saved my life,” Abeke said. “I’ll make sure they don’t hurt you.”

“Thank you,” Shane said, relief in his voice.

As they hurried along the harbor, Abeke’s thoughts were not on Shane, but on Meilin. How long would it be before they saw each other again? Could they find a way to cure Meilin of her Bile poisoning?

Meilin must be feeling so lonely and wretched, so scared at the prospect of surviving alone amid the Conquerors. Abeke wished she could hug her friend one more time. As she tossed her crate to the deck of Shane’s boat and prepared to leap aboard herself, Abeke glanced back at the customs house.

Meilin was almost out of view. It was only because of Abeke’s link with Uraza that her senses were keen enough to spy her. Meilin was slumped inside the customs house, half-hidden in a dark corner. She leaned forward and waved, the glint of her eyes only just visible in the dimness. Abeke could barely make out Jhi’s black paw beside her.

Abeke waved back, then jumped to the deck of the ship, Uraza leaping after her and landing softly on the sun-warmed wood. Abeke found she was short of breath, but not from the run. A terrible certainty gripped at her chest, choking out the crisp ocean air.

She was never going to see her friend again.

THE OASIS

CONOR STARED FROM HIS HIDING PLACE IN THE SAW grass as the Conquerors tried to force their way through the ostrich canyon. Irtike had buried her head in the thick yellow blades, unwilling to watch the bloodbath. But Conor, Rollan, Tarik — and Lumeo and Snake Eyes — were watching closely.

The raiders they'd seen before must have been a less organized advance force. This army was marching in unison, cavalry trotting in front and infantry nested behind, followed closely by archers. In the rear were camels lugging supplies, tended by captured Niloans, their heads bowed in misery. The Conquerors' dark leathers squeaked and creaked as they approached the pass. The ostriches had bravely lined up at the southern end, just like before, but their force looked pathetic compared to the hundreds of Conquerors surging along.

"Zerif," Tarik said, pointing at the tall Conqueror heading up the infantry. Conor squinted and saw that, indeed, it was the handsome man with the close-cropped beard, the one who had stolen Meilin and Abeke away. "They're sending one of their most important leaders," Tarik said. "Clearly the Golden Lion is crucial to their plans."

"There's no way that line of ostriches can hold against them," Conor said. "All we can do is hope that Briggan and Essix have already managed to get the talisman before the Conquerors reach the oasis."

Rollan peered miserably at him. Conor felt his brow dotting with nervous sweat.

“That’s what I was trying to tell you,” Rollan said. “I don’t think Briggan and Essix are going to get the Golden Lion. They were in serious trouble when you pulled me away. I need to go back into Essix’s mind.”

“Trouble?” Conor said, his stomach going tight. “What trouble?”

Tarik frowned. “We’ll have to risk sending you back. Go on, Rollan. We’ll figure out what to do here.”

Immediately, Rollan closed his eyes. Conor watched as his body went limp, and his eyes began to move rapidly beneath the lids. The boy made little gasps. They’d have to wait for him to return with something concrete to report. For good or for bad.

In the meantime, Conor turned his attention back to the Conquerors in the pass.

The first horsemen reached the line of ostriches. Like the last group of Conquerors, they marched forward resolutely, and like the last group of Conquerors, they were felled as soon as they reached the birds. The ostriches’ powerful feet smashed in their helmets with amazing accuracy. The riders hit the canyon wall and didn’t get back up. Their horses scattered, some forward through the ostriches and others back into the infantry’s ranks.

It was no accident, Conor decided, that Zerif was leading a deeper line — he was more than willing to let his soldiers take the first hit. When the first group crumpled and the ostriches were preparing to attack again, Zerif shouted a command.

The lines of soldiers stopped, the archers readied their bows, and they released a volley.

The ostriches whirled in confusion, then began to fall. It was all over in seconds: The surviving ostriches scattered, and the Conquerors poured through the pass. Zerif galloped forward to take the head. He shouted triumphantly as he led his army toward Cabaro’s oasis.

Conor wanted to run down and attack, but he and his friends had no chance against such a large force, especially without Briggan and Essix. Being reminded of Briggan’s absence made Conor want to bury his head in his arm — it was like he was missing a piece of himself. But instead he held his head high. His companions needed him. Briggan needed him.

It took at least half an hour for the Conqueror army to pass through the narrow bottleneck. They strode right into the desert, kicking up a cloud of yellow dust that plumed high into the sky.

As the last Conquerors passed into the desert, Irtike pressed her ear to the ground, gripping Snake Eyes tightly to her chest.

“What is it?” Conor asked. The slender girl made a silencing gesture.

Finally she spoke. “The men the ostriches killed. Their horses scattered, but they’ve calmed now and are gathering on the other side of the cliff, just out of view. I can sense the vibrations of their hooves.”

Conor looked at Tarik, sudden hope wetting his eyes. “If we go on horseback, and there’s only four of us, maybe we can outpace them.”

Tarik was already on his feet. “Let’s move.”

Conor looked at Rollan, laid out flat on the grass, lips moving as he followed Essix in his mind. “What about Rollan?” he asked. “We can’t leave him behind.”

“Of course not,” Tarik said. And with that, he hefted Rollan and carried him down the bluff, holding the boy gently in his arms, like a sick child. Conor and Irtike rushed to stuff their belongings into their packs and then followed Tarik down.

They caught up just as he reached the horses, which were precisely where Irtike had said they’d be, chewing at a stand of dried grass at the desert’s edge. Conor looked at their small companion with new appreciation.

Tarik laid Rollan on his belly across the back of the horse with the gentlest-looking face, then fastened the saddle straps over the boy’s back. Conor picked a steed and fitted his pack to the saddle. Irtike removed the saddle from hers and nimbly clambered on.

They trotted at first, until they saw that none of the mass of Conquerors ahead of them was dropping back to investigate. Once they knew they were relatively safe, they began to gallop. Tarik steered them at a wide angle so they could go around the enemy army.

As they turned, Rollan’s body began to slide from the saddle, until his head was hanging over the side of the horse. Worried for his friend’s safety, Conor nearly called for a stop. But then he saw Rollan groggily shake his head and yelp in surprise as he opened his eyes to sand streaming past.

“Welcome back!” Conor yelled over the wind, grinning at Rollan.

Grumbling loudly, Rollan edged himself back up his horse, and managed to unstrap himself even while riding forward. Finally he was right-side up, galloping alongside them. “I’ve never particularly liked horses!” he called.

His nag whinnied in response.

“I’m not sure they like you either,” Conor retorted.

“Let me tell you what I’ve found out about Briggan and Essix,” Rollan yelled. Tarik and Irtike fell into line, the better to hear while they rode.

“Briggan’s alive,” Rollan said. “He faced Cabaro, but the lion was too lazy to fight. He sent his lionesses after him. Briggan might have managed it, except a group of wild dogs attacked him from behind. Not even Briggan’s command over canines could shake Cabaro’s hold on them.”

“No!” Conor cried. “Is he okay?”

Rollan nodded grimly. “Just. Essix picked off enough of the dogs that Briggan stayed on his feet. But he had to retreat. He’s hidden somewhere in the oasis. Essix rose into the air when he fled. She can’t see him anymore.”

“And the Golden Lion?” Tarik yelled.

Rollan took a moment to rebalance himself as they surged forward, pressing the balls of his feet hard into his stirrups. “Cabaro’s still got it.”

“For now,” Irtike said. “I’m sure he has no idea that a Conqueror army is about to descend on his precious animal oasis.”

Rollan closed his eyes for a moment, then whipped them open and visored his eyes against the sun hanging in the southern sky. “Essix is on her way toward us.”

“Tell her to stay there!” Conor begged. “Ask her if she can spy any sign of Briggan.”

“I can’t communicate with her like that,” Rollan said. “But I think something’s wrong.” He clenched the reins in his hand and closed his eyes. His brow furrowed. “Wait!” His eyes snapped open again, wild with fear. “There are more Conquerors coming through the pass behind us! A hundred or so.”

Fear tingled along Conor’s spine. His horse seemed to sense his anxiety, and swerved off course. Conor had to pull hard on the reins to get it back in formation.

Conor whirled in his saddle. Behind them, he could see a mass at the northern horizon, ringed in rising dust. An undulating, jet-black figure slithered at the head. It looked small now, but was quickly getting larger. It was a snake, and there was only one giant snake that he knew of.

Gerathon.

Conor faced forward, toward the other contingent of Conquerors.

“We’re trapped,” Tarik said, voicing Conor’s thoughts. “They have us in a vise.”

“Head for the oasis!” Conor said. “Out here we’re easy targets. We have to find some cover.”

“And then all we have to do is beat away a few dozen wild dogs and lions!” Rollan called. “Make sure you keep the Slate Elephant against your skin, Conor. Without his extra size, Briggan would already have fallen.”

It seemed to Conor that the wild dogs and lionesses were the least of their difficulties when they had Gerathon to contend with. And Zerif. Not to mention a few hundred Conqueror soldiers.

Essix plummeted beak-first, extending her wings just in time to slow and land on Rollan’s shoulder. Rollan barely seemed to notice as he peered forward. “There’s a stand of trees shaking in the oasis, toward the left side. That’s probably where Briggan is. If we ride all out, we should get there before the first Conquerors do.”

They didn’t need to voice their agreement. Tarik directed his horse slightly to the side, and before long the oasis was in plain view. Conor’s heart leaped when he saw a large gray form whirling at the eastern edge. Several small brown shapes corralled Briggan, so that he was half in the desert and half out of it.

They sped toward the harried wolf, Conor brandishing his hand ax and preparing to attack. But as they got closer he saw that the wild dogs weren’t venturing past the tree line. Briggan faced the pack from the sand, but they held tight at the edge of the oasis, whining and nipping the air.

Briggan spotted Conor as they neared. His tail began to wag, and Conor laughed joyfully in response. But then he saw the severity of Briggan’s wounds.

Because of his thick fur, it was impossible to see the individual gashes, but Briggan's coat was matted and red in more places than it wasn't.

"I wish we had Jhi here," Conor said as they dismounted beside Briggan. Instantly the giant wolf was nuzzling him, pressing his wet nose into the boy's side, almost knocking him over. Heedless of the blood, Conor ran his hands through Briggan's fur. He tried to keep his voice calm, for Briggan's sake. "You need healing." Unable to hold back anymore, Conor threw his hands around Briggan's leg. "Oh, I've missed you!"

Now that the others were here, the dogs retreated into the oasis, growling and snapping. Briggan slumped to the ground while Tarik investigated his wounds. "Surface, mostly," he said. "I think he's going to be okay. But he's exhausted past his limits, and won't be recovering anytime soon."

Conor pressed his face against the wolf's snout. "You hear that? You need to rest some."

"Well, I wish we could offer him some bedtime," Rollan said, staring at the dust cloud kicked up by the Conqueror army as it poured into the oasis a quarter mile away. "But time is what we don't have. Either we convince Cabaro to give us the Golden Lion, or we surrender it to the Conquerors."

Irtike pointed to the trail of fallen trees that Briggan had created while he'd been chased by the wild dogs. "That's the way the dogs retreated," she said. "I think we can assume there's where we'll find Cabaro. I'm picking up heavy vibrations from the center."

Conor nodded. "Let's go."

Briggan led the way, limping gingerly through the trail of broken trees. Still magnified by the Slate Elephant, he stepped over even the largest fallen trunks. The others had a harder time of it. They left their horses at the edge and proceeded on foot, as there was no way their mounts could pass through the dense jungle.

At one point Briggan had to lift them over a tree one by one, tenderly biting into the scruffs of their shirts and carrying them over like pups. The sight of big Tarik helpless in Briggan's jaws would stick with Conor for a long time. Even in the desperation of their situation, it was hard not to laugh.

Conor began to smell something he hadn't since the hut in Okaihee, and at first he couldn't place it. Then he realized — it was the same scent as the lone lion they'd encountered. Conor opened to his mouth to warn his companions, but there was no need.

Briggan was already over the last tree — they'd come to the lagoon at the center of the oasis. The still blue surface reflected the few wispy clouds that were in the sky. The four lionesses were near, two licking the wounds of their companions. They must have been exhausted by the combat. Though their heads snapped to attention when the group arrived, they didn't get to their feet.

Why did they need to, though, when Cabaro the Lion was there, rested and whole, lounging at the far side of the lagoon? When he saw the team he got to his feet slowly, stretching his head low to the ground with front legs outflung, never taking his eyes off them. He strolled around the lagoon's edge, then sauntered over to his lionesses. Those huge cats seemed like kittens compared to him. Cabaro had to be at least a dozen feet long, and moved with easy grace and obvious strength.

"Greencloaks," he said in his velvety voice. "My least favorite of all humans. I don't know how you got past my ostriches, but you should have taken the hint that humans aren't welcome here. You'd best leave, before I get really angry."

Conor wanted to speak, to find a way to convince Cabaro that he should help them protect the Golden Lion from the Conquerors. But when he opened his mouth, fear of the immense beast made his throat close tight.

Luckily Rollan was more unflappable. He stepped forward, bravely brandishing his long dagger, however pathetic it looked compared to the teeth of Cabaro.

"Yeah, well," he said, standing tall. "You might want to ... shut up."

When Essix cried out irritably from a palm directly above him, Rollan shrugged up at her. "Cut me some slack, Essix. It's been a long day."

Cabaro rolled his golden eyes. "The Essix I knew was a Great Beast, not a squawking bird who does the bidding of humans. Are you sure this Essix isn't actually a parrot?"

Essix shrieked in outrage.

"Cabaro," Tarik said, standing forward with one palm open, the other guiding Rollan's dagger tip toward the ground. "My name is Tarik. We have come to warn you that the Conquerors are at the edge of your oasis, and heading inward as we speak. They will be here any minute. I won't hide the truth, that we believe your talisman will be safest in the care of the Greencloaks — but right now we have great need of your might. As we speak, precious seconds are slipping by. The Devourer is here, and Gerathon. Please, let us help you. Let us all flee, and speak later at our leisure."

Cabaro had been listening with evident amusement, but when Tarik said Gerathon's name, a fraction of fear entered the lion's eyes. He seemed about to answer when Briggan stepped forward. The wolf kept his head low, not in submission, but in a peculiar deference. A long look passed between the two Great Beasts. Conor could only imagine what the two legends might be telling each other with that gaze.

Newly agitated, Cabaro began licking his talisman. He dangled the massive pendant from his paw as he spoke. "I can handle myself in combat — no creature that has ever lived has bested me, not even Gerathon. If she dares attack, I will pounce behind her triangular head like a mongoose, and shake until she can move no more. That will be my reply to her."

Conor's heart swelled, in spite of himself. He would love to see that.

"But," Cabaro continued, "you are telling me nothing I don't already know. My animals rove all over Nilo and beyond, bringing me news of the other continents. I knew the moment the Devourer had returned, and when Gerathon was freed, a claim I doubt you Greencloaks can make. And I knew they would come for my talisman. They will need it to free Kovo, whose prison was stronger. I was well aware that my precious solitude would one day come to an end."

Cabaro paced around the edge of the lagoon. Occasionally he would flash something almost like a smile at the companions — he was clearly enjoying the attention, the drama. "But I will never do what you ask, precisely because it is you who ask it. Perhaps I would have listened to Briggan and Essix, had they come on their own. But once I learned they were linked to humans — that in their rebirth they had become mere tools for your kind — the Four Fallen lost my support. If animals banded together and prevented humans from interfering with us, destroyed Conquerors and Greencloaks alike, destroyed every would-be Reptile King, then there would be hope for their world. But we allow humans to run rampant. Why should we be surprised when their desires turn corrupt? The world's fate was sealed as soon as humans came to dominate it. Ours has been a slow slide into servitude.”

Briggan began to growl softly, while Essix struck a defiant stance, sharp beak high. Conor wondered what they were really thinking, but their conclusion was clear: They still stood on the side of the Greencloaks.

Conor managed to find his voice. “Like Suka,” he said. “You’ve given up on the world, just like Suka the Polar Bear did.”

Cabaro laughed, a strangely raspy sound. “No. Nothing mattered to Suka but extending her own lifespan. I think her brain must have been damaged from the prolonged cold. I also saw the end of our time coming, but choose instead to live my remaining days — to spend them in comfort and fellowship.”

Rollan frowned. “Conor, is this what I sounded like that day Olvan asked us to become Greencloaks? If so, I give you permission to punch me. Once. In the shoulder.”

Cabaro slinked around the lagoon, his body lazy and relaxed. But there was a flash in his eyes that made Conor uneasy. Then he realized: The lion was edging toward them.

“Watch out —!” Conor started to warn.

Cabaro sprang. The cat was high in the air, and came down with claws outstretched, right onto Briggan’s back. The lion’s teeth sank deep into the wolf’s neck and clamped tight. As soon as the massive Great Beast impacted him, Briggan was prone on the ground, pressed beneath Cabaro’s weight. His breath came only in strangled gasps.

Rollan leaped toward the giant lion, dagger outstretched. Cabaro was so big, and had pounced so far up on the back of Briggan, that the best the boy could manage was to reach his paw. Rollan’s dagger sank into one of Cabaro’s foot pads. Cabaro glanced only momentarily at the annoyance, never lessening his clamp on Briggan’s throat. With a roar that seemed to shake the very ground beneath their feet, the lion clenched harder.

Briggan’s eyes bulged wide, his mouth agape. The wolf wasn’t even able to gasp anymore. “He’s crushing his windpipe!” Conor cried, running forward, swinging his hand ax wildly.

“Watch for the lionesses!” Irtike shouted. The cats were circling around, maneuvering themselves behind the group. Tarik whirled on them, his curved sword outstretched. When he whipped it through the air, the lionesses paused.

Mindless with fury, Conor grabbed handfuls of Briggan’s fur and climbed up his side. Hand by hand, he reached for Cabaro’s pelt. The lion twisted beneath Conor’s fingers, the muscles thick, hot cords within the cat’s body. Once he’d reached Cabaro’s ribs, Conor reared his ax back and sank it as deep as he could into the cat’s back.

Though Conor’s aim was true, the blade made only a superficial wound on the giant beast. Still, the great cat howled in pain. Cabaro released his stranglehold on Briggan and leaped from the wolf, his claws raking Briggan’s flesh as he launched. Cabaro twisted in the air and landed in the midst of his lionesses. Conor was rocketed off, tumbling through the air.

Cabaro roared, powerful and deafening. The lazy, smiling cat was gone. This was a savage opponent, the strongest they’d yet seen, made even more fearsome by his swirling lionesses, snapping and snarling.

“At my side!” Tarik called, waving his companions to him. “Back to back!”

Irtike was already there, and Rollan joined her, shoulder to shoulder. Conor wouldn’t leave Briggan’s side, though. The Great Wolf was breathing but seemed stunned — he tried to get to his feet and failed. “It’s okay,” Conor whispered, stroking Briggan’s paw. “You’re going to be okay.”

Tarik brought Irtike and Rollan over to Conor, and together they took positions around Briggan, weapons at the ready to protect their friend. Essix hovered above, talons out, wings whipping up dust.

Cabaro and his lionesses circled them, lunging and feinting, long teeth gleaming. Each time a lioness came close, Tarik or Rollan lashed out with his weapon. Conor would have joined them, but his ax was gone, lost in the tumult. For the moment, their mock attacks seemed to be keeping the lions at bay — just. But Conor started hearing something that alarmed him: Wild dogs were yipping at their backs.

“Dogs too? This is impossible!” Rollan said, just loudly enough for his companions to hear. “We don’t stand a chance!”

“Retreating is not an option,” Tarik said. “None of us could outrun any of the lionesses.”

His companions covering him, Conor inspected the deep gashes on Briggan’s neck. Tears of worry and anger dotted his eyes. “Briggan’s hurt badly.”

Conor’s vision swam as he looked at his hands. They were soaked in bright red blood. Briggan’s blood.

“He must go into his dormant form,” Tarik ordered. “Now. Before he bleeds out here.”

Conor nodded. He focused his energy and stared deep in to Briggan’s panicked eyes, begging him to go. Then, with a familiar searing snap, Briggan was gone, back to a tattoo on Conor’s arm.

One of the lionesses whirled, looked at the jungle’s edge, and gave a startled cry. Irtike followed her gaze and, Snake Eyes in hand, closed her eyes.

“Gentlemen,” Irtike said softly, her focus in the trees, “our situation is about to get much worse.”

THE PLAN

MEILIN WAS SURROUNDED BY DEPRESSED RATS.

She didn't know how many hours she'd sat motionless in the corner of the dank abandoned customs house, hidden away against a wall of slimy rotten wood, the rats skittering near. Once they'd gotten close to Meilin and Jhi, though, each one seemed to give up on moving, and lay flat on the floor. Meilin knew this was probably Jhi protecting her by pacifying them, but it seemed as if the rats felt the sadness coming from the girl, and were struck motionless by the weight of it.

On the other side of the thin walls, Meilin could hear running feet, urgent conversations, and the creaks and groans of ships being manned for sea. But no one had come inside and found her yet. She was still alive.

The customs house stayed silent. The floor was damp and smelled faintly of past cargoes, of oily fish and quicklime and spilled ale. There were lines of grime on the floor around the crates, and the sawdust on the ground was dotted with mold.

Jhi sat on the floor with her back to Meilin, who was picking absently through the panda's coarse hair, removing any bits of dirt she came across. Meilin wished she could do something to help Abeke — but only the speed of their ship would determine Abeke and Shane's fate now. There was nothing

Meilin could do about that.

But it wasn't truly Abeke who Meilin was thinking about now. Meilin had seen plenty of people fall in recent months, but strangely, Drina's death tormented her most of all.

First was the terrible swiftness of it. Drina had gone from living to dead in the space of seconds. Meilin also found it hard not to replay the moment of the bite over and over — those fangs had sliced the thin skin of Drina's wrist like a knife. The girl might have died from the blood loss even if the poison hadn't been so lethal.

As if sensing Meilin's dark thoughts, Jhi swung her head around and caught her gaze. The panda's silver eyes drooped at the corners. Meilin avoided Jhi's melancholy stare.

Because what struck her most was the fact that Drina had been killed by her own spirit animal. Meilin had no idea what went on in a spider's mind, but the animal had been bonded to Drina. Gerathon's influence had been enough to subvert the spirit animal bond — something deep and primal and sacred. If Gerathon could force a spirit animal against its owner, then the serpent could make someone who was poisoned by the Bile do anything.

Someone like Meilin.

Could Gerathon turn her against Jhi? She wouldn't know until she woke up from a dream and found out after the fact, discovered the panda wounded or dying by her side. Meilin realized with a start that it was only a matter of time before Gerathon used her mental link to track her down; that meant she had only a short time before she'd be caught.

She had to act now.

"Jhi," Meilin whispered. "We passed an armory when we were fleeing. We're going back there."

When Meilin got to her feet, the rats stood as well, shook their heads groggily, and limped away into nearby crates. Then Jhi got up to all fours. There was excitement in the panda's eyes — finally, they were fighting back.

Breath held, Meilin cracked open the door to the docks, then let it close again. She had no intention of getting herself captured the moment she walked out of the customs house. A trio of guards was right at the waterfront, staring out to sea with a spyglass. Meilin figured it was a good sign if they needed a spyglass to see Abeke and Shane.

“Jhi, I need you to go dormant. You’re too big. You’ll attract attention.”

The panda looked at her placidly, her only motion one long blink.

“Jhi,” Meilin said warningly, “go dormant this instant.”

Jhi flicked one ear at her, and her head rocked to one side.

“Did you just shake your head? At the daughter of General Teng of Zhong?”

Jhi only stared.

“Fine!” Meilin said. She pressed her will around Jhi. The panda took on an even more mournful look, her essence squeezed tight, and then she disappeared into her tattoo.

“I’m sorry, Jhi,” Meilin said, shaking her head, keenly aware of the trespass she had just made. “It’s for the best.” Her father used to say those words to her, when work was going to take him away for weeks. Always with love. Meilin gritted her teeth.

She knew those soldiers would only keep their attention trained on the sea for so long — she had to move. Meilin opened the rickety door again, wincing when the corroded joints squeaked. The men still had their backs to her. She slipped along the side of the building, away from the docks.

Just like in the outposts of Zhong, the manor’s armory was within its walls, so guards could easily arm themselves while they defended their leaders. That meant Meilin would have to pass back up the alleys of the city’s derelict shops and houses and find a way through the portcullis gate. She took a deep breath, then stole forward.

She did as Rollan had once instructed her, following the technique he’d learned during his Amayan street rat days: run along a wall, slow at the corner, peer around, then run along the next wall. It was the split seconds between walls that were dangerous. Most thieves got nabbed in the open space between corners. As she sprinted and paused, sprinted and paused, Meilin imagined Rollan was with her, his pace matching hers. She might have received more formal training than he had, might have more breeding and etiquette, but right here, right now, he would have outclassed her. Meilin desperately wished he could be alongside her.

It wasn't hard to tell when a Conqueror was coming near — they moved heedlessly through their stronghold, heeled boots clomping. With plenty of advance warning, Meilin was able to make her way back to the manor wall without much difficulty. She hid in the shade of a stable and peered at the main entrance, debating what to do.

Everyone else must have been down at the port, readying ships to go after Abeke and Shane (and, they must have assumed, Meilin). Only one soldier remained at the entry, standing worriedly in the open space, his spear resting against a wall. He looked young to Meilin — a recent recruit, all nerves and insecurity.

He would do perfectly.

After making sure no one was nearby, Meilin summoned Jhi. When the panda appeared, she stared at Meilin balefully. "I'm sorry I forced you away," Meilin said curtly, "but you don't sneak well. You just don't. It's a fact."

While Jhi continued her accusing stare, Meilin pointed at the guard and whispered, "Can you calm him? Just so he doesn't attack me right away. Please do that for me."

Jhi looked at her with what Meilin thought was distrust, and it made her heart quake. Then the panda sighed and noiselessly padded out of the shadows. The guard saw her, opened his mouth to yell, then went strangely limp. His knees bent and his arms hung at his side, hands open, the sword clattering to the ground. He looked like a kid who had come across a fluffy bunny and melted at the cuteness of it.

Steadying her breath, Meilin stepped out of the shadows and joined Jhi.

At first the guard stayed relaxed. Then his face contorted and he picked up his sword, advancing on Meilin and Jhi. Meilin let him come, her hands at her sides.

She felt Jhi's eyes on her and knew the panda was relaxed; this soldier was nothing Meilin couldn't handle. But when the girl continued to hold still, Jhi's usually serene eyes flickered with fear. When the boy was almost within striking distance and Meilin hadn't yet crouched into a fighting stance, Jhi cast her gaze back to the Conqueror, probably working her hardest to calm him again.

The guard stepped closer, sword outstretched.

Meilin knew she had to fight him if she wanted to get to the armory. But suddenly, faced with this nervous boy not much older than herself, she couldn't bring herself to do it. How could she kill someone who was doing his duty? After her own betrayal, nothing was as clear as it once was, and without that clarity, her resolve wouldn't tighten into the will to fight.

The soldier raised his sword.

Jhi roared. Meilin startled. She'd never heard the sound from the panda before. Then Jhi was on her back legs, mouth open, teeth bared. The roar became louder, then Jhi slammed down on the soldier, swiping with her paw. Her claw caught him in the middle of his chest, and he sprawled back, skidding across the sandstone floor. He was out cold.

The panda got back to all fours, breathing heavily. Her breathing slowed, and she regained her usual composure.

"Jhi," Meilin said, staring at Jhi with her mouth wide open. "What just happened?"

She gave Meilin a long look, as if to say, Well, you weren't going to do anything.

Meilin looked at her companion with newfound wonder, then tilted her head. Footsteps approached — she was running out of time. Meilin ducked through the entranceway and into the shaded edges of the courtyard, Jhi tailing close beside her.

Pressed against the inside of the manor's wall was a narrow stone structure with an angled thatch roof. The iron-banded door was ajar, and through the portal Meilin could see a halberd. Its curved blade caught a glint of the midday sun.

She and Jhi skirted the wall and ducked inside, Jhi's wide backside only just managing to fit through. Meilin pressed the door nearly closed, leaving it ajar only enough so that a stray beam of sunlight illuminated the interior.

Jhi looked enormous in the narrow armory. The panda sat in the middle of the room and gazed around wonderingly, holding her forelimbs tight to her chest so they didn't knock over the racks of weapons. Meilin too scanned over the contents. The quality wasn't nearly as high as Zhongese weapons — even in the dim light she could see rust along the blades — but there was a broad range to choose from. Some Niloan spears, probably seized from conquered villages, and plenty of weapons the Conquerors must have brought from Stetriol. Polearms lined one wall, crossbows another, and swords the last. Dangling above it all were the secondary tools of war: shields and caltrops, scabbards and sharpening stones. Jhi followed Meilin's eyes as they wandered around the armory, taking in all the options along with her companion.

Meilin paced the walls, fingertips trailing the shaft of a poleax, the trigger of a crossbow. Then she found something that would suit her purpose. Gracefully boosting herself atop a weapon rack, she reached high along the wall. The item she wanted was almost out of reach, and straining for it made a quiver clatter to the ground. Meilin flinched, going still, but a moment later she stretched again and just managed to snag it.

As Meilin pounced back to the floor, Jhi squinted at her. Then she saw what Meilin was holding and lumbered forward, growling again. Meilin wondered at the panda's new assertive side, but figured her own unusual behavior was probably bringing it out.

"Stop, Jhi," Meilin said softly. "I have to do this. You understand why."

Jhi hesitated, then took another step forward. "Jhi," Meilin said warningly, "don't try to block me."

Baffled and sad, Jhi reached out toward the heavy object in Meilin's hands and pawed at the air. Her growl began to sound more like a whine.

Meilin turned her back on Jhi and kneeled on the floor. She dropped the heavy metal device into her lap. Manacles.

Jhi tugged on Meilin's shoulder with her paw, trying to spin her around. But Meilin shrugged her off. She opened one of the manacles and placed her wrist inside, then closed it and turned the key. Jhi crying all the while, Meilin did the same to her other wrist.

She stared at her manacled wrists in her lap, almost too heavy to lift. These handcuffs were strong, and would be very difficult to remove. She dropped the key into a quiver, chosen at random. It tinkled against the wooden shafts as it fell to the bottom of the leather case. It would be nearly impossible to free her, even if Gerathon possessed her. Then, sighing heavily, Meilin slumped to the ground and closed her eyes.

No matter if Gerathon entered her mind now. There was no way to betray her companions here in the Conqueror base, and if she was in manacles, there was no way to use her against Jhi. Mind control didn't matter if the body was useless.

Meilin was still facing away from Jhi, but she could sense the panda behind her. "Now we just wait to be discovered."

She could hear Jhi's labored breathing. "I'm sorry," Meilin said, scrunching her eyes shut, her voice hitching. "I'm ... sorry."

The sound got closer. She could feel the panda's breath hot on the back of her neck.

"I'm ashamed, Jhi," Meilin whispered. "I'm so ashamed."

Jhi's body was warm. "I need you to go back to a tattoo," Meilin said. "So you can be safe."

But Jhi didn't budge. If Meilin wanted her to go dormant, she'd have to force her. "Even you don't trust me," Meilin said. "And I don't blame you. I've lost everyone and everything."

Suddenly there was something heavy, rough, and warm on Meilin's shoulders. It pressed, too strong to resist, and Meilin was on her back. She looked up through teary vision to see Jhi staring down at her. The giant panda's face wasn't usually expressive, but Meilin knew what was shining out of Jhi.

Love.

Meilin put her hands over her eyes, the manacle's chain heavy against her throat.

Jhi shifted so she too was laid out on the floor beside Meilin. There was barely room for the two of them, and as Jhi moved she sent a rack of knives clattering to the ground. Guards would be upon them soon.

But for right now, it was just the two of them. Some of the guilt binding Meilin's heart loosened. It wasn't that Jhi distrusted her. Jhi loved her, and didn't want her to be alone.

Meilin turned toward Jhi, clutched the panda's long coarse fur in her fists, and pressed her face into her belly. Jhi leaned over and gave Meilin's forehead small licks, over and over, like she was a panda cub that needed cleaning. At first Meilin hated the sensation of being so helpless, but soon found herself enjoying it.

“Thank you, Jhi,” Meilin said softly, even as she heard booted footsteps approaching the armory door.

It struck her that she couldn’t have asked for a better spirit animal to get her through this guilt — a weight that she’d been carrying since the Hundred Isles. Since before that, maybe. Meilin never forgave anything — least of all herself.

Jhi forgave everything.

“I’m lucky, Jhi,” Meilin said as the door creaked open and the first Conquerors barged in. “I’m so lucky that you came to me.”

Jhi gave her a long lick down her cheek and snuggled in closer, putting her arms around Meilin protectively.

TARIK

“WAIT,” ROLLAN SAID. “YOU MEAN WE HAVE MORE COMPANY? Cabaro and four lionesses weren’t enough?”

“And wild dogs,” Conor said, looking around nervously. “I heard wild dogs too.”

“I can sense something very heavy,” Irtike said, eyes closed, “approaching through the jungle.”

Then Rollan heard the crashing sounds too. A distant treetop trembled and fell, then another. The next one to drop was even nearer. Cabaro and his lionesses heard it too, and froze in mid-step.

Cabaro whirled in a tight circle, his hackles raised to make him look even more enormous. Conor shuddered. Without Meilin or Abeke, and Briggan too wounded to fight, they were at the Great Lion’s mercy once he returned to the attack.

As more and more treetops fell, Cabaro whirled on them and snarled. “Are these more of your Greencloaks, come to help you? Your allies are destroying this fragile oasis. Hard to trumpet your goodness now, isn’t it?”

Tarik shook his head. “I warned you, Cabaro. Those are not Greencloaks. They are Conquerors, allies of the Devourer. And they are not here to talk reason.”

Rollan looked at the jeweled Golden Lion, secure around Cabaro's neck, then at the crashing treetops, heading ever nearer. Maybe Essix could try again to seize the talisman, but Rollan was loathe even to suggest it. One swipe from Cabaro's paw would be the end of the falcon.

They needed the talisman, but the very worst possibility was that the Conquerors would get it. The idea of Zerif holding the Golden Lion in triumph made Rollan furious. "Run!" he yelled to Cabaro. "Run and we'll delay the Conquerors. Save your talisman!"

"Run?" Cabaro said. "Do you not realize who I am? Cabaro runs from no enemy."

"Rollan speaks wisely," Tarik said. "For your own good and that of all of Erdas, please flee."

"Save your breath," Irtike murmured. "It's too late."

The greenery at the clearing's edge parted, and a giant black form barreled through, sidwinding into the clearing. It twisted and reared. Two scaled wings at either side of its head fanned out into a hood, and the snubbed permanent smile on the snake's face widened to show two fangs, long as swords.

Gerathon was here.

At the sight of the enormous cobra, Cabaro whirled, snarling. The lion was trapped — one way out was blocked by Gerathon, and the other by Rollan and his group. Remembering how aggressive the lone lion in Okaihee had become after it had been trapped, Rollan felt his body go numb with fear. Cabaro would have to attack them or Gerathon in order to escape, and Rollan knew which was the easier target.

Gerathon swayed, staring down each of them in turn and hissing. The Great Beast was so long — it was hard to imagine that she couldn't immediately strike anyone she wanted to hit. Behind her emerged a leather-armored figure. Zerif.

"Cabaro!" Tarik called. "Get behind us."

But anger flashed in Cabaro's eyes. He was taking orders from no one, especially not a human.

Rollan waited for Gerathon to speak, but Tarik had been right: She wasn't here to convince anyone of anything. The giant serpent reared and then, quick as an arrow, struck. The nearest lioness was trapped neatly between her fangs.

Gerathon hurled her to one side. She wouldn't have needed to use her poison — there was no way the lioness could have survived that blow. Then Gerathon struck again, and another lioness was punctured. She'd killed two full-grown lionesses in as many seconds.

Except for Cabaro, none of them could hope to match Gerathon for quickness. As she hurled the second lioness to one side, the giant lion roared and pounced, his jaw clamping right behind Gerathon's hood. The lion shook his head. Any smaller beast would have been flailing through the air, but Gerathon was too massive. She was motionless in the lion's mouth, her tail the only part of her that was thrashing.

The remaining lionesses pounced on that tail and sank their teeth in. The serpent thrashed, and everyone but Cabaro went flying. One of the lionesses struck a palm tree hard and lay still. Cabaro roared with the exertion, his eyes wide with fury, barely managing to hold on.

One eye on his wounded lionesses, Cabaro strained to stay locked onto the coiling and uncoiling snake. Then Gerathon went into a rapid twist, and Cabaro was thrown. Within an instant Gerathon's hood was high above him, and she struck.

Cabaro dodged quickly enough to prevent her fangs from sinking into his throat, but the cobra still managed to bite deeply into his rear thigh. The giant lion whirled and bit into Gerathon's hood, opening a deep gash in the scaly leather. Gerathon released him, and the moment Cabaro was free he leaped away — right between Rollan and Conor.

Panicked and snarling, Cabaro lunged at Conor first. The boy managed to roll away in the nick of time, bowling over Irtike and Snake Eyes in the process. The mole rat went flying, and Irtike scrambled after him on all fours. Then Cabaro streaked for the nearest way out of the clearing, swiping out viciously at the only thing in his path.

Rollan.

The world seemed to slow. The cat's giant paw was headed right for him, as if Rollan had shrunk to the size of a common mouse. All he saw were the rough pads of Cabaro's paw, the claws splaying out like daggers, coming nearer and nearer until it filled his vision.

Then, suddenly, he was spinning in the air.

At first all he was aware of was the blazing pain in his side. Then Rollan regained more of his senses, and discovered he was at the far shore of the lagoon. Disoriented, he shook his head and tried to stand.

Only to see a large shape barreling down on him.

“Hey —!” Rollan said, and then he was whisked into the air again. He bumped wildly against the ground as he was dragged, splashing through the water. He struggled furiously, dagger flailing, but couldn’t manage to connect with his captor.

“Put that thing away!” roared a gruff voice.

“Tarik?” Rollan said, astonished.

They disappeared into the greenery. “Get to your feet!” Tarik ordered, releasing the collar of Rollan’s shirt.

Rollan staggered up.

“Now,” Tarik said. “Run!”

They hurtled into the underbrush. “What ... happened?” Rollan asked as they ran.

“Cabaro fled,” Tarik panted. “And Gerathon followed him ... Lucky I got you away first.”

The tall man vaulted a fallen tree, and then reached back to assist Rollan. He continued speaking as they raced through the brush, his words fractured as Rollan struggled to stay near. “... split up. They went one way ... and here we are.”

With a shriek and a crash, Essix broke through the oasis canopy and landed on Rollan’s shoulder. She called out, and Rollan stopped, searching around. Tarik held still beside him.

They’d reached the far side of the oasis. The trees disappeared, replaced by a spit of sand. A cliff face towered before them, at least fifty feet high, hugging the oasis. Rollan could tell from the relatively relaxed grip of Essix’s talons that they were out of immediate danger. “We’re not being followed,” he informed Tarik. “And it’s a good thing too, since we’re trapped.”

Tarik pointed to Essix. “Do you think you could —”

“On it,” Rollan said. “Essix, can you find Conor and Irtike?”

“And Cabaro,” Tarik added.

With a sharp cry, Essix took to the air.

“That means yes, I hope?” Tarik asked, watching Essix fly off.

“Yeah,” Rollan said, wincing at the pain in his ribs. “That means yes.”

Lumeo poked out of Tarik’s satchel and peered concernedly at Rollan’s side.

“That looks bad,” Tarik said. “Would you let me look at it?”

“Don’t worry, it doesn’t feel too bad.” Rollan said. Then he looked at his torso and saw his shirt was gashed and bloody. Cabaro must have slashed him when he hurled him to one side. Only now that he was looking at it did the wound begin to throb with pain.

They heard a loud shriek from above. Rollan peered up at the sky and then back at Tarik, his wound temporarily forgotten. “Sounds like Essix found Conor and Irtike.”

From within the oasis they heard shouts and clashing steel, along with the angry yips of wild dogs. “I don’t hear the voices of anyone we know,” Tarik said, “which means it’s probably Cabaro’s forces attacking the Conquerors.”

Rollan closed his eyes and let his vision merge with Essix’s. He immediately felt a surge of relief when he saw what the falcon saw: Conor and Irtike were alive. At the edge of the oasis they must have found a route where the ground rose shallowly enough that they’d been able to climb up to the cliff top above. They ran along its edge, high over the oasis. Every step they took near the precipice sent rocks skittering down the sheer fifty-foot drop.

“Come on,” Rollan said, and took off. “At the far side of the oasis, there’s a trail leading up to the top. That’s where Conor and Irtike are.”

Rollan and Tarik took off along the bottom of the cliff, making good time on the barren ground. Soon the cliff opened on the left, where a rocky streambed carved through. It was a narrow canyon, nearly dark, but from what he’d seen through Essix’s eyes, Rollan suspected it would take them up to the top.

Rollan and Tarik hurried, scrambling over logs and bumping their knees on rocks. Essix soared above them, her urgent cries pulling them onward.

The canyon was tough going, but Rollan could sense it sloping upward.

“We’re heading up!” he shouted to Tarik. “We’ll be out on the cliff top soon.”

“Then we’ll have a view of what’s going on in the oasis,” Tarik said, gasping as he struggled forward. From the security of Tarik's satchel, Lumeo gave him encouraging squeaks.

There was a ribbon of sky above them, slowly widening as they ascended. "We're getting nearer," Rollan said. "Just a little farther now."

Then Essix's cry intensified into a shriek. Rollan looked up in alarm. A figure was at the top of the cliff, a dozen feet above. He was silhouetted by the sun, but the outline was unmistakable. Cabaro.

"Hurry," Rollan said, dashing forward under the lion's watchful eye. But then he heard a terrible grinding sound from above.

With a loud crash, the canyon went black.

Rollan was thrown from his feet, against Tarik. Together they tumbled to the rocky floor.

When the cloud of dust settled, Rollan saw what had happened: Cabaro had dropped a boulder on them. It was jagged and broad, and would easily have killed them if it had hit directly. But it hadn't, and from what he'd seen of Cabaro's agility, that had to have been his intention. What he'd done instead was block the way forward.

"He's trapped us!" Rollan said. "But why trap us when he could have just aimed that boulder nearer and killed us instead?"

They heard grunting behind them, and skittering rocks. Like something huge was passing up the canyon toward them.

"Because he doesn't need to kill us," Tarik said. He loosened his curved sword in its scabbard. "Not if someone else will do it for him."

"Oh, no," Rollan said, withdrawing his dagger. "Gerathon?"

"Or Zerif," Tarik said grimly. "Lumeo, we'll need all the help we can get."

The otter jumped out of Tarik's satchel and circled around his feet, teeth bared.

The rumbling sound got louder. Rollan watched as a nearby rock trembled from the vibrations of the approaching enemy.

"Tarik," Rollan said. "If that's Gerathon, I don't think we can take her on our own."

Tarik lay a hand on Rollan's shoulder. "We have to. So we will."

One final rasping sound, and then Gerathon appeared from around the corner. The giant serpent nearly filled the canyon, only barely able to maneuver through. Gerathon read their perilous situation in an instant and streaked toward them, mouth terrifyingly wide, yellow fangs glistening.

Tarik took a fighting crouch, holding his curved blade in two hands. Lumeo scampered to the top of a boulder and reared on his back legs, ready to pounce. Essix landed on the boulder next to Lumeo, sharp beak open. Rollan stood with his dagger up and one leg lunged forward, bracing for impact. As much as it was worth, they were ready.

Then Rollan saw who was with Gerathon.

Around the corner, right at Gerathon's tail, was Gar. The huge man with the horned helmet strode forward, nearly as fast as the giant serpent.

It would be Gerathon who hit them first, though, and with the might of a battering ram. Her body wound far from side to side, the better to work up more power to muscle forward.

Rollan's will faltered. Gerathon and Gar: They really had no chance. There was no way to escape, and no way they could fend off these two. If Rollan had the Slate Elephant to enlarge Essix, or the Granite Ram to leap away, they could use them to run. But Conor had both. The only talisman Rollan had was the Coral Octopus.

At her current size, the falcon wouldn't be able to do much more than harass their enemies. Unless Briggan or Uraza appeared out of nowhere, they were doomed.

When the serpent was only a second away, Rollan saw Gerathon shift so she was heading directly for him. Tarik saw it too, and before Rollan could react he'd lunged in front. It was hard to make anything out during the flash of impact, just black scales and brown flesh. Rollan heard an agonized cry, and realized with shock that Tarik had been bitten by the serpent's enormous fang. A savage wound punctured his thigh.

"You must be Tarik," a voice intoned, muffled but resonant behind the helmet.

Gerathon reared, her black hood nearly blotting out the sky, only a bare sliver of blue visible behind her. The elder Greencloak stood his ground, bleeding profusely from the wound on his leg. Already he was shuddering from the venom, his hands and legs trembling. Rollan had seen such movements before. Early death throes.

“Tarik ...” Rollan whimpered. “Tarik, hold on.”

Gar unfastened straps on either side of his helmet. “I’ve heard much about you. The stalwart Greencloak guardian, one of their finest warriors. I’ll admit, I had hoped to cross blades with you someday. I’d have preferred to fight you unhobbled by poison, but Gerathon was ... eager.”

While Gar removed his helmet, Tarik turned so he faced Rollan. “Run!” he hissed. “Run while I delay them.”

Gar had it off now. He had large eyes, his skin pale and smooth, pinked across the nose and cheeks by the Niloan sun. His mouth was twisted with contempt. “Though you have failed to protect these children, you have at least fought with honor. I will make your death quick.”

While Gar held his greatsword high, Tarik’s shudders turned into convulsions. His face, normally tan and full of life, had become as gray as slate. He blinked once, twice, his eyes flicking to the boulder behind them, only sluggishly returning to Gar and Gerathon. “Rollan ... the octopus.”

Of course. The Coral Octopus would allow Rollan to shrink and slip through a crevice. He might be able to use it to pass through the crack between the boulder and the canyon wall. But that would mean ...

Gerathon hissed in fury and slithered forward, rocks grinding to dust beneath her massive body.

“Hold, Gerathon,” Gar called, raising his greatsword high. “This one is mine. We must retrieve the talisman, above all else. You go find Cabaro.”

“You will not order me around like a common soldier!” the Great Serpent hissed, her voice reverberating against the cavern walls. “I am not your subject, General.”

“I’m not leaving you,” Rollan whispered to Tarik, his dagger outstretched, so puny in the face of the combined might of Gar and Gerathon.

With great effort, Tarik managed to keep his sword raised against the enemy, its tip wildly trembling, drawing circles in the air. His eyes were glassy, but even so, they flashed with anger. “I’ll be dead in seconds. Go! Don’t let the last thing I see be losing you.”

Rollan fished the Coral Octopus out of his bag and held it in his fingers, his hands trembling so much he nearly dropped it.

Lumeo scampered from the boulder and stood on Tarik's shoulder, teeth bared. Essix lunged into the air, doing her best to harry Gar. It was working for the moment — Gar feinted left and right, lashing out with the pommel of his sword, trying to avoid the bird's outstretched talons. "Tarik!" Rollan sobbed. "Don't do this."

In desperation, Rollan tugged Tarik's cloak toward the impassable boulder. With a snap, the clasp broke, and Rollan tumbled backward, the green fabric all that remained in his hands.

Tarik turned, sword in hand, and saw the cloak draped in Rollan's arms. An unexpected expression passed over his face. Hope.

That moment of distraction was all the advantage Gar needed. He brought his two-handed sword whipping through the air at Tarik. Essix only barely escaped the slash, feathers flying as she wheeled into the sky. But she managed to snag Gar's gloved hand as she went, and his mighty blade went wide. Gar readied his greatsword to strike again, grunting with exertion as he heaved the weapon high over his head.

With one hand Rollan gripped Tarik's cloak, and with the other he clasped the Coral Octopus. The edges of Rollan's vision wavered, then he became liquid and limitless. Suddenly weightless, Rollan slipped toward the boulder. He arrived at the edge, and when it met the solid surface his body became ooze, slipping easily through the scant inches of space between boulder and cliff wall.

As soon as he was on the other side, Rollan let go of the Coral Octopus and felt his boundaries sharpen again. He got to his feet in the dark canyon. Rollan kneeled and stared through the few inches of space between the boulder and the cliff wall. It was too narrow to make out what was happening on the other side, but he heard grunts and metal clanging against metal. Then, after a gasp and a horrible grinding noise, everything went silent.

Rollan stared at the small patch of ground visible through the crack. All he could spy was a booted foot, motionless. He squinted, trying to figure out whose it was.

Rollan gasped as a large, furious eye filled his vision. He and Gar stared at each other, breathing hard, their faces inches apart. There was no way, even with Gerathon's help, that Gar would be able to budge the boulder. Rollan was safe for now. But it meant little to him.

Because Tarik was dead.

Rollan heard a familiar chattering, and Gar suddenly whirled, disappearing from view. Lumeo was on the attack. Though he desperately maneuvered around the crack, Rollan could no longer see Gar and the otter. He heard scuffling, and Essix shrieking. Gerathon was moving too — Rollan could hear more rocks crunching under her massive bulk. Lumeo had to be more agile than Gar or even Gerathon, but in the face of their might, Rollan knew there was only one way this could end.

“Lumeo, get over here!” Rollan shouted. It was possible the otter might be able to fit through the gap between boulder and canyon wall. But there were only the sounds of continued fighting. Tears in his eyes, Rollan listened to the footfalls and grunting.

He heard an agonized cry from Lumeo.

Then there was silence.

With a familiar whoosh Essix landed on Rollan's shoulder, her talons digging in. Rollan imagined what the falcon was telling him: They gave their lives to buy you extra seconds to survive. Don't waste them.

It all came over Rollan fresh. Tarik was dead. Lumeo was dead. An anguished sob wracked his body.

And then, gripping Tarik's cloak tightly in his fist, Rollan turned and ran for his life.

THE GOLDEN LION

WHEN THE BATTLE IN THE OASIS HAD BROKEN APART, Conor and Irtike had fled headlong into the nearest trees, whipping past branches and startling songbirds that rose into the air in waves. Conor nearly ran into Essix as they fled — the falcon was diving in the other direction, to Rollan’s aid, and he soon lost sight of her in the trees.

After minutes of heedless running, Irtike had called for them to stop. Holding Snake Eyes in her hand, she closed her eyes and spoke. “I can sense many feet vibrating the ground nearby,” she reported. “But they’re all behind us and moving away.”

“Oh,” Conor said. “We’re safe, then.” It did little to relieve him, though: If they were safe, it only meant that Rollan and Tarik were probably the ones in danger.

Irtike paused again, clutching Snake Eyes. “There are many mole rat warrens in the soil around here, and Snake Eyes is in contact with them. It seems to be strengthening my abilities. I can sense a large creature shaking the ground above us. It’s on the cliff side overlooking the oasis. Something huge ... It vanishes for a second at a time, and then pounds the ground. I think it’s leaping.”

“Cabaro,” Conor said. “That’s got to be him, right? Let’s head up there. We can only hope we find Rollan and Tarik on the way.”

With renewed purpose, they forced their way through the dense foliage. Irtike was the first to reach the edge, and peeked out from between palm fronds. “The Conquerors are all massed at the desert’s edge, where they entered,” she said. “But they’re streaming into the oasis. I can’t detect any up on the cliffs.”

“So we’ll have Cabaro to ourselves,” Conor said, not exactly relishing the thought. “But we should find Rollan and Tarik first.”

“Given their numbers, if we wander the oasis, we’ll probably run into a group of Conquerors.”

“Okay, then,” Conor said grimly. “It’s up to us to get the Golden Lion from Cabaro. Alone.”

Irtike peered up into his eyes. “We can do it.” She didn’t sound especially convinced.

“We’ll have to,” Conor said grimly. “It’s our only hope.”

“Come on,” Irtike said. “At one side of the oasis is a shallow enough incline that we should be able to scramble up.”

They picked their way along the cliff face at the back of the oasis, Irtike leading the way, Snake Eyes tight in her hand. Sure enough, they came to an area of the cliff that was partially fallen — it would still be a steep climb, but they should be able to make it.

Irtike ascended with a sureness that astonished Conor. Her slender feet chose only the rocks that wouldn’t slide away. He tailed after her, choosing the same surfaces she did. After a few minutes of exertion, they were above the tree line. Their position felt dangerously exposed, but he heard no cries from the Conquerors in the oasis, nor could he see any — their enemies were shrouded by the thick greenery. The passage shallowed out more as they neared the top, but also turned gravelly. They switched to all fours when the terrain got clogged with shards of sandstone. As they reached the summit, the vantage point was finally high enough for Conor to see the extent of the army below. Hundreds of soldiers swarmed the far edge of the oasis. The wild dogs were fleeing into the desert, chased by Conquerors on horseback.

The top of the cliff was an open desert mesa above the oasis, the ground made of dry, cracked stone. Conor and Irtike crouched behind a boulder. It was their last opportunity for cover before they emerged into the open. “Cabaro’s vibrations in the earth are near,” Irtike reported. “He’s at the center of the mesa. We should see him to our left when we emerge.”

He leaned out, and indeed saw Cabaro not a hundred yards away. Conor cautiously stepped out into the open, Irtike at his side. He had no chance of besting the giant cat in open combat, he knew, but he figured he’d try to talk Cabaro into putting the Golden Lion into Greencloak hands — maybe now that he could see the Conqueror army with his own eyes, he’d be more willing to collaborate.

Cabaro spotted them immediately, and went from a run to a sprint, heading right for them, the muscles of his long body rippling. Seeing the giant cat bearing down, Conor went numb. His empty hands seemed like feeble weapons indeed, and fear set his pulse to pounding so violently that his thoughts beat against one another. “Ir ... Irtike ...” he mumbled. “Run. Run!”

Irtike had Snake Eyes in hand, and held him right in front of her face. Some part of Conor noticed what she was doing, and figured she might be saying her final good-byes to her spirit animal. But then something strange happened. Something Conor would have thought impossible.

Cabaro disappeared.

The lion was hurtling forward, and then suddenly he was gone, vanished into the earth. Then he emerged again, scrambling out of a pit. After he’d managed to struggle out, he sprawled onto the earth on all fours. He started forward, but the ground gave out under him again. “What’s happening?” Conor asked Irtike.

She didn’t answer. Conor looked at Irtike and saw she still had Snake Eyes in front of her, staring deep into his ugly face. “Irtike?” Conor asked.

This time the hole in the ground expanded before Cabaro could struggle out of it. Conor was baffled. Cabaro had spent centuries living in this area — wouldn’t he know better than to run where the ground couldn’t support him? Then something struck Conor.

“Irtike,” he said, “are you doing this?”

She didn’t answer, deep in concentration. Sweat was pouring down her face.

The hole in the earth continued to grow. With a great roar, sandstone and soil tumbled into its gaping maw. Cabaro had sunk enough that Conor could only see the top of his mane as he tried to leap free. The force of his jumps only made the ground collapse more, though. With a yowl, Cabaro stumbled and fell deeper into the crumbling rock.

The sinkhole stopped growing bigger, and for a moment its edges quivered. Then the sides began tumbling toward the middle. With a sliding roar, the sinkhole filled in — with Cabaro trapped in the center. Only his head was visible, the rest of the Great Beast immobilized under the pressing soil.

Conor gingerly tested the ground. It felt crumbly under his foot, but held under his lesser weight. Cautiously stepping over the upturned earth to the spot where Cabaro was mired, Conor stared down at the Great Beast. Despite the memory of the grievous wounds Cabaro had caused Briggan, he felt pity for such a mighty animal to be brought so low.

“I’m sorry,” he said to Cabaro, “but we need the Golden Lion. For the good of Erdas.”

The lion glowered at him. The earth trapping him puckered and shifted. He must have been struggling under the surface.

Conor eased even nearer. Best to seize the talisman before Cabaro managed to free himself.

“Irtike, can you help me?” Conor asked. But the girl didn’t answer. Conor looked at her and saw she was totally still, riveted in concentration. Sweat had soaked through her clothing. It was her power that was keeping Cabaro trapped, but she wouldn’t be able to maintain it much longer. Even Snake Eyes looked tired, his little head drooping.

Almost guiltily, Conor reached out to the back of Cabaro’s neck. He lifted the mane to get to the talisman’s clasp, shards of sandstone falling from the lion’s hair. The golden rope was surprisingly heavy, and Conor had to strain with both hands to get it free and drag it off Cabaro. The Great Beast had to be furious, and Conor was grateful to be at the back of his head, nowhere near the lion’s jaws.

Conor carried the talisman over to Irtike, who was still standing motionless, lost in concentration. “I’ve got the Golden Lion,” he said. “Let’s go.”

For a moment Irtike was still lost to whatever inner place was the source of her power. Then she shook her head clear and came around. “I feel ... so weak,” she said to Conor.

“Are you okay?” Conor asked.

Holding on to Conor for support, Irtike nodded and nestled Snake Eyes in her bag. She pointed to Cabaro, who was still motionless. “I’m too exhausted. I’m releasing my power over the earth,” she said. “Cabaro will be able to get himself free once he thinks to try.”

“Which means we have to get out of here.”

“Yes,” Irtike said. “Immediately.”

Wordlessly, they made their way as fast as they could to the edge of the cliff. While they went, Conor wrapped the gold rope around his waist, tying it off securely. The talisman bounced against his hip.

As they approached the spot of scuffed earth and open air that led down to the oasis, a nameless dread overtook Conor. Suddenly he wasn’t sure he wanted to see what was below. Sucking in a breath, he forced himself to look.

There had been a canyon running from the oasis up to the mesa, but it was now blocked off by a huge boulder. Conor couldn’t see below the obstruction, but he did notice a set of human footprints heading up the canyon and around the bend, toward the cliff side.

As he stared down the canyon, Conor heard a familiar screech. “That’s Essix,” he said to Irtike. “Come on!”

Together they raced along the canyon’s edge. Essix came into view as they turned a corner, hovering in the open air over the gap.

Down below was a huddled form that Conor recognized. “Rollan?” he called. “Are you okay?”

Rollan slowly looked up, then stared back down at something cradled in his hands.

“Rollan,” Conor said again, waving and pointing at the Golden Lion around his waist. “I have it! We have to find Tarik and get out of here.”

“Tarik?” Rollan said. He sounded confused, as if he’d just been woken from a dream. “Tarik is dead.”

That was when Conor noticed what Rollan was holding. A tattered green cloak, blooming with dark blood, was bunched tightly in the boy’s fingers. “No ...” Conor whispered.

Rollan finally released the cloak and covered his face with his hands. “He died saving me. Gar killed him.”

Conor’s heart dropped into his stomach. The world felt too bright, and his body too light. He worried he might faint.

He steeled himself. Everything depended on the Golden Lion. If they didn’t escape with it, Tarik’s death would be in vain. Tarik’s death. His death. Conor shook his head violently. “We have to get you out of there,” he called down.

“You can’t,” Rollan said emotionlessly. “This streambed doesn’t go all the way up. I already tried. It hits a wall.”

Conor reached into his satchel and pulled out the Slate Elephant, the stone cool under his fingers. “Then use this.”

He tossed it down. It rang out against a rock at the bottom, and rolled to a stop at Rollan’s feet.

He didn’t budge.

“Rollan!” Conor barked, surprised by the force behind his own voice. “Pick it up. Now!”

The shouting worked. As if of its own accord, Rollan’s hand reached out and grasped the Slate Elephant, then he placed the loop over his neck. Immediately Essix more than doubled in size. The falcon’s wings were now nearly half as broad as the canyon was wide.

Essix folded her wings and arrowed into the canyon, unfurling them just as she reached Rollan. Talons hooking into his shirt, she seized the motionless boy and lifted, her great wingstrokes gusting rocks and pebbles about the rocky bottom. Rollan shielded his eyes as he was lifted into the air. Essix gently lowered him to the ground beside Conor, where the boy slumped in the dirt.

“We’ll grieve Tarik later,” Conor said. “For now, Gerathon and Gar and a few hundred Conquerors are still out there waiting for us. We have to get out of here right away. Okay?”

Rollan met Conor’s eyes. For a moment his face was blank. Then he reluctantly nodded.

Tarik is dead. The reality of it yawned right below Conor’s thoughts, but he refused to let himself look into that horrible black space. Between exhausted Irtike and overwhelmed Rollan, they’d be lucky to make it out of the oasis alive. If Conor lost his wits now, they were all done for — and that meant the Devourer won. He looked into Irtike's and Rollan's slack faces. "The oasis below is crawling with Conquerors. We can't go that way."

Irtike shook her head. "There's a reason Cabaro's ostriches guarded that pass so heavily. The desert stretches for weeks of travel in the other directions. We'd die if we went any way other than the way we came. And that means passing back through the oasis."

Conor wanted to collapse. If only Tarik were here, he could hand this decision to him. But he wasn't here. Tarik never would be here again.

"Okay," Conor said. "Then we take the side trail back down. From there, we'll ... I don't know. We'll have to find a way through, that's all."

"It's the best plan we've got," Irtike said, smiling wearily. She took Conor's hand in one of hers, and Rollan's limp one in the other. Together, they all turned around.

And saw the canyon was teeming with Conquerors.

The black-armored men and women had swarmed up the narrow trail, and were beginning to surround Cabaro in the sand pit. Zerif was leading them, directing his soldiers to circle the Great Beast. There were shouts and confusion; Zerif probably thought Cabaro still had the Golden Lion.

He probably also thought Cabaro was still trapped — but Irtike was no longer pressing the earth against him. With a roar and a whoosh of air, Cabaro suddenly pounced from the pit, twisting magnificently in the air. He came down ten feet away, a whirlwind of paws and teeth, bowling over the Conquerors unfortunate enough to be near. The giant lion crouched on all fours, jaws snapping crazily. Zerif cursed and dropped back while his soldiers scattered.

"I think Cabaro's going to survive," Irtike said.

"And this is a perfect distraction. Go!" Conor said.

Together they streaked toward the side trail. There were shouts from the Conquerors assembled around Cabaro. Conor could only hope that they had enough of a head start. The companions barreled around the corner, preparing to race down the trail.

And nearly lost themselves in the mouth of a giant serpent.

Gerathon was slithering up the path, her huge muscular body filling the narrow space. She'd nearly reached the top when they rounded the corner, surprising her as much as she did them. Quick-thinking Essix was the first to spring into action, her enlarged form arrowing right into Gerathon's hood, where it had already been gashed during the combat at the lagoon. The falcon wasn't able to build the momentum she'd have needed to do real damage, but Gerathon wheeled and thrashed, trying to avoid Essix's sharp beak, sandstone rocks crushing to dust behind her.

"Retreat!" Conor ordered. "Back up to the cliff." He yanked on Irtike and Rollan, and together they spun and ran back up to the cliff top.

But Zerif and the Conquerors were ready for them. The moment the companions left the trailhead, they were surrounded. Zerif made his way toward them through the ranks of his men. He brandished his curved sword, a leer on his face.

Behind them, Gerathon hissed in triumph and closed in.

"Raise your weapons!" Conor said, despite the terror in his chest. Rollan lifted his long dagger. From somewhere in Irtike's bag, Snake Eyes chittered.

Was this resistance pointless? Putting up a fight would only delay the inevitable — they'd die in this battle, there was no doubt of that.

Then light came into Rollan's eyes for the first time. "The Golden Lion!"

"What does it do?!" Conor cried as the Conquerors advanced. They were almost in striking distance.

"Does it matter?" Rollan shouted. "Just use it!"

Conor gripped his fingers tight around the Golden Lion and summoned his will. Whatever you have, show me now.

Then Conor roared.

When he opened his mouth, a sound emerged that was far louder than any the Great Beast himself had ever made. As the high-pitched and deafening roar reached them, the nearest Conquerors fell to their stomachs, clutching their ears. Whenever Conor faced them, they were physically pushed back by waves of sound.

"Conor!" Irtike cried. He turned and saw an oversized hyena approaching. Its eyes were crazed, rabid foam spilling from its snapping jaws. The beast was cackling and lunging, its jaws almost closing on Irtike's leg.

When Conor faced it and opened his mouth, the hyena was thrown back by the roar. The noise was painfully loud for Conor, but he could only imagine how much worse it was for the hapless creatures in front of him.

With Rollan and Irtike tight at his back, Conor swept in a circle, the cone of force pushing Conquerors back wherever it pointed. By training his roar on any Conquerors that tried to rush forward, Conor was able to keep them at bay.

Even Gerathon was held back by the sound. She writhed and twisted, her body curling over itself, mashing the unlucky Conquerors trapped between her scales and the ground.

“What now?!” Rollan shouted over the roar.

“We’re still trapped,” Irtike said.

Conor released the lion for a moment and took a big breath, wiping the back of his hand over his lips. “Maybe we can move through them, and if I spin around fast enough they won’t be able to get near enough to attack,” he said.

“I have a better idea,” Irtike said. “The ground is trembling from the sinkhole, and the weight of the army, and now all that noise. It wouldn’t take much for this whole cliff to give way.” She dug in her bag and pulled out Snake Eyes. He cringed in her hand, clearly in pain from all the roaring. “I know you’re tired, but I need your help one more time, okay?”

The ground started to ripple and shudder. Shouts rose among the Conquerors, and Gerathon, despite her pain, raised her head, hood outstretched terrifyingly. “Get back!” she hissed at the Conquerors.

But it was too late.

The earth shook beneath him, and Conor turned toward the precipice just in time to see the edge pour down into the oasis below, as if all the sandstone had turned to water. The ground sighed toward the ring of jungle.

“Irtike?” Conor asked, trying to keep his balance. But the girl had gone back into her trance. Her eyes rolled back in her head as she swayed.

The hush of the falling sand became a roar. Conor watched, paralyzed by fear, as the cliff edge began to cascade away. “Conor,” Rollan said, “we need to get moving!”

More and more of the cliff side fell, until it was a landslide. Conor took one step away, but his heels sank into the sand. His body was tugged backward, and he only just managed to get hold of Rollan’s and Irtike’s hands before he tumbled.

Above the roar of falling sand, he heard the screams of the plummeting Conquerors. Then he pitched to one side and saw nothing but a wide yellow rush, as if they were drowning in a sea of sand. The beating waves of it pounded his skin, scouring it raw. Conor tried to keep his mouth closed, hoping to keep the earth from entering his lungs.

He pivoted in the darkness, riding the avalanche of sand, clenching his friends' hands as tightly as he could. They gained speed as they went, and his head began to wrench against the tumbling soil — all it would take was one bad hit for his neck to snap. But just as he began to wonder whether he'd die that way, or by passing out and suffocating under the weight of the crumbling sandstone, he began to slow.

Miraculously, hot sun was on his face. He felt it warm his eyelids, and breathed in the sweet air. Conor opened his eyes and was relieved to find Rollan and Irtike laid out beside him, gulping in air.

The oasis was gone.

Where there had once been a paradise shielded by a cliff, there was now only a blank slope, like a giant bowl of sand. Everything that had made up Cabaro's animal kingdom — the lagoon, the trees — was buried. The last plumes of sand that were still airborne settled over the land. Then all was still.

Until it began to move.

The sand rippled. It made a wave, over a dozen feet long, and then a long black shape started to emerge, many yards off. Gerathon.

The Great Serpent was clearly disoriented. She faced away, scanning the flattened landscape as sand rained from her scales.

"Guys," Conor whispered, "we need to run. Now."

Irtike struggled to rise. Rollan was motionless, his mouth hanging open. "Rollan?" Conor asked as he staggered to his feet. "Are you okay?"

For a long moment, Rollan was still. His face was covered in sand, the whites of his eyes the only parts that weren't yellow. He shook his head, as if to clear it. "Could you help me get up?"

"Of course," Conor whispered. He pulled on Rollan's arm, and Rollan winced as he stood. The wound in his side had reopened in the landslide. Blood soaked his shirt.

“Can you run?” Conor asked.

“I hope so,” Rollan whispered back.

They took off through the sand, legs kicking high to stay clear of the loose earth. Conor’s whole body screamed — it felt like his skin had been flayed in the landslide. But all it took was imagining Gerathon slithering over the dunes toward them to find the will to move forward.

Essix kept pace with them, high above. “I’m realizing,” Conor said as he puffed forward with his struggling friends, “that there are a lot of advantages to being a bird.”

As the sand grew shallower, their going became easier, and they were soon able to trek more quickly. Conor risked a look backward. A few figures were struggling out of the sand, but they were having a slow time of it. “No more sign of Gerathon,” he reported. “She must have gone the other way. And we seem to have a head start.”

There was no answer.

Conor looked to his friends, and the first thing he saw was their stricken faces. He followed their gazes, worried that he’d made a mistake, that Rollan or Irtike had seen Gerathon bearing down on them after all. But what he saw was worse.

It was Tarik.

The elder Greencloak’s body had been carried along in the cascading sand and was half-in and half-out. Only the head and shoulders were above the ground.

Lumeo lay still beside him. The sand had carried the otter so that he was curled beneath his companion’s neck, cradling Tarik’s chin. They looked ... peaceful.

“Oh, Tarik,” Conor said softly, turning away and covering his face. The Golden Lion was even heavier around his waist. He shifted his fingers over the talisman, thinking about how much they’d lost to get it. How much more could this quest possibly take from them?

“We should bring their bodies with us,” Rollan said numbly.

“We can’t,” Conor said, hating himself for it. “We have so many miles to go, and once the Conquerors get organized they'll be on us. We don't have Tarik to protect us anymore. We need to get out of here as fast as we can."

"So is that how things are now?" Rollan asked sharply. Conor turned and saw his friend's eyes were still on Tarik, but his face had clouded over. "Kind, gentle Conor finally gets hard? He starts making the tough decisions? Now that Tarik's dead, does that make you our fearless leader?"

Conor's voice caught in his throat. "Please, Rollan," he rasped. "Don't do this right now."

"I liked you better the old way," Rollan snapped, his eyes flashing. "I liked the sheep boy."

Conor nodded. "I did too," he said softly. "But he's gone."

Rollan's anger seemed to deflate all at once. He dropped his gaze back to Tarik and stayed silent.

Irtike held Snake Eyes up and peered into his beady little eyes. "I can use my power to bury him, if you want."

Conor deferred to Rollan, who nodded.

At first nothing happened. Then the sand around them rumbled. It caved in, sinking Tarik and Lumeo into the earth. Conor watched, hands pressed tight over his heart, as the body disappeared.

"Thank you, Irtike," Rollan whispered.

As the sand fell in, Irtike broke her trance and faced them. "I'm not sure how many more times I can draw on my earth affinity today," she said. "I don't feel so good."

"We'll do our best to avoid it. And thank you," Conor said. "He deserved to be buried."

"Yes, he did," Irtike said. "I only knew Tarik for a short time, but I could already see his kindness and honor."

"Snake Eyes isn't the right name for that mole rat," Rollan said, petting the groggy rodent. "I'm sorry for anything bad I ever said about him. He saved our lives."

"I was thinking about that," Irtike said. "I'd like to name him Mikak. It's a word in my language that's hard to translate. It means both 'soil' and 'home.'"

"I like it," Rollan said. "Thank you, Mikak."

In response, the mole rat lowered his head and fell asleep.

“Let’s go,” Conor said, gently touching Rollan on the back. “Tarik’s sacrifice will only be in vain if we don’t make it back safely.”

Rollan nodded, wiping away tears.

“And your mother,” Conor added quietly to Irtike. “She gave her life fighting the Conquerors in Nilo too.”

The group began to walk away, back toward the pass that would lead them to northern Nilo, and eventually to Greenhaven. Essix flew above them, her sharp eyes scanning for danger.

They hadn’t gone more than a hundred yards when Conor noticed a dark shape reaching out of the sand. “Wait, is that ... ?”

Irtike whimpered, and Rollan’s hand was immediately on the hilt of his dagger. “Gar,” he growled.

“Relax,” Conor said, his hand on Rollan’s arm. “He’s not moving.”

They moved closer to the body, which lay completely still. The general’s dark armor was caked in bright yellow sand. Blood had dried over a grievous neck wound.

Gar was dead.

“Tarik must have killed him,” Rollan said. “Or he died in the avalanche.”

“No,” Conor said, peering down. “Look at this.” The wound was covered in sand, but he could see bite marks all along Gar’s throat. There was only one explanation. “Lumeo,” Conor said, the world wavering as his eyes filled with tears. “He avenged Tarik’s death after all.”

“Wow,” Rollan whispered. “The Devourer ... is dead. Lumeo killed the Devourer. We stand a chance because of that brave otter. Way to go, little guy.”

He kicked out, shoving Gar’s body farther into the sand. As Gar rolled forward, a dark, furry shape was revealed, crushed beneath him.

“What’s that?” Rollan asked.

Conor kneeled and squinted, then sucked in a breath. He tried to process what he was seeing, but it didn’t make sense. What was it doing here, with Gar?

He peered up at Rollan and Irtike.

“It’s a wolverine,” he said.

SUNDOWN

DURING THEIR DAYS AT SEA, ABEKE WONDERED SOMETIMES why Shane's spirit animal wasn't some aquatic creature instead of a wolverine — he was so natural onboard the ship, with an uncanny sense of currents and squalls. Whenever they hit doldrums he'd cleanly dive into the ocean, cutting through the salt water only to emerge with a tropical fish writhing on the end of his spear. He'd ably climb a free line to get back to the deck, and kill and scale the fish before wriggling back into his shirt.

Abeke was used to being the hunter and provisioner among her friends. It felt new and strange to be cared for so completely. She found herself enjoying it.

They were lucky to be on Shane's family's ship, which he clearly knew so well; otherwise they could never have managed an oceangoing vessel with just the two of them. Truth be told, they made a great team: Whole hours would go by wordlessly, Abeke tying off lines the moment Shane tossed them to her, scaling the mast to lower the bib before he'd even asked for it. In her moments of rest, Abeke would watch the passing shoreline. The first region they passed as they voyaged their way up the continent of Nilo was the great desert, where Cabaro the Lion was rumored to live — then the jungles, and then the steppes where Abeke had grown up.

She was shocked at how close they'd been to Cabaro. The Great Lion would likely have been the next talisman her friends sought. Had they ... Could they possibly have been close by?

It was a small blessing to have so much to do. Otherwise Abeke would have stewed. There was so much to worry about: what was happening to Meilin; whether Conor and Rollan and Tarik made it out of Oceanus; what they'd find when they arrived at Greenhaven; how to make sure she could keep her promise to Shane that the Greencloaks wouldn't harm him.

He'd been their enemy for so long. He was with the Conqueror teams in Oceanus, and Samis, and even at Dinesh's temple. It was hard to predict how Olvan and Lenori and Tarik would react to him. How could Abeke show them all he'd sacrificed?

She wouldn't have long to wait. Already there was a rim of green visible at the blue lip of the horizon: Greenhaven. The winds were low, though, and the sky was pinking. They wouldn't be able to dock before nightfall.

Shane and Abeke hadn't needed to speak all afternoon, going about their tasks in companionable silence. The wood of the deck, still hot from the afternoon sun, seared the soles of Abeke's feet as she gutted the day's catch — dinner would be two flying fish and a few unlucky squid that had come too near the surface to feed.

When he saw the distant shore, Shane turned listless, standing at the bow and peering into the cliffs of Greenhaven, stubbled with bright green shrubs.

Once she'd gotten the embers up and the fish and squid were on the grill, Abeke stood beside Shane and looked out at the cliffs. Part of her soared with relief at the thought of Greenhaven, but worry bubbled insistently beneath. What was she leading Shane into?

"Have you ever seen Greenhaven before?" she asked.

Shane laughed. "Are you kidding? It would be the first and last time if I did."

"They'll understand," Abeke said softly. "I'll make them understand."

Shane closed his eyes, the lids pink-orange in the reflected sunset. "I love that you think so. That you have that much faith about people."

"Hey," Abeke said. "You were raised to believe that your uncle was doing the right thing. It was all you knew from the time you were a child. How could you have seen what the Conquerors were doing when you were inside it?”

“Yeah,” Shane said. “I guess you’re right.”

“It was like my family,” Abeke said. “I’d always suspected that my father liked Soama more than me, that he always expected lesser things from me. But I didn’t know it was true until I summoned Uraza. I know now that in that moment my father should have been proud. But instead he was suspicious. You helped me see that I was special, even when I couldn’t.”

Shane turned to Abeke. The fading sunlight lit the fine lines of his brow, his nose, his throat. Abeke swallowed. “People can change,” she said. “And the Greencloaks are no different. They’ll see what you’ve done to help. They’ll hear what Gar did to your sister, and they’ll understand why you’ve come to our side.”

“You really are amazing,” Shane said huskily.

Abeke cast her eyes to the deck, her face flushing. “I don’t know.”

“I can’t believe ... that he killed her. That my uncle would let Gerathon do that to Drina. I miss her. We fought plenty, but I loved her.”

Abeke looked at Shane, startled. It was the first time he’d spoken about Drina’s death. Whenever she brought it up, he’d say he didn’t want to talk. But now he was finally opening up, and she was honored that he’d started feeling safer with her. “It’s terrible, Shane,” Abeke said. “I can’t imagine what you’re going through. It’s one thing to lose your sister, but another to see that it was your uncle who took her. We were accustomed to death in Okaihee. But not death ... in that way.”

“Drina bonded to her spider without the Nectar,” Shane said. “And she was sick for years afterward. Back then, I took care of her every day. She was such a strong person, I think sometimes she resented me for her own weakness. That was why she took the Bile, to cure her bonding sickness. But ever since then, she was ... defensive. She came on too strong, even when she didn’t need to. I tried to convince her that she was overstepping her bounds around Gerathon, but she was tired of me taking care of her. Instead, she blundered forward in her usual way, taking on more than she could handle.”

Shane let out a deep breath. It sounded like one he’d been holding for a long time. “I’d have made a similar mistake eventually, and it would have been the end of me. I ... hope I'm doing the right thing. What other choice do I have?"

Abeke laid her hand on his forearm. It was strong and warm, the hairs bright golden blond and the skin pink from sunburn. "You did. I owe you my life for the decision you made."

"Your friends should imprison me," Shane said. "If I were in their position, that's exactly what I'd do."

Abeke smiled encouragingly. "Maybe they will, for a few days. But I'll come take care of you, like you've cared for me. They're good people, and once they understand where you're coming from, they'll relent. The Greencloaks are merciful."

"I hear what you're saying, but all the same I can't really feel it. I'll have to let your faith stand in for mine," Shane said.

Abeke nodded, staring at the skyline. Greenhaven was getting larger on the horizon, a beautiful clean square of pebble gray, gleaming in the twilight. "I wish we could go ashore tonight," Abeke said. "But the docks are unlit, and I'm afraid that if we arrive in the dark, a guard might hurt us before we can explain. I want them to know we're not sneaking up on them."

"It's okay," Shane said. "What's one more night, right?"

They dropped anchor a few hundred yards from the castle walls, and ate their grilled dinner as the sun fell. The stars gradually emerged, their bright swaths more familiar to Abeke by now than the constellations of her old home, far to the south. Abeke remembered the evenings she'd stood watch for her companions, Uraza at her side. The leopard had sat bolt upright throughout the night, peering into the sky.

Once they finished their meal, Abeke summoned Uraza and gave her the remainder of the fish. Shane hadn't summoned his wolverine the whole time they'd been on the ship — apparently it got distressed around water. Abeke suspected that maybe Shane's connection to Renneg was weaker than he'd care to admit. Perhaps his reassurance wasn't enough to keep the creature calm on the boat. Not wanting to embarrass him, she didn't force the issue, and kept Uraza in dormant form more often than not.

Abeke ran her fingers through Uraza's sleek fur and stared deep into her purple eyes. Uraza conspicuously avoided looking at Shane. "It's okay," Abeke said, “we can trust him now.”

Uraza allowed herself to check out Shane, then returned her gaze haughtily to Abeke. Evidently she wasn't as sure.

Stroking the leopard, Abeke's thoughts wandered to the next morning. With luck it would only be a few hours before she'd see everyone again. She couldn't wait to embrace them, tell them all that had happened, and get working on a plan to rescue Meilin. She wondered how it would feel with Shane there — Rollan especially would lay into the former Conqueror, but Conor would probably come to understand. They all would.

FUNERAL

TARIK'S FUNERAL WAS HELD IN THE GREAT HALL OF Greenhaven. It was a brilliant, sunstruck morning, and as the sun rose in the sky, its light cascaded through the open circle in the roof, pooling golden light around Tarik's ceremonial sarcophagus. Olvan had initially placed Conor and Rollan at the front of the assemblage, in a position of honor, but Lenori, with her usual wisdom, had quietly ushered the boys to the back of the hall so they could grieve in more privacy. "You've been through so much," she'd said. "If you need to leave during the ceremony, it will be easier this way."

At first Conor hadn't felt the need to move to the back, and had done so only for the sake of Rollan, who still seemed dazed after their trials in Nilo. But now, as the ceremony entered its second hour, he was glad to be at the rear. His head nodded while the Greencloaks came up one by one to praise Tarik's accomplishments. He'd had one good night's sleep in a familiar bed, yes, but it had still been less than twenty-four hours since they dragged themselves into Greenhaven, the boys' skin still red and scratched from the whipping sands of Nilo.

He wished Irtike were there with them — he'd come to rely on her quiet, confident presence. But though she promised to come to Greenhaven eventually, she'd decided to stay in Nilo for the time being. When they'd said good-bye at the shore, Irtike had headed north toward Okaihee. It was for the best — Pojalo would have need of her powers if he hoped to keep his people safe.

Thinking of Irtike, though, brought back all the dark times in Nilo as well. Conor couldn't prevent his mind from summoning the terrifying sight of Gerathon bearing down, fangs glistening. Or Gar's corpse, and the sad final image of Tarik and Lumeo sinking into the earth. The sarcophagus at the front of the great hall was partially open, to show that it was empty. It was only a symbol.

The great hall had been Tarik's favorite spot in all of Greenhaven. Conor had often found him here daydreaming, about what, he never thought to ask. It was appropriate that this was where they held the ceremony that would celebrate his life. Greencloak after Greencloak went up to the front dais to speak.

Monte, who'd renewed his oaths after Barlow's death during the Arax mission, told the story of when Tarik had cornered him in his shop at Boulder City, acting out each part. He did an excellent Tarik impression, bringing his voice low and softly accenting the ends of his sentences. Scrubber, his raccoon, flailed and squirmed on the ground, pretending to be Monte himself. It was a light moment in the funeral, and set the whole audience laughing.

Lishay was laughing long after the rest of the assembled had stopped. She'd made the long trip from Pharsit Nang to be present, despite the danger of escaping Conqueror-occupied Zhong. When she spoke, the room quieted, and she told her own story of their time together as Greencloak recruits, when Tarik had once left their jerky behind at camp, accidentally grabbing a piece of old tree bark instead. He was so stubborn, she said, he chewed the thing for a whole day. Despite his fatigue, Conor found himself laughing and crying at the same time, great tears of mourning rolling down his smiling face.

Rollan, though, held silent throughout the ceremony. Conor cut nervous glances at his friend, who watched, glassy-eyed, while the various Greencloaks spoke. Conor nudged him from time to time, just to make sure he'd react. Rollan batted his friend away and hunched down, staring forward with his chin cupped in his hands.

Finally it was Olvan's turn to speak. The burly leader of the Greencloaks stood before them all, dwarfed only by his enormous moose spirit animal, which clomped behind him on the dais. He paused for a long moment before his bellowing voice began to reverberate in the great hall, all the way up to the cloudless sky. “When we lost Tarik,” he orated, “we nearly lost our hearts. His quiet dignity and wise leadership exemplified the foundations upon which all our work rests. But let us remember that his life and Lumeo’s were given to an end. For now, thanks to his efforts — and those of Conor and Rollan and our new friends Irtike and her mole rat, Mikak — another talisman is safely out of the Conqueror’s hands. And thanks to Lumeo’s heroic sacrifice, General Gar lays slain. Erdas still has a hope of remaining safe.”

Olvan stepped to the head of the sarcophagus, where engraved stone laurels jutted out, and hung the Golden Lion of Cabaro from one of the leaves. Then Lishay passed him more and more talismans to hang in Tarik’s honor. Olvan announced the names of each as he placed them. “The Golden Lion joins the other talismans we have fought so hard to keep safe. The Slate Elephant of Dinesh. The Bronze Eagle of Halawir. The Silver Wolf of Briggan. The Amber Leopard of Uraza. The Bamboo Panda of Jhi. The Copper Falcon of Essix. The Obsidian Ape of Kovo. The Marble Swan of Ninani.”

Olvan gestured to the assembled talismans, dangling in the morning sunlight. “These represent the sum of our work. Though Tarik will live on in our memories, he also lives on in the legacy of the talismans. Without these, Kovo cannot escape his prison. I know Tarik would want us to celebrate those among us today who helped gather the talismans: Conor, Rollan, and the Keeper.”

Conor felt his face flush as the Greencloaks got to their feet and applauded. He hated being the center of attention. It didn’t seem right, anyway, being applauded while Meilin and Abeke were still missing.

Evidently Rollan was thinking the same thing. He rubbed the bandaged wound on his leg. When the applause continued, he seemed unable to take it anymore. He got to his feet and made a silencing motion.

The room became quiet. Rollan looked around for a long moment, taking in the crowd. Conor sensed Meilin would be proud of Rollan’s newfound seriousness, and wished she could see him now. “I understand that there’s reason to celebrate,” Rollan said. “But Tarik would want us to remain vigilant. This fight is far from over, and two of our friends still remain in the hands of the Conquerors.”

He stepped down the aisle, the slippers the healers had given him making hushed scuffing sounds on the marble floor. He approached Olvan and kneeled, pulling two items from a pocket inside his green cloak. “I present the remaining two talismans. The Granite Ram of Arax and the Coral Octopus of Mulop. The talisman that brought us all together and ... and the last one that Tarik was alive to see. The one that saved my life.”

Rollan lowered his two talismans into the crack between the empty sarcophagus and its lid. “Until we need them, I’d like to keep these two right inside here. Because without Tarik and Lumeo, the Greencloaks ... we ... never would have gotten them.”

“You wear Tarik’s cloak with honor, Rollan,” Olvan said. “He would be proud to see you among us today.”

Conor got to his feet, hand over his chest. Something about that empty space filled with two of the talismans they had sacrificed so much to protect made Conor’s heart clench so tightly it hurt.

A hand tugged on his sleeve.

Conor whirled to see Lenori, her face pale. “Please come with me,” she said.

“No, really, I’m fine, don’t worry,” Conor said.

“That’s not it,” Lenori said. “Please come.”

Already overwhelmed, Conor was secretly glad to leave the great hall early. He shot a guilty look to Rollan, who was still kneeling at the front with his eyes closed, then let Lenori guide him out the back exit.

“What is it?” Conor asked as they sped along the hallway. They passed almost no one in the hallways — all the Greencloaks were at the ceremony. Conor could barely keep up, breaking into a jog as Lenori glided along as elegantly as her rainbow ibis. The feathers she’d weaved into her hair fluttered behind her.

Finally they were at the entrance to the courtyard. “There,” Lenori said, pointing forward. “See who’s here for you!”

Conor blinked in the bright sun while his eyes adjusted. Then he saw a familiar figure in the center of the courtyard, arms crossed nervously across her chest. Abeke.

Conor dashed across the courtyard, barely able to slow himself down enough to avoid knocking her down. They spun in a tight circle, both laughing at the sudden pleasure of being reunited. “You’re safe!” Conor said, pressing away. “Oh, let me look at you!”

“Yes!” Abeke said. “And you’re safe too. Lenori told me about your time in Nilo. I wish so much I had been there, Conor. Meilin and I were imprisoned not far away.”

Conor hugged Abeke again. There was so much to talk about — including, eventually, Abeke’s father and sister ... and Tarik. He didn’t know how much Lenori had told her already. But first, something else weighed much heavier in Conor’s mind. “Meilin ... ?”

“Is still captured,” Abeke said. “Alive — at least she was when I left. I was able to escape, but she’s still there.”

“Is she hurt? Is she still under Gerathon’s control? How did you get away?”

Abeke smiled. “There will be plenty of time to catch up on everything. Lenori said you’ve only just returned.”

“Yeah,” Conor said, nodding gravely. “Rollan ... He’s not himself right now. I hope he’ll be better soon, but Tarik ... There’s so much to tell you, Abeke.”

“And I have a lot to tell you. I didn’t make it out alone — I had someone helping me.”

“What do you mean?”

Abeke let out a long breath. “Sometimes we can be wrong about people, right? Sometimes our hearts are screaming something at us, but we refuse to listen.”

“Abeke,” Conor said. “What are you saying?”

She turned her head to one side and looked into the woods at the edge of the courtyard. “Shane,” she called. “You can come out!”

Conor could scarcely believe his eyes when Shane walked out of the trees. He looked even taller and broader than he had before, but there was plenty of worry in his expression. With good reason.

Conor’s hand went to the hilt of his hand ax. “Abeke. What is he doing here?”

Abeke laid a hand on Conor’s arm, stilling him. “He brought me here. It’s because of Shane that I'm alive."

"Stop," Lenori said from where she was standing by the castle entrance, shocked at the sight of Shane. "Stop right there!"

Shane stood still, arms at his sides, palms upturned. "Please, arrest me if you need to. I understand why you wouldn't trust me." He grimaced. "I have no loyalty to the Conquerors anymore. Please, let me help you. I just ask you not to attack me right away."

"Abeke," Conor said, hand on the ax hilt, his eyes never leaving Shane, "move away from him."

She shook her head. "Conor. Listen to me. You don't understand!"

"No, you don't understand!" came an unexpected voice from the castle entrance. Rollan limped out of the gate, brushing past Lenori.

"Rollan!" Abeke called.

"Ask him about his wolverine!" Rollan cried, his dagger out. Essix lashed in from above, shrieking in anger.

"What are you talking about?" Abeke asked.

Shane looked up, eyes wide. "What did you just say?"

"Your spirit animal is a wolverine, right?" Rollan said. "We fought it before. And yet we saw one that looked just like it in Nilo. Dead. Guess who we found it with?"

Shane crossed his arms, his features stony. "I don't know what you mean. You saw Renneg and me together during the Arax battle."

Rollan limped across the courtyard toward Shane, his dagger at the ready. "It's no fun being separated from your spirit animal for long periods of time. Conor and I know that very well, after what we had to do to reach Cabaro. It must have been hard for Gar to send his wolverine with you in the past. So hard he decided to skip that step in Nilo. But, see, that's where you messed up. Because Gar died, and we found your wolverine with him. And his crocodile was nowhere in sight." Rollan stopped a few feet shy of Shane, his dagger pointed at the boy's chest. "Come over to us, Abeke, so we can deal with Shane."

Conor held out his hands to block Rollan in case he lunged. "I think there's an easy way to resolve this. Shane, bring forth your spirit animal, and that will settle it.”

Shane shook his head. “If you’re not going to trust me now, you never will. I thought Abeke was your friend. Why doesn’t her word matter to you?”

Conor watched Abeke’s expression go from defiance to confusion. She turned to Shane and placed a hand lightly on his forearm. “Just do it, please. Summon Renneg. Then Rollan will see there’s nothing to worry about.”

Shane bit his lip. “Are you saying that you don’t trust me either, Abeke, after all that we’ve been through?”

Abeke’s gaze hardened. “Do it for me.”

Rollan stepped to one side so he flanked Shane. “Summon Briggan,” he called to Conor.

Heart racing with indefinable danger, Conor brought the wolf forward. Briggan sat on his haunches beside him, nose in the air and eyes alert. His wounds were healed over, gray fur patchy wherever there were scabs beneath.

“I will summon Uraza now,” Abeke said defiantly. “Unless you give us a reason not to fight, Shane.”

“Fine,” Shane said. “I’ll give you a reason not to fight.” Hands trembling, Shane slowly undid the two lengths of leather that kept his tunic closed. The fabric parted at the top. He tugged the leather free and ran a hand under his shirt. The tunic parted farther, exposing the breadth of his chest.

And an animal tattoo.

SHANE

ABEKE STEPPED BACK, ASTONISHED. THE TATTOO OF A giant beast stretched across Shane's chest, riding the hollow of his rib cage. Its tail whipped around his flat belly, the beast's open jaw in an embrace around the nape of Shane's neck.

A giant crocodile.

It didn't make any sense. Why would Shane have a crocodile tattooed on his chest? His spirit animal was a wolverine. The crocodile was the spirit animal of the Devourer.

The Devourer ...

Rollan advanced on Shane, his long dagger outstretched.

Shane turned to face Abeke, his expression unreadable. Then he thrust his bare chest toward the sky.

The giant crocodile burst into the small space, shooting forward from Shane's body. In two quick strides Shane was atop it. His strong legs clenched the sides of the giant reptile easily, like he'd been doing it all his life. A memory flashed into Abeke's mind, of an armored man, spiked helmet over his features, astride a giant crocodile at the battle of Dinesh's temple. She'd assumed it was Gar. But was that ... Shane?

"It was you," Abeke said, even though Shane was already halfway across the courtyard. "You are the Devourer, not Gar!"

Shane didn't waste time answering. He and the crocodile were racing toward the gate of Greenhaven. With no reason to expect an attack, the Greencloaks had left it wide open.

"Stop him!" Conor cried out.

They'd all been caught unawares. Briggan started sprinting, but the crocodile had too much of a head start.

Only Lenori stood in its way.

She struggled to fit a dart into her blowgun. Her rainbow ibis stood beside her, but it was a creature suited to divination, not combat. Lenori shouted for help as she fumbled with her weapon, only to fall to one side as the sprinting crocodile bowled her over.

The Greencloaks in the great hall must have heard the clamor. The first few had just begun to arrive when Shane reached the open gate. He turned the crocodile agilely, the beast whipping its great tail in an arc. Four Greencloaks slammed into the wall and crumpled to the ground. Shane charged in, and within a moment he and the reptile had disappeared inside. The last thing Abeke saw was the tip of its armored tail sliding through the door.

She was stunned. "I'm so sorry," she cried to Conor and Rollan.

"Don't be sorry!" Rollan yelled. "Just run!" He and Essix took off after Shane, soon followed by Conor and Briggan. Snapping into action, Abeke peeled after them.

There was no time to let their eyes adjust to the dim corridors of Greenhaven, and the moment she was inside Abeke was tripping over fallen Greencloaks and spirit animals. She got to her feet and staggered through the darkness, following the shouts of her companions. She could hear a vast commotion from the great hall, screams and loud crashes that she assumed were from the crocodile's tail striking the wall.

"The talismans!" she heard Conor shout from around a bend in the hallway. "Shane's after the talismans!"

Of course. Shane — the Devourer — needed the talismans to free Kovo. And Abeke had brought him right to them, slipping him in past Greenhaven's defenses. Her shattering guilt nearly brought her to her knees. But she wouldn't let herself collapse — the best thing she could do now was stop the plot she'd helped put in motion.

As she neared the daylight great hall, Abeke began to make out more details in the hallway. The walls were strewn with the Greencloaks Shane had knocked over during his charge. They slumped, dazed. A brown bear spirit animal was hunched over, cradling what looked like a broken foreleg. Abeke snatched a discarded bow and clenched it in her grasp. Farther along she came across a quiver of crossbow quarrels — not ideal, but they'd fire.

The great hall was in disarray. The charging crocodile had smashed benches in its path and shattered the dais. Tarik's ceremonial sarcophagus had pitched forward from its altar, the lid half-off. Crying out from astride the crocodile, Shane faced off against Olvan. The elder Greencloak was feinting with his heavy quarterstaff, but the snapping jaws of the crocodile kept him from connecting with Shane. His moose stood defiantly behind him, but the beast's massive antlers blocked it from getting around the sarcophagus to Olvan's aid.

"Uraza, help me!" Abeke screamed, and in a flash the leopard was at her side. Abeke took heart at the sight of her companion, who, after only a moment's hesitation to take in the scene, slinked forward across the hall. Tail low and ears flattened against her head, Uraza silently maneuvered so she was behind the crocodile.

Olvan threw his body in front of the talismans decorating Tarik's sarcophagus. Taking advantage of the distraction, Rollan managed to reach the crocodile's powerful, whipping tail. With Essix on his shoulder, beating her wings to give the boy extra lift, he lunged forward with his dagger and sank it between two scales on the reptile. When the crocodile whirled to see what had happened, Essix blocked its vision, flapping and pecking.

Rollan jumped higher on the beast's back and sank his dagger in again. He wasn't doing much damage, but he was slowly making his way up the thrashing body, toward Shane.

Briggan, meanwhile, had reached Olvan and his moose. Soon joined by Conor, the four faced off against the crocodile. Essix's distraction was just enough to keep them alive — the crocodile's snapping jaws missed them each time it lunged.

With Rollan nearing Shane from behind, and three capable warriors facing him from the front, Abeke began to take hope. Every second that went by, Shane was benefitting less from the initial surprise of his attack. Abeke could see some of the Greencloaks and spirit animals that had been cast against the walls now staggering to their feet. Reinforcements were coming.

Abeke nocked a quarrel to her bowstring and took aim. Tears of fury clouded her vision, threatening the shot. Shane was bouncing so quickly astride the attacking crocodile, she'd be lucky to get the bolt to connect.

Nonetheless, Abeke steadied herself and prepared to fire.

Until Rollan lunged upward, thrusting his dagger at the crocodile and bringing himself into the shot.

Abeke cursed. She lowered the bow and stole around to the crocodile's flank. With the disadvantage of coming in from below, Rollan was probably hoping to knock Shane off his mount. And since Rollan's sword arm was his right, Abeke thought she had a good idea where Shane would fall.

She and Uraza would be waiting.

Somehow, Rollan got to his feet astride the crocodile, crouched low and balancing, like he was surfing the bucking beast. Abeke was impressed — when had he become such a capable fighter? Maybe he could take Shane down in one strike. Still, Abeke readied the bowstring again, drew it back so her thumb was tight against her cheek. Whether from Rollan's strike, Uraza's bite, or Abeke's quarrel, this battle would be over soon.

And then the room went black.

Abeke lowered the bow in confusion, blinking her eyes. What was happening?

The sunlight returned, then it vanished again. Astonished, Abeke looked up to the circle of sky, flickering at the ceiling of the hall. An absolutely enormous creature was hovering in the open space, at moments blocking it entirely and eclipsing the sun. Then it lowered, and Abeke realized she was seeing some kind of giant bird.

In the eerie flashing darkness, the room went still. Shane, Greencloaks, and spirit animals all froze, staring up at the massive bird. It had a sharp, noble prow and hooked beak, and with a start, Abeke realized what she was seeing: Halawir the Eagle. He was enormous — whenever he flapped, Halawir's wingtips grazed opposite walls of the massive hall.

It took a few moments for the gusting of Halawir's wingbeats to make its way down to the floor. The moment it did, Abeke was off her feet. The wind was so fierce that it sounded like the air itself was panicked and screaming. The squall blew her toward the wall, and out of the corner of her eye she saw even large Briggan lose his footing under the blast of wind, despite how ferociously his claws dug into the stone floor. Abeke could see Conor shouting where he was pinned against the wall, but she couldn't hear a word of it.

Only the giant crocodile was massive enough to resist the blasting wind as Halawir descended. Shane pressed himself flat on its back, gripping the reptile's scales as his body shuddered under the gusts. Poor Uraza tried to take shelter against the crocodile's side, but finally lost her grip, claws leaving great gouges in the stone floor as she skittered across and came to rest on her side between a bench and the wall.

Abeke wanted to look away, her eyes tearing and screaming under the wind. But she forced herself to watch.

Once he was near the floor, Halawir folded his great wings and landed. The giant eagle, handsome with gray-blue plumage, stared at Shane with black and emotionless eyes. His beak was at least two feet long, and curved down into a sharp point. One strike with it would end anyone.

Abeke got to her feet and saw the others and their spirit animals do the same. Essix shrieked, and Halawir cocked his head toward her, listening. Then the eagle turned his attention back to Shane.

Abeke expected Shane to shrink away in fear, but he was unperturbed. He tapped his chest, and the crocodile disappeared into dormant form. Rollan plummeted to the floor, striking it with a loud thud, but Halawir caught Shane in his beak before he fell, and set him gently on his feet.

Why would Halawir do that?

Halawir was supposed to be guarding Kovo's prison. Why was he here? And why would he catch Shane to prevent him from falling?

The answer was obvious, and felt impossible.

Halawir was on Shane's side.

Without pausing, Shane lunged for the talismans decorating the end of Tarik's sarcophagus. As soon as he had their ribbons under his fingers, he lifted them into the air victoriously.

Uraza was the first one to arrive. A frenzied blur of yellow, she leaped for Shane. But before she could get her jaws around Shane's thigh, Halawir had unfurled his wings again and beat them once, sending the leopard skittering across the hall under the roaring wind.

All Abeke could do was watch, numb.

Shane was knocked off his feet too, but managed to keep his grip on the talismans. Halawir dexterously lashed out with one foot and caught the boy's waist in his talons. Then the other foot was around Shane's torso, cradling his body tightly, and with a victorious shriek Halawir beat his wings, rising into the air.

Abeke could barely muster the strength to face into the eagle's powerful thrusts, but she forced herself. She let loose a quarrel, but it shuddered and stilled in the screaming typhoon wind, clattering to the ground. Gritting her teeth, Abeke struggled to fit another quarrel to the bowstring. She saw Halawir give one mighty thrust and then furl his wings, shooting up out of the great hall. The Great Beast disappeared into the sky, along with Shane.

And the talismans.

Essix tried to launch after Halawir, but the falcon must have been wounded in the fight. She managed to get a dozen feet into the air, but then had to come back to the ground, one wing dragging.

There was a long stretch filled only with the moans of wounded Greencloaks and the cries of their spirit animals. Then, slowly, the surviving Greencloaks got to their feet. Olvan was bleeding from a blow to the head, and brought his moose back to passive form rather than have him suffer with a broken ankle. Uraza limped, one paw held tenderly in the air. Briggan shook his head, as if to clear it of some pain inside. Conor clutched his neck. Rollan was stunned, staring down at the dagger that so recently had been lodged in the giant crocodile's hide. Then he looked over at Abeke.

She'd never seen an expression of such defeat. Even now, after the shock of Halawir's rapid entrance and betrayal, she knew that it was all her fault.

Abeke put her face into her hands.

Olvan was the first to speak. “Halawir has betrayed us. That means we must fear the worst: Kovo is free, or soon will be.”

And Abeke, Abeke thought. I betrayed you as well. If it weren't for me, none of this would have happened.

Olvan had never been one to dwell on losses, instead always pointing them toward the next fight. But tears were pooling in the elder Greencloak's eyes. Abeke had never seen him anywhere close to crying. The sight of it set her own heart breaking.

“That's it,” Olvan said. “The Conquerors have all our talismans. Nothing can stop them now.”

AFTERMATH

BACK WHEN HE'D BEEN NO MORE THAN A SHEPHERD BOY tending his family's flock, Conor used to sit on a ruined wall in the meadow near his home, spending his moments of boredom turning over stones and seeing what lay beneath. This night was like the underside of one of those misty meadow stones: moist, deep gray, craggy.

He and Abeke stood at the parapets of Greenhaven Castle, staring out over the darkened shoreline. Moonlight played on distant wave caps — somewhere out there Shane's boat was still moored, derelict. He had no need of it, not with Halawir to carry him away. The battle had taken place that morning; the Devourer was long gone by now.

Conor massaged the spot where his neck met his skull. His head was still throbbing from being knocked hard against the flagstones of the great hall. Abeke noticed Conor rubbing his head and sighed, staring glumly into the night. She'd spent the afternoon and early evening apologizing. Clearly she was sick of her own voice.

"It could have all gone worse, you know," Conor said. When she didn't respond, he continued, "I mean, the ground could have turned into molten lava or something."

Abeke smiled, but there was no joy in it. Her eyes looked red and tired from crying.

“From what you’ve told me,” Conor said, “it sounds like you were a huge help to Meilin. After everything that happened in Oceanus ... it was big of you.”

Abeke sighed. “She’s my friend. I had no option but to love her, whatever she did.”

“Exactly. I guess all I’m trying to say is that there are worse things than trusting people, you know? Shane tricked you, but that’s about him — not you. Your heart isn’t hard, and I count that as a good thing.”

“You’re being nice to me. I don’t deserve that.”

“Shane tricked all of us, Abeke. He brought Gar’s wolverine with him that first time we fought Arax, and again at Dinesh’s temple. And Gar meant for the Greencloaks to believe that he was the real Devourer. If he hadn’t died, we would never have realized that the wolverine was actually his spirit animal. Gerathon probably killed Drina in front of you precisely to get you to trust that Shane had a good reason to leave the Conquerors. We all fell for it. All of us. Not just you.”

Abeke remained silent, her face impassive. Conor picked a stray pebble on the battlement and pitched it into the night. “Of course, if you want to wallow, please wallow away. Don’t let me stop you.”

“Thank you,” Abeke said. Then she gave a long, gutturing sigh. “Thank you for telling me about my family too.”

“I’m sorry,” Conor said. “I really am. I feel like you and I have always put a lot of faith in our families, and yours ... It can’t have been easy growing up alongside people who didn’t value you. It made me so angry, Abeke. For your sake.”

Abeke shut her eyes for a long moment. “I can understand why you’re angry, but Pojalo is still my father. It’s hard for me to feel mad at him. All I feel is confused. But if there’s one thing I’m coming to realize, it’s that some bonds aren’t unconditional. Sometimes the family you find can be better for you than the one you grew up trusting.”

Conor slid closer and gently put his arm around Abeke’s shoulder. “I think of you as family too,” he said.

The torchlight flickered, and Conor turned to see Uraza standing in the doorway, her fur spotted orange in the ruddy fire glow. Abeke's back straightened.

"What is it?" Conor whispered.

"I think someone's in the great hall," Abeke answered. And then, noiselessly, she and Uraza were off.

Conor struggled to keep up, his booted feet clomping as he bolted after the silent pair. Briggan joined him on the way, and the four were soon standing at the entrance to the great hall.

Abeke held a finger to her lips and eased the door open, wincing when the hinges creaked. They crept into the cavernous space as quietly as they could, two humans and two animals, all alert.

A cloaked figure leaned into Tarik's ceremonial sarcophagus, trying to climb inside, one foot on its carved edge. Conor had his ax on him — no way was he going to let it leave his side after the day's events — and quietly eased it from his belt.

Abeke had her bow out and nocked an arrow. While Uraza stole forward, she drew back the string.

At the sound of the creaking catgut, the figure whirled to face them. Abeke's fingers trembled, and the surprise of seeing Rollan's face made her let go of the string. She fell as she did, sending the arrow flying safely into the sky.

Rollan had a hand over his mouth, shocked at how close he'd come to death. Then his face shifted into its usual mocking smile. "Don't you think you have enough to feel guilty about without killing me too?"

"What are you thinking, sneaking around like that?" Abeke hollered, leaping to her feet. "When we're all on edge ... I could have killed you!"

"Not with aim like that, you couldn't."

Briggan whined, and Conor shook his head. "Enough, guys."

"I thought you went to bed right after dinner," Abeke said.

"I did go to bed," Rollan said. "And then I got right back out. You think I could sleep after a day like today? Come on over, and I'll show you what I was doing."

"What's got you in such a good mood?" Conor asked as he approached. His hand shook with nerves as he placed the ax back into his belt.

“After everything that happened today, I wasn’t sure who we could trust. I didn’t want to do this in front of everyone, but I have complete faith in you two, of course. Give me a boost and I’ll show you.”

Conor held out two interlaced hands, and Rollan placed his foot in them. After Conor had boosted him up, Rollan clutched the edge of the sarcophagus. Leaning in deep, he fished around.

“What are you doing?” Abeke asked.

Finally Rollan emerged and leaped back to the floor. He lifted his hand into the air. Two items dangled from it, clattering together.

The Granite Ram of Arax. The Coral Octopus of Mulop.

“We still have two of the talismans!” Conor said, clapping in joy.

“So all’s not lost,” Abeke breathed. She threw her arms around Rollan. “You’re amazing!”

“That’s what I keep trying to tell you guys,” Rollan said with a grin.

“Just think!” Abeke said. “We still have a chance. If we can manage to protect these two talismans, the Devourer can’t complete his plan.”

“Nilo and Zhong are overrun,” Rollan said, sighing ruefully. “Kovo will be out of his prison soon, if what Mulop told us is true. Halawir is a traitor, and the Devourer — the real Devourer — has twelve talismans. Even if Tellun himself bounded in here with party hats, I’m not sure there would be any reason to celebrate.”

“I don’t care,” Abeke said. “Seeing those has me feeling good for the first time today.”

Conor looked at the two talismans in Rollan’s hands. They were such small things, and yet essential to the very fate of the world. The moonlight streaming in iced their edges, its gleam reflecting in his friends’ eyes.

He put one arm around Rollan and another around Abeke. Together, they stared through the open ceiling of the great hall into the night sky, where a splash of stars winked through the clouds.

To Conor, they almost looked like an arrow pointing the way south, to Stetriol. The Conquerors’ home.

“We have two talismans,” he said. “And we know who has the rest. So let’s get moving.”

Eliot Schrefer is the National Book Award finalist author of Endangered, about a girl surviving wartime in Congo with an orphaned ape. His research for his Great Ape Quartet books has led him to a bonobo sanctuary in the Democratic Republic of Congo and on a boat trek through the jungles of Borneo. He once worked as a sea turtle research assistant and had many fish while growing up, of which only the catfish survived.

You've read the book—now join the adventure at Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Have your ebook ready and enter the code to unlock huge rewards!

NPM4JDFWT9

BOOK SEVEN:

THE EVERTREE

The talismans are gone. The team has been betrayed. With nothing left to lose, the heroes must launch a final offensive into the heart of the enemy's territory. They sail for Stetriol, the Lost Lands — home of the Conquerors.

Each book unlocks in-game rewards.
Log in with your copy to help save Erdas!

The Legend Lives in You

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

A sneak peek of the next

ASPIRIT ANIMALS™

Book Seven

The Evertree

By Marie Lu

SLEEPWALKING

IT WAS A COLD, DRIZZLY MORNING AT GREENHAVEN CASTLE. Rollan wrapped his cloak — Tarik's old green cloak, rather — more tightly around his shoulders and wandered out to the main entrance, where he'd seen Abeke surveying the overcast landscape with Uraza at her side. The Coral Octopus hung heavily around his neck, bumping against his chest with every step he took. He found himself reaching up frequently to touch it. After all that had happened — Shane's betrayal, Meilin's turning, Tarik's death — he couldn't afford to lose one of their two remaining talismans.

How long had it been since Shane escaped with the talismans? A few weeks? Somehow, the whole thing felt like it'd happened yesterday. And here they were, still gathering Greencloaks from around the world, building up their forces to face the Conquerors. Rollan's mouth tightened in frustration. If Tarik were here, he would tell Rollan not to worry, to calm down and think clearly, to let himself grieve and then move forward with a clear, patient head. But all Rollan could do these days was pace restlessly in the castle, waiting for the word that they could head out to retrieve the talismans, stop Kovo the Ape, and rescue Meilin.

And rescue Meilin.

His fingers stopped fiddling with the Coral Octopus for a moment, suspended by the weight of the thought. Rescuing her felt impossible. Sometimes, when he chatted with the others, he found himself looking for Meilin so that he could tell her the newest joke in his head. He would yearn to make her laugh, only to realize that she wasn't there. She was far away.

Rollan sighed. He couldn't afford to keep thinking about all that had gone wrong. He closed his eyes, took a deep breath, and tried to pretend that Tarik was still wandering around somewhere in the castle, that Meilin was asleep in her chambers upstairs. He knew neither was true, but right now, he could force himself to believe, and it kept his darker thoughts at bay.

The weather. That was a much safer thought. I'll think about the weather.

For the fifteenth time that morning, Rollan considered how odd the weather had been. This was supposed to be the dry season, but for the past week, as Olvan organized their forces in preparation to leave, they'd gotten nothing but gray skies and steady rain. Even the animals were behaving oddly all of a sudden. The birds were migrating early, for one, and when Rollan looked overhead, he could see another flock heading south in two giant V formations.

"Go ahead, Essix," he murmured to his gyrfalcon, who sat perched on his shoulder. If she kept putting her full weight on him like this, he was going to get a sore back for sure. "I know you want to hunt."

But even Essix seemed out of sorts. She chirped a little, fluffed her neck feathers to shake out water droplets, and settled in even more. She seemed completely content to stay put, instead of heading out for a good hunt. Rollan watched her for a while. When she just went back to preening her tail feathers, he tried to ignore his aching shoulder and decided he'd better leave her be. Far be it from him to judge her sullen mood.

Maybe she loathed waiting around just as much as Rollan did.

By the time he reached the castle entrance, the drizzle had turned into a steady rain. The water beaded on the fabric of his cloak before soaking through. Uraza watched them approach. Her tail swished back and forth. Even though she wasn't his spirit animal, Rollan guessed she probably felt a little impatient with all the waiting too.

Abeke stood beside her, leaning against the archway and absently stroking the leopard's velvety head. She didn't bother turning when Rollan came to join her. The Granite Ram, their only other talisman, dangled from her neck, the pale gray pendant prominent against the dark of her skin.

“Hey,” Rollan said. “I know you were supposed to be your village’s Rain Dancer and all, but can you lighten up on all the dancing?” He looked up at the sky for emphasis.

Abeke’s eyes flickered to Rollan’s cloak, then went back to surveying the bleak landscape. She didn’t seem amused by his joke, and in embarrassment, he let it fade away. “Hey,” she just said.

Rollan turned serious. “Olvan says we should be able to set out soon, in the next few days.”

“Any new messages?”

He shook his head. They’d sent out dozens of stormy petrels and pigeons to their Greencloak allies and friends in other nations, hoping that some of them would receive the call for help in time to come to their aid. Abeke had sent several doves to Nilo, to deliver the news to her father and sister.

Friends — we make for Stetriol in a week. We need your help.

As far as Rollan knew, Abeke’s father hadn’t responded.

“Sorry,” he replied.

Abeke nodded her thanks, lowered her eyes, and turned away again.

Rollan pursed his lips, for once lacking a witty quip. Where was a good joke when you needed one? Abeke had been like this often lately, staring off at the horizon while lost in thought. He knew she was probably dwelling on Shane’s betrayal, and how Meilin had been forced to turn on all of them. And by the way she lowered her eyes in shame, he knew she still blamed herself for all of it.

Meilin. Again, Rollan scolded himself for returning to the thoughts that kept him tossing at night and pushing away his meals. Where is she now? he wondered. What was she thinking?

What must it feel like, to have no power over yourself?

The pain of losing Meilin irritated him for an instant. He’d done so well, for so long, on his own. But now there were people at stake, whose absences hurt him, and he didn’t like it one bit.

As if she could tell what he was thinking, Abeke tilted her head toward him and cleared her throat. “It looks good on you,” she said, offering him a weak smile.

Tarik’s cloak. Memories flashed back to him of the elder Greencloak’s last stand, of the hopeful look in Tarik's eyes when he saw his own cloak draped in Rollan's arms, just before he sacrificed himself. A pain spread in Rollan's chest, until he felt like he could barely breathe.

Still, there was something comforting about Abeke's words. As if Tarik wasn't completely gone. Even now, the cloak protected him, shielding him from the rain. Essix ruffled her feathers again, and flecks of water went flying.

"Thanks," he muttered. "Who knew I'd have to wrap myself up to keep warm at this time of year?"

"Olvan says the Greencloaks in Nilo are reporting weird weather there too."

"Like what?"

"Like layers of ice over the watering holes. He said some of the animals don't know what to make of it, and they can't get to the water."

Ice. In Nilo? Rollan tried to imagine the oasis where they'd found Cabaro, encased in a thick layer of ice. "Well. That sounds like a nice, normal summer."

Abeke couldn't help smiling a little at his sarcasm. "I can't remember seeing that — or even hearing about it — when I lived in Nilo. The tribes must be in chaos."

"Or skating around and playing games. I mean, I would."

That coaxed a genuine laugh out of her. "I can see it. Planks of wood and antelope bone strapped to our feet."

Rollan leaned in with a conspiratorial grin. "I bet Uraza would love that. Wouldn't you?" He nodded at Uraza, who regarded him with a rather withering look.

The two chuckled a little, and then their moment of humor faded.

Rollan realized that Abeke must be wondering how her father and sister were doing. He shifted his boots against the damp stone floor. "Do you think they're okay?" he asked.

Abeke shrugged. For a moment, she threw her shoulders back in an illusion of confidence. "I haven't thought much about it," she said, almost too careful about her carelessness.

The lie in her words and posture was so obvious that Rollan could have sensed it even without his gifts from Essix. Still, he just nodded along. He had lost his mentor, the only man he'd ever thought of as a father ... but Abeke's true father had turned his back on her. And the person Abeke had always considered a good friend — Shane — had used her friendship too.

“Abeke,” Rollan suddenly said, touching her arm with his hand. She and Uraza both turned to look at him in unison. “Look. I know what you must be going through. You don’t have to pretend around me.” He hesitated. He’d never been all that good at gestures of serious emotion. “It’s not your fault,” he finally said. “Shane’s betrayal ... He’s the one who should feel guilty, not you. You couldn’t have known. You love and you trust. And I just wanted to say ... well, that I’m sorry people keep taking advantage of that trust.”

Abeke studied him for a long moment. She still looked sad, but Rollan thought he could see some of the guilt lift from her eyes. After a while, she nodded. “Thank you,” she murmured. “I’m sorry that you’ve had to wait so long to trust others,” she replied.

The two fell into a comfortable silence. After a while, Rollan shook his head and nudged her gently. “The ice will pass, I know it. All I can say is that I’d be mad if Nilo was hogging all the blue sky and sunshine.”

Abeke cracked a wry smile. Uraza let out a comforting rumble deep in her throat, then nudged the girl’s hand with her head.

Suddenly Rollan felt Essix’s weight shift on his shoulder. An instant later, she pushed off from him and launched herself into the air with an earsplitting shriek. The movement nearly sent him tumbling backward. He flinched, his ears ringing, and looked on as she soared up into the sky. “Hey!” he shouted up at her, annoyed. “I know you’re loud — you don’t have to show off!”

“What is she doing?” asked Abeke.

“I don’t know. Probably decided she was hungry after all.” But the migrating birds were too far off in the distance now. Something else must have caught her attention. Rollan looked at Essix as she flew farther away — — and then, abruptly, the world rushed forward around him, and he could see through her eyes.

He soared up, up, above the castle and into the open air, and then he looked down at where their small figures stood at the entrance. Essix’s gaze turned sharply to focus on one of the castle’s battlements. She shrieked again. This time, it was the distinct cry of something going very, very wrong.

Rollan looked closer. There, along the slippery, wet edge of the battlement's stone barrier, walked Conor.

Conor didn't walk in a concentrated way. He swayed and teetered dangerously along the ledge, as if he wasn't quite awake. The hairs rose on the back of Rollan's neck. What on Erdas is he doing up there? Rollan blinked, feeling his vision rush back to the ground and return to him. He pointed up in horror.

"Is that Conor?" he said incredulously.

"What?" Abeke exclaimed. She looked too. Immediately she straightened, then squinted as if she couldn't quite believe what she was seeing either. She cupped her hands around her mouth. "Conor!" she shouted up at the battlement. "Hey, Conor!"

But Conor didn't seem to hear her. He didn't seem to notice anything, actually, not even the fact that he was now inching his way along the edge of the battlement. Where was Briggan? Rollan glanced frantically around the top of the tower, but the enormous gray wolf was nowhere to be seen. Briggan must have been in his passive state.

A chill ran down Rollan's spine as he thought back to Meilin's strange, Bile-addled behavior. What if Conor was somehow affected by the Bile too? Rollan felt a sudden urge to call out for Tarik — until he remembered, with a pang, that Tarik was no longer there to help them.

"Come on!" he hissed at Abeke, grabbing her hand. He dashed through the entrance, back into the castle, and toward the stairs leading up to the battlement. They ran up the steps two at a time. Rollan almost tripped on one step, but caught himself and hurried on. Uraza bounded beside them, each of her strides equal to three of theirs.

By the time they emerged at the top of the wet battlement, Uraza was already there. Rollan wiped rain out of his eyes, and his gaze settled on Conor's teetering figure.

No!

Essix shrieked again and dove for the boy. Rollan lunged forward as fast as he could.

He reached Conor — right as Conor slipped off the edge.

You've read the book — now join the adventure at Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Create your character.

Choose your
spirit animal.

Enter your code to unlock huge rewards:
NPM4JDFWT9

Go on exciting
quests and help
save Erdas!

THE LEGEND LIVES IN YOU

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

Discover the Truth Behind the Conqueror

Learn all about Shane in the thrilling
Spirit Animals e-short trilogy!

GET THE BOOK!

SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SASHANee

From the creators of The 39 Clues™ and Infinity Ring™

SPIRIT ANIMALS

THE LEGEND LIVES IN YOU

Four children discover that they have spirit animals, a powerful bond that thrusts them on a quest to save their world.

READ THE BOOK.
UNLOCK THE GAME.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

 SCHOLASTIC

From the publisher of The 39 Clues™ and Spirit Animals™

TOMBQUEST

The tombs are opening . . .

The magic of Egypt has come alive. Mummies are waking. New York is overrun with scorpions. And worst of all, five evil ancients called the Death Walkers have broken free. It's up to one boy to stop them . . . before the Afterlife claims us all.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/TombQuest

TOMBQUEST®

SCHOLASTIC, TOMBQUEST and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

THE STUNNING ADVENTURE
FROM BESTSELLING AUTHOR
RICK RIORDAN

Available in print and
eBook editions

scholastic.com/the39clues

39CLUESe

SCHOLASTIC, THE 39 CLUES, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

INFINITY RING™

FIX THE PAST. SAVE THE FUTURE.

Available in print and eBook
editions.

SCHOLASTIC.COM/INFINITYRING

SCHOLASTIC, INFINITY RING, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

IRINGe

Copyright © 2015 by Scholastic Inc.

All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920.
SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2013953382

Map illustration by Michael Walton

First edition, January 2015

e-ISBN 978-0-545-52260-1

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereafter invented, without the express written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

THE NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING SERIES

ASPIRIT ANIMALS

BOOK 7

THE EVERTREE

READ
THE BOOK.
UNLOCK
THE GAME.

BY NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING AUTHOR

MARIE LU

The world is in peril.

A long-forgotten evil has risen from the far corners of Erdas, and we need YOU to help stop it.

Claim your spirit animal and join the adventure now.

1. Go to scholastic.com/spiritanimals.
2. Log in to create your character and choose your own spirit animal.
3. Have your book ready and enter the code below to unlock the adventure.

Your code:

NXNC3WD2TC

By the Four Fallen,
The Greencloaks

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

It shimmered under the dark sky, glowing as if from within, a rainbow of silver and gold.

The Evertree.

ASPIRIT ANIMAS™

THE EVERTREE

Marie Lu

SCHOLASTIC INC.

To Taylor, who loves beasts great and small

–M.L.

Contents

Evertree Emblem

Greencloak Letter

Quote Page

Title Page

Map

Dedication

1: VISION

2: SLEEPWALKING

3: THE PLAN

4: PRISONER

5: OLD FRIENDS

6: DORIAN

7: DISRUPTION

8: BATTLE AT SEA

9: GRAY HILLS

10: DESOLATE LAND

11: ARMY

12: FRIENDS AND ENEMIES

13: MUTTERING ROCK

14: KOVO

15: BREAKING BONDS

16: DUEL

17: TELLUN

18: REDEMPTION

19: THE FINAL BATTLE

20: THE STAFF OF CYCLES

21: THE EVERTREE

22: REBIRTH

23: REUNION

About the Author

Online Game Code

Sneak Peek

Spirit Animals Game

Copyright

1

VISION

ENORMOUS BLACK SCALES SLITHERING ACROSS GRASS. A gorilla’s earthshaking roar. A piercing shriek from the sky. Grass, dirt, rock, brittle bark. A heartbeat deep in the earth, something as old as time itself. A silhouette of twisting antlers that appeared and then vanished.

The dream always began this way. Conor blinked, blinded by the light overhead. He held his hand out over his eyes in an attempt to block it, but the light cut through, turning the edges of his skin red and translucent. Something gold flashed before his eyes. It vanished immediately, but for that instant, it had looked like leaves. He struggled to a sitting position. The dirt beneath him crumbled, hard and cracked, dying.

A voice echoed in the air.

Conor. It is the end of an era. We need you here.

Tellun? Conor thought. Gradually, he realized that the blinding light came from fires. Fire was everywhere.

“Conor!”

Conor jerked his head to his side at the familiar scream. As his eyes adjusted to the light, he realized that he was lying near the edge of a cliff – and not far from him stood Meilin, weighed down with chains. She threw herself at an oncoming Greencloak and knocked him into the dirt. Jhi looked helplessly on.

Rollan was locked in a tight battle with an enormous snake. The snake wrapped its coils around both of his arms, lifting him high in the air. A short distance away, Abeke and Uraza fought what seemed like hundreds of Conquerors.

Briggan! Conor tried to shout the name as he finally managed to get to his feet. He wanted to run to his friends. Why was it so hard to move? Briggan, come on! We have to help them – where are you? He called and called for his wolf before he realized that Briggan was in his passive state. But something seemed wrong. The longer Conor stared at the tattoo, the fainter it turned, until he couldn't tell whether or not it was there at all. His heart seized in terror.

Conor.

The gorilla's roar sounded out again, shaking the earth beneath his feet. Conor looked off to a large rock behind where Rollan struggled with the snake. There stood the Great Ape. One of his fists pounded heavily against his chest, while the other fist clutched what looked like a twisted golden staff that gave off a strange, ethereal glow.

The ape swiveled his head toward Conor in such an eerie move that it sent shivers down his spine. The shadow that the beast cast swallowed Conor whole, covering every bit of land as far as the eye could see. When the ape caught sight of Conor, he narrowed his eyes into dangerous slits. Then he threw his head back into another roar. He charged him.

Run! Conor screamed at himself, but his limbs all felt like they were dragging through thick molasses. He tried to lunge forward with each step, only to feel like he was being pulled back. Behind him, the gorilla surged forward, his mighty limbs pounding against the earth. Conor ran toward the edge of the cliff, unsure what he expected to do once he got there. He skidded to a halt just over the edge, arms wheeling. His boots kicked up a shower of pebbles that rained over the cliff side. There was nowhere else to go.

The gorilla roared behind him. He was so close now. Conor cowered near the cliff's edge. All he could see around him were the images of his friends losing the war, struggling against enemies far too strong for them. Greencloaks fell before Conquerors and flames rose into the sky, all against the backdrop of a bleak, dying land.

The gorilla reached him. Conor's boot slipped. He tried to catch himself, but all he caught was a close glimpse of the gorilla's terrifying eyes. He teetered on the edge.

An enormous eagle appeared overhead. Its wings gleamed bronze and white as they blocked out the sun. Conor looked up at it, and to his amazement, he saw Tarik riding on its back, his cloak billowing out behind him. Tarik! You're alive! An indescribable joy and relief washed over him at the sight of the familiar face. Tarik was here. Everything was going to be okay. The Greencloak reached out with one gloved hand toward Conor, and Conor reached up to take it.

Except it wasn't Tarik.

The face transformed. The kind, knowing eyes were replaced with ones cold and cunning. Conor found himself staring up into the face of Shane instead. The boy smiled at him in a way that showed all his teeth at once. In the distance, the gorilla's roar mixed with Tellun's deep voice. Shane withdrew his hand, and Conor saw the abyss yawn beneath him, swallowing him whole.

SLEEPWALKING

IT WAS A COLD, DRIZZLY MORNING AT GREENHAVEN CASTLE. Rollan wrapped his cloak – Tarik's old green cloak, rather – more tightly around his shoulders and wandered out to the main entrance, where he'd seen Abeke surveying the overcast landscape with Uraza at her side. The Coral Octopus hung heavily around his neck, bumping against his chest with every step he took. He found himself reaching up frequently to touch it. After all that had happened – Shane's betrayal, Meilin's turning, Tarik's death – he couldn't afford to lose one of their two remaining talismans.

How long had it been since Shane escaped with the talismans? A few weeks? Somehow, the whole thing felt like it'd happened yesterday. And here they were, still gathering Greencloaks from around the world, building up their forces to face the Conquerors. Rollan's mouth tightened in frustration. If Tarik were here, he would tell Rollan not to worry, to calm down and think clearly, to let himself grieve and then move forward with a clear, patient head. But all Rollan could do these days was pace restlessly in the castle, waiting for the word that they could head out to retrieve the talismans, stop Kovo the Ape, and rescue Meilin.

And rescue Meilin.

His fingers stopped fiddling with the Coral Octopus for a moment, suspended by the weight of the thought. Rescuing her felt impossible.

Sometimes, when he chatted with the others, he found himself looking for Meilin so that he could tell her the newest joke in his head. He would yearn to make her laugh, only to realize that she wasn't there. She was far away.

Rollan sighed. He couldn't afford to keep thinking about all that had gone wrong. He closed his eyes, took a deep breath, and tried to pretend that Tarik was still wandering around somewhere in the castle, that Meilin was asleep in her chambers upstairs. He knew neither was true, but right now, he could force himself to believe, and it kept his darker thoughts at bay.

The weather. That was a much safer thought. I'll think about the weather.

For the fifteenth time that morning, Rollan considered how odd the weather had been. This was supposed to be the dry season, but for the past week, as Olvan organized their forces in preparation to leave, they'd gotten nothing but gray skies and steady rain. Even the animals were behaving oddly all of a sudden. The birds were migrating early, for one, and when Rollan looked overhead, he could see another flock heading south in two giant V formations.

"Go ahead, Essix," he murmured to his gyrfalcon, who sat perched on his shoulder. If she kept putting her full weight on him like this, he was going to get a sore back for sure. "I know you want to hunt."

But even Essix seemed out of sorts. She chirped a little, fluffed her neck feathers to shake out water droplets, and settled in even more. She seemed completely content to stay put, instead of heading out for a good hunt. Rollan watched her for a while. When she just went back to preening her tail feathers, he tried to ignore his aching shoulder and decided he'd better leave her be. Far be it from him to judge her sullen mood.

Maybe she loathed waiting around just as much as Rollan did.

By the time he reached the castle entrance, the drizzle had turned into a steady rain. The water beaded on the fabric of his cloak before soaking through. Uraza watched them approach. Her tail swished back and forth. Even though she wasn't his spirit animal, Rollan guessed she probably felt a little impatient with all the waiting too.

Abeke stood beside her, leaning against the archway and absently stroking the leopard's velvety head. She didn't bother turning when Rollan came to join her. The Granite Ram, their only other talisman, dangled from her neck, the pale gray pendant prominent against the dark of her skin.

“Hey,” Rollan said. “I know you were supposed to be your village’s Rain Dancer and all, but can you lighten up on all the dancing?” He looked up at the sky for emphasis.

Abeke’s eyes flickered to Rollan’s cloak, then went back to surveying the bleak landscape. She didn’t seem amused by his joke, and in embarrassment, he let it fade away. “Hey,” she just said.

Rollan turned serious. “Olvan says we should be able to set out soon, in the next few days.”

“Any new messages?”

He shook his head. They’d sent out dozens of stormy petrels and pigeons to their Greencloak allies and friends in other nations, hoping that some of them would receive the call for help in time to come to their aid. Abeke had sent several doves to Nilo, to deliver the news to her father and sister.

Friends – we make for Stetriol in a week. We need your help.

As far as Rollan knew, Abeke’s father hadn’t responded.

“Sorry,” he replied.

Abeke nodded her thanks, lowered her eyes, and turned away again.

Rollan pursed his lips, for once lacking a witty quip. Where was a good joke when you needed one? Abeke had been like this often lately, staring off at the horizon while lost in thought. He knew she was probably dwelling on Shane’s betrayal, and how Meilin had been forced to turn on all of them. And by the way she lowered her eyes in shame, he knew she still blamed herself for all of it.

Meilin. Again, Rollan scolded himself for returning to the thoughts that kept him tossing at night and pushing away his meals. Where is she now? he wondered. What was she thinking?

What must it feel like, to have no power over yourself?

The pain of losing Meilin irritated him for an instant. He’d done so well, for so long, on his own. But now there were people at stake, whose absences hurt him, and he didn’t like it one bit.

As if she could tell what he was thinking, Abeke tilted her head toward him and cleared her throat. “It looks good on you,” she said, offering him a weak smile.

Tarik's cloak. Memories flashed back to him of the elder Greencloak's last stand, of the hopeful look in Tarik's eyes when he saw his own cloak draped in Rollan's arms, just before he sacrificed himself. A pain spread in Rollan's chest, until he felt like he could barely breathe.

Still, there was something comforting about Abeke's words. As if Tarik wasn't completely gone. Even now, the cloak protected him, shielding him from the rain. Essix ruffled her feathers again, and flecks of water went flying.

"Thanks," he muttered. "Who knew I'd have to wrap myself up to keep warm at this time of year?"

"Olvan says the Greencloaks in Nilo are reporting weird weather there too."

"Like what?"

"Like layers of ice over the watering holes. He said some of the animals don't know what to make of it, and they can't get to the water."

Ice. In Nilo? Rollan tried to imagine the oasis where they'd found Cabaro, encased in a thick layer of ice. "Well. That sounds like a nice, normal summer."

Abeke couldn't help smiling a little at his sarcasm. "I can't remember seeing that – or even hearing about it – when I lived in Nilo. The tribes must be in chaos."

"Or skating around and playing games. I mean, I would."

That coaxed a genuine laugh out of her. "I can see it. Planks of wood and antelope bone strapped to our feet."

Rollan leaned in with a conspiratorial grin. "I bet Uraza would love that. Wouldn't you?" He nodded at Uraza, who regarded him with a rather withering look.

The two chuckled a little, and then their moment of humor faded.

Rollan realized that Abeke must be wondering how her father and sister were doing. He shifted his boots against the damp stone floor. "Do you think they're okay?" he asked.

Abeke shrugged. For a moment, she threw her shoulders back in an illusion of confidence. "I haven't thought much about it," she said, almost too careful about her carelessness.

The lie in her words and posture was so obvious that Rollan could have sensed it even without his gifts from Essix. Still, he just nodded along. He had lost his mentor, the only man he'd ever thought of as a father ... but Abeke's true father had turned his back on her. And the person Abeke had always considered a good friend – Shane – had used her friendship too.

“Abeke,” Rollan suddenly said, touching her arm with his hand. She and Uraza both turned to look at him in unison. “Look. I know what you must be going through. You don't have to pretend around me.” He hesitated. He'd never been all that good at gestures of serious emotion. “It's not your fault,” he finally said. “Shane's betrayal ... He's the one who should feel guilty, not you. You couldn't have known. You love and you trust. And I just wanted to say ... well, that I'm sorry people keep taking advantage of that trust.”

Abeke studied him for a long moment. She still looked sad, but Rollan thought he could see some of the guilt lift from her eyes. After a while, she nodded. “Thank you,” she murmured. “I'm sorry that you've had to wait so long to trust others,” she replied.

The two fell into a comfortable silence. After a while, Rollan shook his head and nudged her gently. “The ice will pass, I know it. All I can say is that I'd be mad if Nilo was hogging all the blue sky and sunshine.”

Abeke cracked a wry smile. Uraza let out a comforting rumble deep in her throat, then nudged the girl's hand with her head.

Suddenly Rollan felt Essix's weight shift on his shoulder. An instant later, she pushed off from him and launched herself into the air with an earsplitting shriek. The movement nearly sent him tumbling backward. He flinched, his ears ringing, and looked on as she soared up into the sky. “Hey!” he shouted up at her, annoyed. “I know you're loud – you don't have to show off!”

“What is she doing?” asked Abeke.

“I don't know. Probably decided she was hungry after all.” But the migrating birds were too far off in the distance now. Something else must have caught her attention. Rollan looked at Essix as she flew farther away –

– and then, abruptly, the world rushed forward around him, and he could see through her eyes.

He soared up, up, above the castle and into the open air, and then he looked down at where their small figures stood at the entrance. Essix's gaze turned sharply to focus on one of the castle's battlements. She shrieked again. This time, it was the distinct cry of something going very, very wrong.

Rollan looked closer. There, along the slippery, wet edge of the battlement's stone barrier, walked Conor.

Conor didn't walk in a concentrated way. He swayed and teetered dangerously along the ledge, as if he wasn't quite awake. The hairs rose on the back of Rollan's neck. What on Erdas is he doing up there? Rollan blinked, feeling his vision rush back to the ground and return to him. He pointed up in horror.

"Is that Conor?" he said incredulously.

"What?" Abeke exclaimed. She looked too. Immediately she straightened, then squinted as if she couldn't quite believe what she was seeing either. She cupped her hands around her mouth. "Conor!" she shouted up at the battlement. "Hey, Conor!"

But Conor didn't seem to hear her. He didn't seem to notice anything, actually, not even the fact that he was now inching his way along the edge of the battlement. Where was Briggan? Rollan glanced frantically around the top of the tower, but the enormous gray wolf was nowhere to be seen. Briggan must have been in his passive state.

A chill ran down Rollan's spine as he thought back to Meilin's strange, Bile-addled behavior. What if Conor was somehow affected by the Bile too? Rollan felt a sudden urge to call out for Tarik – until he remembered, with a pang, that Tarik was no longer there to help them.

"Come on!" he hissed at Abeke, grabbing her hand. He dashed through the entrance, back into the castle, and toward the stairs leading up to the battlement. They ran up the steps two at a time. Rollan almost tripped on one step, but caught himself and hurried on. Uraza bounded beside them, each of her strides equal to three of theirs.

By the time they emerged at the top of the wet battlement, Uraza was already there. Rollan wiped rain out of his eyes, and his gaze settled on Conor's teetering figure.

No!

Essix shrieked again and dove for the boy. Rollan lunged forward as fast as he could.

He reached Conor – right as Conor slipped off the edge.

3

THE PLAN

ESSIX DOVE AT THE SAME TIME ROLLAN CRIED OUT. HER talon hooked into the sleeve of Conor's shirt. The fabric ripped – but not all the way. For an instant, Conor dangled precariously in midair.

“Grab him!” Rollan shouted.

Abeke was the closest. She skidded to a crouch on the ledge, using one hand to securely grasp the stone battlement. Then she stretched her free arm out to grab Conor's sleeve. Essix flapped as close as she could – but with each movement, the fabric tore more, until nothing but a few dozen threads kept Conor from plummeting to the ground.

Abeke finally seized Conor's sleeve. She tightened her fist around it and pulled him toward her. The boy groaned at the movement. His eyes opened for the first time – initially, he looked disoriented. Then he glanced down and gasped.

The threads of the fabric snapped.

Conor fell. Abeke gritted her teeth and hung on tight. Conor slammed into the side of the wall, grunting in pain. Abeke hung desperately on to his sleeve, but she could feel her grip slipping. Just when she thought she could hold on no longer, Uraza stretched her neck out and seized Conor's arm in her mouth. She tugged, careful not to break Conor's skin with her teeth.

“Pull!” Abeke shouted, working as one with Uraza. Conor looked up at her and used his other hand to grab her wrist. She clenched her jaw. Then Rollan joined her in pulling Conor up, and together they dragged him back over the side of the tower.

The three collapsed in a heap, right as two Greencloaks came running.

“What’s all this?” It was Olvan, and his eyebrows were furrowed.

Abeke stayed where she sat, still trying to catch her breath. Beside her, Uraza blinked water out of her violet eyes and swished her tail. She seemed agitated, enough so that she actually growled at the Greencloaks whenever they got too close to her.

“You tell us,” Abeke finally said to Conor, who looked unsure of what had just happened himself. The side of his cheek that had slammed into the tower was already beginning to bruise.

Rollan leaned back and rubbed his shoulder. “Yeah, what was that all about? Recreational attempt at flying? If you wanted to do that, you should’ve let Essix know ahead of time.”

Olvan turned his piercing eyes to Conor. “You were climbing the battlement, boy?”

Conor didn’t say a word. Abeke watched him carefully as he pulled himself into a sitting position and wiped the rain from his face. He seemed deep in thought. She couldn’t guess what he was possibly thinking about, aside from having just narrowly escaped death. It took her a moment to see everything wrong with him – he looked particularly pale, and whether his hair was plastered to his face from rain or sweat, she couldn’t tell. Dark circles rimmed the bottom of his eyes.

Olvan helped him to his feet, threw his own cloak around Conor’s shoulders, and guided him away from the battlement. He motioned for Abeke and Rollan to follow. “Let’s get you three out of the rain. This is no way to start a morning.”

An hour later, Abeke, Rollan, and Conor were sitting in the dining hall in fresh, dry clothes, all wrapped in blankets and sipping hot porridge. Abeke’s braids were still plastered to her scalp, matted down with rain. Steam rose from their heads. She sipped her breakfast gratefully, thinking that if only the porridge had a touch of Niloan spice in it, it could be the best thing she'd ever eaten in her life. Nearby, Rollan was gulping his own porridge down, not even bothering with a spoon. It was the first time this week that Abeke had seen him with an appetite.

Olvan and Lenori sat nearby, as if they feared something else might happen if they left Conor alone. Conor just stirred his bowl of porridge. His eyes focused on nothing in particular, and Abeke thought she could hear him muttering under his breath. Briggan sat beside him with his muzzle in Conor's lap. Conor stroked his head absently.

Abeke finally decided to break the silence. She nudged Conor. "So ... what happened up there?" she asked him carefully. "Sleepwalking?" She didn't want to accuse him aloud of what she knew they all feared – that Meilin had sleepwalked too, when Gerathon controlled her through the Bile. But Conor seemed to hear the concern in her voice.

"It's not that," he said, hesitating. "At least, I don't think so." Conor stayed silent for a moment longer. Then he put his spoon down and nodded. "I've been having dreams again ... ever since Shane took the talismans." Rollan sucked in his breath sharply, but Conor went on. "I'm okay, but I haven't slept well, and I keep dreaming the same things night after night." He hesitated. "I woke up in the middle of the night last week too ... and found myself climbing the battlement."

A chill ran down Abeke's spine. She didn't want to think about what might have happened if Conor hadn't woken himself up in time, and if no one had been around to help him.

Rollan raised an eyebrow. "You could've, you know, told someone. I would have happily stood outside your door and whacked you in the head every time you tried to leave."

"Rollan has a valid point," Olvan agreed. "Why did you leave Briggan in his passive state after your first incident, and tell none of your friends?"

Conor shrugged, looking guilty. "I would have, except I had a night when nothing happened. So I thought it went away. I even locked my bedroom door – but I must have unlocked it in my sleep."

Lenori leaned forward, the beads around her neck clacking together. Her eyes were warm with concern. “What dreams did you have, Conor?” she said gently. “Do you remember?”

Conor took a deep breath. “They started a few weeks ago.” He frowned. “There’s always an ape. And the shadow of antlers. A bright flash of light. Golden leaves.” Conor looked out the window, his expression distant as he relived the vision. “We are all in the middle of a battle. The ape attacks me. I fall over a cliff, but a man riding an eagle soars overhead. At first, I think it’s Tarik coming to my rescue.” Rollan stiffened at the late Greencloak’s name. “But when I reach out to take his hand, I see that it isn’t Tarik at all. It’s Sha –”

Conor cut himself off, but Abeke still winced. She knew the name hanging on the tip of his tongue. She knew it all too well.

Conor cleared his throat. “Anyway, he pretends to save me, and then he lets me fall,” he finished, shooting Abeke a sympathetic look.

Abeke tightened her jaw and tried to push Shane from her mind, but it was hard not to imagine his face. Hard not to imagine how Shane had looked when he rode away on Halawir’s back with the talismans. And now Conor was having dreams about it.

How earnest and sincere Shane had seemed, when he sailed to Greenhaven with her and convinced her to vouch for him, when he’d asked for her help and lied through his teeth without a single flicker of his gaze. How silly she had been, to believe him. I love that you have that much faith about people. You really are amazing.

The words echoed, familiar and cruel, in her ears. How stupid.

“Abeke.” Conor’s voice jerked her out of the memory.

“Huh?” she blurted out.

Rollan was staring at her too, with a concerned look on his face. “We said, are you okay?”

Abeke shook her head, blinked, and straightened. Her mouth set back into a line. “I’m fine,” she replied. “Conor, what do you think your dreams mean? Are they prophetic? I thought you couldn’t do that if Briggan was in his passive state, and you said –”

“I know,” Conor agreed. “That’s what I thought too. But it keeps happening, night after night. I don’t know what’s causing them, but I know they mean something.”

“What do they mean, then?” Rollan said.

Conor took a deep breath. His eyes darted to Olvan before settling back on his friends. “Kovo has stirred in his prison. I think Shane and Zerif have reached him, or are going to reach him soon. We’re going to fight a great war in Stetriol.”

The hall fell silent at Conor’s ominous words. After a moment, he went on. “I don’t know what the golden leaves mean, but ... every time I saw them, I felt a heartbeat under my feet, something deep and powerful in the ground.”

“The heart of the lands,” Lenori murmured in wonder, and everyone turned to her. She nodded at Conor. “There is an ancient myth among the Amayan tribes of a place in Erdas that is the origin of all life – humans, animals, even the Great Beasts. The tale calls this the place where the heart of our world still beats. Perhaps what you felt was the birthplace of Erdas. If so, there is a lot more at stake than we thought.”

Abeke’s heart skipped a beat. She had heard similar myths as a little girl, tales that named Nilo as the first of the lands.

Rollan cleared his throat. “Did you see anything about Meilin?” he asked, the hope obvious in his voice.

Conor met the other boy’s eyes reluctantly. “I saw her and Jhi fighting Greencloaks, with the Conquerors at her back. They disappeared into the fray.”

Rollan’s entire posture drooped. His face darkened as he returned to his porridge. Abeke could tell that Conor regretted saying anything at all.

Olvan sat taller in his seat and gave the three as comforting of a look as he could. “These are visions, not yet truth,” he reminded them. “All is not yet lost. And we received several new messages this morning.”

At that, Abeke leaned forward. “From whom? Where?”

“Our friends Finn, Kalani, and Maya will arrive in Greenhaven tomorrow.”

Maya! Kalani! It would be good to see them again. Finn too. Abeke waited for him to list a few more names, but the elder Greencloak finished, and the hall settled back into an uneasy silence. Her face fell again. Her father’s name was not among them. Why was she surprised? Still, she managed a smile. “No others?” she asked hopefully.

Olvan shook his head, clearly dismayed that he could not give her better news. “With Conor’s prophecy, we cannot wait any longer. We will take two parties and set out separately.” He looked at the others. “Abeke, Rollan, and Conor – you will travel with a small patrol of our best Greencloaks. You will move faster and more stealthily this way, giving you the chance to search for Kovo’s prison and the stolen talismans. I will lead a larger force of Greencloaks from a different direction and meet you there. Too many Conquerors will be gathered in Stetriol for your smaller team to face alone – our forces will provide a distraction for the Conquerors, so that you are able to get through and carry out your mission.”

A brief silence fell over them. Abeke saw Rollan’s eyes wander over to the empty chair beside Lenori. Tarik would have sat there. He would have been at this meeting, and his presence would have reassured them. Now there was only an echo of him in the air, a ghost. Abeke knew Rollan must be thinking about that now. He pushed his porridge bowl away, as if suddenly uninterested.

“What about Tellun?” Rollan muttered. He looked around. “I mean, there’s still the Platinum Elk.”

Lenori shook her head. “I have not seen nor felt Tellun’s presence.”

Olvan folded his hands before him. “We cannot afford a separate mission to find Tellun and the Platinum Elk. There is no time to lose.”

“Conor said he saw a shadow of antlers in his dream,” Abeke added. “Maybe that’s where we’ll find Tellun too, at the heart of Erdas.”

Rollan nodded, probably relieved that they could finally be on the move again. If they had to wait any longer to go after Shane and rescue Meilin ...

Conor still had a troubled look on his face. Abeke reached out and tapped his arm. “What’s the matter?” she said, a knot of dread tightening in her stomach. “Is there more to what you saw?”

Conor nodded. This time, his stare focused not on his friends, but on their spirit animals. He met Essix’s piercing eyes, then looked at Uraza lounging beside Abeke. His own hand stayed on Briggan’s neck, buried in the fur.

“In my vision, I saw Briggan, Essix, Uraza, and Jhi in the battle with us. I saw ... I saw Uraza overwhelmed by Conquerors, and Briggan’s tattoo disappeared from my arm. Jhi was helpless, and Essix was nowhere at all.”

Silence.

“I think ...” Conor said slowly, as if unwilling to say the words aloud, “that our spirit animals may not survive this war.”

4

PRISONER

THE PRISON DOOR WAS UNLOCKED.

It was always unlocked. Gerathon saw to it, because she knew that it made no difference for Meilin. She wanted Meilin to sit here, cowering against the wet, mossy dungeon wall of her prison cell, staring for hours at the door that taunted her with the freedom she knew she couldn't have.

Meilin wrapped her cloak more tightly around her and snuggled against Jhi's fur. She couldn't sleep. If she could see herself in a mirror, she knew there would be dark circles under her eyes. Whenever she did manage to sleep, she dreamed of her father. She would wake thinking that he was alive – alive! – somehow, maybe even here with her in this cell. But then the images from her dreams would fade away, and reality would settle heavily back into the pit of her stomach.

Her fingers played numbly with a sash tied around her waist. They had cut away her manacles. No point in escaping. She couldn't trust herself anymore, not in her current state. Even now, with Gerathon far off doing ... whatever she did, Meilin could feel the subtle, menacing presence of someone else in her mind, coiled in the shadows and waiting to lash out when needed. She shuddered at the memory of the snake's domination – the helplessness of not being able to control her own limbs and actions. What would she do if she escaped the dungeons and went back to her friends, anyway? Betray them again?

“At least Abeke is free,” she whispered under her breath. Abeke should have made it back to Greenhaven by now, with Shane in tow. Meilin couldn’t understand Abeke’s attachment to that boy, although a part of her sympathized, wondering how it must feel for Shane to have been used by the Conquerors – to watch his sister die like that. She hoped the Greencloaks had accepted him too, and that they were both safe now.

Beside her, Jhi made a deep sound in her throat that set her entire body humming. Meilin paused in her thoughts to look up at her panda. Jhi returned her gaze with wide dark eyes. She knew what the panda was trying to say.

Don’t worry. The others will return for us. This won’t go on forever.

“No,” Meilin snapped for the hundredth time. She recalled Abeke and Shane leaving her, promising that they would return for her. She’d let them go.

“They’re not coming back. There’s no point. I don’t even think I want them to.”

One look at Jhi’s mournful gaze was enough to send guilt shooting through Meilin’s heart. She patted the panda’s fur. “I’m sorry. I didn’t mean it like that.” She sighed. “Oh, Jhi. What will happen to us?” She laughed a little, a sad sound. “Do you think ... do you think the universe made a mistake, pairing the two of us together? Do you think it knew how I would treat you?”

When Jhi only made the rumbling sound in her throat again, sending soothing tremors through Meilin, she shook her head. Maybe I wasn’t supposed to have a Great Beast at all. But I’m glad I do. She squeezed Jhi’s side softly. Once, she would have forced Jhi into the passive state and kept her there, too annoyed to deal with Jhi’s insufferably patient, sympathetic expression. Now, she couldn’t imagine sitting in this cell without the panda’s presence nearby. “Forgive me, Jhi. I’m just ... so tired. So tired of not having my thoughts be my own.”

Jhi licked her hand in reassurance. Meilin leaned against her, soaking in her familiar comfort, and closed her eyes. The image of Gerathon’s smiling jaws and slithering body disappeared, replaced instead with Rollan’s lopsided grin and Conor’s encouraging voice, Abeke’s clear laugh.

The prison door’s hinges squealed. Meilin shot to her feet right as Jhi let out a low growl.

It was Shane.

He looked more tired than she remembered, the bags under his eyes dark and prominent, but it was still unmistakably Shane. His silhouette was stark against the opening of the cell, looking uninjured. His shirt was unbuttoned low into his chest, almost casually.

A surge of excitement and fear cut through her melancholy. Meilin could hardly believe her eyes – she didn't even know how to feel. For a moment, the two just stared at each other in complete silence.

Finally Meilin found her voice. "You came back ..." she whispered.

Shane nodded. "I did."

They had come back to rescue her, after all.

In spite of everything, Meilin burst into a grin. She felt a sudden urge to hug him. The dark thoughts that had plagued her just a moment ago suddenly vanished. If Shane was here, then that meant he and Abeke had made it back to Greenhaven!

Abeke has reunited with the others.

It meant all sorts of things. The questions started to spill out of her before she could stop herself. "Is Abeke safe? Are there others with you? Did you come with Greencloaks? The east stairs of the dungeon are crawling with –"

"I'm here alone."

Meilin wrung her hands. She looked uncertainly around the cell. "How are we going to get out of here? And even if we do – if I go with you – Gerathon can still see and control everything." She gave Shane a determined look. "You shouldn't have come back. Just leave me here, and go help the others. I'll only make everything worse. I –"

Jhi's growl cut her sentence short. Meilin shot her a quizzical look. "What's wrong? It's just Shane." She glanced back to him. "Shane, we have to ..."

Her words faded away. Meilin frowned, suddenly hesitant. Something seemed different about Shane's expression ... in fact, something seemed off about this entire encounter.

"Shane?" Meilin said. "What's wrong?"

"Nothing's wrong," Shane replied. Even the sound of his voice seemed different – colder, somehow, a far cry from what she remembered. "I just came by to check on you.”

Meilin raised a skeptical eyebrow. In the past, her instincts had always guided her thinking and actions. Even now, with her trust in her own perception shaken by the Bile, she wanted to rely on her gut feeling ... and her gut was telling her that something was horribly off. A low growl continued to rumble from Jhi’s throat. Meilin took a step back.

Then she noticed something peeking out from the opening of his shirt. Part of a dark mark. A tattoo? She frowned, focusing closer on it. Yes, it looked like ... reptilian teeth, protruding from a jaw of scaly skin. She gasped. The rest of the tattoo disappeared inside his shirt, but Meilin didn’t need to see all of it to understand.

The teeth and scaly skin belonged unmistakably to a crocodile. But a crocodile was the Devourer’s spirit animal....

Behind Shane, two Conquerors emerged in full armor. They saluted him as soon as they arrived. Meilin glanced back to him at the same time that he narrowed his eyes. “I came back to make sure you are still in your cell, and that you are well.”

A million thoughts rushed through her mind. “Shane ... ?” she managed to say. Impossible. It couldn’t be.... A glint of metal from Shane’s light blond hair caught Meilin’s attention. She recognized the circlet she’d seen Gar wearing – a snake devouring its own tail.

“Yes. I’m the Reptile King.” He lifted an eyebrow at her. “Are you really so surprised?”

Shane. The thought sank into her mind. Shane was the Devourer?

“Your wolverine ...” Meilin gasped out, trying to make sense of it all. She glanced again at the tip of his tattoo, hoping that the second time around, she might see something different.

But the teeth and scales were still there. Like they’d been there forever.

“You ...” Meilin said. “In Zhong, when –” She choked on her words, and it took her a second try to get them out. “It was you all along. You killed my father!”

Shane just shook his head. “Save your indignation,” he replied, leaning against the wall. “It wasn’t me in that armor at Dinesh’s temple, it was my uncle.

And Gar is dead. The Greencloaks killed him in Nilo, shortly after you saw him. Your revenge is complete. I've merely come to inform you that we'll set out soon, and you're invited to join us. I'm sure you'll want to come along."

Meilin's emotions warred against each other until she could hardly breathe. Gar was dead, but Shane – the true Devourer – had betrayed them. Somehow, that felt even worse. He had never wanted to help them.

What about Abeke?

She didn't make it back to Greenhaven, Meilin thought in horror. She might even be dead. The possibility that Shane had hurt her friend, the thought that Abeke ... Blood rushed to her head, making her sway. The room spun for a moment. With the fear came a flood of rage. Meilin trembled from head to toe. With a furious cry, she hurled herself at him. She could feel the world around her slowing down as Jhi's abilities came rushing to the forefront – she saw Shane throw his arms up in defense, but the movement looked long and labored. Meilin balled up her fist. She managed to dodge past his arms and strike him square in the jaw. Shane staggered backward in slow motion.

"Jhi!" Meilin called out.

Jhi braced herself, then lunged for the boy too.

Then, abruptly, the coiled monster in the shadows of her mind reared its ugly head. Numbness froze all of Meilin's limbs. She gasped. The world, so slow a moment ago, suddenly sped up, rushing around her in a streaked blur. Meilin blinked, trying to keep up.

Shane darted backward – a thunderous roar echoed in the cell. Something green and brown and scaly flashed before Meilin's eyes. An instant later, she felt a tremor go through the floor and fell to her knees. Jhi halted in her attack. Meilin managed only to hold a hand up to her face and stumble backward. Her limbs felt detached and weak.

An enormous saltwater crocodile appeared between them and Shane, its legs as thick as tree trunks. Meilin gasped. The beast opened its jaws at Jhi, then slammed its tail down on the floor. Its eyes were slitted and shiny. They glinted with something savage, completely different from the warmth in Jhi's eyes.

Jhi nudged Meilin back, putting herself protectively between Meilin and the crocodile.

Shane brushed hair out of his eyes and sighed. “Call your panda into its dormant state,” he said. “Now.”

More fog seeped into Meilin’s mind. She staggered, clutching at her head and trying in vain to fight off Gerathon’s presence. The compulsion was as strong as ever. She felt herself putting out her arm, as if she were a Zhongese puppet toy, opening her mouth to call Jhi back. Jhi cowered, lowering her head.

A memory came to Meilin of Abeke. Abeke, who could be in serious trouble right now.

No. Fight it.

With a mighty effort, Meilin gritted her teeth and tried to push back. Lights burst in her vision. Shane smiled at her as she struggled. One of his hands ran along the scales of his crocodile. “Abeke was right,” he said. “You are stubborn.”

The mention of Abeke gave Meilin more fuel. She clenched her jaw, bracing herself against the fog that threatened to take over. Her hand was still outstretched in Jhi’s direction, but the commands halted on her tongue, clamoring for release.

No.

The lights across her vision grew, blinding her. She squinted as they erased her surroundings for a moment.

Was Jhi causing this? It all felt similar to the glowing orbs Meilin would sometimes see when Jhi helped her to make decisions calmly, but somehow ... it was different too. This time, the light narrowed into a line across her vision, then centered as if she were staring down a dark tunnel toward something impossibly bright and warm. The golden path cut through the blue-gray haze of fog, of the Bile’s whisper and poison. Meilin reached for the light.

The light pushed the fog back. Only for an instant.

Meilin withdrew her hand, refusing to call Jhi into her dormant state. Then she lunged at Shane once more.

Shane’s eyes popped open in surprise. Meilin managed to strike a glancing blow against his cheek before his crocodile’s tail caught her legs and sent her crashing to the ground. Shane drew his saber and pointed it at her throat. All hints of amusement were gone from his face.

“Chain both of them to the wall,” he commanded. The two Conquerors waiting behind him moved immediately.

Meilin shook her head as she felt the soldiers pinning her hands against the cold stone of the wall, then clapping chains around her wrists. Her rebellion had already ended. Gerathon’s coils slithered across her thoughts – in her mind, Meilin heard the Great Serpent chuckling. Beside her, the panda stared cautiously at the crocodile while a Conqueror secured her paws with manacles.

Poor little girl, Gerathon hissed inside Meilin’s mind. I’ll have to be careful with you.

Gerathon chuckled again, but somehow, Meilin thought she could detect a hint of wariness from the serpent. Somehow, in some way, Meilin had managed to push back against the Bile. It hadn’t lasted long. But it had lasted.

Shane cast her one last look before calling his crocodile back. It vanished in a flash of light to reappear on his chest. He scowled. Meilin knew he would never admit it, but she could see that her moment of defiance had shaken him. As Gerathon lost interest in controlling her, she felt the fog dissipate from her mind and bring the prison cell back into sharp focus. Her anger returned with it.

Shane had been the Devourer all along. He fooled us.

“See to it that her door stays locked,” Shane snapped at the Conquerors. Then he motioned for them to file out.

Meilin found her voice right as Shane was about to leave. “I don’t know what you did to Abeke,” she spit out, “but you don’t deserve her. And if you hurt her, I’ll make sure you pay for what you did.”

Shane hesitated with one foot still inside her cell. He didn’t turn around. Instead, his jaw tightened, and a strange emotion flickered across his face, something Meilin almost wanted to interpret as ... regret.

The moment lasted barely a few seconds, and it passed so quickly that Meilin couldn’t be sure he’d hesitated at all.

Then he stepped out of her cell, and the door shut with a loud, echoing clank.

Meilin sat in the new silence, savoring that echo, listening to the Conquerors’ footsteps disappear down the hall. In spite of everything, she couldn’t stop a small smile from creeping onto her face. Jhi blinked when she looked at her.

Gerathon had kept that cell door open to taunt her all this time, knowing she couldn't – wouldn't – escape.

But the door was locked now, because Meilin had forced them to do it. She continued to dwell on this. And she dared to hope.

5 OLD FRIENDS

THE FOLLOWING DAY, ALLIES WHO HAD RECEIVED AND accepted their call for help began to arrive, just as Olvan had said they would. Conor waited anxiously to see each of them cresting the horizon and approaching the castle in sporadic groups. It would be a long, hard road ahead for all of them, but at least they were in the company of old friends.

First came Finn, the Greencloak covered in tattoos who had helped the team find Rumpfuss the Boar. Finn arrived in stoic fashion, leaner than before and quieter than ever, although he did manage to crack a small smile of greeting when he saw Conor, Abeke, and Rollan. At his side was Donn, his sleek black wildcat. The cat purred as they made their way back to Greenhaven Castle. Conor marveled at him, remembering the awe they all had felt when they first realized Finn's spirit animal was this legendary creature.

"And how has life treated you in Glengavin?" Abeke asked as they walked.

Finn shook his head. "Very well," he replied, "until last week."

"Why?" Conor asked. "What happened?"

"What a shame that we reunite under such circumstances." Finn's voice turned grim. "You'll recall our friend MacDonnell, yes? His castle, his law? Well, the Conquerors returned to Trunswick, this time in huge numbers, and laid siege. Lord MacDonnell was forced to retreat and leave his estate to the Conquerors. He will commit his soldiers to our cause.”

Rollan made an angry sound in his throat. “Our week hasn’t been great either,” he said, pointing up at the dreary sky. “Although I’d much rather get soaked by rain than sacked by Conquerors.”

Conor felt sad at the thought of the mighty lord’s castle now overrun by Conquerors. Somehow, the older image of Lord MacDonnell in complete control of his domain was comforting. It seemed like such a long time ago. They’d only just learned that Zhong had fallen. Nilo had still been free. The Conquerors were moving fast now.

Next came Kalani, all the way from the islands of Oceanus, her cloak of seaweed now replaced with a standard cloak. She looked more irritated than Conor remembered, which he figured might have something to do with the fact that she was now in a place quite opposite to that of a tropical paradise. Still, she greeted Conor warmly, even as she muttered something about the never-ending cold drizzle.

“Thank you for coming, Kalani,” Conor said with a smile. “It’s good to see you.”

“And you,” Kalani replied. “It’s only a matter of time before the Conquerors take Oceanus completely. I didn’t want to wait around for that to happen.”

She greeted Abeke too, but when Rollan tried to say hello, Kalani’s lips tightened and she looked away. Rollan’s smile vanished as he did the same. It took Conor a moment to remember that Kalani still considered Rollan tapu—dangerous and forbidden—and therefore could not acknowledge him. This would make for an awkward journey.

As the day went on, Conor noticed that Abeke hovered constantly at the windows facing the harbors. He knew who she was searching for, and who she hoped to see. But they didn’t come.

At the end of the day, only Maya and her fire salamander joined them, significantly less bothered by the chilly weather. Conor laughed in surprise at the sight of her. Maya looked nothing like she had when they’d last seen her, when she’d lain limp and nearly lifeless after unleashing the fury of her fire against the Conquerors. Her red hair had been burned away and her cheek scarred with a vicious wound. The scar was still there, a faint but permanent blemish, but Maya's red hair had grown back a little, enough for her to tuck it behind her ears, and a healthy pink glow illuminated her face. There was a weight in her brilliant blue eyes that didn't exist before, the lingering pain of the past ... but time had a curious way of healing things, and Maya had managed to cover that burden with the new joy of seeing her friends again.

She squealed at the sight of them all, then threw herself into a hug with Conor, Abeke, and Rollan. Her fire salamander, Tini, watched from her shoulder, his bright yellow spots pulsing happily at the reunion.

"Other Greencloaks from Eura are on their way too," Maya told them as they headed toward the hall for dinner. Her short hair bounced with each step. "They'll join Olvan's forces." She glanced at Conor and nodded. "I'll go with your smaller patrol. You probably won't need any fire while traveling through Stetriol, but you'll certainly need a friendly face." She paused to look adoringly at her spirit animal. "And we are the friendliest faces, aren't we, Tini? Yes, we are!"

They all laughed. Seeing the old affection between the two of them lifted Conor's heart for a moment. It was really, really good to have Maya back.

The conversation over dinner stayed low. Conor felt like he could touch the tension in the air.

"A ship with other Greencloaks has set sail from Oceanus. They will join Olvan's forces in Stetriol." Kalani rubbed at her dolphin mark, the other tattoos lining her arms bold in the candlelight. Conor felt sorry for her that she couldn't call on her spirit animal in a place like this. She looked warily around the table. "Do we even know how to get to Kovo's prison, or the heart of Erdas?"

Olvan looked uncomfortable at the question, but he lifted his head authoritatively. "There are rumors of where Kovo's prison is. Ancient accounts of the first war tell of a chain of mountains in Stetriol, near which lies a formation called Muttering Rock. They say Tellun imprisoned Kovo there. Conor's visions of the red rock also support this theory. It will be a good starting point for us."

"We have some old maps," a voice called from the end of the table. A Greencloak named Dorian sat with them. Conor hadn't remembered seeing him around the castle. He looked unpleasantly pale, with dark blond hair tied back in a short tail at the nape of his neck. His lips were thin and drawn back into a stern line.

Dorian laid out several parchments, faded and crinkling with age. He spread them flat on the table for everyone to see. “These are generations old, discovered in some ancient library texts.” He pointed to a landmass on each that Conor had never seen before on any present-day map. “Stetriol.”

Kalani didn’t look reassured. Neither did Finn. He frowned at the older Greencloak. “This is all we have to go on? Visions? Rumors? Maps from hundreds of years ago? The world has changed much since then. This will hardly be reliable.” He sighed and rubbed a hand over his face. “I mean no offense, Conor,” he added, “and I know your dreams are crucial to this, but we are heading into true darkness. The very center of it.”

Conor saw Abeke shiver visibly. When she noticed him looking at her, she looked away and reached for a piece of bread. Abeke tore it in half, the crust crackling as she went. “We’ll be prepared,” she said, trying to sound optimistic. “We’ll have plenty of water and provisions with us.”

Kalani frowned and rubbed harder at her tattoo. Conor wondered how much water a place like Stetriol might have. The sight reminded Conor of his dream, of how he’d stared and stared at his tattoo of Briggan until he couldn’t see him at all anymore. I might not have Briggan forever. Just the thought sent a stab of pain through him. He buried his hand deeper in the wolf’s fur.

“Do we know if Stetriol has any harbors?” Kalani asked. “How many people still live there?”

“We know very little of Stetriol,” Olvan answered. It was not what anyone wanted to hear. The Greencloak furrowed his brows. “Abeke is right. We will prepare the best we can.”

Conor swallowed hard. He was sitting in a room with the world’s finest Greencloaks, and no one sounded confident about their mission. They were sailing into the unknown now, an untouched and forgotten land. Briggan and the other Four Fallen had died leading the Greencloaks into Stetriol. What would happen this time?

“Sending the Four Fallen blindly into Stetriol,” Finn said, “and sending an army of Greencloaks as their diversion, to face the Conquerors ...” His eyes were tragic. He met Olvan's stare and held it. "This is a suicide mission, Olvan," he said gently.

Conor could feel the dread that rippled through the room. He, Rollan, and Abeke all looked at Olvan, half expecting him to deny such a claim. But he didn't.

"We leave tomorrow, at dawn," Olvan finally replied, his voice very quiet.

The realization slowly settled into Conor's heart. This was it, the final stand. Tomorrow, they would leave Greenhaven. And they might never return.

In the silence that followed, Finn bowed his head. He put a hand flat on the table. "I'm ready," he said.

"Me too," Maya added.

"Me too," echoed Rollan and Kalani at the same time. It startled them, and they looked at each other in surprise before they remembered that they weren't supposed to acknowledge each other. Kalani quickly looked away again.

Conor chimed in too, followed by Abeke, and gradually, everyone at the table pledged themselves to the journey. They were all ready to lay down their lives. Conor looked around the room, memorizing the moment and the faces.

Finally Rollan grabbed another dinner roll and bit into it with determination. "Better eat up now, then. It'll be a hard road."

THE JOURNEY TO STETRIOL BEGAN UNDER A FRAGILE sheet of rain and fog, with the smaller of the two Greencloak groups heading out first. Abeke, Conor, and Rollan each rode separately on their own horses; Uraza walked beside Abeke's mount, while Briggan loped easily alongside Conor. Essix soared ahead, seeking out the harbor where the Tellun's Pride waited for them. Sacks of provisions bumped against each of their horses' hindquarters. Behind them came Maya and Kalani. Finn rode ahead, talking in a low voice to the Greencloak named Dorian, who had been tasked with leading the little troupe. Dorian was now pointing out something on one of the ancient maps he'd brought. On his shoulder perched his spirit animal, a horned owl.

"I'm not sure he's going to lead us in the right direction," muttered Rollan. His eyes were fixed on Dorian and filled with resentment. "And an owl? Really? Is his hoot going to scare the Conquerors away?"

"He's the keeper of the maps," Conor replied, clearly trying to keep their conversation reasonable.

But Abeke understood Rollan's impatience. Dorian had woken each of them up that morning by pounding on their doors and shouting, like a father chiding his oversleeping children. He galloped ahead now, as if he had always been their leader, as if Tarik had never existed.

Rollan snorted. It didn't seem like "keeper of the maps" impressed him much.

"Keep Briggan out, okay?" he said. One of his hands checked idly for the Coral Octopus looped around his neck. "It would be nice if we didn't have to save you from your dreams every other day."

Conor shot him a guilty look, then glanced at Abeke. "Got the Granite Ram?"

Abeke nodded, showing him the necklace that kept it securely against her chest. She tugged once on it, just to be sure. "You can hang on to it, if you want," she said.

Conor shook his head. "I'd rather not."

Abeke gave him a small smile. Even after all this time, he still seemed a little hesitant to be the one responsible for hanging on to a talisman. She stared at him for a moment longer as he turned his attention back to the trek. How different Conor looked from when they'd first started their journeys together – he'd grown taller, and lost the fat in his cheeks. Even Rollan, with all his jokes, had changed ever since he lost Tarik and donned the green cloak. He was more focused. More serious. The realization took Abeke off guard. How quickly they'd all changed.

Her thoughts wandered back to her father and sister, and whether their village in Nilo was truly covered in snow. Uraza turned her violet eyes up at Abeke, as if she could read the girl's mind. Abeke just smiled. "We're okay," she said. "I don't need them here." Then she turned away from her spirit animal, so Uraza couldn't tell that she'd lied.

Most of all, she didn't want Uraza to see how afraid she was that she might lose her.

By the time they reached the Tellun's Pride, the entire party looked like a pack of waterlogged rats in wet green cloaks. The ship's captain was already waiting for them at the pier, hollering at the top of his lungs at the crew hoisting crates and rolling barrels up the ramp.

He shook his head grimly as Finn and Dorian approached, then pointed down at the water. "Choppy, murky waters today," he muttered. "We'll have some rough seas to endure." He pointed to where taut ropes at the bow of the Tellun's Pride disappeared beneath the waves. "And the rockback whales – they may be sick."

"I'll check on them," Kalani said, shrugging her right shoulder, which housed her dolphin tattoo. She winced – light flashed briefly around her, and a moment later, everyone heard the unmistakable call of a dolphin from the water. Kalani leaned over the pier. Abeke was certainly no sea creature expert, but even she could tell that the dolphin was unhappy to be in this cold, unfamiliar ocean. She felt her heart tug at the sight of Kalani's brow furrowing in concern.

"See how the rockback whales are doing," Kalani called down to her dolphin. "Be careful."

The dolphin made a subtle nodding gesture before diving below the surface. They all waited for a few quiet minutes.

All of a sudden, the dolphin exploded from the surface of the black water with a strange, sickly sound. Kalani gasped. She leaned forward and held her arm out.

"Come back up!" she said.

The dolphin splashed around a bit more on its side. Light engulfed the creature before it vanished from the water and returned to Kalani's shoulder. Kalani swayed. Conor and Rollan had to rush forward to keep her from falling backward. Abeke felt sick to her stomach at the sight. She didn't want to imagine Uraza in that kind of agony.

Kalani finally turned to the captain. "The churning water has brought in some schools of tiny, poisonous fish. They are making the whales sick. We have to leave. Now. The whales won't survive if they continue like this."

"Is Katoa okay?" Abeke asked.

Kalani nodded with a tight mouth. "She's very sensitive to the water, even more so than the whales." She sighed. "With the sea around Oceanus also unhealthy, I haven't let her into the water in days. She's not happy."

Maya patted Kalani once on the shoulder. "Thank you for the warning," she said. "We better get moving."

"You heard her," the captain shouted to his crew, triggering another flurry of activity on the ship's deck. "Move out!"

Abeke walked up the ramp with the others. She tried not to look at the black water again.

7

DISRUPTION

THE WATER TURNED LIGHTER AFTER THEY REACHED OPEN waters. Still, the air felt heavy and oppressive, in part, Abeke knew, because everyone felt a little bit anxious. Uraza’s tail swished restlessly, and Abeke knew it wasn’t just because they were on a ship – Uraza’s least favorite form of travel. In fact, everyone’s spirit animals seemed slightly on edge.

“Donn!” Finn shouted as he chased his black wildcat across the deck of the ship. Abeke and the others were in the middle of a lesson with Dorian on how to use the ship’s cannons. Scampering barely in front of the wildcat was Maya’s fire salamander, Tini, giving off indignant little squeaks every time the wildcat swiped his claws at him. Chasing Finn was Maya, her hair in complete disarray, as if she had just awoken from a nap.

Tini reached the end of the deck, then turned and hissed at the wildcat. Maya managed to catch up just in time to call for her salamander. “Into the dormant state with you!” she exclaimed. Tini obliged all too willingly.

“Sorry about that,” Finn said breathlessly. He gave his wildcat a reproachful glare, while Donn gave him the same look in return. Abeke, Conor, and Rollan all looked on from the cannon they were crowded around while Finn straightened his clothes and tried to walk off in a dignified manner.

Rollan raised an eyebrow. “I would just like to point out,” he stated, looking skyward, “that Essix has been on her best behavior.”

“That’s because she gets to fly,” Conor said. He’d kept Briggan in dormant state for most of the journey so far.

“Hey, Essix isn’t having the best time either,” Rollan retorted. Overhead, Essix circled restlessly, making agitated little squawks. “She thinks the fish taste funny.”

“All right,” Dorian interrupted, nodding back down at the cannon. “Attention back there, all three of you.”

As Dorian explained how to light the fuse once powder had been loaded into the cannon, Rollan gave him a mutinous look. Abeke tightened her lips. She shook her head at Rollan, warning him not to be so defiant to their new leader. Rollan remained silent, but the resentment stayed on his face.

As they sailed through the narrow sea dividing Eura and Nilo, they saw more that worried them. Where fertile farmland once thrived in southern Eura, enormous cracks now marred the parched, scorched earth left behind by invading patrols of Conquerors. Farmers gathered on the shore to watch them sail past, looking lost. Abeke wondered if they thought one of the passing ships could stop and save them, or perhaps take them far away to somewhere safe. Farther east, they passed entire cities that had been overtaken, their flags now gone and replaced with the Conquerors’.

“We must detour from our planned route,” Dorian announced to everyone one morning as he studied his maps. “The Conquerors have seized an important trade strait between Nilo and Eura.”

“Tarik would never have let us sail this far without knowing that,” Rollan muttered under his breath. Abeke rolled her eyes at him. They’d just heard about the seizure that morning by messenger pigeon.

She pictured her homeland overrun by Conquerors, and could hardly bear the thought: the peppers and wild grasses burned away, razed by the invading soldiers. The antelope all migrating from the fighting. Would the lions and hyenas turn on the tribes in hunger? What would the people eat? What were the Conquerors going to do to them?

They docked that afternoon in Balanhara, a port city situated at the beginning of a thin strait between Nilo and Zhong, to restock their provisions.

It was a mistake.

“Look,” Conor muttered to Abeke as they walked through the port’s narrow streets behind Maya and Rollan. All of them were balancing barrels of water on their heads. Kalani had stayed behind to help on the ship. “Conquerors attacked this city.”

The inner city still had some of its beauty – baskets and bags of colorful spices sat out in the open markets. Their smells were rich and enticing, reminiscent to Abeke of home. Bright glass trinkets hung from the crowded wooden stalls, reflecting the sunlight. But Conor was right. Once-beautiful homes were now pitiful structures of crumbling stone and broken wood. The harbor itself was almost completely destroyed by fire, with two of its piers washed entirely away.

Beggars crowded the alleys, their thin arms outstretched. People paraded through the streets several times during their walk, the processions all in honor of the dead. Mourners hoisted the deceased on their shoulders in ominous white carriers.

Abeke looked away. So many funeral processions.

“All this couldn’t have happened in just a week,” she whispered to Conor.

Conor bent down to pick up a glittering tile fragment that had once belonged on the side of a building. He admired it sadly, holding it in the sunlight. “The Conquerors move fast,” he muttered. He put the fragment carefully in his pocket, as if a reminder of what their mission was for.

Maya turned back to look at them. Her fire salamander stayed hidden behind her loose hair. “I just overheard a passerby. In the past two weeks, Balanhara suffered two sieges. The Conquerors finally passed through, but they left behind a trail of destruction. They’ve destroyed huge areas of the region.” She paused to look sadly at the beggars. “A lot of victims.”

As they passed more homes, Abeke saw that makeshift talismans hung on many of the doorways. The talismans were made out of barnacles, bits of broken clay, and beads. They were crafted in rough imitation of real talismans, the Coral Octopus and the Slate Elephant, the Marble Swan and the Silver Wolf, each dangling like a silent wish for help from the Great Beasts. Abeke’s heart twisted.

“We have to do something,” she said. But she didn’t know what. Maybe all of this was because Kovo had already been freed from his prison – that they were too late. The thought made her shudder.

Rollan paused as they entered a small marketplace with food carts. The space looked like it usually held many more stands, but now only a few stood here and there. Most sold small, sallow potatoes and other roots that had survived the raids. Other stands sold rotten meat swarming with flies. Abeke guessed that the meat must have been salvaged from cattle killed during the siege. She wrinkled her nose at the smell, sickened by the reality that the people would be forced to eat such things.

The only cart selling something that looked good was situated at the far corner of the market. Abeke’s stomach rumbled; they had all skipped breakfast in order to help out with gathering provisions, and now the sun hung high overhead. She joined Rollan’s side to stare longingly at the golden-brown meat buns the vendor was frying over a flat iron disc.

“Let’s pick some up for the others on the ship too,” Conor said as Rollan pulled out a pouch of coins.

“Don’t worry,” Rollan replied, handing the money over. “I promise I won’t eat all of them.”

The vendor gave them bags of meat buns, and then they continued on their way. Abeke bit enthusiastically into hers. The food was delicious – the fatty juices spilled down her chin, the spices making her tongue tingle. She wiped her mouth with the edge of her sleeve. Conor was popping his last bite into his mouth, while Rollan had already finished one and was digging for another.

As they walked and ate, Abeke thought she could see a seagull following them from broken roof to broken roof, but it flew off every time she tried to look at it. She didn’t dwell too much on it, though. They were in a port city, after all, and close to the water. The seagulls must be just as hungry as she was.

They turned into a filthy alley. What they saw made all of them pause in their steps.

Beggar children huddled here, their gray rags barely able to hide their skinny arms and legs. At first, they startled at the strangers. Then their eyes darted to the bags of food in their arms.

Abeke stared back at them, her appetite suddenly fading. These children were younger than they were – some much, much younger. Maya swallowed hard, her cheeks reddening. “Orphans,” she whispered.

The children didn’t dare make a move. Rollan was the first to break the stillness by bending down to a little girl. She shrank away from him. “It’s okay,” he murmured. “I remember living this life.” Then he reached into his bag and pulled out a meat bun. He held it out to her. “Bet you’re hungry.”

The girl stared at him with wide eyes. She blinked at the food right in front of her face, still steaming hot. Then she reached out and hesitantly took it from Rollan’s hand. They all looked on as she devoured the bun, as if she hadn’t had real food in days.

The other children in the alley began to gather near them. Conor glanced at Abeke. “Give them our bags,” he said in a quiet voice. “We’ll buy more for ourselves.” He stooped down beside Rollan and started handing the food out. Rollan gave him a grateful look. Abeke followed suit, as did Maya.

At the sight, the hesitant children suddenly surged forward, their outstretched hands everywhere. Their silence turned into laughter, smiles, and shouts. Abeke couldn’t understand what they were saying, but their desperation was obvious enough. She handed out meat buns as quickly as she could, filling the empty hands. Still, more came. She realized that others begging outside the alley had gotten a whiff of what was happening. More crowded in, cutting them off.

“No more,” Conor said as he held up an empty bag. But the people didn’t see him, or perhaps they were too tired or hungry to notice.

One little boy pointed at the tattoo on Abeke’s arm. He glanced back up at her. His eyes grew wide. “Uraza,” he whispered.

Abeke shook her head quickly, trying not to draw more attention to them, but the boy had already turned back to the street. “The Four Fallen are here!” he yelled, pointing frantically at Abeke.

The words rippled through the crowd.

“We should get out of here,” Conor said.

They started pushing their way through the alley. The sight of so many hungry faces tugged at Abeke’s heart. If they failed in their mission, would the entire world become this? What would happen if the Conquerors won? The thought plagued her as their group finally made it out of the alley and started heading back toward the harbor. Behind them, a steady stream of beggars trailed along, some chanting and cheering.

The Four Fallen are here to save us!

“We’ve attracted too much attention,” Maya said through gritted teeth. They surged on, trying to leave their followers behind. Still, Abeke thought she didn’t look like she regretted anything.

The farther they traveled through the streets, the more people flocked in their direction. Abeke didn’t think most of them could even tell whom they were cheering for – only that there was a commotion, and excitement, and a welcome distraction from the city’s misery.

She winced as someone bumped her shoulder hard. They were surrounded by a blur of faces, over which she could see a sliver of the harbor beyond. Too many people. Abeke’s heart began to beat faster, and she forced her rising panic down.

Something flashed past her line of sight.

An arrow hit the man closest to Abeke, right in the shoulder, and he screamed. The force of the hit sent him tumbling backward.

Instantly, the crowd broke into chaos.

Abeke dropped her barrel of water. The precious contents sloshed out and spilled all over the ground. Maya dropped down into a crouch.

“Forget the water!” Conor hissed. He grabbed Abeke’s wrist and pulled Rollan close, abandoning their remaining barrels.

All around them, people fled in panic, a blur of motion and colors. Abeke could hardly see in the midst of all the flying dust.

Someone had just tried to kill her.

The seagull that had followed them came rushing back to her thoughts. What if that was a Conqueror’s spirit animal? The Conquerors had passed through not long ago.

Another arrow came whizzing from nowhere. It hit a nearby woman in the leg.

“Go!” Conor urged, pointing through the mass of panicking townspeople. He ducked into the thick of the crowd and pulled Abeke after him. The others followed. Screams filled their ears.

“Someone’s firing from the roofs!” Rollan called out over his shoulder. He ducked lower. Abeke did the same, so that from the air they were all but invisible in the chaos. Abeke fought the urge to call for Uraza – this was no time to have their spirit animals out, drawing even more attention. She gritted her teeth and continued weaving through the people. She thought she saw a glimpse of blood on someone, but the image flashed past her too quickly to get a good look.

All they wanted was a bite of food. How did this get so out of hand?

By the time the four made it back to the port, their assailants had vanished. They were all panting. Maya rushed ahead to let everyone know that they had arrived. Rollan stopped to lean on his knees.

“Well,” he muttered to Conor, “it’s nice to know that good deeds are rewarded.”

“The Conquerors must be hunting for us,” Abeke replied as she leaned against a wooden post, struggling to catch her breath. “I saw a seagull following us. We need to get out of here before they catch up to us again. We don’t have much time.”

Conor and Rollan nodded silently. They hurried onto the deck of the Tellun’s Pride, where Finn and Kalani waited impatiently for them. Kalani rushed over as soon as they were on board. “Are you all okay?” she asked. “We saw the commotion in the streets.”

“We’re okay,” Conor replied, even though his expression didn’t look like it.

Finn ushered them belowdecks immediately. Abeke nearly tripped on the ladder’s steps in her haste.

Dorian was waiting for them in the hold. As they arrived, he straightened and frowned at them from behind his maps. In the sudden dark, Abeke had nearly mistaken him for Tarik, summoning a fresh pang of grief.

“What happened out there?” he asked. His owl was perched beside him on the table, watching the team with its own sharp gaze.

“The Conquerors attacked us when we ... accidentally drew a crowd,” Conor replied. Sweat beaded on his brow. He looked suddenly guilty. The floor beneath their feet was already shifting – the Tellun’s Pride had just pulled away from the harbor.

“And what were you all doing, to attract such a crowd?”

Rollan’s jaw tightened. “We passed through a narrow alley with children orphaned from the storms. I stopped to give a girl a meat bun.”

Finn shook his head sympathetically. Beside him, Dorian gave them all a stern look.

“Good intentions,” Dorian said. “But now’s not the time for it.”

Rollan rolled his eyes. Already, he looked like he was bristling at Dorian’s presence. “Oh, come on. We’re all safe and well, aren’t we?”

Dorian pressed his lips into a line. “We must lie low, and you’re drawing too many eyes.” His voice lowered. He looked at Conor, who hung his head.

“Remember, the fate of Erdas lies in our hands. We cannot afford to be distracted from our primary mission by small acts of kindness.”

Rollan couldn’t seem to hold in his irritation anymore. He scowled. “It was my idea, not Conor’s,” he snapped. “So don’t blame him,”

“Very well, then. I’ll hold you responsible for putting your companions’ and, indeed, all of our lives at stake.”

“If we can’t even bother to be kind to people in need, then what’s the point of saving Erdas?”

Dorian frowned back. “Your actions drew the Conquerors’ attention. Is that what you want?”

Rollan’s voice grew louder. “Tarik would have been proud of us, if he was still here! But he’s not. We just have you, trying to fill his shoes.”

Dorian winced visibly at that. It lasted only for an instant before it was replaced with his stern look, but even Rollan seemed to recognize he’d hit a sore spot. He crossed his arms and dropped his gaze.

An awkward silence hung heavily in the air. Abeke searched Dorian’s face for that vulnerability she’d seen before, but his eyes were every bit as fierce as his spirit animal’s.

Truly, she felt a bit sorry for him. How must it feel to have to step into Tarik’s shoes, to be the newest person in a group that had already bonded together over so much? She remembered that feeling well enough.

“Balanhara was our last dock,” Dorian said, his voice cold. Clearly their prior conversation was over. “We won’t stop again.”

He turned his back and headed up the ladder with Finn. But before he left them, he paused and looked over his shoulder.

“Tarik and I joined the Greencloaks at the same time,” he said. “We trained together. So don’t tell me things I already know.”

Abeke watched him go. They remained silent for a long moment afterward.

Rollan let out a slow breath. His shoulders hunched. “I know, I know. I shouldn’t have said that,” he muttered.

Abeke walked over to Rollan and patted him on the shoulder. “I’m glad we helped those children,” she said. “Even though it caused a lot of trouble. At least they have full stomachs now.”

Maya and Conor nodded their agreement. Rollan still looked unhappy, but his posture relaxed a bit, and he gave his friends a faint smile.

As they headed up to the deck to watch Balanhara fade away on the horizon, Abeke’s thoughts wandered back to the seagull that had watched them before the attack.

Perhaps it was a coincidence.

BATTLE AT SEA

WHEN ROLLAN WENT UP TO THE DECK OF THE TELLUN'S Pride the next morning, the ocean had turned choppy and black. Black.

Not a normal color for the ocean, he thought to himself. He winced at the wind and huddled under his cloak. Everyone else was still asleep belowdecks, except for the few crew members manning the sails. He took a deep breath.

His anger and guilt over what happened yesterday had faded away into a sullen understanding. Dorian was right, of course. Rollan just didn't want to admit it. When he next saw Dorian, he would apologize for what he said.

Essix glided somewhere overhead. Rollan turned his face skyward, searching for her, but all he saw were churning clouds. It seemed like the entire world had been stripped of color. Even the whales pulling the Tellun's Pride forward seemed uneasy, blowing enormous plumes of mist into the air. Rollan grimaced at the ominous water, then squinted out toward the horizon.

It took him a moment to realize that another Greencloak was up on the deck besides himself. Kalani. She saw Rollan approaching and looked away quickly, toward the ship's bow.

"Good morning," Rollan said as he joined her. He glanced at the sky again. "Or not. What are you doing up so early?"

Kalani leaned over the railing, the edges of her mouth turned down.

Rollan sighed. “Look, I know that I’m officially poisonous to your people now, but if we can’t even talk to each other on this mission, it’s going to get us into trouble.”

Kalani’s eyes remained focused on the sea’s surface, and Rollan realized she was searching for her dolphin in the waters. Maybe she was still weighing whether or not to acknowledge him. When she stayed quiet, he shook his head.

“Fine,” he said. “I get it. But, Kalani ... this may be the last journey we ever make together. I don’t even know if we’ll all come back.” His voice lowered. “And if we don’t make it back ... do you really want our last days together to be spent like this?”

At that, Kalani’s stare finally shifted from the ocean to Rollan. She studied his face. He could see the conflict in her eyes. For a moment, he thought she might keep pushing back.

But then her shoulders relaxed, and she let out a long breath. Her eyes went back to the sea. “The whales aren’t doing well,” she said. And despite the severity of her words, Rollan couldn’t help exhaling in relief. They were talking again. “I couldn’t sleep because I could sense the distress of their underwater calls. So I came up here. Look.” She pointed to the quivering ropes latched to the whales. “Their pace has slowed. They’re sick. I sent Katoa to check on them.”

So the whales were behaving oddly. Rollan didn’t like the sound of that at all. If their whales were sick, they wouldn’t be able to make it to Stetriol in time. They’d have to dock again somewhere. But they were so close! No other ports lay between here and Stetriol – nothing but open ocean. Where would they go?

“We’ve got to be getting close by now,” Rollan muttered. Then he raised his voice. “Hey, Essix!”

A piercing cry answered him, muffled by wind and distance. Now he saw her – she hovered in a wide circle several hundred yards away from the ship. Her relaxed glide calmed him somewhat.

Between the surprise attack at Balanhara, his argument with Dorian, and now the whales’ condition, Rollan could use a moment of calm.

When he looked back at Kalani, he could see tears welling in her eyes. Down in the water, her dolphin surfaced, whistling and clicking for her. She held out her arms and called it back into the dormant state before looking at Rollan.

“The whales,” she murmured. “They’re ... dying. The waters here are slowly poisoning them.”

“Dying?” Rollan said. He hadn’t thought it would be as bad as that. The word seemed so final – the thought of their faithful rockback whales sacrificing themselves because of this journey hit him hard in the heart.

Kalani nodded. Her voice sounded flat and dead. “We need to cut them loose, if we want to save them. They need to get away from Stetriol to cleaner waters.”

Rollan pulled out his long dagger. “Well, if you need a hand in cutting them loose ... I’m in.”

Kalani looked at the dagger with a pensive expression. Then she smiled weakly. “Thanks, Rollan. And ... I’m sorry. I know you broke our customs for the good of Erdas, and that seeking Mulop cost you much. As a queen, I suppose I should be willing to do anything to save my people. Even become tapu myself.” She sighed. “Let’s go tell the captain.”

The last word had barely left Kalani’s lips when Essix sent up a shrill shriek. The sound penetrated the air like a knife, making Rollan jump.

“Okay,” he said, “that didn’t sound good.” He searched the sky to see what made her give a warning cry. But the surface of the sea was covered with a layer of mist, hiding whatever else might be beyond.

“Hey.”

Rollan turned to see Conor emerge from the lower decks. The other boy stopped beside Kalani and squinted first at the ocean, then up to the Greencloak observing the sea from the crow’s nest. “What’s Essix calling about?”

Rollan shrugged. In the mist, he could hardly make out Essix at all. “No idea.”

“Think you can see through Essix’s eyes for us?” Kalani asked.

Rollan looked back out at the ocean and concentrated. He felt the familiar experience of the world rushing at him, and the curious sensation of being airborne, of soaring over the dark water and through the mist. The air smelled sharply of salt and fog, and tiny droplets of water dotted his face.

Essix swooped down, then expanded her wings to their full length and caught the air currents. Rollan could feel the wind ruffling through her feathers.

Everything looked a hundred times sharper than what he could see through human eyes.

At first, Rollan didn't notice anything unusual.

Then he saw the faint silhouette of a landmass looming behind the fog.

Essix shrieked again. Rollan rushed away from the sky and down toward the ship. He jolted back into his skin, right as he lifted his arm in the direction of the land and shouted, "Stetriol, straight ahead!"

A few seconds later, the lookout in the crow's nest called out the same thing. As others began emerging from belowdecks, Conor and Kalani stood next to Rollan and leaned out to see better. No doubt about it.

Jagged gray rocks rose from the horizon. Even from here, and even shrouded in mist, the vision sent a chill down Rollan's spine. He could feel something poisonous here, in the very air of the place. It didn't seem like so long ago when they had first passed Stetriol by.

This time, we will actually set foot on forbidden land. Was Meilin here?

As they drew closer, the land began to take on more detail, until Rollan could make out some sort of bay straight ahead. The wind began to pick up, and white foam crashed against jagged rocks lining the mouth of the bay. Some of the rocks glowed red with lava, still fresh and hot from the mouths of underwater volcanoes. These were pieces of land just days old, with new lava still flowing over them. The red-hot liquid gave the rocks the look of a giant beast's bloody jaws.

"There's no way we can squeeze through that without wrecking ourselves," Conor said grimly.

"I'm not sure we have much of a choice," Rollan replied. Indeed, the Greencloaks were already busy lowering the ship's masts, preparing to enter the strait. A harsh gust of wind nearly lifted Rollan clear off his feet. Overhead, Essix had returned to circling the ship. Her cry echoed again.

"Why is she still calling?" Conor shouted.

The ship lurched to one side as they drew closer to the stormy bay. Now they were near enough to hear the waves smashing themselves furiously against the rocks. The whales pulled hard as the Greencloaks urged them on. Kalani winced, and Rollan knew she could feel their agony.

Kalani looked worried. “The whales are exhausted,” she said, “but they’re going to try to get us through. It won’t be an easy passage.” She removed her cloak and stepped up onto the ship’s railing. “I’m going to guide them, and then cut them loose. Make sure to hang on!”

“Right!” Rollan called back.

Then she jumped overboard, falling in a graceful arc and splashing into the sea. A moment later, she emerged perched on the back of her dolphin, hanging on to its fin.

Rollan was about to call up to Essix when he felt the world rush around him again. This time, he saw through her eyes to the ocean behind them. There, in the wavering V that their ship had just carved through the ocean, came the shadow of another ship.

A Conqueror ship was hot on their trail.

Rollan felt his chest heave at the sight. Essix had been trying to warn them of something else all along, in addition to the jagged harbor they were about to enter. Now she turned her head forward, and Rollan saw why the other ship was here.

Right in front of Essix flew the seagull that had followed them in Balanbara. He could see it now through the mist, wind blowing through its tail feathers. The seagull, Rollan realized. The Conquerors were watching us.

Essix let out a sharp, angry cry and lunged for the bird.

Rollan gasped as his vision returned to him, and then grabbed Conor’s arm. “Conquerors!” he shouted.

Now the Greencloaks were pointing at the ghostly ship too. The Tellun’s Pride lurched again, sending sea mist spraying into their faces. No question about it – the Conquerors were frighteningly close, hidden from view the whole way by the thick mist. They would catch up in a matter of minutes.

“To the cannons!” the captain shouted.

They all leaped into action. Rollan and Conor ran to man a cannon. They were so close to the jagged rocks now. As the ship started to careen past the first rock, orange light burst from the Conqueror ship. Cannonballs! Rollan stumbled and fell to his knees as the first one made impact. The entire ship shuddered. Greencloaks ran by, some to douse the fire, others to the riggings. Still others were loading their own cannons. Rollan saw Dorian manning his own station while overseeing those closest to him.

“Fire!” Rollan heard Dorian’s order shouted over the chaos. A volley of cannonballs sailed toward the Conquerors’ ship, exploding in showers of splinters wherever they made contact.

Rollan gritted his teeth as he and Conor picked up a cannonball and staggered with it toward their cannon. Dorian’s earlier lesson with them rushed through Rollan’s head. He hated to admit it, but the instruction was about to come in handy. They shut the metal breech, then lit the fuse.

“Point it higher!” Conor urged as they turned it toward the enemy’s ship.

“I know, I know!” Rollan snapped. “This thing’s a lot harder to move than it looks!”

The fuse finished burning, and the cannon rocketed backward.

The recoil knocked Conor and Rollan off their feet. For a second, Rollan thought that the impact might have knocked all the teeth out of his mouth. He landed with a thud on his back. He struggled to catch his breath as he scrambled back up.

They were much too close for comfort. Rollan could make out the faces and expressions of the enemy crew, and even distinguish the details on the Conquerors’ clothing. He glanced wildly across the deck and noticed Abeke and Finn manning one of the other cannons. Maya leaned over the railing, Tini on her shoulder, and focused on the enemy’s ship. Fire burst from her hand, but they were still too far away for her to hit.

The ship shuddered again.

This time, they careened wildly. “Hang on!” Conor yelled, right before the side of the ship rammed into one of the bay’s sharp rocks.

Hanging on was useless – Rollan went flying. His back hit the ship’s railing, sending a shock of pain rippling through his body, robbing him of breath for an instant. The Tellun’s Pride groaned in protest. Seawater flooded the deck, soaking Rollan’s boots. The icy coldness of it made him cringe.

“I’m cutting the whales free!” Kalani’s voice rang clear and high over the sound of crossfire and crashing waves.

Rollan leaned over as far as he could without toppling right off the ship.

“No, wait – !” he started to shout.

But Kalani hoisted a long, gleaming dagger, leaped onto one of the whales’ backs, and ran down its length on light feet. The sight sent a wave of flashbacks through Rollan, of when Meilin had done something similar.

Kalani sawed through one of the whale’s restraints, then another. The ship lurched heavily, and another wave of salt water flooded the deck. Behind them, the Conquerors increased their fire. Kalani hacked at a waterlogged rope. Finally she cut through one last restraint – and the first rockback whale broke loose with a tug. The creature immediately disappeared beneath the waves.

The ship’s stern surged up with the sudden freedom, causing the second whale’s harnesses to snap. The whale spouted a tall column of sea spray into the air before following its companion into the sea.

The Tellun’s Pride was floating alone now.

More cannon fire. The ship shuddered, her wounded boards groaning under her own weight. Rollan squinted through crashing water to see the Conquerors’ ship sailing past their stern, frighteningly close. Maya leaned over the railing of the Tellun’s Pride to aim once again.

This time, her fire hit true. A ball of flames exploded upon impact with the enemy’s deck, in a plume of gold, blue, and white. Wood, metal, and Conquerors went flying through the air and into the ocean.

Rollan’s eyes shot to the unmanned helm of the Tellun’s Pride. Where was the captain? As the thought flew through his head, he noticed the man lying unconscious on the deck. Oh, no. His eyes darted back to the helm. The ship shuddered again. They would never make it to shore.

An idea struck him.

He nudged Conor and made a sharp turning motion with his hands. Conor looked toward the helm too. His eyes suddenly lit with understanding, and his lips parted as if to repeat aloud what Rollan was thinking. They both hesitated, knowing how extreme their plan was – but only a few seconds. Conor nodded without a word, then started stumbling across the deck with Rollan in tow. The two boys reached the helm right as the ship shook again, bringing them once more to their knees.

From across the ship came a piercing whistle. Rollan glanced over to see Abeke swing her arms wide, as if to ask what they were doing. He made a wild gesture with his arms. “Abandon ship. Abandon ship!” he mouthed.

Abeke blinked, then immediately shouted to the people on either side of her.

Conor grabbed the helm and started to pull it toward him with all his strength. Rollan did the same, throwing his weight into it. But their combined strength wasn't enough to turn the entire ship. They clenched their teeth, sweating and dripping with seawater.

“Let me help you boys out,” a white-haired Greencloak muttered as he rushed over to their aid. It took Rollan a moment to realize that the man was Finn. Together, all three threw their might against the helm.

The ship turned sharply to the right – its nose headed straight into the enemy ship's side. Suicide, Rollan thought.

The two ships rammed into each other.

The Tellun's Pride sandwiched the Conquerors' ship against the jagged rocks of the bay. Wood splinters flew through the air. The impact jolted everyone off their feet. Rollan's head slammed hard into the deck. For an instant, the entire world blurred – sounds muffled and everything went dark. He fought against the encroaching blackness. No, I can't lose consciousness right now! High above him, he heard Essix's piercing war cry. She was trying to keep him awake.

Then he felt a hand grab his shirt and haul him to his feet. Conor threw an arm around him. “We have to jump!” he was yelling. “Can you hear me, Rollan? Jump!”

Rollan reached blindly for the railing. His hand connected with slick wood, and he carefully hoisted himself up. His feet dangled over the edge. The ocean churned beneath him, all darkness and fire and broken wood. We're too high up! But Conor's shouts rang in his ears, and he felt the other boy tug sharply on his arm. With a deep, shuddering breath, Rollan launched himself from the side. Air and glittering water rushed all around him, parting for him as he plummeted like a stone. The fall seemed like it took an eternity. Then he hit the water.

The icy cold of the sea knocked all the breath out of him. He floundered helplessly, not knowing top from bottom, where he was, or how to get to the surface. The distant, blurred noise of fighting, fire, and breaking of wood rumbled somewhere around him. Rollan had the sudden notion that this was how he would die.

What would happen to Essix if he did?

A talisman bumped against his chest in the water. He realized that the Coral Octopus was looped around his neck. Rollan reached desperately for it. His fingers closed around it, and suddenly he could breathe. He blinked, looking around in the water.

Abeke was struggling nearby.

Rollan swam toward her. He grabbed for her hand, lacing his fingers with hers, and then turned up toward the surface and kicked as furiously as he could. He tugged Abeke with him.

They surfaced with a terrible gasp. Suddenly the noise around him was deafening. He saw the wreckage of two ships, both in flames, crumbling slowly into the sea.

Conor waved a hand at them from several dozen feet away. Maya was already in front of them, Tini clinging tightly to the top of her head.

Abeke spit water from her mouth, then wiped a hand across her face. She turned toward land. "This way!" she shouted.

"Hang on to me," Rollan shouted back, submerging again. With the Coral Octopus's help, he was able to swim without surfacing as Abeke gripped his shoulders, floating along above him.

Conquerors and Greencloaks alike struggled in the choppy waves. Some fought each other. A few screamed.

Rollan saw a dark shape swim by. Chills ran down his spine. The fish was hideously lumpy and discolored, with red-and-black spots. Its sides were adorned with vicious, spiky fins. It swam between the struggling legs, disturbed by the churning debris. An explosion issued from the Conquerors' ship, sending tremors through the water. Rollan could feel the heat of the fire, even submerged in the cold water. He didn't dare look back.

I'm so tired. His waterlogged clothes threatened to pull him under. But still, he kept kicking, kept swimming. Abeke hung gamely on to his shoulders. Muffled shouts came from every direction.

Rollan had no idea how long they were in the water. Somewhere up ahead, he saw Kalani swimming through the murky blue, hanging on to one of her dolphin's side fins while Conor clung to the other.

Finally Rollan saw land underneath him. Moments later, his feet hit sand. He dragged himself through the surf, then collapsed onto the beach. His breath came in ragged gasps. Beside him, Conor rolled over onto his back and closed his eyes for a moment, his chest rising and falling rapidly. Abeke coughed up water nearby.

"Are you all right?" Kalani said as she hopped onto the sand and crouched down to them. Her dolphin leaped once in the water, then vanished in a flash of light to return to her shoulder. Around them, others were crawling onto the beach too. More Greencloaks fought with the few Conquerors on the sand who had survived the explosion and the ocean. Rollan looked on in exhaustion as the last Conqueror was finally defeated.

None of them said a word. They could only look back at where an inferno had completely engulfed the dying Tellun's Pride and the Conquerors' ship. Both were locked together and sinking slowly as the waves crashed them mercilessly against the rocks. Smaller fires dotted the water.

"Dorian!"

Rollan suddenly recognized one of the Greencloaks struggling through the sand beside him. The man collapsed onto his back as Rollan crawled to his side. Aside from multiple wounds and cuts from wood splinters, Dorian's face was ghostly white and his lips had turned a deep shade of purple. He trembled from head to toe. The exposed skin of his arms and legs was an unnatural color, covered with angry red welts.

Rollan looked up at Kalani as the others joined him. "What's wrong with him?" he said frantically.

Kalani just shook her head. "Poison," she replied. "From stonefish stings. If Stetriol's stonefish are anything like what I saw back home, he is in a great deal of pain. He must have swum right into one."

Dorian coughed, the sound terrible and raspy. He tried to focus on Rollan hovering above him, but he couldn't seem to see very clearly. Whatever words he tried to speak were too garbled to understand. Rollan struggled to say something, anything, to comfort him, but all he could do was stare. The vicious-looking fish he'd seen in the water returned to his mind.

Dorian drew one last, shuddering breath. Then he slowly went still.

Rollan sat back in the sand, stunned.

“I’m sorry,” he mumbled. Then, louder. “I’m sorry!” He repeated it several times until he was shouting it. Abeke finally reached for his hand and told him gently that Dorian couldn’t hear him.

Conor lowered his head and closed his eyes. Kalani murmured over the fallen Greencloak’s head. “From the sea we came,” she said, “and to the sea we return.”

Overwhelmed, the small group sat on the beach and looked out to where the ships had both already disappeared from view. No more people struggled in the water. No Conquerors, no Greencloaks. A small handful of their original crew had survived and made their way to the beach, but it was a tiny number. And now the Tellun’s Pride, which had carried them all so faithfully on so many voyages, had taken her last breath too.

Rollan swallowed hard. They made it to Stetriol ... and there was no turning back.

9 GRAY HILLS

AS THE FEW REMAINING SUPPLIES THAT HAD WASHED TO shore were salvaged, Conor gathered around Finn with Abeke and Rollan. The elder Greencloak had taken charge after Dorian's death. Altogether, their already small party now numbered only a dozen. Everyone else had perished. Conor noticed a few of the Greencloaks crying over the limp bodies of their spirit animals. A stoat, a blue jay, a lynx. He also saw a few animals fleeing into the underbrush. Spirit animals that must have lost their beloved human partners. The sight weighed down his heart.

One look at Finn's face was all that Conor needed to get a sense of their chances. The man's eyes were bleak, almost as dark as the inky ocean. He carried out the grim job of taking the old maps of Stetriol from Dorian's body, where they were still rolled up and tucked at his belt. Beside him, Donn hung his head and nuzzled Finn's leg in mourning.

"We need to head into the nearest village," he said to the small group gathered around him. He pointed down at the waterlogged map. "If there are any. There were once settlements on this coast, but that was a long time ago."

"What if we can't find any?" one of the Greencloaks asked. His voice was choked with tears. Conor had seen the man earlier, crouched in anguish over the body of the lynx.

Finn tightened his lips. “We have no choice but to find one. We do not have enough supplies to last us for more than a few days, and we need horses.”

“And water,” Conor piped up. “Don’t we?”

“Yes, Conor,” the man replied. “We barely have any water left, other than the canteens strapped to our belts. There’s no time to lose.” He paused, looking out into the churning seas. “But first, we’ll pay our respects.”

The sand was too wet to bury Dorian – and, it seemed to Conor, too disrespectful. Lowering fallen Greencloaks into pits half-filled with dark, icy water was no burial at all. Instead, Kalani and her spirit animal helped gather up large segments of wood that had broken from the body of the Tellun’s Pride. They eased their fallen companions onto the boards, spreading their green cloaks neatly beneath them. They placed small tokens on each of the dead’s chests. For Dorian, Conor chose the glittering tile fragment he’d found in Balanhara.

For the first time since they’d boarded the Tellun’s Pride, Conor called for Briggan. The wolf appeared beside him in a flash of light. His great head turned, surveying the tragic scene. He stared for a long moment, then lowered his head and leaned against Conor’s hand. He uttered a low, mournful whine. It seemed as if Conor could feel Briggan’s grief through the wolf’s fur. Uraza had emerged beside Abeke too, looking on, her pose subdued. Essix sat quietly on Rollan’s shoulder, her expression fierce. Rollan’s eyes stayed downcast in grief and guilt.

As Finn spoke words of respect for each, Conor glanced at Rollan from the corner of his eye. His friend’s hand stayed wrapped tightly around the Coral Octopus hanging at his neck. Rollan looked like he was holding it together well enough, but Conor could tell he was thinking of all the things he’d said to Dorian.

He walked over to Rollan, then put a hand on his shoulder. “Hey,” he said softly. Rollan startled, looking up at him. “We’re going to win this war. We’ll make Dorian proud.”

Rollan looked back down at the Greencloak’s still figure. “Yeah,” he replied, although he didn’t sound like he believed himself.

Conor wished he could see into the future, that he could have a dream that told him everything would be okay. But his mind remained clouded and uncertain. He’d always known their journey would be full of danger, but even after the attack at Balanhara, even after everything they'd all been through, it had still seemed like they would find a way.

Now he wasn't so sure. What if they all died in the uncharted lands of Stetriol, before they could even find Kovo's prison? Before they could rescue Meilin? If the Conquerors had already swept through so many cities, and the lands were starting to shudder from the shadow falling over them, then what would happen if Gerathon and Shane managed to free Kovo? What would be left?

Nothing. The answer that echoed in his thoughts made him shudder. Nothing would be left.

He could not allow that to happen.

Finn's last words faded away over the final body. A brief silence fell over everyone. Then they pushed each board out into the sea, watching from the shore as their friends floated out across the water on the broken strips of their beloved ship. Conor murmured a farewell under his breath.

They belonged to the sea and sky now.

"I can see why they wiped this place off the maps," Rollan muttered. "Not exactly a dream destination, is it?"

They had spent the entire day chopping their way through dry, brittle underbrush and a dying forest. Now, as they finally emerged on the other side, they saw a desolate, yellow expanse of plains spread out before them, with a small village situated at the bottom of bare foothills.

Conor had to admit – Stetriol didn't look like a country that anyone would visit voluntarily.

"Hide your cloaks," Finn said to all of them. "Greencloaks will not be welcome here."

Conor and Abeke removed theirs, but Rollan hesitated. His fingers fiddled with the clasp of his cloak. Conor remembered that it was not Rollan's cloak, but Tarik's.

"Tarik once told us never to take our cloaks off to win favor," Rollan mumbled. "In Boulder City."

Finn walked over to where Rollan stood. He gave him a sympathetic nod. “Wise words,” he said gently. “But he will be with you now, cloak or not, just as you will always be a Greencloak.”

Rollan nodded. Still, his eyes stayed down. “Yeah, you’re right.” Finally he unhooked the clasp. The cloak fell to the ground in a heap, sending up a shower of dirt. Rollan immediately bent down, picked it up, and started shaking dust from it. Conor looked on as Rollan folded the cloak carefully. He packed it tightly into his bag.

As the first town came into view, Conor was struck by how gray and brown everything looked. A long, low wall surrounded the cluster of homes, but the wall’s rocks were chipped and crumbling. Some parts of it had collapsed entirely. The land around the town was dry and sparsely dotted with weeds. A couple of mules pulling carts of supplies waited at the wall’s rusted entrance gates. The animals’ hides were dull and dappled with sores, and Conor could see their ribs.

They entered the town quietly after the mules and their carts. The two guards stationed at the gates didn’t look like guards at all, Conor thought, but merely poor peasant farmers in tattered tunics and shoes. As the Greencloaks walked in, he thought the two farmers cast them sidelong glances.

Conor looked away and instinctively scanned the sky for birds. He hadn’t forgotten Balanhara yet.

“Don’t worry,” Rollan said, pointing up at Essix. “If any bird looks suspicious, Essix will make a lunch out of it.”

“Lucky, being allowed to keep Essix out,” Abeke muttered at Rollan. “I wish I could let Uraza prowl around, but Finn said it’s too dangerous for her to be seen here. People might pass the word to the Conquerors that the Four Fallen have arrived.”

Conor wished he could let Briggan out from his dormant state too – he missed the silent comfort of his presence.

Rollan just shrugged. “Now that you mention it, where are the Conquerors? I figured this place would be swarming with them.”

“Maybe Shane is already gathering their entire army near Kovo’s prison,” Conor whispered.

Faded tavern signs with the town's name swung in the breeze. "Gray Hills," read Abeke. As their small group wandered through the marketplace – or what Conor could only assume was a marketplace – the people walking past them averted their gazes, keeping their hats pulled low and mouths tight in thin lines. Once, Conor accidentally brushed the arm of a passing woman. The woman cringed as if he'd burned her, then hunched her shoulders and walked away as fast as she could.

Abeke stopped to smile at a little boy with dirty cheeks who stooped at the entrance of an alley, quietly watching them pass. As she did, the boy sneered at her, then spit in her direction before running off. She watched him go with her mouth open.

"With my remarkable powers of perception," Rollan said beside her, "I'm getting the very subtle hint that people might ... possibly ... not like us here. But it's hard to tell."

Abeke raised an eyebrow at Rollan's sarcasm, then returned to looking around the nearly deserted marketplace. "Why does everyone look so hostile? Like they think we're going to hurt them?" A few yards away, Finn and several other Greencloaks stopped at a corral to haggle over the prices of horses. "I'd understand if Uraza was prowling around, but it's not as if our spirit animals are out."

"I wonder if they can tell that we're Greencloaks," Conor whispered back.

The three made their way over to the corral. The owner, a man in ragged clothes, showed Finn his meager stable of horses. Even here, right in the middle of a business transaction, Conor could tell that the horse dealer was trying his best to not meet Finn's eyes.

The elder Greencloak handed over a small pouch of coins and came back with several horses. None looked healthy. They seemed to Conor not unlike the mules they'd seen entering the town earlier. He patted one horse's muzzle sympathetically, and it grunted in return.

As they led the horses away, Finn leaned down to them and said in a low, gruff voice, "Keep your wits about you. We're not staying long. The people fear us, because they think we might be Conquerors in disguise, spying on them."

"Conquerors in disguise?" Conor said.

“Apparently some Conquerors have been doing that to the border towns, to make sure the people stay meek and obedient. The towns are afraid of anyone they don’t recognize.”

Abeke exchanged a look with Rollan. “They keep their own people in a state of fear?” she said in a low voice. Then she glanced around. Conor followed her gaze, wondering with an uneasy feeling whether any of these townspeople were Conquerors in disguise, watching them.

Finn nodded. “Some have been whispering that a patrol of Conquerors came through here less than a week ago. We aren’t far behind them.” He sighed. “They took a great deal of the town’s few food stores with them, as well as precious water supplies. There’s not much left for us to purchase from anyone.”

The thought unsettled Conor. Without water, they would run into trouble in the Stetriolan deserts in no time. “Do we have any?”

“Some,” Finn replied. He looked across the marketplace, where two Greencloaks were tying provisions to the backs of their horses. “Not much. We’ll need to make good time. They say this village is the only one for miles.”

Miles ... with nothing but desert surrounding them. Conor could feel his throat turning dry at the very thought. If this mission failed, and they all perished in the wastelands of Stetriol, it would be his vision that led them out here.

Finn saw Conor’s expression and put a gentle hand on his shoulder. “We all chose this,” he said in a lowered voice. “And we’re going to follow you, Abeke, and Rollan to the end.”

Conor straightened as much as he could. He lifted his chin. “Thank you,” he replied.

They stayed in Gray Hills for the night, renting rooms in a small, cramped inn near the edge of the town. Conor shared a room with Abeke, Rollan, Maya, and Kalani. Despite the fact that the five of them were all squeezed into the cramped space, the real reason Conor couldn’t sleep was because of the shifting colors in the night sky.

Sometimes it would be pure black, like a night sky should be. Other times, it would blaze scarlet, the tint of blood. As he looked on, the colors faded into blue, then an ominous brown. Conor wondered if they were visions – something only he could see. The sky didn’t seem to wake the others. Briggan, out of his dormant state for the night in order to keep watch over Conor, kept his head turned up to the sky too, silently observing.

In the morning, the bodies of red-crested birds littered the streets.

No one opened their doors to greet them as the team checked their horses and left. The entire place had turned into an eerie ghost town. Conor shivered as they filed out through the town's exit gate and into the desert. Even though the land beyond was dry and desolate, he was still glad to leave Gray Hills.

As they rode, the land around them gradually changed from parched yellow plains to sandy red rock dotted with shrubs, the stone carved into rivulets where ancient water used to flow. Off in the distance, they could see the faint silhouette of the Red Mountains, a thin line of jagged rock running along the horizon. Their progress was sporadic, slowed down by the fact that Finn was constantly searching the maps for recognizable landmarks.

"Did your visions show you anything specific?" Abeke asked him as they rode side by side. "Nothing about the Conquerors chasing us, or the birds falling from the sky? The weird villagers?"

Conor shook his head. "The most specific thing I saw was a barren land and the trunk of some enormous tree. I know that Tellun, Kovo, and Gerathon were there. And all of us." He paused there. "Tellun was fighting on our side. I hope that means we'll encounter him soon."

Abeke's jaw tightened. "Some just prefer to stand by," she said quietly, "until they can't stand by anymore. Maybe Tellun's like that too."

"Did your visions ever tell us anything about oases in the desert?" Rollan muttered as his horse finally caught up to theirs. Sweat beaded on his brow. That's a good sign, Conor thought. At least he's still sweating. If he stops, that's when he'll be in trouble.

"Come on, Rollan," Abeke said, rolling her eyes. "We all had a drink of water a few hours ago."

"I know," Rollan whined. As if in answer, Essix called out to him from high in the sky, where she was on the hunt for mice and other rodents. "Easy for you to say!" he muttered up at her.

Abeke shook her head and smiled. She looked back and forth between the two boys. "In Nilo," she said, taking something small and smooth out of her pocket, “we suck on pebbles when the water’s scarce. Try it out. It’ll stave off some of your thirst.”

Rollan hopped off his horse, grabbed a couple of gray pebbles from the ground, then jumped back up and polished them on his tunic. He shoved them in his mouth.

“Don’t eat them,” Abeke said with a laugh. Conor sucked on a pebble and watched their antics, grateful to Rollan for bringing a smile to Abeke’s face.

“Hey,” Abeke called to where Kalani and Maya were trailing them. “You guys want some pebbles?”

Maya shook her head. Her fire salamander was out on her shoulder now, hiding in the shade that her hair created. Its gold-and-black-patterned scales gleamed in the sun. Maya usually kept Tini in his dormant state, but sometimes she’d let him out to feed. Tini would scamper down to the ground to hunt for a few insects and worms, then dart back to her and happily turn dormant again. Desert heat was no place for a fire salamander.

But it was Kalani who looked absolutely miserable this far from the ocean. Her shoulders were hunched, as if she’d wilted in the sun, and she rode on with a blank, downcast expression. Conor watched her closely. Unlike Rollan, she had no sheen of sweat dotting her brow. She looked entirely parched. And listless.

“Kalani?” Rollan asked hesitantly.

“She’s going to faint!” Conor shouted.

Right on cue, Kalani’s head lolled to one side and she swayed in her saddle. Abeke jumped down and rushed over right as Conor called out. When Kalani started to fall, Abeke caught her. Her legs buckled, and the two girls crumpled into a heap on the ground.

Their entire procession paused. Finn came hurrying up from the rear as Conor and Rollan gathered at Kalani’s side. Conor opened his canteen and poured some water into Kalani’s mouth. Her eyes still looked dazed.

“Everyone take a few minutes,” Finn called out, then frowned down at Kalani in concern. She took another drink of water. Suddenly the spark of life came back to her eyes, and she broke out in a sweat.

“Thanks,” she said weakly to everyone gathered around her. “I’m not made for this kind of heat.”

“None of us really are,” Finn replied with a sigh. He squinted up at the low sun. “We should stop for the day, anyway. Sunset’s approaching and we need to set up camp.”

Conor looked toward the waning sun too. He felt how light his canteen was now and wondered how long they could all keep this up.

DESOLATE LAND

THEY TRAVELED RELENTLESSLY FOR TWO DAYS.

On the third night, Abeke slept curled on her side in one corner of her tent, while Uraza lay nearby, close enough for Abeke to keep one hand in the leopard's velvet fur. She was exhausted from the day's journey, and so very thirsty. Her parched throat kept her from falling completely asleep, and she would constantly wake up from half-conscious dreams about waterfalls and cold streams. When they first pitched their tents, Rollan had helped Finn set up a trap of pots and pans around their meager group provisions, and situated it in the center of all their tents. Abeke wished she could have a canteen of water from that pile.

Still, sleeping on the ground in the desert felt like its own form of relief, giving her a nostalgic reminder of village life.

Her thoughts wandered to Meilin. Was she still being kept in the hold in Nilo, or on one of the Conqueror ships – or had they brought her to Stetriol by now? If they ran across Conquerors soon, Abeke hoped that Meilin would be with them – even if she were commanded to fight with the enemy. Did she know about what Shane did? She must, by now. Beside Abeke, Uraza shifted closer and swished her tail, letting a low purr vibrate through her hand.

Aside from thirst, night sounds kept her constantly awake. Unlike those in Nilo, these sounds were unfamiliar to her. There were hoots and calls that she didn't recognize, yips and yowls, the slither of something scaly on the ground. Sometimes she stirred, looking around. Then she would settle back down.

Suddenly Uraza turned alert. Her head pointed toward the tent flap, and her purring changed to a low growl. Her tail swished faster. Abeke stiffened. She rolled into a quiet crouch, listening intently.

There. A scratching sound, and then footsteps. Something was outside.

"Uraza," she whispered urgently. But the leopard was already on the move – she sprang out of the tent in one bound. Abeke leaped up and followed close behind.

They charged out into the open night, completely lit by the moon.

Abeke stopped abruptly, panting, her eyes darting around the camp. She didn't see anything. Everyone still slept, and not a person was in sight. She stooped back down beside Uraza, who was still growling.

"What is it?" she whispered.

Uraza led the way. They cut a quiet path through the smattering of tents before finally reaching the center, where some of their provisions had been stacked, protected by a circle of pots and pans that were supposed to clank if anyone broke through.

But the provisions were gone.

The sacks were ripped open, their insides empty. The paper-wrapped dried meats lay strewn along the ground, and the canteens were open, some still spilling water into the dirt. Abeke gasped out loud.

"Thief!" she called out.

Immediately, Greencloaks stirred from their tents. Finn was the first beside her, while others murmured and muttered in confusion, swords drawn. "Abeke?" he exclaimed when he saw her out there. He paused at the sight of a growling Uraza. "What's going on?"

"Look," Abeke said, pointing at the ruined provisions. "Somebody took our supplies."

Finn's gaze fell on the scattered remnants. He cursed under his breath, then motioned for the others to gather. Abeke tried to temper her anger, but her own thirst made it hard for her to see all that wasted water. Who would do this? She studied the trap closely but found that nothing had tripped it.

“Huh,” Rollan grunted as he and Conor came hurrying over from their tents.

They all paused when Uraza suddenly tensed and lunged for something in the darkness. The charge was followed by a piercing yelp. Abeke blinked in surprise, then found herself chasing instinctively after her spirit animal. “Uraza!” she called out.

But Uraza’s attention had fixed on another creature. She chased after a blurry figure that made a mad dash in front of her, zigzagging in an attempt to shake her off its tail. Uraza pounced – this time, she caught the creature and pinned it to the ground. Another piteous series of yelps punctuated the night.

Abeke ran over to her. She arrived to see her leopard snarling at what looked like a skinny little tan-colored wolf.

Conor and Rollan came skidding to a halt beside her. So did Finn. He was the first to speak. “Well,” he said. “I think we found our culprit. A dingo.”

“A what?” Rollan blurted out.

“They’re like wild dogs,” Finn said. “But native to Stetriol.”

The animal struggled in vain under Uraza’s mighty paws, but she refused to let it up. The telltale signs of its thievery were on its face – crumbs of bread still dotted its muzzle. Abeke shook her head. She hadn’t even bothered to check if the canteens had holes bitten in them, which they most certainly did.

“Uraza,” Abeke said to the leopard. “We should let it go. It’s as hungry and thirsty as we are.”

Uraza reluctantly lifted her paws and let the creature scamper to its feet. It loped across the landscape for a while, then paused to look back at them. In the night, its eyes shone like two metallic discs. Then it ran off and disappeared into the shadows.

They made their way back to the provisions. The dingo had eaten almost everything. Now the only supplies they had were the small packs they’d each kept with them in their tents. It wouldn’t be enough for another three days through the desert. And they were already short on water.

Abeke sank down onto her blanket. She tried not to think about the inevitable, but the thought refused to go away. If they couldn’t reach Muttering Rock in the next few days, they would die out here.

The next morning, they all packed up what little they had and set out again. Abeke allowed herself a few meager sips of water. It took all of her willpower to not drink every last drop in her canteen. The desert had taken on a shimmer of light that hovered just above the dry vegetation, rippling under the sun. Sometimes, she saw things in the ripples.

The others did too.

“Are those Conquerors headed in our direction?” Maya once said, startled, her finger pointed toward the horizon.

They all paused to look. As the ground continued to shimmer, Conor finally said, “No. It’s an illusion. Let’s keep going.”

Rollan swore he saw a giant elephant in the distance, as big as Dinesh, and wondered aloud how he’d gotten there. Twice, Abeke made the mistake of seeing a small stream babbling up ahead. It seemed like she could even hear it. But every time they neared, the stream would vanish and all they would see was more parched land.

Abeke kept her attention focused on the nearing expanse of mountains. Just a little farther, she thought. If they ever made it out of this desert, she would drink an entire keg of water.

The fifth day.

One of the horses perished from the harsh conditions. They all looked helplessly on when the poor creature suddenly stumbled in its steps, fell to its front knees, and collapsed onto its side with a groan. Kalani reached the horse first. But even before she could put a hand on the animal’s neck, she was shaking her head. The horse shuddered, foaming at the mouth. Then, slowly, its body settled against the earth, until it used up its last breath.

They rode in silence for a long time after that. Abeke couldn’t stop playing the horse’s death over and over in her head.

The other horses weren’t doing too well either, and the entire group had resorted to chewing on the last strips of dried jerky. Abeke traveled with Uraza in her dormant state now. The sun baked her hair and skin until they felt hot to the touch. Her canteen had already run dry. She’d sucked on so many pebbles that they no longer helped anymore. Her eyes constantly swept the shrubbery around them, searching for plants that looked like they contained water. She hadn't seen anything yet.

Wait.

As if the mere thought had given her a clue, Abeke's eyes fell on a small, nondescript plant a few yards away. It reminded her immediately of a plant she knew from back home in Nilo.

Conor saw her pause. "What is it?" he asked. He sounded half-delirious from thirst himself.

"There." Abeke pointed. "That plant."

"What about it?"

Abeke didn't answer right away. Instead, her attention stayed on the plant. It was a short, squat, ugly little thing, with swollen leaves that looked like little green sacs. Back in Nilo, they called it a water bulb, due to moisture that the plant carried in its body. This one was covered in brightly colored spiked leaves, but otherwise, it looked fairly close. She dismounted from her horse and headed over to it. Conor followed her.

"Careful," Conor said, but Abeke gave him an encouraging smile and stooped down to peer at the plant.

"I won't touch the spikes," she promised. "Look at those colors – they're probably poisonous."

She removed the knife at her belt and sliced one of the green bulbs off. She carved one end of it open. Wet, clear liquid dripped onto her hands. The others stopped in their procession to watch. Abeke stared at the liquid for a moment. It could be poisonous, of course – but at this point, she was so thirsty that she didn't care. They would all die without water, anyway. Taking a deep breath, Abeke lifted it.

She sipped the clear liquid.

Then she closed her eyes and drank deeply. Water! It tasted slightly sweet and wonderfully cool – before she knew it, she'd finished drinking the entire bulb. When she opened her eyes again, she noticed that the plants grew in a large cluster hidden behind dry, prickly bushes. Conor stared at her in shock. She looked back at him with a grin, and Conor's expression changed to one of delight as he realized what Abeke had found. They both turned and enthusiastically waved the others over.

“Water!” they called out in unison.

Everyone set about filling their canteens and watering their horses the best they could. The water from the plants wasn’t much, but it was enough, and the mere fact that they would be able to find bulbs like this in Stetriol’s barren lands gave Abeke hope that they could make it across.

“I’m going to search for more plants,” she announced, then set off up the hill to find more clusters. They seemed to grow together, and if she found a few more at the base of the hills, they would be set for another week.

“Wait for us!”

Behind her, Conor and Rollan came running. Maya stayed behind to look after Kalani, who still didn’t seem her best. Abeke waited until the boys caught up to her, and then the three of them set out together.

“I used to survive on bulbs like that when I went out hunting,” Abeke said. “The thing is, they tend to grow in lands that have some underground water or tiny streams. If we find any more clusters of them growing, then we might be able to find a bigger water source.”

“Bigger water source,” Rollan said, still drinking from his refilled canteen. “Music to my ears.”

They covered the short distance between the plains and the foothills. There, to Abeke’s delight, they found two more clusters of the water bulbs growing. There had to be some sort of stream around. Abeke, Conor, and Rollan climbed higher up the first hill. The wind had picked up again, and the cool breeze it brought was a welcome change from the stifling heat. Abeke breathed a sigh of relief. Thank Ninani their luck was finally turning around. At this rate, they’d be prepared when they caught up to the Conquerors. Sure enough, Abeke glanced down from the hill to see the first sign of a thin, snaking stream. She laughed as they went.

“Look!”

Conor stopped so suddenly that Abeke bumped right into his back. Rollan smashed into her in turn.

“What is it?” Abeke said. Then her eyes settled on what had captured Conor’s attention, and her words faded away into nothing.

From this vantage point on the hill, they could look down at a vast expanse of flatland, partly framed by the Red Mountains. The nearest side – the side they now stood on – was lined with narrow ravines. On the far side was a strange, shimmering red rock formation that plateaued high above the ground, looking like a giant ant mound.

And in the flatland's center, between all of the formations ... were thousands of Conquerors.

ARMY

SO MANY OF THEM.

That was Conor's first thought.

His second: We can't fight them. We have to go around.

And his third: Olvan's army should be here by now.

"Let's go back," Conor whispered, crouching lower in the grass. All thoughts of water seemed to have escaped him. "We have to warn Finn."

"Right," Rollan whispered. He turned abruptly around and started making his way through the tall grasses. "It's a good thing we went searching for plants. We would've walked right into them. They probably have troops guarding all the passes."

"It likely also means we're close to Kovo's prison," Abeke piped up. She looked sharply at Conor. "Anything familiar to you out there? Anything from your dreams or visions?"

Conor furrowed his brows. Up ahead, the others had already quieted and turned to watch them running frantically back. Conor's persistent visions flashed through his mind – the eagle, the ape, the snake, the golden leaves. The cliff, the red earth –

"That red rock," he muttered under his breath. Then louder, "That rock formation we just saw, on the far side. I think that's Muttering Rock."

“Do you think they’ve freed Kovo already?” Rollan asked.

“I don’t know,” Conor admitted. “But we have to head there all the same. If Kovo hasn’t been freed yet, it won’t be long before he is.”

The three charged back to the others. Finn frowned at their expressions. “What did you see out there?”

“Conquerors,” Abeke said breathlessly. “A whole army of them.”

“And no Olvan,” Conor added, saying what Abeke had been hesitant to voice. “His forces are supposed to hold them off and give us the chance to go ahead.”

“We may have arrived before him,” Finn said grimly. He nodded toward the foothills from where they’d just come. “Show me.”

Conor took them back to the crest, where they all got down on their bellies to watch the massive expanse of troops arrange themselves into practice formations. It seemed as if they were preparing for a big event, and Conor had no question what that event would be. Maya crawled over to join them after a while. She sucked in her breath at the sight.

“There,” Abeke snapped, pointing out a lone figure standing near the front of the flanks. Her jaw clenched until Conor thought it might break. “Shane!”

Even from this distance, the Devourer’s enormous crocodile was clearly visible camped out at its human partner’s side, its mighty jaws opening and closing. Conor shivered at the way its tail swept back and forth, and imagined the wide swaths it was painting in the desert sand. He looked back at Abeke to see her hands were clenched into fists. The fire of rage lit her eyes, a rare sight.

“If Shane’s here,” Rollan added, his own eyes sweeping the scene, “then maybe Meilin is too.”

Conor’s gaze settled on the strange rock formation he’d seen earlier. Something about it continued to hold his attention. Kovo. He called Briggan out from his passive state, and the huge wolf joined them in a small flash of light. His hackles were already up.

“Conor,” Finn said, looking at the rock. “Is that ... ?”

Conor nodded.

“We have to find a way around this army and reach the rock without drawing their attention,” Finn continued. He gestured down to the formations. “I can see some of their forces down in three of the narrow ravines leading onto the plain. I'm going to assume they've taken those, as well." He pointed to two more narrow valleys that fed into the plains. "If we want to get around them, we'll need to make a wide circle east. And we'll need to do it without our horses."

Conor felt a pang at that. He looked back at the poor animals, all of whom had already been in bad shape before they set out. How would they survive in the desert?

Finn saw his face and shook his head. "We can't take them. Where we'll have to go is too steep for their legs. They will die. And if one of them startles when we're passing close to the Conquerors, they could give away our location."

Conor took a closer look at the terrain. The way he was crouched in the grass gave him a better view of the lower plains than Finn had. As he scanned the space, he noticed a tiny, shadowed path. Paths. In fact, there were several branches of grooves carved deep into the land, as if some ancient river and its tributaries used to exist there and had dried up decades ago.

The resulting maze of winding paths had tall walls with strange, wavelike formations and natural half tunnels. The paths carved their way all along the edge of the foothills. They stopped short of where their small troupe needed to be, but if they could pass through there completely unnoticed, they would leave behind the worst of the Conquerors.

"There," he whispered. "What if we make our way through one of those river paths?"

Finn followed his finger. His brows furrowed in thought. "It will take us dangerously close to the troops," he finally muttered. "If we're found while still there, they'll easily overwhelm us in a matter of minutes."

Conor nodded. "Definitely dangerous," he admitted. "But it's faster, and it looks like smooth, flat ground underneath those wave formations. If we pass through, the shape of it should muffle the sound of our horses' hooves, and block them from seeing the troops." He glanced at the others for their approval.

Rollan didn't even hesitate. "The faster, the better. I'm with Conor. Meilin might be down there with those troops, and we need to save her as soon as we can."

Abeke seemed more guarded. "We are passing awfully close," she said, more to herself than anyone else. “But if we pad our horses’ hooves, we can make them travel even more quietly. Conor’s right – the shadows and the formations should hide us from view.”

Maya frowned. “It’ll keep them from seeing us, true, but it’ll also keep us from seeing them. We won’t even have a warning of them coming until they’re right on top of us. We won’t have a second chance.”

“I can keep Essix out,” Rollan suggested. “She’ll have to fly high to stay out of sight, but she can be our eyes, and if she sees the Conquerors moving toward us, she’ll give us a warning cry.”

“It’s the best solution,” Conor said, nodding toward Kalani. “We’re not going to survive much longer out in these deserts, not with the state we’re all in. It’s time for us to take a chance, even if it’s our only one.”

It took him a moment to realize that everyone was looking to him as if he were the final say in the decision – as if he were now leading the charge. Conor blinked, taken momentarily off guard. Maya was right about one thing: This was their final stand. They would succeed now, or everything they’d worked toward, ever since they first drank the Nectar and joined the Greencloaks, would be for nothing. This was the final struggle for Erdas, and it fell to Conor’s decision.

Memories from long ago flashed across his mind – sitting with his brothers in green pastures dotted with white sheep, standing behind Devon Trunswick and meticulously buttoning his luxurious vest.... How strange to be here after once being a shepherd and a servant.

He took a deep breath and willed himself to keep his head high. “I say we do it.”

Finn nodded once. He didn’t question Conor again. “Prepare the horses. We’ll make for the path at sunset.”

Sunset seemed to take forever to arrive. The light turned red and purple, casting long shadows across the plains. Cooking fires began to dot the bush where the Conquerors were gathered.

The team finally made their move.

Their horses trotted slowly down the side of the rolling hills. Finn led, followed by Conor and the others, the hoods of their cloaks pulled over their heads to blend them in further with the lengthening shadows. They moved in a short, silent procession. As they went, the landscape shifted, changing from bushes and dry grasses to red, sandy rock and bare, sheer cliff sides. The walls of rock kept them safely hidden as night fell in earnest.

After a while, the mouth of the paths came into view – its walls tall and curved into a wave formation. The sound was strange here, bouncing the faint thud of hooves against the curved wall so that it came right back to them, giving it an odd echo. A cool breeze whipped their hair and hoods back.

Conor struggled to hear what might be going on beyond the rock wave, whether or not the Conquerors had followed them. The formation made it difficult for him to hear much outside of the path, though. He looked up to the sky. Essix was flying so high that in the darkness, he couldn't see her anywhere.

Behind him, Rollan whispered, "We're doing okay. The Conquerors seem like they're all cooking their suppers."

"Good," Conor replied. He could use a little bit of supper himself, but he quickly banished the thought. As if in response, his stomach rumbled. Even that sound echoed inside the wave formation, bouncing back and forth between the high bluffs.

The darker the night became, the harder it was for them to make out where they were going. The path had started to branch too, forcing them to concentrate on following the rightmost course so that they didn't accidentally lose each other. Conor couldn't see the moon tonight. Soon they were traveling in almost total darkness, their horses picking their way carefully through the terrain.

Finn kept them at as fast of a pace as he could, but they moved slower than Conor had predicted. The idea of Conquerors being right over the top of the wave formation – that at any moment, one might wander close by and look down to see them passing through – made Conor urge his horse on.

The other thing he didn't plan on, aside from the strange echoes: the wind. The shape of the narrow path channeled the air in such a way that a constant blast of cold wind beat against them, whipping their cloaks out behind them in dark streams. Conor gritted his teeth against it. After traveling through dry heat for the entire day, the sudden shift threw him off. At least it made a whistling noise as it went, muting their hoofbeats.

“How far along are we?” Abeke hissed from ahead. “It feels like we’ve been stuck in here for hours.”

Conor tried to gauge how much distance they’d covered, but it was hard in the winding darkness. He looked over his shoulder at Rollan. “Can Essix give you any hints?”

Rollan started to answer, but a sound stopped them all abruptly.

It was the sound of hooves against dirt, but not any of theirs. They fell into a tense silence – Conor strained to hear if it came from the Conquerors’ camps. But the noise had disappeared.

Then it was back again, even louder. This time, Conor could tell it came from the path far ahead that curved around a bend. A moment later, he saw the flood of light from a lantern wrapping around the path.

The rock formation bent sound so oddly that they hadn’t heard the approaching party. Kalani, riding near the front, only had time to draw her sword before the other party came clearly into view.

Meilin appeared first, her hand clutching the lantern, with Jhi right beside her. An entire troop of Conqueror soldiers followed. She stared straight at them, her eyes anguished.

“Found you,” she said.

FRIENDS AND ENEMIES

ROLLAN DIDN'T KNOW WHAT TO THINK AT THE SIGHT OF her. He didn't know how to react. He didn't know why his first thought was of the last time he'd seen her, running away from them with Abeke in tow, her mind and body no longer under her own control. He had no idea what expression must be on his face.

"Meilin," Rollan found himself calling out.

She winced at his voice but held firm. Her eyes turned yellow, and her pupils dilated to an unnatural size. "Seize them," she commanded.

The Conquerors charged at Finn and the Greencloaks. Conor called Briggan out in a blaze of light, and Uraza came roaring out of passive state to attack the enemy soldiers. Rollan called out for Essix, who let out a cry in return as she swooped down – and then he swung from his saddle and started shoving his way toward Meilin.

She didn't look like herself anymore. Dark circles rimmed the skin below her eyes, and her hair swung limply with each move of her head. But one thing stayed the same – she moved in an elegant blur of motion, a whirlwind of attacks that he was all too familiar with, taking down a Greencloak with a fierce kick at his head. Beside her, Jhi reluctantly ambled at her side, protecting her as she went.

"Take them prisoner!" Meilin shouted.

Rollan noticed that Shane stood at the very back of the patrol, a dark smile on his face.

Shane called for his crocodile. The enormous creature emerged, tail thrashing, blocking off the entire path with its size. Rollan touched the talisman buried against his chest. If the Conquerors got hold of his and Abeke's talismans, they were doomed.

Essix dove into the fray with talons outstretched, her cry furious. She lunged for the Devourer's crocodile first, but her sharp claws clicked harmlessly against tough scales. The crocodile snapped its head around, jaws seeking feathers. The gyrfalcon darted out of reach at the last instant. The beast's teeth barely missed her.

Abeke and Kalani moved at the same time, with Uraza charging ahead of them. They attacked a Conqueror and knocked him hard to the ground. Uraza pounced up onto the back of another Conqueror's horse with one huge leap, and the soldier fell off his mount with a shriek.

Nearby, Conor and Briggan aimed for Shane's crocodile, Briggan snarling and trying to find a way around its snapping jaws, to hold the animal off from the others.

"Meilin!" Rollan shouted as loudly as he could.

Meilin paused for a moment in the midst of the fighting; her head snapped in his direction. There – he could see a spark of recognition in her eyes, something within that fought to break free of the cloud that blanketed her face. He ducked under a Conqueror's swinging sword and sprinted in her direction. If he could just reach her, if he could just touch her hand, he knew he could help her overcome the Bile. If he just –

"Fall back!" Finn shouted from the fray. Rollan's attention broke for an instant. The elder Greencloak pointed at the path behind them. "The way we came!"

The Greencloaks began to break formation, turning their shrieking horses around and urging them in the opposite direction. Rollan cast another desperate look toward Meilin. She met his gaze for a brief moment. No. I have to reach her! Again he started to push through the soldiers, but the Greencloaks were all retreating. Abeke grabbed his arm as she passed him.

“We have to run!” she shouted.

“But –”

Rollan looked again and Meilin was lost from sight within the Conquerors. The enemy charged forward, weapons brandished. Gritting his teeth, Rollan followed Abeke and ran with the others.

Dust flew up from the footsteps and hooves, clouding the entire narrow path with a haze lit by the light of their lanterns. The dust lined Rollan’s throat. He choked and coughed. His boot caught on the edge of a sharp rock – he stumbled, then fell hard to the ground.

Immediately he started staggering to his feet again, but he looked up and found himself staring straight into Meilin’s haunted face.

She looked like she was about to attack him. Rollan braced himself.

Then, without warning, she grabbed his shirt collar and pulled him close. The colors in her eyes shifted abruptly, flashing from sickly gold back into a humanlike darkness, her pupils contracting. “The next fork will have no patrols,” she hissed. “It’ll lead you to the surface. Go!” She released him.

Rollan gaped, but he had no time to respond – or to grab Meilin’s hand and pull her with him. She lost the battle in her eyes. Her pupils dilated back into big black halos, and her irises gleamed yellow once more. With Jhi at her side, she waved the Conquerors forward. Shane smirked in approval.

Rollan had no idea whether Gerathon heard Meilin’s warning to him, or how it even happened, but he knew they couldn’t stay on their current path for long. He turned and ran to where Abeke was dashing back to him.

“Take the next path!” he gasped at her, gesturing for her to pass it along. Abeke didn’t hesitate. She shouted it up the chain, and the words traveled to the rest of the Greencloaks.

She helped us, Rollan thought feverishly as they ran. But she was still under the Bile’s influence. Somehow, her willpower must be finding a way to break through the overwhelming control – and if that was the case, then surely there would be a way to save her. Rollan forced himself to keep going, instead of turning around and finding Meilin again. Getting captured wouldn’t help anybody right now.

They reached the branch with the Conquerors right at their heels.

Somewhere above the walls and along the plains, Rollan thought he could hear the sound of battle – the clang of sword meeting sword, horses’ thundering hooves, shouts of men. Had the other Conquerors already been alerted? If the entire army knew where they were now, they would have no hope of getting through in time. As they ran, Rollan noticed the ground gradually starting to slope up. He ran faster.

“Essix!” he shouted as he went. Overhead, his gyrfalcon’s familiar cry answered. He took a deep breath, then glimpsed through her eyes. An image flashed before him – the plains from the night sky, dotted with hundreds of fires. Conquerors moving in chaotic clusters. They looked like they were fighting. Rollan peered closer through Essix’s vision.

Right as their path led them up to the surface of the plains, Rollan realized that the Conquerors’ army was fighting ... Greencloaks.

Olvan and his forces had finally arrived!

Rollan blinked, returning to his own view, then looked on in awe as they all ran. Familiar cloaks flashed in the darkness, clashing with the Conquerors’ dark armor, their silhouettes outlined sharply by the fires. Olvan’s moose reared somewhere in the fray, his enormous antlers glinting in the dark. There! Was that ... a soldier wearing the crest of Lord MacDonnell on his armor? And there – Rollan thought he saw Lishay, the Greencloak who had fought alongside them in Zhong, and at her side was her late brother’s black tiger, loyal to her almost like her own spirit animal had once been. Rollan wanted to shout with relief. They were all here! Even a few Niloan warriors darted through the melee, their war cries joining the sounds of battle. They must have joined Olvan’s forces! He wondered if Abeke’s father was among them.

Then a figure flashed through the darkness that erased Rollan’s smile. Zerif. He caught sight of Rollan, and the corners of his lips turned up into an oily sneer. The Iron Boar was looped around his neck – even as Greencloaks on horseback tried to shoot him down with arrows, their weapons bounced harmlessly off of him. With a snarl, Zerif turned in his saddle as a Greencloak rode up beside him. Rollan looked on in horror as he slashed at the Greencloak with his sword. The Greencloak clutched his chest and fell from his horse with a sickening thud.

Another Greencloak galloped over to Rollan. He had several horses with him, stallions that looked much stronger than the mounts they'd been traveling with. It took Rollan a moment to realize that the Greencloak was Monte, with his raccoon spirit animal perched in front of him on the saddle. The raccoon's hackles stood on end, and it hissed in the direction of the battle.

"Go as fast as you can!" he shouted as he flung the reins toward Rollan. "We'll cover you!" Then he waved reinforcements over and turned them onto the Conquerors on their tail.

Rollan let out a bark of laughter. Perhaps the tide had turned! He grabbed the reins and tried to swing up onto the horse's back. "Stop!" Rollan shouted at the horse. It only slowed slightly for him.

"Here, let me!" Abeke shouted beside him. She made a running leap, grabbed the horse's mane, and swung up in one fluid move. Then she pulled the horse to a halt so that Rollan could climb up behind her.

Ahead of them, the large red rock formation loomed close in the night. They could make it.

Then Rollan heard a familiar voice next to them.

"Poor little boy. Shall I force you to fight the girl you care for?"

Meilin materialized out of the chaos, riding alongside on her own stallion. Her hair streamed out behind her. At her back rode other Conquerors. When she glanced at Rollan and Abeke, her expression looked stone-cold. Her eyes flashed like mirrors in the darkness. Hearing Gerathon's words in Meilin's voice sent a chill down Rollan's spine. He narrowed his eyes at her.

"I'll fight you," Rollan snapped back. "And I'll make you pay for what you've done to Meilin."

Ahead, another patrol of Conquerors had blocked their path, forcing Finn to pull to a halt. Abeke turned their horse to face Meilin. Uraza growled at Jhi, who stayed firmly by Meilin's side.

"Meilin, it's us!" Abeke shouted. "Look – I'm okay, I made it here with the Greencloaks! Come with us!"

"She's no longer your concern," Shane called back, emerging from the shadows behind Meilin to face Rollan and Abeke. Several talismans hung from his belt, clacking together against his hip. Shane wore one around his neck, though Rollan couldn't make out which.

Abeke fell silent. Rollan looked on in rage.

Shane stared at Abeke for a moment, his brows furrowed, as if he wanted to say something. Then he seemed to change his mind. He nodded at Meilin. “I say it’s time to take their remaining talismans. Don’t you?”

Meilin narrowed her yellow eyes, then kicked her stallion forward. “Attack!” she said. She charged at them, aiming for Abeke and Rollan.

Abeke spurred their stallion on. The two horses charged at each other. As they drew near, Meilin hopped nimbly onto her steed’s back – then, as soon as they were close enough, she jumped. She knocked Abeke right off the horse, leaving only Rollan astride it. The two landed on the ground with a shower of dust.

Rollan swung down from the stallion and rushed to where Meilin was striking out ferociously at Abeke. Abeke put her arms up desperately over her face, trying to shield herself from the onslaught, but Meilin still caught her now and then, her movements a blur of motion. Head, side, jaw, arm. She struck everywhere, far too fast for Abeke to deflect. Nearby, Uraza snarled and growled at Jhi, who kept her at bay with her enormous, deadly paws.

“Meilin!” Abeke shouted. “Stop! I don’t want to fight you!” She struggled to defend herself without attacking back, but Meilin bared her teeth and continued on. Abeke’s breaths came in ragged gasps, then sobs. “I can’t fight you!” she cried out. Meilin caught her in a blow to the stomach, and Abeke doubled over in agony, all the wind knocked out of her. She wheezed.

Uraza roared in fury. She tried again to lunge toward Meilin, but Jhi muscled her way between them, baring her teeth at the leopard. Essix cried out from somewhere above Rollan. She dove at Jhi, claws extended, but seemed unwilling to inflict real damage, avoiding the panda’s eyes and going instead for the thick fur of her neck.

Rollan lunged forward as Meilin raised her fist to knock Abeke unconscious. He grabbed her shoulders from behind. “Meilin –” he began.

Meilin whirled on him, knocking him right off his feet. He landed with a thud onto his back. Immediately he put his arms up to protect his head, but Meilin kicked him hard with her shin. The blow crushed his own arm against his face. Rollan rolled away, then scrambled to his feet. His arm throbbed with pain, as if just hit with a mace. His heart pounded wildly. She could kill him here, if she wanted to. She wouldn't even have to try.

"I saw you fighting it earlier," he said. "You can do it again!"

Though Meilin's face was the picture of anger, when she spoke, her voice cracked with anguish. "Leave me behind," she sobbed. "Run!" She lunged for him again.

Abeke scrambled up and tried to grab her arms, but Meilin was on her in a flash, kicking her squarely in the chest and knocking her down again. This time, Shane joined in – he shouted a command at his crocodile, and the giant creature snapped its jaws at Abeke. For a second, Rollan lost sight of Abeke behind the crocodile's towering figure. Then he saw her jump backward and whirl on her old friend with a determined stance. Beside her, Uraza let out a roar. She grabbed her bow off her back and pointed an arrow at him.

Rollan tried to remember his combat lessons, but facing Meilin, he couldn't seem to fight at all. He sidestepped Meilin's next attack, but she drifted with him, kicking out at his legs in a quick flourish. Rollan stumbled forward – he caught himself before spilling over and then dodged Meilin's short sword by a mere inch. She whirled. He could barely see her through the speed of her movements.

"I'm not leaving you!" Rollan shouted as he desperately tried to match each of her punches. One landed hard on his shoulder. He cried out in pain – it felt like someone striking him with a hammer. Meilin's eyes flashed from yellow to brown and the huge dilated pupils shrank to a normal size, then back again – whatever toll it took on her to resist killing him, he couldn't guess. How do I snap her out of it? How do I help?

"Such a weakling," Meilin snapped at him. Gerathon's words. "What does she see in a street urchin like you?"

"Meilin!" he yelled as she stabbed out with her sword again. The blade nicked his arm, and he felt hot blood well up against his skin before he felt the pain. "Do you remember when I first met you? Remember how much we irritated each other? Do you remember how many times you saved me?"

"Why should she remember anything about you?" Meilin hissed back. The words dripped with dark amusement. "You are nothing."

Meilin lunged for him, and the tip of her sword looked like a pointed star as it thrust straight toward his eye. Rollan ducked, stumbling, but continued stubbornly on. “Remember my fever rash in Zhong? How you stayed with me when I caught the Sunset Death? Or that time we were journeying to Samis, when you stopped that thief before he could stab me?”

Something flickered on Meilin’s face – the old Meilin, the one he knew and cared about. Her yellow eyes filled with tears, but still she continued to advance.

Nearby, Rollan heard a sword clash with something wooden. It was Abeke’s bow against Shane’s blade. Abeke shrieked – but whether it was in pain or anger, Rollan couldn’t tell.

“Remember when you fought off the sharks in Oceanus?” he said. “Do you know how worried I was? How ... how impressed?” His last few words wavered and his eyes burned as the memory of their last journey together hit him. Meilin let out a harsh battle cry and leaped for him, as if to make him stop. He tried dodging her again, but she caught him this time with her fist and sent him tumbling backward. The impact knocked the breath out of him – for a moment he struggled just to inhale. Meilin lifted her sword over her head. Her yellow eyes flashed wildly.

“Don’t you prefer to die like this?” Gerathon’s taunting words. “By her hands?”

Rollan told himself to ignore it. “Do you remember Abeke? Conor?” he gasped. Then he suddenly dropped his hands. Meilin had a clear shot at him, but he didn’t bother to defend himself anymore. I have to do this. “You’re a Greencloak, Meilin! You’re one of us, and we’ll stand at your side until the very end. You’re our friend.”

The blade trembled. Rollan shut his eyes and braced himself. His hands clutched tightly against the talisman on his chest. “You belong with us,” he said weakly.

The blow didn’t come. Rollan waited. The sounds of battle roared all around him. Then he opened his eyes carefully.

Meilin stayed suspended over him, but she had put down her blade and now both of her arms hung at her sides. Behind them, Shane glanced over from where he fought with Abeke. His face was incredulous. “What are you waiting for,

Gerathon?” he snapped at Meilin. “Get the Coral Octopus!”

Rollan kept his eyes fixed on Meilin’s.

Her eyes were brown – a beautiful, human brown.

His lips tilted into a lopsided smile. “If you’re not here, who am I going to tease all the time?”

A laugh emerged from Meilin’s throat – sad, amused, relieved. She still looked like she was struggling, but she helped Rollan stand up and then glanced frantically around the battlefield. “Keep me shackled,” she said. “Don’t let me go.”

“I won’t,” Rollan replied.

Meilin called Jhi into her dormant state. The panda disappeared in a flash. Rollan seized the moment to hurriedly wrap Meilin’s hands tightly behind her back.

Shane saw what was happening. His face twisted first in confusion, then in rage. He turned to Meilin. “Gerathon!” he shouted. “What are you doing? Command her to attack them!”

But Meilin’s eyes didn’t change. They stayed dark.

“Gerathon!” Shane shouted, angrier this time. He viciously shoved Abeke aside and hurried toward them.

“This is no time to play around,” Shane snapped at her, drawing his sword. He paused in his steps when he saw Rollan take a firm stance in front of Meilin. Abeke pushed herself back up on her feet and joined him. She turned her fierce eyes onto Shane.

“If you’re so worried,” Abeke said through clenched teeth, “then come attack us yourself!”

Shane narrowed his eyes at her. He hoisted his blade higher. “So be it,” he shouted. “If the Great Serpent is too weak to control a girl!”

Suddenly Shane froze in place. His eyes widened. He winced, then clutched his head as if something had stabbed him there. A terrible gasp escaped from his lips. He shrieked once. Rollan watched as the Devourer’s eyes changed ... into sickly gold. His pupils dilated until they nearly filled up his irises.

So. It was true, then. Shane had drunk the Bile – and now, he had become Gerathon’s puppet.

Shane shuddered violently. Then, he lifted his head and looked at Abeke again with his new eyes. He smiled and hoisted his saber again.

“I’ll be ordered around by no human,” he spat.

Then he touched the talisman looped around his neck and roared. The Golden Lion! Rollan realized too late.

The noise echoed across the battlefield – a deafening blast that knocked them off their feet.

Shane mounted his own stallion again, then called his crocodile into its dormant state. Rollan’s eyes darted up, following Shane’s path.

Zerif waited several dozen yards away. Wrapped around his hands were the other talismans. “To Muttering Rock!” the man shouted. Shane kicked his horse, spurring it on. The two galloped in the direction of the red rock formation.

“Quickly!” Rollan shouted, pulling Meilin over toward their horse. Abeke struggled up from where she was and ran for her horse too. All around the plains, Olvan’s Greencloaks had mounted a successful attack. Conquerors were breaking into smaller, chaotic clusters, herded into position by determined Greencloaks. Far in the middle of the plain, Rollan thought he saw Olvan in the melee.

Conor came dashing up to them on his horse. He pulled to a halt and Briggan loped up beside him, his gray fur lustrous in the firelight. Conor looked from Meilin to Rollan. His eyes were very wide, almost wild like his wolf’s.

“Is she –?” Conor started to say.

“She’s fine,” Rollan huffed, out of breath.

Meilin screamed. Her dark irises flickered to yellow, and she struggled against her bonds.

“She will be fine,” Rollan clarified. “She’s holding off the Bile as well as she can.”

“Let’s get her on a horse,” Conor said. “We have to go after Shane and Zerif – now. They’re going to free Kovo!”

MUTTERING ROCK

CONOR URGED HIS STALLION FORWARD, IN THE DIRECTION that Shane and Zerif had gone – toward Muttering Rock. The vision and dreams he'd been experiencing for days now came rushing back to him: the bloodred stone, Shane astride the eagle, Kovo roaring outside his prison. Tellun's voice, ringing in his ears.

It is the end of an era. We need you here.

They would find Tellun tonight. Conor was sure of it.

Conor spurred his horse into a sprint. The others followed closely behind him. As the battle between the Conquerors and the Greencloaks raged on, Conor kept his focus on the enormous rock formation that loomed nearer and nearer. Ahead, Shane's and Zerif's horses kicked up a cloud of dust. They would reach the bottom of the rock before long. Conor clenched his jaw and urged his horse to go faster.

They reached the wall right as Shane and Zerif began to scale it. They went at a frightening pace, aided by the stolen talismans – Shane crawled across the rock as if he were a squirrel, his grip steady and sure, and Zerif was yanked up after him, sliding from foothold to foothold in a rush, tied to Shane with a length of rope. Conor swung off his horse at the foot of the rock and hurried over to the others as they dismounted. He and Abeke helped Rollan get Meilin off the horse.

All four stared up at the looming wall of rock. It seemed unscalable.

“The Granite Ram,” Conor said, pointing to the talisman looped around Abeke’s neck.

Abeke handed it over. “Go,” she said. “We’ll follow as far as we can.” She tilted her head at Rollan. “Essix can send it back when you’re up.”

As Conor tugged the talisman over his head, Rollan turned and looked at Meilin. “Can you climb?”

“No,” Meilin said immediately.

“Yes, you can,” Rollan pressed.

Meilin’s voice sounded frantic. “Absolutely not. I’ll only be a danger to you up there. I –”

Before Conor even realized that Rollan had his dagger in hand, he’d slashed it down, cutting the rope that bound Meilin’s hands in one swift movement. The coils fell to the ground in a heap, leaving her unrestrained.

Meilin looked down at her hands in horror and wonder, opening and closing her fingers.

“Rollan ...” Conor said. “Are you sure about this? Gerathon could turn her against us at any moment.”

“I said I’m not leaving her,” Rollan muttered, sheathing the dagger. Meilin’s eyes darted from her hands up to him. He shook his head at her. “And I’m not.”

“You should,” Meilin said again, although this time she said it weakly.

“No.” Rollan’s eyes were steady, unafraid. “I trust you.”

“We all do,” Abeke said. She stepped forward and squeezed Meilin’s pale hands with her own. Tears started to well up in Meilin’s eyes.

Conor thought back to when he had betrayed the others, and how they’d forgiven him. How, no matter what, they had to set their fears aside sometimes and put their faith in each other. He reached out and touched Meilin’s shoulder. He smiled at her. “Come on, Meilin. Let’s go.”

Meilin shut her eyes and her tears overflowed, spilling down her cheeks. “Okay,” she whispered. “Thank you.” She looked at each of them in turn. “For everything. I’ll fight Gerathon with everything I have. I promise.”

Conor glanced up the rock. “I have to go.”

“Be swift,” Abeke said. “We’ll be right behind you.”

Conor clutched the talisman tightly. Suddenly it felt as if he could see every single foothold on the entire sheer rock side. He gave a mighty leap. The Granite Ram shot him up into the air – he landed instinctively in a spot where he could find footholds. “Hold on!” he called down to the others. Then he took another wild leap to another hold. Wind rushed past him. When Conor chanced a look down, a prickly sensation rushed up his spine. He had covered over fifty feet in the span of a few seconds. The others followed his path at a slower rate while he jumped ahead. He glanced up to where Shane and Zerif dashed. Then he leaped again.

A piercing cry rang out overhead. For an instant, Conor flinched and thought he would see Halawir flying overhead, just like in his nightmares. But the cry came from Essix. The gyrfalcon flew ahead of them, calling out a shrill warning. Conor looked up to see Shane wielding the Crystal Polar Bear. His eyes widened.

“Watch out!” Conor yelled down to the others. As he said it, a violent explosion shook the cliff side – followed by the sound of crumbling boulders. Shane had knocked an avalanche of debris down toward them. Essix shrieked and darted away from the cliff. Conor made a giant leap out of the rocks’ way. An enormous boulder hurtled past him, hit the edge of the sheer wall, and crumbled into smaller rocks. They barely missed Abeke, who managed to fling herself to one side.

More rocks came tumbling down. Conor leaped from side to side as Shane struck out repeatedly with the Crystal Polar Bear’s invisible arms, raining more debris onto them. “Spread out!” Conor shouted down to the others. He saw Abeke taking the lead and guiding them farther out to the right. More boulders hurtled down the side, smashing entire chunks out of the wall and adding to the avalanche.

I have to distract Shane. Conor jumped and climbed to the opposite side of the wall, forcing Shane to concentrate on stopping him. He coughed from the dust stirred up by the falling boulders. Halfway there, Conor took another flying leap, and then another, moving as fast as he could. But Shane and Zerif had the Marble Swan. With the extra burst of agility it would give them for their climb, they would undoubtedly reach the top before he could.

The thought of Shane and Zerif releasing Kovo from his prison spurred Conor to even greater speeds. If Kovo escaped, all would be lost.

Faster. Almost to the top. Conor let out a yelp as another sudden avalanche of rocks nearly sent him toppling down. He gripped the wall precariously, his feet dangling for a moment. An image of himself plummeting to his death flashed through his mind. Conor clenched his teeth and pressed himself close to the rock wall. Thanks to the Granite Ram, he found his footing.

Shane and Zerif had already cleared the top. At least the rain of rocks had stopped. Conor spared a second to make sure the others were all still climbing, and then he made three more giant leaps. He lunged up with his arm on the last leap – and his fingers curved around the top of the cliff side.

Exhausted, he pulled himself up.

Conor yanked the Granite Ram talisman from around his neck and held it aloft to Essix. The falcon snatched it from his hand with startling quickness and carried it away to the others.

From the top of Muttering Rock, he could see the entire expanse of red and brown plains surrounding the rock formation, stretching endlessly in every direction. A faint sliver of sunlight peeked up from the eastern horizon, bloodred in color.

Conor pulled himself up to his feet. “Briggan,” he gasped, calling for his spirit animal. With a flash of light, the wolf appeared at his side, already growling. Conor’s gaze fell over the plateau he now stood upon.

It looked like something out of his nightmares, and yet also entirely unfamiliar. Red rock. Dead, crooked trees, so unlike the golden leaves he always saw drifting in his dreams. But what commanded his attention was an enormous stone temple standing in the center of the plateau, composed of a ring of towering pillars and twisted wood that looked distinctively like ancient, petrified antlers. One of the pillars was carved in the shape of an elk – Tellun’s image, he realized – as if standing permanent guard. Each pillar stretched high toward the sky, casting long shadows against the ground. In the temple’s center, trapped behind the circle of twisting antlers, was the yawning mouth of a pit. Shane and Zerif now stood beside this pit. Conor’s throat constricted.

In the waning darkness, he also made out the smooth coils of a snake, and the hulking figure of an enormous eagle. Gerathon and Halawir were here. The hackles on Briggan's back rose, and his growling grew louder. Conor searched frantically for the mighty elk too, but there was no sign of Tellun.

Conor's eyes darted to the pit. It was huge and black, an endless, yawning hole in the earth. Around the edge of the pit's mouth, Shane and Zerif had arranged all of their talismans, each spaced evenly apart. The pit looked empty.

Shane met Conor's gaze momentarily. His eyes were cold and hard – and full of triumph.

Oh, no.

Kovo had already been freed.

A dark figure crouched in front of the pit, his body illuminated by flashes of lightning. The sunrise had lightened the sky, and Conor could now make out the beast's scarlet eyes. It was an ape. A gorilla.

Kovo.

Kovo lifted his fists to his chest and pounded it twice. He vaulted onto his hind legs and roared again. Conor couldn't believe how big he was – he blocked the sun entirely. Behind Conor, the others had finally crested the cliff and looked on in shock.

Kovo smashed his arms back down to the earth, shaking the entire plateau. His mouth curved at Conor and Briggan in a slanted smile. "Ah," he said, his voice deep, angry, and ancient. "One of the Four Fallen." He glanced behind them to see Rollan, Abeke, and Meilin with their spirit animals flashing out of passive state. Essix swooped down to join Rollan. "I am glad you've returned, my brethren. I did not wish us to part on such bad terms." He glanced in disdain at the statue of Tellun behind him, then back to Conor. "I've been waiting for you to arrive."

Briggan's fangs gleamed. Conor had never seen his wolf so enraged.

Kovo laughed at Briggan's expression. Then he turned his stare back to Conor. "Thank you for answering me," the ape said.

Conor frowned. His mind swirled in confusion. "What are you talking about?" he snapped back. He glanced around the plateau again. Tellun. Where is he? He's supposed to be here! "Tellun!" he tried calling out.

Kovo's smile widened. "There's no use. Tellun is not here, boy."

"B-but ..." Conor stammered. "The visions ..."

“Tellun didn’t send those visions to you,” Kovo answered. “I did.”

Kovo did. Conor’s eyes widened. They had traveled all this way not by Tellun’s beckoning, not to stop Kovo from escaping his prison – but because Kovo himself had called them here, deceived them into it. No wonder Conor had been able to see it even when Briggan was in his dormant state, even when he should not have been able to have such dreams. Kovo had been waiting here for them to arrive, with the final talismans. The realization hit Conor hard. I should have known.

“You ...” Conor began. “You brought us here to get the last talismans.”

Kovo chuckled once. His dark eyes glinted bloodred in the light. They locked on the Granite Ram hanging around Abeke’s neck, then to the Coral Octopus around Rollan’s. “Clever boy,” he said. “I hadn’t intended you to make it all the way up Muttering Rock. Shane failed to stop you in the plains below. Ah, well. No matter. The talismans are here.”

Foiled. Deceived. Betrayed. Conor felt so helpless and ashamed.

“Don’t look so disappointed,” Kovo said, still smiling. He reared up onto his hind legs again. “I will put them all to good use.”

Then he slammed his fists into the ground.

The blow radiated out from Kovo in a ring of dust. Conor fell flat again as the entire plateau disappeared in a haze of light. Through it all, Conor could see the talismans arranged around the pit as each begin to glow a different color. Their glow grew brighter and brighter, wider and wider, until the colors all fused into one. Conor shielded his eyes from the blinding light.

Then the light vanished.

When Conor opened his eyes, the talismans around the pit were no longer there. Instead, a beautiful staff made of what looked like radiant silver wood sat in Kovo’s open palms, gleaming under the churning black clouds. The top was curled in the shape of a shepherd’s crook, a silhouette that Conor knew all too well. Sparkling white lines ran down its length. Kovo took the beautiful staff and held it high over his head, then slammed it down onto the ground. The stone pillars and twisted antlers around him trembled, then cracked. He took a deep breath.

“The Staff of Cycles,” he said reverently, “is mine.”

KOVO

KOVO HAD SENT FOR THEM. KOVO HAD TRICKED CONOR. All this effort, all they'd lost on the journey to Stetriol – the Greencloaks at the bay, the Tellun's Pride, Dorian – had been at the request of Kovo, who'd expected them to appear all along.

“We have to get out of here,” Conor suddenly said beside Abeke. He grabbed her hand and nodded at Rollan. “They'll get our talismans.”

They only managed to sprint a few steps to the edge of Muttering Rock before Halawir launched himself from his perch. He reached the edge long before they could, then spread his enormous wings, blocking out the sky. They all stumbled backward from a blast of wind. Halawir landed near the ledge, his eyes fierce and menacing.

“Where are you going?” he said in a harsh, taunting voice.

Abeke backed away from the eagle's sharp talons, then whirled around to face Kovo again. Her friends reluctantly did the same. They were trapped here. Abeke's hand tightened so hard around the Granite Ram that she could feel it digging deep grooves into her palm. Her eyes stayed focused on the silver staff that Kovo held aloft. What the staff could do, she had no idea – but it held the combined power of every talisman except for hers, the Coral Octopus, and Tellun's Platinum Elk. What would happen if the remaining talismans fused with it too? Already, the sky above them had begun to change again, the clouds rimmed with ominous purple.

A movement from Shane, who still stood with Zerif by the pit, distracted Abeke. He took several steps toward Kovo. "I've fulfilled my promise," he said. He stretched one hand out. "I brought them to you. Now, it's your turn."

A hungry light had appeared in Shane's eyes, taking over the cold triumph that Abeke had seen there moments earlier. Her hand that wasn't clutching the talisman now clenched into a tight fist. Shane was asking Kovo to hand over the staff.

Kovo cast Shane a brief look. He said nothing. Then he turned away again and nodded toward Gerathon. The serpent's tongue flicked out once, as if in agreement, and her scaly mouth curved into the semblance of a grin. The hunger on Shane's face wavered. For the first time, Abeke saw doubt there – real doubt.

"You're not worthy to rule," Kovo finally said, his deep voice rumbling. He didn't even bother looking at Shane. "Never speak of it again to me."

Shane's confusion changed to shock, then incredulity. Then, rage. It twisted his face and made him hideous. "You promised me," he snapped. "Everything I've done, all I've sacrificed." He paused in his rant to look at Gerathon. Sudden realization hit him as he studied the serpent's cold gaze.

"You ... !" Shane choked out, pointing at Gerathon. In the depths of his rage, Abeke could hear raw grief. "You killed Drina for nothing!"

Gerathon's eyes slitted as her mouth grew wide. "Not for nothing," she corrected him, looking to Zerif. "Drina believed that we served your pitiful family, when it was you who served us. You should have known, Shane, from the very beginning."

"You coward!" he snarled. "Forcing us to do your dirty work. You call yourself a Great Beast!"

Gerathon just laughed. "Careful, boy," she said. "Lest you value your life so little."

"You –"

"Do you know how painful death can be?" Gerathon hissed. Her slithering coils pushed her higher, and she stretched her neck up until she towered over them. "I can make you scream when you die, and this time, it will be for nothing.” Her fangs gleamed. “Nothing but my amusement.”

Shane couldn't seem to fathom what had just happened. He looked from Kovo to Gerathon, then back again, as if expecting something to change if he stared hard enough. In spite of everything, Abeke couldn't help feeling a twinge of pity for him. But the pity didn't last long, not when she thought back to what Shane had done to Meilin, to how many deaths he had been responsible for ... to how he had made her trust him.

No. Don't. She forced her heart to harden and hate. This is what it feels like, Shane, to be betrayed by those you trust.

Kovo turned his attention back to the Four Fallen. He hoisted the staff again. “He who controls the Staff of Cycles,” he roared, beating at his chest, “controls the Evertree. The fate of Erdas. He controls all.” He narrowed his dark red eyes at them, focusing particularly on Abeke and Rollan. “You have lost! Give me your talismans. You have no use for them any longer, and I will put them to very good use. The world needs the talismans to bind together. Hand them over, kneel to me, and I promise you mercy.”

“Like you promised Shane you would let him rule?” Rollan snapped. “You keep using that word – I don't think it means what you think it means.”

Kovo's mouth curled up as he bared his teeth. “Resist,” he roared, “and I will destroy you all.”

For a moment, no one moved.

Then Zerif stepped forward and bent his knee to Kovo. He lowered his head. Abeke watched, stunned. An oily man to the end – how quickly he turned his back on Shane, now that it seemed all was lost.

“I pledge my loyalty,” Zerif said to Kovo.

Shane let out an enraged cry. Then he called on his crocodile. It burst forth in a flash of light, front legs reared up and jaws already open – Shane grabbed one of its spikes and leaped onto its broad back. The crocodile's front legs smashed down to the ground, shaking the earth, and they lunged for Kovo.

Shane didn't even cover half the ground between himself and the ape before his crocodile suddenly halted in mid-step. Shane let out a wrenching shriek of pain. Then he fell from his crocodile's back and collapsed to the ground. He writhed. Abeke gasped.

Gerathon turned her control on Shane, forcing him back onto his feet and toward them. Abeke instinctively looked toward Meilin. As she feared, Meilin's pupils dilated and her irises faded to yellow. She shook her head violently. The color of her eyes flashed between dark and gold as she fought against Gerathon's pull. "Go!" she shouted at the others. "Don't worry about me – fight Shane and Zerif!"

"Now," Gerathon hissed. "Attack!"

Shane tried to resist, but Abeke could tell that his limbs moved of their own accord. He fixed his mindless stare on them and lunged.

"Go!" Conor suddenly shouted.

He, Rollan, and Abeke surged forward as one, their spirit animals at their sides. Conor and Briggan aimed for Shane and his crocodile, while Essix flew ahead of Rollan and opened her talons at Zerif. Zerif called his jackal – and for the first time, they saw the tawny animal emerge. It lunged for them with frightening speed. Shane aimed for Abeke, but Uraza leaped between them with an earthshaking roar. She attacked Shane's crocodile with claws extended.

Something black and white flashed in the corner of Abeke's eyes. Jhi! The panda reluctantly stayed at Meilin's side as Meilin struggled against her bonds, throwing herself at Abeke with all of her strength. Her eyes were completely yellow now, her pupils fully dilated. Abeke jumped backward. Even fighting against the control, Meilin was a formidable opponent. She kicked out at Abeke, trying to trip her, but Abeke managed to dodge it and throw Meilin to the ground. Meilin struggled wildly, unable to stop herself.

"I'm sorry," Abeke said breathlessly, "but I have to do this." Then she hit Meilin in the jaw, right where she knew she would knock the girl unconscious.

The hit landed where Abeke wanted it. Meilin's limbs went limp, and her eyes turned dazed. Abeke set her gently down, then leaped up and charged at Shane.

She had just reached him when Kovo lifted his staff and pointed it at all of them. A violent flash of light exploded from it, engulfing everyone.

Abeke halted. She threw her hands up to shield her face. Then, unbelievable pain stabbed her.

BREAKING BONDS

ROLLAN CRUMPLED TO THE GROUND WITH A CRY OF agony. His muscles felt like they were on fire. His joints cramped up. What's happening? His head clouded with a tight, painful tingling, and for a split second he felt as if he wasn't himself at all – that he was a complete stranger, and his real form was floating somewhere outside his body. For a moment, he was reminded of when he had been sick in Zhong. His thoughts flitted away as confusion clouded him. Who am I?

Nearby, he saw Uraza stumble and fall with a pained growl. Essix let out a shrill cry – her flight turned erratic. She landed with a crash, sending up a shower of dust, her wings splayed out in agony.

“Essix!” Rollan managed to shout through his own pain. He tried to crawl toward her, but another spasm of pain lanced down his legs, forcing him to curl up in a ball. Tears sprang to his eyes. Through his blurry vision, he could see that Conor and Abeke had fallen too.

Kovo roared in triumph. He stepped away from the edge of the pit, his staff still glowing in his hand, and walked toward Abeke. He's going to take the Granite Ram, Rollan thought. He struggled to get up, but his limbs felt weak and useless. He could only look on as Kovo towered over Abeke, effortlessly shoved the girl's arms aside, and opened his giant hand toward her. Rollan's eyes widened in horror. He's going to crush her.

Abeke cringed away from the enormous fingers as they reached for the talisman looped around her neck. With one vicious yank, the talisman snapped free from its rope.

“No!” Rollan managed to shout. He glanced at Essix’s struggling figure again. I have to help her! “Essix, come here!” He pointed to the spot right above his heart. Essix turned her head toward him, her eyes full of agony. Rollan wasn’t even sure that she could go into the dormant state after Kovo’s attack – but being dormant had to be better than letting her suffer like this.

Essix let out a weak cry before vanishing in a flash of light. To Rollan’s relief, she reappeared over his heart in her usual place. A small surge of energy rushed through him – for now, he felt momentarily stronger. Rollan looked toward the others.

“Use the dormant state!” he called to them.

Conor called for Briggan, and Abeke for Uraza. Each spirit animal disappeared in a flash of light. Only Meilin stayed unconscious on the ground, Jhi beside her.

Conor shook his head, as if to clear it. His expression was still contorted in pain, but the little surge of strength his spirit animal had given him allowed him to crawl up onto his knees.

Kovo lumbered to Rollan’s side and loomed over him. Rollan could only hold a weak arm up in a vain attempt to stop him before he grabbed the Coral Octopus hanging around Rollan’s neck and pulled it free. Rollan’s heart dropped.

Kovo had all of the talismans now.

The ape lifted the staff and set its point down on the ground. He tied first the Granite Ram and then the Coral Octopus around the top of the staff, using the broken chains that had once held them in place around Rollan’s and Abeke’s necks. As if in response, the earth shuddered. Rollan’s fingers raked through red dust, leaving long scratches. He gritted his teeth as pain continued to pour over him. There was nothing he could do.

“Thank you for your cooperation,” Kovo said to them, although nothing in his sneer gave any indication that he felt grateful. He patted the staff in a taunting gesture, as if daring Rollan to come retrieve it. Then he tightened his fist around it and turned his back. “Come,” he called to Halawir and Gerathon. “The Platinum Elk is all that is left.”

The Platinum Elk. Rollan struggled up as Halawir took to the skies, carrying Gerathon in his talons. Kovo disappeared over the edge of Muttering Rock, leaping into what seemed like oblivion to the ground far below.

They’d gotten away.

With Kovo’s departure, the skies changed color again, shifting from black and blue to an eerie, dark red.

“This is from my vision,” Conor said beside him, his face turned up to the sky with a stunned expression. “This was when I saw Tellun.”

But Tellun was nowhere to be seen now.

Zerif was the first to bolt. He scrambled to his feet, suddenly freed of Gerathon’s control, and called his jackal back into its dormant state. He shot a quick glance at Rollan. Then he turned away and hurried to the edge of the rock. Rollan wanted to shout at him. He wished he were strong enough to give chase. But Zerif was already gone.

Conor let out a groan nearby. “Are you okay?” he asked Rollan.

Rollan gingerly stretched his limbs. The sharp pain that had crippled him seemed like it’d started to fade now. The fog that had shrouded his mind lifted too. He gradually felt more like himself again. Rollan tested his fingers and toes, then pulled himself into a crouch.

“Yeah, I think so,” he replied. He got up laboriously. “What did Kovo do to us? The way my bond with Essix stretched ...” He paused, shuddering at the memory. “It felt like my arms getting pulled out of their sockets. I thought it was going to tear me apart. Was that ... bonding sickness?”

Conor shook his head. “I don’t know. Maybe. But whatever it was, the staff must have caused it.”

They both went to check on Meilin, who nodded weakly at them, her face crinkled in shame. Jhi ambled over to her and nuzzled her gently. At first, Meilin couldn’t seem to bring herself to look at her panda. Only when Jhi uttered a low, mournful growl and nudged Meilin with her nose did she finally turn her eyes up. Meilin put a hand on Jhi’s nose, then hugged her muzzle. Jhi stayed perfectly still. Her gesture said everything Rollan wanted to. It wasn’t her fault. None of this was.

Then they turned to Abeke.

But Abeke was already up and moving, walking past them with a grim, determined gait. She was headed toward Shane, who still lay on the ground. He'd looked so powerful while on the battlefield below – but now, after Kovo had cast him aside, he looked defeated. His eyes, flashing and furious only moments earlier, were hollow and empty. He stayed in a fetal position, his arms and legs limp.

His crocodile was gone now, back in its dormant state, and he made no effort to move. He didn't seem to care about his well-being anymore. He didn't even seem to notice Abeke approaching. Whatever spark of power that had driven him before was gone from his face, leaving behind something empty and forlorn.

At first, Rollan thought that Abeke would help him up, kindhearted even after all Shane had done to hurt them. But when she reached him, Abeke kicked him hard with her boot instead. Her heel caught him under his ribs. Shane's cry echoed out over the desert. He coughed breathlessly.

"Get up!" Abeke snapped. "I said, get up." Her voice sounded completely cold. Rollan didn't know what to make of it. He had always thought he would cheer the day when Abeke finally got her hands on Shane. But somehow, seeing her like this, merciless and vengeful, gave him little pleasure.

Still, it was hardly his place to say anything. So he watched silently with Conor and Meilin as Abeke forced Shane, swaying, to his feet. Behind them loomed Tellun's stone temple, as if the Great Elk himself looked down on the proceedings.

Abeke bent down and picked up Zerif's discarded sword, pointing it toward his neck. She narrowed her eyes at Shane.

"Come on," she said. "Fight me."

DUEL

THE LAST TIME ABEKE HAD CONFRONTED SHANE, THEY were at Greenhaven, and she'd seen him turn her kindness against her, stealing their talismans and running away like a coward. Now, as she faced him once more, all of his past betrayals came hurtling back, overwhelming her.

Shane hugging her with open arms in Samis, whispering into her hair how much he'd missed her.

Asking her to stay with him before they reached Greenhaven, claiming he wanted the others to accept him.

That twilit evening on the boat, when he'd confided in her about the loss of his sister and his fear of Gerathon ... and he'd told Abeke she was amazing.

All were false memories – humiliating reminders of her gullibility. Shane had deceived her into caring for him, sympathizing with him, pitying him.

Lies.

Abeke's anger rose with each poisonous thought. She glared at Shane's swaying, weakened figure, and then lifted Zerif's sword with one hand. She slapped Shane in his side with the dull edge. He winced, hissing in pain through his teeth.

"I'm not going to tie you down," she said furiously, "because you are already weak. I don't need to bind an enemy who's as cowardly as you." She slapped him again with the sword. “Come on. Are you scared now? Hanging your head, now that you’ve been left behind?”

Shane circled her warily while the others looked on, their uncertainty clearly written on their faces. None of Abeke’s friends seemed quite sure what to do. But Abeke didn’t pay attention to their hesitation. She barely heard them call out her name. All she saw before her was Shane.

“Abeke,” Shane said, steering clear of the range of her sword. “I’m sorry. You don’t understand how hard it’s been for me –”

The tragedy in his voice made Abeke’s anger boil over. She screamed and lunged at him. Shane tried in vain to dodge it, but the blade of her sword glanced off his shoulder, leaving a blooming red stain. He winced and hobbled away.

“I still remember when you sparred with me for the very first time,” Abeke said as she started circling again. Her hand was trembling now. “You had a pretend-assassin attack you during the match, so I’d think that it was real. I was so sure of you – even after you’d already lied to me!” The memory came back to her with stinging clarity. How ironic, she thought, that their first session was a harbinger of the betrayals to come. Abeke gritted her teeth and struck out again.

“Abeke, please!” Shane shouted as he dodged. “Listen to me!”

“Why should I?” Abeke shouted back. “You’re the Devourer! You tried to kill all of us!” Her voice grew louder and louder, until it was raw with her heartbreak. “I trusted you! I defended you! How could you?”

“You summoned Uraza!” Shane suddenly spat. He sounded furious now. Abeke was almost taken aback. “Do you ever think about that? You didn’t choose for your spirit animal to be one of the Four Fallen – you were handed a hero’s choice. How easy that is for you! What about me? Do you think I had a choice?”

“You always have a choice!”

“What if you had been me?” Shane pressed on. “What if you were the crown prince of an island prison – a nation condemned by the Greencloaks for the crimes of their ancestors? What would you do?”

He’s baiting you again, Abeke thought. He’s good at it. She steeled herself against his words as she attacked again, purposely using the same move she’d used on him during their very first training session together. Her hands were shaking, despite her best efforts to steady them.

Shane stumbled backward, still talking. “I watched the bonding sickness destroy my mother and father, and turn my sister into someone I didn’t recognize. Did you ever have to go through that? Spirit animals were a curse in Stetriol! The Greencloaks decided we weren’t worthy of their precious Nectar. So they abandoned us without a second thought. Did they abandon you? Did you have any idea that Stetriol even existed?”

Abeke sliced at him again with her sword, catching him this time in his side. He winced and gritted his teeth. “Then my family was approached by Zerif, who brought us the secret location of Gerathon’s talisman. With it came the Bile – the only cure for bonding sickness that we’d ever seen.” His voice grew louder. “Don’t you understand? I thought I was saving my people, Abeke! I truly, honestly thought –”

Abeke growled. She charged Shane with Zerif’s sword pointed forward.

To her surprise, Shane paused. His tense stance suddenly relaxed, and he shook his head. “Just do it,” he murmured. Then he held both of his arms out to either side, leaving himself completely open for Abeke to attack.

Abeke couldn’t stop – she twisted the sword at the last moment, striking him hard in the chest with the pommel. The impact knocked him off his feet. He fell to the ground without even a cry. Abeke stood over him, breathing hard.

Shane coughed. He kept his head bowed this time, and his hair fell over his face. “I thought ...” He trailed off for a second. “I wanted to be worthy. It’s so easy for you to feel that way. You were chosen for greatness. What about the rest of us? I only wanted the same.”

To Abeke’s dismay, she felt her heart waver. She narrowed her eyes.

Shane finally looked up at her. “I’m sorry,” he said. “I’m so sorry, Abeke. For everything. You meant so much to me – you were my only true friend. I remember everything about you ever since we first met. It killed me to have to betray you, because I didn’t want to lose you. I sacrificed so much ... my sister ...” He winced visibly. “But I had no choice. I’m bound to the Bile, just as helplessly as your friend Meilin.”

Don’t. Abeke closed her eyes and pushed his words out of her head. She thought back to Shane’s cold eyes, the way he had violated their trust at Greenhaven and imprisoned Meilin. All of the horrible things he'd done. How did he manage to sway her like this every time? What's wrong with me?

Abeke lowered her sword. The fight had suddenly gone out of her, but when she spoke again, her voice still came out cold.

"Well, I'm sorry too, because you mean nothing to me," Abeke said to Shane.

Shane opened his mouth to speak, but then closed it again. He stared at her for a long moment. Finally he looked away. His mouth tightened into a line.

Conor appeared with a bit of rope, and Abeke looked at him gratefully. He tied Shane's arms tightly behind his back. Shane didn't bother to struggle.

As Conor dragged Shane to his feet, the ground began to tremble again. Abeke paused, then looked to Conor, who had focused all of his attention on the shifting sky. A great wind whipped at them, pushing the clouds westward and stretching them into long dark streaks.

At first, Abeke thought that the shaking earth might be an earthquake. But as it went on, she realized that it felt less like an earthquake than it did ... footsteps. Deep, mighty footsteps. She glanced at Shane in case he was up to something, but he seemed as startled as she was.

Conor was the one who looked toward the towering circular stone temple surrounding Kovo's prison, where a strange glow had begun to emerge from the empty recesses of the prison.

"What is it?" Abeke asked.

Conor didn't turn to look at her, but his voice sounded hushed with reverence. "He's here," he replied.

The ground shook with each thundering footstep. The sound seemed to come from everywhere at once. Abeke's eyes widened as she saw the pillars and antlers start to crumble. One pillar fell against another, toppling it, setting off a chain reaction that sent the stones crashing to the ground. The antlers, too, broke into pieces and rained down.

A blinding flash of light engulfed them for an instant. Abeke shielded her eyes with her arms. When she opened them again, something stood before the destroyed temple. Her mouth dropped.

It was an enormous elk. His fur did not look brown, as Abeke had imagined it, but instead glittered gold and silver and white. His majestic antlers branched toward the sky, and his head was lifted in a regal stance. Wind gusted all around him, but he seemed untouched by it. He walked slowly toward them. Each time his hooves hit the earth, the ground trembled.

Hanging from within the cage of his antlers shone a heavy, round talisman made from platinum, forged in the figure of an elk, its own antlers molding into the shape of the sun around it.

What captured Abeke most of all were the Great Elk's eyes – they seemed dark at first glance, but when she continued to stare, she could see red and gold, fire and earth and wind and sky, like looking into the soul of the land itself. A shudder went through her.

Tellun had arrived.

TELLUN

TELLUN WAS, BY FAR, THE LARGEST OF ALL THE GREAT Beasts. Rollan fell to his knees before the mighty elk, unable to look away. For once, he was at a loss for words.

“Tellun,” Conor gasped out nearby.

The elk looked back at them in silence. Rollan could hardly bear his gaze – it was the gaze of something that had walked the earth far, far longer than Rollan ever had, that had seen the ages come and go. He swallowed hard. “Essix,” he whispered, calling her out of the dormant state. She needs to see this. With a flash of light, Essix reappeared and flew toward the temple ruins with a cry that sounded to Rollan like surprise. Nearby, Conor and Abeke released Briggan and Uraza. Both crouched before Tellun, silent and still.

Tellun’s eyes finally fell upon Meilin’s figure, where she lay wincing from Abeke’s earlier blow. Then he looked toward Shane. The elk bowed his head once. His antlers seemed lit from within by an ethereal fire.

Meilin and Shane let out a simultaneous gasp.

“Meilin!” Rollan shouted automatically, rushing toward her. The gasp sounded like one of terrible pain. But when he reached her, it was as if the fog that had clouded her eyes was suddenly gone.

“Meilin?” he said again, hesitantly this time.

Meilin blinked, unsure of herself. She frowned. Then she glanced at Tellun with awe. She held up her hands, studying them, and started to laugh.

“It’s gone!” she exclaimed, looking at Rollan and then at the others. Her face glowed with joy.

“Gone?” Abeke said, breaking into a grin. “You mean – the Bile?”

An incredulous laugh escaped Meilin. “I think the Bile is completely gone. I don’t know how I know, but ... I can’t feel it anymore!” Beside her, Jhi made a happy, grunting sound in her throat.

Rollan stared in shock. It wasn’t until Tellun inclined his head toward them that he broke into a grin and let out a whoop. Conor and Abeke rushed over and wrapped Meilin in a giant hug. She threw her head back and laughed. The sound filled Rollan’s heart with light – how long it’d been since he’d heard her laugh like this! He laughed along with her as they all hugged. Behind them, Tellun looked calmly on.

“I can’t believe you’re back,” Rollan exclaimed as Meilin paused in her laughter long enough to look at him. He raised a mischievous eyebrow at her. “I’ve really missed making fun of you all the time.”

Meilin punched his arm in mock protest. Rollan laughed, then threw his arms around her and hugged her fiercely. She hugged him back. A weight lifted off his chest, and for an instant, Rollan forgot everything they still had to accomplish. This moment, at least, was perfect.

He pulled away long enough to kiss her right on the lips.

It took him a second to realize what just happened. The two jumped away from each other. Meilin’s eyes widened. Rollan flushed red from head to toe. What was he thinking? It seemed like such a natural gesture that he could barely remember what made him do it.

“I-I’m sorry,” he started to stammer out. “I just –”

Then Meilin smiled. She fiddled with the sash at her waist. “I missed you too,” she said, suddenly shy. She started to laugh again, and Rollan did too, running a hand bashfully through his hair. For once, he had no good joke ready. Beside them, Conor and Abeke looked on with amused expressions. Even Essix, who stayed perched on the ruins of the temple, fluffed her neck feathers up into a quizzical appearance and chirped. Jhi just looked as serene as always.

Shane stood apart from the group, head bowed silently, with his hands tied behind him. Rollan couldn't read his expression, but it was obvious that the Bile had been lifted from him too. When he thought no one was looking, he lifted his head to the sky, closed his eyes, and breathed in deeply ... as if for the first time.

"We have to stop Kovo," Conor said as they now turned back to Tellun. "He has all of our talismans now. The only one he doesn't have is yours." At that, he nodded at the Platinum Elk. "We have no idea where he's gone."

Tellun towered over them all, his antlers catching the light. "Kovo seeks the birthplace of all life," he replied in a deep, echoing rumble.

"The ... birthplace of all life?" Meilin asked. Her hand was entwined with Rollan's.

Tellun bowed his head once. Then he turned to look north, searching for something far beyond the horizon. "The Evertree."

The word itself sent an electric shudder through Rollan, a strange tremor, as if the very earth had spoken. "The Evertree?" Rollan whispered. Somehow, he felt it was a word meant to be whispered, something ancient and sacred.

Tellun took a single step closer to them. "When the world was very new, there existed only the sky, the water, the air, and the earth. From this new world emerged the Evertree. Some say her seed was a falling star, while others say it was forged in the mountains by the heat of the world. Her branches reached up to the heavens and her roots burrowed deep into the soil of the land. Through those roots, she breathed life into the world. The Great Beasts and our talismans were born from the Evertree. Each of us protects part of her power; it is why we guard our talismans so fiercely. The Evertree is our mother, the source of the bond between man and animal, the very soul of us – and of all living creatures. Of you."

Tellun paused to bow his head in reverence. A tragic note entered his voice. "You have all now felt the earth shudder – the storms in Greenhaven, the poisoning of the seas, the blizzards in Nilo. The Evertree's roots are connected deeply to the balance of life. As she trembles from the approach of darkness and destruction, so does the entire world tremble."

So that was why the world had seen such imbalance lately. Rollan tried to imagine what a life-giving tree would look like. "And Kovo is heading there now?” he asked. “What will happen once he reaches it?”

Tellun lowered his head in respect to Jhi, Briggan, Essix, and Uraza. “The Evertree was wounded during the last great war. Her soul was injured by Kovo, with a staff made of only half of our talismans. This was before the Four Fallen gave their lives to protect Erdas. She has never healed. This injury is what gave rise to the bonding sickness. Now, Kovo has another Staff of Cycles, far more complete than his last one. Even without my talisman, the staff will give him the power to call all of the Great Beasts to the Evertree. If he obtains mine as well, then the staff will give him the power to control every living being in Erdas. He will rule over all.”

Kovo, ruling Erdas. Rollan shivered.

To his surprise, Tellun shook his head so that the Platinum Elk slid to hang on one of his antlers. He pointed his antlers at Conor, waiting for him to take the talisman. “I entrust you all, and the Four Fallen, with my talisman. It will be drawn to the others, just as we are being called to the Evertree by Kovo. I can feel the pull already. Should something happen to me, I want to know that the talisman lies in your grasp, not mine. Kovo’s power is not something to underestimate. We must stop him now, or he will control all of us.”

Conor reached out in the silence and took the talisman from Tellun’s antlers. Rollan stared at it, wondering what would befall them now.

Tellun met the gazes of the Four Fallen again. “The balance among the Great Beasts has been shaken forever. There is no going back.” He closed his eyes. “Our time may be coming to an end.”

Conor’s prophetic words came back to Rollan in a flash. Our spirit animals may not survive this war. The thought of ending his bond with Essix was so overwhelming that Rollan wanted to double over in pain. As Tellun’s words sunk in for everyone, the sky continued to shift. Lightning streaked quietly along the horizon, warning of a distant storm, and an electric tension hung in the air. What little of the morning sun that had shone was now entirely covered by clouds.

Tellun lifted his head and sniffed the air once. “Kovo is calling,” he said. “He is summoning the Great Beasts to the Evertree now.”

REDEMPTION

WHEN MEILIN HAD FIRST BEEN AFFLICTED BY THE BILE, its chains had been so insidious that she didn't even know they were there, tying her to Gerathon. But now that Tellun had freed her, she felt as if she'd taken a deep breath of the freshest air. Like she had dived into a cool, crystal clear lake.

And then Rollan had kissed her. A real kiss.

It'd lasted barely a second, but she couldn't stop blushing and smiling, in spite of everything.

Only when Tellun said that the Great Beasts' time might be coming to an end did her smile waver. She took a step closer to her panda, and Jhi uttered a comforting grunt in the back of her throat. Jhi. Guilt welled up again in Meilin's chest. She had taken Jhi's presence for granted so many times – but the thought of losing her entirely, especially now that they were both freed from Gerathon's control? Meilin's heart twisted painfully.

Tellun focused on each of the Four Fallen. He narrowed his eyes. "You do not feel Kovo's pull," he finally said in his deep rumble. "Your original severance from the Evertree has made you immune to Kovo's calling." He nodded thoughtfully. "You all once gave your lives in order to save Erdas. I must now call on you to put yourselves in peril once more, to stop Kovo from succeeding."

A hush fell over them. Meilin looked on, heart in her throat. She wondered for a moment if their spirit animals would answer Tellun's plea.

Then Briggan took a step forward, his fur shining, and bowed his head before the Great Elk. Pledging his dedication. Meilin's eyes widened. He would give his life again?

Essix let out a piercing shriek. Jhi, too, turned to Meilin, and Meilin felt her heart lift in comfort. Jhi's eyes were warm and full of wisdom, the look of the wise earth guarding her wards, the tree offering shelter from the storm, the bonfire chasing away the cold. It was the gaze of a mother. Meilin felt tears well in her eyes. She didn't want to lose Jhi.

Only Uraza pawed the ground in disapproval, leaving grooved claw marks in the dirt. Her growl sounded suspicious and scathing, the hints of a deep bitterness apparent.

Tellun bowed his head, as if understanding. His antlers gleamed. "I apologize, Uraza," he replied, "for not standing with you all during the last war. It has always been my hope to interfere as little as possible in the natural order. But I give you my word. I will stand with you to the end."

Uraza looked wary, her violet eyes flashing. A long moment passed. Finally, she nodded once to Tellun. Then she joined the others in bowing her head.

As the Four Fallen pledged their dedication, Meilin noticed something else happening. Briggan, Essix, Jhi, and Uraza looked larger than usual – paws wider, legs taller, tails longer, talons sharper. They looked, in fact, closer to how they must have once been before they gave their lives. Behind each of them shimmered a ghostly aurora that resembled their former selves: towering, regal silhouettes. Meilin shivered with delight at the ghost of Jhi's Great Beast form – the gentle, round panda she knew had once looked like an enormous, fierce warrior, a hulking giant that radiated respect. The shape gleamed and glistened behind Jhi, changing colors underneath the dark sky.

In the midst of the overwhelming display, a tiny movement at the corner of Meilin's vision caught her attention. It was Shane. As Tellun spoke, Shane had stayed standing at a distance from them all, unmoving. Now he took a step toward them.

Meilin thought he might be moving to attack. "Stop!" she called out, pointing at him.

Shane stopped walking at Meilin's shout. He gave her a calm look and shook his head. If his hands weren't still tied, he likely would have lifted them in surrender. "I didn't mean to alarm you," he said. His jaw was set in a resolute gesture. "I want to come too."

"Not so fast," Abeke snapped. "This is another one of your lies."

"Yeah," Rollan added. "I don't think you're in a position to make demands, Shane."

"But what do we do with him?" Meilin asked, studying Shane. How strange. Not long ago, he'd seemed like such a threatening opponent. Now, he simply stood there and gave them a level look.

"I can help you," he said. "I know things that you don't."

Abeke scowled. Rollan raised an eyebrow. "Forgive us if we're a little skeptical about your intentions," he said sarcastically. Shane's expression didn't change.

Conor shook his head. "He's right. He knows more about Kovo, Gerathon, and Halawir than all of us." He took a deep breath. "I think Shane should come."

Meilin and Rollan both jerked their heads toward Conor in surprise.

"What?" Meilin said.

"You want him to come with us?" Rollan added.

"Yes," Conor repeated, his voice firm. "This is his mess in the first place. He needs to help us fix what he started."

Meilin kept her voice as reasonable as she could. "Shane is a traitor," she said. Her eyes went to Abeke, who had crossed her arms and was regarding Shane with a wary look. "Abeke, maybe you should make the call."

Abeke was quiet for a moment. Then she lifted her head higher. "I agree with Conor. Shane should come with us. Who knows what will happen if we leave him here? He might escape again. If he comes with us, at least we can keep an eye on him." She turned to Shane. Her voice became scathing. "If you're remotely genuine about anything you said to me earlier, then you'll help us track down Kovo and stop him."

Something about the thought of striking back at Kovo seemed to light a spark in Shane's eyes again. It was a small spark, a fraction of what had once burned there, but it was a light all the same. His eyes narrowed.

“I’ll kill Kovo myself,” he said.

Tellun stepped between them, quieting everyone. He turned his head toward Shane and held his gaze. Shane trembled as he looked into Tellun’s unwavering eyes.

“Shane will come with us,” Tellun finally said. “We need all the help we can muster.”

Conor looked at Meilin and Rollan. “We’ll be careful,” he reassured them. “We’ll keep him tied tightly up.” He narrowed his eyes. “Don’t worry. I haven’t forgotten what he’s done either.”

Rollan sighed, but when Essix bowed her head in deference to Tellun, he threw his hands up and shrugged. “Fine. He comes with us.”

Meilin looked at Abeke, who tightened her jaw and walked toward Shane. Anger bubbled in Meilin’s stomach, and she told herself silently that she would still make him pay for what he’d done to her and the others.

Abeke stopped right in front of Shane. “So,” she said. “You want to be worthy? Well, now’s your chance.”

THE FINAL BATTLE

THE SIDE OF MUTTERING ROCK THAT THEY HAD CLIMBED up was sheer and steep, but the opposite side sloped like a mountain, revealing a large expanse of land that ended with the white foam of the seashore. As they made their way down, Conor shot an apologetic smile at Meilin and Abeke, who still didn't look thrilled with their new companion. Shane stumbled along behind Tellun, tied to the elk with a thick length of rope. His hands were bound tightly behind him, done by Abeke and Meilin. He walked in silence, with his head down.

"Where is the Evertree?" Conor asked Tellun as he traveled beside the mighty elk.

"The Evertree grows in the place where all life began," Tellun explained. "It marks the piece of land that first emerged from the oceans."

Where all life began. Nearby, Abeke turned in interest. "Yes! We have many tales about the first land," she piped up. "Chinwe used to say that Nilo was the firstborn, birthed from the fires in the world's belly."

Tellun gave her a wise nod. "You are right, Abeke. Nilo is the First Lands, the origin of all life." Conor saw Abeke puff up a little with pride.

"But we're in Stetriol right now," Meilin said. Rollan lifted an eyebrow at her obvious statement, but she just nudged him in the ribs.

"Yeah," Conor added. "Our ship, the Tellun's Pride, sank as we tried to dock in one of Stetriol's bays. How are we going to get to Nilo?"

"We will walk there," Tellun replied.

Rollan let out a grunt of disbelief. "I'm sorry," he said. "For a moment, I thought you said we were going to walk from Stetriol – the island continent – to Nilo."

"How is that possible?" Conor asked.

Tellun's antlers gleamed. "In the earliest days, when the world was very new, the oceans sat lower and left more of our lands uncovered. Conor, did your ship encounter the jagged rocks lining Stetriol's bay?"

Conor nodded.

"Those jagged teeth first existed when the oceans were low and Stetriol was young. They were called the Jaws of the Underland. The ocean swallowed them up after several millennia, but now they have returned. All of the things you have seen happening around the world – earthquakes, storms, blizzards – are turning the world back to how it looked in those early days."

Suddenly Conor understood what Tellun was saying. "In the old days, there was a way to walk from Stetriol to Nilo, wasn't there?"

Tellun paused to nod toward the ocean in the distance. "Yes. Long ago, a narrow land bridge connected northern Stetriol to southern Nilo. Now, this bridge has once again reappeared."

At that, Rollan sighed dramatically. "Oh, good to know. I wish it had reappeared a little faster, so that we could've taken that to Stetriol instead of nearly dying in those Jaws while sailing here."

As they traveled down from Muttering Rock and toward the ocean, Conor started to see what Tellun was talking about. Far along the horizon, waves crashed against a tiny strip of new land – it barely peeked out of the water, but even from here, Conor could see its uneven rock pushing against the sky. It connected to the Stetriol mainland.

"How far away is Nilo from here?" Conor asked. He was a bit too embarrassed to ask if he could actually walk from one continent to another.

But Tellun just blinked at him. It was strange to see a hint of mischief on such a reverent Great Beast's expression. "How would you all like a lift?" he said.

By a lift, Tellun meant a ride on his back. And by a ride on his back, Tellun meant that each step he took made the ground below them rush by, as if they were all carried forward by some magical force.

All of them – Conor, Abeke, Meilin, Rollan, and even Shane – could fit comfortably on the Great Elk’s back with plenty of room to spare. To Conor, it felt like riding on the back of a mountain – like he was close enough to touch the sky. The wind whipped against their faces as Tellun led them off of Stetriol and onto the narrow land bridge that carved a path through the ocean. Conor couldn’t help throwing his head back, closing his eyes, and letting the wind comb through his hair.

The land bridge wasn’t perfect. Essix, the only one of their spirit animals that stayed out of dormant state, flew ahead, shrieking warnings whenever she saw places where the rocks were still partially covered by the ocean, leaving paths as narrow as Conor was tall. The rocks here were slippery and wet. But Tellun never seemed to slow or stumble. He walked on, serene and mystical, and the earth beneath them flew past. Sometimes, the rocks sat so low in the water that they couldn’t see them at all. It appeared as if they were walking on the ocean, with nothing beneath them but their own reflections mirrored back on the surface of shining glass.

As Stetriol became a thin strip along the horizon behind them, Conor’s heart began to beat more rapidly. Something about the earth here pulsed with new life, like the heart of a giant creature. Conor found himself constantly searching for the first signs of Nilo.

The clouds cleared as the hours dragged into the afternoon. They traveled so quickly on Tellun’s back that by the time the sun started to set, bathing the ocean in golden light, Conor saw the telltale silhouette of land rising along the horizon. He pointed at it.

“Look!” he exclaimed. “Nilo.”

All of them – except Shane – let out a whoop. When Conor looked over his shoulder, he saw Abeke take a deep breath. “Home,” she murmured under her breath.

The clouds had started to gather again, turning darker with each passing second as the sun dipped into the water. The wind picked up too, whipping their cloaks out behind them. Conor squinted at the approaching land. He hadn't seen this side of Nilo before – or perhaps the changing world had shifted it into something unrecognizable. The land bridge began to slope out of the water, until they were now suspended a good twenty feet above the ocean. Sheer cliffs stretched on either side of Nilo. Conor tried not to think about how high they were.

But, most noticeably, Conor could see an enormous, craterlike formation looming ahead, not far from where the land bridge connected with the mainland.

“We are drawing near,” Tellun said, his low voice sending a rumble through everyone.

Fat drops of rain started to fall right as they reached Nilo. Tellun began traveling up narrow paths that wended along the crater's edge. The air was colder here, and Conor had to wrap his green cloak more tightly around his shoulders. The trees began to dwindle until they disappeared altogether, leaving nothing but low shrubs, yellow grasses, and bare rock along the path. As they climbed higher, Conor could see the land bridge winding back toward Stetriol like a slender snake through the ocean.

The sky behind them looked gray and threatening. Conor hadn't been able to make it all out from the ground, but from this higher vantage point, he could see that the clouds streaked in ominous lines from Stetriol all the way to where they were in Nilo, gathering in swirling circles over their heads. He shivered.

As they crested the top of the crater, Conor realized that it was the remnants of what must have been the most massive volcano that ever existed. His jaw dropped at the sight. Once upon a time, this volcano would have been a formidable sight, raining lava and ash on its surroundings before collapsing in on itself in a spectacular display. Now, high from his new vantage point on top of the volcano's edge, Conor looked down on the inside of the ancient, collapsed crater and saw a huge expanse of lush green land.

Tellun spoke in the silence. “You are now on sacred ground,” he said. “This is the birthplace of all life. Only the Great Beasts can find this place.”

The clouds overhead had turned even darker, and lightning streaked at the edges of the crater. Conor's eyes shifted to a single tree standing tall in the center of the crater. He knew immediately what he was looking at. His eyes widened.

“The Evertree.” His voice came out a hoarse whisper.

It was taller than any tree Conor had ever seen in his life. It shimmered under the dark sky, glowing as if from within, a rainbow of silver and gold. Its branches reached up to the skies in an enormous canopy of shimmering leaves. Its twisting silver trunk was at least a dozen times as wide as Tellun’s antlers. Pure white fruit hung from the Evertree’s branches. Conor could hardly breathe as he took in the sight.

The origin of all life.

A rumble of what sounded like thunder shook the crater. They all startled at the sound. Meilin glanced back at Conor with raised eyebrows. “What was that?” she said.

“Thunder?” Rollan piped up, distracted. He couldn’t take his eyes off the Evertree either.

The rumble sounded again. This time it was louder. There, standing below the Evertree’s mighty branches, was a dark shape. A jolt of fear lanced through Conor. “No,” he said, shaking his head. “It’s Kovo’s roar.”

The ape lifted the staff high over his head. This time, his roar was unmistakable – it pierced the air and brought goose bumps out on Conor’s arms. When he looked closer, he noticed Gerathon’s serpent body coiled beside Kovo’s, and Halawir perched in the branches of the Evertree. Even from this distance, they looked enormous and forbidding, more so than during their last confrontation on Muttering Rock.

But as large as they loomed, the Evertree dwarfed them all. Somehow, this gave Conor the bit of strength that he needed.

Tellun lowered his neck so that they could all slide off. Shane, still tied up, landed on the ground with an undignified roll. He grunted. Conor picked himself up and called for Briggan. With a flash of light, the wolf appeared at his side.

“What should we do?” Conor asked Tellun.

The elk kept his eyes fixed on the Evertree. “We answer Kovo’s call,” he replied. One of his hooves stepped forward, kicking up dust.

“We ... answer his call?” Conor asked. He looked around at the others. None of them seemed to feel the pull of Kovo’s summon.

Tellun fixed him with a steady gaze. “Come.” Then he began to head down.

Meilin and Abeke called their spirit animals out too, and Essix soared over Rollan. As Tellun made his way down into the crater, the others followed, spreading out until they were all several dozen feet away from one another. Conor looked at Briggan as they walked. The wolf’s blue eyes stayed locked on the Evertree and the figures of Kovo and Gerathon underneath it. His muscles were tense, and the hackles on his back were up. Conor’s gaze shifted back to Tellun. They were answering Kovo’s call ... they were approaching him, right out in the open. What did Tellun have in mind?

Kovo turned to face them as they drew closer. He paused in his roar for a moment, then puffed his chest out arrogantly. Conor thought he could see a sneer spreading across the ape’s face. Kovo lifted the Staff of Cycles higher, then pounded his chest with one mighty fist. He slammed the staff into the earth.

The entire land trembled at the blow. Conor stumbled, barely keeping himself from falling. The sound seemed to reverberate all across Erdas, deep into the world’s core.

At first, nothing happened. Then the ground trembled again. Conor looked to the crater’s horizon. What had Kovo done?

The tremors came one after another, deep and slow. Footsteps.

And as Conor looked on, dark silhouettes appeared all along the far edges of the crater, each spaced apart from the other, all facing in toward the Evertree and Kovo. The tremors came in rhythmic, thundering steps, like the beating of war drums. Conor began to recognize the approaching silhouettes.

Rumfuss. Suka. Dinesh. Conor exchanged a startled glance with the others as they recognized the towering shapes of the great boar, polar bear, and elephant. Arax too, and Cabaro, and Mulop, the octopus’s huge tentacles sliding a wide path across the ground. A Great Swan flew beside them, her white wings expanded in a bright canopy of feathers, and Conor caught his breath at his very first sight of Ninani herself.

The Great Beasts had all arrived.

“Keep going,” Tellun said in a low voice. Conor pressed his hand tightly into Briggan’s neck fur, took a deep breath, and focused on the Evertree as they moved forward in step with the other Great Beasts.

As the Evertree came into better view, Conor noticed that one side of the tree had a large, dark blemish on its otherwise pristine silver trunk. The blemish was twice as big as he was, a region of black, rotting wood that seemed to be slowly eating away at everything surrounding it. An indescribable sadness sank into Conor's chest at the sight. So, this was the consequence of Kovo trying to control the tree with a partial staff. Even though it had happened long ago, the wound still looked fresh and festering.

Closer and closer came the Four Fallen and the other Great Beasts. Now their footsteps were so strong that Conor could barely keep his balance with each thundering reverberation. He had never seen all of the beasts together in one setting – dusk extended their shadows into long, endless streaks across the land, and the approaching darkness cut their enormous figures into shades of stark black and white, making them look even bigger than they were.

Keep moving, Conor reminded himself. Briggan, Uraza, and Jhi strode steadily onward, their focus unbroken. Maybe Tellun was wrong. What if they were feeling Kovo's summon too?

Finally each Great Beast stopped a short distance away from the Evertree, forming a ring around where Kovo, Gerathon, and Halawir had gathered beneath its canopy. Tellun halted too. Conor stood between him and Briggan, his hand still buried in the wolf's fur. His breath came in shallow gasps. Without the tremor of footsteps, the plains fell eerily quiet, the silence punctured only by the crackle of lightning and rumbles of thunder overhead. An icy wind whipped around them. None of the Great Beasts uttered a word. They stood frozen, the ominous totems of an endgame.

Kovo moved first. He pivoted where he stood, staring at each of his brethren in turn. His stare stopped on Tellun. Under the dark sky, the ape's eyes flashed scarlet. His gaze shifted hungrily to the talisman that hung from Conor's neck. The final piece of the puzzle.

"The era of our power is coming to an end," Kovo finally shouted. The wind carried his words across the plain. "The world is in upheaval. You have all seen it. I have seen it. Once, long ago, we stood against each other and let mankind destroy what should have been ours by right – the control of this world. We allowed four of our own to perish." Briggan tensed beside Conor, and nearby,

Uraza uttered a low growl. Conor's jaw tightened too. Kovo and Gerathon had been the ones responsible for the Four Fallen's deaths, after all. "Now, the end of this old era has come to pass. That is why I have summoned us all here today for a Grand Council."

He paused to hoist the Staff of Cycles again. He looked up at the Evertree's gleaming branches. "But know this!" he said, pointing the staff at each of the beasts. "With the end of this era, we can begin another. A better era. An era where we are truly great again. Everything I have done – everything – has been with the goal of bringing us all to our former glory. When I rule Erdas, I will ensure that all will bow to us. Our power will be unsurpassed. We should not war against each other. We should unite. Join me in this. We will be true Great Beasts!"

Conor listened in silence. His eyes wandered to the others. None of the Great Beasts made a move or a sound. No, Conor thought desperately. They're listening to Kovo.

Kovo turned back to Tellun. He brought himself up to his full height, then nodded once at the elk. "Stand with me, Tellun!" the ape roared. "You once imprisoned me, but I am now free. Don't you see how much power is here for us to take?" He stretched out one huge palm. His eyes narrowed at Tellun's talisman. "Give me the Platinum Elk," he commanded. "You know what a complete Staff of Cycles can mean for us. You know you must do this, for all of Erdas. For the Great Beasts."

For a long moment, Kovo and Tellun just stared at one another. Conor's heart began to pound. What are you waiting for? he thought fiercely at the Great Elk, wishing he could hear him.

Then, to Conor's shock, Tellun lowered his head. "What –" Conor stammered, not knowing what to say next. Tellun didn't reply. Instead, he let his antlers touch Conor's chest, right where the Platinum Elk talisman now hung.

Kovo's eyes widened, and a slow smile started to spread across his face. Tellun was going to take back the talisman and give it to him!

"No!" Conor shouted. He couldn't let this happen. The Platinum Elk was the only thing left that Kovo didn't have. With this, all would be lost. Conor's eyes shot to Tellun's, and he put his hand on Tellun's lowered muzzle. "Please –"

Conor begged. Meilin, Rollan, and Abeke looked on in horror. “Don’t do it. I don’t know what Kovo has done to persuade you, but you have to fight it. You —”

Tellun only met Conor’s desperate gaze with his quiet one. Conor felt as if he could see straight into the Great Beast’s soul. Tellun still didn’t speak. The rest of Conor’s plea withered away on his tongue.

Tellun lowered his head again. He made no move to take the talisman away from Conor.

Kovo’s smile wavered.

“Everything lies with you now,” Tellun said to Conor in a low, rumbling voice. He nodded once. “Protect it.”

Conor couldn’t think. He couldn’t react. All he could do was clutch the Platinum Elk close and look on as Tellun turned toward Kovo. Kovo’s fading smile twisted into the picture of rage. Tellun lowered his antlers again.

As Kovo opened his mouth to utter a furious roar, the Great Elk charged at the Evertree.

Blinding light exploded from the tree as Tellun struck it. An enormous force threw Conor clear off his feet. He flew backward, landing heavily in the grass. The brilliant light was everywhere – he couldn’t see anything. The ground beneath him trembled violently. An earthquake.

Then the light vanished. Spots swam before Conor’s eyes. He pushed himself up, blinking, and immediately reached out for Briggan. His hand made contact with familiar fur. As his vision cleared, Conor saw that Tellun had disappeared. All that remained was a new dark mark on the Evertree’s trunk where Tellun had struck it. Conor’s mouth hung open. A feeling of indescribable pain pierced him.

Tellun had never intended to give Kovo the Platinum Elk. Instead of letting Kovo have what he wanted, Tellun sacrificed himself.

Tellun had died.

Before Conor could react, he saw Rumfuss the Boar stamp the ground with his hooves. Huge clouds of dust whipped into the air. He, too, looked toward Conor and the other Four Fallen, exchanging a quiet, knowing look with them. Then he snorted loudly at Kovo.

“For ... Erdas!” he roared. He charged at the Evertree.

“No!” Kovo managed to call, but it was too late – Rumfuss hit the tree with a force like thunder, shaking the entire crater with the impact, and vanished in a flash of light. Another dark wound appeared on the Evertree. A shower of golden leaves fell as the tree shuddered.

Dinesh, too, stepped forward and charged at the Evertree, letting out one last, enormous trumpet of his trunk before sacrificing himself. Then Cabaro the Lion let out a bone-shaking roar and charged at the Evertree too. His impact knocked Conor to his knees. When Meilin hurried over to help him up, he saw that Cabaro was gone and the Evertree had a new wound. Even Cabaro, the vain and cowardly! He felt a swell of sadness and kinship.

Kovo pounded his chest in rage and snarled at the other Great Beasts. “Such fools!” he shouted. “All of you! I could have handed true power back to all of us – I could have made sure we ruled together! Do you not know that our era is waning?” He roared as Suka the Polar Bear stepped forward. “Stop!” His voice had a note of anguish in it that surprised Conor.

Meilin met Conor’s eyes with a wild, startled expression. “The Great Beasts are sacrificing themselves!” she shouted. “So that Kovo cannot control them! We have to help!” Beside her, Jhi pawed the ground and uttered a long, low, pandalike cry. It was the first time Conor had ever seen her in a battle pose.

This snapped Conor out of his shock. “Right!” he replied. He touched Meilin’s arm and looked at Rollan and Abeke. “Briggan and I will aim for Kovo,” he said. “Get Halawir and Gerathon! This is our last chance!”

The four nodded in unison. No time to waste. Conor pulled out the ax at his belt. Briggan bared his teeth at Kovo. He and Conor charged as one.

Abeke and Meilin lunged for Gerathon, with Uraza and Jhi right beside them. Rollan called Essix as Halawir prepared to take off from the Evertree’s branches. They all seemed to move in a slow, blurred motion. From the corners of his eyes, Conor saw Suka change her course in mid-gallop from the Evertree to Gerathon. The Evertree’s branches glimmered behind her towering shape. Conor veered to one side and crouched low as the bear charged past him. His hair whipped over his face and he turned his eyes up, mouth open, to see one of her enormous paws soar over his head. The rest of her was shadowed, a titan of a silhouette with a bright glowing eye high above the earth. Then her paw crashed down to the ground, throwing Conor onto his back. He scrambled to his feet again.

The other Great Beasts were on the move too. Arax the Ram's horns looked nearly big enough to tear the Evertree down. His hooves beat against the earth, furious and heavy, ripping up entire fields of grass as he charged ahead. Kovo tensed as the ram hurtled toward him. At the last moment, Kovo sidestepped with surprising speed. He grabbed Arax's horns and twisted hard. Their shadows engulfed Conor and everything around him. The two giants toppled to the ground with a shudder, the force strong enough to crack the earth.

Halawir took off into the air – but Mulop swung his giant tentacles up. One of them caught Halawir before he could fly higher. The giant eagle shrieked in fury as the enormous suctioned rings on the tentacle wrapped around his talons, trapping him in midair. Essix dove for him, a small, stark figure against Halawir's maelstrom of beating wings. The falcon extended her talons and hurled into Halawir with an earsplitting shriek. One of Essix's claws hooked into Halawir's left wing, throwing the eagle off balance. Halawir lunged at Essix with his gleaming, razor-sharp beak – the beak tore into Essix's wing before the gyrfalcon could pull away. Essix let out an angry cry and lunged back. Even restrained by Mulop, the beating of Halawir's wings was so strong that a funnel of wind started to form around him. The gusts bent some of the Evertree's branches, and more leaves whipped around in the air.

Conor had to fight to keep from being lifted right off his feet. As the leaves flashed past his vision, he remembered his dreams in a flash. Golden leaves, towering tree, the Great Ape roaring. He turned back to Kovo and gritted his teeth.

“Now, Briggan!” Conor shouted.

As Kovo shoved Arax away roughly by his horns, he turned in time to see Conor and Briggan charging straight for him. He only had time to bare his teeth before Briggan slammed into him. The wolf knocked him onto his back with a heavy thud. Briggan snapped at the ape's neck, but Kovo rolled just in time, forcing Briggan off of him and swinging a mighty fist at Briggan's snout. Briggan leaped back, narrowly avoiding the blow. For an instant, Kovo was on the ground, and his attention was turned completely away from Conor. Briggan snarled as Kovo lunged for him.

Conor made a flying leap for Kovo. His arms laced around Kovo's neck, throwing him off balance and stopping his attack. The wolf twisted around Kovo's arm. He sunk his teeth into the ape's thick wrist, making him roar in pain. Conor saw instantly that Briggan was trying to force Kovo toward the Evertree. To make him sacrifice himself in the way that Tellun, Rumpfuss, and the other Great Beasts had.

Nearby, Suka let out an earthshaking roar as she faced Gerathon. The serpent had uncoiled and now towered over the polar bear, her fangs wide open.

Conor hung on for dear life as Kovo swung around, trying to shake the boy off of him. Briggan tightened his jaw. Kovo spun to crush Conor under his back, but Conor let go at the last second and scrambled away.

Near them, Halawir managed to shake Mulop off, throwing him against the tree. Blood stained one of Essix's wings, but the gyrfalcon dug her claws grimly into the eagle. Halawir looked ready to attack Essix again when a white blur of motion struck him. Ninani the Swan! Conor ducked instinctively at the sight. Wind roared against his face. Her pale wings nearly blotted out the dark sky as they beat furiously against Halawir. An angry cry emerged from her throat. Halawir, startled for an instant, forgot Essix – and the moment gave Essix the chance to strike out. Halawir screamed as the gyrfalcon's beak tore into his side.

“Conor!”

Abeke's shout shook Conor from watching the winged beasts fight. Just in time, he saw Kovo roar and throw a heavy fist at him. Conor threw a hand up in a pitiful defense. Something silver and gray blurred in front of him before Kovo's strike could land.

Briggan.

The Great Wolf struck like lightning, his fangs shooting out at Kovo's arm and locking onto his wrist before Conor could even think. Kovo's roar changed to one of pain. He swung his arm backward, taking a snarling Briggan with him, and tried in vain to throw him off. Briggan hung on grimly. The ground shook as Kovo stumbled backward. Then he lost his footing as Briggan gave his arm a ferocious shake. Kovo roared again in fury. He twisted around and sank his teeth into Briggan's shoulder.

"Briggan!" Conor screamed as he scrambled to his feet. Briggan winced in pain. He tried to continue hanging on, but Kovo's bite had taken its toll, and the wolf was forced to release the ape.

The earth shuddered. Conor glanced over to the Evertree in time to see Suka seize Gerathon's body between her thick jaws. She clamped down hard. Gerathon hissed in fury, twisting her body in an attempt to free herself, but it was too late. Suka charged at the Evertree with the serpent. They struck with the force of an avalanche. The tree shook, one of its branches snapping and crashing to the ground. Blinding light engulfed everyone.

When Conor could see again, Suka – and Gerathon – were gone. The Evertree leaned from the weight of the blow.

Nearby, Uraza leaped for Halawir, managing to grab one of his talons in her teeth, and Mulop wrapped a tentacle around the other. With the forces of Ninani and Essix keeping him from flying higher, Halawir screamed in frustration. He finally lost his balance and crashed to the ground. Arax the Ram was there, ready and waiting. He lifted Halawir with his horns, then charged at the Evertree with the eagle. Halawir tried to untangle himself, but to no avail.

Both Arax and Halawir struck the Evertree and vanished in a haze of light and thunder. Ninani and Mulop followed immediately afterward, sacrificing themselves in their wake.

Kovo threw his head back with a furious cry. "You fools!" he shrieked, grief mixed with his rage. He brandished the Staff of Cycles higher. "You sacrifice yourselves for nothing!" He bared his teeth at the rest of them. "Then I will destroy everything. I will destroy you all! I will rule Erdas alone!"

He looked down at the wounded Briggan at his feet.

No! Conor sprinted toward them. With Gerathon and Halawir gone, Rollan, Meilin, and Abeke rushed to help. Uraza pounced on Kovo right before he could lunge at Briggan again. Her claws dug into the ape's thick back hide. Kovo stumbled, giving Briggan the chance to dodge his blow. Kovo shook his body left and right – finally, with a terrifying growl, he spun so roughly that Uraza flew off of him. He reared up to his full height, pounding his chest with his fists. His eyes glowed red in the darkness.

And then, to Conor's disbelief, he heard Meilin's clear voice ring out. "Now, Jhi!" she cried.

THE STAFF OF CYCLES

JHI CHARGED AT KOVO. WHEN SHE REACHED HIM, SHE reared up to her full height – a formidable sight, even as a smaller version of her Great Beast self. She let out a roar. Meilin felt a sudden jolt of both fright and pride. Never had she heard such a sound before. Gentle Jhi, now a terrifying warrior. Even Kovo seemed stunned for a moment.

Meilin moved on instinct. The Bile had held her back for so long that now, to have full control over her entire body and mind, she felt completely exhilarated. She broke into a run, then stepped lightly off of Jhi’s back and made a graceful, flying leap toward Kovo. Her arms hooked around his neck. He swung wildly to shake her off but Meilin kept her balance on his shoulders. She whipped off the sash tied around her waist and yanked it tightly around Kovo’s eyes, blinding him. He threw his fists out around him, striking at the air. “Go, Jhi!” Meilin cried out.

Jhi lunged toward Kovo – but not before Kovo managed to throw Meilin off his back. She hit the ground hard. Stars exploded before her eyes. Kovo swung his staff at Jhi, forcing her back, and slammed the staff into the ground again. Light burst from the crook in all directions. Meilin and her friends cried out at the brightness and threw their arms up. Meilin felt her bond with Jhi tremble, as if a string between them had just been violently plucked. Panic rushed through her. She struggled to her feet and staggered toward Jhi.

The panda looked back at her, also shaken. Uraza, Briggan, and Essix all shuddered in place – and Uraza’s violet eyes flickered for an instant, turning colorless. The cobalt blue color of Briggan’s brilliant eyes faded too. For a moment, it seemed as if all of their bonds would break.

No, they can’t, Meilin cried silently. She braced herself for the worst.

Suddenly the light from the staff flickered and died. Confused, Meilin glanced at Kovo. What she saw made her mouth drop open. Another figure had lunged at Kovo, someone riding on the shoulders of an enormous crocodile. The crocodile’s jaws were open, and his roar was directed at Kovo.

It was Shane.

Shane.

I must be hallucinating, Meilin thought, struggling to understand.

Shane let out a furious yell at Kovo, one full of anguish and anger. His crocodile snapped at Kovo. Its jaws clamped down on the gorilla’s side. Shane slashed out at the ape’s face with his saber. The blade sliced into Kovo’s eyebrow, cutting deep. Kovo roared in pain. He spun sharply, yanking Shane and the crocodile with him. Meilin tried to shake the shock from her system.

Shane won’t be able to hold Kovo back for long, she thought.

Then she realized that Shane was shouting something. Something at them. “Get him!” he yelled.

Jhi moved with terrifying speed. She lunged at Kovo with her jaws wide open. Her attack forced him backward. Meilin couldn’t believe how fast Jhi was moving – this was the warrior side of her, the side that Meilin had always whined to see but that Jhi had kept hidden until the moments when she knew she had to unleash it. In that instant, Meilin felt an indescribable sense of pride in her spirit animal.

Jhi had always been the true warrior. The warrior who turned to peace and kindness first, and struck only in love and defense. The wise warrior. What Meilin should have wanted to be all along.

Jhi’s claws raked across Kovo’s chest before he could get out of the way, leaving four deep red gashes. He roared. Shane ducked the swipe, then rolled and grabbed Kovo’s leg. It didn’t take a huge amount of force – Shane’s move was enough to trip Kovo. He fell heavily.

Nearby, Conor rose. He put his hands on Briggan's fur, as if to strengthen their connection, and Briggan managed to stagger back to his feet. Meilin marveled at how regal Conor looked. He and Briggan charged Kovo as one. Rollan and Essix did the same – Rollan sprinting forward, Essix following him in the air, ignoring her wounded wing. Abeke and Uraza charged at Kovo too. Uraza jumped for Kovo's arm, the one that brandished the staff. Her jaws closed on it. At the same time, Briggan grabbed the arm in his teeth. Together, the two yanked hard.

"Essix!" Rollan shouted. Essix dove for Kovo's face, forcing him to throw his other hand up to defend himself. Attacked from all sides, blind and fallen, Kovo finally dropped the staff. It rolled once, until it lay at Meilin's feet.

"Now, Meilin!" Conor shouted.

Meilin bent down and seized the staff. She tossed it to Conor. Kovo let out a roar that sounded more desperate this time. But he couldn't stop Conor from taking the Platinum Elk off of his neck and looping it around the staff. Kovo's voice suddenly turned pleading.

"I could have saved you all!" he cried from where he lay on the ground. His eyes darted from one of the Four Fallen to the next, disbelieving. "If you do this, we will all perish! You will destroy the Evertree, and you will all die!" His gaze switched to Meilin, Rollan, Abeke, and finally Conor. "You will forever lose your spirit animals." His voice held in it a terrible tone of finality.

Conor hesitated, just for a second. Meilin swallowed hard as she met Jhi's gaze. Even in her warriorlike state, Jhi's expression was as calm and steady as ever. Meilin could feel the wisdom in her gaze, and it broke her heart. She knew what Conor had to do.

Finally Conor returned Kovo's look. "I know," he answered. His voice did not tremble at all.

Then he pressed the Platinum Elk tightly against the staff. The talisman vanished in a halo of light, and threads of bright silver lit up on the staff. It started to glow. Conor pointed it at the Evertree.

Kovo's struggles turned frantic, but the others held him firmly down. "No! You can't! Stop!"

Conor ignored him. He lifted the completed Staff of Cycles, took a deep breath, and rammed it into the ground.

THE EVERTREE

A BRILLIANT BOLT OF LIGHTNING STRUCK THE WOUNDED Evertree. Abeke ducked down and covered her ears, but the explosion tossed her easily to the ground. It shook the entire crater. Sparks of fire flew from the Evertree, quickly igniting on each of its lower branches. The giant tree groaned in agony, shuddering, and then an enormous crack split the entire tree down its middle. Abeke winced at the sight, as if the lightning had struck her instead.

Kovo let out one final, anguished cry. Then he too vanished in a flash of light and reappeared as a dark wound on the dying Evertree's side.

He was gone.

The Evertree tilted heavily to one side. Golden sap streamed from its wounds, painting trails of tears down the trunk and pooling in the dying grass around it. Overhead, the sky's dark clouds turned jet-black, swirling in spirals around the dying tree. For a moment, it seemed as if the Evertree might still stand, engulfed in flames. But then it gave a final groan, followed by an earsplitting crack. Abeke took a step back.

The Evertree fell.

It fell slowly, in the way a giant would fall, with all the weight of the world on its shoulders. Its silver and gold branches snapped, burning, and as the tree crashed to the earth in a storm of splinters, the clouds overhead finally split open with cold rain – gathered since their battle at Muttering Rock. There the tree stayed, spent, its life slowly leaking away, limbs bleeding. Abeke looked on as a torrent of rain gushed from the skies, hissing as the sheets of water hit the Evertree’s furious flames. Lightning streaked across the sky in jagged rivers. Rain poured down Abeke’s face.

She couldn’t tell if it was rain, or tears.

From where Kovo had once lay struggling on the ground, Uraza crouched at the wounded Briggan’s side. The wolf’s strength was finally sapped, now that Kovo was gone. Conor had already hurried to his spirit animal, wrapping his arms around the wolf’s neck. Essix landed nearby, limping, and hobbled over to join them. Jhi sat beside Briggan, her head bowed, and Meilin stood silently next to her. Slowly, Abeke walked over until she reached Uraza. She leaned down, petted Briggan, and placed her head against Uraza’s chest. A deep, empty feeling weighed against her.

From over Uraza’s shoulder, she noticed Shane sitting some distance away. He looked dazed, his eyes locked on the Evertree. She couldn’t be sure, but his expression seemed genuinely tragic.

The colors in the sky began to change. At first, Abeke thought it was the same thing that had happened while they were at Muttering Rock – but this time, the colors were brilliant and bold, not dark and ominous. Bright scarlet and gold, green and turquoise, a rainbow of light that swirled and sparkled among the clouds. The colors blended together seamlessly, magnificently, into ribbons that trailed from the sky over them all the way to the edges of the horizon. It seemed as if the life in the Evertree had left the physical world and bled into the heavens.

Abeke could hardly bear the beauty of it.

As Abeke stared in awe, the colors began to shift into shapes and silhouettes. They solidified into a vision. Abeke’s eyes widened. She gasped, and her hands tightened against Uraza’s fur. The vision intensified, spreading until it covered the entire sky. She saw a beautiful golden land; a clear, breathtakingly blue ocean; a sky glittering with stars; a world young and pristine. The beginning of everything. She saw a tree sapling with silver bark and golden leaves growing from the new soil of a dying volcano. She felt the life that the Evertree’s roots breathed into the land, the beginning of the world. She witnessed the birth of the Great Beasts that emerged from this newfound energy, and their sacred oath to watch over the world and guard it from harm. The way things used to be.

The way things were now. She saw the deep, profound connection she shared with Uraza – manifested in threads of light that tethered mankind to the kingdom of beasts – that they all shared with their spirit animals and with every living thing.

She saw death ... and she saw rebirth.

Somehow, Abeke understood it. She understood all of it. She tasted salt on her lips, and she no longer questioned whether or not the water running down her face was rain or something more.

This is the end, Abeke thought. She looked to Conor, who knelt over Briggan, his tears flowing freely, and the realization finally hit her that this was the moment when she might lose Uraza. The thought made her gasp in pain. She turned back to her leopard, who met her gaze with steady violet eyes. Then she wrapped her arms around Uraza's neck and hugged her tight. The memory flooded back to her of when she'd drunk the Nectar of Ninani so long ago, and how she'd felt when she first saw the sleek golden leopard. How much they had experienced together since then. How much they had won and lost. What would life be like without her?

"Thank you," Abeke whispered into Uraza's fur.

Uraza didn't respond. Instead, she stayed calm and still. Abeke could feel the tremor of her purr, as if her spirit animal was telling her that everything would be all right.

Abeke closed her eyes and waited for the end.

REBIRTH

CONOR DIDN'T KNOW HOW IT WOULD HAPPEN. WOULD Briggan disappear in a flash of light, just like the others had? Would the dying Evertree reclaim him, somehow? Or would he simply die, the way Conor had seen sheep die before, the way so many who'd crossed their paths had already died? Conor ran his hand absently through Briggan's fur. He bowed his head and braced himself. He'd always sympathized with those who lost their spirit animals, and he'd told himself to be ready for this moment ever since he first felt it during his visions.

But I'm not ready. He could never be ready. And now, the time had come.

The visions continued to shift in color. Through them, Conor saw each of the Great Beasts as they once were – Tellun, Rumfuss, Arax, then Kovo, Gerathon, and Halawir, then the others, all settling into the far reaches of the world. They vanished from sight, leaving behind bright balls of energy that swirled around the image of the once mighty Evertree. Conor saw a vision of Uraza appear in all her glory, a full-sized Great Beast. She appeared to walk toward them, and as they looked on, she turned her violet eyes toward where Abeke and the real Uraza sat.

A vision of Jhi soon joined her, as large and magnificent as she once was. Mighty Essix soared down toward them. And Briggan ... an image of Briggan as a Great Beast appeared in the sky last, the elegant and towering shape of a beautiful wolf, loping easily up to the others and stopping at their side. The vision of Briggan looked down at Conor, then at the wounded version of himself that lay on the grass. The vision gave a single nod.

Then, all the colors in the sky faded away. The clouds returned to normal, and sheets of rain continued to pour down.

He looked down at Briggan, who gazed up at him with a bemused expression. Our spirit animals will not die, Conor suddenly realized. The wolf pushed himself up to a sitting position, still wounded, but otherwise alive.

“You’re going to be okay, aren’t you?” Conor said hoarsely to Briggan.

Briggan nodded, just like his vision had.

Stunned, Abeke looked back and forth between Conor and Briggan. “But – I thought you said ...” she began, “that our spirit animals didn’t live through this journey. I thought the other Great Beasts all sacrificed themselves. Uraza –”

“– had already given her life once.” Conor finished the sentence, finally understanding what the vision in the sky had meant. He broke into a huge smile as he faced the others. “The Four Fallen won’t need to sacrifice themselves again.”

Silence.

Until Rollan broke it with a huge whoop. He flung himself around Essix’s neck, to her startlement, and hugged her tight. They all broke into cheers. Conor threw his arms around Briggan’s neck. He couldn’t tell if he was laughing or crying, but it didn’t matter. Relief flooded him. Briggan was alive! So were the other Four Fallen. Even through his grief at the Evertree’s death and the sacrifices of the other Great Beasts, at least his spirit animal was going to be okay. They had defeated Kovo. That was what really mattered.

“Hey – there he goes!”

Meilin’s voice shook Conor out of his moment. He glanced over to where Meilin was pointing to a figure fleeing from them. Shane had taken advantage of their celebration in order to sneak away.

“That little coward –” Rollan growled, picking himself up and getting ready to chase after him.

Abeke was the one who grabbed his arm and held him back. She shook her head. “Let him go,” she said.

“Really?” Rollan exclaimed. “After all that!”

“We’re no better if we have no mercy,” Abeke replied, watching Shane’s back as he ran, stumbling, away from them. She took a deep breath. “He won’t bother us again.” Conor knew she was remembering the moment during their battle when Shane had thrown himself at Kovo in an attempt to buy them some time. All of his anger at the former Devourer seemed to diffuse.

So they stayed where they were, looking on until Shane became nothing more than a dot on the rainy horizon.

“Now what?” Meilin asked as Conor finally pushed himself up onto his feet. She stared sadly at the fallen Evertree. “The Great Beasts are gone.”

Conor’s attention shifted to the Staff of Cycles. It still lay in the grass near the Evertree, right where he had dropped it. He walked over to the staff, Briggan limping at his side. Conor reached it, picked it up gingerly, and studied it. The staff no longer looked as silver and glittering as it once had. In fact, it looked like any ordinary spiral of wood, even like his shepherd’s crook. Only small hints of luster still glinted along the shaft. Otherwise, it had turned wholly unremarkable.

Conor stared at the fallen Evertree. He walked over to it, where the golden color of its leaves had already begun to fade. He bowed his head in reverence before the twisted trunk and branches, then put the Staff of Cycles gently down in the dirt where its roots emerged from the ground.

“I’m sorry,” he said. Tears sprang to his eyes.

A ripple seemed to go through the earth, but Conor ignored it, thinking it was just the wind and rain beating against him.

Then he felt the pulse again. It was like a wave had moved through the ground beneath him, the heartbeat of something living. Of the land itself.

He frowned, looking around. His eyes settled on the Staff of Cycles – which once more had started to glow a faint silver color.

Gradually the glow traveled to the Evertree, spreading along the length of its branches and trunk until it engulfed the entire mass of broken wood. The glow left the Evertree, then pooled into the ground around it. As everyone looked on, the torn earth from where the Evertree’s roots had ripped out now began to part. A bright light emerged from somewhere deep in the soil, revealing something small, new, and green.

A seedling!

It was nothing more than a slender stalk of a plant, still curved in infancy and emerging from a split seed, its two delicate leaves tipped with silver and gold. The first hints of roots extended from the seed's cracks, reaching toward the ground, growing thicker and stronger with each passing moment. Conor sat down beside Briggan and watched in awe.

A new beginning. A new Evertree.

Conor had a feeling that, someday, when the Evertree became whole again, the other Great Beasts might return once more to Erdas. The cycle would begin anew. His arm tightened around Briggan's neck, and calmness filled his heart. Someday, Briggan might evolve back into his Great Beast form. Conor didn't know if he would be around to see it, but ... that was okay. Everything would begin again.

REUNION

THE RAIN DIDN'T LAST LONG.

Soon the clouds began to clear, revealing first a pocket of gray light, the hints of dawn, and then the brilliant gold and faint blue of a beautiful morning. Water beaded on the grasses of the crater, turning into a million sparkling gems under the light. The breeze brought with it the first true scent of summer, something sweet and fresh, nothing like the oppressive air that had seemed to hover over them for the past few weeks.

It felt as if a spell had lifted from all of Erdas.

Rollan smiled as they made their way down from the crater and out toward Nilo's southern shores. Essix soared above them, while Uraza loped ahead toward the water. Briggan and Jhi stayed with Conor and Meilin. The sun felt warm on Rollan's face, and at the sight of the blue ocean, a wild joy built up in his chest. He broke into a run. The others followed behind him, cheering and laughing. Rollan blushed when he saw Meilin sprinting beside him, an enormous smile on her face. She flashed a grin at him, and his own smile grew wider.

They all slowed to a stop as they reached the shore. The waves crashed in perfect arcs, sliding white foam up the sand and toward their feet. Rollan pulled off his boots and let his toes wriggle in the surf. He breathed deeply. The air was salty and cool. Nearby, Uraza leaned her head forward and tentatively sniffed at the water. Behind her, Jhi ambled up. The panda paused behind Uraza, rolled her silver eyes innocently skyward, and gave the great cat a playful nudge. Uraza fell forward into the surf. She immediately pounced up, shaking water from her head, and gave Jhi a grumpy swat with her paw. Jhi just blinked big, sweet eyes back.

Abeke and Meilin laughed as Uraza chased Jhi along the shore, the two acting for a moment like they were young cubs.

“I wonder if Olvan’s forces defeated the Conquerors,” Conor said as they all joined Rollan.

“Maybe they’re already sailing for Greenhaven,” Meilin added.

Rollan smiled at that thought. He pictured the gray mood lifted from Greenhaven, and how beautiful the hills must be now. He looked down the line of Nilo’s coast that curved off into the horizon. “It will be a long journey back,” he said.

Abeke nodded, but she had a smile on her face too. “A journey spent in the best company.” She looked at Meilin as she said it, and Meilin beamed.

“One more journey,” Meilin replied. “A victory march.”

Rollan nudged Meilin in the ribs with his elbow. He gave her a sidelong grin. “I bet I can beat you back to Greenhaven.”

Meilin raised an amused eyebrow. “Is that so?”

“Hey, you’ve been gone for a long while, and I’ve been training. Just saying.”

Meilin merely grinned. “Then let’s see a demonstration.”

Rollan tossed hair out of his face. Then, without warning, he darted down the shore.

“Hey!” Meilin exclaimed. “No warning? No ‘on your mark’?” She bolted too, leaving Abeke and Conor to jog along behind them, grinning at their antics.

Some things would never change. Meilin caught up to Rollan and passed him. As she did, he caught her, threw an arm around her neck, and ruffled up her hair. Meilin squealed, her laughter ringing out in the clean ocean air.

It was so nice to laugh.

It was so nice to head home.

The storms stopped in Zhong, and the earthquakes quieted in Eura. The snow disappeared from Nilo, unveiling the land in its former beauty.

Even better, the Conquerors had been defeated. With Gerathon's death, the Bile had lost its power over those who drank it. In that instant, nearly half of the Conqueror armies had simply abandoned the battle. The rest quickly surrendered.

As they sailed back toward Greenhaven, the four saw all the signs of normalcy returning to the world. Relieved looks graced the people's faces in port cities. Clusters of cheering citizens sometimes gathered on the shores to watch the Greencloaks sail by.

Still, signs of healing did not mean that tragedy was forgotten. The land bridge between Stetriol and Nilo remained, and many cities were still picking up the pieces, building new homes and farms around broken, collapsed ones. Erdas would take time to heal. Without the Nectar of Ninani, no one could be sure how the future would look for new bonds with spirit animals, or even that bonds could happen at all, until the new Evertree matured. But one thing was for sure: The bonding sickness was gone, and with it, the Bile and the Nectar.

The links between man and animal could begin anew.

On a beautiful, warm afternoon, the Four Fallen and the Greencloaks' caravan finally docked at home. As they made the final leg of their journey, Rollan could see the spires and battlements of Greenhaven Castle peeking out from the climb from the docks, basking under the light of a bright sun.

Overhead, Essix soared and let out a call of fierce joy. Rollan smiled as he looked up at her tiny figure, then turned back to the castle's silhouette.

"I can't believe you actually became a Greencloak," Meilin said as she walked beside him. She shot him a quick smile.

"Me neither," Rollan replied. "I look awful in green." Even as he smiled back, the memory of Tarik came fresh to him, bringing with it a sharp stab of pain. Rollan imagined Tarik was still alive, traveling home with them now. What would he have made of everything they'd accomplished?

Meilin watched him thoughtfully, as if she knew what he was thinking.

"Do you think Tarik would have been proud of me?" Rollan asked in a soft voice.

Meilin reached over to take his hand. She squeezed it once. “I know he would be,” she replied.

“Hey, guys,” Conor said as he trotted back to them. Abeke walked nearby too, unable to contain her excitement. “Look at the crowd that’s gathered near the castle. They’re all waiting for us!”

Rollan craned his neck. Conor was right; as they crested the top of the staircase, he saw before the castle’s silhouette a mass of people, their faint chants carried on the wind. Rollan thought they were chanting something about victory and the Four Fallen. He certainly recognized a cheer for Essix.

“Let’s go join the party, then,” Rollan exclaimed, hurrying upward.

It seemed like the closer they came, the bigger the crowd got. By the time they crested the final staircase and saw the sprawling courtyard of Greenhaven Castle, masses of people had completely filled either side.

“The Four Fallen have returned!” someone yelled as they approached. “The heroes are back!”

The cheers were deafening. Rollan waved enthusiastically as their procession passed through the crowds, while Conor bowed his head in humble acknowledgment. Abeke and Meilin just gaped in awe. With the people were also spirit animals – a beautiful crested heron next to a girl with pigtails, a boy with a white-faced monkey sitting on his shoulder, another boy with a hedgehog. As they threw rice and colorful strips of paper in the air, the heron flapped its wings to blow the paper toward them. Rollan laughed, swatting the strips away.

“Mom!”

Conor’s shout stopped Rollan short. His eyes darted to where Conor was looking, and there, he saw Conor’s mother and family rushing out of the packed crowds and onto the courtyard’s center. Conor pushed forward, stumbling in his haste, and then ran toward her. She pulled him into a huge hug.

Abeke let out a startled laugh from where she walked. Her father and sister waved at her from the side of the street. They had come to see her! Rollan couldn’t stop smiling as, in spite of everything, she rushed over to them. She paused for a moment right as she reached them, as if unsure what to do next, but Soama pulled her into a hug, and Pojalo put his hands on their shoulders.

Rollan searched in vain for a sign of his own mother. I won’t find her here, he reminded himself with a sinking heart. Gerathon was gone now, and though his mother no longer needed to obey the Bile or live in fear – she had been with the Conquerors. Meilin and Abeke had both seen her in Nilo. Even with the Conquerors dissolving after their losses, there would be no reason for her to come here.

What wishful thinking. Rollan steeled his heart. Expectations just lead to disappointment, he reminded himself. He looked back at Conor hugging his family and tried to imagine himself in the same place, tried to convince himself that seeing his friend’s joy would be the same as experiencing his own.

“Rollan?”

The voice was quiet, so quiet that Rollan barely heard it. He whirled back around. Where did it come from? He looked at the cheering faces, but saw no one familiar looking back. A sinking feeling settled in his chest. Perhaps he’d imagined the voice. Rollan shook his head and was about to turn away when he heard it again.

“Rollan! Rollan!”

“Look!” Meilin exclaimed, pointing into the crowd. There Rollan saw a frantically waving hand making its way closer through the people. It was a woman. She had dark hair and tanned skin, and her eyes were a warm, breathtaking brown. He watched her as she made her way into the street, but even when she stood there, right before him, he could hardly believe the sight.

Mother?

She didn’t look like she had the last time he’d seen her. She looked happy now. Free.

Rollan couldn’t remember stepping forward. He couldn’t remember if he said anything, if he called out for her like Conor had, or even if he bothered to smile or laugh or cry. All he remembered was running across the cobblestones. One moment he was still with the rest of the procession, and the next, he was in his mother’s arms, holding on for dear life. He was laughing. Crying? He didn’t care.

“You’re here!” he said.

Aidana didn’t answer. Maybe there wasn’t much that needed to be said, at least not yet. So she hugged him tight, and he returned the embrace. How long ago had it been since Rollan sat in a filthy dungeon cell, a lost orphan that nobody wanted? How much had changed. He smiled so hard that it hurt.

Through a haze of joy, Rollan realized that Abeke had stepped over to join him in his celebration, along with her father and sister. Conor and his family were hurrying up the path toward them. Rollan wiped his eyes and laughed. Then he gazed at where Meilin still stood, alone.

She was smiling too, but in the midst of all these family reunions, she looked a little lost, as if unsure whether or not she should be allowed to join them. Rollan's smile wavered for a moment.

Meilin's father was gone. She would have no reunion here today. When she saw Rollan's face, she smiled wider in an attempt to hide her sadness.

"Meilin," Rollan called out. He motioned for her to come over.

She hesitated, but when Abeke and Conor piped up too, Meilin took a tentative step forward, and then headed over with a shy smile. "Hi," she said softly to their gathered families.

Aidana smiled warmly at her, then patted her cheek. "Hello, my darling," she replied. And before Meilin could utter anything else, Rollan's mother pulled her into a tight hug.

They all joined in, Abeke, Conor, and Rollan, until they were one big pile of arms and legs and hearts and smiles. Rollan found Meilin and wrapped his arm around her shoulders. He looked from her to Conor, then to Abeke. "We'll always have a family," he said. "Always."

At those words, Meilin's moment of sadness faded away, and her smile turned genuine. She hugged them all back.

If Rollan used Essix's vision right then, he would see, among the throngs of celebrating revelers, a tiny, almost insignificant cluster of friends wearing cloaks of green, each blending in with the ones next to it, so that no one could tell where one ended and the others began.

They were one.

The End

MARIE LU is the New York Times bestselling author of the Legend Trilogy and the Young Elites series. Before becoming a full-time writer, she worked in the video game industry as a Flash artist. She currently lives in Los Angeles with her husband, one Chihuahua mix, and two Pembroke Welsh Corgis, and spends her time writing, reading, drawing, playing video games, and getting stuck in traffic.

You've read the book—now join the adventure at Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Have your ebook ready and enter the code to unlock huge rewards!

NXNC3WD2TC

THE BOOK OF SHANE

EBOOK TRILOGY

There are two sides to every story.

Shane's story will finally be told . . . and history will be written by the victors.

Each book unlocks in-game rewards. Log in with your copy to infiltrate the Greencloaks.

The Legend Lives in You

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

There are two sides to every story.

A sneak peek of

SPIRIT ANIMALS™

Book of Shane #1

By Nick Eliopulos

Available only in ebook.

The First Book of Shane
VENOM

by Nick Eliopoulos

SHANE'S LIFE CHANGED FOREVER THE DAY HE WOKE TO the sound of screaming.

It was a scream right out of a nightmare – a sound of terror, and mourning, and fury all tangled together. It was barely human.

He'd never heard anything like it before, yet he knew at once that it was coming from his sister.

Shane leaped from bed and bolted from his room. At some point he stubbed his bare toe on stone, but the pain wouldn't register until much later. At the moment there was only Drina, and the distance that kept him from her. He didn't hesitate, didn't pause at her threshold to wonder what terror awaited him, what monstrous sight could tear such a howl from his sister's throat.

But he paused when he entered the room and its unnatural twilight. His own bedroom had been bright with morning's light, and the hallway too. Something in Drina's room was blocking the light. A frayed and tattered tapestry? Thick strands of cotton? Shane couldn't quite make sense of it.

Drina had stopped screaming, but she lay convulsing in bed. Something was terribly wrong.

He went to her and gripped her by the shoulders, willing her to be still, but her body jumped and jerked beneath his fingers. She looked up at him with eyes that didn't see him. They registered only horror.

He realized he was saying her name, over and over again. "Drina. Drina."

Then he saw movement out of the corner of his eye.

He didn't turn all at once. The hair on the back of his neck stood up, and his ears prickled. He knew somehow that making any sudden moves would be a terrible mistake. So he kept his hands on his sister's shoulders, and turned his head slowly, very slowly, until he was looking into the far corner of the room.

Squatting there in the shadows was the largest spider Shane had ever seen.

It saw him too. It stared back at him with eight eyes, alien and unreadable. Other than the bands of yellow along its abdomen, it was entirely black. Venom dripped from its fangs to the floor.

It stayed absolutely still, and Shane tried to stay still too. But he couldn't suppress a shudder of fear and revulsion. He had to do something. Others would arrive soon – others must have heard Drina's scream. And the next person through that door would step right beneath those dripping fangs.

He took a heavy brass lantern from Drina's bedside.

He turned away from her slowly, so that he faced the spider. He would have to put all his strength behind his throw. He might only have one chance at this.

Those alien eyes stared back, unblinking.

Shane shifted his weight and gritted his teeth. He reared back with the lantern, ready to let it fly when –

Suddenly Drina screamed again. This time, she produced a word: "No!"

She lurched from her bed, shoving into him with all her might. Shane went flying; his head smacked against stone. The world reeled, and he hit stone again, and the lantern shattered all around him, covering him with broken glass.

"He's mine," his sister said. Through a haze of red he watched her take an unsteady step toward the creature on the wall, her arm outstretched, palm up. "He's mine."

It was only then that the true horror of the situation finally dawned on Shane. Despite his fervent hopes, his sister had summoned a spirit animal.

Unconsciousness came for him, and he did not fight it.

He didn't want to see what happened next.

Shane never woke slowly. In the two years since Drina had summoned her spirit animal, he jolted awake each morning, usually in a cold sweat, always with a sense of dread. This morning was no different. He immediately scanned the ceiling, then checked the four corners of his bedroom for any sign of an animal. He kept the stone walls bare and the room clear of any clutter: the better to be sure nothing could hide from him. Finally, before daring to place his feet upon the floor, he leaned over the side of his bed, peering into the shadows beneath it like a young child checking for monsters.

It was only after he was satisfied that he had not summoned a spirit animal in his sleep that he remembered to breathe.

Shane knew the odds of being Marked were slim. He reminded himself of that fact every day. Yet despite the odds, every member of his immediate family had summoned an animal. People said they were cursed, and there were times Shane himself believed it.

He was nearly thirteen years old now. If he was going to get a spirit animal – and the bonding sickness that usually came with it – it would happen soon.

Shane slipped from bed and pulled his damp nightclothes over his head. He took a fresh tunic and trousers from his wardrobe – a wooden antique from which he'd removed the doors. That way it was one less hiding place for him to fear. And besides, Shane's uncle had use for any wood he could get his hands on.

As he dressed, Shane remembered a time in his childhood when a servant would wake him, bathe him, dress him. But nearly all the servants were gone now. And it was just as well – there was no money with which to pay them, little food with which to feed them.

Shane knew very little about the lands outside of Stetriol, but he suspected he was the poorest prince in the world.

He walked the long hallway that led to the dining hall, trailing his finger along the stone wall and tapestries, leaving a line in the dust. The tapestries showed legendary scenes of Stetriol's ancient past. On one, torrents of water flowed from the mouth of a frog, creating all the lakes and rivers. Another showed two lizards painting patterns on each other, one with a fine brush and an eye for detail, the other without care.

Shane knew of other tapestries – forgotten tapestries that still hung from the rafters in a dark and disused corner of the castle. Those artworks celebrated other animals entirely: formidable birds of prey, and huge, vicious cats, and an octopus with startingly intelligent eyes. But the Great Beasts had cursed Stetriol. They were better forgotten.

Lost in thought, Shane jolted with surprise when he rounded a corner and saw a cloaked figure standing before him. He hoped she hadn't seen him flinch, but it was hard to sneak anything past his tutor.

“Yumaris,” he said, nodding his head in greeting.

“My prince,” she said, lowering her own head in a sort of bow. Shane imagined if she attempted to lower herself any more than that, she might never manage to get up again. She clutched her staff as if without it her heavy robes might drag her to the floor.

He wasn't sure exactly how old she was, but during her history lessons it was easy to imagine that she spoke from personal experience. The oddest thing about her, though, was that she sometimes spoke of the future as if it were history too.

Shane watched curiously as the woman produced a sheathed sword from the folds of her robes. It was the saber he had been training with lately, at his uncle's insistence. “You will be glad to have this blade,” she said, holding it out to him.

He wasn't so sure, but he took the sword and affixed it to his belt. “You're my tutor, Yumaris. Aren't you supposed to favor the pen?”

“A prince must have many tools in his arsenal,” Yumaris answered, a faraway look in her eyes. “For words and learning do little to impress a jackal.”

Shane tightened his belt and gave his tutor a questioning look. “There are no jackals in Stetriol.”

Yumaris shrugged. “A figure of speech, my prince. Now, I fear you have more pressing business this morning than breakfast.”

Shane sighed. “What is Gar up to this time?”

You've read the book — now join the adventure at Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one
of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Enter your code to
unlock huge rewards:
NXNC3WD2TC

Create your character.

Choose your
spirit animal.

Go on exciting
quests and help
save Erdas!

THE LEGEND LIVES IN YOU

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

Discover the Truth Behind the Conqueror

Learn all about Shane in the thrilling
Spirit Animals e-short trilogy!

GET THE BOOK!

SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

 SCHOLASTIC
scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SASHANee

From the creators of The 39 Clues™ and Infinity Ring™

SPIRIT ANIMALS

THE LEGEND LIVES IN YOU

Four children discover that they have spirit animals, a powerful bond that thrusts them on a quest to save their world.

READ THE BOOK.
UNLOCK THE GAME.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

 SCHOLASTIC

From the publisher of The 39 Clues™ and Spirit Animals™

TOMBQUEST

The tombs are opening . . .

The magic of Egypt has come alive. Mummies are waking. New York is overrun with scorpions. And worst of all, five evil ancients called the Death Walkers have broken free. It's up to one boy to stop them . . . before the Afterlife claims us all.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/TombQuest

TOMBQUEST[®]

SCHOLASTIC, TOMBQUEST and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

THE STUNNING ADVENTURE
FROM BESTSELLING AUTHOR
RICK RIORDAN

Available in print and
eBook editions

scholastic.com/the39clues

39CLUESe

SCHOLASTIC, THE 39 CLUES, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

INFINITY RING™

FIX THE PAST. SAVE THE FUTURE.

Available in print and eBook
editions.

SCHOLASTIC.COM/INFINITYRING

 SCHOLASTIC

SCHOLASTIC, INFINITY RING, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

IRINGe

Copyright © 2015 by Scholastic Inc.

All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920.
SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2014957423

Map illustration by Michael Walton

First edition, April 2015

e-ISBN 978-0-545-53522-9

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereafter invented, without the express written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING SERIES

FALL of the BEASTS

A SPIRIT ANIMALS

BOOK 1

IMMORTAL GUARDIANS

READ
THE BOOK.
UNLOCK
THE GAME.

BY NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING AUTHOR

ELIOT SCHREFER

The world is in peril.

An ancient evil is rising from beneath
Erdas, and we need YOU to help stop it.

Claim your spirit animal and join the adventure now.

1. Go to scholastic.com/spiritanimals.
2. Log in to create your character and choose your own spirit animal.
3. Have your book ready and enter the code below to unlock the adventure.

By the Four Fallen,
The Greencloaks

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

The Evertree was the source of all bonds between humans and spirit animals.

And there was no mistaking it:
The tree was dying.

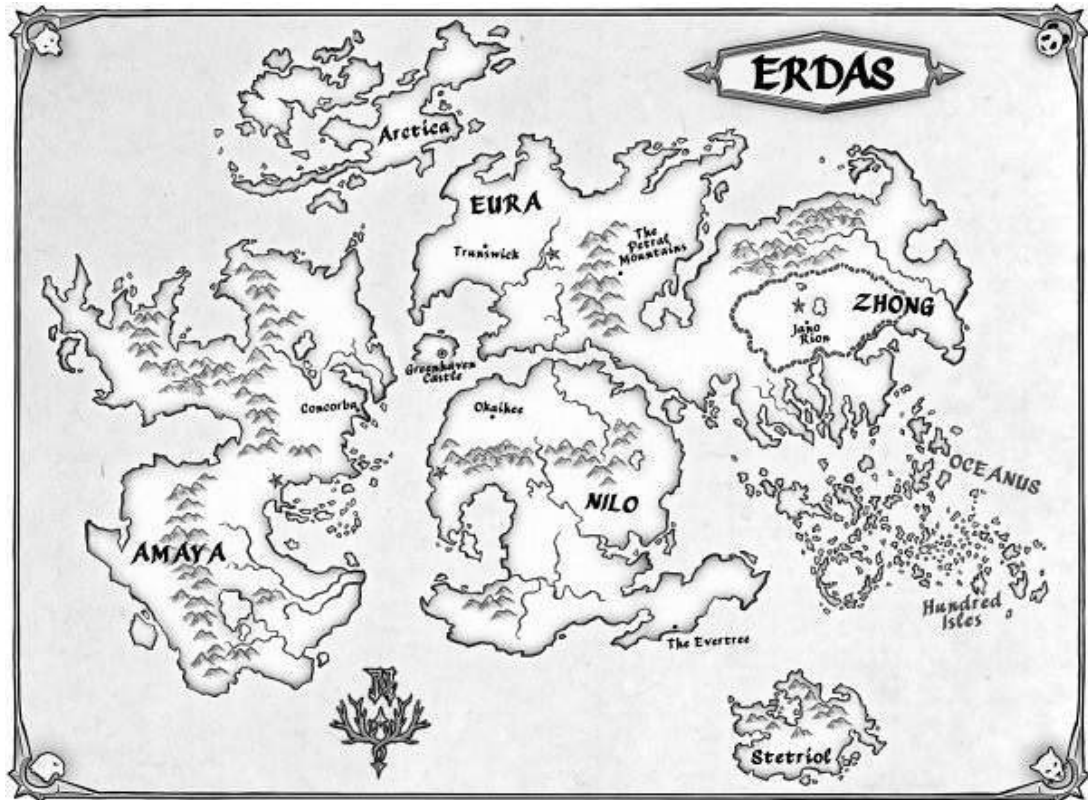

FALL of the BEASTS
SPIRIT
ANIMALS™

IMMORTAL GUARDIANS

Eliot Schrefer

SCHOLASTIC INC.

Contents

Wyrn Symbol

Greencloak Letter

Quote Page

Title Page

Map

1: MARKET DAY

2: THE EVERTREE

3: HOMECOMING

4: THE PORTAL

5: A DESPERATE PLAN

6: THE PETRAL MOUNTAINS

7: HUNTING

8: STONE

9: THE MANY

10: THE HEALER

11: PHOS ASTOS

12: NORTH, SOUTH, WEST

13: VICTORY

14: AMBUSH

About the Author

Online Game Code

Sneak Peek

Spirit Animals Game

Copyright

MARKET DAY

IF ONLY SHE COULD TURN RIGHT AROUND AND GO HOME.

Normally Kaiina lived with her tribe, day in and day out—she hadn't been around this many unknown people for years, not since she had once come with her mother to this very marketplace as a little girl. But she was twelve now, which meant she'd have to start taking her turn trekking to the jungle market to buy supplies for her tribe.

Everyone had requests. Oranges for her father. A new hunting blade for her mother. Sugarfruit for her brother.

Thinking of how happy her family would be with their presents gave Kaiina the courage she needed. Holding her head high, she stepped into the clearing.

She picked her way between the woven mats, perusing the goods carefully laid out on each. Fragrant herbs, wild pineapple and celery, grouse eggs—her stomach growled as she passed among the vendors. To prevent herself from wasting her tribe's money, she recited her short list in her mind, like a mantra. Oranges. A hunting blade. Sugarfruit.

Vendors beckoned to Kaiina as she passed, but she timidly avoided their eyes. She'd never bartered before and was worried they'd take advantage of her the moment she showed interest in what they were selling.

“Kaiina!”

She looked up, startled, and was relieved to see a familiar old woman scamper agilely through the crowded vendor mats and come to Kaiina's side, warmly taking the girl's hands in her own. Kaiina relaxed: Prana was an elderly woman who traveled between the tribes, bartering her pottery. Kaiina had known her for years, and had never seen Prana without a smile on her old, cracked face.

Prana's spirit animal, a brilliant brass kingfisher, was perched on the woman's long gray braid, its delicate feet hooked into the folds of silvered hair. The bird hopped to Kaiina's shoulder, warbling a cheerful, tuneless song.

I wish I had a spirit animal, Kaiina thought. Then I'd always have company, and wouldn't have to come to market day alone. But some people bonded with spirit animals and some didn't—there was no predicting it. And Kaiina hadn't summoned one.

"He is not usually this excited to see anyone—he really likes you!" Prana said.

Kaiina took a moment to run her hand over the bird's smooth and glossy plumage. He raised his chin, inviting her to preen his underfeathers. Kaiina smiled and obliged.

Just then, Prana's kingfisher took to the air and began to shriek. From all around, the trees shook. Monkeys screamed. Cicadas droned. Songbirds chattered.

Kaiina felt a strange dizzy sensation wash over her, and the market fell into silence.

The ground seemed to tilt beneath Kaiina's bare feet. "What is happening?" she cried out.

Though only moments before she'd been so hot she was sweating, Kaiina shivered with a sudden chill. The sky went dark, and the clouds turned rageful and knitted together. She heard a boom and a crack, and her eyes filled with light.

The explosion knocked Kaiina and Prana to the ground. Ears ringing, Kaiina's first thought was to help the elderly woman up. But Prana was already back on her feet, tears in her rheumy eyes. Blinking her own eyes rapidly to clear the purple flash, Kaiina raised herself onto her elbows.

As quickly as they'd formed, the clouds scattered. The clearing was once again full of radiant sunshine, its brilliance frosting the silhouette of a giant creature where just moments before there had been nothing.

"It is not possible," Prana whispered. But it was. An elephant had appeared.

The massive beast bowed its head, trunk slung low and snuffling along the ground. Kaiina had seen plenty of forest elephants in the jungle, but none as big as this one. Its broad ears swayed as it made its way toward Kaiina and Prana. Vendors and tribespeople alike fled to the edges of the market, watching with fearful curiosity.

Kaiina's legs were rooted to the ground.

"D-do you know this elephant?" she stammered to Prana. "Where did it come from? And why is it coming toward you?"

"Not toward me, child," Prana said, wonder in her voice. "It's coming toward you."

"I don't understand!" Kaiina cried, tears blurring her vision.

"You've summoned a spirit animal," Prana said. She had placed a wizened hand over her mouth, making her words almost inaudible. "But an elephant, the eyes ... it's impossible! Kaiina, you've summoned Dinesh."

Dinesh? A creature of legend, one of the Great Beasts of Erdas? It felt as if the earth went soft beneath Kaiina, as if she'd stepped into slipmud.

The elephant slowed as it came near, and Kaiina was shocked to see it lower its great head. Brilliant aqua eyes met hers, and they flashed with intelligence and something almost like amusement as they took in the cowering marketgoers. Could this animal truly be the great Dinesh?

"Say hello," Prana encouraged. "He's waiting to meet you."

The creature's expression softened, and Kaiina found her legs were able to move again. Despite the dozens of eyes she could feel on her back, despite the ruckus of the upturned earth and the bizarre sight of an enormous elephant standing on the woven mats, Kaiina didn't shrink away. She wanted to touch him. A charge was building up inside her, setting her skin tingling, and she knew instinctively that only one thing would settle it.

Hands trembling, she strode to the elephant and leaned in close so their faces were mere inches apart. As she ran the back of her hand along his leathery ear and closed her eyes, a serene warmth filled her.

Kaiina felt a moist touch on her neck. Opening her eyes, she smiled as she saw that Dinesh's large trunk was nuzzling her. Comforting her. Suddenly she felt as large as the elephant, somehow—too large to be intimidated by a crowded marketplace. It seemed ridiculous that she'd ever been.

Kaiina hesitantly laid a hand against the elephant's flank. His flesh was rough and thick, his giant torso rising and falling beneath her fingers. She looked into the elephant's eyes and saw a vast intelligence gazing back.

"How could I have summoned Dinesh?" Kaiina asked in wonder. "And why to me?"

Before Prana could answer, a man in a black tunic stepped forward. "This is indeed an auspicious morning!" the stranger called. "The Great Beasts are returning, and I have been sent to shepherd them to safety."

Prana's golden kingfisher pointed his sharp beak shrewdly at the man. Kaiina's attention was drawn to the charcoal-colored spiral on the man's forehead. She could see now that it was raised and swollen, more of a brand than a tattoo. It almost appeared to ripple in the wavering heat, but after the shock of the last few moments, Kaiina wasn't sure she could trust her senses. She leaned into Dinesh's side for security, and took comfort in the slow rise and fall of his ribs.

"You may leave the girl and her elephant in my care, old one. I will handle it from here."

The elephant raised his trunk into the air, letting out a deep trumpeting call, the sound powerful enough to reverberate deep in Kaiina's chest. From elsewhere in the jungle, other elephants called in response. When she heard distant crashing sounds, Kaiina realized the other elephants were converging on them.

Dinesh tossed his head in the stranger's direction, lowering his tusks and leveling them toward the man in the black tunic. Kaiina stroked Dinesh's ear and saw that the elephant's eyes were full of distrust.

"Kalistan-ah," Kaiina whispered to Prana in the local language. Beware.

Before Prana could respond, the stranger stepped toward them. He was handsome and tan-skinned, a trim beard covering his jaw. "Sia-ga," he said, a wicked grin splitting his face, "I speak your language, and yes, you should be afraid."

The treetops again began to shake, and the nearby monkeys and birds recommenced their shrieking. The cicadas went from a low drone to a roar. Kaiina looked to Dinesh, hoping to discover in the elephant's soft eyes that she had nothing to fear. But fear was precisely what Kaiina found there.

Dinesh took a step forward and then a step back, lowering his head nervously. Kaiina followed his gaze and saw a thicket of spiny jungle growth tremble and shake. As the branches bent farther and whatever creature was behind them began to emerge, Dinesh trumpeted again.

“What’s wrong?” Kaiina cried out. The powerful vibration of the elephant’s call rattled in her head.

Marketgoers had begun to approach from their safe vantage, but paused after they heard the elephant’s trumpet. It was a good thing they did, too, as Dinesh suddenly charged. They scurried to get out of the way, but the elephant was only halfway across the clearing when he abruptly halted, momentum hurtling his body through the dirt and nearly pitching him forward.

Emerging from the thicket was another huge creature. It was a bear, but unlike any Kaiina had ever seen. She’d been taught that bears were always brown or black, but this one was white, its fur as light as morning clouds against the vibrant blacks and greens of the jungle. Baffled, Kaiina wheeled and caught Prana’s startled eyes.

“What wrongness has come to our world?” Prana cried, her hand to her heart.

There was a cry from the sky, and a large eagle descended, lowering so it was flapping above the polar bear. Then there was a roar from the other side of the clearing, and Kaiina pivoted to see a giant boar, thick-tusked and bristly.

Blinded by fear, Kaiina ran toward Prana but was blocked by a new creature—this one a muscular beast on all fours, like a stocky antelope, but with curling horns on its head. It used those horns to butt into Prana, who staggered and fell before Kaiina’s eyes. Her kingfisher hovered, trying ineffectually to stop the beast’s assault.

Kaiina backed up, hands outstretched as she sought the company of her newfound spirit animal. Dinesh wasn’t hard to find, trumpeting and screaming as he whirled in the center of the clearing, facing off against both the polar bear and the boar. Standing calmly between the two attacking beasts was the stranger in the black tunic.

“Why are you doing this?” Kaiina cried.

The man didn’t answer. Hearing Kaiina’s distress, Dinesh pivoted to face her. With one clean motion he whipped his trunk around, caught the girl around the waist, and deposited her securely on his broad back. He immediately returned to fending off the bear and the boar, whipping his great tusks through the air to keep them at bay.

The stranger grinned at Kaiina. The spiral on his forehead was definitely moving now, writhing under his flesh. “Haven’t you figured it out? I am collecting the Great Beasts. And Dinesh is my next trophy.”

With that, the man pulled an obsidian vial out of a pouch at his waist and unstopped it. A feeling of cold dread passed through her.

The polar bear and the boar had spread out. The elephant turned in nervous circles. With the other Great Beasts flanking him, Dinesh could no longer fend off both attackers at once. Kaiina wondered how much longer his tusks would keep them safe.

With a rush of wind, the eagle was there. It hovered beside the bearded man, who placed the mysterious black vial in its talons. With a few flaps of its strong wings, the eagle flew up toward Kaiina. She cringed, clenching her legs tightly against Dinesh as she instinctively threw her arms before her face.

But the eagle wasn’t coming for her.

Kaiina watched in horror as it dexterously turned the vial in its talons, letting the contents fall onto Dinesh’s broad forehead. At first Kaiina thought it was a piece of gray mud inside, but then she saw the glob start moving, and realized it was a worm, or a leech—the same size and shape as the twisting spiral on the stranger’s forehead. Kaiina leaned forward desperately, hoping to use the back of her hand to wipe the little monster off Dinesh.

But the worm was surprisingly fast. It wriggled over Dinesh’s forehead, easily sticking to the elephant’s hide, no matter how frantically he tried to shake it. The worm pressed its toothy sucker mouth against Dinesh time and again, but was clearly finding it hard to get through Dinesh’s tough skin. Kaiina swatted at it, but the wriggling creature was too fast. It lurched for Dinesh’s ear, soon disappearing in the folds. She realized how far it had gotten when she heard the elephant cry out in pain and shake his head furiously.

Dinesh began to tremble and shudder beneath Kaiina’s thighs. He lifted his head and trumpeted one more time, a terrible, anguished cry. Then he went quiet and still.

The bear and the boar relented, stepping back from the elephant.

“Dinesh!” Kaiina yelled. Her hands were clamped on the elephant’s head.

“Are you okay? Dinesh!”

He was motionless.

“At least you had a few moments with your spirit animal,” the man said. “Some I don’t even give that much.”

Kaiina rubbed the elephant’s hide, hoping Dinesh would reawaken to her touch. But the electricity was gone, and the elephant remained still.

The boar relaxed and sat in the dirt while the bear panted heavily in the jungle heat, tongue lolling out of its mouth. Kaiina felt suddenly light-headed, like she might pass out from shock.

The stranger in black tugged at the length of rawhide that tied the collar of his shirt closed, exposing a broad chest. In the middle of it, right in the triangle where his abdomen began, was a tattoo of what looked like a cobra. The stranger closed his eyes, his brow wrinkling with concentration. Then, with a flash, the bear and boar had disappeared, appearing on the man’s chest, one on either side, forelimbs reaching out onto the muscles of his shoulders. Kaiina heard popping sounds behind her and saw two more tattoos appear on the man’s chest: an eagle and a ram. There was a large space left in the middle, right below his throat.

“No, no ...” Kaiina moaned, realization dawning.

“Oh, but yes,” the man said, his voice a low purr.

There was another flash, this one right below her, and suddenly Kaiina was falling. She fell hard onto the muddy ground, the breath knocked out of her. Wheezing and shaking, she raised herself on her hands and saw a new tattoo in the center of the man’s chest, riding over his breastbone. Dinesh.

“Who are you?” Kaiina gasped. “Why have you done this?”

The man loomed over her, crossing his arms over the animal tattoos on his powerful chest. The strange spiral brand on the man’s face writhed. He winced as the flesh on his forehead puckered and stretched. His eyes took on a dim glow, became the color of twilight.

“The whole world knew my name once, and soon it will know it again. I am Zerif.”

THE EVERTREE

IT WAS A BREEZY, BEAUTIFUL DAY, AND THE EVERTREE WAS singing. As the wind passed through its leaves, they tinkled together and played a song as chaotic and joyous as a burbling stream. Lenori raised her hands to the sunshine and closed her eyes, taking in the magnificence of the moment.

Part of her wished she could stay here forever.

Back in Greenhaven, Lenori had kept a simple herb garden. She'd loved the daily labor of it—running her fingers through silky black soil, picking just the right spot to place each batch of seeds. She supposed that growing plants wasn't that unlike training the new Greencloak recruits. When a child summoned a spirit animal and joined the ancient order, it had been Lenori who would care for them. Not just their training, but their hearts and well-being, too—something blustery Olvan often overlooked.

But all the same, when she'd lived in Greenhaven, Lenori had often found herself taking long walks along misty battlements, looking down longingly on a forest world that seemed all too far away. She'd never quite taken to gray stone walls.

Her new job taking care of the Evertree was much more suited to her.

For generations, it had been the secret source of the spirit animal bond—perhaps the source of life itself on Erdas. But the world fell into war. Kovo the Ape, one of the Great Beasts, betrayed his brethren in a bid to control the Evertree. During the resulting conflict, it had been destroyed.

Then, through a miracle that Lenori had yet to fully understand, after the Great Beasts sacrificed themselves, the tree was born anew.

Above her, the Great Tree's branches groaned in the wind. Its golden leaves rustled, their song growing louder.

How beautiful the tree was! Every day its splendor grew. The height of a mountain, its great silver spire rose so tall that its highest branches stroked the clouds, generating a constant patter of rain on the ground below. After its first months of rapid growth, the tree had begun to sprout golden leaves, each an intricately wrought marvel, as delicate as the finest filigree, fanning out from the elegant arcs of the tree's branches. The Evertree changed colors according to the sun's mood, going from silver-white at dawn to blazing yellow at midday, then maturing to muted, steely afternoons and purple explosions at sunset. Living with the tree was the opposite of lonely, not when Lenori had that magnificent canopy above her. And of course there was also Myriam, her rainbow ibis companion.

In Greenhaven she'd been a vain, preening creature, taking great pains to arrange her feathers just so, ensuring that every color of the rainbow was on display somewhere on her body. But now Myriam was too busy playing host to worry about that—the ibis kept busy greeting each newly arriving bird as Lenori made her long daily trek around the vast trunk of the Evertree. Myriam would join Lenori at camp at the end of each day, snacking on a few tasty bugs from the mud before plopping down beside Lenori's bedroll, exhausted.

One day, though, Myriam hadn't come to her before sunset. That was unusual, but not much cause for concern; some new peacocks had recently arrived at the tree, and Myriam had spent the day following them around, keeping tabs on which was the most beautiful. When Lenori finally tracked Myriam down, she found her staring at a patch of bark along one of the tree's silvery exposed roots.

Lenori knelt beside the ibis and stroked her spirit animal's iridescent plumage. Her focus remained on the tree. Lenori looked where she was staring, and her heart stuttered.

Rot.

It was a patch no longer than her finger, as purple-gray as a bruise on a pear. When Lenori tentatively pressed her finger to the blemish, she found it was soft, squishing beneath her touch with a wet, sighing sound.

She'd never considered that the Evertree could be susceptible to the same minor infections that plagued all trees. Lenori examined it for any other signs of illness, but the Evertree was shining and healthy. As she lay down in her bedroll that evening, her thoughts were on that strange black mark.

The next day Myriam kept close to Lenori's side, hopping along the shady ground, never more than a few feet away, even ignoring the upstart peacocks when they brazenly strutted by. When Lenori returned to the spot where she had last seen the rot, she held her breath.

And let it out in a sharp gasp.

The patch had grown. When Lenori placed her hand over the root, the blemish was the size of her middle three fingers. She tentatively tried to peel the rotten bark away, and when the black sludgy paper came free in her fingers, she saw there was a crevice behind the rot, a black arc slicing into the tree's pristine silver.

Lenori had grown up in the mangrove forests of Amaya and knew a few tricks for curing tree rot. She gathered lichen and wedged it into the narrow black crack, wetting the patch with pond water. Lichen had its own ways of fighting invaders and could work like a poultice to stave off this black sickness, if the Evertree couldn't manage it on its own.

But when Lenori next returned, the lichen had withered and the rot was bigger. It was as big as her now, a Lenori-sized patch of decay along a root of the tree. It loomed over her, like an accusation.

Lenori stepped toward the rot reaching up the trunk. As usual, she tested it with her fingers, removing whatever bits of black mush she could, hoping to slow the infection's progress. This time, when she pressed against the rot, it gave way with a soft tearing sound. Her arm passed right into the humid space behind.

Lenori ripped away at the cavity, heedless of the black goo caking her arms and face. The dead bark was like a curtain, hiding an empty space that extended back into the tree. She took a tentative step into it and gasped.

The rot must have been eating at the tree for a long time, longer than Lenori had known. She was in a cavern that led deep into the tree, bits of dying wood dropping around her. Everywhere was the strangely sweet smell of death and rot, and the soft slimy blackness of the Evertree's sickness.

Looking down, Lenori saw that the rotten hollow extended down, into caverns and dank tunnels under the earth.

The Evertree was the source of all bonds between humans and spirit animals. If it fell, those partnerships would cease to exist.

And there was no mistaking it: The tree was dying.

HOMECOMING

MEILIN WAITED IMPATIENTLY ON THE DOCKS. ITCHING TO ascend the path to Greenhaven and greet her friends, she massaged a knot of worry that had appeared at the back of her neck. That knot was an old friend—it had shown up during the war, and only left her after months of peace spent in Zhong, undertaking the simple, satisfying work of rebuilding a nation stone by stone. But now that she'd gotten word of Erdas's new troubles, the knot was back.

She flexed her dominant arm while she waited, hoping she hadn't gotten too soft during her time home.

Greencloaks were coming and going along the docks, whispering among themselves and cutting admiring glances at Meilin. Meilin had more self-assurance than most twelve-year-olds, or most adults for that matter, but it made her nervous to be seen as a hero. In Zhong, she'd perfected a serene smile, warm enough to honor the person's interest but chilly enough to discourage handshakes and questions.

"Aren't you done yet?" Meilin asked the guard imperiously.

She'd been ready to drag her trunk right up to the hulking castle of Greenhaven, but a young Greencloak had stopped her along the path. He'd apologized and then started searching Meilin's trunk, meticulously picking through her things.

"Find any hidden weapons?" Meilin asked.

"I'm sorry, ma'am," the guard said, embarrassed. "We're required to search everyone arriving in Greenhaven. After the war ..."

"Yes, yes. I remember the war, believe me." It had only brought Meilin the title of Hero of Erdas. It had only caused her to bond to a Great Beast. It had only killed her father.

The guard turned bright crimson as he got to the last layer of Meilin's case: underwear. "I don't suppose you suspect I've hidden any killer crocodiles in those?" Meilin asked, peeking over his shoulder.

Jhi, a giant panda, made a warning grunt where she was sitting a few feet away and philosophically chewing on a piece of bamboo. Lately Jhi had started to take Meilin to task whenever she slipped into rudeness. It was very annoying.

Suddenly aware that her arms were crossed over her chest and her nose was raised haughtily, Meilin forced herself to smile at the guard. "I, um, like your turkey."

The man's spirit animal, a particularly unimpressive fowl that was ecstatically picking worms out of a nearby leaf pile, raised its head, shook its wattle, then returned its attention to the dirt.

The guard finished his search, his face still crimson while he stuffed Meilin's underwear back in her trunk as fast as he could. "Sorry for the delay, ma'am," he said. "Everyone gets searched, even the Four Heroes of Erdas."

"You can make it up to me by carrying my case," Meilin said. Jhi grunted again. "Oh, fine, I'll get it myself."

Meilin and Jhi began the walk up the long and winding path to Greenhaven castle, an imposing gray stone structure that rose high over the sea. Though it was an intimidating place, Meilin felt an unexpected joy when she saw it. Greenhaven was as much her home as Zhong. All the same—if she'd had her way, she might never have come back.

Rollan, she thought as she scanned the ramparts of the imposing stone fortress the Greencloaks called home. Where are you?

She'd known the situation was serious when Rollan sent his own spirit animal to call her back from Zhong. She'd been ready to bunk down for the night after a long day helping build a new bridge for the capital when the falcon had rushed into her cabin. A small golden tube had been banded to one of Essix's legs.

Even in her exhaustion, the falcon had managed a disdainful look as Meilin unscrewed the top of the cylinder and tugged out a rolled-up letter. Meilin had imagined what Essix would say if she could: Essix the Falcon is not a messenger pigeon! Essix eats messenger pigeons for breakfast!

The note had been ominously short.

Meilin,

I know you had to spend some time away for your sanity, and I'm not asking this lightly. But you must come to Greenhaven as soon as you can. Evertree in danger. Will explain when you get here.

—Your Rollan

Rollan had once described the feeling of being far from the gyrfalcon as having someone scratch at his eyelids. Sending Essix all the way to Zhong must have been excruciating. Meilin couldn't wait to see her friend's face when he was reunited with his spirit animal. She couldn't wait to see his face in general, actually.

Essix had flown on ahead as soon as Meilin's boat arrived, but now returned, alighting on Meilin's shoulder with a squawk of delight. Then, with a shriek, Meilin was bowled over by an unseen assailant. She panicked for a moment, before she felt the long, stinky licks of a wolf's rough tongue on her cheek.

"Briggan!" she cried, laughing with joy through her tears as she wrapped her arms around the wolf's neck. "Conor!" she shouted, hoping Briggan's human partner was nearby. "Where are you? Get this oversized dog off me!"

But Briggan kept licking, and before she knew it Meilin was joined on the ground by her friends Abeke, Conor, and then Rollan, laughing and hugging as they rolled on the flagstones of the path, heedless of the scene they were making.

One of the Greencloaks making his way up the path giggled, and the phrase "Four Heroes of Erdas" passed through Meilin's mind. She remembered her dignity and stood up, primly brushing soil and grass from her traveling clothes.

Rollan stayed on the ground and looked up at her, ripping up a handful of grass and adding it to the bits already dusting his shiny, unkempt hair. Meilin's heart kicked when she saw that the lean Amayan boy looked just the same, with his dark hair and impish grin. At least some things hadn't changed during her time in Zhong.

"Embarrassed to be seen with us, milady?" Rollan joked. Essix landed neatly on his shoulder.

Conor smudged some mud on Rollan's nose, then busted into a guffaw. "Now she'll be embarrassed of you."

Abeke turned serious before the boys did. The tall Niloan girl brushed herself off, too, and stood shoulder-to-shoulder with Meilin. She pointed up at Greenhaven castle. "I'd hoped we could give you the time off you wanted—we wouldn't have called you back unless we had to, I promise. Let's head up to the castle. I'll explain on the way."

Abeke took one handle of Meilin's trunk, and together they started up toward the fortress. Abeke's leopard, Uraza, and Jhi kept pace with them, the boys and their spirit animals tailing behind. Abeke had clearly been practicing her fighting skills while Meilin was off helping rebuild Zhong; as they walked Meilin admired the bands of muscle lining the Niloan girl's arms. Even the bow on Abeke's back looked heavier than the one she'd previously used. But Meilin knew what her friend would really want her opinion on. "I like your new skinnier braids," Meilin said to Abeke.

"Really?" Abeke said, her hand unconsciously going to her hair. Abeke toyed with the wooden bead at the end of a braid, then let it fall. "I've been experimenting. It was good while it lasted. There won't be time to worry about hairstyles anymore. Not now."

When Abeke started telling Meilin about recent events, all thoughts of hairstyles vanished from her mind.

"Great Beasts summoned as spirit animals, the Evertree sick—that can't be a coincidence," Meilin murmured.

"You think?" Rollan said sarcastically. "We managed to figure that much out, too."

"You can see why we wanted you back here," Abeke said.

"Of course," Meilin said gravely. A stony weight settled in her stomach. "What does Olvan have to say about all of this?" Meilin asked. The leader of the Greencloaks was their best source of wisdom.

"He went to check on Lenori at the Evertree. Due back any day. But wait," Abeke said. "You haven't heard the worst part."

Conor gave an involuntary shiver and wrapped a hand around his sleeve, pinning it to his arm. As if to hide something.

“What’s going on?” Meilin asked.

“Surprise,” Rollan said flatly, pointing ahead of them.

Meilin’s gaze snapped forward. She dropped her side of the trunk. It fell against the flagstones, the wood splintering. “No! Oh no. What have we done?”

They’d arrived at the main courtyard of Greenhaven. It had none of its usual bustle, and even Mustado’s familiar merchant stall was shuttered. Armed guards had been stationed on the battlements, all facing down into the courtyard. The reason was very clear. Chained in the center was an ape. Not just any ape: a gorilla.

The beast’s rounded shoulders were what Meilin saw first. Broad stretches of pure muscle were covered in coarse black hair that turned silver where it trailed down his back. He stood on all fours, knuckles pressing heavily into the ground. The gorilla’s noble, squared brow was held as proudly as possible, but a collar had been fitted around his neck, and the chain didn’t reach quite high enough for him to raise his head. The ape was hunched, eyes scrunched tight, as if by squinting he could shut out the discomfort of his imprisonment.

“Tell me that’s not Kovo,” Meilin whispered.

“It is,” Conor spat. “He’s back.”

“Summoned as a spirit animal,” Abeke said, with a sighing sympathy in her voice. “Just like ours.”

“That’s the one Great Beast we managed to rescue?” Meilin asked. “The traitor?”

“He’s smaller than before, at least,” Rollan said. “Mini-Kovo.”

“He is plenty big enough, thank you,” Meilin said, refusing to take another step toward their sworn enemy. “Who summoned him?”

Her eyes lit on a skinny boy dressed in a stiff blue cotton robe drawn tight with a white sash. He was cross-legged on the ground, hunched like Kovo, his face in a motionless frown. Like the ape, he looked like he was focusing all his energy on surviving his current torment.

“Whoever is going around stealing the Great Beasts didn’t manage to sever that boy’s bond to Kovo?” Meilin asked.

“We got to him first,” Abeke whispered. “Thanks to Conor. Takoda was raised by monks in a monastery in Southern Nilo. One of the monks was a Greencloak, fortunately. After Kovo appeared, she kept Takoda safely locked away while Conor rushed down to bring them back to Greenhaven.”

Conor blushed slightly. “They were already under attack when I got there,” he said. “I was lucky to get them out at all.”

“Who was attacking?” Meilin asked. “I don’t understand who could do this. Are there still Conquerors out there?”

Conor stared furiously at the ground, hand tight on his sleeve again. “It was Zerif,” he said.

Meilin stared between her friends, anger rising within her. She knew that name. Zerif was a war criminal. One of the cruelest and most cunning enemies they’d ever encountered. But he’d never held the power to take a spirit animal. No one did.

“But we got to Kovo first. And he’s certainly not in a position to cause anyone any trouble now,” Abeke said, looking at Kovo with something almost like sympathy.

As if in response, Kovo slowly opened his eyes ... and found Meilin’s. She had forgotten how startling their color was. At the sight of his scarlet irises, cold sweat broke out down her back. Much as she tried to calm her fear, her instincts told her one thing only: Run.

Meilin fought to master the urge to flee. She would not let her enemies control her.

The courtyard had fallen silent as Kovo roused. All eyes turned toward the gorilla. He took in the scene blankly, betraying no emotion on his face. After giving Meilin a long, scalding look, he slowly closed his eyes again.

Abeke cleared her throat. “Takoda,” she called to the seated boy. “Do you want to meet Meilin? The one we were telling you about?”

Meilin tore her eyes away from Kovo’s hulking form as the boy got to his feet and walked over, shaking the chill out of his legs and knees. He was about Rollan’s height, but so thin that even his stiff cotton robes couldn’t hide the narrowness of his frame. When he got near, Meilin became confused—though his skin was dark, his features seemed almost Zhongese. When he spoke, his accent was like anyone else from Southern Nilo.

“You must be Meilin of Zhong,” he said, bowing his shaved head. “It’s an honor to meet such a famed warrior.”

“Oh,” Meilin said, hoping the blush she felt wasn’t showing. “Thank you.”

“You’re as polite as always, Takoda,” Rollan said to the boy, a complicated expression on his face.

Takoda smiled, avoiding Rollan’s eyes. “I’m not quite the person you imagined would summon a huge bloodthirsty gorilla, I’m sure.”

Meilin shrugged and cracked her calloused knuckles. “I summoned a fluffy panda. Go figure.”

“You aren’t going to like what I’m about to say,” Takoda said. “We’ve all lost much to Kovo in the past, and those wounds are not yet healed. Though he might have ... behaved poorly before, I think Kovo is trying to help you.”

“Kovo help us?” Meilin asked. Fury surged through her. “Help us like he helped the Devourer rampage across Erdas?” she spat. “As I recall, the last person he helped was cast aside like an old toy when he was no longer useful.”

“Just let me show you,” Takoda said. He took two slow steps back, then turned on his heel and strode toward the ape.

“Takoda, wait!” Abeke cried.

From the battlements above came the sound of drawing bowstrings and swords. Greencloak guards shouted in alarm.

Meilin launched forward on instinct, reaching her hand out to grab Takoda. But she cursed her softened instincts as her fingers reached him a moment too late, catching only the hem of his robe.

Kovo sprang.

For a creature so large, the ape was astonishingly fast. With a single push of his meaty palms against the cobblestones he was beside Takoda, red eyes blazing within the dark of his face. The ape’s fiery gaze flipped from the boy to Meilin, and the sudden intensity of it took her breath away.

Despite herself, Meilin halted, dropping into a more defensive crouch. With another crashing leap Kovo was past Takoda—and bounding straight at her.

Then the chain caught, and Kovo’s collar jerked him to a halt.

He nearly tumbled to the ground but caught himself just in time, straining against the collar, his face inches from hers. Meilin could feel the ape’s breath rustling the ends of her hair. Kovo’s teeth were bared. A few links of chain were all that kept her from death.

Meilin, you are a warrior. She narrowed her eyes.

“No, stop!” Takoda pushed himself between the two of them, his skinny arms waving frantically. “Please, just listen. Kovo doesn’t want to fight!”

Takoda faced the gorilla, and with the boy between her and her enemy, Meilin allowed herself to rise from her defensive stance.

“Show them,” Takoda pleaded to Kovo. “Please.”

The gorilla’s eyes were still fixed on Meilin’s, with every bit of the calculating menace that she remembered. A raw surge of hatred passed through her. She could barely control the urge to attack.

Kovo shoved a chained hand at Takoda, knocking the boy back a step. Takoda let his hand drop, opened his satchel, and took out a roll of papyrus and a piece of charcoal. He placed them both on the ground in front of Kovo.

Meilin’s anger slowly drained as she watched Kovo take the charcoal in his powerful fingers, holding the tool with surprising delicacy. Avoiding their eyes, the ape concentrated on the papyrus and began to sketch.

“It’s always the same picture,” Takoda explained. “He even draws all the parts in the same order. It’s like he’s trying to get it all perfectly right. Like he’s trying to capture something that’s been seared into his mind.”

The gorilla started with a jaw, and the fangs came next. At first Meilin thought Kovo was drawing an animal—the Great Serpent Gerathon, perhaps. But it soon became clear that the jaw wasn’t attached to any creature. Instead, there were stones and grass in front of it, a rocky mountain behind, and a half moon in the sky above.

“Is it the fossil of a giant jaw?” Meilin asked.

Kovo dropped the charcoal and stared at her. Under the sudden onslaught of the ape’s cruel red eyes, Meilin fell back a step before she could remember her poise. Holding her head high, Meilin watched the ape trace an arc in the air, then walk through it with two fingers of his other hand.

“It’s not a fossil,” Takoda explained. “It’s a door. Wait, he’s not done. There’s one more part to it.”

Finally taking his gaze away from Meilin, Kovo picked the charcoal back up. On top of the fanged door, positioned right in its center, he drew a strange, disquieting symbol.

A twisting spiral.

THE PORTAL

WHO'D EVER GIVEN DOORWAYS MUCH THOUGHT? BUT now they were all Abeke could think about. As she and her friends passed through Greenhaven's chilly stone corridors, Abeke found herself looking up at every frame and archway. Turned out that a doorway was never just a doorway. Some had shields hung above, some were splintered wood or gleaming granite, and some had frames of molding where there had once been glass.

None of Greenhaven's doorways looked even remotely like a set of fangs.

"No one has seen anything like it," Conor said forlornly, peering at the parchment with Kovo's charcoal drawing.

"It feels like we've asked nearly everyone in Greenhaven," Abeke said.

"Why not try the library?" Meilin asked.

The other three stared at her. "Greenhaven has a library?" Rollan asked.

Meilin rolled her eyes and led the way, bringing them down staircase after staircase. Natural light became scarce and then disappeared, replaced by the ruddy glow of guttering torches. "I came down here to study while we were training," she said. "Didn't you guys ever get the urge to pick up a book during training breaks?"

Abeke saw Conor blush and look away. In the last six months, he'd only just begun to learn how to read.

"Uh, yeah, of course," Rollan said dryly. "I was reading, like, all the time. The bigger the book, the better, that's what I always say."

"Someday our survival will rest on knowing all about ancient Hellan rock decorating, and you're going to thank me," Meilin said, cuffing him on the shoulder.

“Shh!” came a low, outraged voice.

They’d arrived at the library.

At the end of a dank, dim hall at the very bottom level of Greenhaven, a doorway led into a musty space. The ceiling was so low that Conor had to duck to enter. It seemed to Abeke more like a dungeon than a library.

But once they were inside, the place had a coziness to it. Rows of short bookshelves extended in every direction. They were covered in candles that flickered in the drafty chamber, dripping wax over the worn wood. The warmth of so many ruddy flames lifted some of the chill that seeped into Abeke’s bones whenever she wasn’t in Nilo.

“Erlan?” Meilin called out excitedly. “Are you there?”

“Meilin? Is that you?” came a gruff voice from behind one of the bookshelves.

Staring at the rows of dusty leather-bound books, they edged farther into the chamber, in a reverent hush. Until, that is, Rollan promptly bashed his head on an iron chandelier, which in turn swung right into a bookcase, rocking it backward. Dusty parchment flew everywhere.

“Careful, careful!” came the gruff voice.

A tiny Niloan man came into view around one of the shelves, wearing a sea-foam-colored robe with white fur trim that merged seamlessly with his voluminous white beard.

“Hello, Erlan!” Meilin said, giving the librarian a kiss on the cheek.

“Meilin!” Erlan said, delighted.

As the librarian walked toward them, Abeke became confused: For every step the small man took forward, there was a pattering of footfalls.

She saw the reason soon enough, when Erlan stepped to one side and revealed a large tortoise, its gray-blue scales the same hue as the librarian’s robe. The tortoise blinked its rheumy eyes at them and yawned.

“It’s so lovely to see you again, Meilin. I have the new edition of Shei-Lon’s Ars Geometrica. You’ll adore it. I’m still more partial to the Niloan edition, but that could just be because that’s what I grew up reading. In any case, you won’t believe the diagrams; they’re woodcut prints, and simply gorgeous. Now, where is it?”

Erlan turned in a broad circle, searching for the book. His robe dragged against another shelf, sweeping a stack of books to the ground and spraying candlewax over the friends. Abeke and Conor followed after him, picking up the books and placing them back on the shelf as close as they could to their original order while Rollan stamped out the flaming wicks.

“I’d love to look at that book soon, but not today, Erlan,” Meilin said. “We’re here on urgent business.”

“Learning is always important business,” Erlan muttered. He kept rummaging around the shelves until the tortoise pointedly walked into the librarian’s legs to get his attention. Erlan looked down at his spirit animal, then at Meilin, and smoothed his white hair. “Sorry. Right. Urgent business, you said?”

“Yes,” Rollan said, rubbing the top of his head where it had bashed the chandelier. “Headache remedies, please.”

“Oh, sorry. I designed the library myself decades ago, and, well, I’ve never been very tall, and I suppose I forgot other people would use it, too. So let’s see,” Erlan said, scratching through his beard as he scanned the candlelit shelves. “Headache remedies. I’ll have to see what I have....”

“He was kidding,” Meilin said, scowling at Rollan.

“Says you!” said Rollan, outraged.

Meilin clamped her hand over his mouth. “Erlan, we’re looking for any reference to a doorway that looks like an open jaw.”

He rubbed his palms together. “That’s not something you hear every day.”

“Like this one,” Conor said helpfully, unrolling Kovo’s parchment and showing it to Erlan.

The old man squinted at the charcoal sketch. “Who drew this? It’s quite good, really. Exquisite use of crosshatch shading.”

“Kovo did,” Conor said. “He’s been drawing it repeatedly. He’s obsessed with it, apparently.”

Erlan instinctively recoiled. “Well, well. All the literature does point to Kovo being very smart. That was never in question.” Erlan scrutinized the drawing. “Now. What is he trying to tell us?”

After a few moments, the old man sighed. “I suppose there’s only one place for it....”

Groaning, he padded toward a candle-covered bookshelf that was already wobbling long before the librarian drew near. Abeke braced herself to leap to the rescue, but Erlan turned before ever reaching the shelf. Instead, he faced a small stretch of blank wall nestled between all the books.

Except it wasn't a wall.

The elder Greencloak lifted a trembling hand and ran it over the bricks, finally coming to rest on one that was slightly darker than the rest. When he pressed it, ancient stones grumbled and hissed as they shifted deep in the walls, and then the bricks pivoted back, revealing a hidden room.

So many kinds of doors, Abeke thought again.

"Erlan?" Meilin said uncertainly. "You never told me there was another room here."

"No, I didn't," the librarian said wearily. "I couldn't tell anyone, not even you, Meilin. The Greencloaks have many fine qualities, but there are stories that they'd prefer to forget."

Erlan disappeared into the room, sending a breeze of cold, stale air back out in his place. Abeke shivered.

"Much of the history of the Lost Lands is contained in here," Erlan called out. "After the First Devourer War, the nation of Stetriol became a forbidden place, and knowledge of it was erased. It has taken me many, many years to assemble these manuscripts. Use what you discover here to help Erdas, but I'd ask you not to spread word of this collection further than you must. Not everyone would be happy to know I've been accumulating this information."

A cough, a wheeze, a puff of breath. Dust plumed out of the doorway. From within its shell, the tortoise sneezed.

"But some of these histories are older even than the Lost Lands," Erlan said, emerging from the passage with a tome bound in cracked black snakeskin. He hobbled to a broad table and laid the great book down with care. There, raised beneath the cover, was the shape of a gorilla standing on all fours.

"Kovo," Conor whispered.

"What is this book, Erlan?" Meilin asked, mistrust lacing her voice.

"I have no idea," the librarian said wistfully. "Can't read a word of it. Perhaps to keep its contents secret, it was written in a forgotten tongue—or a code. I've lost many nights trying to decipher it. But thankfully, the author was also a skilled artist." Erlan gently cracked open the cover of the book, turning each page with delicate precision.

“Here we are,” he said. As he turned the next page, the air in the cramped library seemed to still.

Despite herself, Abeke gasped. There, sketched onto the page in a delicate hand, was the exact door Kovo had drawn, waiting within a set of ragged jaws. It even had the strange spiral symbol.

Rollan whistled. “Well, isn’t that weird?”

Erlan grunted in agreement as he turned the next page. It was a map. A twisted ring of mountains curled into itself, dropping into a cone at the center, like the trap of an antlion. In the center of the ring, the spiral was drawn again into a stretch of mountainside surrounded by forest and ruined walls. This time the spiral was a deep crimson color. Abeke hoped it was just red ink.

“What is this place?” Meilin asked.

“The Petral Mountains, on the border between Eura and Zhong,” Erlan said quietly. “A very secluded stretch. No humans have lived there for quite a while.”

“This is all fine and moody,” Rollan said, “but we still don’t know that it’s connected to what’s happening with the Evertree. Kovo has tricked us before.”

“Kovo is not to be trusted,” Erlan said. “But in this case, I believe that the door is indeed connected to the Evertree.”

“Why’s that?” Abeke asked.

“I haven’t shown you the back cover yet.” Erlan closed the tome and carefully flipped it over.

There, raised beneath the snakeskin, was the outline of an enormous tree. But the tree was only half of the picture. A thin line bisected the image where the roots of the tree met the ground. Below the line, the roots spread out into a web of branches, as wide and tangled as the tree itself. Bundled deep within the roots, like an egg within a nest, was the familiar spiral.

“That’s why Lenori couldn’t find anything wrong with the Evertree at first,” Abeke said. “She was looking outside, but the trouble is coming from below.”

“So we have to go below, too,” Conor said. “And we have to start in the Petral Mountains.”

Now that Conor had said it aloud, the idea of journeying deep under the earth felt terrifying. They stared at each other in the candlelit gloom of the basement library. Abeke saw Rollan rub his head absently where he'd struck the chandelier. How far down did the Evertree go? If this library felt low and oppressive, what would it feel like to be miles underground? She couldn't speak for the others, but she knew it was nowhere she'd want to be.

Erlan clapped his hands cheerfully, cutting the sudden gloom. "Glad to be of service!"

"Good thing I didn't unpack yet," Meilin said as the old man shuffled away. "We'll leave as soon as we can. It's too bad—after that sea voyage, I'd have loved a few nights in a soft bed."

Conor shook his head and tugged unconsciously at his sleeve.

Meilin glanced from him to Abeke with questioning eyes. All Abeke could do was shrug. It wasn't her news to tell.

"Before we make any decisions, I have something to show you," Conor said miserably. "But let's go back up to the courtyard. We'll all feel better out in the daylight."

But the daylight was nearly gone. Afternoon was rapidly declining into twilight when they returned to the courtyard, the shadows lengthening and joining as they deepened toward night.

Conor had been silent all the way out to the courtyard, and now in the waning evening light he held up a hand to stop his companions. "Takoda?" he called softly. "Would you come over here? I need your help—I don't want to get any part of this story wrong."

Takoda stood up, hands clasped within his stiff blue robe.

When the boy stepped away, Kovo startled and grunted loudly, making a flurry of signs. Takoda waited for him to finish, then made a simple sign back and pointed to Abeke and the others.

Kovo signed more and more emphatically, baring his teeth. Abeke felt her hands tighten into fists. Would Kovo attack Takoda, even though they were bonded?

Calmly, Takoda repeated the same simple sign and pointed at the group.

All was still for a moment, then Kovo strained against his chain and roared right into Takoda's face, the noise echoing across the bare courtyard. Chest heaving in anger, Kovo grunted and hurled himself heavily onto the flagstones, his back to them. He punched the ground once, and Abeke heard a crack where the sturdy flagstone split in two.

Visibly shaken, Takoda crossed over. "I think he's ... concerned that you won't heed his warning. Sorry."

"Are you okay?" Abeke asked.

Takoda nodded, lips sealed in a straight line. "What do you need from me?"

Conor had clenched his jaw so tightly that it was shaking. Abeke put a reassuring hand on her friend's wrist, and was relieved when he let it stay.

"When we went to get Kovo and Takoda, Zerif attacked," Conor began. "He was ... different, somehow. More intense. And here was the strangest thing: He had that spiral symbol on his forehead." Conor swallowed. "While we were driving him back, Zerif uncorked a small black bottle. I managed to grab it from his hand." Conor breathed out softly.

From the center of the courtyard, Kovo turned his head enough so he could stare at them, his scarlet eyes narrowed.

"What was in the bottle?" Meilin asked.

"It was ..." Conor faltered.

Takoda spoke gently, answering for him. "It was alive. Some kind of worm."

Conor nodded, casting a grateful look at Takoda. "I chopped at it as soon as it crawled out of the bottle. I thought it was dead, but a little chunk of it wriggled up my blade and entered a cut on my wrist. And that piece ..."

Gritting his teeth, Conor rolled up his sleeve.

Though she'd already heard the story, this was the first time Abeke had seen Conor's wound. She gasped. Starting at a red scab at Conor's wrist, a tendril of gray passed up his forearm, ending slightly before his elbow. It paralleled a blue vein in the middle of Conor's arm. But while the vein was still, this tendril quivered like something alive, just below the skin.

At the elbow, where the living tendril ended, the knob of it throbbed and shifted, curling into new versions of the same shape.

A spiral.

A DESPERATE PLAN

REVEALING THE PARASITE WENT JUST AS CONOR FEARED it would. Abeke gasped and turned her head away; Rollan cast his eyes to the ground; Meilin gritted her teeth and forced herself to keep looking despite her obvious disgust. Conor watched all of it, his heart twisting. There was something bitterly wrong with him, and now he was going to lose the people he loved most in the world because of it.

Conor pulled his sleeve down low so it covered the creature. The creature inside of him. “I don’t know what it is,” he said. “It’s been moving ever since it entered me. I can barely sleep.”

Takoda looked at him with deep pity, and Conor hated it. He felt his face twist into a humiliated scowl. His heart was racing so much, he wondered if his friends could see his veins thudding violently under his skin.

“Hey,” Rollan said, wrapping his arm around Conor’s shoulders. “We’re going to figure this out. You know that, right?”

There was tension in Rollan’s voice. He was lying. Conor was sure of it.

“Does it hurt?” asked Meilin.

Conor shrugged Rollan’s arm off his shoulder. “Not too much. Sometimes I think if I ignored it, it might go away. It’s just so ... disgusting.”

Rollan wouldn’t give up. He threw his arms around his friend. “You’ve been disgusting ever since we’ve known you.”

Conor’s heart filled with relief. Who knew it could feel so good to be teased? But Rollan had always been an expert at it, making him feel loved even as he took him down.

Finally Conor could voice what was worrying him most: “Even though only a small piece of it got inside me, this thing is working its way up my arm. Zerif’s was in his forehead. I think that’s where it’s heading.” Conor’s stomach lurched. “What happens when it gets there?”

“It’s not possible for you to become like Zerif,” Rollan said flatly. “He’s got better hair, for starters.”

“I feel like cutting it out,” Conor said.

“Absolutely not,” Meilin said. “No way are you cutting into your arm.”

“You said even that little fragment of the parasite was able to infect you,” Abeke said. “Last thing we want to do is risk splitting it into more pieces.”

Conor shuddered, then reluctantly nodded.

“All of Greenhaven’s most capable healers have gone to help the Evertree,” Abeke continued. “Who’s left?”

“The best healer of them all, that’s who,” Meilin said. “Jhi.”

The next dawn, the friends met for an early breakfast in the Greenhaven dining room, slate-colored rain drumming the stained-glass windows. The night before, they’d marked in ink how far up Conor’s arm the creature had reached. This morning it was only a tiny bit farther.

“It’s slowed,” Conor said, sighing. “At least there’s that.”

Meilin had spent the night on the floor of Conor’s room so Jhi could be near him while he slept. The panda had worked her healing throughout the night, and though there had been benefits, they’d clearly been minimal. “Did anyone get any sleep?” Meilin asked.

Her friends stared back at her balefully.

Meilin’s hair was sticking straight up in the back. Rollan cut a glance at Conor, silently daring him to comment on it. Abeke gave them a severe look: Don’t you dare.

“While I was staring at the moonbeams on Conor’s ceiling,” Meilin continued, “here’s what I figured: We have two problems to deal with. Zerif is out collecting the Great Beasts as they appear. And something—probably related—is poisoning the Evertree from below.”

“Lenori will know where the Great Beasts are going to appear shortly before it happens,” Abeke said. “We could try to intercept Zerif next time, and stop him for good.”

“Regardless, someone should check out this mysterious door and figure out what’s poisoning the Evertree,” Meilin said. “Problem is, we can’t all do both at once.”

Abeke nodded. “We’ll have to split up.”

“Okay,” Rollan said, gritting his teeth. “I don’t like it, but it’s not like we haven’t done this before. We’ll be back together before long.”

Conor watched as Meilin fixed Rollan a complicated, mournful look.

“What?” Rollan asked. “What did I say?”

Meilin switched to a stop-being-such-a-dolt look. “I’ll need to stay with Conor ... so Jhi can heal him as much as she can.”

“So? ... Oh.”

“Conor and I can check out the door,” Meilin said solemnly. “Rollan and Abeke are our best trackers, which means you two should find the other Great Beasts.”

“I could go alone,” Abeke offered.

“Absolutely not,” Rollan said, sighing. “Zerif was dangerous before he had a bunch of Great Beasts as his personal bodyguards.”

“Thank you,” Abeke said, sighing with relief. “I’d argue harder, but I have to admit the idea was terrifying.”

Conor wasn’t eager to follow the strange doorway into whatever darkness lay beyond it, but he couldn’t see any better option. He was terrified by the worm living inside him. What if Zerif could use it against him somehow—or against his friends?

Meilin and Rollan were staring at each other with moony longing, but Abeke looked right into Conor’s eyes. He could tell from her expression that she’d followed everything that had just passed through his mind. She lay a hand on her friend’s infected wrist. With one move she’d told him that she wasn’t scared of his sickness. Conor’s eyes stung with gratitude.

“I’ll probably regret suggesting this,” Meilin said, “but Kovo is the key to that door, which means he and Takoda should come with us when we go check it out.”

“And a full detail of Greencloaks,” Abeke added. “You’ll need whatever we can spare to watch him.”

“So we won’t have Kovo’s sparkling conversation to entertain us here in Greenhaven?” Rollan asked. “That’s really such a shame.”

Abeke frowned. “Investigate the door, guys. See if it’s safe. But remember that you don’t have to do anything more than that: If that entrance is as old as we think, any tunnels beneath it may have collapsed already. Don’t get yourselves trapped.”

“With the worst enemy we’ve ever known, no less,” Conor said.

“We’ll be careful,” Meilin said, casting one last long look at Rollan. “And we’ll be back before you know it.”

THE PETRAL MOUNTAINS

TAKODA WAS FALLING BEHIND.

The monastery in Nilo had been so tranquil. The quiet, meditative men and women who had taken him in spent their days shuffling through terracotta hallways, whispering to one another in deliberative tones or meditating in the study.

Takoda had spent his life in sandals, and now he was wearing a pair of heavy boots he'd borrowed from Conor. He struggled to keep up. His life had changed so much, so rapidly. He'd left Nilo for the first time, traveled over the sea to Greenhaven, and now he was in the Petral foothills. The monks who raised him were so very far away. A lush green cloak hung around his shoulders. Takoda stroked it admiringly as they trekked.

Meilin was watching. "Remember that you're just wearing a green cloak," she said, a touch imperiously. "That's different from being a Greencloak."

Takoda grimaced and continued marching. Sure, he hadn't joined the order or anything, but all the same he enjoyed the feeling of the heavy cloak clasped around his narrow shoulders. He probably wouldn't say no if they asked him to be a Greencloak someday.

As if he had sensed Takoda's thoughts, Kovo grunted in irritation. Takoda realized he'd pulled a few paces ahead, and returned to the ape's side. Kovo never liked it when Takoda strayed, but the boy wasn't naive enough to think Kovo missed him.

The Greencloak delegation kept itself in a tight circle around Kovo. At first it had made Takoda nervous, but that soon turned to relief when he realized it meant he wouldn't be responsible for the gorilla.

Once a spirit animal bond grew strong, sometimes the animal could disappear as a tattoo somewhere on its human partner's body. The decision to use passive form was ultimately the animal's, however, and Kovo clearly was nowhere near trusting Takoda. So the smiths at Greenhaven had fashioned Kovo a collar with two rings that attached to long poles. Two Greencloaks took up those poles now, positioned on either side of him.

Kovo suffered his indignity stoically, keeping his true feelings well hidden. The powerful gorilla clambered easily over the ground, knuckle-walking his way through brambles and thickets while the Greencloaks struggled to keep pace. As often as not Kovo had his gaze focused up in the clouds; Takoda frequently found himself following Kovo's eyes and wondering what he saw up there.

When they took their first break for the day, Kovo basked in the chill sunshine with his eyes closed, face to the breeze with a serene expression. Long before his captivity in Greenhaven's courtyard, Kovo had been imprisoned for centuries for his crimes. Even chained to two poles, he must be finding this relative freedom sweet.

The Petral foothills were like nothing Takoda had ever seen in Nilo. Brisk winds sheared off jagged, low mountains, sending waves of sharp chill down through the desperate leaves clinging to scraggly bushes. The soil was thin and pebbly, dotted with broad flat stones barbed in green moss. The whole region was one giant shallow basin; ever since they'd crested the mountains at the Eura-Zhong border, they'd been slowly descending—toward what, Takoda didn't know.

He planted his numb, red fingers under his arms to keep them at least a little warm.

"How is Olvan so fast?" Takoda asked Meilin, huffing as he struggled to make his way up a rise. His breath made little cotton puffs wherever he went. The leader of the Greencloaks was bounding over a rise half a mile ahead.

Meilin shrugged. "His spirit animal is a moose. I guess we're in a moose-y kind of place."

Meilin had brought Jhi into passive state, to spare the panda the trek. It was a moment that would forever be seared in Takoda's memory: As soon as the ground grew rough, Meilin had taken Jhi's face in her hands and they took a good long look at each other, both of them nodding once they'd finished their wordless deliberation. Takoda couldn't imagine a spirit animal relationship more different from his own.

"Briggan is a wolf," Conor said. "But even he's finding it hard to keep up." Beside him, Briggan barked indignantly at the challenge. The wolf took off hurtling over the countryside, soon overpassing even Olvan. He took occasional leaps of pure joy.

Conor grinned after him, the worry so frequently on his face melting momentarily away.

Toward late morning, Olvan called the group to a halt on a rocky crest. "Look!" he called triumphantly.

Takoda scanned the landscape but could see nothing all that different from the rest of the steppe they'd traveled. "It's ... pretty?" he tried.

"Olvan, I see what you mean," Conor said. "It's just like the map!"

Now that Conor had pointed it out, Takoda could see it. At the lowest point in the valley, dense shrubbery closed in, masking whatever was at the bottom.

He heard a scuffle behind him, and his heart seized when he turned and saw the two Greencloaks, both barrel-chested Eurans, struggling mightily to keep Kovo in line with the collar. Kovo kept walking forward, despite his restraints. Then, with no apparent effort at all, he took a leap, yanking the poles clean out of the guards' hands.

No! Be good! Takoda signed.

Kovo stared back, expressionless. It was typical; sometimes Kovo would sign fluently at Takoda, and other times he'd pretend not to understand a single gesture. The message he sent by being so selective was unmistakably clear: I'm the one in charge. Don't forget it.

Conor fell into a fighting position, but Takoda laid a restraining hand on his new friend's shoulder. He wouldn't stop the Greencloaks from battling Kovo if it came to blows, but Takoda knew his spirit animal well enough to see that the ape wasn't about to attack. There was the trace of a wicked smile on his face, though—clearly Kovo had enjoyed the game of pretending that he was under their control ... and had enjoyed proving it wrong even more.

Kovo stood on all fours at the top of the ridge, scrutinizing the densely wooded basin. Olvan edged close to the ape, his moose hovering over him protectively. A shiver passed over Takoda as he watched his spirit animal—the Great Beast that had nearly conquered the world—stand shoulder-to-shoulder with the leader of the Greencloaks. With that one simple display of force, Kovo had made it hard to say who was truly in charge.

The two burly Greencloaks brought Kovo's poles back up, but the ape took advantage of the pause to barrel forward, dragging one of the men a dozen feet before the surprised Euran let go.

“Briggan, tail him!” Conor said. But the wolf was already on it. Nose low to the ground and tail pointed straight back, he shot off on the chase, his whole body taking the shape of a javelin. Conor, Meilin, and Takoda fell in behind, scrambling to keep their footing on the dim and scrabbly forest trail. Takoda heard Conor tumble beside him, but couldn't afford the time to help him up—Briggan was letting out a stream of barks so that the rest could more easily follow, but they were getting fainter as he and the ape pulled ahead.

When Conor and Takoda flagged, Meilin assuredly sprinted past, easily hurdling upturned roots and fallen trees. Takoda picked up speed as he switched from following Briggan's sounds to watching Meilin's whipping hair as she leaped and ran.

Though he couldn't risk letting his gaze leave the path for even a second, Takoda became aware of ruined walls blurring by. Beneath his feet, the ground changed from soil and moss to overgrown mosaic floors and shards of dull broken pottery. “We've entered some ancient city,” Takoda puffed to Conor. “Abandoned.”

“Maybe we're about to find out why!” Meilin shouted from up ahead.

“Be careful,” Takoda called. “Don't trust Kovo!”

“Don't you worry about that!” Meilin disappeared around a curve, then yelled back for Takoda and Conor to stop. Takoda was already barreling around the mossy brick corner, though, and nearly slammed into her. She threw her arms around him to bring him to a halt before he tumbled.

As Takoda caught his breath, he realized they were standing at the edge of what might have been a moat during a rainier season. It was only about four feet deep but a good dozen feet across, its bottom full of pine needles and dirt. It extended far into the distance on one side and stopped in a solid rock wall on the other; they'd have to cross it to continue the trail.

Kovo must have made the same decision for himself: He was already standing on the debris clogging the moat, raised on two legs as he stared apprehensively along its length. The gorilla was perfectly motionless, and Takoda could see the tension rippling up and down his muscular legs. Clearly Kovo's footing was precarious beneath the dirt and pine needles, though Takoda couldn't see exactly why.

Stop. Return, Takoda signed.

Kovo roared and made one simple sign, his scarlet eyes glittering in anger. No.

"Look!" Conor said, pointing at the cluttered moat floor.

At first Takoda couldn't see what Conor was referring to. Then, glinting from below, he saw rusty spear tips where the leaves and rubble parted a far ways down. It was a trap! But the rigged pit must have been so old that it was clogged, and hadn't fired. Yet.

Stop. Return, Takoda signed again. He cursed. If only he and Kovo knew more than ten symbols, he could explain the danger.

But Kovo had already figured it out. His gaze returned to the terrain below and the stones that shifted precariously under his feet. He must have raced over the moat, and then gone still once he sensed the danger below.

But not still enough.

Kovo's weight shifted slightly, and Takoda heard a grinding sound deep underground as a mechanism started moving. Kovo flashed a desperate look at Takoda. The grinding sound intensified, and then the stones under Kovo's feet gave way. Kovo cried out and suddenly dropped, disappearing up to his waist in stones and soil.

If he'd had a moment to think, Takoda might have let Kovo continue to fall. But he saw the ape tumbling to his death, and instinct took over. Takoda dashed toward his spirit animal, over the wobbling stones of the pit floor, which fell toward the spikes with every step.

A furious light burned in Kovo's eyes, and then, in a flash, his arm was around Takoda's waist. Leaping into the air, the gorilla just managed to catch the far wall of the moat and hurl himself up. The ground beneath the moat roiled, then disappeared as rocks and debris tumbled somewhere below.

Takoda fell against Kovo, landing hard onto the ape's chest. For a moment the two remained there in a strange embrace, struggling to catch their breath. Then Kovo pushed Takoda roughly to one side and rose on all fours.

“Are you okay, Takoda?” Meilin called.

He couldn’t seem to get enough breath in his lungs to reply. But he nodded as the stones in the pit continued to gnash and fall away.

“What do we do?” Conor asked Meilin. To Briggan, though, the right way forward was obvious. The wolf backed up, got a running start, and leaped across the churning stones of the moat.

“Go!” Conor cried to Meilin, after seeing Briggan scabble up to safety on the far side of the shifting floor.

Briggan had apparently had enough of Kovo’s chase. The wolf’s hackles raised and he took feinting lunges toward the ape, long teeth bared and growls rumbling out from deep in his throat.

Kovo and Briggan would have to fight it out themselves. Takoda’s attention was on the far side of the moat, where great gaps now appeared, revealing even more spikes. For a few moments, at least, there was still enough earth intact that his Greencloak friends might be able to pick their way across.

Meilin jumped first, aiming for the most solid section of the moat floor. She landed, but sank up to her ankles in the loose soil. It held long enough for her to leap to the next. With each hop she left fewer footing options open to Conor.

Takoda watched as the pale boy gritted his teeth and chose his own path, a few feet to one side of Meilin. Looking at the pit of rusty spears below, Takoda’s mind filled with flashing horror.

Meilin grunted as she made her final leap, only just reaching the far side. Her fingers clawed deep into rocky dirt. “Come on, Conor!” she cried.

Conor was perched on a teetering square of earth. There was only one foothold left that he could hop to in order to reach the far side, but it was already crumbling. He paused, unsure of himself, unsure of whether it would hold. Then, before Conor could act, the ground beneath him gave way and he was falling toward rusty spear points—

—until a strong arm reached out from the far side of the moat and snagged the belt around Conor’s midsection. Takoda watched in disbelief as, with impossible agility, Kovo stepped right around Briggan’s snapping jaws, reached to fish out Conor, and hurled the boy through the air. Conor skidded along the ground and got to his feet as soon as he could, looking back to see Kovo climbing out of the half-fallen moat. The ape raised himself onto all fours, panting heavily. Briggan had ceased his attack and looked completely puzzled, his hackles still raised and one hesitant paw in the air.

“What just happened?” Conor asked, shaking his head as he staggered to his feet.

“Kovo saved your life,” Takoda said, kneeling beside the gorilla. Kovo stared furiously at his hands, clenched into tight fists in his lap. He raised one and used it to shove Takoda away.

“It wasn’t a moat,” Meilin said, peering down. “It was a trap. Whoever’s city this once was, they didn’t want anyone going farther.”

Takoda ignored her. Thank you, he signed to Kovo.

The ape didn’t make any response. He’d never made the signs for you’re welcome—or thank you or sorry, for that matter—to Takoda. Maybe he hadn’t learned them. Maybe he didn’t know the concepts.

The ape stared at Takoda, red eyes glittering. Takoda signed one more time. Thank you.

Kovo grunted. Then he sprang into motion, hurtling past Briggan and hustling off down the trail. A second too late, Briggan lunged at him, his jaws clamping over empty air. Briggan shook his head, surprised to have missed, then took off to follow Kovo, his teeth bared.

“Do you have any idea where Kovo is going?” Conor asked Takoda.

Takoda shook his head. “I wish I did. Kovo only signs to me when it’s useful for him.”

“Hustle, guys. We don’t want to lose them,” Meilin said. She took off after Briggan and Kovo.

“What about Olvan and the others?” Conor asked, casting a glance back along the trail. They could hear the sounds of the rest of the Greencloaks, still far off.

“They’ll have to go around or find some other way across,” Meilin said, “Kovo can’t go free. That has to be our first priority.”

Part of Takoda thought that losing Kovo sounded pretty appealing, actually. But he suspected that, for good or bad, he’d always have Kovo to deal with.

Takoda saw Briggan's tail only a short ways down the path, fur sticking out stiffly. He couldn't see what the wolf was looking at, but he was at full attention.

"What is it, Briggan?" Conor asked.

As they turned the corner, Takoda saw it.

The giant maw.

It was like the earth itself had a mouth, open and hungry, waiting for prey to fall in. Cupped in the face of a mossy shale cliff side, here were the rows of sharp teeth above and below. And above it all, carved into the cave's overhang, the symbol of a twisting spiral.

It looked like that mouth wanted to drink the world above, drink and drink, as long as it took to swallow the sky down.

Seeing the gaping maw, all Takoda wanted to do was turn around and go back. Rattled, he tried to reason with himself. This cave entrance must have been designed to strike terror, he scolded himself, and you're letting it work.

Kovo was on his feet, swaying trancelike as he stared into the opening. Then he got down to all fours and stepped forward.

"Can you get him to stop?" Conor asked Takoda. "Olvan and the others should be here for this."

"Um, no," Takoda said. "But if you want to try, be my guest."

Kovo stepped under the overhang, then disappeared into the darkness.

"He can't get away!" Meilin gasped. "Kovo has a plan, and whatever it is, I don't trust it!"

Briggan looked at Conor, waiting for him to act. But Conor was retreating inside himself, his hand nervously clutching the arm where the parasite was growing and spreading. Seeing Conor's indecision, Briggan barked.

"This is what we came here for, right?" Takoda said, lips set in a grim line. "Saving the Evertree. I'm going after him."

Steeling his courage, he stepped over the carved lower teeth and entered the gaping jaw. He could hear the others following behind him. Whether or not Takoda trusted Kovo, they were all going to follow the ape. The fate of the Evertree—of the spirit animal bond itself—depended on them.

Light had been scarce in the dense forest city, but it was pitch-dark beneath the overhang. Takoda reached at his belt for one of the skinny torches Conor had given him from the Greenhaven stock, and struck it against the attached flint. It lit with a flurry of sparks and then a steady flame.

Takoda gasped. Scarlet eyes glittered at him, only inches away. Takoda nearly dropped the torch in fright. Steadying himself, drawing on every ounce of self-control the monks had instilled in him, Takoda forced himself to meet Kovo's gaze. The gorilla gave one grunt in his direction and made a sign: Follow. Then he lumbered off, his black hair soon merging with the surrounding darkness.

Meilin and Conor tight by his side, Takoda shuffled after Kovo, probing the ground with the toe of his boot to make sure they didn't walk into another chasm.

Briggan whined softly but kept moving forward. The wolf had better dark vision than the humans did, so it was a small reassurance that he was comfortable with traveling deeper into the cave.

Takoda felt a sudden cold draft, then the ground pitched unexpectedly downward. He swung the torch forward, and its light caught the trail of silver hair along Kovo's spine. The gorilla was close in front of them, staring at something farther along the passageway.

Takoda maneuvered the torch so it would illuminate whatever had caught the ape's attention.

The stone walls of the cave dead-ended at an ancient wooden door. The wood was splintered and riddled with wormholes, and probably would have fallen apart centuries ago if it hadn't been for the thick rusty bands that reinforced it lengthwise and crossways.

"Here's our doorway," breathed Meilin.

"Olvan!" Conor yelled, in the blind hope that the elder Greencloak had somehow found a way to follow. The only response was his own echo. They were on their own.

"Well, we'll just have to wait here," Meilin said. "No way we're going through that door without the others."

"That sounds wise," Takoda said, though he didn't relish the idea of waiting in this dark and mysterious cave, either. He could hear large skittering insects somewhere nearby, and the plunk-plunk of dripping water beneath the hissing of his torch.

"We should go back into the daylight and wait for them," Conor said.

Apparently Kovo didn't relish waiting by the door, either. But his solution was different: The gorilla picked up its iron-ring handle and, before anyone could stop him, gave it a tug.

The door held firm. Briggan growled warningly, snapping his jaws.

“Stop him!” Conor said.

Meilin was the first to leap to the attack, her quarterstaff out. She streaked it toward Kovo’s head, but he pivoted and knocked it aside with a massive forearm. The quarterstaff glanced away harmlessly.

The gorilla gave the door another mighty tug.

It was Briggan’s turn to attack. The wolf lunged forward and caught Kovo’s ankle in his jaws. Kovo roared in pain but kept his footing.

Enraged, Kovo switched tactics. Instead of pulling, he battered.

Yanking his ankle out of the wolf’s jaws, the gorilla took two thudding steps before hitting the door squarely with his meaty shoulder, the poles that had once restrained him clattering at his sides. The door bent and groaned, then finally tumbled from its hinges entirely.

There was a rush of fetid air from a frigid black corridor, and an ominous rumble.

Kovo stepped in.

As soon as he did, there was a crunching sound. The heavy stone arch above the door fell an inch. The rocks shivered: They wouldn’t hold for long.

Takoda wavered. From behind him, the crunching sound got louder. It sounded like loud crackling now, almost like a giant tree being felled. He could flee back into the daylight if he wanted.

Meilin yelled, but her words were lost in the clamor.

The stone around them crackled again, a sound almost like fireworks, and then it roared. Suddenly Briggan was rushing by Takoda, sprinting into the corridor after Kovo. The kids ran after the wolf, hurtling into the passage just as the cave behind them collapsed in on itself. That door must have been holding up the great weight of stone and earth, and once it had fallen, all the rest had tumbled in, too.

“Run!” Meilin yelled, her footsteps clattering in the darkness.

Something heavy caught Takoda’s heel and he spilled, tumbling onto slick stone. The corridor slanted sharply down, and as he rolled forward he bowled into someone—Meilin or Conor—and they tumbled together. Down became up, then went back to being down. Takoda’s nose smashed into a wall. He tasted blood in his mouth as he continued to plummet deep into the earth, only slowly coming to rest.

For a moment, all was noise. Then black stillness. Though he couldn't see any of it, rock dust must have been everywhere—every time Takoda breathed in, he coughed and gagged.

Takoda felt Briggan's tongue lick his cheek. He managed to free one hand where it was wrenched under him, and reached up to stroke the side of the wolf's snout. If Briggan was safe, did that mean the others were? The thought gave him some strength, which he used to lift his head and look around.

On his other side he discovered that the torch was still lit, sputtering against the stone nearby. Takoda took it into his sore fingers and lifted it.

Meilin and Conor were sprawled together on the other side of Briggan, laid out flat. Takoda watched them blink back at him in the darkness. "Are you okay?" he asked.

"Yes," Meilin groaned. "Just."

Conor nodded gingerly.

Takoda didn't need to ask Kovo whether he was okay. The ape was seated to one side. His black hair was covered in a soft layer of clay dust, but otherwise he seemed unaffected by the collapse. For a moment his penetrating eyes seemed to look right through Takoda. Then he turned his head and peered off into the darkness, where a corridor sloped into the void, seemingly without end.

Calmly, as easily as if it had been made of wet paper, Kovo reached up and plucked off his collar.

HUNTING

“BUT IT’S SO CLOSE,” ROLLAN SAID, AN UNCHARACTERISTIC whine to his voice as they sailed past the Concorba skyline. He stretched his arms as far as he could over the railing of Tellun’s Pride II, as if hoping to stroke the buildings.

Their ship was going right by the city where Rollan had spent his childhood. Since he’d been a homeless thief back then, Abeke hadn’t expected to see Rollan feeling nostalgic for the place. But home was always home, she knew, and that fact could never be changed.

“Don’t worry, we’ll visit Concorba on the way back,” she said. “You can give me a tour, and we’ll stop in and say hello to all the shop owners you stole from back in the day. That should be fun.”

Rollan chuckled, but it didn’t last long. Abeke noticed his hand absently toying with his green cloak. Maybe Rollan actually did want to go to Concorba, wanted to let everyone from his street urchin past know how much he’d made of himself.

“Maybe on the way back we can stop in the market and see if they have anything our friends would like,” Abeke continued quietly. “I’ll help you pick out something for Meilin.”

“She’s the one who gets to go cave diving,” Rollan said. “Meilin should be picking a gift out for me. Like a fossilized cave bat or something.”

It was windy on deck, and Abeke wrapped her own cloak tightly around herself, tucking it under her arms for extra warmth. Much as she tried to stay open-minded, she suspected she was never going to like northern Amaya. The people were friendly, and there were cloudless skies and vibrant woods circling brilliant blue lakes. But it was also so cold. It would only get colder, too: Tellun's Pride II would be heading farther north into the wild lake region before they disembarked.

Rollan smiled ruefully at himself. "When Lenori sent word that another Great Beast was being reborn, I hoped she'd send us to some tropical island. Like maybe Mulop had showed up beside a pristine beach, and we could have a nice philosophical conversation with our favorite octopus while sipping from coconuts."

"Could be Ninani the Swan," Abeke mused. "Since swans spend time in the north of Amaya during the summer. It's spring now, but she might have arrived here early."

Rollan snapped his fingers. "Arax the Ram, of course! He was from Amaya."

An idea suddenly struck Abeke. "You don't think it could be ... Tellun?" The idea of it was awe-inspiring. The other Great Beasts had often deferred to Tellun. The elk had been their leader, powerful enough to imprison even Kovo.

"Tellun," Rollan said, knocking on the wooden rail of Tellun's Pride II. "Huh. That would be appropriate enough, wouldn't it?"

When a cry rose from the ship's crow's nest, Abeke fell into a fighting pose and prepared to summon Uraza. But Rollan laid a restraining hand on her arm. "That means the crew sighted the drop-off point. We're nearly there."

Abeke forced her shoulders to relax. She'd been tense ever since she got on board, and because Uraza hated ship travel, she didn't even have the comfort of her leopard companion to sustain her. With its burnished cherry wood, the new flagship of the Greencloaks was even more beautiful than the previous, but this trip had brought back memories of navigating with Shane all the way to Greenhaven, sharing tender moments on deck, only to arrive and discover that he'd betrayed them all. That felt so long ago now, but as much as she tried to blot him from her mind, memories of the handsome blond boy resurfaced in unexpected moments.

The ship pulled up at a simple wooden pier that jutted from the mossy banks of the lake far into the sparkling water. This was the last spot of deep water before the inlet they were traveling on dissolved into streams and tributaries. From here they'd have to continue on foot.

Abeke and Rollan clambered below and emerged with the rucksacks they'd packed and repacked during their few days at sea, struggling on the swaying deck to get the straps over their shoulders.

"You know," Rollan said as Tellun's Pride II eased alongside the pier, "it might work to our advantage that we'll be hunting for our meals. Many of the people of Northern Amaya are nomadic, following the herds throughout the year. They sold meat in Concorba sometimes. Finding good hunting should also mean finding them."

Abeke's fingers strayed to the smooth Niloan wood of the short bow strapped to her back. She hadn't needed to hunt while at Greenhaven, and she missed the pleasure of it. Not the killing of the animal—that always came with a fierce sorrow—but roaming the open country, at one with the natural world.

Abeke's heavy canvas bag creaked and shifted as she stepped toward the gangplank. "We need all the luck we can get," Abeke said, "if we want to find the next Great Beast before Zerif does."

Abeke and Rollan fleetly made their way down the pier, striding out into brisk open air. Abeke opened her arms and stared up at the cloudless sky, its broad blue struck through with sunshine. She couldn't control herself—she let out a loud giggle at the beautiful and grand adventure promised by that huge sky. She practically danced off the ship.

"What's gotten into you?" Rollan chuckled. But then Essix left her perch at the summit of the ship's crow's nest and swooped over them, giving a joyful cry. Rollan, too, broke into a broad smile. When Abeke released Uraza, the leopard sprang forward, bounding over the grassy tufts that dotted the firm black soil of the Amayan earth. Abeke laughed out loud as Uraza hunted an azure butterfly, pouncing after it wherever it fled.

It felt great to be free.

"Where to?" Rollan asked.

"Anywhere!"

"No seriously, where to?"

Abeke pivoted, scanning the landscape. The land stretched flat as far as she could see, cupped on three sides by snowcapped mountains. There was a lot of territory to investigate. "Good question," she said, stalling.

Rollan smirked. “Erlan told us that springtime means the yak are herding and heading north. We should be able to catch them wherever we see the most green, because that’s where there’s food for them to eat.”

Abeke gaped at him, dumbfounded.

“What?” Rollan said defensively. “I can’t have a good idea every once in a while?”

“It’s a great idea,” Abeke said, smiling to herself. “Scouting the greenest area means first getting to a vantage point. I say we climb that hill over there and see what we can see.”

“Hill?! By hill do you mean that staggeringly high mountain?”

Abeke grinned and started off.

Rollan grumbled all the way up, but Abeke sensed he didn’t mean it. She was well aware of his sprightly step and how his eyes shone whenever he looked up at the brown arc of Essix wheeling in the bright sky. Abeke felt her body limbering during the hike, long-unused muscles stretching and lengthening.

It was late afternoon by the time they crested the summit, orange scatters of light from the declining sun bursting over the landscape. Between dense stands of pine were rolling expanses of emerald grass, and passing along one of those swaths was the largest herd of animals Abeke had ever seen. There were so many of them that at first Abeke thought she was seeing a river.

“Amayan Yak,” Rollan reported. “I used to see their pelts for sale in the Concorba market, but I’ve never seen a live one before. Any hunter worth her salt in this region will be tailing them.”

“Which means we need to be tailing them as well,” Abeke said. “Though I don’t think we’ll be reaching that herd by sundown.”

“Time to make camp,” Rollan said. “And let’s do it somewhere other than this windy mountaintop, please.”

The next day, they made better time than Abeke had predicted; it wasn’t yet midday before they’d reached the edge of the herd. A pair of elderly yaks were lagging behind, ribs stark under their patchy fur. Though either of them would make for an easy kill, Abeke resisted stringing her bow and taking one down. She and Rollan had discovered fresh water and plump breadtree buds near their campsite, and they'd filled their bellies without needing to hunt.

It became clear that Abeke had made the right choice when the pair of yaks parted and revealed a calf between them, no more than a few days old, poking its way forward on knocking knees. Perhaps its own mother had died, and this elderly pair was caring for the little beast. It, too, would make for an easy kill. Though Abeke had spared these yaks, she knew that another hunter easily might not; they'd strayed too far from the herd and were easy pickings.

Beside her, Rollan made a loud clicking noise at the back of his throat. All three yaks stilled, heads raised. From where he and Abeke were hidden in a thatch of plainsgrass, Rollan clicked again. The yaks startled and raced back toward their herd.

"What do you think you're doing?" Abeke asked.

"They need to be back with the safety of their kind," Rollan said indignantly. "I only—"

"You clearly don't know herding animals!" Abeke pointed to the herd, where the three scared yaks were joining the rest, bleating their heads off. Alarmed, the thousands of yaks took off at high speed. The resulting roar shook the countryside, the ground rumbling.

"Oh," Rollan said quietly. "I think I caused a stampede."

"Yes," Abeke sighed. "You definitely caused a stampede."

Giving up on remaining camouflage, Abeke took off sprinting toward the herd. Rollan and Uraza followed, the leopard loping quickly through the grass, soon overtaking Rollan. Her spots might not blend in with this northern environment, but Uraza could still move more quietly than any other creature Abeke had ever known. Though the yaks were fast, between Uraza on the ground and Essix soaring overhead, they'd have no trouble locating the herd once it calmed down.

After half an hour of tracking, they came to a bottleneck where the forest closed in on either side, choking the plains tight. The herd had to slow as it passed through. "Let's keep ourselves a few hundred paces behind," Abeke called. "Don't forget our goal is to find whoever's hunting this herd, not to stress the animals."

Rollan nodded and slowed. "We could use a break anyway," he panted. Uraza stared at him—a little disdainfully, Abeke thought—and then returned her alert gaze to the herd as it pulled ahead. Abeke gave the frustrated leopard a comforting pet on the flank.

The herd slowed even more, and Abeke and Rollan fell farther and farther behind to wait it out. Once the yaks were clear of the trees, the friends could finally continue forward. The woods edged in as they passed through the bottleneck—the narrowest point was only a few paces away. Abeke peered in curiously as she passed but could see nothing moving.

The same wasn't true for the other side, though. Abeke heard a yowl behind her and turned just in time to see a mountain lion launch out of the woods at her, claws outstretched and ready to rend her apart.

Caught by surprise, Abeke gasped and stumbled.

The tawny, muscular cat hadn't counted on Uraza, though. The leopard was instantly on the attack, leaping so her own body impacted the mountain lion's before it could strike Abeke. The two cats tumbled in the dirt, rolling until they crashed into the side of a boulder.

It was a close match. Uraza was longer, but this cat was more muscular. It gashed the leopard with its powerful back claws, and Uraza howled in pain.

Abeke immediately had her bow off her back and struggled to get it strung, cursing herself for not having predicted an ambush. Rollan's dagger needed no preparations, though, Abeke saw from the corner of her eye as he ran toward the cats. Essix shrieked in the air, probably set to dive in and join the combat.

They would have had this under control. If the mountain lion had been alone.

Abeke felt a sharp pain in her spine, and suddenly her body no longer obeyed her commands. She dropped slackly to the earth, the agony in the back of her neck eclipsing all else. Though she couldn't see what it was, there was a vise on her spine, pushing ever tighter, and she felt a hot line of blood—her blood—stream down her face as she lay still. My spine, she thought. Something is trying to crush my spine.

Then there was a rush of air, and a falcon's scream sounded in her ear. The vise on her neck lifted, and Abeke was able to get her arms under herself enough to see Essix rolling with a second mountain lion. Brown and white feathers flurried into the air.

The element of surprise had allowed Essix to get the mountain lion off Abeke, but the falcon stood no chance in an open combat against a ferocious cat. Fortunately, Rollan was soon upon them. He struck wildly with his dagger, opening a gash along the mountain lion's midsection. Howling, the cat disengaged from Essix and limped away. The falcon hopped into the air but flopped back to ground, one wing dragging, clearly wounded.

The first mountain lion had wriggled free of Uraza and the two faced off against each other, circling in the dirt while they made low growls, fangs bared. As the second lion limped off after the departing yak herd, though, the first one broke away and followed.

Rollan was immediately upon Essix, murmuring words of concern, his arms around the wounded bird. While Essix held her beak closed, stoically silent, Rollan gently probed her wing. "I don't think it's broken," he said, relieved. "Just strained."

Uraza came over and tenderly nudged Essix's wingtip with her nose, making soft concerned meows. Then the leopard turned her attention to Abeke, and when Abeke saw her companion's anxious expression, she realized that her own injuries were the more serious. She pressed her hand against her neck and grimaced when it came back red with blood.

She cautiously turned her head from side to side, and though the movement was painful, it wasn't overly limited. She had a couple of puncture wounds; that was the extent of it. They must have been bleeding so much because they were near her head. She'd had similar injuries before, and she'd gotten over them.

"A rookie mistake," Rollan said ruefully. "We should have realized that more than human hunters would be attracted to this herd of yaks."

"Yes," Abeke said, ripping off a strip from the hem of her shirt and wrapping it tight around her neck. As she did, though, she looked up and saw the mountain lions had regrouped and were going after a new target—the baby yak. It had fallen behind the rest of the herd. Its elderly caretakers stood a few yards away, groaning worriedly but too weak to confront the mountain lions directly.

Normally Abeke would let the natural order take care of itself—maybe this baby yak wasn't meant to live. But then she remembered the jaw around the back of her neck, and Essix's limp wing, and fury rose in her. Her fists clenched and unclenched helplessly. Before she knew it, she'd gotten to her feet. Blinking back light-headedness, she stalked toward the lions, fitting an arrow to her bow.

The panicking little yak was darting this way and that, crying out to its caretakers, begging them to come help him. But the mountain lions were relentless, keeping themselves between the yak and its protectors, edging nearer and nearer to the terrified animal.

Fresh blood was streaming down Abeke's neck, more than she would have expected, and she found it hard to run straight. As she staggered forward, she struggled to string her bow. She wrapped the line around time and again until it held, then pulled an arrow from her quiver with shaking arms. Somewhere behind her, Rollan was calling out, but she couldn't hear him—the whole world was sounding at once, roaring through her head.

The first lion had just made a nip at the baby yak's rear leg when Abeke got near enough to fire. She pulled back the bowstring as quietly as she could, but in her disoriented state, she lost her balance and crushed a stick beneath her heel.

The mountain lions looked up, fully alert, and soon spotted their stalker with her bow and arrow. The little yak looked around in confusion as its would-be killers sped away. Bleating, the baby ran to its elders, and together they headed back to the safety of the herd.

Despite Rollan's cries, Abeke sprinted after the lions. There was a flash of yellow as Uraza cut right in front of her path. What was the leopard trying to do, trip her? "Get out of the way!" Abeke yelled.

But Uraza cut in front of her again, looking up at her with those luminous purple eyes.

More blood ran down her chest, and suddenly the sky was white instead of blue. Abeke staggered forward, sensing Uraza's soft presence at her side as she did. The world began to spin. As she stumbled forward, she became aware of people emerging from the woods all around the clearing, figures with brown skin and thick, braided black hair.

There, too, was the green of the trees, a bed of fallen needles, and that white sky, so white it was cold, a cold that took the world spinning even faster so her feet couldn't stay level upon it, couldn't dig in hard enough to keep her upright.

Abeke fell against warm Uraza, then tumbled onto her back. She tried to force herself upright again, but couldn't.

Her vision turned yellow as Uraza stood directly over her, making a sound Abeke had come to recognize as her protective yowl. Tentatively, Abeke slid out from under the leopard, hand tight on the fabric binding her neck. It was wet with blood.

Abeke couldn't get her eyes to focus. She closed them for a long moment and struggled to open them again. When she did, she had a moment of clear vision and gasped.

She was surrounded by men and women. They were scowling, furs tied around their powerful shoulders. Every last one of them had a spear. And every last one of them had the tip pointed at her.

STONE

STONE WASN'T SILENT. MEILIN REALIZED THAT MUCH AS she trudged along the dark tunnel. There were the sounds she and the others made, of course—Briggan's panting, Kovo's grunts as he knuckle-walked over sharp shards, the syllables of Takoda's meditations, and the soft patter of Conor's boots under the fizzle-splatter of his sparking torch. But the heavy weight all around them made its own noises, too.

Though the stone under their feet wasn't wet, there was water everywhere, running through distant cave systems. Meilin heard constant skittering sounds as small creatures fled, vanishing long before Conor's torchlight reached them.

One time, the escaping creature hadn't sounded small at all. It sounded like footfalls running away—something the size of a human. When they heard it, Meilin cut glances at Conor and Takoda, pointedly avoiding Kovo. Takoda looked back, a finger over his mouth, signaling for silence.

What option did they all have but to continue forward?

The most constant sound was sighing rock. It was a crunching, ominous rumble, like the earth was one huge creature grinding its teeth in a restless sleep. In the darkness, Meilin began to imagine that they were walking down an enormous gullet, that the beast might at any time decide to swallow them all.

So far there hadn't been any options for where to turn, but after sloping downward for a mile, the tunnel branched into two narrow openings. They were in a small, round chamber in the rock, mushrooms along the floor and a puddle of water in the middle. A stalagmite rose from within, covered in moss that gleamed wet and purple in the torchlight.

“Left or right?” Meilin asked.

Takoda shrugged and answered in his soft, melodious voice. “Left and right are not what I’m concerned about. What worries me is that neither Briggan nor Kovo will fit in those tunnels.”

Surprising even herself, Meilin whirled on Takoda, rage making her whole body rigid, her hands tightened into fists. “I don’t care where Kovo does or does not fit! He’s lucky we don’t find the narrowest tunnel we can and leave him trapped down here forever.”

“Meilin,” Conor said in low tones. He placed a tentative hand on her back. “I’m as angry as you are. But we’re stuck down here. We’ll need one another to get out of this alive. Let’s save our fight with Kovo until once we’ve found the surface.”

The fear in Conor’s eyes said what his words didn’t—there might not be a way out.

Kovo met Meilin’s gaze challengingly and let out a long, lewd snort, flapping his lips at the end of it so they sprayed spit on her.

“Takoda,” Meilin said, her words slow and deliberate, “can you sign to Kovo that if he ever dares do that again, I will smash his brains out with my staff?”

“I don’t know those signs,” Takoda said with a worried expression.

Meilin missed Rollan all of a sudden. She could really use his sense of humor right now.

“Kovo did save Conor back at the pit,” Takoda said. “I’m not trying to defend him, but I don’t know why he would do that if his goal all along was to trap us. He made a mistake, that’s all.”

Seeing the gorilla’s glittering, ferociously intelligent eyes, Meilin wasn’t so sure Kovo was the type to make mistakes. But as her rage ebbed, she saw Conor’s point: They all needed one another if they hoped to survive. The horrible weight of the creaking stone pressing down all around them was putting her on edge. If it’s what it took to survive, she’d call a truce with Kovo until she saw the sun again. Whenever that was.

Sighing, Meilin beckoned Conor to the two tunnel entranceways so they could inspect them together. Takoda was right—it would be tricky for the three of them to fit through either one. There was absolutely no way Briggan or Kovo could make it.

“I can bring Briggan into his passive form, of course,” Conor said. “But ...” His voice trailed off as he looked at Kovo.

Takoda lowered himself so he sat cross-legged in front of Kovo, staring into the beast’s eyes. For a few seconds, Kovo looked everywhere but at Takoda—down both tunnels, up into the ceiling, into the torch reflection in the puddle of dark water. Then finally, sulkily, he met Takoda’s eyes.

Meilin was surprised to see not just reluctance in the ape’s expression, but something else—a twinge of anxiety.

Takoda made a series of hand gestures, finishing by tracing the spot on Conor’s forearm where Briggan went into tattoo form. Takoda traced the same area on his own arm.

Kovo looked up at the ceiling for a long moment. Gradually his gaze shifted back to Takoda, then he bowed his head. His eyes glittered, catching even more of the torchlight. He bared his teeth and suddenly roared, beating his chest with his fists.

Meilin and Conor sprang into action. Conor had his fists clenched, and Meilin held her quarterstaff out in guard position.

“No!” Takoda said, right into Kovo’s face.

Meilin wasn’t sure if Takoda had been speaking to them or to Kovo. It didn’t matter, because it was Kovo who got the message. He lowered his chin to his massive chest and sighed a long, puttering sigh.

Kovo made one sign, tracing laurels on the top of his head. Then he delicately placed his thumb between his teeth and bit it.

“King. Worthless,” Takoda translated. He shook his head severely and made the thumb-biting gesture again. “Not worthless.”

Kovo looked at the boy for a long moment, misery etched in his face. Then, with a shimmering flash and a popping sound, the ape vanished.

He reappeared, not as a tattoo on Takoda’s forearm, but on his chin and neck. The image of a gorilla, charging forward with teeth bared, went from the tip of Takoda’s sharp jawline and down his throat, Kovo’s foot stepping on the boy’s collarbone.

Takoda stared in disbelief where Kovo had just been sitting.

“Congratulations,” Meilin said without much enthusiasm. “You and the enemy of Erdas are closer than ever.”

“In the spirit of being as honest as I can be with you,” Takoda said. “I have to tell you that I miss him.”

“Then that makes one of us,” Conor said. Wincing at his own gibe, Conor cast a guilty glance at Takoda. “But I get what you mean. It’s not your fault who you were bonded to. Come on, Briggan.”

At the sound of his name, the wolf nuzzled Conor’s hand. And then, with another shimmer and pop, Briggan disappeared into tattoo form.

Conor stood before one tunnel and then the other, shining the torch down each in turn. “They look identical to me,” he said.

Meilin stood back-to-back with Takoda. “My shoulders are the narrowest of the three of us, just barely. So let me go first and report back. I’ll try the left tunnel, because it seems to slope upward. Since we keep hearing those dripping sounds, I’d rather not end up falling into an underground lake.”

“Good thinking,” Conor said, shuddering. He handed Meilin his torch, then quickly retracted his hand. It was the one with the parasite.

Meilin could only imagine how it would feel to have something like that growing inside of her. Probably not too unlike being bonded to a villain like Kovo, actually. What a state they were all in. She squeezed Conor’s shoulder encouragingly. “I’ll be fine, don’t worry about me.”

“Good luck,” Takoda said. “We’ll be right here if you need help.”

At least their conversation had temporarily gotten Meilin’s mind off the mass of stone over them. Before her nerves could get the better of her, she started down the tunnel. She had to crouch from the start, but as the path narrowed more, it became clear she’d only be able to move forward on her elbows. She lowered herself onto the smooth rocks of the tunnel floor and began to wriggle her way along.

She smelled something burning and realized it was a piece of her own hair. The fumes from the torch were way too close—she’d have to extinguish it. Reluctantly, she pressed the tip against the tunnel wall until the flame went out.

She continued forward into the tight, constricting darkness.

Weight. That was all Meilin could sense as she wedged one shoulder then the other into the narrow tunnel of rock. Above her were tons of solid, heavy stone. All it would take is one shudder, one tremor in the rock, for it all to collapse on top of her. This giant stone beast would swallow her down.

Focus, Meilin. One arm eased forward, then she wriggled the rest of her body behind. She could feel her body pucker and bruise wherever she passed over even the slightest pebble.

Somewhere behind her, Conor was saying something, but she couldn't hear him—her own body had nearly sealed the tunnel tight. All she wanted was to turn back and see the sky again. But now that the opening had collapsed, they had no other options.

Meilin paused. The rock was grinding again.

Her breath came short, and suddenly her only instinct was to struggle, to push back against the rock, to do whatever she could to fight it off. But if the weight was about to fall in on her, then fighting would only make it happen faster. She martialled all the discipline of her warrior training and forced her body to be still.

She could feel the stone shiver against her, pressing her ribs in tight. Tears welled in Meilin's eyes, and her breath came only in rapid gasps.

Then the pressure relented, and the rock was still. Meilin thought of the stone bridges she had helped build in Zhong, how they would sway—but not fall—as their stones contracted and expanded. Maybe the same thing was happening here. Steadying her breath, she forced herself to continue wriggling forward in the darkness.

The tunnel narrowed even more—how was that possible? If she continued this way and got wedged tight, how would Conor and Takoda free her? Maybe they wouldn't be able to. She'd starve or die of thirst. If scavenging animals didn't get her first.

Stop it, Meilin. Terror is your enemy.

She continued forward, using the little free space under her hands to brush the tunnel clear as she wriggled, to gain her even the tiny space that the rock dust took up. Her shoulders wedged tight once, and then she managed to free them, her collarbone wrenching painfully before she could continue forward, now with arms down by her sides.

Relief. A cool, sulfurous breeze hit her face. She'd never been so grateful for something so stinky. As Meilin moved forward, her head and shoulders came free into an open space.

Her first impulse was to hurl forward into freedom, but she stopped herself.

She desperately wished she had space to relight the torch. As she eased forward, the top half of her body was hanging in the sulfurous open air, but her hands were still pressed into her sides. She flailed around, hoping to contact a nearby ledge or bit of ground. But it was all open. What would she do now? She might be a couple of feet above the ground, or the bottom could be hundreds of feet away.

Meilin figured it was best to lean down as far as she could manage and use her fingertips to test whether there was any ground beneath. Leaving the torch pinned against her waist, she wrenched her hands free and felt down and all around. There was nothing below. She'd have to use her feet instead, which would reach farther.

Once enough of her was free, she reversed her grip and eased her legs out. Now her feet dangled low, while only the strength of her fingertips prevented her from falling. She felt a sudden need to summon Jhi, to have the comfort of her companion. But Jhi couldn't fit into the tunnel, and the idea of summoning the panda into open air and watching her plummet was too horrifying to consider.

"Conor?" Meilin called.

She heard his faint reply from the far end of the tunnel. "Yes?"

She realized there was nothing she could ask him for. What would happen next was all up to fate. "Wish me luck!" she called.

"What's happening?" came his distant voice.

"Just wish me luck!"

Meilin stretched her toes, hoping to contact ground. No success. Her fingers began to strain. Then, unexpectedly, a rock came free under one hand and slipped away.

She free-fell for a long second, then struck something soft. Meilin heard a ghastly cry from beneath her and rolled off whatever living thing she'd hit. Something was panting near her.

Then she felt a hand on her chin.

Shouting in panic, Meilin reeled backward, flailing in the darkness. She fell from whatever perch she'd been on. She dropped for another horrible moment, then struck pebbly ground and something wet.

Meilin staggered desperately through the darkness, hands outstretched.

She contacted another warm body, smooth and hairless and strangely oily, and kicked out. The creature, whatever it was, gasped and fell back. Meilin turned in a slow circle, looking all around her but finding only blackness, fists out and ready to strike. “Hello?” she said.

“What do you see?” Conor called.

The torch! Of course—there was a second torch at her waist! Cursing herself, she patted her waist until she found the handle, then struggled to free it.

Before she could light it, though, more hands were on her. They clutched and pulled, tearing her skin. Then sharp fingernails were on her face, yanking at her ears, scraping her cheeks.

Meilin screamed.

THE MANY

CONOR PACED HELPLESSLY, THEN HELD STILL WHEN HE heard Meilin screaming from the far side of the tunnel. When he called out for her and she didn't respond, he prepared to leap into the shaft. "Takoda!" he cried. "Follow me!"

"If Meilin is in trouble," Takoda said behind him, "whatever happened to her will happen to you, too. Think, Conor!"

"I don't care about being reasonable! She needs us!" Conor yelled, whirling with his second torch.

The ruddy light illuminated Takoda's face dramatically, casting shadows down the gorilla tattoo stretching along his neck. "If she's been attacked, you'll head into it face-first, with no way to defend yourself," Takoda said.

"You have more in common with Kovo than you think," Conor snapped. "We're going now!"

Takoda nodded wearily. "I was afraid you wouldn't budge. Okay, let's head in."

Conor handed the torch to Takoda and had begun to wriggle through the tunnel again when Takoda grabbed his ankle.

"Hold on," Takoda said. "Do you hear something?"

Conor realized he could hear scuffling sounds farther along in the tunnel. "Meilin?" he called out. "Is that you?"

The scuffling got nearer.

"Meilin?" Conor called again.

Still no answer. "Back up, back up!" Conor screamed at Takoda.

As Takoda scrambled out of the tunnel behind him, Conor did his best to wriggle in reverse, hustling as fast as he could.

They came free into the chamber, where Takoda pulled in front of Conor and brandished the torch.

A figure, just Meilin's height and weight, raced toward them. "Oh, thank Tellun, Meilin, you're—"

But it wasn't Meilin.

Conor and Takoda fell backward in terror as a scrawny human figure scabbled out of the tunnel on all fours, its twisted yellow fingernails clicking against the stone ground. It was a ghastly gray-white, with barely a hair on its head. Its eyes were wide and pink, and before Conor's eyes the giant black pupils contracted to pinpoints—the torchlight seemed to have the monster dazzled. It froze, its long, skinny arms dragging on the ground.

"What is that?" Conor whispered, reeling backward.

"I don't know," Takoda whispered back, fear tightening his voice. "But look at its forehead."

Conor had assumed it was dirt, but could see clearly now that the creature had a symbol on its forehead—a spiral, just like the one on Zerif's forehead, and on his own arm. He had no time to reflect on it, though, as at that moment another of the strange creatures emerged from the tunnel—then a third, and a fourth.

"We have to get out of here!" Takoda yelled.

"What about Meilin?" Conor said.

This time, the creatures heard them. They pressed their milky eyelids shut and lunged at the boys blindly, clawlike fingernails outstretched, clashing whenever they struck the chamber's stone walls. Conor and Takoda instinctively fell back, tumbling to the ground and scuttling backward on all fours.

Whether summoned by Takoda or appearing from his own will, Kovo was suddenly back among them. With a pop, the gorilla appeared in the round chamber, seizing the torch where Takoda had dropped it in one clean motion. He stood over the kids protectively, the flaming light tight in his strong black hand. Now that their eyes were closed, however, the creatures were no longer scared of the light. They lurched toward them, slowly circling the round cavern, easing closer and closer. Mightily as Kovo swung the torch, it did nothing to keep them at bay.

All the while, more and more monsters emerged from the tunnel.

One of them contacted Conor, wrapping a clammy and surprisingly strong hand around his wrist. Conor cried out and whirled in an attempt to break free. The creature gnashed its sharp teeth in the air, trying to get them around his forearm.

Takoda had a slender knife out—his only weapon—and stepped toward the monsters, slashing wildly. Kovo roared and motioned for them to return to his side. Though in any other situation he'd have been reluctant to take orders from his former enemy, Conor willingly pressed his back tight against Kovo's, while Takoda did the same.

Kovo wrapped one strong hand around the leg of the nearest ghoulish creature and, with a grunt, whipped it into the air, flailing the limp form into the surrounding monsters. Then Kovo threw the lifeless body to one side, roaring and beating on his chest.

The torch tumbled away in the process, and Conor scrambled to pick it up. As he did, one of the monsters leaped onto his back. Conor staggered about, backing into walls, desperately trying to free himself. But more creatures continued to pour out of the tunnel. Another latched on to Conor's back while he was still fighting off the first.

With a furious roar, Kovo set himself on the creatures thronging them, one powerful arm plucking monsters from Conor and the other from Takoda. As Kovo bent over in his task, three of the ghouls leaped onto the gorilla's back, with more behind them clamoring to get on. Even mighty Kovo staggered under their combined weight, bleeding from multiple bites.

Conor summoned Briggan. The wolf appeared in midair and leaped to the attack, whirling and lunging as best he could in the close quarters of the dark cave, dancing in and out of the torchlight as he pounced and wheeled, pale ghastly creatures falling under his jaws time and again.

Kovo used the surprise of Briggan's appearance to press the offensive, reaching to the ground and heaving up whatever debris his hands found on the cave floor. Heaps of rock flew into the air, strafing their attackers. But more and more creatures continued to pour through the tunnel.

"Meilin!" Conor yelled. She'd been right where these monsters emerged from, and the thought of it filled his heart with icy dread. Conor couldn't stand to imagine what the ghouls had already done to her. "Too many to fight!” he gasped. “We need to retreat before they block the tunnel to the surface.”

“They’ll easily chase us down!” said Takoda.

One of the creatures got its jaw around Kovo’s ankle. The gorilla roared in pain, nearly losing his footing before Briggan managed to hurl it away. But Briggan was having trouble of his own: A creature ripped its sharp yellow fingernails into his ear. The wolf’s blood gleamed in the torchlight.

Conor felt his own flesh tear as one of the beasts clawed at his throat. It was all he could do to jam its forehead away with the heel of a hand, but as he did his fingers slid into the creature’s open mouth. If it clamped its sharp teeth down, Conor might lose them all in one bite.

The creature began to bite down.

But then the world filled with light.

Dazzled, Conor looked up into the blinding white flash, blinking as he whisked his hand free. Tears streamed down his face. He couldn’t see anything beyond the afterglow that had burned purple into his vision. He heard Briggan whining in pain nearby and staggered toward the sound, finally making contact with his spirit animal’s coarse fur. Kovo panted nearby, and Conor could hear Takoda groaning not far away.

Conor’s eyes gradually adjusted enough that the cave resolved into view. Lavender light seeped from a stone lying in the middle of a puddle on the cavern’s floor. Conor realized it was some strange kind of flare, giving off ever-weakening light.

The light bomb seemed to affect the ghoulish creatures much more strongly. They were laid out flat on the floor, whimpering and quivering, fingers clamped over their eyes. Already the first was struggling to regain its feet in the dwindling light.

“Up here!” came a female voice high above them, on the far side of the cavern.

Conor looked up, shielding his eyes as best he could from the painful lavender glow. A slender figure stood at the edge of a hole high up in the cavern’s ceiling. “Meilin? Is that you?” Conor asked, confused.

“No,” the girl said. “No time to explain—these monsters won’t be stunned for much longer. Hurry up!”

Still dazed, Conor watched the girl lower a rope down the twenty feet or so from the entrance. With a familiar pop, Briggan disappeared into his tattoo. “Takoda!” Conor said. “Get Kovo into his passive state! Hurry!”

Takoda bit his lip. “I’m trying!”

Kovo took it into his hands—literally. He placed his large, hairy fists on top of Takoda’s shoulders and stared deeply into the boy’s eyes. Then Takoda gasped, like he’d been punched, and in a flash Kovo became a tattoo on the boy’s neck. Conor shook his head. Of course it would be Kovo who got to decide precisely where to become a tattoo—and then place himself in such a prominent position.

The two boys stepped over the moaning and shifting bodies, stealing toward the rope. Conor gave it one tug to test it, and then held it out to Takoda. The slender boy easily clambered up. Conor followed, working his way up the slick length of braided fiber, all the way to the top. He hurled himself over the edge and sprawled out flat, gasping for breath.

“No rest yet,” the mysterious girl said, still only a silhouette before Conor’s seared retinas. “Help me pull this up, quick!”

Conor couldn’t find the strength to stand but he rolled onto his belly and, together with Takoda and the girl, heaved on the rope. A creature had just reached it as they whisked it up. The ghastly beast beat its fists against the cavern wall in frustration.

Conor lay on his back, gasping. He couldn’t muster the strength to resist when the girl removed one of the torches from his belt and lit it.

“What a marvelous thing, these lights,” she said. Clearly the illumination was painful for her. Although she closed her eyes to slits, they streamed tears, even in the dim light.

When Conor propped himself up, he saw a girl about his own age and pale as ether, with short white hair and eyes that were a soft pink. She was like a beautiful, delicate version of the creatures below. Even so, Conor found himself staggering back against the tunnel wall in fear, preparing to summon Briggan.

“It’s okay,” came a voice Conor knew as well as his own. “She’s a friend.”

Conor gave a sob of relief.

Meilin crept into the torchlight, a smile on her face. “I fell right into the nest of those things. Xanthe swept down from above and helped me out on one of her rope ladders. These caverns are honeycombed with passages above. She knows all of them. We had to go the long way around, and raced through the tunnels to the top of the cavern as soon as we could.”

“You were attacked by the beings my people call the Many,” the girl said in a delicate and unfamiliar accent. “The only defenses we have against them are our tunnels. There’s a whole system of ladders and traps. You wouldn’t have stood a chance, two boys against all of them.”

She doesn’t know we have spirit animals, Conor realized. On instinct, he decided to keep Briggan and Kovo a secret until he knew more about this mysterious girl. Takoda clearly had the same thought: He slyly buttoned his borrowed green cloak tight, so that its cowl hid his neck up to the chin.

“What are those things?” Conor asked.

“You saw the symbol on their foreheads? They used to be like my people, but they ... changed. There will be time later to explain, but it’s not safe to linger in the territory of the Many. Please, come with me.”

Conor’s stomach dropped, though he tried to hide it. Seeing those monsters might have been seeing his own future. Trying to keep his terror out of his face, he shot a look at Meilin and Takoda. Not any other option but going along with her, is there? They shot him similar glances back.

Before they headed up the tunnel, Meilin clasped Conor close to her. “I’m so glad you’re okay,” she said loudly. Then she whispered: “Keep the spirit animals a secret.”

She’d had the same instinct as he and Takoda.

They passed down the tunnel, Xanthe taking the lead, crouching and moving ably forward on all fours. She wore a simple charcoal-colored shift, woven from some shimmering material that Conor had never seen before. She carried no weapons that he could see.

He took in her white-pale skin. Even though this stranger had saved their lives, Conor found it hard to blot the monsters Xanthe had called the Many from his mind.

As they crept down the tunnels, Xanthe looked back admiringly at the torch in Conor’s hand, though it still made her eyes stream tears. “Such a marvelous thing. All the lights we have down here are so temporary in comparison.”

Conor smiled and shook his head. “I never thought a torch was that special. We have so many of them where we're from."

"Where is that?" Xanthe asked, her tone studied and neutral.

"Aboveground," Meilin said.

Xanthe stopped, hands clasped in front of her mouth. Her eyes shone with awe. "That's what I'd hoped. But I hadn't dared assume it."

"Why is being from above so special?" Conor asked.

"Because it's been a thousand years since anyone traveled here from the surface," Xanthe said. "You've come to stop the Wyrms, as my people have long hoped. We've been waiting centuries for you to save us. Welcome to the land of Sadre."

THE HEALER

TRY AS SHE MIGHT, ABEKE COULDN'T MAKE THE WORDS she was hearing come together into anything that had meaning. In front of her wavering vision, so close to her nose that it appeared double, a spear tip trembled in the air. Abeke held perfectly still—partly to keep the armed tribespeople calm, and partly because of the puncture wound on her neck. Uraza was hunched protectively over her torso, making low warning growls and batting away any spear tips that came too near.

Keeping her hands open along the ground to prove she wasn't reaching for a weapon, Abeke lowered her head and placed her hopes in Rollan.

Essix wheeled above, giving an occasional falcon cry, so Abeke knew that Rollan must be near. He was probably hiding at the forest line, waiting to see if it was safe before he came forward.

"Hello, there!" she heard Rollan call.

Or not.

Instantly, half the spear tips disappeared from Abeke's vision, warriors grunting as they prepared to hurl their weapons.

If this standoff came to battle, Abeke needed to be ready. Gritting her teeth, hoping she wouldn't pass out, Abeke grabbed the nearest spear shaft and yanked. The weapon didn't come free, but she was able to pull herself up it so she was on her feet. Instantly, though, the world buckled under her, and she was back down on her knees. Uraza stood over her, growling to warn off any attackers.

"Hold!" Rollan called. "We mean you no trouble!"

The tribespeople conferred with one another in their own language, then one of them spoke in Common. “Drop your weapon, stranger.”

“I’ll drop mine if you drop yours,” Rollan called.

“Do as they say, Rollan,” Abeke managed to croak. “I’m in no condition to fight, and we need their help.”

She heard a thud as Rollan sighed and dropped his dagger. From high above, Essix shrieked indignantly. Giving in easily wasn’t her or Rollan’s style.

“Thank you,” said the same voice. A woman knelt into Abeke’s vision. She had a sun-wrinkled face, a striking mixture of tans and ruddy reds, and surprisingly kind eyes. An infant was wrapped tightly to her chest with a length of yak hide, only the top of its head poking out.

Uraza struck out at the woman with her paw. Her claws were retracted, but it served as a warning from getting too near. Though the woman didn’t appear scared, she crept backward so she was a safe distance away.

“My name is Aynar,” she said. “My son is the healer for our people. But he’s back at camp, so I’m the best we have for now. Your wound will not heal on its own. Rot can easily set into mountain lion bites. If you allow me, I would tend the wound on your neck, Abeke of Okaihee.”

Abeke startled. “You know my name!”

“I wasn’t sure until you said Rollan’s name,” the woman said, giving Abeke an apologetic smile. “I hope you will forgive the spears pointed in your direction. Word has reached us that Erdas has again entered a troubled time. Greetings, too, Rollan of Concorba. You are both legends here. We suspected who you were immediately—it’s not every day, after all, that one comes across a leopard prowling here.”

“No autographs, please,” Rollan said wryly.

“You should move as little as possible,” Aynar continued to Abeke. “Our horses are on the other side of this grove. With your blessing, we’ll fetch them and rig a litter to carry you to our camp. It’s only a few miles off.”

Rollan knelt beside the woman, taking in Abeke’s injury and giving her a worried smile. His expression was enough to tell Abeke he was willing to go along with Aynar’s plan.

“Thank you for helping us,” Abeke said.

Aynar nodded and started giving orders in the tribal language. Once the hunters were out of view, Rollan plopped down beside Abeke. “Huh. Not two days into our Amayan journey and we already need rescuing.”

“Sorry,” Abeke said, gingerly prodding the wound on her neck. “It’s not like I meant for that mountain lion to maul me.”

At the mention of Abeke’s attacker, Uraza gave an angry growl. Abeke affectionately tousled the fluff of hair sticking up on the back of Uraza’s neck, and the leopard relaxed.

“What we need most is information,” Rollan said. “Maybe this tribe knows about the summoned Great Beast. When you think about it, your injury might have been a brilliant move.”

“Hard to see it that way at the moment,” Abeke said, wincing.

The tribespeople returned with a litter rigged behind one of their horses. They’d taken a birch canoe, tied one end to the saddle, and attached two wooden discs to the low end so that it could roll. “Come,” Aynar said to Abeke. “Lie inside.”

The world bloomed white as Rollan helped Abeke to her feet, but her friend’s arm under her shoulders was strong and firm as he got her to the litter and gently arranged her inside. Aynar removed the blood-soaked fabric binding Abeke’s neck and used a flat, smooth stick to apply a poultice that stung at first but soon suffused Abeke with a cool, fresh feeling. Aynar lightly draped a soft rabbit’s hide over the wound.

Now that her pain had lessened, all Abeke wanted was to fall asleep. With the last of her energy, she called Uraza into passive state for the journey. Though the leopard was swift, she wouldn’t be able to keep up with horses over a long distance. Abeke sleepily watched Rollan mount Aynar’s steed behind her, and then passed out. Even though the litter bumped and dragged, she didn’t wake up until they came to a stop.

That poultice must have had something powerful in it; when she opened her eyes, Abeke felt like herself again. She untied the rawhide strands attaching her to the litter and rolled over the side, easily getting to her feet. She could hear no one around: They must have decided to let her sleep late into the day.

The tribe’s camp was a scattering of large tents, each crafted from slender logs with animal hide stretched over. The grass around each tent was fresh and untrampled, which made Abeke think they hadn't been set up for long. Maybe the tribe moved every day, or every couple of days. The nomad tribes in the north of Nilo were much the same. They avoided a lot of the problems that plagued those who lived in villages—lice, parasites, scavengers—by bedding somewhere new every night.

The sky was so large up here. When Abeke squinted her eyes, it was almost like she was below the same wide blue sky that stretched above Okaihee. Just seeing its expansiveness invigorated her. She hoped that after she and Rollan had tracked down this Great Beast, Lenori would augur the next one in Nilo. Abeke longed to see her father and sister again.

“I see you're feeling better,” came a quiet voice. Abeke turned to see a boy of about eleven emerge from the smallest tent. His skin was dark, nearly as dark as Abeke's, though his cheeks were a pink red, almost the color of salmon. His hair was tied back in a single braid that went down his back, and his eyes were a startling color—light orange-brown, like the rind of a cheese.

“You're Aynar's son, the tribe's healer,” Abeke said. Something about the gentleness in the boy's eyes had made it clear.

“I am,” he said, with an uneasy tilt to his head.

“Forgive me,” Abeke said, “but aren't you a little young for that responsibility?”

“You were not that much older than me when you went to fight with the Greencloaks,” the boy said, smiling. “But you are correct. I was named healer only recently. There were special circumstances. In any case, our word for 'healer' has a much broader set of meanings than it does in the Common language.”

“It does?”

At Abeke's interest, the boy's previous shyness melted away. “Our healers are also moral guides. We conduct listening ceremonies to help our people find their hearts. The other boys hunt, but that doesn't interest me much at all.”

Abeke experimented with her neck, angling her head from side to side. Miraculously, she was able to do so without pain. The clean scent of pine rose from her fresh bandages. “I'm glad it doesn't,” Abeke said. “You have real talent—what's your name?”

The boy beamed with pride. “Anda. My mother gave you a poultice I made. I always send the hunters out with it, and it appears to have done its work. While you were sleeping, I added another. This new one should speed the healing even more, and prevent scarring.”

“Where is Rollan?” Abeke asked.

“Hunting with the men. They would have loved for you to join them—it’s a rare opportunity to learn from such a famous hunter—but you were asleep. So Rollan went instead. He ... did not seem comfortable riding. I’ve never seen a horse take such an instant disliking to someone.”

“He has that effect on horses,” Abeke said with a smile. “And walruses. And some people. Is there anything to eat?”

“Of course,” Anda said, blushing. “I should have offered earlier.”

Abeke chewed strips of salty yak jerky while Anda walked her around the camp. It was small—only five large tents circling a fire. Two horses, so scrawny they were probably used for carrying supplies and not riders, grazed nearby.

After warning Anda, Abeke summoned Uraza. The leopard nuzzled Abeke affectionately, then sniffed worriedly at her wounded neck. She was clearly relieved by what she found. Uraza bounded and pranced, undoubtedly hunting for more butterflies—until she noticed Anda.

Uraza stood stock-still, staring at the boy with her large lavender eyes. Then she did something Abeke had never seen Uraza do before: The leopard lay down in the earth, head resting on her paws, and stared up at him.

“She likes you,” Abeke said. But her voice trailed off, because she could see that it was more than that. The expression in Uraza’s eyes was closer to submission.

“Should we show her?” Anda asked the open air. Abeke whirled around, but couldn’t see what or who Anda was talking to.

Uraza purred loudly, at full attention as she stared into the nearby tree line.

Abeke followed the leopard’s gaze and saw, camouflaged in a copse of pine trees, an elk.

A very large elk. It stood motionless, noble head held high, antlers as broad as a man’s arms. Its fur was tinged with white and gold, the same mix of colors as Anda’s striking eyes.

The elk’s eyes locked on Anda, then it stepped out toward them, its gait stately and unhurried.

“You summoned Tellun,” Abeke said in awe.

“You make him sound so serious.” Anda laughed. “I just think of him as my elk. And I’m his boy.”

As the noble elk drew near, there was no shred of doubt in Abeke’s mind that she was in the presence of Tellun, the leader of all the Great Beasts. Uraza looked at him with wide, awestruck eyes, confirming Abeke’s thoughts.

Without quite knowing why, Abeke got to her knees.

“Please get up! There’s no need to do that!” Anda said. “My elk is silly most of the time; I’m not sure why he’s being so serious today ...” Anda’s voice trailed off, and his lips moved silently instead. It looked like he was communicating with the elk. Anda’s light brown eyes widened, and his jaw set tight.

“Why didn’t you ever tell me you were that important?” he asked.

When the hunters returned, Abeke, Anda, Uraza, and Tellun himself were quietly waiting at the edge of the camp. They watched the dust cloud gradually settle as the hunters brought their horses to a halt.

“Abeke!” Rollan said as he struggled to dismount from his horse, then struggled even harder to extract his foot from the stirrup. “I wish you had been with us. Apparently I’ve already lost all my saddle callouses—ouch—but I used a bow! And I wasn’t half bad. I mean I wasn’t Abeke-level or anything, but ...”

Rollan’s eyes widened, and he went pale. Just like Abeke, he, too, dropped to his knees when he realized he was in the presence of Tellun.

The noble elk maintained his serene gaze, but Abeke suspected she saw a wink in his eyes.

Aynar dismounted and approached, arm in arm with a tall, severe-looking man. He had his hair in a long braid, like Anda’s, but his was striped with gray. If his face had ever had any of Anda’s gentleness, it had lost it long ago. Abeke sensed she was seeing the boy’s father.

“I see our guests have met Tellun,” Aynar said. Beside her, Anda’s father watched the elk warily.

“The Great Beasts have returned to Erdas,” Abeke said. “Your son has had a tremendous honor come to him.”

“The type of honor that also destroys all of our tribe’s privacy,” Anda’s father muttered.

Abeke frowned. She remembered her own bonding ceremony, when she’d summoned Uraza—the leopard had brought a deluge of life-giving rain to her parched village. At the time, Abeke had thought she’d become her village’s new Rain Dancer. Her father had responded to that news with surprising skepticism. Though she and her family had worked through their differences, Abeke watched a similar defensiveness settle into Anda’s father’s features. Because of what she’d been through with her own family, though, she understood it: He wanted to believe all of this was impossible, so the tribe’s life could remain the way it had always been.

While the other hunters dismounted, silent with reverence, Aynar inspected Abeke’s wound. “I never would have thought that you’d be standing, much less walking around, by the time we came back. Anda, your skills have improved so much, my son.”

Abeke ran a hand over the bandage on the back of her neck. “I can barely feel any pain. It’s amazing. I hope Anda gets to meet Jhi someday. They could learn a lot from each other.”

“They could gossip in the women’s tent and sip herbal teas together,” Anda’s father said.

Rollan cut him a severe look. “A talented healer can turn the tide of a military campaign far more effectively than even the strongest warrior. I’ve seen it happen.”

Anda’s father shook his head curtly and tightened the strap of his quiver with a savage jerk. “Do not pretend to educate me on battle. You should know your place—maybe children rule in Greenhaven, but not here.”

“There are more important concerns for us to talk about,” Abeke said, stepping between the two. “A man named Zerif is on the loose, hunting down the Great Beasts as they return to the world.” She cast a worried look at Anda. “Severing them from their human partners.”

“I knew we should not trust these outsiders,” said Anda’s gruff father. “Don’t you see, Aynar—they have come to take our son away.”

Aynar looked deep into Anda’s eyes. “Is that true? You will have to leave?”

Anda couldn't meet his mother's gaze. "It won't be safe for any of us if I stay here. Abeke tells me that Zerif is very powerful, and getting stronger with every Great Beast he claims."

"I'm sorry, Aynar," Abeke said. "I know that your tribe named Anda as its healer precisely because of the good omen when he summoned Tellun. I, too, left my family after I summoned Uraza. I know how painful this is, but believe me when I tell you that I'm closer to my family now than I ever was before I left Okaihee. I've learned so much about myself, and them, while I was away. Anda will return to you even more talented—and even wiser."

"Zerif is undoubtedly on his way," Rollan said. "Even with the help of Uraza and Essix and all your hunters, we'd be stupid to fight him. Your son's best hope—and the best hope for Erdas—is for him to come with us to Greenhaven."

Aynar's eyes filled with tears as she looked at her son. "You've made up your mind. I can see it."

Anda grimaced. "The whole tribe is in danger while Tellun and I stay."

Aynar let out a long sigh and took a step backward. She gathered herself, love and anguish beaming from her eyes as she fought to hold herself together. "I only ask two things of you, my precious son: Do everything you can to keep yourself safe, and return to us once you are able. I'll think of you every time the first star comes out at night."

"And I'll think of you, Mother," Anda said, tears streaming down his face.

At the sight of his son's crying, Anda's father's face tightened into a frown. But he stepped to Anda and clasped him to his chest. "Please don't forget our people's ways when you're on the outside. You will always have a place in our tribe."

"I won't, Father," Anda said. "I'll make you and the rest of the village proud."

"Keep working on your spear arm," his father said.

Anda nodded, struggling to meet his father's eyes.

"Come, let's go," Abeke said sorrowfully. "We have no way of knowing when Zerif will close in."

As Anda shuffled over to join them, Rollan threw his arm around Anda's shoulders. "Wait until you see the healing poultices the Greencloaks have come up with," he whispered. "You're going to be amazed. You can spend your time in Greenhaven practicing whatever you want.”

With one bound, Tellun was at Anda’s side. Abeke watched in astonishment as the leader of the Great Beasts gave Anda an affectionate lick along the side of his face. He then pressed his side against Anda’s, as if to shoulder some of the boy’s weight.

PHOS ASTOS

CONOR AND HIS COMPANIONS MOVED SWIFTLY THROUGH winding stone tunnels. The type of rock varied as they traveled—sometimes they were surrounded by speckled granite, sometimes soft, pockmarked limestone, sometimes slippery obsidian. Their footfalls—and the footfalls of other unknown creatures creeping in the dark—reverberated through the tight spaces.

Without the noise of the world above to fill the air, the quiet music of the earth sighed in Conor's ears. The creaking of rock was constant, but there were also rivulets of water trickling somewhere deep inside the stone, beneath the muttering breezes of damp, cool air.

Conor kept his torch lit, but somehow Xanthe was able to see clearly even when she scouted ahead of its light. She'd call out directions to them from much farther along. By the time the companions managed to reach her, Conor would be amazed to see that Xanthe had already clambered up slick passageways and scaled cave walls in the darkness.

Whenever Xanthe pulled far ahead, she sang an ethereal, tuneless song so the others could locate her. The song grew louder and louder until eventually Conor would turn a corner and find the pale girl waiting, perched on a rock or a giant toadstool, her head cocked at a quizzical angle. Then she'd wordlessly continue on her way.

Seen from behind, Xanthe looked even more like the strange beings that had attacked them—the ones she'd called the Many. In Conor's spooked imaginings, her short white hair resembled their bald heads, and her narrow frame was ghastly instead of elegant. But then whenever she'd turn to face them, he'd see the goodwill in her eyes as she beckoned them forward.

"You're all doing very well," Xanthe said cheerfully as she led them splashing through an underground stream. "Before the trouble with the Wyrms, we sent occasional patrols upside to scout. They always came back telling stories of how oafish the upsiders were. You three—well, you're not at the level of Sadreans, but you're still good climbers."

"Thank you?" Meilin said dryly as she heaved herself over a boulder, landing in a few inches of slimy water.

To Conor's surprise, Meilin allowed Xanthe to help her to her feet. "We're almost halfway there now," Xanthe said. "We'll be at Phos Astos before too long."

"What's Phos Astos?" Takoda asked.

"That is a joke, right?" Xanthe called over her shoulder.

"Um, no," Takoda said.

Xanthe stopped short in the tunnel, and the other three nearly piled into her. "Are you telling me you know that little about this land? We have guarded Erdas for centuries."

It did sound pretty bad when she put it that way.

Conor looked to Meilin. If any of them would have been taught about this place, it was her. But even she reluctantly nodded her head.

Xanthe shook her head when she saw their bewildered reactions. "There used to be many of us, but the last few months ..." She trailed off. "Let me start closer to the beginning. Phos Astos is one of many underground cities settled by my people. These tunnels pass under Erdas, all the way to its farthest corners. Our cities are connected by paths carved out over millennia by ancient rivers and the roots of the Evertree, and we once traded resources along those routes. Until recently." She let out a long sigh. "The Many are our people, twisted by an infection that turns into something more like ... occupation once it reaches their foreheads."

Unable to stifle a gasp, Conor put a hand to his sleeve. The gray creature had been just past his elbow the last time he'd checked. Once it finished its climb, would he end up like one of those monsters?

"We've lost all contact with the other cities of Sadre," Xanthe said. She swallowed, and when she spoke again her voice shook. "Our fear is that they've all succumbed to the infection. Phos Astos might be the last remnant of our civilization.”

Meilin fell back a step so that, out of Xanthe’s view, she could squeeze Conor’s hand. Her message was double: It’s going to be okay and Don’t say anything.

“Oh!” Xanthe said as she sighted something in the distance. “We’re nearly there. Now’s when we stop going forward and start going down.”

“Down?” Conor asked, stomach tightening.

“Down?” Takoda repeated.

“Yes, down,” Xanthe said, breaking into a sudden sprint. “Like this!”

She glided forward into the darkness, her white skin and hair shining long after her black shift had merged into the surrounding gloom. Then, in an instant, she dropped away. She simply disappeared.

“Um, can anyone tell me what just happened?” Takoda asked.

“I don’t know,” Meilin said, creeping forward. “Xanthe? Are you there?”

Torch brandished, Conor took the lead as they eased toward the spot where Xanthe had disappeared. “Oh, wow,” he breathed.

Warm air rushed upward in front of him, like in a chimney. They were at the brink of a chasm, glossy black stone extending down as far as the torchlight went. Conor closed his eyes and smiled; the rising air smelled vaguely like the hot stones his mother had once used to warm his bed when he’d come back from shepherding during the brutal Euran winters.

“She just jumped?” Takoda asked. “Into this stream of air?”

“Maybe ...” Meilin said, finger tapping her lips as she puzzled it out. “My tutors taught me about air currents. If the upward draft can compensate for a body’s downward acceleration due to grav—”

Meilin broke off, dumbfounded, as Takoda pivoted so his back was to the chasm, cheerfully waved good-bye, and let himself fall backward. He was there, and then he was gone, as simple as that.

Conor and Meilin stared at each other, beyond words.

Takoda’s voice rose up through the hum of the updraft. “Guys, this is amazing!”

“We’ve all gone crazy,” Meilin said. “Maybe there’s some gas in the air that’s making us all—”

Conor stepped off the edge. “Bye, Meilin!” he called up against the hot wind.

At first he fell rapidly, but the moment he let his arms out wide, the updraft caught him and it was like he was barely falling at all. His torch winked out, leaving him in darkness as he gently descended.

“I can’t believe you just did that. I’ll kill you once I catch up!” Meilin shouted down.

Conor smiled as he imagined her outraged expression. As he continued to descend, he made out Takoda’s voice: “Conor, is that you? You’re about to hit a net. Xanthe and I will get you out.”

Conor rolled over so he was looking down. The dark air wavered in the heat, but very far below, like at the waking edge of a dream, he saw a muted glow. The horizon was a soft, gauzy pink.

Clearly Conor’s floating was about to end, but he wished it wouldn’t. He hadn’t realized how oppressive the squat tunnels of Sadre had been until they’d opened up. There was so much space around him now, and so much clean air—he never wanted to go back to that claustrophobia.

“Okay, see him?” Xanthe said somewhere in the darkness.

Black lines began to trace themselves over the glow from below. They grew bigger and bigger until Conor was caught in some sort of net, a lattice of the same woven material as Xanthe’s shift. As soon as he hit it, slender hands reached from the side to grasp him, and then before he knew it Xanthe and Takoda had pulled him off.

They were seated on the far edge of the net. The open spaces between the mushroomy rope led to the ground far below, but the net was sturdy enough that he didn’t feel afraid.

“Isn’t this amazing, Conor?” Takoda asked. “To think we’re the only people from the surface to have ever seen this place!”

In his excitement, Takoda lost his balance. The rope netting pouched beneath his feet, sending him sliding into Xanthe. Both muttered flustered apologies, and Conor noted with amusement how extra vivid Xanthe’s blush was against her pale skin.

As the two carefully extracted themselves, Conor looked down through the netting. Now that the updraft wasn’t marbling the air, he could see more of the vista below.

They were suspended at the top of a glittering cavern, the ground at least a hundred feet below. The soft pink glow was from mushrooms—many, many mushrooms. The tallest soared as high as Euran oldwood trees and were ringed by shorter mushrooms, which were ringed by even shorter, until the ground at the edge was dusted with a fringe of fungus. All of them gave off the same dull pink light that illuminated the people walking below. The sheer majesty of the cavern was enough to take Conor's breath away.

"Xanthe," he breathed. "This is Phos Astos?"

Xanthe gave him a sly smile by way of an answer, then sat up on the net, expertly swinging her body so that she bounced along with her hands gripping the edge. Heedless of the hundred-foot drop, she leaned far over the side. Seeing her close to tumbling into the wide open space, Conor reeled with vertigo. There was so little separating him from the air below—just these slim black filaments.

"It's perfectly safe," Xanthe said, watching his expression. "There's another net below this one. Just watch me, and then do what I do. Ready? One —" She was interrupted by a familiar voice.

"Conor?" called Meilin. Conor turned in time to see her float down the stream of hot air. She face-planted into the net, then turned to glare at them furiously.

"Hey, Meilin," Conor called. "Hold on, we'll come bring you over."

"Stay where you are," she called warningly. "I'll come to you." Meilin looked down and shrieked when she saw the open space beneath her. She began to creep along the netting, nervously testing her weight on each section of the net before proceeding. Once she'd reached her friends, she closed her eyes and held her knees tight to her chest, keeping herself as compact as possible. "How do we get down?" she asked in a small voice.

"Are you scared of heights, Meilin?" Conor asked. At first his tone was mischievous, but became serious as he realized how scared she was.

"I just want to be on the ground," she said, not opening her eyes.

"We'll be on solid ground in a moment," Xanthe said, smiling encouragingly. "Let me warn my people that you'll be arriving."

Putting her delicate fingers to her mouth, Xanthe let out a high-pitched whistle.

To Conor's surprise, more people began to emerge from the mushrooms themselves, revealing wide openings in the trunks that towered over the cave floor like great trees.

Their skin was the same luminous white as Xanthe's, and they all had short hair of the palest blond. They held still at the entrances, staring up at Conor and the others with startled pink eyes. There were hundreds of them already, and more were emerging every second. Men and women, children and elderly, tall and short—all looked up in wonder.

“Don't be afraid!” Xanthe called down. “These people have come from the surface! They're friends!”

Shocked whispers went through the crowd, then more and more of the Sadreans emerged from their mushroom homes. “Tayne,” Xanthe yelled to the nearest, a small, pale boy peering out an opening at the top of the tallest mushroom, “go tell the elders! We're coming down.”

The boy waved at Xanthe, then nodded and called something in an unknown language. He then clambered ably down rungs that had been carved into the mushroom flesh. Wherever he placed his hands, he blocked some of the mushroom's pink glow, sending flickering patterns of light onto the cavern's obsidian walls.

Xanthe smiled at the companions' awestruck expressions, obviously pleased by the effect Phos Astos was having on them. “Take it all in,” she said. “You won't get a better view of it than from way up above.”

Pink was the city's dominant color, but as Conor's eyes adjusted he saw that there were greens and yellows, too. The mushrooms had some other colorful fungus growing upon them, so that great swaths of glittering color spread all the way up the largest bulbs. The overall effect was that the air shimmered everywhere Conor looked, like he was peering through a fly's wings.

In the center of the city was an open hole leading into the earth, from which the warm air rose up to pass through the ceiling of the cavern. It must warm the whole city, Conor realized. It was certainly a welcome change after the chill of the tunnels.

More and more of the Sadreans emerged from hiding. As they did, they looked up at the newcomers and froze, astonishment slackening their faces. Conor heard gasps echo throughout the cavern. After letting her people gawk at them for a minute, Xanthe whistled and called out something in her language, waving them along. They didn't budge, though.

Conor felt his face flush as the dozens of Sadreans staring up became hundreds and then thousands. Right in front of his eyes a dignified woman holding the hands of two children fell to the ground and broke into sobs of joy. A large bat hung from a fold of the woman's shift—it seemed some Sadreans had spirit animals, too.

Down at the base of a mushroom tree, a Sadrean woman stood before a pen in which a number of fuzzy white spiders were crawling over themselves to eat the teeming beetles the woman poured from a bucket. She held it slackly as she stared in wonder at the outsiders, the insects flooding the floor of the pen.

Spiders as livestock. Conor shuddered.

Meilin opened her eyes, and seemed to be just as stunned by the sight of all these people paused in the middle of their everyday lives miles under the earth, staring up at them; her mouth hung slack and her hand curled around Conor's elbow in awe.

"Phos Astos means 'the city of light,'" Xanthe said, surveying her home as she gripped the netting. "Sadre has always protected Erdas from the Wyrms. We were the guardians you didn't even know you had. Now I fear this city is all that remains of us."

Takoda kept his face emotionless, but he cocked his head at Xanthe. "I'm sorry."

She laughed quietly, a light, silvery sound that ended sooner than Conor expected. "It isn't your fault."

"Does your family live in one of those homes carved out of the mushrooms?" Meilin asked.

"Yes," Xanthe said, her eyes going proudly to one of the smaller mushrooms on the city's edge. "In that one there. I will look forward to introducing you to them. But first you should meet the elders. Now that they know you're here, they'll assemble at our teilidh—our mural chamber. Come, follow me."

Without further preamble, Xanthe swung around the edge of the net and let go, dropping twenty feet or so until she hit the next one down. She let the rebound pitch her off the edge and drop her to the last net. Patting her hair flat in the pink light of the glowing city, she gracefully stepped off onto Phos Astos's stone floor.

Takoda was the first to the edge of their net, placing his hands in the same position Xanthe had. “How are you so comfortable with all this?” Conor asked.

“Cliff diving is a very popular hobby in Southern Nilo,” Takoda said with a wink, before swan diving to the net below. He folded into a cannonball at the last moment and took a gigantic bounce to the next net down, hooting in glee the whole time. An admiring cheer rose from the watching Sadreans.

“Our man of mystery,” Meilin said in amazement as she watched Takoda stride forward and introduce himself to the nearby Sadreans. “Shy with us and assertive with everyone else.”

Conor held out his hand. “Here. Since you’re scared of heights, do you want to go together?”

Meilin nodded, biting her lip, and gratefully took Conor’s hand. “We’ll wait until you’re ready,” Conor said.

She peered over the edge. “I—I don’t know if I can do this, Conor,” she stammered.

“Of course you can,” he said, kneeling beside her on the swaying net. “Just—”

“Ha!” Meilin yelled, then with one expert movement pushed Conor over. He fell twenty feet, screaming his head off, belly flopping onto the net below. He lay still, hands over his face while he listened to the giggles of a few thousand watching Sadreans.

The net surged as Meilin landed beside him, chuckling. “I’m not afraid of heights, you dummy,” she said.

“Are you pleased with yourself?” Conor asked, shaking his head.

“Yes, very,” she said.

Reaching over, Conor slowly and deliberately placed a hand on Meilin’s back and unceremoniously heaved her off the net.

By the time they’d stepped onto the city’s rock floor, Conor and Meilin were breathless with laughter. That stopped quickly, though, once they saw that the assembled residents of Phos Astos were still staring at them.

“Come,” Xanthe said as she began to weave a passage through the mushroom buildings. “The elders will be waiting.”

When the Sadreans didn’t move out of the way, she made a clicking noise in her throat and waved her hand to shoo them away. “I’m sorry,” she said. “It must make you uncomfortable to have them ogling you like this.”

Even though most of the Sadreans reluctantly returned to their business, as he hesitantly started forward Conor caught the eyes of no fewer than a dozen who were still staring at him. When they saw him looking back, the Sadreans startled and turned to other tasks, pretending they hadn't been gaping. Conor watched them with interest as he passed. Some were sharpening spears made from resin, or swords fashioned from crystals. Others were slivering a large black mushroom, separating wafer-thin layers that another Sadrean was sewing into patchwork cloth. Entranced, Conor realized with a start that his friends were already a dozen paces ahead.

"The reason Phos Astos has been able to hold out against the Many for this long," Xanthe was explaining to Meilin as Conor caught up, "is that our city is surrounded by a plain of flat glacier stone that extends half a mile wide and is as smooth as a mushroom. Once, a black river passed over it, and we had to raft across to reach this cavern. But now we've discovered how to dam the river and walk across the dry riverbed. The Many may be powerful, but when they become infected, they lose their memory and their reason. When they attack, they surge across the plain without any caution, filling it like the black river once did."

They lose their memory and their reason. The words rattled around Conor's head.

"And that's when you release the dam!" Meilin said.

Xanthe shrugged humbly. "It has worked in the past. But it's not a perfect system. The pressure of the water is strong enough that it takes us days to muscle the mechanisms back into place and drain the trap, leaving us vulnerable in the meantime. And we only have one shot—we have to time the flooding perfectly when the Many are all on the plain itself. If we miss any, then they can still get across after the initial flood sweeps the others away."

"Still," Meilin said, shaking her head in admiration and stepping around a Sadrean child with his thumb in his mouth, staring up at her in awe. "It's a stroke of genius. I'm impressed."

"Thank you," Xanthe said, clearly pleased with herself.

The tunnel sloped downward, and to continue along it they had to turn sideways, pressing the edges of their boots sharply into the rock. Xanthe kept cutting backward glances, obviously still fascinated by the outsiders. In one of her distracted moments, she tumbled—and it was Takoda who caught her. He flashed out one hand and ably grabbed hold of her shoulder, righting her without losing his own balance. Xanthe smiled shyly and thanked him.

As he walked, Conor turned Xanthe's words over in his mind. Maybe the Many weren't as mindless as everyone was assuming—which meant they were more dangerous than anyone thought.

"Careful, now," Xanthe said. "We're approaching the dam's mechanism."

The slate all around them began to shine as Conor's torch streaked light along its surface. The tunnel sloped down before giving out onto a black plain. They were at a ledge ten feet or so above it, at the top of the dam. The mechanism to open it was simple: Thick bands of corded rope were wrapped around two great wheels of iron, with handles evenly spaced along each.

"These wheels connect to a large door damming the river upstream," Xanthe said. "By turning them, we can control the amount of water flowing out."

"And wash out the Many," Conor said.

"Underground locks must have been difficult to build," Meilin said approvingly.

Xanthe held her finger up to her lips to quiet them, then paused, her head tilted in the air. Then she shook her head. "I thought I heard something," she said. "But it's nothing."

She knelt at the ledge's lip. A small mushroom was growing there, gold in color and shaped like a bell. And, like a bell, it rang out when Xanthe flicked it. "These are what we call screamers," she said proudly. "We've cultivated them over the centuries as a warning system. If the Many approach us, they'll have to cross through tracts of these. The mushrooms set off a chain reaction all the way into Phos Astos, ringing so loudly that they wake everyone up. Come, this way."

Xanthe made a quick turn, disappearing into an opening in the slate wall. Remembering the tight tunnels they'd been in when the jabbering horde had attacked, Conor quailed. But after watching Meilin and Takoda calmly enter the passageway, he followed, too.

The glowing pink-and-green dust was back, coating the walkway. Conor watched, transfixed, as it swirled around the ankles of his companions, whose paces left foot-sized patches of clear slate behind them.

"You're really in for a treat," Xanthe said. "I love these murals."

“Shouldn’t someone be keeping an eye on the riverbed?” Conor asked. “Just to be safe?”

“The screamers won’t fail,” the girl replied surely. “And the elders are waiting for us in the mural chamber. They’re going to be so excited to meet you.”

They stepped into a cavern, only a dozen feet across but so tall that Conor couldn’t see its roof. Mushrooms grew up and down the walls, a soft carpet of glowing plants. It all served as illumination for the masterpiece in the room’s center.

A massive stalagmite had built up there, extending halfway up the vaulting room. Carvings were chipped into its surface, images winding around and up the thick structure. The first looked like a snake swimming in an ocean of stars. Conor leaned forward to examine it, only then noticing that there were people quietly assembled around the far side.

Conor eased around to see a half dozen Sadrean men and women standing around the stalagmite in a perfect semicircle, clad in voluminous robes made from the same shimmering black cloth as Xanthe’s shift. They’d been talking to one another in hushed voices, but jolted to attention at the new arrivals.

“Here are the upsiders!” Xanthe exclaimed to them. “Conor, Meilin, and Takoda, these are the elders of Phos Astos.”

As one, the elders stared at them with something like awe on their faces. Conor flushed with embarrassment.

“Thanks be to you,” said one elderly woman, her joints creaking as she got down to one knee, tears in her eyes. “Our saviors have finally come.”

A second elder dropped to his knees, tears streaming down his wrinkled face.

The companions stared at one another. “No, please, no one else get on their knees,” Conor said.

The tallest elder stepped toward them. He was a handsome, severe-looking man with a patch over one eye. “My name is Ingailor. Takoda, Conor, and Meilin, please know how honored we are that you have come. This moment has been prophesied for a long time. You’ve been called to us to defeat the Wyrms.”

“I’m sorry,” Takoda said. “But could someone tell me what this Wyrms is that everyone keeps talking about?”

All the elders went perfectly still. The old woman who had been kneeling staggered to her feet, confusion slackening her face.

Ingailor shook his head. “I don’t understand. Do you have another name for the Wyrms up on the surface?”

“Maybe,” Takoda said. “I don’t know.” He looked to Meilin. Can you give me some help here?

She shook her head.

Xanthe grabbed Conor’s shoulder. When he turned toward her, he was startled to see hope in her eyes that was so desperate it looked almost like panic. “What about the weapon?” she asked.

Conor met her wide eyes. “I’m sorry, Xanthe. I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

One of the elders gave an anguished cry and dropped to the ground.

Ingailor kept his face impassive. “If you don’t have the weapon, why have you come here?”

“The Evertree is sick,” Conor explained. “And the source of its illness is coming from below.”

Xanthe stepped in front of the companions, and addressed the elders. “I’m sorry! They know nothing of us,” she said. “But fate must have brought them here to save us from the Many. It’s too much of a coincidence not to be ordained.”

Ingailor raised a hand to stop Xanthe from speaking further, the expression on his face both tough and oddly gentle. The rest of the elders weren’t as good at hiding their feelings—they were clearly aghast. “I don’t doubt that you believe this. But I’m not sure what these children can do that we haven’t already tried. And without the weapon ...”

“I understand that you must be disappointed,” Xanthe said, keeping her eyes downcast. “But perhaps if we show them the story in the murals, they might still see something in them that we haven’t.”

Ingailor smiled wanly. In that moment, Conor realized that he was only being brave for his people—he had given up all hope. “That’s a good plan. You do your family proud. And we have nothing to lose.” He turned to the rest of the assembled elders. “Belsharth roha.” “Belsharth rohi,” they said back, nodding. Then, as one, they parted and shuffled gloomily out of the cavern.

As Ingailor stepped to one of the carvings, Xanthe stayed close to his side. Conor heard her whisper: “Trust my intuition in this. All hope is not lost, Elder Ingailor.”

Ingailor didn’t react, and instead pointed to the image carved in the wall above him. It was of a dozen men and women in a primitive boat crossing a choppy sea, their rows of oars dipping into the water.

“This shows the founding of Erdas,” he explained. “The bands of hunters that came together to become the civilization known as the Hellans.”

Meilin’s eyes widened in surprise. “I’ve read about the Hellans,” she said. “They were some of the earliest astronomers. Many of their constellations are still used in navigation today.”

It was Xanthe who pointed to the next carved image, a giant tree surrounded by the shapes of fifteen animals—each icon representing one of the Great Beasts. Conor was pleased to see that Briggan and Jhi and Uraza were pictured near one another, friends even way back then. That was only half the image, however: The tree’s roots extended down deep, wrapping around what looked like an egg, which the artist had crusted with the dust of sapphires and emeralds. It looked like the tree was cradling the egg in the lattice of its roots—or caging it.

“This is the essential conflict of Erdas and Sadre,” Xanthe said. “The Evertree versus the Wyrms. The tree provides life. It bonds animals and humans as allies. The Wyrms is ... something else. We suspect it may be as old as the Evertree itself. It has always slept deep in the earth, contained within its roots.”

“The Wyrms is a parasite,” Ingailor said with sudden vehemence, touching his fingers to the egg in the carving. “It is chaos and hunger incarnate. For a millennium it has slept, encased in an egg kept dormant by the power of the Evertree. But it was a restless sleep.”

“How do you know all this?” Meilin asked. “The Evertree was hidden from humans until very recently.”

“The wisest of the Great Beasts sought out the Hellans,” Ingailor said, pulling his hand away from the jeweled egg. “Though the Great Beasts came from the Evertree, only he sensed the rot that lurked beneath it. He told the Hellans about the danger of the Wyrms and gave us our task: By making sure the Evertree’s roots were healthy and strong, we could help delay the eventual coming of the Wyrms. The Hellans above were tasked with building a weapon, something capable of stopping the Wyrms if it ever broke free.”

Conor’s heart sank. Just a small piece of a single parasite was slowly taking his body from him. Without the weapon, what chance did they have against the Wyrms and all of its minions?

Meilin stood close to Conor, tension radiating from her.

They moved to the next panel. There, Hellans hugged good-bye, tears on their faces, as half of them climbed down into a cave. “The Hellans divided into two people,” said Xanthe. “Our brothers and sisters stayed above. We, the Sadreans, went below to tend to the Evertree’s roots. That was the last time we ever lived on the surface.”

“Not too long ago,” Ingailor continued, “the Evertree’s roots withered, and the Wyrms’ egg dropped. Then, just as mysteriously, new roots began to grow where the old had been. They cradled the egg again, but they were young yet, and much weaker than before. The Wyrms sensed that weakness. It is waking. Worse still, the fall cracked the egg, allowing small gray parasites, extensions of the Wyrms’ will, to spill out. They have spread all through Sadre, sowing chaos and possessing our people.”

“The Many,” Conor said, goose bumps breaking out along his arms. Maybe it was only his imagination, but he thought he could sense his own parasite twitching.

“This also explains why the Evertree is sick,” Takoda said.

“Worse than sick,” said Xanthe. “Dying! As the Wyrms wakes, it consumes the tree for its power.”

“The parasites are on the surface, too,” Conor said, fingers clenched on his arm. “A man named Zerif is using them to possess the Great Beasts—and people. Maybe we can seal the egg somehow.” Even if it was too late for him, he could possibly help to save others from the infection that was claiming him. “Can you lead us there?”

“The path to the Wyrms’ egg is crawling with the Many. Any who attempted that journey would not return.” Ingailor frowned wearily. “I’m sorry, but Phos Astos needs its elders now more than ever. I must stay here.”

“But I am in my wander years,” Xanthe said. “I’ve been to the Evertree’s roots before. That was before the Many began their assault, but I know the way. Let me be the one who brings the upsiders to the Wyrms.”

“Before you go offering yourself up for risks like that,” Meilin said, “you should know that we don’t even have a plan for what we’ll do about the Wyrms once we get there. The Hellan civilization is ancient history. If they had a weapon, it most likely disappeared with them.”

Xanthe clenched her fists and raised her head, a new resolve in her expression. “I had hoped that you might be the Hellans. I let myself believe you had brought us their weapon, and I know now that I was wrong. But I won’t let go of my belief that you’ll save us. That will happen.”

“Xanthe’s right. It won’t help any of us to give up hope—” Takoda started, but froze.

A shrill, thunderous ringing filled the chamber. The sound was powerful enough to shake multicolored motes down from the walls, bathing the air in color.

Xanthe and Ingailor were instantly in motion, sprinting out of the cavern. “The screamers!” Xanthe called over her shoulder. “The Many are attacking!”

As they sped down the tunnel leading back to the plain, the mushroom dust swirled up in great gusts, clouding Conor’s vision and making him cough. He covered his mouth with his sleeve as they dashed down the sloping tunnel.

The companions skidded to a stop just shy of the ledge at the tunnel’s exit. They were only ten feet or so above the smooth slate plain, two wheels and a lock the only things guarding them—and Phos Astos—from annihilation.

Xanthe lay her hand over the screamer’s bulby head until it stilled, then she and Ingailor hunched over one of the wheels, talking heatedly in their language.

“When’s the last time you used this thing?” Conor asked.

Ingailor spared one glance at Conor before returning to examining the wheel. “We’ve never had a second attack come this soon—we’ve only just finished the repairs from the last wave. The guards are on their way, but we’ll need your help in the meantime.”

“Of course,” Meilin said.

Xanthe measured up their group. “Conor, Takoda, and I will take one wheel. Meilin can help you, Ingailor. That should be enough strength on both sides to do it. Once the guards arrive, they can take over.”

Xanthe sifted through a pouch at her waist. Her hand came out with a small glowing pink globe, no bigger than a marble. Standing at the lip of the tunnel opening, she lanced it as high as she could over the slate plain.

It lit the glossy stone below like soft fire, casting a pink glow that brought out constellations of glittery highlights within the rock.

Revealing the Many.

A few dozen of the monsters were halfway across. They'd been creeping toward them in the darkness, but in the shock of the sudden light they staggered, reeling back and gasping. Before Conor's eyes, he saw them scrunch their eyelids shut and press forward, crawling on all fours, shockingly fast.

He imagined those creatures—the kind of creature he would become once the parasite got to his forehead—lurching forward, hunting them, their long-nailed hands groping through the darkness. His body broke into shudders, and he couldn't make it stop.

“Release it!” he gasped. “Release the water!”

“Stay calm!” Ingailor commanded. “It will take the Many a few more minutes to cross the plain. The bulk of the horde is behind them, and we need to catch as many as possible in our trap.”

In an attempt to calm himself, Conor imagined the most peaceful thing he could: his old herd. He pictured the sheep's soft curly fur, smelled the wet musty scent of their skin, listened to their soft bleats as they chewed grass. It was enough of a distraction to keep the terror at bay—almost. Then Xanthe threw another one of her stones and illuminated the plain again. Conor's sheep vanished from his mind for good.

The plain was swarming with the Many—at least a thousand of them, staggering and lurching across the smooth, glittering surface, crawling over one another in their unthinking haste. They all froze for a moment under the brilliant light, then it faded and Conor was blind again. He closed his eyes, biting back his terror, and flailed in the darkness until he contacted one of the wheel's handles. He almost started turning it on his own, but stopped himself just in time, instead grinding his palms into his wheel. Just let us release the dam! he silently pleaded.

The nearest of the Many hadn't been more than twenty feet away, and they were moving fast.

“Hold ... hold ... and now!” Ingailor cried. “The wheels!”

Gasping in relief, Conor began to turn his handle. With Xanthe and Takoda straining beside him, the wheel began to shift. From a few feet away, he could hear Meilin and Ingailor’s wheel groan and shudder as it, too, lurched into motion.

“It’s working!” he heard Meilin exclaim.

Which was when Conor’s wheel stopped.

“Is it supposed to do this?” Takoda asked.

“No!” Xanthe said frantically. “It’s jammed. It’s jammed!”

They heaved, but the wheel gave only an inch or two before springing back to its original position.

“Ingailor!” Xanthe shrieked.

Conor could hear the Many right under their ledge: the sound of their fingernails scratching against the stone, their grunts and moans as they tried to scramble up to get them. Conor imagined they’d mound up soon, start to climb one another ... and then they’d be upon them, and all would be lost.

Conor tugged frantically, but the wheel was still stuck.

“Xanthe?” Ingailor called over, concerned. “What’s happening? The gate’s not opening!”

“I have to do it,” Takoda said.

“What do you mean?” Xanthe asked, perplexed.

But Conor knew precisely what Takoda meant. There was a radiant flash and a popping sound, then a heavy weight hit the ground beside him.

“What the—?” Xanthe said, shocked.

Conor heard a familiar grunt, and then Kovo was beside him, the gorilla’s coarse hair bristling against Conor’s arm as he took a place at the wheel. Conor felt a rough hand over his own and realized the ape wanted his handle, too. He leaped out of the way. Startled, Xanthe tumbled beside him.

“You have a spirit animal?” she asked.

“It’s ... more like he has me,” Takoda said ruefully. “But yes.”

With a scream of metal, their wheel began to turn. Kovo grunted as he slapped the handles, getting up more and more speed until they were whizzing past.

“It’s working! It’s open!” Ingailor called.

Kovo seemed to be enjoying himself. He continued to pelt the wheel, pushing it faster and faster.

“Hey!” Takoda said sternly. “Stop now.”

The ape roared in anger at Takoda, baring his sharp teeth.

“Please,” said Takoda. Before the boy’s pleading eyes, the anger drained out of Kovo.

“Listen!” Xanthe said excitedly. Her eyes had been on the plain ever since their wheel started turning. “Water!”

Conor heard the rushing sound, too.

So did the Many. They began to scream, an awful, high-pitched sound.

Xanthe took another stone from her pouch, this one a pale green color, wider and flatter than the previous. She hurled it to the ceiling of the cavern, where it struck and splattered, green goo softly illuminating the scene below.

The light came just in time to reveal an enormous wave of black water as it struck. It had such force behind it that the first rows of the Many disappeared entirely, swept deep into the dark, surging tide. More and more fell beneath it, their screams cutting off short as the water swept across the plain, bowling over ghoulish white bodies and dragging them under.

Conor watched the trap do its deadly work. Once the water began to slow into a swift current without any whitecaps, he could see that none of the Many remained. The sudden black river had seized them all.

“Where did they go?” Conor asked. He’d expected to feel joy at seeing the monsters swept away. Instead, the gaping emptiness of the plain stood as a painful reminder of his own plight. Though they called them monsters now, the Many had once been people, just like him.

“Rivers run throughout Sadre,” Xanthe said grimly. “The tunnels we use are all old riverbeds. This water will flow in a thousand different directions, into the deepest parts of the earth. That’s where the Many have been dragged. Those who haven’t drowned are lost forever.”

“Will any survive?” Meilin asked.

“It’s unlikely,” Xanthe said, staring back across the plain. “Though we’ve never swept quite this many down before.”

“It’s so sad,” Conor said.

Meilin squeezed his arm.

“Ingailor, I’ll put out a call for workers to come set the trap again,” Xanthe said.

There was no answer.

“Ingailor?” Xanthe turned around and gasped.

Ingailor’s pink eyes were wide, his hands held in shock over his chest. Once Xanthe saw what he was looking at, she took a step back in surprise.

They were staring at Kovo. Illuminated by the soft green light from above, the ape looked especially fearsome. The tips of his jet-black hair were lit by faerie fire, broadening his already massive physique. He stood on all fours, taking them all in. The expression in his scarlet eyes was inscrutable, but the one thing about Kovo that was unmistakable, ever unmistakable, was his brutal intelligence.

“So ... I guess I should tell you that we have spirit animals,” Conor said. “This is Takoda’s.”

Xanthe stared forward, her voice softened by awe, her eyes shining. “Is this who I think it is?”

“Oh, you recognize him?” Meilin asked with a nervous sigh. “The Great Beasts of Erdas died and have been reborn as spirit animals. That’s what caused the Evertree’s roots to regrow six months ago. Conor, Takoda, and I all summoned Great Beasts. So you don’t have to be afraid of Kovo ... probably.”

“You don’t understand my question,” Xanthe said, turning her shocked eyes on Meilin.

“I think I do understand,” Takoda said, shaking his head. “When you told us the origin of Sadre, you said that the wisest of the Great Beasts taught the Hellans about the Wyrms. We assumed you were talking about Tellun ... but you weren’t, were you?”

Xanthe shook her head, staring reverently at the ape. When she spoke, it was directly to him. “No. The one who was trying to save the world was Kovo. It was you.”

NORTH, SOUTH, WEST

THE TRIBE OFFERED ABEKE AND ROLLAN HORSES TO ride. Rollan thought nothing of it—Greenhaven had three stables full of them, so giving up a horse or two seemed like no big deal—but Abeke bowed low and thanked them effusively.

“Giving up a work animal is a tremendous sacrifice for a nomad tribe,” she explained as she adjusted her horse’s saddle pads and shortened its stirrups. “They must have spent years traveling with these horses, raising them from colts.”

Aynar had mapped them a trail that would lead back to the Tellun’s Pride II over paths solid enough for the horses. They’d follow the swath of muddied grass the yak herd had left behind, head due east along a valley between two mountains, and cross an open plain to the pier where their ship was moored. Sticking to terrain suitable for horses meant traveling a longer distance, but with mounts they should be back by the end of the day.

“I’m relieved we have a new way to go,” Abeke said. “If Zerif is tailing us, it’s safest to press forward and not loop back.”

Anda watched patiently as his new companions mounted up. Tellun wasn’t a particularly demonstrative elk, but he did stand very close to the boy, his broad chest right behind Anda’s shoulders. Whenever he leaned back and scratched through Tellun’s white and gold fur, the elk scrunched his eyes in stoic pleasure.

Rollan shook his head, mystified. “Anda is scratching the leader of the Great Beasts.”

“Not just scratching him,” Abeke said as she mounted her horse.

“What do you mean?” Rollan asked.

“Did you notice how many horses there are? And how many riders?”

Rollan’s jaw dropped open. “Wait. You don’t mean—”

And then it happened. Anda elegantly wrapped his long arms around Tellun’s neck and launched from the earth, swinging around to land neatly on the Great Elk’s back.

“You do realize who you’re riding, right?” Rollan asked out of the side of his mouth.

“Yes,” Anda said, smiling. “My friend!”

“And you’re fine with this?” Rollan asked Tellun, shaking his head.

“Why not?” Abeke said. “We rode him to the Evertree.”

“That was different,” Rollan sniffed.

In reply, the elk raised his antlers haughtily into the air and bounded down the beaten path. Anda threw his arms around his neck to hold on.

“At least Anda didn’t put a saddle on him,” Rollan grumbled as he kicked his own horse into motion. “That would have been simply too much.”

Sure, Rollan figured, the tribe might have made a big sacrifice by offering them two horses, but they’d clearly been strategic about which two horses they gave up. Rollan’s had the approximate speed and power of a bread box. Abeke’s kept slobbering everywhere, and tried to throw her twice within the first fifty paces. Though an elk was by no means a traditional mount for any human, it was soon clear that Anda would be making far better time than Rollan and Abeke. “Say hi to everyone at Greenhaven for us!” Rollan called as the boy pulled farther and farther ahead.

Essix didn’t seem to know what to do with herself. At first, with millennia-honed instinct, she forgot about Rollan entirely and flew above Tellun instead. Then, after about an hour of travel, she returned to Rollan’s side. She made a piercing, confused cry, her eyes darting around. She took off back toward Tellun, then thought better of it and returned to Rollan, then took off again and returned to Tellun, soon returning to Rollan’s side.

“I know,” Rollan told her. “It’s confusing to me, too. It’s Tellun, but he’s not using his boomy voice.”

Uraza seemed to be taking everything in stride—but then again, the leopard had never been one to lose her cool. She loped along beside Abeke’s persnickety horse, low to the ground, frequently stopping to sniff the air or the base of a tree.

“There must be new smells around here for our kitty cat,” Rollan said to Abeke, trying to kick some extra speed from his horse as it tiptoed along the ground. At this rate, it would be winter before they made it to the boat.

“It’s not that,” Abeke said with a worried expression. “Her nose is many times more sensitive than ours. I think she’s detecting something amiss.”

Uraza paused and looked up at Rollan with her wide lavender eyes, as if to say, See? Show a little more respect.

“Which direction?” Rollan asked.

Uraza flicked her gaze north. Rollan pivoted in his saddle to look that way. All he could see were the white-capped cliffs of distant mountains, skirted by a broad, flat plain and isolated clumps of desperate pines. A small plume of dust was at the horizon, but that could have been caused by any number of things. “Well, good thing we’re heading east and not north, then,” Rollan said.

They continued, following the distant blip of Anda and Tellun as boy and elk easily picked their way over rocky terrain.

Rollan decided it was time for a better view. He scanned the sky for Essix, then began to focus on her shape. Nothing happened for a long moment, then suddenly the world pitched and the ground fell away. Rollan felt momentarily sick—no amount of practice had ever helped that—but soon he was able to see the world through Essix’s eyes. The falcon felt him enter her mind and churred companionably.

At first Rollan used Essix’s high vantage point to look north, but he couldn’t see anything out of the ordinary, couldn’t tell what Uraza might be smelling.

West was another story.

When Rollan followed Essix’s vision around the plains, he came up with nothing the first few times. But then he heard Essix shriek, and grew alert. With her telescopic vision, Essix zeroed in on an abandoned campsite. Whoever had left it behind had been careful to cover their tracks—the surrounding ground was smoothed over, and the blackened stones of the fire pit had been scattered. But there was still the faintest burning ember in one of the fire logs, trailing up a whisper of smoke. Vision less acute than Essix's would have missed it.

Rollan returned his consciousness to his own body with a dizzying lurch, and called out to Abeke to hold up. At the same time, he saw that Anda and Tellun were making their way back to them. They met under the shelter of a broad, leafy tree. Rollan's thoughts flicked to the ailing Evertree, and he realized that even this brief moment of relief after finding Tellun might have been too much of an indulgence.

Anda and Tellun were wearing concerned expressions even before Abeke told them that Uraza had scented intruders to the north. When Rollan added that Essix had spotted an abandoned campfire to the west, Anda gave a grim smile. "Tellun is upset as well. But he keeps looking to the south."

"We can't all be correct," Abeke said.

"We'd best hope that we're not all correct," Rollan said. "Otherwise, we're nearly surrounded."

"I'm not a ranger," Anda said. "But I can only think that this doesn't change our plan. We're heading through that valley to the east. So far, that's also the only direction where we haven't sensed any danger."

"I agree," Abeke said. "And let's have our wits about us as we go."

"Being especially alert, of course, to anything that might be approaching from the west," Rollan said.

He watched Abeke try—and fail—to hide her smile. "By west, I think you meant north," she said.

"Or rather south," Anda said, smiling as well. Then his expression grew serious. "Regardless of the direction of the threat, Tellun and I won't scout ahead anymore. We should stay close, to defend one another."

They started moving again. To the east appeared two large mountains flanking a narrow valley, just as Aynar had told them. Anda and Abeke picked up their pace, but Rollan immediately felt himself falling behind. His horse was simply too old and too ornery to keep up with the others. Abeke and Anda stopped to wait for him after a few minutes, and when Rollan reached them, Anda laid his hand on Tellun's forehead, right between the antlers. The two communed for a moment, and then Rollan's mount whickered. The tension drained out of the horse's body, and when Anda and Tellun took off again, Rollan's horse followed perkily, as spry as a colt.

Rollan didn't even need to hold on to the reins, his horse had become that sure and graceful. "What just happened?" he called to Anda.

"I'm ... not totally sure," Anda said. "I have only inklings of Tellun's skill so far. We haven't been together for long. But I think he can communicate freely with any animal he meets."

Abeke pulled up alongside them. "You're well paired. You were the listener of your tribe, and Tellun has served a similar role for the Great Beasts. He has always been a quiet leader."

Anda stroked Tellun's long neck as he rode. "It's nice to feel understood."

Abeke pulled her hair behind her so she could see forward better. "You know, my father always wanted me to be pretty and refined, like my sister Soama. But that wasn't who I was: I was a hunter. I preferred the solitude of the plains, with my bow in hand."

A flicker of pain passed over Anda's features. "My father wished for a hunter. But he got me. I can hunt mushrooms and healing herbs, but that's about the extent of it."

"It can take time," Abeke said. "But he'll come around. You summoned Tellun. Your story will become one of your people's legends. My father and I only started to understand each other recently, but our love was there all along."

"I miss my tribe already," Anda said simply. "I miss them very much."

As they neared the twin mountains, they left the herd's beaten trail entirely and picked their way through scabbly brush. Though Rollan's horse was no longer resistant and cranky, it did start to slow from sheer exhaustion. She dropped her neck and stumbled, a sure sign the mare was nearing her limits. At one point, Anda called the group to a stop.

"I hate to say it, but I think we should camp and find the ship in the morning," Anda said.

Rollan nodded gratefully.

"Why?" Abeke asked. "There's still plenty of daylight."

"Look how high the mountains rise on either side of the valley where we must pass," Anda said. "Once we're in the canyon between them, they'll block out any light that isn't directly overhead. The sun will set hours early in that valley. We'll be in the dark, with only two access points. If we're attacked, we could easily be overwhelmed."

"Oh," Abeke said. "I hadn't considered that."

"We'll have to camp one night," Rollan said. "It'll be cold, but it's best not to make a campfire. An attack could easily come from the west."

"Or north," Abeke said.

"Or south," Anda said.

"Let's hope none of us are right," Rollan said.

"We've assigned night watches before," Abeke said. "And we've handled anything that came at us."

"That may be true," Anda said, "but we have a saying, oranu yeno simula oranu mordico. 'A confident plainsman is a dead plainsman.' Let's camp once we reach the base of the mountains. I'll feel safer with a cliff face at our backs."

Rollan hated the idea of being without good shelter at night in the whispering plains. All the same, he was glad they had decided not to press forward. The prospect of navigating a night-dark alley between steep, foreboding mountains was none too appealing.

Though it was afternoon, once the cliff blocked the sunlight, the chill of twilight entered their bones. As they assembled their bedrolls and made camp, Uraza was the first to start shivering. Abeke called the leopard into passive state so the tropical cat wouldn't suffer. Essix had techniques to keep herself warm, though the normally regal gyrfalcon did look a trifle silly with her feathers puffed out, more like a ruffled chicken than a bird of prey. Tellun and Anda were the only ones who seemed fully at ease, standing on the rocky ground and staring out watchfully.

After a simple cold meal of seeds and greens, they settled in for the night. Once Tellun had chosen a position and lay down, it was impossible to resist putting their bedrolls alongside him to warm themselves against his fur. Rollan felt a little scandalous, using the greatest of the Great Beasts for his body heat.

"Do you think you'll be able to fall asleep, Rollan?" Anda asked while they stretched out on their backs. The first stars were twinkling in the slate sky.

"Hmm whaa ... ?" Rollan asked. Anda's question had caught him midyawn.

“You go to sleep if you can. I’ll take first watch. I’d like to replace Abeke’s neck dressings, anyway. Then I’ll switch off to her, and you can take the last watch.”

“Sounds just fi-iine to me,” Rollan said around another yawn. “How’s your neck doing, by the way?”

“Much better,” Abeke said. Rollan could hear the smile in her voice. “Thanks to Anda.”

“Yes, thanks to Anda,” Rollan said. “And we should all thank Tellun, for being so very snuggly.” Rollan wriggled his hands under the elk’s warm body, and the greatest of the Great Beasts snorted in response.

Despite the cold, Rollan slept deeply. He dreamed of Arctica, of balancing on an ice floe with Meilin, giggling as it tilted, trying to keep their balance as each jostled the other. Jhi and Essix were on two more floes nearby, bobbing in a frigid sea, watching. It only slowly dawned on Rollan that they were strangely impassive, even as Rollan and Meilin were having the time of their lives.

Come on, Essix, Rollan thought in the dream. Lighten up!

Dream-Essix looked at him like a stranger. Then she opened her mouth, and rolls of black rot came streaming out. It flooded her floe, tipping the bird into the icy depths. Then Jhi was retching black rot, too, and Meilin was screaming and tipping in.

Then—slam—the dream was over. Rollan was suddenly awake and gasping, hands patting the cord of rope that tied his pants, groggily searching for his dagger sheath. The dream was over, but a very real pain was wracking his body. His insides felt like they’d wrapped around a giant’s fist, then yanked out of his body.

“What happened?” came a startled voice. Anda.

“I don’t know,” Rollan managed to say. Then, before he could say anything more, it happened again. The giant yanked his insides to the horizon and let them snap back. He rolled onto his side, face contorted in pain.

“Argh!”

Now that he was awake for it, Rollan heard Anda scream, and Abeke, too.

“Rollan, what’s happening?” she cried.

“I don’t know,” he gasped.

But then he did. He recognized this awful pain. Rollan had felt it once before, under a bloodred sky at the end of the world. “Our spirit animal bonds!” he shouted. “They’re breakin—ahh!”

Once more, his guts wrenched.

“I don’t understand,” Anda said, his voice unsteady with fear. “Why is this happening to us?”

Rollan sat up, hugging his arms around his torso for comfort while he waited for the next tremor.

They breathed in silence in the darkness, waiting for the next wave of the pain. But it didn’t come.

“Our bonds are under attack,” Abeke said to Anda, her breathing slowly returning to normal. “I think ... I think it’s because the Evertree is sick.”

“It—it was horrible,” Anda stammered in the near darkness. “Like something was punching my spine.”

“Essix?” Rollan called, remembering his dream. Though he could see the outline of the falcon nearby in the dim light, for once he didn’t have an inherent sense of where she was. It was a bleak and empty feeling, like grief.

Then the fluffy cold-weather version of Essix edged over to Rollan and snuggled in close. Gradually, as if it had been frozen in a block of ice that was slowly melting, Rollan’s link to Essix was returning. But it still felt like a small, frailer version of what it once was.

“Abeke ...” Rollan said. “Something’s changed.”

“I feel it, too,” she said grimly. “My link to Uraza feels ... cold.”

“I think it might be coming back to me and Essix, slowly. Maybe we’ll be okay in the morning.”

Anda reached his arms around Tellun, his eyes closed tight. “I can’t tell,” he murmured.

“There’s nothing we can do now,” Abeke said. “I’ll summon Uraza in the morning and see where things stand.”

“You’re right,” Rollan said, nodding. “Get some rest.” Then he turned to Anda. “I’ll take my watch now.”

“Wake us at the first sign of danger,” Abeke whispered.

They must have been truly exhausted; neither Anda nor Abeke put up a fight, and were soon huddled into themselves, out cold.

Normally Rollan found it hard to stay awake when he was on watch, but there would be no trouble with that tonight. He sat up, rigid with worry, and listened to the noises of the Amayan night. Hugging his knees close, he scanned the near dark and listened to frogs, insects, and the first warm-ups of morning songbirds. One was particularly insistent, and was soon met by another answering call from far off.

Probably two birds falling in love from afar, Rollan thought grumpily. At least they're happy. I'm just cold. And worried.

His thoughts went to Meilin. Essix hadn't been the only spirit animal in his dream—wherever she was, had Meilin felt a similar rupture to her bond with Jhi? He hoped she was more comfortable tonight than he was, sleepless in this chilly air and waiting for danger to strike. Had she and Conor found the mysterious door? He wished that they could all be together, camping with Tellun.

But Meilin wasn't there, so Rollan would have to spend his watch with only Essix for company. At least the falcon was sticking close—she probably felt as confused as he did by the near loss of their bond. He stared out into the blackness, taking comfort from the slow rise and fall of his friends' breathing and Essix's little chirps. The falcon readjusted herself on Rollan's arm, fluffing and unfluffing her feathers, trying to find the right temperature.

"Are we okay?" Rollan whispered to the falcon. But though he could make a guess, he had no idea what she was feeling. He could only pray the connection returned soon.

Throughout it all, the songbirds continued their happy chirping. There were three of them now, Rollan realized. One from the north, one from the south, and one ... from the west.

Filling with dread, Rollan rose quietly to his feet and unsheathed his dagger. He could see from the silvered outline of the twin mountains that the sun had dawned on the other side, but their massive forms were still blocking most of the light.

He was nervous but wasn't sure if he needed to awaken Abeke and Anda yet.

"Essix," Rollan whispered, "can you see enough to scout around?"

Before he had even finished asking, Essix took to the air, rising into the night as silent as a whisper.

Rollan held still and opened his senses as much as he could. The songbirds were coming closer. Songbirds in the night? Closing in from three directions?

His intuition set off alarms. “Anda, Abeke!” he hissed. “Get up!”

Whatever was hunting him must have been waiting for him to make a noise, because the moment Rollan spoke was the moment the first animal struck, from out of nowhere. Something sharp locked on Rollan’s hamstring. He couldn’t see enough to know what it was that had attacked him, but it was strong enough to yank him to the ground. Rollan flailed, trying to get back to his feet even as his attacker bit deeper and pulled.

A man shouted, with a voice Rollan recognized but couldn’t quite place, and then the clearing was suddenly full of noise as attackers closed in. They came not from the west, the north, or the south.

They came from all three.

VICTORY

THE GROUP WAS GRIPPED BY A QUEASY SILENCE ALL THE way back to Phos Astos. Unbidden, Meilin’s mind kept replaying the sight of those white bodies struggling to get above frothing black water, inevitably failing and being swept under. She shivered. Carried off into the watery depths—it was a horrific way to go. Despite herself, she hoped at least a few of the monstrous creatures had somehow survived.

When the tunnel started to glow pink-green, Meilin knew they were nearing Phos Astos. Then they emerged into the main cavern, and she was again struck by the beauty of the lively oasis, glowing warmly in the midst of so many tons of dark and impenetrable rock. The nervous chatter of the Sadreans carried down the ruddy light of the entrance tunnel. Once she and the others had stepped out into the full light of the city, Meilin saw a ripple pass through them as they remarked on the strangers’ return. The Sadreans paused in their tasks, became still and watchful, waiting for news.

Ingailor raised a hand to the watching crowd. “You can return to your duties,” he said. “The Many attacked, but they have been fought off.” There was no cheering, only grim nods, rustling, and murmurs as everyone returned to work. Fighting off the Many was clearly something that had happened often before. Even so, most looked up every few seconds to scan their surroundings as they returned to work.

The last to emerge from the tunnel was Takoda—with Kovo. The moment the gorilla clambered down the handholds in the stone wall and thudded to the cave floor, the cavern of Phos Astos filled with audible gasps. Men and women fell to their knees where they were, bowing their foreheads to the ground in reverence. A complicated and almost wistful expression on his face, Kovo grunted and paced, finally working his way to the center of the cavern. There, he stood up on two legs and slowly pivoted, taking in the sight of the people he had tasked eons ago to found their underground civilization. He roared.

The youngest of the Sadreans screamed, their shrieks joining the gorilla's roar and reverberating through the walls. The echoes strengthened one another until the noise sounded more like the rumbling of the earth than animal cries. Then the gorilla stopped, and gradually the cavern grew quiet.

Most of the Sadreans stood where they were along the edges of the giant mushrooms, but then the elders from the mural room made their way to the floor, expertly clambering down the handholds carved into the fiber. When they arrived, they formed a semicircle around the group.

One by one, the elders knelt, while Kovo lowered himself to the rock floor. One of the elders ran her hand over the shimmering fungus on the ground, then tentatively brought it toward the mighty ape. Meilin expected to see him bare his teeth, but Kovo stared into the distance coolly as the woman traced five lines across his cheek. Then the woman took another handful of color and traced it over her own cheek.

Each of the elders came forward and did the same, choosing a different part of Kovo to honor and leaving a mark on the same spot of their own bodies. Ingailor was the last, placing a pink handprint on Kovo's chest and then one on his own. The ape bowed his head, acknowledging their ancient agreement. Meilin watching silently, not wanting to break the spell.

"Xanthe," she finally whispered, nodding deferentially to the elders, "would it be okay if I showed them Jhi?"

"Of course!" Xanthe said. "We would be honored."

Meilin brought the panda out, and Jhi emerged right over a small bush of round mushrooms, squashing them flat and letting out an iridescent pink-green cloud of spores. The panda looked around in surprise, then saw Meilin and bounded over, making a groaning sound that Meilin recognized as the sign of Jhi's purest joy. Meilin threw her arms around her closest friend, breathing in the eucalyptus smell of Jhi's fur, somehow constant through all of the panda's appearances and disappearings. Immediately Jhi was covered in color, from the moist tip of her nose to the soles of her feet. She looked delighted by it.

Conor summoned Briggan, and the wolf was soon painted as well, though due to his thicker fur the color appeared only at the tips, giving him a shimmering aura. Briggan nuzzled Conor joyously, and Conor buried his face in his friend's fur. Then they seemed to simultaneously remember where they were and got to their feet. The people of Phos Astos were watching them silently, smiles on their faces. Even Kovo's mouth split into something that might have been a smirk.

"Let us rejoice tonight!" Ingailor called. "We have once again defeated the Many, and Great Beasts have come to Phos Astos."

As the cheer died down, Jhi's stomach growled.

Xanthe scrutinized the panda's belly, and then she, too, threw her arms around Jhi. "It took me a moment to realize what that strange sound was," she said. "You must all be starving. Come to my house. We'll feast!"

"This isn't precisely what I'd call a feast, not exactly," Conor said through tight lips.

"Speak for yourself," Meilin said. "I'm enjoying it immensely." She lifted her bowl to her lips and downed a huge mouthful of food, smacking her lips in satisfaction. The food was strangely tasty, considering it consisted of boiled mushroom cubes and some kelp-like black weed. Though they looked the same, some of the mushrooms were peppery and some were sweet. Meilin had Conor on one side, but she'd spent most of the meal talking to Xanthe's uncle on the other. His job was to distinguish and combine the various flavors.

Once they'd eaten, Xanthe escorted the group through a series of passageways, up into some mushroom towers and out through others, until they were at the far side of Phos Astos. Once there, she asked them to bring their spirit animals into passive state, as they'd have to climb slender rope ladders to reach her clan's sleeping quarters. Kovo was the last to go into his dormant state, giving the city a longing glance over his shoulder before he did. The ape had enjoyed the adoration he'd gotten from the Sadreans.

They climbed up more braided ropes that led to three ledges carved in the cavern's rock walls. At the top, they plopped to the ground to rest. Once they were ready, Xanthe led the companions up the last few paces to a freestanding mushroom tower. An open portal fed to a dim interior room. As they entered, Sadrean children leaped down from rows of beds that had been cut out of the sides of the mushroom. They peered shyly from behind Xanthe.

Tiny pale faces with giant pink eyes—Sadrean children were surprisingly adorable, Meilin thought.

“Some of these are blood relatives and some lost their parents, like I once did,” Xanthe explained. “But we’re all brothers and sisters now.”

“War makes orphans everywhere,” Takoda said. He tousled the hair of one of the little girls, who patted it down furiously. Takoda messed it up all over again, and this time she broke into a giggling smile. Xanthe’s brothers and sisters soon got over their shyness and surrounded the upsiders, touching their garments curiously and asking dozens of questions about life on the surface.

“Let’s give them some space,” Xanthe finally told her siblings. “My new friends have had a long journey, and they’re very tired.”

Xanthe carved a path through her siblings and led Meilin, Conor, and Takoda to the rear of the chamber, where she pointed to four empty bunks carved into the rounded wall. “Have as long a rest as you need. You all deserve it.”

“I guess it’s hard to say ‘I’ll wake you in the morning’ when there’s no morning, huh?” Conor said.

“We have a water clock to keep time,” Xanthe said. “It’s night on the surface right now, actually.”

Meilin, Conor, and Takoda slotted their few belongings into cubbies at the foot of their bunks and settled in. Xanthe disappeared for a moment and returned with soft, shimmering black blankets. At first the blanket felt clammy over Meilin’s body, but soon it warmed and turned supple. She would sleep just fine.

“Good night,” Meilin said to the others as she slid into the bunk.

“I guess it is night,” Takoda sleepily responded. “Not that it matters down here. It’s a striking shift in perspective. What a marvelous opportunity for self-reflection.”

“Sure ...” Meilin said, voice already weakening as she drifted off, “... absolutely marvelous.” Good night, Rollan, she mouthed to herself, wondering where he was.

Meilin dreamed of Jhi. She'd once had a poisoned bond with the panda, but ever since she'd been cured, Jhi was with her every sleeping moment. Sometimes the dreams were about Meilin's life—her childhood in Zhong, memories of her father or, more distantly, her mother. But other times she dreamed of places she had never been, places that must have been part of Jhi's memories instead. They'd wander into a cloudy forest of bamboo, with giant sloths swaying in the treetops, creatures that no longer existed on Erdas.

This was one of those nights. Meilin wandered that familiar dream forest, listening to the wind in the trees. Jhi was leading the way. Well, Jhi was more ambling the way, wandering among the stems, selecting the youngest shoots and passing every other one back for Meilin to eat. She ate them happily as she stared into the clouds—they tasted slightly spicy, like chives.

The openness of the dream space was such a pleasant break from sky-less Sadre. One of the clouds looked a little like Rollan. Well, not exactly, but it had the same goofy chin. Jhi, Meilin called in the dream, come see Rollan!

But Jhi wasn't there anymore. Meilin whirled in the bamboo forest. The beauty of her surroundings had turned ominous. She was alone.

Meilin checked her arm, but the tattoo wasn't there—Jhi wasn't passive, but missing. Panic coursing through her, she ran heedlessly through the forest, calling out Jhi's name. Leaves caught and dragged at her hair, scratching her arms and face. There were no monsters or terrors here, but all the same Meilin felt a sinister kind of fear at being so alone. She crashed through a thicket of bamboo, and suddenly she was in open black space, falling slowly down a chasm.

She felt her spine wrench and twist as she fell——and woke up screaming. Meilin sat up, gasping and soaked in sweat. The wrenching pain came once again, and it took all of Meilin's will not to give in to the torment and buckle over. Marshaling her training, she made herself stand. The terrible pain ebbed, leaving her a shred of control over her senses. The first thing she did was roll up her sleeve and check her arm for Jhi's tattoo. It was there. She hadn't lost Jhi in the real world.

It dawned on Meilin that someone was shrieking, had been shrieking since she woke up. She fell into a fighter's crouch, staring around in alarm.

It wasn't a person making the sound, she realized, but more like the anguished hiss of steam leaving a kettle. The screamers. The alarm had been tripped.

"Conor! Takoda!" she said. But their beds were empty. She whirled, and found they all were vacant, rimmed in their usual phosphorescent pink-green. The incessant whine of the screamers continued. Between that noise and her painful awakening, Meilin was finding it hard to get her thoughts into any order. She clamped her hands over her ears and gritted her teeth so she wouldn't start screaming herself.

Meilin grabbed her quarterstaff and staggered toward the exit, shaking her head in hopes of clearing it. Once she was out of the tight confines of the sleeping chamber, she summoned Jhi. It took longer for the panda to arrive, but when she finally did, Meilin calmed. Jhi startled in the dim light and blaring noise, then Meilin saw her ears wag, and the noise suddenly stopped.

They were surrounded by a sphere of stillness.

"Jhi," Meilin whispered, "I didn't know you could do that."

Jhi nodded but looked at her glassily. Meilin felt a strange and uncomfortable distance between them. She wanted to ask what was wrong, but there wasn't time. "Come," she said, a hand on Jhi's back. "We need to find Conor and Takoda!"

Jhi didn't answer. When Meilin looked at her, she realized why.

The panda was staring out at the lights of Phos Astos. At first Meilin thought the lights were shimmering, but she quickly realized what was happening: The beautiful city was under assault. The Many were crawling over the mushroom towers like a plague of insects, making ripples in the glowing light. They climbed senselessly, moving up the mushrooms in pulsating waves, many of them tumbling to their deaths. But an ever-growing swarm was ready to take their place. The far half of the city was overrun—Meilin saw terrified families emerge from their homes, only to fall under the onslaught. She watched in horror as one of the ghoulish monsters broke into the spider pen and began eating the small animals—another entered the weavers' quarters, exiting with blood on his clawed hands.

Jhi groaned and pointed her paw at the ceiling.

Ghouls were falling like rain.

The Many had managed to navigate the warren of tunnels to the updraft entrance. A long line of them slowly descended in the lazy hot air, thronging in one pale groaning mass at the first net before spilling over into the next. From there they spread out hungrily into Phos Astos, swarming the city like ants on a bean cake.

Meilin shook off her horror. There was a big fight to come, and terror would do her no good. Beside her, one of Xanthe's siblings slipped past, grabbed a braided rope without losing any speed, and disappeared over the side of the mushroom, down to the next ledge.

"Where are you going?" Meilin called after her. But there was no answer.

What she did hear was the howl of a wolf from one of the ledges below. Briggan and Conor were already out and fighting. "Jhi, get ready!" Meilin cried. "We're joining them!"

She sprinted toward the braided rope ladder and grabbed it, allowing her momentum to kick her legs over the edge. Her hands held on tight to the rope and she spun, sliding down without losing any momentum.

While she was in the air, she did something she and Jhi had worked on during her months in Zhong: She called Jhi into her passive state as she contacted the rope, then sped down the length, where she quickly summoned the panda again. They'd gotten the high-speed summoning down to a science, but this time her bond seemed to shudder under the stress. A fraying pain whipped into the core of Meilin.

The distraction of it made her miss her target; girl and panda tumbled right onto the coarse fur of Briggan's back. The wolf yelped in surprise and pivoted, his mouth in a snarl. When he saw who he'd cushioned, his tongue lolled out in happiness.

The four of them were alone on a broad ledge of rock. Conor stood at the lip and stared over, his ax out and ready.

"Conor!" Meilin cried.

He turned, surprised. His expression softened when he saw his friend, but then tightened back up with worry. "Another wave's coming—Meilin, get ready!"

Meilin didn't need to ask what he meant: A ghostly-white hand appeared at the lip of the ledge, followed by another and another. With hideous grunting sounds, the arms and heads of the ghastly creatures appeared.

Briggan lunged, one of the monsters' limbs instantly crunching within his jaws. With a flick of his head, he flung the ghoul over the side.

But more of the Many were appearing, and two of them soon had their long-nailed fingers around Briggan's tail. The wolf danced and kicked, trying to free himself. Caught off-guard, one fell away—only to meet Jhi's paw. With one mighty swipe, the panda sent the creature skittering across the ledge and into the void. Another of the Many got to its feet, only to face Conor's ax, which swung through the pink-green light and slammed into its face. With a shriek of pain, the monster staggered backward—following the last one right over the edge. It fell screaming into the open air, the sound lasting a full second before it cut off in a sickening gargle.

Four more of the Many appeared, and rather than falling into her customary fighting crouch, Meilin leaped into the air, whipping her quarterstaff in a wide, singing arc, cracking into the neck of one monster and bowling it into the next and the next, so that all three went screaming into the darkness.

“Good one!” Conor cried.

“My bond with Jhi ...” Meilin said breathlessly, joining Conor at the edge as he stomped on the hands of the Many whenever they appeared. “Something happened. It's weaker—”

“I felt it, too,” Conor said. “Then I heard the alarm. There must not have been time to repair the dam.” He grunted as he lifted the hand of a particularly strong creature and flung it over the edge.

Meilin remembered her remorse over drowning the horde and cursed her own soft heart. “Where's Takoda?” she asked.

This wave of attackers finished, Conor managed a wicked grin. “Look below.”

Jhi and Meilin cautiously leaned over the edge and peered down. There, on a wider ledge directly below theirs, Takoda and Kovo were facing their own batch of the Many. Because their position was lower, they confronted a much larger throng—Conor and Meilin had been fighting only the trickle that made it past the powerful ape. Takoda had mounted Kovo's back and had his slender arms wrapped around the gorilla's neck.

Kovo had his arms held out wide and was turning in low circles, flailing any of the Many that were unfortunate enough to fall within his reach and sending them screaming over the edge. Any time Kovo windmilled his arms, only the ghouls at the far sides of the ledge survived to climb up toward Conor and Meilin. Before her eyes, Meilin saw one of them emerge, only to become a rag toy in Briggan's powerful teeth.

"Any sign of Xanthe?" Meilin asked.

Conor shook his head. "She must be off defending another part of the city."

"How do we get out of here?" Meilin asked. When the head of one of the Many appeared over the edge, she brought her quarterstaff down in a fierce overhead blow, knocking the creature senseless. It tumbled away, arms pinwheeling through the air.

"We've got to get down to Takoda's ledge," Conor said. "It's our only hope. The cavern floor is below it. Once we get that far, maybe we can find a passage that will take us away from here. Only problem is this." Conor held up the climbing rope, which had been severed in the fighting.

"Wait. What do you mean, 'away from here'? We can't abandon Phos Astos—it's the last standing city in Sadre!"

"Have you seen the destruction out there? Phos Astos is lost," Conor said. "If this many attackers are at the edge where we are, there's no way the Sadreans will hold out at the center. Our dying here won't help anything."

Meilin's mouth pressed into a scowl. She'd seen war. She'd once witnessed her own city fall to invaders, and had been forced to flee and become a refugee from her home.

This was worse. It wasn't occupation; it was annihilation. This strange and wonderful place—this city of light—was about to blink out forever. And there was nothing she could do about it. Her eyes stung with frustration. How had she come to be here? She'd left Greenhaven to help the world rebuild. And now she was only witnessing destruction.

"It's thirty feet down to the next ledge," Meilin said brusquely, wiping her tears away before Conor could see them. "If we jump, we break our legs. We have to scale down the rock face."

Conor shook his head. "Kovo managed it, but only just. And he's an ape. I don't think we'd have a chance of making it down."

Meilin peered over the edge again, thinking. She nodded. "I have a plan. Don't ask what it is, just watch."

“What is—” Conor asked, then stopped with a sheepish look.

Meilin stepped back from the lip, calling Jhi into passive state as she did. Again, she felt the wrenching pain of her frayed bond whipping through her core. She let one of the Many climb all the way onto the ledge. The moment it was on its feet, it rushed Meilin, yellow fingernails outstretched and mouth bared. The spiral on its forehead throbbed and twisted as Meilin reared her staff back. But rather than strike the monster with its length, she thrust with its tip. The pole struck the creature in its chest and sent it flying backward.

Meilin followed after, pole-vaulting over the edge with the tumbling monster. She kicked out with both her feet so they hit its chest, and then she was surfing on the tumbling body. The creature’s back worked like a kite in the open air, slowing Meilin’s descent. When it struck the ledge, she rolled free.

She’d have to leave it to trust that Conor was following the same plan, as the moment she hit the lower ledge Meilin was surrounded by the gnashing teeth and claws of the Many. She managed to get her staff out in time to cuff the chin of a ghastly monster who was about to sink its teeth into her shoulder. It reeled, bowling over two of its companions.

“Takoda!” Meilin called.

Takoda didn’t react; he had enough to worry about, struggling to keep himself on Kovo’s shoulders as the gorilla pivoted and swung his meaty arms. Kovo’s technique was still working, keeping a circle of stone floor clear around him, but even he was tiring.

As she battled, Meilin heard Conor drop to the ledge beside her, followed by a popping sound as Briggan reappeared. She wished she could summon Jhi, but the ledge was too narrow for all their spirit animals.

“This horde won’t end. We need to drop down as soon as we have an opening!” Meilin cried.

Kovo didn’t respond—he just stepped quickly to the edge and dropped over into the darkness, taking a surprised and shrieking Takoda with him.

Meilin and Conor ran up to the lip of the ledge and, after peeking over and seeing there was only a few yards’ drop, stepped over.

As she landed, Phos Astos came into view. The sight was enough to confirm that the last city of Sadre was definitely lost. The scrambling forms of the Many riddled the giant mushrooms like parasites, attacking whoever they could find. Their pale bodies shone in the pink-green light. More streamed down in the updraft, a torrent of slavering ghouls that cascaded into the city like an unholy waterfall.

The sight of the devastation took Meilin's breath away, but Conor was instantly on his feet, running toward the tunnel that led out of the city. Without losing any momentum, he whipped out his ax just in time to take down one of the Many that came too close. Meilin fell into a sprint, right behind Briggan.

Conor veered to one side, and Meilin realized what he was heading for. At the base of the last mushroom before the cavern wall, Xanthe and Ingailor were locked in combat against a gibbering throng of enemies.

Back to back, they had bright crystal maces in their hands and were wielding the glowing rocks like dual swords; wherever the shining weapons went, the Many recoiled. Their slices and parries left broad arcs of light in the air. But their enemies were increasing in number, and as they did, they grew more aggressive. The tunnel to the slate plain was soon blocked by a horde of creatures.

There was a rush of black at the edge of Meilin's vision as Kovo charged past, his meaty hands and feet impacting the ground with great rumbling thuds that sent tremors through her gut. The gorilla furiously set upon the Many, pounding them from above. Takoda still clung desperately to his back.

Scrambling after him, Meilin watched helplessly as Xanthe lost her footing and tumbled before the pressing mass of the Many. For an anguished moment she disappeared entirely from view. Then the girl reappeared, struggling against one of the Many who had her scalp in its grasp. It yanked her head back to expose her slender, pale neck.

"No!" Meilin cried out. But she was too far away to save her new friend.

Ingailor, however, was not. He threw himself onto the monster, ripping it from Xanthe. But the beast twisted in his grasp, and in the space of one horrifying split-second it had sunk its yellow teeth into his neck. Another took advantage of the opening to pounce, landing on Ingailor's shoulders. The Sadrean elder fell into the horde and did not come back up.

For a horrified second, Xanthe stared at the space where the elder had fallen, her face frozen in utter shock. A monster leaped from the side, long-nailed fingers ready to swipe.

By then, Kovo and Takoda had arrived. The ape pummeled the creatures approaching Xanthe while Takoda reached down from his vantage point on Kovo's back. He grabbed the back of Xanthe's shift and hauled her up in front of him. Meilin streaked to their side and heard Takoda yell to Xanthe: "Where should we go?"

But the girl was in shock. Her mouth was slack as she stared at the space where Ingailor had so recently stood, now crawling with monsters. It was all she could do to hold on to Takoda's arms.

"Head for the exit tunnel!" Meilin yelled while she fended off another attacker. A low roundhouse sent him staggering to the ground. "There's no other option!"

Fatigued and struggling under the weight of two riders, Kovo tottered and nearly fell. But he righted himself and lurched toward the tunnel.

Xanthe managed to find the wits to hold her crystal mace in front of Kovo's forehead. The glow helped keep their enemies at bay. Conor and Briggan tucked themselves into the open space behind Kovo, and Meilin took up the rear, swiping her quarterstaff at any enemies that got too close.

Though she couldn't risk turning her head to see where they were going, Meilin felt the ground slope slightly, and then cool, dank air washed over her flushed cheeks. The glowing lights of Phos Astos narrowed to an oval, then a point as they fought their way deep into the exit tunnel.

Jabbering with fury, the Many pressed after them, but Meilin could no longer be flanked in the narrow confines. She went on the offensive, bludgeoning any creature that came near. While she fought off their enemies, she heard Xanthe's voice from somewhere behind her: "There's a secret rope here. There, tucked into the crevice!"

Then she heard two rapid pops as Kovo and Briggan disappeared. Someone was climbing nearby. She saw a braided rope enter her vision, even as she sliced her staff at an attacker. "You'll be the last one up," Conor called after her. "As soon as there's an opening, climb this."

She heard the rope creak as the others ascended behind her. Then she made a final stand, knocking one attacker into the next hard enough that the two bowled down the one behind. Meilin used the opportunity to grope in the darkness for ... the rope! She caught the knotted cable and scrambled upward, her arms burning with exhaustion. Once she'd gone a ways up, she felt a familiar grip on her shoulders as Conor helped her the rest of the way.

Meilin lay on the tunnel floor, panting, while Conor pulled the rope back up. Then he collapsed next to her. Takoda lay in a similar state of exhaustion on her other side. Meilin turned her head in time to see his tattoo quiver and then disappear. Kovo appeared, sitting on the stone floor. She summoned Jhi, and Conor did the same with Briggan.

Xanthe had huddled herself against the wall, her head pressed tight against her knees. Jhi ambled over and sat by her side, resting her soft, furry back against Xanthe's. The panda always knew who was in the most need.

For a long moment, all they did was catch their breath in the darkness.

As soon as she could, Meilin sat up and faced Xanthe. She lay a hand on the Sadrean girl's elbow. "Xanthe? Are you okay?"

Xanthe tried to nod, but she was shaking too violently. She jerked back and pressed against the rock wall, away from Meilin and Jhi.

"Are we safe for now?" Meilin asked.

Xanthe nodded again, though the words that tumbled out of her mouth were: "Phos Astos is gone."

"I'm sorry about Ingailor," Conor said.

She glared at him. "They're all dead," she snapped. "Not just him. My family! All of them! Dead because of those mindless monsters!"

Conor shrank away, his face blanching even in the shadows.

Takoda knelt beside Xanthe, and to Meilin's surprise he took her trembling frame fully in his arms. "I know," the boy said. "You must be in so much pain. I'm sorry." His face was full of both yearning sadness and affection.

Kovo slowly turned so he could no longer see Takoda and Xanthe. His scarlet eyes clouded, and his face twisted with something Meilin was slow to recognize. Kovo looked ... jealous. It was an emotion she'd never have expected in the gorilla.

It seemed like Kovo had surprised himself, too. He breathed heavily for a moment, then sat back on his haunches and very deliberately closed his eyes, hands balled into tight fists at his side.

"Xanthe," Meilin said, "we may be safe in this tunnel for now, but I can't imagine we will be for long. I can hear the Many congregating down there."

"Give her a second!" Takoda snapped.

Meilin recoiled, stung.

Xanthe pulled out of Takoda's embrace. "No, Meilin is right. We need to get moving."

"The question is where," Conor said.

"No, that is not a question," Xanthe said. Her face was as white as bone, leached of even its faint color.

"What do you mean?"

"This tunnel goes south, but it branches soon," Xanthe said. "There are indeed decisions to be made, but there's no question of our eventual destination. Our last city is destroyed. My family ... We cannot let that be in vain."

"The Evertree," Meilin said. "We have to go to the Evertree."

"Yes," Xanthe said. She determinedly wiped her tears away. "Look." She pointed to the ceiling of the tunnel. Wide cracks lined it, and within each was the skinny tendril of a root.

"That couldn't possibly be ..." Meilin said. "The Evertree is miles away."

"The roots of the Evertree are far wider than the tree itself," said Xanthe. "The Evertree is Erdas, and we are it. But these roots, too, are dwindling. Even a few days ago, they filled these crevices. But now they have shrunken—the tree has retracted them, because it's sick."

"We must cure it," Meilin said.

"Then we'll need to destroy the Wyrms," Xanthe said. "The Wyrms is where the parasites are emerging from. The Wyrms is the scourge sickening the Evertree. If the tree dies, the bonds between humans and spirit animals will disappear entirely—and worse."

"Look!" Conor said. "The root!"

In front of Meilin's eyes, the root lining the ceiling began to quiver, echoed by an aching throb in Meilin's spine. Then the quivering intensified, as did the throb. "Oh no, oh no—" Meilin said.

Then it happened. Like the blast of a horn right in her ear, pain ripped through her, obliterating every other sensation. She buckled under it, and saw through the flashing agony that Takoda and Conor were experiencing the same torment.

She screamed and curled into a fetal position on the floor. Around her she heard, not just the cries of her friends, but sharp whimpers from Jhi, whining howls from Briggan, and anguished grunts from Kovo. Then, slowly, the pain around Meilin's spine released. She sat up, drenched in sweat, and looked around her. Briggan's and Jhi's eyes were rimmed in fearful white, and Kovo's face was scrunched down at the pain he'd been through.

"What just happened to you all?" Xanthe asked quietly.

Meilin looked into Jhi's eyes, and it was like staring at a stranger. "Our spirit animal bonds just ... frayed," Meilin panted. "That's the only way I can describe it."

"And look," Xanthe said, pointing at the crevices in the ceiling. "The Evertree's roots retracted as the pain came."

Meilin heard Kovo snort, then turned to see him sitting before Takoda, signing. The ape made a rumbling sound of complaint.

"Kovo says he's noticed it, too," Takoda said. "He can't sense my thoughts the way he used to."

"I'd call that a good thing," Conor said, looking suspiciously at the ape. He stood with a grunt and lit a torch. The scant light of the tunnel became a full blaze.

Meilin risked a look at Kovo. She found he was already watching her, his scarlet eyes gleaming with furious intensity. It was hard to know what he was thinking, but one thing was unmistakable: Kovo was under no one's control. He knew more than any of them about what was happening, and they were all at his mercy.

With a gruff snort, Kovo turned and headed down the tunnel. Toward Nilo. Toward the Wyrn.

AMBUSH

ROLLAN TUMBLED IN THE DIM LIGHT OF DAWN. HE landed on his hands and knees and screamed as he struggled to escape his mysterious attacker. Essix relied on vision, not smell, so in the dim light she must have been caught as unawares as Rollan. He heard a rush of wind and a surprised shriek as the falcon swooped to his side. As soon as she landed, Essix was back in the air again. Another raptor screamed, and the vise-like clamp on the back of Rollan's thigh eased.

He freed himself and whirled in confusion—the sounds of his foes were coming from all directions. Though the mountains still blocked the dawn, a few scraps of light had iced the dewy grasses only a few yards away. That's where Rollan staggered, knowing he and his friends would have a better chance of defending themselves if they could see who they were fighting.

Along the way he stumbled into Abeke. She nodded in the direction he was moving, and wordlessly followed. Anda and Tellun were at their side by the time Rollan got to the open grassland.

A handsome bearded man emerged from the darkness, clad in a black tunic. Even in the predawn light, Rollan could see that there was a spiral on his forehead, where the strange creature writhed beneath the skin.

"Hello, Rollan and Abeke," the man said calmly. "It has been some time. Can't say I've missed you."

"Zerif!" Abeke said, her bow in hand. "What happened to you?"

"Something wonderful," Zerif answered. "Though far beyond your understanding. The Wyrms awaken, and I awaken with it."

Rollan noted that the man still carried his oily charm, but Conor had been right: Something was off about Zerif. His eyes were a bit too wild. His smile was a bit too stretched.

“And this must be the boy who has summoned Tellun,” Zerif continued, turning to Anda. “What is about to happen to you can either be painful or mercifully quick. The amount you will suffer is your choice, but the outcome is not. Tellun will be mine.”

In response, Tellun bowed his noble head—not in deference, but in preparation to charge. He raised one hoof and pressed it to the earth, like a runner taking his mark. But then he paused.

Something emerged from the shadows behind Zerif.

It was a large serpent, as thick as a tree trunk, with a broad, triangular head. Her wide, slitted eyes had a manic tilt to them, and as she came into the full light she reared back and opened her black hood. Fear filled Rollan’s mouth with a foul, bitter taste, and his skin felt like rubber. He’d met this cobra before, during the war. Of all the opponents they’d faced, cruel Gerathon was the one who most often stalked his dreams.

“Gerathon,” Abeke said bitterly. “You’ve bowed to this fool?”

Abeke knew what she was doing: Gerathon had always been a haughty, stubborn creature, with a definite bent for killing humans. It might work to pit her pride against Zerif. But the cobra’s triangular face remained impassive as she turned her merciless gaze on them. Rollan knew from experience that, although they were a dozen feet away, they were still within striking range of the cobra’s fangs.

Rollan had his dagger out, ready to dodge and counterattack, but Essix chirped to stop him.

Tellun stepped forward, approaching the serpent. Rollan’s heart was in his mouth as he watched the elk stride calmly in front of the coiled snake and go perfectly still, head lowered.

Staring right into Gerathon’s slitted eyes, Tellun worked his way closer. Though information seemed to pass between the beasts, Tellun apparently didn’t get the response he’d expected. Gerathon lunged, hissing, and the elk sprang to one side, all four legs tucking under him in the air.

Beside Gerathon, another form emerged from the darkness—an eagle, slightly larger and stockier than Essix, with a sharp and noble prow.

A new fear pricked at Rollan's neck as Halawir looked hungrily at Essix. The falcon would be in for the fight of her life if it came to aerial combat. "Stay near," he whispered to her.

Rollan heard Abeke's bow creak, and knew she was readying for battle. "I don't know what your plan is," Abeke called to Zerif, "but you won't have Tellun as part of it."

"Are you so sure?" Zerif spat. "He'll have no say in the matter."

"Prepare," Abeke told Rollan and Anda through the side of her mouth.

Gone were the days of allowing Zerif to call the first shot; Abeke gave no warning before letting her arrow fly. He dodged to one side just in time, and the arrow thudded into something beyond the edge of the dawn's light—something that trumpeted in anger. The ground rumbled as the furious beast surged forward. It was Dinesh, the mighty elephant thudding into the crisp light, rage in his eyes and a comparatively puny arrow shaft sticking out of his flank.

Trembling, Anda took an involuntary step backward. "We have to run!" he whispered. "We have no chance against them."

Fear had the opposite effect on Abeke; she gave a battle cry and summoned Uraza. Instantly, the powerful cat was twining itself around her feet, growling as she prepared for the fight.

But then Zerif ripped open the front of his tunic, revealing three more tattoos riding the muscles of his chest—a boar, a ram, and a polar bear. One by one the tattoos flashed and disappeared, until three more Great Beasts stood before them: Rumfuss the Boar, with his wide, flat head and pointed shredding tusks, chilly hatred in his expression; Arax the Ram, all wiry hair and bounding energy, bitter anger flashing in his eyes; and Suka the Polar Bear, the largest of them all, with pure white fur. The polar bear's black lips pulled back to reveal a row of powerful teeth.

As one, the beasts leveled their hostile gazes on the companions. Zerif had them all under his command; there was no doubting it.

"Anda, run!" Rollan ordered. "We'll hold them off as long as we can!"

Essix launched herself at Zerif, but Halawir unfurled his great wings and sprang to meet the falcon. He hooked his sharp beak around one of Essix's talons, and the two crashed together in the air, tumbling, beaks snapping and clawed feet gouging. They flew higher as they went, shreds of feathers floating down.

Though Rollan was desperate to keep his eyes on Essix, he had plenty to worry about on the ground. With Arax, Rumfuss, and Suka at his side, Zerif charged Tellun. Arax pulled ahead first, brow lowered to the horizon line so his great curving horns were parallel to the ground.

But Tellun held his ground, four legs planted deep in the earth, antlers lowered in defense. They looked spindly compared to Arax's densely curled horns.

Anda had started to flee, but when it was clear Tellun was making a stand, he reversed course and raced to his side. He was still yards away when the two Great Beasts made impact. With a horrifying crunch of breaking bones, they went down in a cloud of geysering dirt.

When the dust cleared, Rollan saw Tellun staggering to his feet. A fragment of antler was on the ground, but the elk was otherwise unharmed. Apparently those antlers weren't as spindly as Rollan had thought.

Arax was splayed out on his side but soon leaped back up, preparing to charge again.

Now it was Rumfuss's turn to attack. His short legs didn't allow him to get nearly the momentum Arax had, but he scissored his tusked head from side to side as he went, ready to slice anything that got in his path. The impact with Arax had spun Tellun sideways, and the boar would soon catch him broadside. When Rumfuss hit, Tellun would be gored.

If not for Uraza. The leopard had been silently circling the field since the attack began, and launched herself with the speed of one of Abeke's arrows, hurtling through the air to strike Rumfuss's flank. Her claws sank into the boar's tough hide. They did little damage but held like burrs, and Uraza's weight fishtailed Rumfuss to one side, crashing leopard and boar into the dirt. When Gerathon streaked toward the pair, Abeke loosed an arrow that embedded into the snake's tail. Gerathon hissed, hesitating long enough for Uraza to scramble to her feet and make a desperate leap to the side. Gerathon's fangs sank into the dirt where Uraza had been only moments before. Another arrow and the serpent was pinned at the hood, flailing as she tried to extract herself from the rocky soil.

That still left a man, an elephant, and a polar bear for the others to contend with, with Arax preparing to rejoin the attack. While Tellun settled into a defensive stance, Rollan took up a position next to Abeke, with Anda behind him.

“Let’s do this,” Rollan said grimly.

Abeke nodded resolutely.

“I’m afraid I’m not much help as a warrior,” Anda said.

“Don’t apologize,” Abeke said sharply. “Just fight as you can!”

Anda cast a glance to Tellun, and Rollan was surprised to see a lack of fear on the boy’s face, though surely he had to be aware of the hopelessness of their fight.

Dinesh led the charge. As the massive, trumpeting animal bore down on them, Rollan knew they had only two options: Get out of the way or die.

The companions’ hasty defensive line scattered as they tumbled to either side. Even Tellun didn’t dare stand up to the massive beast. He leaped directly away from Dinesh, looking over his shoulder to make sure the elephant gave chase. Only the elk could hope to match Dinesh once he got up to speed. The fleet leader of the Great Beasts was soon leading Dinesh away from the companions. Rollan could hear the crash and clatter of the life-or-death chase as they hurtled away.

A few yards off, Uraza was facing the impossible task of simultaneously holding off Rumfuss and Arax. While her assailants circled and lunged, Uraza growled and dodged, making harassing jabs with her claws as she tried to keep the beasts distracted and buy them all time. Somewhere in the sky above, Essix’s shrieks matched Halawir’s screeches as more broken feathers glided down to the earth.

Meanwhile, arms crossed over his chest, Zerif calmly took in Rollan, Abeke, and Anda where they lay sprawled in the dirt. “I will claim three Great Beasts today. My job is nearly done.”

“You will not have Uraza!” Abeke said, spitting blood as she got to her feet and dusted herself off. With the leopard present, she was even more agile than usual, regaining her feet in one springing motion. “I’d bring her back into tattoo form long before you could take her.”

“Sadly, you’re right,” Zerif said, leaning nonchalantly against Suka’s flank. The possessed polar bear didn’t even seem to notice the man next to her, her smoldering eyes fixed on the fleeing elk. “I’ll have to kill you first. Though I wonder if Tellun has the same protection.” His eyes fell on Anda.

“Tell me, plainsboy, you only just summoned the Great Elk. Have you mastered his dormant state?”

Anda didn't answer, but his wide, fearful eyes confirmed plenty.

Zerif's mouth split into an oily grin. “So much of my life lately has been about good timing.”

Rollan readied his dagger, clenching his sweaty fingers over its leather grip as he kept his eyes on Suka. Powerful and agile—even a normal polar bear was nothing Rollan and Abeke could contend with without the aid of their spirit animals ... and Uraza and Essix had their own life-or-death battles. Favoring his good leg, Rollan edged closer to Anda.

“Suka,” Zerif commanded, “kill the plainsboy first.”

Suka bared her sharp yellow teeth and took off toward Anda, starting slow and lumbering but soon at lethal speed. The boy scrambled backward and tumbled, grinding his body through the dirt in his haste to get away. Abeke loosed an arrow at the bear, but cursed as it did nothing to slow her. She readied another, but she would have no time to shoot before Suka reached Anda. Rollan threw himself forward and tried to slash at the bear with his dagger, but the blade was slowed by her thick pelt and only barely nicked Suka's skin. The polar bear continued unimpeded.

With one great swipe of her claw, the boy was lying prone on the ground. With another swipe, his body tumbled and rolled and came to rest beside a tree.

Abeke got another arrow off, and this one made contact, hitting Suka in the flank. The polar bear roared in pain. But it was too little, too late. Suka laid one strong paw on Anda's chest where he lay still and opened her massive jaw to finish him off.

Anda's life would have ended right then—if it hadn't been for Tellun. Tree branches snapped sharply as the elk burst over a rise, head bowed, heading straight for the polar bear who had dared harm his boy. Caught by surprise, Suka took Tellun's antlers hard in the flank and fell over, rolling in the dirt.

Tellun stood over the moaning Anda, antlers lowered protectively. The elk was bleeding from many places, including one particularly nasty wound on his backside that must have come from Dinesh's tusks. Rollan noticed that Dinesh had not followed Tellun and felt a glimmer of hope: Could it be that Tellun had actually defeated him?

Zerif had taken advantage of the distraction to creep up undetected. Tellun was facing Suka, ribs shuddering with exhaustion, foamy spittle dripping from his mouth. Abeke worked busily to get a third arrow notched. With his wounded leg, Rollan was too far from the fight to reach them in time. “Watch out, Tellun!” he cried.

Zerif was upon the elk before Tellun could whirl to face him. That moment of advantage was all he needed. With vision sharpened by his affinity with Essix, Rollan watched Zerif unstopper a vial and splash something gray and squirming right onto the elk’s gashed cheek.

For a moment, the leader of the Great Beasts was frozen in shock. Then he frantically slashed his head from side to side, trying to get the creature off. It continued to wriggle up his head, though, and as it did Tellun seemed to realize what was happening. He looked down at Anda, sorrow joining bewilderment on the elk’s face.

“No!” Anda cried. The boy managed to raise himself to his forearms just in time to watch Tellun’s expression change to anguished horror as the creature disappeared under his skin. The elk’s eyes went milky, then bright.

He turned coldly away from Anda and stood at attention, ready for orders. From Zerif.

“Tellun?” Anda called, eyes wet with tears.

“Slay the boy,” Zerif commanded.

Without even a moment of hesitation, Tellun lowered his head, preparing to charge in with his sharp antlers.

Rollan peered around in desperation. Essix was locked in combat with Halawir, and Uraza was still busy with Arax and Rulfuss, breathing heavily with exhaustion. Anda lay motionless on the ground, paralyzed by shock.

It seemed hopeless.

Until he heard a whizzing sound, right over his shoulder, as a spear appeared in Tellun’s leg.

Rollan watched in astonishment as the elk fell. It wasn’t a mortal wound, but it was crippling; the elk struggled and failed to get up, neck muscles standing out as he thrashed and struggled. Tellun was out of commission.

Some of the hunters from Anda’s tribe must have followed them! Rollan whirled, hoping to see Anda’s parents had come up behind them.

Instead, striding out of the dawn mists, was a stranger.

Friend or foe, child or adult, it was hard to tell anything, as the mysterious figure wore a long, stiff crimson cloak. Even if there hadn't been a hood hanging low over his head, a curious mask—a single white plate, like one huge scale of a reptile—covered his features. The stranger strode forward fearlessly, the fingers of one leather-gloved hand flexing and unflexing.

“Stop right there!” Zerif called.

Tellun was baying in agony from the spear. Rollan had never heard such a terrible noise.

The red figure continued striding forward. Though the movement looked effortless, the stranger approached at the speed of a sprint and was soon upon them. To Rollan's shock, he went straight for Suka. The polar bear opened her jaws to strike, but the stranger was too quick. His run turned into a dropkick, and the heel of his boot smacked Suka full in the face. Already weakened, the enormous bear groaned and tumbled to one side, unconscious.

Rollan and Zerif both were frozen in shock at the stranger's amazing strength. Abeke took the opportunity to loose her third arrow, this one right at Zerif. It struck the man in the abdomen, and he doubled over. For a moment he looked at the shaft in astonishment, as if surprised to find himself vulnerable after all. Then—his eyes full of a maniac's zeal—he yanked the arrow back out and threw it to one side, drawing himself back up to his full height.

Abeke's next arrow went to Rumfuss, striking his shoulder. When the boar looked up in surprise, Uraza swiped him in the face. Having freed herself from the arrow, Gerathon arrived and was soon coiled and making feinting strikes with her hooded fangs. Bleeding from the leopard's gashes, Rumfuss returned his attention to Uraza.

Arax was unwatched.

Abeke's desperate shot had left her open to attack. Arax lowered his head and charged. Though Rollan shouted for his friend's attention, it was too late—there was no way Abeke would be able to leap away in time. Once Arax's horns hit her at this speed, death would be instant.

But with one long stride, the red-cloaked stranger was in front of Abeke. As Arax neared, the figure simply held out its hands. Rollan gasped when he realized the stranger meant to catch the ram's horns.

With a giant thunderclap of sound, a cloud of soil and rock erupted into the air, like an explosion had gone off beneath the earth. When the cloud settled, Rollan strained his eyes through the dust to see what had happened.

The figure was still on his feet.

But Arax was not.

With superhuman strength, the stranger pressed Arax's horns deeper and deeper into the ground. The ram struggled but was wrenched hard into the soil, neck bending, his possessed eyes now full of fright. Rollan found himself swelling with unexpected pity for the once Great Beast.

Above, Rollan heard Essix shrieking. She wouldn't be able to keep Halawir at bay for much longer. Rumfuss, too, was up and ready to attack again.

"Zerif!" Rollan cried, trying to keep the desperation out of his voice. "Suka and Arax have fallen, and Dinesh has disappeared. Surrender!"

Zerif narrowed his eyes and flicked them to the figure in red. Rollan watched as furious calculations passed behind Zerif's eyes. Finally, the man in black nodded, a scowl twisting his mouth. "You might keep Uraza and Essix today, but I have what I came for. Tellun is mine!"

Zerif parted the rent fabric of his tunic farther, and with a flash and a popping sound, Suka and then Arax disappeared, right under the hands of the masked stranger. Zerif must have called Dinesh from wherever he was trapped, too. All three appeared as tattoos on his chest.

Finally, without a second look at Anda, Tellun himself vanished and appeared as a tattoo crossing Zerif's ribs and up under his arm, his antlers just gracing the hollows of Zerif's collarbone. Anda got one dazed look at the elk emblazoned on the body of his enemy and finally passed out, his eyes rolling white before his head hit the earth.

Zerif kept Rumfuss, Halawir, and Gerathon in active form. The beasts flocked to his side, ready to press the attack.

Abeke soon had another arrow notched and pointed at Zerif's heart. Zerif put one hand out to still her. "Your plainsboy friend will die unless you bandage his wounds now. If you shoot, we will attack."

Abeke's fingers on the arrow shook with tension for a moment, but then she wearily nodded and lowered her bow.

While Zerif headed off toward the forest line, his beasts tailing after him,

Uraza and Essix returned to Anda's side.

Once their enemies were out of sight, Abeke dropped her bow and ran to the boy.

Rollan, though, went to the red-cloaked figure. "Thank you for your help," he said warily.

The figure didn't respond, just stood perfectly still, arms folded. Then the shining white mask nodded, catching gleams of the dawn's light.

"What's your name?" Rollan asked.

With one hand, the figure pointed to Anda. The meaning was clear: Go help your friend.

Then the red-cloaked stranger took off into the trees, following Zerif. As he went, he recovered his spear from the ground where Suka had disappeared. He inspected the tip, then hefted it, preparing to throw again. Apparently the battle wasn't over for everyone.

Rollan rushed to Anda's side. Abeke was busy dabbing at Anda's face with his own shirt, which she had ripped free to use as a bandage. "He's bleeding a lot. We need to get him to the ship quickly. If we move fast, I think that he'll live."

"His tribe trusted him to us ..." Rollan said grimly. He squeezed his eyes shut as the full scope of their failure came into focus. He took a ragged breath. "I'll make a stretcher."

As he ran to a nearby fallen tree to strip branches, Rollan's mind raced. Why was Zerif stealing the Great Beasts? How did this gray parasite take over its host, and where did it come from? And who was that masked red figure who had clearly been tailing them as well?

Zerif had mentioned a name when he attacked—the Wyrms. He'd said it was awakening. What did that mean?

While Rollan hacked at branches to start making a stretcher, the question that loomed largest in his mind was also the saddest. How would Anda react when he woke up? Tellun, the greatest of the Great Beasts, the noble elk who'd become his closest companion, had been taken from him.

Though it was heartbreaking to imagine, Rollan sensed that Tellun wasn't all that would be taken from them in the days to come. Not by far.

Eliot Schrefer is the two-time National Book Award Finalist author of Endangered and Threatened, jungle survival stories about apes. His research for his Great Ape Quartet books has brought him to a bonobo orphanage in Congo and on a boat trek through the waterways of Borneo. Immortal Guardians is the second book he's written for the Spirit Animals series.

You've read the book—now join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Have your ebook ready and enter the code to unlock huge rewards!

BOOK TWO:

BROKEN GROUND

Split between two worlds, the team races to stop an ancient evil. Below, Conor and Meilin must cross a vast spiderweb, while above, Rollan and Abeke journey to Stetriol—the kingdom that nearly destroyed Erdas.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

A sneak peek of the next

Book Two

Broken Ground

By Victoria Schwab

SHADOWS IN STETRIOL

Clouds raked across the sky, blotting out the moon and stars.

It was not a night for looking up.

If it had been, someone in Stetriol might have seen the shadows slipping over the rooftops, the shapes perched like gargoyles atop the walls. Someone might have seen the young man standing at the peak of a roof like a weathervane, his face hidden behind a pale, horned mask, his dark cloak snapping in the breeze. But all eyes were down, focused on books and hearths, meals and fires and drinks, and no one noticed.

The figure straightened and began to walk lithely along the spines of the shingled roofs, the cloak billowing behind him. In the color-stripped night, the cloak looked black, but when he paused and the lamplight flickered up from the roads and courtyards below and caught the fabric, it shone red.

All around him, Stetriol was alive in a way it hadn't been in ages. The city had a pulse again, and it was beating, beating, beating in time with his heart, his steps.

The streets fell away below him as he moved with animal grace over the tops of shops and houses until he found the one he was looking for. He paused against a chimney, then sank into a crouch, the horns of his mask catching the light before vanishing with the rest of him into shadow.

In a courtyard below, a girl sat on the rim of a fountain, her long white-blond hair twisted up around her head like a crown. Her legs swished absently in the shallow pool, where a large swan drifted, its feathers as white as sunlight on snow. Behind the horned mask, the young man's eyes—not human eyes, but slitted sideways, like a ram's—widened at the sight of the animal, and he leaned forward at an almost impossible angle, entranced as the swan slid gracefully over the water's surface.

So the rumors were true.

Ninani had come to Stetriol.

The girl's hair and the swan's feathers made twin pools of pale white light against the muted greens and blues and shadow grays of the courtyard. The girl had a book open and was reading aloud to the swan, her voice soft and sweet, the words lost beneath the gentle swish of the water around her legs.

Back on the rooftop, a flash of movement caught the man's eyes; another cloaked figure appeared on the opposite wall of the courtyard, only the snout of a coyote mask visible against the slated roof. Howl. The canine figure shifted his weight; on the ground, he was unstoppable, but he'd never been comfortable with heights.

Howl, the first signed in greeting.

Stead, the second signed back.

A third cloaked shadow sprang out of the darkness to Howl's right, a feline smile carved into the mask that hid her face, her movements so smooth he hadn't even noticed her approach.

Shadow.

The girl signed a dismissive hello, then sank into a crouch and steadied herself on the roof, her nails glinting, curved and sharp as a cat's.

The three perched like stone statues above the courtyard, surrounding the girl and her spirit animal as she read on, unaware of their presence. Howl shifted his footing a second time.

What now? signed Shadow, her fingers dancing lazily through the air.

The young man in the horned mask—Stead, they called him—squinted, and then signed his command. Send word to King.

Shadow drew a finger around her head in answer. The sign for horns was the same as the one for crown. They had wanted to call him that. Crown. He was, after all, King's second-in-command. But the gesture made Stead uncomfortable—his loyalty to their leader was absolute, unflinching—so he'd opted for Stead. As in steadfast or steady-on-your-feet.

He waved Shadow's tease away.

Below, the girl trailed off and went to turn the page when the book slipped from her hand. She fumbled with it, but it fell, bounced off her knee, and landed with a splash in the fountain.

The swan bristled, fluttering her wings.

“Oops,” whispered the girl, dragging the sodden book out of the water. She held it up by one corner, and sighed as water dripped from the pages. “Don’t tell Father.”

She set the book aside; it landed with a soft wet smack on the fountain’s edge.

Just then, Howl shifted his footing a third time, and slipped.

A loose tile came free beneath his boot and went skittering down the peak of the roof. Howl managed to catch himself against the nearest chimney, but he was too late to save the tile. It rocketed forward toward the edge of the roof and the courtyard below. Stead recoiled, back pressed against the chimney, already braced for the crash, but Shadow lunged, body arcing gracefully, and caught the slate with a claw-like nail before it could plummet down to the courtyard floor.

Mortar pebbles skittered down the roof and over the edge, as soft as rain.

The cloaked figures held their breath.

Below, the swan stilled in her pool.

The girl looked up, but it was dark above the lanterns. “What was that?” she asked softly. She and the swan both craned their necks. The girl squinted, as if she could almost see the outline of a figure, the edge of a mask.

“Tasha!” called a voice from within the house. The girl’s attention wavered, drifted back down to the fountain and the house behind her.

“Must have been a bird,” said the girl. “Or a mouse. Or the wind.” She swung her legs out of the water, and then trailed her fingers through its glassy surface.

“Come on, Ninani,” she said pleasantly.

The swan fluttered for a moment, lifting her wings as if about to take flight, before disappearing in the flash of light. As she vanished, a mark appeared, black as ink against the girl’s fair skin, a swan wrapping from wrist to elbow. With that the girl padded inside, leaving a trail of damp footprints in her wake.

Tasha. So that was her name.

The moment she was gone, the feline Shadow uncoiled, and hauled herself upright on the roof. Her usually green eyes were black, the pupils blown out in the low light, and they glared daggers at Howl. She looked as if she planned to chuck the discarded tile at his head.

“Idiot,” she hissed aloud.

“We weren’t all meant for scaling buildings,” he growled in return.

“Enough,” ordered Stead, his voice low and even. Howl and Shadow both drew breath, as if about to go on, when Stead’s hand shot up in warning.

A sound, like the shuffle of bare feet on stone.

An instant later Tasha hurried back out into the courtyard to retrieve the book she’d left on the fountain’s edge. Halfway there, she caught her foot on a mat, and nearly stumbled before righting herself and taking up the sodden book. She pressed the covers together to squeeze out the last of the water and turned back toward the house.

And stopped.

She hesitated, cast a last look at the rooftops and the night sky above.

“Tasha!” called the voice again.

And then the girl was gone, retreating back inside.

When the courtyard had been still for several moments, Stead made a signal with one hand, a silent command to retreat. Shadow set the roof tile against the nearest chimney, and she and Howl peeled away, vanishing into the dark. He watched them go with his sharp, slitted gold eyes, and then looked back at the courtyard, the damp footprints already beginning to disappear.

Tasha.

They knew where she was now.

Where Ninani was.

And they would be back.

With that, Stead slipped away and followed the others into shadow and night.

Enter your code to unlock huge rewards:

Design your own spirit
animal!

Join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!
Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one
of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SPIRIT ANIMALS

Discover Your Spirit Animal!

Read the Books. Play the Game.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals

SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, AND ASSOCIATED LOGOS ARE TRADEMARKS AND/OR REGISTERED TRADEMARKS OF SCHOLASTIC INC. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

From the publisher of The 39 Clues™ and Spirit Animals™

TOMBQUEST

The tombs are opening...

The magic of Egypt has come alive. Mummies are waking. New York is overrun with scorpions. And worst of all, five evil ancients called the Death Walkers have broken free. It's up to one boy to stop them... before the Afterlife claims us all.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/TombQuest

TOMBQUEST™

SCHOLASTIC, TOMBQUEST and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

THE STUNNING ADVENTURE
FROM BESTSELLING AUTHOR
RICK RIORDAN

Available in print and
eBook editions

scholastic.com/the39clues

39CLUESe

SCHOLASTIC, THE 39 CLUES, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

INFINITY RING™

FIX THE PAST. SAVE THE FUTURE.

Available in print and eBook
editions.

SCHOLASTIC.COM/INFINITYRING

 SCHOLASTIC

SCHOLASTIC, INFINITY RING, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

IRINGe

Copyright © 2015 by Scholastic Inc.
All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920.
SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

The publisher does not have any control over and does not assume any responsibility for author or third-party websites or their content.

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2015940289

Cover illustration by Angelo Rinaldi
Cover design by Charice Silverman & Rocco Melillo
Art Direction by Keirsten Geise
Metal frame: © caesart/Shutterstock
Wood texture: © ilolab/Shutterstock

First edition, August 2015

e-ISBN 978-0-545-83001-0

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereafter invented, without the express written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557
Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING SERIES

FALL of the BEASTS

A SPIRIT ANIMALS

BOOK 2

BROKEN GROUND

READ
THE BOOK.
UNLOCK
THE GAME.

VICTORIA SCHWAB

The world is in peril.

An ancient evil is rising from beneath Erdas, and we need YOU to help stop it.

Claim your spirit animal and join the adventure now:

1. Go to scholastic.com/spiritanimals.
2. Log in to create your character and choose your own spirit animal.
3. Have your book ready and enter the code below to unlock the adventure.

Your code: N44NH736TG

By the Four Fallen,
The Greencloaks

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

Treat these strangers with caution.

We don't know if they are friends or foes.

FALL of the BEASTS
SPIRIT
ANIMAS™

BROKEN GROUND

Victoria Schwab

SCHOLASTIC INC.

Contents

Swan Symbol

Greencloak Letter

Quote Page

Title Page

Map

1: SHADOWS IN STETRIOL

2: EYES IN THE DARK

3: UNWELCOME NEWS

4: SETTING SAIL

5: CALL TO THE KING

6: SHADOW PLAY

7: TROUBLE AT SEA

8: THE DANGEROUS DEEP

9: THE LEFT PATH

10: STETRIOL'S WELCOME

11: THE ARACHANE FIELDS

12: THE FESTIVAL

13: THE CHASE

14: UP IN FLAMES

15: FALLING

16: ATTACK ON STETRIOL

17: NEWS AT SEA

18: GREENHAVEN HAS FALLEN

About the Author

Online Game Code

Sneak Peek

Spirit Animals Game

Copyright

SHADOWS IN STETRIOL

CLOUDS RAKED ACROSS THE SKY, BLOTTING OUT THE MOON and stars.
It was not a night for looking up.

If it had been, someone in Stetriol might have seen the shadows slipping over the rooftops, the shapes perched like gargoyles atop the walls. Someone might have seen the young man standing at the peak of a roof like a weathervane, his face hidden behind a pale, horned mask, his dark cloak snapping in the breeze. But all eyes were down, focused on books and hearths, meals and fires and drinks, and no one noticed.

The figure straightened and began to walk lithely along the spines of the shingled roofs, the cloak billowing behind him. In the color-stripped night, the cloak looked black, but when he paused and the lamplight flickered up from the roads and courtyards below and caught the fabric, it shone red.

All around him, Stetriol was alive in a way it hadn't been in ages. The city had a pulse again, and it was beating, beating, beating in time with his heart, his steps.

The streets fell away below him as he moved with animal grace over the tops of shops and houses until he found the one he was looking for. He paused against a chimney, then sank into a crouch, the horns of his mask catching the light before vanishing with the rest of him into shadow.

In a courtyard below, a girl sat on the rim of a fountain, her long white-blond hair twisted up around her head like a crown. Her legs swished absently in the shallow pool, where a large swan drifted, its feathers as white as sunlight on snow. Behind the horned mask, the young man's eyes—not human eyes, but slit sideways, like a ram's—widened at the sight of the animal, and he leaned forward at an almost impossible angle, entranced as the swan slid gracefully over the water's surface.

So the rumors were true.

Ninani had come to Stetriol.

The girl's hair and the swan's feathers made twin pools of pale white light against the muted greens and blues and shadow grays of the courtyard. The girl had a book open and was reading aloud to the swan, her voice soft and sweet, the words lost beneath the gentle swish of the water around her legs.

Back on the rooftop, a flash of movement caught the man's eyes; another cloaked figure appeared on the opposite wall of the courtyard, only the snout of a coyote mask visible against the slated roof. Howl. The canine figure shifted his weight; on the ground, he was unstoppable, but he'd never been comfortable with heights.

Howl, the first signed in greeting.

Stead, the second signed back.

A third cloaked shadow sprang out of the darkness to Howl's right, a feline smile carved into the mask that hid her face, her movements so smooth he hadn't even noticed her approach.

Shadow.

The girl signed a dismissive hello, then sank into a crouch and steadied herself on the roof, her nails glinting, curved and sharp as a cat's.

The three perched like stone statues above the courtyard, surrounding the girl and her spirit animal as she read on, unaware of their presence. Howl shifted his footing a second time.

What now? signed Shadow, her fingers dancing lazily through the air.

The young man in the horned mask—Stead, they called him—squinted, and then signed his command. Send word to King.

Shadow drew a finger around her head in answer. The sign for horns was the same as the one for crown. They had wanted to call him that. Crown. He was, after all, King's second-in-command. But the gesture made Stead uncomfortable—his loyalty to their leader was absolute, unflinching—so he'd opted for Stead. As in steadfast or steady-on-your-feet.

He waved Shadow's tease away.

Below, the girl trailed off and went to turn the page when the book slipped from her hands. She fumbled with it, but it fell, bounced off her knee, and landed with a splash in the fountain.

The swan bristled, fluttering her wings.

"Oops," whispered the girl, dragging the sodden book out of the water. She held it up by one corner, and sighed as water dripped from the pages. "Don't tell Father."

She set the book aside; it landed with a soft wet smack on the fountain's edge.

Just then, Howl shifted his footing a third time, and slipped.

A loose tile beneath his boot came free and went skittering down the peak of the roof. Howl managed to catch himself against the nearest chimney, but he was too late to save the tile. It rocketed forward toward the edge of the roof and the courtyard below. Stead recoiled, back pressed against the chimney, already braced for the crash, but Shadow lunged, body arcing gracefully, and caught the slate with a claw-like nail before it could plummet down to the courtyard floor.

Mortar pebbles skittered down the roof and over the edge, as soft as rain.

The cloaked figures held their breath.

Below, the swan stilled in her pool.

The girl looked up, but it was dark above the lanterns. "What was that?" she asked softly. She and the swan both craned their necks. The girl squinted, as if she could almost see the outline of a figure, the edge of a mask.

"Tasha!" called a voice from within the house. The girl's attention wavered, drifted back down to the fountain and the house behind her.

"Must have been a bird," said the girl. "Or a mouse. Or the wind." She swung her legs out of the water, and then trailed her fingers through its glassy surface.

"Come on, Ninani," she said pleasantly.

The swan fluttered for a moment, lifting her wings as if about to take flight, before disappearing in a flash of light. As she vanished, a mark appeared, black as ink against the girl's fair skin, a swan wrapping from wrist to elbow. With that the girl padded inside, leaving a trail of damp footprints in her wake.

Tasha. So that was her name.

The moment she was gone, the feline Shadow uncoiled and hauled herself upright on the roof. Her usually green eyes were black, the pupils blown out in the low light, and they glared daggers at Howl. She looked as if she planned to chuck the discarded tile at his head.

"Idiot," she hissed aloud.

"We weren't all meant for scaling buildings," he growled in return.

"Enough," ordered Stead, his voice low and even. Howl and Shadow both drew breath, as if about to go on, when Stead's hand shot up in warning.

A sound, like the shuffle of bare feet on stone.

An instant later Tasha hurried back out into the courtyard to retrieve the book she'd left on the fountain's edge. Halfway there, she caught her foot on a mat, and nearly stumbled before righting herself and taking up the sodden book. She pressed the covers together to squeeze out the last of the water and turned back toward the house.

And stopped.

She hesitated, cast a last look at the rooftops and the night sky above.

"Tasha!" called the voice again.

And then the girl was gone, retreating back inside.

When the courtyard had been still for several moments, Stead made a signal with one hand, a silent command to retreat. Shadow set the roof tile against the nearest chimney, and she and Howl peeled away, vanishing into the dark. He watched them go with his sharp, slit gold eyes, and then looked back at the courtyard, the damp footprints already beginning to disappear.

Tasha.

They knew where she was now.

Where Ninani was.

And they would be back.

With that, Stead slipped away and followed the others into shadow and night.

EYES IN THE DARK

THE TORCHLIGHT MADE THEIR SHADOWS DANCE.

They walked through the tunnels below the world, casting a train of eerie silhouettes, all stretched out and flickering against the cave walls. Conor tried to focus on the people instead of their monstrous shadows, but he couldn't stop his eyes from wandering to the rock walls, where their distorted versions twisted and hovered. Meilin, Takoda, and Xanthe were nothing but spindly forms. Briggan's shadow was low, all ears and tail.

But it was Kovo's that disturbed him most.

The ape's shadow stretched and loomed, towering over the others with its teeth bared. In the haunting, unsteady light, Conor thought he could even see the beast's red eyes glowing impossibly in the shadow's warping face.

Conor swallowed and squeezed his eyes shut, trying to separate what was real from what was fever and fatigue. More and more, the two blurred together in his sight. The edges weren't sharp, and if he didn't focus, the nightmares could slip so easily out of his dreams and into the darkened tunnels around them.

"Are you sure you know where you're going?" asked Meilin—the real Meilin, not shadow but flesh and blood and stern resolve—from the path ahead. She was gripping the torchlight, angling its beam from the pale pink eyes of the other girl, the one who was leading the group through the underground maze.

"I'm sure," said Xanthe.

“How can you be sure?” muttered Meilin. “Everything looks the same ...”

“Maybe to you,” said Xanthe simply, running a delicate hand along the wall.

But it looked the same to Conor, too. Now and then he could feel the ground beneath them slope slightly downward, could feel the air get a fraction warmer or colder, a strange current like the breath of a sleeping beast. But otherwise, the tangled tunnels of Sadre did all look the same. An endless repetition of caves and caverns and tunnels. He felt like they were going in circles. Spirals.

How could Xanthe possibly know where they were going? And yet, she seemed to.

They came to a kind of crossroads in the tunnel. The three paths, one ahead and one to either side, looked identical. Xanthe held up a hand for them to stop, while she alone continued forward to the very center of the intersection. She readjusted the pack on her shoulder and knelt, laying her hands flat against the stone, and closing her eyes. Conor didn't know if she was listening or feeling or smelling or using some other sense he didn't have. All he knew was that, when she opened her eyes a few seconds later and straightened, she gestured to the tunnel on the left.

“This way,” she said, continuing on without even looking back.

Kovo and Meilin each let out a skeptical sound, something between a sigh and a grunt, then shot dark looks at each other. Takoda chuckled, and even Conor managed a smile. It wasn't the first time the two had behaved alike. Meilin might have summoned Jhi the Panda, the picture of serenity, but she was as stubborn as the ape when she wanted to be.

Meilin strode after Xanthe, and Takoda and Kovo fell in step behind.

Now that he'd stopped, Conor's body felt sluggish, detached, and he struggled to make it move again. When the others had entered the tunnel and he had not, Briggan's muzzle found his thigh, nudging him forward. The gesture was small, but enough to coax his legs into motion.

“Thanks,” he whispered tiredly, running a hand along the wolf's scruff. Briggan leaned against his leg, not hard enough to set him off balance. Just enough to show Conor that he could lean on him, too.

“It's not magic,” Xanthe was saying when Conor caught up.

“Then how do you do it?” asked Meilin. “How do you know which way to go?”

“I listen to the caves,” answered Xanthe, as if this explained it.

“Will you teach me?” pressed Meilin, and Conor wondered if her insistence was because she didn’t think Xanthe really knew where they were going, or if Meilin simply didn’t like relying on anyone else for help. Probably both.

Xanthe chewed her lip. “I don’t think I can teach you,” she said. “I know because I have always known. And I have always known because I need to know.”

Meilin frowned. “Well, that is both mysterious and entirely unhelpful.”

“Sorry.”

Takoda, who’d been busy trying to teach Kovo how to sign a question instead of a statement—and having no success—looked up. “So everyone down here knows how to find their way?”

“Not everyone,” said Xanthe, stepping up and over a low rock, and holding a few tendrils of mossy rope out of the way so they could pass. “When the children in Sadre are—were—old enough to walk, our mothers and fathers would take us to a place in the caves, somewhere close to our homes, and leave us.”

Meilin let out a short gasp. “That’s awful.”

Xanthe shrugged. “It wasn’t far, and almost all the children could find their way back.”

Almost all, thought Conor grimly. And what of those who couldn’t? He’d seen animals in the wild abandon their young, focus their time and energy on those strong enough to survive.

“The next year,” continued Xanthe, skirting a crumbled section of wall, “the parents would take the children farther, somewhere with a few twists or turns, but still not too many dangers, and they would return home to wait. Every year, the children were taken somewhere and left to find their way, and every year, the path got harder, the pitfalls more precarious. Parents would spend all year teaching their children about the caves—how to make light, how to find food, which water was safe to drink, which mushrooms were edible and which were toxic, how to tell where you were from the direction of the markings left by water in the rocks—to help them survive that one day. Every year ... ” Xanthe trailed off, lost in her own thoughts. Perhaps in memories of Phos Astos and the family she’d lost.

When Xanthe spoke again, she was smiling, but her voice was laced with sadness. “So no,” she said apologetically. “I don’t think I can teach you.”

Meilin stared at the girl with a look Conor had rarely seen before on the warrior from Zhong. He thought it might be respect. Or awe. Takoda’s mouth was open. Even Kovo’s face was steady with appraisal.

The tunnels around them were changing again, oscillating. Their ceilings and sides rose and fell in a way that made Conor’s head swim. He felt himself stumble once, then again, over loose rocks. The second time, he stuck out his hand and caught himself against an outcrop, the wall’s texture strange and chalky against his hand.

The stone was darker here, flaking like charred coal under his touch and smudging on his skin. A drop of sweat ran down his cheek and landed on his palm, turning the black ash into ink. He shuddered, feeling unwell, but straightened and forced himself to follow.

“Watch your step,” called Xanthe, treading gingerly around a hole in the center of the floor.

Conor wouldn’t have noticed it. Even knowing it was there, he nearly fell, and then he realized, too late, that it wasn’t clumsiness or fatigue slowing him down, weakening his limbs and robbing him of balance.

It was the parasite working its way through his body.

Panic rippled through him. He’d wanted to forget so badly that he almost had. Now the remembering hit him like a blow. His skin was burning, but his blood felt icy in his veins. The shiver, once an occasional thing, was now constant, a tremor that followed him through the days—if they could be called days in a place without sun—and into fevered sleep.

Briggan padded along beside him, his body a simple reassuring presence in the dark. Conor curled his fingers in the wolf’s fur, then recoiled as he felt the parasite shift beneath his skin.

A voice—like water over rocks—whispered through his head.

Xanthe glanced over her shoulder at Conor, and he fought back a shudder. Her pale skin, white hair, pink eyes, suddenly reminded him of the Many, those horrible creatures that had somehow once been human, and were now only things. And soon, too soon, Conor would be one, too.

Was there anything left of the Many but teeth and nails and horror?

What would be left of him?

The only physical difference between him and them was the dark spiral that marked their foreheads, and once the parasite finished its slow trek through his body, it would leave that mark on him, too.

How far had it spread?

He didn't want to see.

Didn't want to know.

But he had to.

Conor bit his cheek and slid the fabric of his sleeve up to his elbow. The last time he'd checked, days before, the spiraled tip of the mark stopped there, in the crook of his arm. He'd marked it with his nail, scratching a thin red line to note the parasite's progress. The line was still there, but the streak of black had vanished beneath his shirtsleeve. It was still moving, and Conor could only imagine the path it would take up toward his shoulder, his throat, his cheek, his forehead. He gripped his forearm until it ached, until his fingers left bruises on the skin. But it did nothing to stop the thing moving through him, just as it couldn't stop the whispers starting in his head, as soft and steady as a distant stream. Words muffled like voices beyond a door. Words he couldn't understand, and didn't want to.

Conor shook his head, trying to push away the voices, the image of the Many, the fear, and to remind himself that he still had a chance, still had time. If they could get to the Wurm before the Evertree died, if they could defeat the age-old creature, if winning could save the infected, if, if ...

Briggan looked up at him, his blue canine eyes wise and worried.

"It's okay," said Conor, trying to still the tremor in his voice, to sound calm and soothing, the way he did when he spoke to his sheep so long ago, when he was just a shepherd. Not a boy famous for summoning one of the Great Beasts. "We'll be okay."

Conor had always tried to tell the truth. He knew this was a lie, but he so badly wanted it to be true.

“What’s it like?” asked Takoda ahead, navigating the uneven ground with lithe steps that reminded Conor of Abeke’s grace. “Living in the dark?”

Xanthe shot him a smile. “I don’t know,” she answered. “What’s it like, living in the light?”

Takoda laughed softly. His blue monastery robes billowed behind him, now dingy from their trek through Sadre. “Fair enough. But how do things grow? Do you know what birdsong sounds like? What is—”

Xanthe laughed and held up her hands. “Slow down there. First of all, light isn’t the only source of nourishment. We have vegetables—carrots, potatoes, yucca—that thrive in the dark, and herbs that feed on the minerals in the rocks, and fungi that make their own light, and rocks that can spark fires. And your birds make song? Ours make sounds, but I wouldn’t call it music. More of a squeak. What do birds sound like above?”

Takoda brought his hands together and whistled into them, making a kind of melodic trill that echoed through the caves around them. Xanthe broke into a smile. Kovo scowled. The ape had been signing something at Takoda for several long seconds, but the boy’s back was turned, his attention on Xanthe. Finally, the Great Beast reached out and knocked him in the shoulder. Takoda would have tripped, had the ape’s fist not been tangled in the boy’s robes. Satisfied that he had the boy’s attention, Kovo signed again, slowly, deliberately, adding a snort of displeasure to the end like a punctuation mark.

Conor didn’t know what the ape was saying, but Takoda frowned a little, then wrested himself free. “I don’t know,” he said. “Maybe if you phrased it as a question or—”

But that obviously wasn’t the answer the ape wanted, because his lips curled back, teeth bared. Takoda rolled his eyes and turned toward Xanthe. “Kovo wants to know how much farther we have to go. He doesn’t like it down here.”

“That makes two of us,” said Meilin.

Conor was about to say three when his foot landed on something slick and he started to fall, not down but through. A thin layer of chalky ground gave way beneath his shoe. And then, abruptly, he stopped falling. Not because the hole was shallow—no, it plummeted down and away into nothing but blackness—but because something had caught his elbow. A massive hand encircled his arm, and he looked up to see Kovo glaring down at him with those red eyes. Weakling, said the crimson gaze. Straggler.

You're slowing us down.

You're holding us back.

Why should we try to save you?

You're already lost.

Conor wrenched his arm free and stumbled away from the ape and the hole, his back coming up against an outcropping. Pieces of wall flaked away behind him, revealing another small tunnel no wider than his hand, as if this section of the cave were a bad apple, riddled with wormholes.

And then, from somewhere deep inside the hole, he heard rustling.

At first he thought it was only the whispers in his head, but those were quiet and even. This sound was getting closer. Louder. A moment later Xanthe spun back, pink eyes narrowed, and Conor knew that she heard it, too.

“Get in the center of the cave,” she whispered urgently.

Meilin was the first to move, putting her back to Xanthe and shifting fluidly into a warrior’s stance, torchlight in one hand, quarterstaff in the other.

“What’s going on?” asked Takoda, even as he and Kovo joined the circle.

“Is it the Many?” asked Conor, pushing off the wall and putting his back to Takoda’s, the image of Phos Astos being overrun surging to mind. A tangle of pale bodies, empty eyes, clawing fingers.

Briggan crouched beside him, ready to lunge.

“No,” said Xanthe, clutching her pack. “It’s not the Many.”

“Well, that’s good,” said Takoda. And then, in the ensuing silence, “Isn’t that good, Xanthe?”

But the girl said nothing. The rustling sound grew nearer, the cave trembling and bits of stone crumbling away to reveal more and more holes, so many Conor thought the tunnel would collapse around them.

And then, embedded in the darkness, he saw the stars.

Conor's first thought was that they were somehow back above ground, that the cave had crumbled around them and revealed the night sky overhead. A brief rush of relief went through him. But then the stars began to blink and shift, and Conor realized with horror that they weren't stars at all, but eyes.

Dozens—no, hundreds—of milky white eyes.

Kovo growled, a sound deep in his chest, and Briggan bared his teeth. Conor waited for faces to form around the eyes, for the shapes of the creatures—whatever they were—to materialize, but they didn't. Instead, the eyes hovered, as if they belonged to the darkness itself. And then the darkness itself began to move.

"What on earth ... " whispered Meilin.

"It's a cyrix nest!" said Xanthe, as if anyone but her knew what that meant. But the tone of her voice was enough to tell Conor that whatever a cyrix nest was, it was bad.

The darkness was alive with the creatures. The shadows and eyes shuddered forward together, pouring through the holes and into the cavern, writhing and coiling and blinking their hundred white pupils.

Meilin shouted, and brought her quarterstaff down on a tendril of darkness.

Xanthe took the torchlight and swung it into the writhing dark. The cyrix retreated from the fire just like actual shadows, but then a limb surged forward and struck Xanthe in the chest. The force sent her staggering back into Meilin. The torch fell from her grip and skittered away.

On the damp cave floor, the torchlight began to sputter and die.

In its faltering flame, Conor saw Kovo bring a massive fist down on a writhing shape, blocking out several white eyes as his hand connected with something both solid and insubstantial. The creature bent like jelly around the beast's blow. The force of the ape's attack shuddered through the darkness, and Conor realized with sick certainty that the seething shadows were connected.

The cyrix wasn't many things.

It was one.

One massive creature, either coming together or spreading apart, surrounding them in shadow and eyes and—somewhere, given their luck—teeth.

Something brushed against Conor's leg, and he tried to pull back, but the thing was already wrapping a smoky black tendril around his ankle. No, not a tendril. A tentacle. It latched on to him, cold seeping through his leg where the creature's touch met his skin. Conor gasped at the icy contact and tried to tear free, but the cyrix's grip only tightened. He felt himself losing ground, being dragged forward toward the nearest hole.

Conor stumbled and went down, grasping at the chalky floor for something, anything to hold on to as the cyrix pulled him toward the dark. A cry escaped his lips, and then he heard a growl and felt rushing air as a blur of fur tore past him. An instant later Briggan's teeth closed around the tentacle, and the wolf shook his head viciously, the way Conor had seen terriers do with rats.

The eye-dotted limb twitched in Briggan's mouth, and then wrenched itself free from the wolf's teeth and the boy's leg at the same time. It snaked down into the hole and out of sight.

But there were so many more.

Leg still tingling with cold, Conor grabbed a loose rock from the ground and hurled it at the nearest pair of eyes. The tentacle flinched back and then reared up to strike again as the torchlight faltered, plunging the cave into stuttering seconds of dark.

In the spasms of light, Conor saw Meilin swinging her quarterstaff, the motions fluid but wild, as if she didn't know where to strike; saw Xanthe digging through her pack, searching desperately for something; saw Kovo trying to put himself between Takoda and the monster, but the monster was everywhere!

"Does this thing have a weakness?" asked Conor, crouching to grab another rock.

“Yeah, Xanthe,” snapped Meilin, lashing out at nothing. “How are we supposed to fight this thing?”

Just before the torchlight failed for good, Conor saw Xanthe pull something small and spherical from the pack. “You don’t fight a cyrix,” she said, holding the sphere over her head. “You run.”

The torchlight vanished, plunging them all into darkness, but Conor still squeezed his eyes shut. He knew what was coming, and an instant later Xanthe’s hand must have tightened on the sphere, because light exploded through the cave. The cyrix hissed and recoiled, hundreds of starlike eyes vanishing like candles blown out by a gust. Xanthe wasted no time. She burst into movement, looking less like a girl and more like a ball of blue-white light as she ran for the nearest tunnel.

They all followed, ape and boys and girl and wolf, knowing that the flare would only buy them a few moments. But it was long enough. It had to be.

Conor was the last one out. He saw the extinguished torchlight and snatched it up, stumbling to keep up with the strange blaze of blue-white light ahead and not get left behind in shadow.

They ran when the path was even, and slid when the earth beneath them slanted away. They nearly collided with each other several times until the tunnel finally opened up, not into another cave, but into a massive cavern with half a dozen branching tunnels.

The ceiling rippled overhead. At the center of the cavern, pools of water shone like glass, emitting a faint greenish light.

Which was good, because the sphere in Xanthe’s hand had petered out.

“Well ... ” Xanthe slowed and stopped, letting the spent flare tumble to the damp cavern floor. “That was my last light.”

“Who knows,” said Meilin, who barely looked winded. “Maybe we won’t need any more.”

Takoda let out a small, nervous laugh. He was leaning against Kovo’s broad side. “Maybe,” he said.

Conor had his hands on his knees, gasping for air, his head swimming with the chase. Briggan stood beside him, hackles still raised. Kovo’s red eyes were trained on the darkness behind them, as if daring the cyrix to follow. But long moments passed, and no milky eyes swam in the shadows, no tendrils of darkness crept toward them.

“Are we safe?” asked Conor.

Xanthe squinted around, trying to get her bearings. She nodded and said, “For now.”

Conor straightened and tried to manage a smile, but the world spun, and the horrible, squirming feeling under his skin redoubled. He clutched the crux of his arm, darkness swimming in his vision.

“Conor?” came Meilin’s voice, too far away. “Are you okay?”

Okay, okay, okay, it echoed through the cavern and in his head, mixing with whispers.

Conor closed his eyes, opened them, swallowed.

“Yeah,” he said, forcing himself to straighten. “Let’s keep going.” His eyes tracked to Xanthe, who stood reflected by a shallow pool, doubling into two, four, many. She turned toward him, her pink eyes multiplied.

“Are you sure?” she asked. “You look sick.”

Sick, sick, sick.

Conor looked to Meilin, who shook her head. Xanthe didn’t know, not about the parasite crawling through him, infecting him the way it had so many of her people. He tried to find the words but Meilin answered first.

“He’s tired,” she said. “We all are.”

Conor managed a nod, but Xanthe’s gaze lingered, eyes narrowing. “I’m okay,” he said shakily. To prove it, he took a step, and then another. “We need to keep moving.”

“Okay,” said Takoda, looking around at the cavern with its many branching tunnels. “Where do we go from here?”

UNWELCOME NEWS

THE LOW BRANCH CREAKED BENEATH ABEKE'S FEET.

She moved carefully across the tree limbs, watching, listening, an arrow already nocked in her bow, but the only sounds that met her ears were the sounds of any forest, the rustle of leaves and the trill of birds and the shuffle of small creatures in the branches and the brush. Somewhere on the ground below, Uraza prowled, and overhead, Rollan's gyrfalcon, Essix, was a shadow against the clouds, circling soundlessly.

Abeke shouldered the bow and climbed higher, until she broke through the forest canopy. In the distance, she could see the water that separated Amaya from Greenhaven, the dark shape of boats. They were almost to the water. Slowly, she descended back into the trees. Her body still ached from the fight with Zerif and his stolen beasts—How? How had he taken so many? And the even scarier question, Why?—and a deeper pain ran through her from whatever had shaken her own bond with Uraza. The first was muscle and bone. The second was something worse. Something that scared her.

They needed to get back to the Greencloaks' fortress.

Olvan would know what was happening, what to do. She hoped.

Beneath her, Uraza's dark shape slid past.

And then, all of a sudden, the leopard stopped.

Her head sank low and her tail flicked, nose twitching as if scenting prey.

Or predator.

Abeke held her breath and nocked an arrow in her bow, her mind spiraling through a dozen possible threats. Had Zerif come back? Had one of his infected animals stayed behind? What was lurking in the woods?

The big cat crouched, hesitated, and then pounced.

An instant later, a tinny shriek, cut short by Uraza's strong jaws, and the leopard reappeared, a limp woodland creature in her mouth.

Abeke rolled her eyes as the cat looked up at her, as if offering to share.

"That's okay," she whispered. "You can keep it."

Uraza blinked her violet eyes and began to play with her snack, and Abeke straightened and made her way back across the branches to the clearing where they'd camped. It was little more than a few trampled strides of treeless earth near the edge of the woods. Two exhausted figures huddled around a small fire contained by a circle of rocks.

She dropped to the forest floor, the mossy earth cushioning the force and sound of her landing.

"No sign of Zerif," she said.

Rollan jumped like a startled cat and spun, gripping the tiny stick he'd been using to nudge the fire. Its end smoked faintly. When he saw Abeke, he slumped back onto the dead log he'd been using as a seat. "Way to give a guy a heart attack," he said, tossing the stick back into the fire. "I didn't hear you coming."

"Sorry." Abeke managed a tired smile. "That's kind of the idea."

Rollan rolled his head on his shoulders. Abeke's attention went to the other figure, a boy in animal skins and a woven grass belt, his back against a fallen tree, a livid bruise against his cheek. Abeke's chest tightened. Anda. The boy had left his family, his tribe, and they hadn't been able to keep him safe. Where he had looked lean before, now he looked fragile, his narrow form gone gaunt from the wound at his side and the loss of Tellun.

Abeke didn't know what it felt like to lose a spirit animal, but she could see the pain in his eyes. Supposedly it was like losing a loved one, or a limb, a piece of yourself. Abeke made a silent promise that she and Rollan and Meilin and Conor would find a way to stop Zerif, heal the Evertree, and return Anda's spirit animal.

When she thought about the tasks, they felt impossible. But Abeke reminded herself of all the impossible things they'd already done. They could handle a few more.

Still, she had to admit that the three of them had looked better.

They wouldn't have escaped Zerif at all, not without the help of the figure in the red cloak. Who was he? How was he strong enough to face a Great Beast? And why had he helped them? Abeke had so many questions for the stranger, but of course, he wasn't there to answer. He'd vanished into the trees after Zerif. It had taken all Abeke's restraint not to hunt the man down herself, but Anda needed her, and so did Rollan. They had to stick together, had to deliver Anda to Greenhaven, even without his spirit animal, Tellun.

Abeke shuddered at the thought of Uraza being taken from her. Even though she'd only had Uraza for a relatively short time, she couldn't remember what it felt like to live without her. Just the thought of it made her ill, an echo of the sickness she'd felt when the earth had shaken and her bond with the leopard had felt stretched to breaking. Those strange tremors were bad enough, and left her feeling like the earth and everything in it was being pulled and torn ... but to lose Uraza entirely?

How? How could a person be separated from their spirit animal? How could Anda bear it?

But of course, he wasn't bearing it, not well. His skin looked sallow, and his arms were pressed around his wounded side, where Suka the Polar Bear had slashed him. But she could tell the severed bond hurt him even more. There was nothing she could do for that, but his other injuries still needed tending.

Abeke crouched in front of the boy and dug some berries from her pocket. She'd found a high-growing bush in the forest, their seeds known to help with pain. Anda took them without question, his eyes never leaving the ground, where several elk tracks marked the last sign of his spirit animal.

"It's not far to the water," said Abeke. "We'll be back at Greenhaven soon."

“What’s the point?” whispered Anda, so softly she almost didn’t hear.

“You’re still one of us,” said Abeke, but Anda only shrugged, defeated.

Rollan said nothing. He had tipped his head back, eyes closed. She recognized the blankness in his face and knew he was looking through Essix’s eyes, seeing for himself what she had seen above the canopy. A few moments later he blinked, gaze returning to Abeke and Anda and the dying fire. He nodded and helped the other boy to his feet. Anda leaned heavily against Rollan, beads of sweat running down his face and staining the skins that wrapped around his shoulder.

Uraza appeared at the edge of the small clearing and began to pace, wearing paths into the forest floor. Abeke knew the leopard preferred to roam freely, but she’d stand out too much in the clearing leading down to the shore, and she wasn’t a fan of the crossing to Greenhaven. Besides, what had Zerif said to Anda before he stole the Great Beast?

That he hadn’t learned to bring Tellun into the passive state. If the elk had been in its passive state, would it have been safe?

“Uraza?” called Abeke, holding out her hand, a gesture the leopard knew well. But Uraza did not come. The Great Beast’s violet eyes shone with a wild glint, her tail flicking nervously. Panic wound through Abeke’s chest.

“Uraza,” she said, forcing strength and certainty into her voice.

The leopard slunk several paces, head low beneath her shoulders, looking less like a spirit animal than a predator.

“Please,” said Abeke softly.

The big cat stopped pacing, and seemed to see Abeke for the first time. Her head lifted, as if catching a scent, and her mouth lolled open as she padded forward, soft dark fur brushing Abeke’s hand before Uraza vanished in a flash of light. A sudden heat flared against Abeke’s skin, and then the mark was there on her arm where it should be.

She touched her fingers to it, trying to draw comfort.

And yet ... she could still feel the distance, the invisible cord between them drawing taut and slack and taut again, its strength uncertain. How long would it hold?

“Abeke?” She dragged her attention up and saw Rollan, shifting his weight as he tried to support Anda. “Are you ready?”

She nodded, and the three made their way out of the forest and toward the water in silence.

“Stew. A bath. Stew. A real bed.” Rollan helped drag the boat up onto the shore.

He had decided to pass the journey across the water by listing everything he planned to enjoy once they were back. Even though Abeke knew the only thing Rollan really cared about finding there was Meilin. Well, maybe Meilin and stew.

“Wait, did I already say stew?”

“I’m pretty sure you mentioned it,” said Abeke, tying off the rope. She looked around, but the docks were strangely empty. Up ahead, Greenhaven loomed.

Rollan’s mood seemed to brighten with every step toward the gates, but the closer they drew, the more Abeke had a gnawing sense that something was wrong.

It wasn’t anything specific, just a gut sense, but years of tracking and hunting in Nilo had taught her to pay attention when that feeling in her chest flared in warning. Surely if Abeke and Rollan had felt the strain on their bonds, the other Greencloaks had, too. Hopefully they knew what was happening, and how to stop it.

“Hey,” said Rollan, trying to hide his interest as they climbed the steps to the gate. “Conor and Meilin, they have to be back by now, right?”

Abeke smiled. “I’m sure. After all, they were only going to investigate the door in the Petral Mountains.”

“Let’s hope they ran into less trouble than we did.” His voice was light when he said it, but something twinged in Abeke’s stomach.

“Yeah,” she said quietly. “Let’s hope.”

By the time they passed through the gate and into the courtyard, Abeke could feel the tension in the air. Every face she saw seemed drawn, and the guards all had their weapons out, their postures tense, as if they were trying to hold their ground against a wind.

But it wasn't just what Abeke saw that gave her pause, but what she didn't see. Something was missing.

And then Abeke realized, it was the spirit animals.

Every time she'd been to Greenhaven, she'd been met with parrots and foxes, meerkats and pelicans, a hedgehog and a boa constrictor and a dozen other beasts. They dotted the fortress with color, filled the air with sound. But now they were gone—no, not gone, of course, just drawn into their passive states. The black tattoos stuck out from collars and cuffs. Whatever had happened to Rollan and Abeke back in the Amayan forest, it had obviously happened here at Greenhaven, too. And the Greencloaks must be just as scared.

Only two animals were in sight: Olvan's moose, standing sentry at the edge of the courtyard, and Essix, still circling overhead. She was an ornery bird, as stubborn as Rollan.

But where was Kovo? The last time she'd been here, the Great Ape had been in the center of the square, surrounded by guards. Even as a spirit animal, he took up space. But there was no sign of him. Or Jhi. Or Briggan.

Rollan eased Anda down onto the steps outside the great hall. A medic rushed forward to see to the boy's wounds. He didn't resist, didn't even speak, only let the woman lead him away. Abeke caught him as he passed and squeezed his shoulder once, gently.

"It's going to be okay," she said.

Anda nodded vaguely but said nothing. The sadness in his eyes broke Abeke's heart.

"Some welcome party," said Rollan, turning in a circle. "Meilin?" he called out. "Conor?"

"I'm afraid they are not here," said Olvan, the leader of the Greencloaks, appearing at the entrance of the great hall. He looked older, or perhaps just tired, new creases etched into his face.

"Shouldn't they be back by now?" asked Rollan, fear edging his voice. "You ... you went with them."

"Yes," said Olvan slowly. "I did."

“Then where are they?” demanded Rollan.

“What’s going on?” asked Abeke, heart racing.

Olvan hesitated, his wrinkles deepening in thought. His eyes tracked over the courtyard, as if he didn’t want to speak of what had happened, not even in front of his own Greencloaks. Abeke’s chest tightened, the way it did when she was on uneven ground and could feel it shifting, about to give way.

What had happened to her friends?

When Olvan spoke again, his voice was carefully even, but his gaze was filled with warning. “You two look as though you’ve had your own troubles,” he said, holding open the door to the great hall. “Come inside, and we can compare notes.”

“What do you mean, they’re trapped?”

“Lower your voice, Rollan,” instructed Olvan. The boy’s words still echoed through the great hall.

Trapped ... trapped ... trapped.

Abeke looked around then, and realized that the great hall, usually buzzing with activity, had been emptied. The three of them were alone, Abeke and Rollan on one side of the long wooden table, and Olvan on the other. The surface of the table was piled with scrolls, and bowls of stew waited in front of them, quickly cooling as they sat untouched, forgotten.

“We don’t know exactly what happened,” explained Olvan, “only that the doorway collapsed behind them.”

“What?” squawked Rollan.

Abeke listened but said nothing. She ran her fingertips along the table’s surface, considering the hundreds of marks—scratches, dents, grooves—in its surface, focusing on the details as she tried to organize her thoughts.

She worried about them all, but she worried about Conor most. He was running out of time, and she couldn’t stop thinking about the mark crawling up his arm, about what would happen when—if—it reached his forehead.

The fight with Zerif came back to her, the horrible spiral on his face. The same mark was echoed in every one of the animals he now controlled, and the thought of him controlling Conor, too, made her stomach turn.

“You didn’t want to tell us in the open,” she said slowly. “The other Greencloaks don’t know, do they?”

Olvan rubbed his eyes. “Not all of them, no.”

Rollan looked pale with anger. “Why on Erdas not?”

The old man sighed. “The last few weeks have been trying on all of us, mentally as well as physically. I fear that this turn of events would be a blow we cannot afford.”

“I don’t care about the Greencloaks’ morale,” snapped Rollan. “Not when our friends are stuck under the earth with Kovo, the ape who tried to destroy the world!”

Abeke reached out and brought a hand to Rollan’s arm. She could feel his body, as tense as rope, beneath his cloak.

Olvan, for his part, looked as if he were carrying the weight of Erdas on his shoulders. Abeke could tell it was taking all his strength to keep his own voice even, his manner calm.

“Kovo is not what he once was,” said Olvan steadily.

“Look,” said Rollan, “I’m all about redemption, but you’ll never make me believe that Kovo is on our side.”

“He is on Takoda’s side,” offered Abeke, “and Takoda is on ours.”

“Takoda is trapped under the ground with the rest of our friends!” shouted Rollan, pushing to his feet. “How can you just sit there listening to this, Abeke? We have to go after them!”

“Sit,” commanded Olvan. “Where they’ve gone, you can’t follow. The door has caved in, and it’s too fragile to force our way through. Your friends are still alive—”

“How do you know?” Abeke cut in.

Olvan gestured at the mountain of scrolls on the wooden table, ribbons of red and blue and yellow tying them shut. “Word comes from many sources, Lenori among them. She can feel Briggan and Jhi, as well as Kovo. They are all still alive.”

“That doesn’t mean they’re safe!” protested Rollan.

“Have faith in your friends,” said Olvan. “I do. And know that you are needed here. With Zerif infecting people and stealing spirit animals, it’s more important than ever that you two find the Great Beasts before he does. Bring them here to Greenhaven so that we can protect them from whatever he’s planning.”

“But we failed,” said Abeke, her throat tightening. “Anda lost Tellun.”

Olvan’s eyes darkened. Abeke could see the worry in his expression. Not only for Anda, but for all of them, for whatever Zerif was planning, whatever he would do when—if—he got the rest of the Great Beasts. “Tell me everything.”

Abeke swallowed hard, and explained what had happened—first with Anda’s tribe, and then the appearance of Zerif and his stolen Great Beasts, the loss of the elk, the horrible strain on their spirit animal bonds.

“We, too, felt the straining of our bonds,” said Olvan grimly. “We can only assume it’s because of the Evertree’s rot. Lenori tells us that her own bond shuddered when the tree did.”

“And then there was the guy in the mask,” said Rollan, stabbing a spoon at his now-cold stew.

At this, Olvan stilled. “What guy?”

“He showed up at the last minute,” said Abeke thoughtfully. “He’s the only reason we got away.”

“He had a red cloak,” offered Rollan, “and he wore some kind of mask. Weird and faceless, gave me the creeps. Didn’t say anything. But Abeke’s right, he did help us.”

“The way he fought ... ” said Abeke.

“It was insane,” said Rollan, spirits brightening a little despite himself.

“I’ve never seen anything like it,” added Abeke. “Not from Meilin, or my people, or even Zerif. It was like he ... wasn’t human. It was as if a spirit animal were giving him strength, but there was no animal around. Not that I saw.”

Olvan steepled his fingers. “Strange. A similar figure appeared here at Greenhaven not long ago, but his mask had the face of an animal carved in it. Some kind of cat.”

“So there’s more of them?” asked Rollan.

“It would appear so. This one called himself Worthy. He came asking for the Keeper. They left together and haven’t returned. For now, we must treat these strangers with caution. We don’t know if they are friends or foes.”

“But the one in the woods,” insisted Abeke, “he helped us.”

“Yet he conceals his face,” countered the leader of the Greencloaks. “We may share a common enemy in Zerif. But if you cross paths with him again, be careful.”

Rollan slumped back in his seat. “So, what now?” he grumbled. “We’re just supposed to sit here, waiting for news of our friends? Waiting for Zerif to strike again? Waiting for the Evertree’s rot to break our spirit animal bonds?”

“No.” Olvan shook his head. “I don’t expect you to sit here, waiting for anything.” He began sorting through the pile of scrolls on the table, searching for one in particular. Some were large, obviously brought by hand, while others were small and tightly coiled, the kind carried by messenger birds. Each was bound with a ribbon, yellow or red or blue ... never green. Abeke wondered if that would be too obvious. A message just asking to fall into the wrong hands.

Finally Olvan found the one he was looking for and plucked it out of the stack.

“This just arrived from Lenori.” He slid the yellow tie from the paper and unrolled it. “Another Great Beast has awoken. So eat up and get your rest, because you two leave at first light.”

“What about Anda?” asked Abeke.

Olvan sighed. “As soon as he’s strong enough, we’ll return him to Amaya and help him find his tribe.”

Abeke bristled at the idea that the boy was useless without Tellun. “But he belongs with—”

The man reached out and curled his old hand over hers. “It’s not your fault, but Anda has no place here without his Great Beast.”

A new wave of guilt rolled over her. They’d taken him away, all for nothing. The only thing she could do now was fight for him. For Tellun.

Rollan sat forward on the bench.

“So where are we going?” he asked.

Olvan pinned down the scroll with his mug and finally met their eyes.

“You’re going,” he said, “to Stetriol.”

4 SETTING SAIL

EVERYONE HAD OBVIOUSLY LOST THEIR MINDS.

That was the only explanation Rollan could come up with.

He shook his head and spit over the edge of the battlements. It was the middle of the night, the wind biting at his cheeks and messing his hair. He couldn't quiet his thoughts enough to sleep.

Stetriol, of all places. It couldn't have been Nilo, or Eura, or Amaya, or Zhong, or even Arctica! It had to be Stetriol.

He would rather face everyone he'd ever stolen from than set foot back in the land of the Conquerors and the Bile, Gerathon and Gar, the Reptile King and Shane.

Olvan claimed that the land at the edge of the world was different now, that it had changed. According to the leader of the Greencloaks, Stetriol was now full of happy people and frolicking pets and rainbows and—fine, Rollan might be exaggerating.

But still.

The last time he'd been in Stetriol, they'd tried to kill him. In fact, every encounter Rollan had had with Stetriol and its people had been unpleasant. And no matter what Olvan said, Rollan wasn't suddenly ready to assume the best from people who'd once showed him the worst.

"They're rebuilding," Olvan had insisted. "And we are helping them. We must show them they can trust us."

Rollan fought back a snort at that. Trust. He hadn't survived the streets of Concorba by trusting the people who were nice to him, let alone the ones who tried to stab him in the back. Sure, Stetriol had been through some bad times, but it had been cut off from the world for a reason.

“Stetriol is now a post, occupied by Greencloaks,” Olvan had explained. “Our presence there is as large as it is here in Greenhaven, so you’ll be in good hands once you arrive. And this time you won’t be traveling alone.”

In the end, those words had helped to ease Rollan’s nerves a little. But he still wished Meilin was going with him. Wished she were here. He knew she’d had to go with Conor, so Jhi could help heal him, but it didn’t change the fact that Rollan missed her. Not that he’d say that to her face. She’d probably just tease him if he did.

Or maybe she wouldn’t.

Girls were confusing.

The wind on the battlements picked up. Rollan pulled his cloak tight around his shoulders. Below, the ocean made a constant shushing sound against the shore, while overhead it was a cloudless night with a bright wedge of a moon and a sea of stars. The kind of night that made Rollan feel small, though not in a bad way. Like he was part of something bigger.

He picked at the edge of his green cloak, the garment he’d been so hesitant to put on. After all, being alone could be scary, but being a part of something was way scarier. And yet, being a part of the Greencloaks had helped him get his own mother back, had brought him close to Abeke, Conor, and Meilin. It had given him family, friends, things he thought he’d never have.

He felt like he’d stolen something precious, and gotten away with it.

Rollan forced himself to smile. Once a thief, always a thief.

But someone—Zerif—was trying to steal those things back, and Rollan wasn’t letting go without a fight. He took a long, steadying breath and was about to whistle for Essix when he heard the footsteps behind him. Not the march of boots down in the courtyard, but the soft familiar shuffle of Abeke’s steps somewhere at his back. Rollan didn’t turn around. He knew that if he heard her coming, it was only because she wanted him to hear. He’d never met anyone so stealthy.

Meilin the warrior. Abeke the tracker. Conor the loyal leader.

What did that make him?

“Can’t sleep?” asked Abeke, emerging from the shadow of the keep wall.

Rollan shook his head.

“Essix is restless,” he said, blaming the bird. The falcon appeared for an instant against the moon, then was gone again, swallowed up by the sky.

“I can’t sleep either,” said Abeke. “Every time I close my eyes, I’m afraid I’ll wake to that feeling....”

Rollan knew the feeling she was talking about. He’d felt it, too. Like his skeleton was being torn from his body with the skin still on. Like something important inside of him was bending, bending, about to break.

“It seems like you and Essix are okay.”

“Me and Essix ...” said Rollan, squinting up at the night sky. Was that true? “We’ve always let each other be. If this spirit animal bond is like a rope, maybe there’s just more slack in ours. I mean, remember how long it took me to convince Essix to even go into her passive state?” Rollan took up a loose pebble and lobbed it over the wall. “Silly bird.”

He tried to keep his voice steady, but the truth was, Rollan was scared. He was having a harder time borrowing Essix’s sight these days. Even when he did, it felt unsteady, like he might fall at any second. Every time, he was left feeling dizzy, and like he’d eaten something rotten.

Rollan forced himself to take a deep breath. He felt trapped.

Trapped, like Meilin and Conor.

“Do you think they’re okay, Abeke?” He didn’t have to say who.

Abeke eased up beside him and leaned on the battlement. “Meilin’s a warrior. And Conor ... he’s a fighter. The only way for us to help them is to stop Zerif. And to do that, we have to get to Stetriol before he does.”

“Stetriol,” grumbled Rollan. “Land of the Conquerors, and Shane, and all the people who hate us.”

Abeke touched his shoulder. “People change,” she said. “Look at us. None of us are the same people we were when this first started. Whoever thought you’d finally put on that green cloak?”

Rollan snorted.

“Besides, abandoning Stetriol is what got the Greencloaks into trouble last time.” She looked out at the night. “You, me, Meilin, Conor, we’re supposed to be the future of the Greencloaks. If we choose not to help, we’re just repeating the past. We have to be better ... okay?”

“Okay.” Rollan bumped into her shoulder. “When did you get to be so smart?” he asked. “Are you hiding a talisman or something? Which Great Beast had all the brains?”

“Ha-ha.”

“We should get you some mystic robes. You can go around telling futures or advising nobles or whatever people in mystic robes do ... ” He trailed off into a yawn, and Abeke broke into a smile.

“Come on,” she said, steering him toward the stairwell. “We both need sleep if we’re going to set out at first light.” She cast a last glance back at the night, the moon, the glittering water. “Something tells me we’re going to need our strength.”

“Hoist!”

“Bartel, hand up that crate.”

“Careful with the apples.”

“Gera, got your medical bag below.”

“Have you checked the sail lines?”

“Don’t let those blades get wet!”

The sun was barely up, and the Greenhaven dock was already a flurry of activity. Rollan had secretly hoped that “we sail at first light” actually meant “we sail at a perfectly decent hour sometime after breakfast,” but his hopes had been dashed when Olvan pounded on his door before dawn.

“I’m up, I’m up,” he’d mumbled before rolling over and trying to stifle the beginning of dawn’s light with his pillow. But when he tried to close his eyes again he’d seen Meilin clawing through the dark, and Zerif’s grim smile, and the wormy black spiral forcing itself across Tellun’s forehead, and he knew that sleep was ruined.

Now, as they made their way to the shore, Abeke looked almost as tired as he felt, and far less excited about the ship waiting for them at the end of the docks.

While she'd grown more comfortable with boats over time, Abeke had always preferred being on land. Plus, Uraza got seasick. The short trip from the Amayan coast was one thing, but a sea voyage to Stetriol was another.

Rollan's spirits were considerably brighter. Growing up on the streets of Concorba, he'd dreamed of fresh air and freedom, and life aboard a ship afforded both. Besides, when it came to modes of transportation, sailing was about as far from riding a horse as he could get, and in Rollan's book, that was a mark in its favor.

The Tellun's Pride II was a beautiful craft, sturdy with brilliant white sails, but it wasn't the ship that caught Rollan's attention: It was the crew!

Not a handful of escorts, but a proper crew of fifteen—no, twenty!—Greencloaks. All for their mission to Stetriol. The sight of them made Rollan feel rather important.

"This is quite an expedition," said Abeke. "Will we draw too much attention?"

Rollan deflated a little. Of course, she was the one to think of stealth.

"I've sent word ahead," answered Olvan. "They know you're coming. Besides, half of these Greencloaks are going to relieve those who are already stationed there."

Rollan deflated a little more. And then Abeke knocked his shoulder with hers and flashed him a smile, and he felt himself smile back. It was still an impressive crew. And besides, they were the chosen ones! They'd gone on their last quest without any help at all! And, okay, maybe that was a bad example because it didn't end so well, but still ...

"Awfully small for Greencloaks, aren't they?" said a voice behind them.

Rollan and Abeke turned to find two figures in forest green ambling down the docks toward them, packs on their shoulders. The first was a woman, tall with warm dark skin, a shock of short black hair, and silver in her ears. The second was a man, a head shorter and stockier, with pale hair pulled back in a ponytail.

"I was beginning to wonder if you'd join us!" said Olvan.

“Sorry we’re late,” said the woman. Her voice had a slight Niloan cadence.

“S’my fault,” said the man, who was all Eura. His collar was open beneath his cloak, and across the skin of his chest Rollan could see the edge of a tattoo. It looked like a monkey. Or at least a monkey’s tail.

“Of course it’s your fault,” said the woman, but her tone was cheerful. “Just be glad they didn’t sail without us.”

Her sleeves were rolled up, revealing a parrot tattoo that ran the length of her forearm, from talons to crest. She leaned her elbow on the man’s shoulder, and he didn’t seem to mind. In fact, he leaned into her as if they were old friends.

Will Abeke and I be like that one day? Rollan wondered. It was easy to imagine staying friends, but it was hard to picture getting so ... old.

“That would be hard to do,” said Olvan, “considering you’re the captain.”

Rollan’s eyes widened in surprise, but Abeke broke into a grin.

“Which makes me the first mate,” said the man. “And you two must be our cargo.”

“I’m nobody’s cargo!” said Rollan, at the same time Abeke said, “Cargo?”

He only chuckled.

“I’m Nisha,” said the woman, “and this is—”

“Oi, I can introduce myself,” cut in the man. “Arac. I’m Arac.”

Nisha raised a brow, obviously amused. “Do you feel better now?”

“Much,” grunted Arac. “A name’s a powerful thing to have,” he said, addressing Abeke and Rollan. “Can’t go handing it off to anyone.”

“I’m not anyone, Arac, I’m your wife.”

Rollan’s mouth fell open. He’d never met married Greencloaks before. Now he could see why.

“Close your mouth, boy,” warned Nisha. “Before something flies in.”

Abeke giggled as Rollan’s mouth snapped shut.

“Chop-chop,” said Nisha, striding up the plank.

“You heard the woman—er, I mean captain,” Arac amended when she cut him a glance. In a fluid gesture he took up Rollan’s and Abeke’s sacks and hoisted them onto one strong shoulder.

“You can see I’m leaving you in good hands,” said Olvan.

Abeke shot the elder Greencloak a worried look. To Rollan’s surprise, the lightness left the old man’s face and he knelt, resting a hand on each of their shoulders.

“Any advice?” asked Rollan.

“Yes. Take care. Watch out. And come back safe.”

“That’s awfully general,” said Rollan, tipping his head. “You got anything more specific?”

Olvan swallowed. “If you see that stranger, the one with the mask and the red cloak, be careful.” Olvan straightened, his joints popping and cracking with the effort. “I’m counting on you two,” he said. “We all are.”

“No pressure,” grumbled Rollan as Olvan mounted his spirit animal and made his way back up toward Greenhaven’s keep. Rollan thought he could see Anda beside the gate, dark eyes wide and watching. Rollan lifted a hand, but the boy—if it was him—didn’t respond.

“Get aboard or get left,” called Arac, pounding a meaty fist along the ship’s hull.

Abeke and Rollan climbed the ramp, and both cast a last glance back at Greenhaven as the ship put out to sea. They stood there watching as the fortress shrank and shrank, until it was lost from sight.

“Off on another adventure,” said Abeke, leaning back against a crate.

“I wonder if Stetriol has good stew,” said Rollan. Abeke touched her stomach as if the thought were unwelcome, and closed her eyes.

Overhead, Essix let out a short cry and swooped down toward the deck.

“I was wondering when you’d show up,” he said, trying not to sound relieved.

Essix landed on the ship’s rail just long enough to claim a scratch under her beak and another between her wings. Then she was off again, and so were they.

CALL TO THE KING

THE BOY SAT ON A LOW ROCK, SHARPENING A PAIR OF knives.

He was perched in the shadow of the tree line, shielded by a canopy of leaves while he worked. His cloak, a vivid red, sat at his feet, folded inside out to hide the crimson. His sleeves, crisp and black but torn from the fight with Zerif, were rolled to his elbows. The only sound beside the sh-sh of stone against metal was the rustling of branches overhead, their leaves caught up by the breeze. Now and then, his lips formed words—as if he were talking to himself, or to someone else, or simply remembering conversations long past—but they never took shape, never found sound.

His mask, a smooth plane of white wood, sat cast aside him on the stone. Unlike the others, with their ears and snouts, their horns and tusks, his mask held no such markings. It was even, featureless, save for the slits through which he saw and breathed and spoke.

When the knives were clean and sharp, he set them aside and rolled his head on his shoulders, trying to work out the stiffness that had settled in his muscles. A cut ran along his jaw—it was a testament to the force of the blow, that it even broke the skin—and his muscles ached, but he was alive, and so were the Greencloaks. But he hadn't been fast enough to save Tellun.

And in the end, Zerif had gotten away with his newest prize, vanishing in the trees.

The man seemed at times a monster, at others a ghost.

In the distance, the sun sank over the water, turning the ocean and the sky from blue to orange and purple and gold, the colors of a fading bruise. A clearing stretched between the boy's perch at the edge of the woods and the shore, and the boat waiting for him on the docks.

As soon as night fell, he would go.

Until then, he tended his weapons and nursed his shallow wounds. As he dabbed fresh salve over the cuts, his skin caught the setting sun, illuminating the band of scales that tapered down his forearm like armor, shifting from green to gold.

He paused, arm outstretched before him, and stared at the scales, marveling now the way he had when he'd first seen them. When he flexed his arm, they shifted in response, not like well-fit clothing, but like skin itself. He lifted a fingernail and ran it thoughtfully along their plated surface.

A bird screeched overhead.

Not a falcon or a pigeon, but a crow, a Ksenian crow, a southern tracking bird with a dash of white on its forehead. He held out his scaled arm, and the bird landed on his wrist. A message was bound to its leg with a single piece of dark red cloth.

The message was from Stead.

He recognized the young man's short, blocky script, even before he read the note.

Only a few lines, but that was all he needed.

King, it read.

A Great Beast has risen.

Return to Stetriol.

He jostled his arm, and the bird hopped free, waiting with curious eyes while the boy dug a piece of charred wood from his pocket, turned the scrap of paper over on the stone, and scribbled an answer. He then retied the note to the crow's foot. It clicked its beak, clearly expecting a reward. He fed it a scrap of dried meat and sent it on its way. Within moments, the bird was a speck of black in the reddish glare of the setting sun, winging its way toward the sea, King's message bound to its foot.

A single line, signed with a K.

Already on my way.

The boy they called King squinted until the crow was lost from sight, then slid his knives back into their holsters and took up his mask. He fastened it over his face, settled the red cloak back on his shoulders, and made his way to the boat bobbing on the dock.

To Stetriol.

SHADOW PLAY

TUNNEL AND CAVERN.

Tunnel and cavern.

Tunnel and cavern.

Meilin had been trained to map the terrain in her mind so she never got lost, but it didn't work down here. Not when everything looked the same! They were beneath the earth, she knew, but how far beneath? Feet? Miles? How long since the doorway had collapsed? How long had they been trapped underground, wandering the corridors of Sadre, the world under the soil? Days? Weeks? Time ran together just like the tunnels and caverns.

Meilin had tried to keep track, marking time on her sleeve with a bit of blackish chalk, but she'd given up one night after slipping in a puddle, the muddy water smudging the tallies beyond recognition.

Tunnel and cavern.

Tunnel and cavern.

It was maddening.

Down here, there was no up or down, no forward or back, no day or night. Time bled, and the simple beat of Meilin's heart was deafening in her ears. She couldn't distract herself from worries about Abeke, and Rollan, and Conor. She reached for Jhi's calm, which usually came to her, even in the panda's passive form, but where it once wrapped around her, now it felt more like a grazing touch. Still, Meilin clung to that comfort and resisted the urge to scream.

“We should stop here,” said Xanthe when their tunnel gave way to another cavern. “I’m sure we could all use some rest.”

Meilin looked around. It looked like almost every other space they’d passed through.

“Is it night?” she asked, before remembering that outside of Phos Astos, Xanthe likely had no way to keep track of day and night. “I mean ... is it the time when you normally sleep? How do you even measure the hours?”

This wasn’t the first time Meilin had asked that question, but Xanthe still answered patiently. “By the sound of the water in the rocks, and how tall the ground blooms are, and whether or not the wall rushes are awake.” Then she shrugged and added, “And how tired I am.”

“I think it’s fascinating,” said Takoda. “I mean, what is day and night without the sun and moon? How does a body know the cycles of need?”

Kovo and Meilin rolled their eyes at the same time, then caught each other and glared. She didn’t trust the ape or his scarlet gaze—a look that seemed constantly challenging, a body always on the verge of action. And yet what help had he been? He’d gotten them trapped here beneath the earth, and now he didn’t seem to be doing anything but biding his time. For what?

Briggan gave a soft whimper, and Meilin turned to find Conor half walking, half stumbling, bracing himself against a handhold of rock.

“I also judge the time,” said Xanthe soberly, “by how badly your friend needs to rest.”

“I’m all right,” mumbled Conor, but his blond hair was sticking to his face with sweat. Meilin could tell he was suffering. “I’m ... ” He trailed off as a shudder passed through him.

Meilin reached for his arm, but to her shock Conor jerked backward, a hiss escaping his throat.

The sound was so strange, so utterly inhuman, it stopped her in her tracks. Conor’s hands curled, not all the way into fists, but claws, and his expression twisted into something animal, his eyes vacant, and his mouth half open in a snarl.

Briggan leaped forward and put himself between Conor and the rest, not to protect him, Meilin realized with a start, but to protect them. Kovo growled and wrapped his arms protectively around Takoda.

“What’s going on?” demanded Xanthe, pink eyes wide. “What’s wrong with him?”

Conor’s chest heaved as Meilin inched forward. Xanthe tried to pull her back, but she held up a hand, her eyes trained on her friend.

“Conor,” whispered Meilin. “You’re stronger than this. Fight it.”

The boy squeezed his eyes shut, another shiver rolling through him. Then he blinked and looked up, and his eyes widened. He was Conor again. The boy from Trunswick. The kindhearted Greencloak who’d stood beside her through thick and thin.

“Meilin,” he whispered. “I’m ... I’m sorry ... ”

He tried to take a step forward, but his knees buckled. Meilin was there by his side, catching him before he could fall. He was burning up as she lowered him to the cave floor, and when she pulled his shirt aside and saw the vicious curl of the parasite against his bicep, inching up toward his shoulder, his throat, his head.

Xanthe saw the mark then, and leaped away with a gasp.

“He’s infected.”

“But he’s fighting it,” said Takoda.

Xanthe shook her head. “Do you honestly think we would have cast our own people out if they could be saved? There is no way to fight it.”

“I refuse to believe that,” snapped Meilin. “He’s still my friend.”

“Not for long,” said Xanthe, wrapping her arms around herself. “And once the mark takes him, he’ll be able to infect us. This is how one become many. He can’t come with us, Meilin.”

“I’m not leaving him behind,” she said as she took the cloak from her shoulders, folding it for a pillow beneath Conor’s head.

“I’m sorry, but there’s no saving him.”

“You don’t know that,” snapped Meilin. “If we get to the Wyrms, if we defeat it ... ” She could hear the desperation in her own voice; she knew how it sounded, but she wasn’t just trying to make herself feel better. She believed he could be saved. She had to believe it. “Look, if he loses control, then ... ”

“Then what?”

“Then we’ll talk,” said Meilin. “But until then, he stays with us.” She looked up. “Even if that means you won’t.”

Silence fell over them, broken only by Conor’s fevered breathing. Xanthe’s eyes flicked from Meilin to Takoda and Kovo, then down to Conor. The way she looked at him, like he was already gone, turned Meilin’s stomach. She gripped Conor’s shoulder. She knew what it felt like, to be trapped inside your skin, to be fighting against someone else’s control. She knew the fear, and the helplessness, and the hopelessness of that fight, and she wouldn’t let him go through it, not alone.

“Xanthe,” she said, fighting to keep her voice even. “I don’t know if we can do this without you, but I won’t do this without Conor.”

Xanthe’s pink eyes met hers. “Okay,” she said at last. “I’ll stay.”

“Thank you,” whispered Meilin.

Xanthe tried to manage a smile. “You wouldn’t make it far without me,” she said, but Meilin could see the darker truth in Xanthe’s pale eyes. The girl had nowhere else to go. No one to go to.

From the floor, Conor let out a small, stifled sound of pain, and Meilin flinched.

Jhi, she called desperately. With a flash of light and a quick burst of heat, the panda was there beside her in the cavern. Jhi’s head swiveled slowly to get her bearings, obviously hoping to find herself back above ground.

Sorry, thought Meilin. Not yet.

The panda turned her steady gaze on Conor’s prone form. Jhi’s face remained passive, and where that lack of expression used to frustrate Meilin, now she clung to it, trying to absorb the panda’s calm. Jhi leaned forward and rested a single paw on Conor’s chest, while Briggan paced, his hackles still raised.

For a long moment, no one said anything.

And then Xanthe clapped her hands. “Like I was saying,” she said, an edge of worry lodged in her throat. “I think it’s time to set up camp.”

The fire burned blue.

Xanthe said the color came from the moss they used for kindling. It was perfectly normal—she'd been surprised to see their torches burn gold and white—but the bluish tint made the cave seem even more unnatural, painting the cavern in tones that belonged to an underwater world, a place of ocean, not earth.

Meilin stood watch at one side of the cave, her quarterstaff in her hands. Conor and Jhi rested nearby, while Takoda and Xanthe sat by the opposite wall.

Ahead of her, the path was darkness—no, people spoke of darkness, but this was something thicker—and it played tricks on her eyes, pulling her imagination toward unseen threats until she finally dragged her attention back to the cavern.

Takoda and Xanthe had their heads together near the fire, making shadow puppets on the cavern wall.

First, Takoda made a butterfly.

Then, Xanthe made a blob that was apparently something called a snarle.

Next, Takoda made a bear.

Then, Xanthe made another blob with antennae she claimed was a gallor.

Takoda shook his head with a shy smile. “That’s not a real thing.”

Xanthe cocked her head, her pale hair glinting blue in the moss fire’s light. “Just because you don’t know what a snarle or a gallor is,” she countered, “doesn’t mean they aren’t real.” But there was a ghost of a smile at the edge of her mouth.

“You are making them up!”

Xanthe shrugged, but the smile widened. “Hey, you’d never seen a cyrix before either.”

At that, Takoda shuddered dramatically. “And I hope I never see one again.”

Kovo was supposed to be on watch, too, guarding the way they’d come, but the ape kept casting glances back at the pair by the fire.

He’s jealous, thought Meilin. She was jealous, too, jealous of the way they could laugh, even now. She knew that if Rollan were here, he’d make her laugh. Or at least smile.

Conor whispered in his sleep. He lay curled against the cave wall nearby. Briggan had finally stopped pacing, and now stood sentry beside the boy while Jhi worked her silent, soothing power.

The strain had gone out of Conor's face, and his breathing had grown steady and even. He wasn't the only one calmed by the panda's presence. Meilin could feel her heart slowing, her panic ebbing as she lowered herself to the cool cave floor. She put her back to the wall, crossed her legs, and tried to breathe.

"I'll take watch," said Xanthe from the fire, casting a nervous glance at Conor as she spoke.

Anger still flared through Meilin, at Xanthe's fear, and the fact that she understood it.

She wanted to lash out, to hunt down Zerif and attack him for hurting her friend and endangering so many. Instead she was stuck here beneath the earth, watching Conor suffer. Feeling helpless. Useless. The anger and panic and fear were like ropes, wrapping themselves around her. She wanted to fight back, to tear free, but knew that struggling would only make the dark feelings tighten. Instead, she nodded, and tried to breathe, ground herself the way her fighting instructors had taught her, and let the ropes fall away.

Overhead, the blue light danced, and Jhi's calm wrapped around her. Eventually she felt her eyes begin to unfocus.

But as soon as they drifted shut, she heard a voice.

Not a stranger's voice, or an animal's, not the gurgle and rasp of the Many or the sound of water on the cave walls. It was a voice she knew too well. Her father's.

Meilin's eyes snapped open.

"Meilin," he called. The name echoed softly "... eilin ... lin."

It wasn't coming from the cavern, but from the tunnel beyond, a snaking path where the blue firelight quickly gave way to impenetrable black.

Meilin frowned, wondering if she'd imagined the sound, but then it came again.

"Meilin ... eilin ... lin."

“Did you hear that?” she asked, turning back toward the fire, but there was no one there. No Takoda and Xanthe making shapes. No Kovo looming. No Conor and Briggan curled against the wall.

Only Jhi, sitting before the fire, her dark round shape like a shadow puppet, and her face blank in a way that reminded Meilin of that horrible sensation when their spirit animal bond had been stretched.

“Jhi?” she called. But the panda didn’t look at her. Didn’t blink.

“Meilin ... eilin ... lin,” called her father. She knew it wasn’t him, knew it couldn’t be him, but there was so much strangeness here beneath the earth, and maybe, maybe, maybe ...

Meilin got to her feet. She could feel Jhi’s presence at her back, tugging, trying to keep her from following the sound, but Meilin had to know.

She called into the darkness. “Hello?”

Hello? Hello? Hello? It echoed.

But no other answer came.

Meilin took a step, out of the cave and into the tunnel, and then another, the blue light from the fire fading behind her until she could barely see the way ahead. Above her, roots pulsed like veins to a heart. As the tunnel sloped down beneath her feet, she knew it led toward the Evertree.

Every time she thought of stopping, the voice came again.

“Meilin ... eilin ... lin.”

But now it didn’t sound like her father.

It sounded like Zerif.

It sounded like Shane.

It sounded like Olvan.

It sounded like Conor.

It sounded like Abeke.

It sounded like Rollan.

It sounded like people she knew, and people she’d lost, and even people she hadn’t met.

The ground beneath her feet became tangled with roots. The walls pressed in with them, and the tunnel became narrower and narrower, closing in until Meilin had to crawl on hands and knees toward the darkness at the heart of the world.

And then, all of a sudden, the tunnel gave way, and she was in a massive cavern, as big as the greatest hall in the largest fortress in Zhong.

She was kneeling on a stone floor, palms splayed, and under her fingers something had been gouged into the rock. Up close, it looked like a curve, but when she got to her feet, she gasped.

It was, of course, a spiral.

Meilin looked up, taking in the rest of the cavern.

The roots of the Evertree were everywhere. They wound around the edges of the space and over the floor. They climbed the walls and gathered together in the ceiling. Light streamed from every root, illuminating the strange chamber. A dozen of the strongest tendrils came together into a canopy overhead and trailed down like curtains in the middle of the cavern. No, Meilin realized, not like curtains. Like bars.

And standing there, in the center of the cage of roots, was a shape.

At first it seemed like a monster.

And then like a man.

And then like something else entirely.

Meilin knew just by looking at this thing that it was old, as old as the world, and as dark as the sky on a moonless night. Its presence seemed to soak up all the light and warmth, and radiate back a sickly cold.

It had no edges, and when it twisted toward her, she saw that it had no face.

And when it spoke, its voice whispered in her head, and the words all bled together like the rustle and crack and tread of the woods at night.

Meilin couldn't understand what it was saying, but it seemed so very important. Maybe, if she just got closer ... She took a step, and the words got clearer. But she still couldn't understand, so she took another, and another, until she was right in front of the cage of roots.

The darkness smiled, and lunged.

Its hands shot forward through the bars and wrapped around her throat and—

Meilin sat forward with a gasp.

She was still sitting on the cavern floor at the mouth of the tunnel. Someone had cast a cloak over her like a blanket. Xanthe was crouching over her, her pink eyes bright, her small, pale hand resting on Meilin's arm.

"You were talking in your sleep," said Xanthe apologetically. Jhi sat a few feet away, gaze even but eyes dark. Had she seen it, too? The Wyrms? Meilin saw concern and sadness tinge the panda's steady eyes, as if she knew what waited for them in the dark.

I'm sorry, the panda seemed to say.

They were so different, Meilin and Jhi, like fire and earth. Meilin would never have guessed that their bond would stay strong even now, under such strain. Maybe it was because of their differences. Meilin and Jhi were still distinct, and often at odds, unlike Conor and Briggan, who seemed to share the same soul.

Meilin couldn't help but wonder how Rollan was faring.

The blue fire had gone cold, and Kovo was holding up their own revived golden torchlight while Takoda rolled a blanket back into his pack.

"We should get moving soon," said Xanthe. "It's still a ways to go. Oh, and I found some rockweed for us to eat," she added, holding out a ropy plant the color of seaweed.

Meilin could imagine Rollan saying, "Mmmm, delicious," in his sarcastic way. A pang went through her as she realized how much she missed him. She hoped he and Abeke were faring better on their own mission.

"Thanks," said Meilin, accepting the plant with dignity. She raised it to her mouth and hesitated.

"Best not to try and actually eat it," explained Xanthe. "The nutrients are in the juice. You chew on it, like this." Xanthe demonstrated, chewing on the stalk the way Meilin had seen farmers in the countryside do, trying to keep their mouths from going dry on the hottest days of harvest. It wasn't a very elegant process, but Meilin was crouching on a damp cave floor, her clothes stained with soil. There was a time for elegance, and a time for survival.

Besides, the rockweed actually tasted good, like honey and river water, and soon Meilin didn't care what she looked like, chewing the strange—fruit? vegetable?—food.

Across the cavern, Jhi and Kovo seemed to be engaged in a staring contest. The ape was much larger than the panda, but even he obviously wasn't immune to her influences, and Kovo was the first to break away, his red eyes escaping to the floor with a snort. Jhi made a small sound and rocked slightly, and if Meilin didn't know better, she'd think the panda was being smug.

"We need to get going," whispered Xanthe, tossing aside a spent stalk of rockweed.

Meilin didn't understand why the girl was keeping her voice low until she saw that Conor was still curled in the corner. Briggan's long body was stretched out beside him, like a barrier between the boy and the rest of the cave.

She hated to wake him, but the fact was that only reaching—and defeating—the Wyrms could save him. Jhi could slow the sickness, but the panda couldn't stop it.

Meilin got to her feet. Her whole body felt stiff, as if ... well, as if she'd spent the night sitting on a cold cave floor. She flexed her muscles, aware of how long she'd gone without a proper fight—sure, there were plenty of things to run from—and how badly she wanted to avoid one.

She reached a hand toward Jhi. The panda considered her a moment before slowly bowing her head and vanishing in a burst of light and heat.

Meilin crossed the cave to Conor, but before she could reach out a hand, his eyes were drifting open.

Briggan stretched and nuzzled the boy's cheek.

"Hey there," he whispered, a tired smile tugging at his mouth.

"You're awake," said Meilin, kneeling beside him. "How are you feeling?"

Conor sat up and rubbed his head, the blond tufts standing up in a dozen directions. Before she could stop herself, Meilin reached out and smoothed the hair, feeling his forehead as casually as possible.

With Jhi's help, and a few hours of sleep, at least his fever was down again.

“What happened last night?” he asked.

“You got ... sick,” she said, searching for the right word.

His gaze went to his infected arm, folded against his ribs, and then to Xanthe, who was standing across the cavern, watching. “I’m sorry,” he said. “I thought I could—”

“Conor, you should have said something.”

He swallowed. “I’m already slowing us down.”

“You have to tell us when it gets bad, okay? You have to tell me. That’s what friends do.”

He shook his head and wouldn’t meet her eyes. When he spoke, his voice was sad and lost. “There’s nothing you can do.”

Meilin tensed.

There’s nothing you can do.

They were her five least favorite words.

When Zhong had fallen, she’d heard them.

When her father had died, she’d heard them.

But she wouldn’t accept those words, not now. Maybe she couldn’t save Conor—not on her own, not without help and time and luck—but there was something she could do. She could stand at his side. She could be strong enough for both of them.

“You need to eat.” Meilin handed him a stalk of rockweed. “It’s actually not bad,” she said in response to his cautious look.

Briggan sniffed the plant, recoiled, and looked pitifully at Conor until he dug a scrap of dried meat from his sack.

“I can feel it,” he whispered, turning the rockweed over in his hands.

She expected him to say the parasite, but instead he said, “The Wurm. I can feel it here,” he said, touching his arm. “But also there,” he added, pointing down the tunnel Meilin had guarded, the one she’d wandered in her sleep. “We’re getting closer.”

Every inch of Meilin’s skin crawled at the thought of facing the monster from her dreams, but she forced herself to smile. “Good,” she said, holding out her hand.

Conor took her hand and got to his feet, but he looked uncertain. “Is it?”

“Yes,” said Meilin. “Because the sooner we get there, the sooner we can fight.” She wrapped an arm around the boy’s shoulders. “And the sooner we fight, the sooner we can win.”

TROUBLE AT SEA

THE TELLUN'S PRIDE II CUT LIKE A KNIFE THROUGH THE waves, buoyed along by a strong current, a good wind, and a stretch of clear sky. It was a grand ship, and with the help of the breeze and the two whales at the bow pulling it along, they were well on their way to Stetriol.

"About time something went our way," said Rollan, turning his face toward the morning sun. "This weather is amazing!"

"Don't say that," warned Abeke. She was sitting cross-legged on a wooden crate, rolling an apple between her palms. "You'll jinx us."

"Come on," said Rollan, waving his hand. "How can I jinx us? There's not a cloud in the sky."

"I'm serious," she said. "Don't talk like that."

But now he couldn't help but tease her. "You know what?" he said. "I bet we get all the way to Stetriol without a drop of—" He was interrupted by the apple that Abeke lobbed at his head. Rollan dodged, and it caught him in the shoulder instead. There wasn't much force behind the blow, and he finished defiantly, "—rain."

Abeke shook her head as he rubbed his shoulder where the apple had struck.

"Tenavo," she said.

"What's that?" he asked.

"That was the word for bad luck in my village. Not just any bad luck, but the kind you ask for."

"Superstitious girl," grumbled Rollan, fetching up the fallen apple. He took a big bite.

“You’ll see,” she warned.

Ten minutes later, the storm rolled in.

They stood at the rail, watching it form on the horizon. It approached at first like a malevolent ship, and then something much bigger than a ship, and then a wall.

Within minutes, the storm was on them, and it was raging. It swallowed up the blue sky, carrying clouds that went from white, to gray, to charcoal. Thunder rumbled through them, and lightning danced, and then the rain came, crashing down like a wave.

Within seconds, they were soaked through.

Rollan craned his head back, squinting through the icy rain. “Essix!” he called up into the worsening storm, but the bird was nowhere to be seen. She probably had the good sense to get above the clouds. Right about now, as the ship rocked under the growing swells and shuddered under the force of the rain, Rollan was wishing he could do the same.

He had seen his fair share of bad weather, but he’d always been on land, crouched under an awning or in a doorway, tucked behind some bins or under a set of stairs. He’d never been in the middle of it.

Now, standing on the deck of the Tellun’s Pride II, he didn’t have much choice.

The downpour battered the deck and crashed against the hull, the ship bucking like an angry horse beneath them. Soon it was all they could do to stay on their feet.

Abeke glared at Rollan. “Tenavo!” she repeated, the word sounding more like a curse as she shouted at him through the gusts of wind and torrents of rain.

The crew, most of them caught just as off guard by the sudden storm, now scrambled over the deck, tying down all the cargo, tarping the crates, and collapsing the sails. Abeke and Rollan helped to drop an anchor so they wouldn’t be hurled off course, but the rope got stuck in its crank, and as they heaved at it, they both nearly went overboard.

“Get inside,” ordered a stocky Greencloak as Rollan slipped and slid on the waterlogged deck and Abeke fought to keep her own balance. “Before you’re washed away.”

They sat in silence at a table in the ship's galley. Their clothes were soaked through, dripping water on the table, the bench, the floor. A few other Greencloaks sat at the table, too, most of them looking just as bedraggled.

Abeke stared across at Rollan. Her dark skin had a greenish tint from the sloshing of the waves. She was nursing a glass of juice instead of food, and obviously waiting for him to say something. Her fingers tapped out a beat on the table, and even though the sound was lost beneath the groan of the ship, he could feel her tension. She was as coiled as a cat.

"Well?" she said at last.

Rollan fidgeted damply. He looked up at the ceiling, at a lamp swaying on its hook. A drop of icy rain dripped from his hair and slid beneath his collar. He shivered, wondering if he would ever be dry again. More rainwater dripped from his hair into his soup. "Well?" he echoed.

"Are you going to apologize?"

"For what?"

Abeke let out an exasperated sound. Rollan had to fight back a smile—it was the kind of noise Meilin would make. "I told you," said Abeke sharply. "I told you not to test our luck. Am I such a superstitious girl now?"

"Fine, fine," said Rollan, rolling his eyes. "Tenavo."

Abeke blew out her breath and said something in her native tongue. Even though Rollan didn't know the words, he got the idea. She brought her head to rest on her arms, Uraza's tattoo crouched across her skin.

He chewed his cheek. "Okay, so how do you undo it?" he asked, running a hand through his wet hair. "This tenavo?"

Abeke glanced up, the ghost of humor in her eyes.

"I mean," he went on, "assuming it exists, and assuming someone is noble and selfless enough to try and undo its effects even though he definitely didn't cause it, what would they have to do?"

"Well," she said thoughtfully. "They would have to do the magical intenavo dance."

Rollan's eyes narrowed with skepticism. "Is that so?"

"Indeed," said Abeke, nodding gravely.

“And how would someone do this intenavo dance?”

Abeke looked around. She got to her feet and plucked some dried herbs from the wall, bracing herself against the counter when a particularly bad swell made the ship sway.

“We normally use flowers, but these will have to do.” She plucked a few colorful herbs and stuck them in Rollan’s wet hair. “Now you get up, and hold out your arms and bounce up and down on your toes five times, then move your hips in a circle, all while saying, ‘Forgive me, Great Tenavo. I am a foolish boy.’ ”

Rollan looked at her skeptically. “And that will help?”

Abeke shrugged. “It couldn’t hurt.”

The Greencloaks at the other end of the table were watching with amusement. Rollan felt his face go red. But he took a deep breath, and he did it. He got to his feet, and held his arms toward the ceiling, and bounced on his toes, and swiveled his hips, and said the words.

After the first round, the sky bellowed with thunder, and Abeke said he should probably try again.

“I don’t think it’s working,” sighed Rollan, sagging back onto the bench after the third or fourth attempt.

Abeke was sitting on the bench, smothering a fit of giggles behind her hand. Rollan could feel a smile working its way onto his own face. He didn’t mind being silly, if it made Abeke smile. Ever since they’d faced Zerif in the forest, she’d been closed off, distracted. “You did your best,” she said, stifling a laugh.

The galley door flew open, and the captain and first mate blew in.

“I see you two got caught in it, too.” Arac’s voice carried ahead of him through the room.

“Quite a storm out there,” said Nisha, a few steps behind. They both had had the good sense to trade their greens for hooded weatherproof cloaks. A handful of Greencloaks trailed in behind them, a stream of seawater in their wake.

“Came out of nowhere, didn’t it?” chimed in Arac. “Someone must have challenged the sea.”

Abeke shot Rollan a look, and Rollan ducked his head over his food.

“Arrogant thing, the sea,” continued Arac, fixing himself a bowl. “Can’t help but rise to a challenge.”

Rollan gripped his bowl.

“Gotta be careful what you say around it.”

“It was my fault, okay?!” announced Rollan. “I did it!”

The other Greencloaks shot him a variety of looks, some amused, others annoyed, all damp.

Arac only chuckled. “Should’ve known.”

“If a ship can’t weather a storm,” said Nisha, “it isn’t much of a ship.” She offered Rollan a wink, and he felt his shoulders relax. The captain scrunched up her nose. “Are those bay leaves in your hair?”

Rollan was about to explain about the luck-restoring ritual when he felt something move around his feet, and then a dark shape leaped up onto the bench, vanished again, and appeared on the table in front of him, holding what was left of his chunk of bread.

It was a spider monkey.

Arac’s spider monkey, judging by its mischievous expression and the fact the man’s tattoo was now missing from his chest. Before Rollan could reach for his bread, the monkey was off again, scaling Arac’s arm to perch on his shoulder.

“Nexi,” said Arac, by way of introduction. The spider monkey tipped its head.

Rollan glanced at Nisha, who was pouring herself some soup.

“Where’s your parrot?” he asked before he could stop himself. Nisha gave him a knowing look.

“It’s a little cliché, don’t you think? A captain strolling around a ship with a parrot on her shoulder?”

“All you need is an eye patch,” offered Rollan cheerfully. “Or a wooden leg.”

Nisha chuckled good-naturedly. “Truth be told, Relis doesn’t care much for the open water. Besides ...” Her expression darkened. “I’m sure you’ve felt the strain. I feel better keeping him close, until we find a way to fix it.”

“That’s probably a good idea ...” Rollan looked up at the ceiling and wondered where Essix was. He’d been scared to test their connection.

Scared Essix would pull away. As long as he let her roam free, he could pretend everything was still okay between them. He didn't have to find out if it wasn't.

"What about you, Arac?" asked Abeke. "You don't feel the same?"

Arac snorted. "I'd like to see you try and make Nexi do anything she doesn't want to do." The spider monkey, who'd been busy hiding bits of bread in Arac's blond ponytail, looked up at the mention of her name, flashed a grin full of teeth, then went back to work.

Nisha came over, carrying two bowls of soup and spilling neither—which Rollan thought was seriously impressive, considering how much the ship was swaying.

"It'll calm," she said, casting a look at Abeke, who was clutching the table's edge. "These kinds of storms, they don't last long."

The captain sat, pushing the second bowl of soup in her husband's direction. "Before you know it, we'll be in Stetriol."

Rollan's gaze went to their sodden green cloaks, hanging on hooks along the galley wall.

"Still not sure how good I feel about wearing green over there," he said. "Feels a bit too much like wearing a target on my back."

"Olvan said—" started Abeke.

"I know, I know," said Rollan. "It's just ... does Olvan even know what Stetriol's really like these days? Has he been there himself?"

"We have," said Nisha, nodding at Arac.

"Really?" asked Abeke. "What's it like?"

"Weird," grunted Arac.

"Different," said Nisha at the same time. "Better." Arac grumbled something unintelligible into his bowl as he drank down the rest of the soup.

"What was that?" challenged Nisha.

Arac set down the empty wooden bowl with a thud. "I said it's still Stetriol."

Nisha shook her head, as if they'd had this conversation before. "Arac."

"I lost my brother to the Conquerors," said the man.

“We all lost someone,” countered Nisha. “That is the nature of war. But if we keep looking back, we’ll never move forward.” She turned her attention to Rollan and Abeke. “It’s amazing, the difference. You won’t even recognize it. It’s not just about what’s there, it’s about what’s not. The air is different, clearer. The people are healthier and happier. It still has a ways to go, but it is progress.”

Rollan pushed his bowl aside. “Maybe they should rename it. To help people forget.”

The captain shook her head. “They don’t want to erase the past, Rollan. They just want to move on. And we can help them. So much is changing in Erdas, and most of it for the worse, but Stetriol is changing for the better. And that’s something.”

Silence fell over the galley.

“Do you feel that?” asked Nisha, cocking her head.

Rollan didn’t. “No.”

“Exactly,” she said with a smile. He realized then that he didn’t feel the ship swaying, didn’t hear the wind and rain barreling the sides and sails.

“The storm,” he said. “It’s over.”

THE DANGEROUS DEEP

THE STORM HAD INDEED PASSED.

Not slowly, but all at once, just as it had come.

Standing on deck, Abeke could see the dark mass of clouds moving away, retreating like a curtain of shadow across the sea, leaving still, blue sky in its wake. “Fickle thing, the sea,” said Arac. “Isn’t it?”

Abeke smiled and shot a look at Rollan beside her, but he only shook his head, dislodging the last few bay leaves she’d stuck in his hair. They fluttered down to the deck. “No way,” he said. “I’m officially done goading the ocean. From here on out, I plan to tell it how nice it looks, and how much I respect its prowess.”

Abeke laughed and looked around. The change was kind of incredible. With the bad weather gone, the sea glittered in the light. It reminded her of the Niloan grasslands after the sun came up and before the dew burned off, when everything was still wet. It didn’t seem possible—after all, they were on the ocean, everything was wet—but that was how she thought of it. Sparkling. Fresh. Even the air tasted better, less like salt and more like, well, air.

Abeke drew in a deep breath just as a screech sounded overhead. Relief flooded Rollan’s face, and moments later, Essix dove, landing on the boy’s shoulder, her talons digging into the wool of his cloak.

“Maybe we should get you an eye patch,” teased Nisha.

“Only if you make me captain,” countered Rollan with a grin. He touched his temple against the bird’s crown, and Essix took wing again, sweeping over Arac's head. The gyrfalcon plucked a piece of soggy bread from the man's ponytail before banking up again.

"And I thought Nexi had a mind of her own," Arac mumbled as the bird landed on the mast. His attention turned to Abeke. "When are we going to see that Uraza of yours?" he asked.

Abeke's chest tightened, her hand brushing the tattoo on her arm. "I imagine when we're back on—"

But she was cut off by a terrible sound, like a drowning cry, and the horrible give beneath her feet as the ship torqued sharply to one side.

"Did we hit something?" asked Rollan. But the ship hadn't stopped. It was still pressing forward in a halting way, jerking side to side as it did.

Even the most experienced sailors stumbled, fighting for balance, and calls of alarm went up across the deck. Abeke dropped instinctively into a crouch, but before she could catch Rollan's sleeve, he went down hard on his hands and knees as the ship groaned beneath them. Luckily most of the cargo was still tied down from the storms, but the people weren't.

"What's going on?" shouted Nisha, who was somehow upright and moving swiftly across the deck.

Just then the ship rocked heavily, as if hit sideways by a massive wave. Even in the midst of the storm it hadn't swayed this much. Now, as it careened between the bright sun and calm sea, Abeke knew that something must be very wrong.

"The whales!" demanded the captain. "See to the whales!"

Abeke stayed crouched, clutching the base of a nearby rope for support, but Rollan struggled to his feet.

"Stay low!" she called, sensing another shudder from the ship. But he didn't hear her; he was already up. He made it halfway to the bow before the spasm came. The ship hurled forward and Rollan went down like before, but this time the deck wasn't flat beneath him. The whole thing was banking steeply to the right, ocean spraying up in a cold mist.

And when Rollan fell, he slid.

The deck was still slick from rain, and he skidded toward the rail. Abeke let go of her rope and lunged for him, skinning her knees and catching his wrist before he could slide beneath the wooden rail and crash down into the deep.

“I’ve got you,” she said, panic flooding her as she felt her grip begin to slip. But the ship was already tilting back the other way, and they managed to scramble away from the edge.

Rollan was gasping for air, but his eyes were still fixed on the rail. “Did you see that?”

“See what?” she asked, breathless.

“There was something down there. In the water. I thought I saw a—”

But his words were lost as the ship shuddered again, and Nisha’s orders broke their attention.

They got to their feet; by the time they reached the bow, they found half the crew struggling with the lines that held the whales in place. One of the two beasts was pulling the craft sideways as it tried to escape the second, which was thrashing and writhing against some invisible attacker beneath the current. Abeke scanned the water in search of sharks, or eels, some trace of blood, but there were no signs of whatever was attacking the whale. It dove, or tried to, but the harness binding it to the Tellun’s Pride II held, and the ship bobbed dangerously, like an apple dropped into a bucket.

There was a cry, and two men nearly went over, clinging to ropes and rails for support as others rushed to haul them back on board. The whale kept twisting and turning, as if possessed. It was obviously losing strength—but it might still have enough to wreck the ship before it tired.

“What’s wrong with it?” asked Rollan.

“It must be hurt!” said Abeke.

“Cut it loose!” ordered Nisha, but no one seemed able to get close enough. The harness had gotten tangled during the whale’s panic. “Cut it loose before it sinks the whole ship!”

Arac was at the bow, calling out orders, sawing at the ropes as fast as he could. But the storm had left them wet, the knots swollen with rainwater. He dulled one blade on the waterlogged ropes, cast it aside, demanded another.

“It’s not giving, Nisha! We’ll have to unfasten the harnesses from the whale’s end.”

Abeke was already swinging a leg over the side, getting ready to jump into the roiling sea.

“Wait!” cried Rollan, and she could see he was still shaken from whatever he’d seen in the water. Abeke hesitated.

But Nisha didn’t.

The captain tore off her cloak and swung her legs over the railing, a knife already out and clutched in her grip. She dove with the experienced grace of a lifelong swimmer over the ship’s side and into the water below. Arac paled when his wife went over but didn’t abandon his work.

Rollan drew his own short knife and set to sawing beside Arac, casting glances every few seconds at the churning waters where the whale still thrashed. One of the ropes of the harness finally broke, but the metal hook on the other had warped, pinning it to the ship. Beneath the current, Abeke could see Nisha’s shape moving alongside the panicked whale. She hadn’t even come up for air.

“Swims like a fish, my wife,” said Arac, his voice tight with pride and fear.

All of a sudden, the rope went slack. Far below, Nisha must have finally gotten the harness from the raging creature. The ship stopped bucking and rocked to a halt, the world evening out around Abeke. She hadn’t realized how much it was churning until it went still. The wounded whale didn’t surface. Instead it dove, a dark shape disappearing into the depths of the sea, and an instant later, Nisha broke the surface of the water, gasping for air.

Abeke felt herself gasp with relief, and then realized every other hand on board was sighing, too.

A pair of Greencloaks was throwing a rope ladder over the side, and Nisha scaled it, taking half the ocean with her. Water ran down her limbs and over her clothes as she ascended, her face drawn. When she hoisted herself back over the ship’s rail, water pooled at her feet and a woman rushed forward with a coarse towel.

“A bit brisk for a swim,” said the captain, teeth chattering, and everyone laughed, but the air was still tense with confusion.

“What happened?” asked Arac, his voice and gaze searching.

“Was it ill?” asked another.

“Was it injured?”

“Was it mad?”

“Was it frightened?”

“What could have possessed it so?”

The questions came in a wave, and Nisha held up her hand for order. “Be calm.” But something was wrong, thought Abeke. She could see it in the captain’s eyes, in the way she leaned back against the rail, not just for breath, but for strength. She didn’t know what had happened beneath the current, but she could see that the captain was shaken. Badly.

She shot a look at Rollan and saw his face tight with concern. Whatever was wrong with the captain, he’d seen it, too.

“The whale wasn’t simply frightened,” explained Nisha. “Something attacked it.”

Rollan went pale, and Abeke wondered what he’d seen moving beneath the surface.

“A shark?”

“A sea eel?”

“But there was no blood in the water,” pressed Arac.

Nisha was shaking her head. “Because the whale wasn’t bleeding.”

“I thought you said it was being attacked.”

“It was.” When Nisha spoke, the words seemed to take a lot of effort. “There were no teeth marks. No claws. No wounds.”

“Then how—”

“It was being attacked from the inside.”

“How do you know?” asked an older Greencloak.

“Because I saw the thing attacking it,” said Nisha grimly. “I saw it moving beneath the whale’s skin.”

Abeke went very cold.

“I tried to cut it out,” Nisha continued. “But it was no use. When my knife cut through, it ... it became two.”

At that, Nisha gritted her teeth and held out her hand. It had been curled into a fist at her side while she spoke, but as her fingers peeled away to reveal her palm, Abeke saw something that made her heart turn.

She heard Rollan’s breath catch in horror beside her.

In the center of Nisha’s palm was a small dark mark.

A spiral was buried in her skin.

A parasite. Behind Abeke's eyes, she saw Conor's outstretched arm, the horrible mark that seemed to twitch beneath his skin, stealing time and life and sanity. No. No. Not this. Not again.

Arac must have recognized it, too, because the man let out a strangled sound of fury as the parasite writhed and wound its way up Nisha's palm and over her wrist.

"I tried to ... " The captain trailed off, swaying on her feet even though the deck was now steady. Arac was there to catch her before she could fall.

"Nisha, Nisha, stay with me," demanded Arac as the captain shivered against him. "Where's Gera?" he shouted, calling for the Greencloak's medic.

The woman was already pushing her way through the gathered crowd, kneeling in front of them and tearing strips of cloth to bind around Nisha's elbow, as if the parasite could be contained by a simple tourniquet.

"Get back," Arac growled as the crew pressed in. Abeke didn't realize she'd been edging forward, too, until she felt Rollan's hand on her arm. The weight of his touch was a comfort, a sign of solidarity as much as a barricade, holding her at bay.

She watched as Gera drew a knife and pressed the tip into the captain's forearm, skewering the dark shape that writhed beneath the surface.

"I've got it, I've got it," said Gera. And that's when Abeke realized that Gera didn't know how sinister the parasites were, how infectious. The medic let out a sound of dismay as, to everyone's horror—everyone's horror and Abeke's sadness—the parasite divided in two once more, half still burrowing up Nisha's arm, the other half now snaking quickly up the medic's blade, right for her fingers. Gera cast the knife aside before the creature could reach her hand, and Rollan kicked it over the ship's edge and into the sea.

Abeke felt ill—how many other creatures would become infected by that squirming shadow? How quickly would the evil spread?

Blood streamed from the wound in Nisha's arm. The dark shape beneath her skin continued upward, slower, but otherwise undeterred.

“Gera,” growled Arac. “There has to be something ...”

“It’s no use,” said the medic, shaking her head. “I’m sorry.”

“It’s okay,” breathed Nisha. “I’m okay. I’m okay. I’m okay.”

But the words sounded hollow, the repetitions of someone slipping into a fever. How long would she last? And if—when, realized Abeke with horror—she fell victim, could she ever find her way back? If—when—they defeated Zerif and stopped the mysterious Wyrn, what would happen to those who’d already fallen? Was there hope?

Arac swept the captain into his arms and set off toward the steps down into the ship’s hold, leaving behind only a trail of seawater from Nisha’s clothes. Abeke looked down at the nearest puddle and saw a drop of blood swirling in the middle of the salty stain. She watched the red twist and spread, feeling helpless and scared and desperate to reach Stetriol, to do something instead of watch those she cared about suffer. Her body tensed. Her stomach turned.

And then Abeke felt Rollan take her hand. The two stood there, as motionless as the rest of the crew on the rocking deck.

“We have to stop this,” she whispered.

“We will,” said Rollan, his voice laced with fear, but also grim determination.

The Greencloaks stood vigil on the deck for several long minutes before Arac reemerged, looking pale. A streak of his wife’s blood stained his sleeve.

“She’s resting,” he announced distantly. He was standing there among them, but Abeke could tell that his thoughts were still belowdecks, with Nisha. “She’s strong,” he added, lower. “She’s a fighter.” He blinked a few times—focused, glared, straightened. “What are you all standing around for? Get this ship back on course!”

“Sir,” said a short, balding Greencloak as Arac turned away. “What should we do about the second whale?”

Arac looked back and shook his head.

“Cut it loose,” he grumbled. “It can’t pull the ship alone. They work in pairs. One’s no good without the other.”

THE LEFT PATH

THEY KEPT CONOR IN THE MIDDLE.

It was the only way to keep him from falling behind, and the only way to keep Meilin herself from falling over, since when he was at the back of the pack she kept looking over her shoulder to check on him, until she inevitably stumbled on a root or a rock. She had the scuffed palms and bruised knees to show for it.

But it was more than that.

With Conor holding the torchlight in front of her—Xanthe didn't want it in her eyes, said it was too "red bright," whatever that meant—Meilin could watch his movements. She kept track of when his legs began to drag, when his body began to sway. The fact was, if he wouldn't tell them when he was tired, she'd have to do it herself. Meilin knew he was afraid of slowing them down. He murmured as much when he was curled up between Jhi and Briggan, sick with fever and fatigue. But she wasn't going to speed up, not if it meant losing him.

Meilin would keep Conor with them, keep him Conor, for as long as she could.

For as long as she had to.

Behind her, Takoda and Kovo signed messages to one another in eerie silence. Meilin didn't like having the ape where she couldn't watch him, but this stretch of tunnel was narrow, and if he went ahead, his wall of black fur blocked out the light. Meanwhile, up at the front of the group, Xanthe was humming.

It was a strange tune that got picked up not only by the rock walls, but by the moss and mushrooms and the shallow pools as well, carrying through the tunnels like a gust of air. Now and then there were words in the song, words in a language Meilin didn't know. It made her think of the creature that whispered in her dreams. She wondered if the words were muffled, as they'd seemed, or if they were another language. One as old as the rustling of leaves and the rushing of water in a stream. One as old as the world itself.

Just then, as her thoughts were lost in deciphering dreams, something reached out and brushed Meilin's arm. She caught her breath and spun, slashing with her quarterstaff and pinning the attacker back, before she realized that it wasn't an attacker at all, only a tendril of root that had come loose from the tunnel ceiling.

Meilin let out a shuddering breath.

"You show that tree," said Takoda with a mock frown.

Meilin scowled back, then realized he was mimicking her. Kovo snorted. Xanthe chuckled, and even Conor managed a weak smile. Meilin blew her hair out of her eyes. Too long underground. It was making her paranoid. She lowered her quarterstaff and stepped up closer to examine the offending root.

The ropy strand was thicker than any of the ones she'd seen so far. Once, they'd been little more than thin cords that ran like cracks in the ceiling overhead. Now some roots were as thick as her wrist, others as big as her upper arm. And up close, she could see that the root—all the roots—were moving. Not quickly, but not as slowly as stars either. They moved like a body shifting in sleep, loosing fragments of earth and rock with every small twist and turn.

The sound of crumbling stones was eerie, like skittering feet, and Meilin found herself wishing that Xanthe would start humming again—anything to distract from the feeling that they were not only underneath the earth, but inside a living thing. A dying thing.

Meilin shuddered and turned back to find that the group had stopped. At first she thought they were waiting for her. Then she realized, with a flicker of annoyance, they were waiting for Xanthe, who'd paused up ahead. Meilin frowned. The only thing she disliked more than not leading was not being able to lead. She hated that she didn't know this underground world, that all she could do was follow.

Up ahead of Xanthe, the tunnel branched suddenly into two identical paths. At least, they looked identical to Meilin. She watched as the girl closed her eyes and brought her pale fingertips to the stone divide between the tunnels. What could she tell, just by touching the wall? Meilin had seen her do this a dozen times, had even tried to mimic it, pressing her hand to the rocks now and then, but she never felt anything except the cold damp of the cave.

But Xanthe must have felt something, because a moment later, her hand fell away and her pink eyes drifted open. She didn't speak, though. Her pale face remained contorted with concentration as she tipped her head from side to side, trying to process what she'd learned.

"Well?" prompted Meilin.

"It's strange," said Xanthe. "But both paths lead where we are going, in the end ... " She trailed off in a way that made Meilin think there was something she wasn't saying.

"So what's the difference?" asked Meilin, but Xanthe didn't answer. She was already plunging into the tunnel on the left, and the group had no choice but to follow her into the dark.

It was an easy road compared to the ones they'd taken so far, a gentle slope with weedy yellow mushrooms sprouting from the seam where the curved walls met the floor. Like many of the fungi here in Sadre, the tops glowed faintly with their own internal light, not enough to see by, just enough to stand out against the surrounding rock, the way clouds did sometimes when the moon was bright.

Xanthe led the way, not even bothering to look back. That prickle of annoyance began to rise in Meilin again at the thought of being helpless. She couldn't cure Conor. She couldn't find the Evertree's roots. But then she felt Jhi's touch, like a paw against the center of her back, and she remembered something her father had told her years before, when Meilin said she wanted to be like him, a warrior.

"What kind of warrior?" he'd asked.

"The kind that leads," she'd answered proudly.

"Then first you will learn to be a foot soldier."

Needless to say, Meilin had not been pleased. “But I want to be a leader,” she’d insisted, as if he’d misunderstood her answer.

“That may be,” he’d said, “but a true leader knows when to follow.”

Meilin straightened and stared at Xanthe, who walked ahead like a pale, wavering flame in the dark. Solitary.

Alone, thought Meilin.

With Phos Astos gone, Xanthe was alone. No family. No spirit animal. And yet, the girl hadn’t stopped to mourn, hadn’t hesitated. Even after she found out about Conor, she was still here, still helping. Maybe she needed this mission as much as any of them. After all, her world was in danger, too.

What they had to do was more important than either one of them, and if they were going to succeed, they would need to work together. And if that meant Meilin needed to follow instead of lead, then all right.

Besides, thought Meilin with a grim smile, Xanthe may be the one who gets us to the Wyrms in one piece, but once we’re there, I’ll be the one to defeat it.

“Hey, there’s light up ahead,” called Takoda.

Meilin blinked, dragging herself out of the bright world of memory and back into the darkened tunnel.

Jhi’s touch faded from her mind, replaced by a quickening pulse.

Takoda was right. Light was beginning to dance on the cave walls ahead, low and flickering. It was faint, so faint that the old Meilin wouldn’t have noticed it. Even if her muscles were stiff from lack of training, the weeks beneath the earth were sharpening her sight.

“I can hear water,” murmured Conor.

“Maybe there’s a village,” added Meilin, thinking how nice it would be to see new faces. To eat something that looked like food, and sleep on something that wasn’t stone. She chided herself. She’d never been a soft girl, had always been able to hold her own with the soldiers, but what she wouldn’t give right now for a bath, a bed.

“There’s no village this way,” said Xanthe, her voice tense. “The glow must be coming from stone moss and river fern ...”

“Do you hear that?” asked Takoda from just behind Meilin.

“The water?” prompted Conor.

“No,” said Takoda. “There’s something else.”

And when Meilin strained to hear over the slosh and burble, she heard it, too, though she didn’t know what it was. The skittering of loose pebbles? The shuffle of steps?

Briggan’s ears twitched, and his lips curled in warning, his wolfish blue eyes bright. Conor’s torchlight snagged on something on the wall. Meilin reached out and brushed her fingers over the damp surface. The rock was softer here, and strangely grooved. She fit her fingertips to the lines and traced their course, and then recoiled as she realized how easily her nails had fit the grooves.

The ground was getting slicker, too. When she looked down, she noticed that it was a mess of crushed yellow mushrooms, trampled underfoot. Though Conor and Xanthe had been walking ahead of her, Meilin knew they hadn’t done this damage, not alone. This was the work of dozens of feet, maybe more.

“You guys,” she murmured. “Something isn’t—”

Xanthe’s breath caught audibly in her throat. She’d nearly reached the mouth of the tunnel when she froze. When the others caught up and saw what she saw, a sickly silence settled over them.

The mouth of the cave opened into the wall of a large cavern. Spikes of rock—stalagmites and stalactites—juttied up from ground and down from ceiling, transforming the cavern into a gaping mouth with flashing rows of sharpened teeth.

But it wasn’t the illusion of a predator’s fangs that stopped them cold.

It was what waited beyond them. Because there, behind the wall of spiking teeth, were the Many.

Tens.

Hundreds.

A writhing mass of bodies, pale and wormy and marked by black pulsing spirals. As thick as rats on a sewer floor.

Conor gasped and tossed the torchlight back into the tunnel behind them as if burned, plunging them into shadow an instant before one of the creatures looked up. Its milky eyes panned across the cavern walls. Meilin’s heart pounded as its gaze brushed across them like a chill.

“Don’t move,” whispered Xanthe. The order passed back through the ranks like an echo.

Look away, thought Meilin to the creature. Look away. Look away.

But the creature was at the edge of the tangled horde, and something had caught its attention. It stared, fixated, up at them, its face blank, eyes unblinking. Meilin wished Xanthe weren’t at the front of the pack, with her skin so pale it caught every flicker of light.

Meilin’s fingers tightened on her quarterstaff.

It was a ten-foot drop from their perch at the mouth of the tunnel into the cavern’s jaws below, and Meilin could see the marks in the mud where the bodies of the Many had slipped and slid. The slope was so steep it would be almost impossible for one to climb back up. But Meilin didn’t think the Many cared about impossible. She could picture the creatures clambering toward them anyway, with their empty eyes and their mindless, tireless pursuit. Could picture them climbing over and on top of each other, turning bodies into stairs until they reached the tunnel.

Beside Meilin, Conor shuddered. It was a small, involuntary motion, but the creature below cocked its head and took a shuffling step forward. Its hand drifted up through the air, the gesture in slow motion, as if the limb were underwater. But as it opened its mouth, another pale form jostled it from behind.

Just like that, the spell was broken.

The creature spun on its assailant, and the two went down in a shuffling mess of limbs. No one tried to pull them apart. No one even noticed. Within moments, their bodies were swallowed up by the rest of the Many, who walked right over them as if they were rocks.

Up in the tunnel, Xanthe braved a single step backward, the others moving with her, inching away from the edge, and the flickering light, and the mass of pale limbs and teeth. Only once they’d all edged back to the discarded torch did they run.

Back past the trampled mushrooms and the claw marks on the wall, back through the winding tunnel, back to the chamber where the two paths split, and they’d chosen left.

They stood in a circle, breathless.

Meilin’s fingers ached from clutching her staff.

All the color had drained from Conor's face, though she didn't know if it was from fatigue or the sight of the terrible creatures with the spirals in their skin.

Kovo glared back down the tunnel, his red eyes narrowed on the dark.

Takoda had a hand on Xanthe's shoulder. The girl's narrow arms were wrapped around herself.

"Okay, new plan," said Meilin, "we take the other path."

Takoda and Conor nodded, but, if it was possible, Xanthe's pale skin got even whiter. Her pink eyes widened.

"What's wrong?" pressed Meilin. "You said they both lead to where we're going."

"They do," said Xanthe slowly. "But that ..." she said, pointing to the left route, the one they'd chosen, the one filled with the Many, "... was the easy path."

Meilin swallowed, and looked to the divide. The other path spiraled away into darkness.

They had no choice, but the question hung unspoken in the air, as heavy as smoke.

If the left path was supposed to be the easy one, then what could possibly be waiting for them on the right?

STETRIOL'S WELCOME

“L AND!”
The call went up just before noon.

The Tellun's Pride II had been slowed by the loss of its whales but was spurred forward by a strong current and a merciful wind behind its sails.

Now Stetriol loomed, growing larger and closer by the minute. Abeke had never seen the capital before, didn't know what it had looked like during the time of the Bile and the Conquerors, but she'd heard stories, and she could tell from the energy that this was a new world. And hopefully a better one.

Abeke clutched a slip of paper. Word had arrived from Greenhaven that morning, written in Olvan's hand but bound to a messenger bird with Lenori's yellow ribbon. According to the healer at the Evertree, their friends were still alive somewhere beneath its roots. That was all she could say.

Stay strong, Olvan had instructed. Focus on your mission.

Arac stood at the ship's bow, calling out orders while Nisha leaned against the mast, ill but upright. Word was her husband had tried to keep her in her cabin, and she'd given him a verbal lashing. The sounds of the fight had rung out through the ship, most of the words lost, but the meaning known: Nisha would be captain until the moment the sickness took her. And staying cooped up in her cabin would do nothing to slow its course.

Her parrot, Relis, sat on her shoulder, its rainbow feathers flustered and its black eyes heavy, knowing. Would the parrot stay with the captain until the end? What then? Nisha's dark arms, lean but strong, were bare beneath her cloak. Abeke saw shallow cuts running up her right arm like notches in a tree. Gera, the medic, had obviously tried to stop the parasite's progress, tried to cut it from the captain's skin. In the end, she'd only bought Nisha a little time—Abeke saw the trace of the black spiral already against the base of the captain's throat. Nisha was holding on, but Abeke could tell she was losing the fight. Slowly, yes, but faster than Conor. Too much of the parasite had escaped the medic's blade. Sweat beaded on her brow, and her once radiant skin had taken on a sickly pallor.

How can something so small do so much damage? marveled Abeke sadly.

But of course, she knew. Not all enemies were large.

Back in Nilo, she had seen a man die of infection.

He'd been wounded on a hunt, not badly, barely a graze along his calf. The cut was so shallow that no one even thought to treat it. Besides, he was one of the strongest men in her village, strong as an ox, an elk, a tiger. He was a tree, a mountain, and he laughed off the small cut, called it a bug bite, a splinter, a nick.

But the night after he was injured, the man trod through a puddle of stagnant water, and by morning, the line was angry and red, the skin hot to the touch. Still he waved away the ministrations of their healers. By the third day, vicious red lines wove up his leg from the cut, now infected. And by the fourth, the sickness was in his blood.

Such a small wound—a nick—had felled a mountain of a man.

“You ready?” asked Rollan, appearing beside her. He'd followed her gaze and must have thought she was looking at the approaching city, not the captain before it.

Abeke nodded as the ship entered the port.

Stetriol's docks were alive with motion and noise. Up and down their length, sailors called out, men traded words and wares, and carts moved crates. Abeke saw two other ships with Greencloak flags, and mixed among them were ferries from Zhong and Eura, and even one from as far as Amaya. In the bay, a handful of whales and dolphins and rays swam in circles, and on the docks she saw horses, cats, and dogs, some with the focused gaze of spirit animals and others the more docile look of pets. Calls went up, and ropes were flung onto the docks, caught by workers who helped to haul the Tellun's Pride II into its berth.

Arac and Nisha were quarreling again in hushed tones. Abeke tried not to overhear, but Rollan was obviously making no such attempt, because he leaned over to whisper in her ear.

“Arac wants Nisha to go ashore for help. And Nisha refuses to leave the ship. So Arac says he’ll stay with her, and she says he’s to go ahead with us, and—”

At that point in the conversation, Arac stormed away, muttering curses and kicking a crate. Nisha glared after him, then sank back against the mast, looking exhausted.

Word of their arrival had landed ahead of them, and many people were gathering around the docks. Abeke could feel Rollan tense beside her, donning his own hostility like armor against an impending fight. But there was no malice in the people’s faces that she could see. No distrust. Only curiosity, and here and there, even a smile of delight. And throughout the crowd, the first traces of spirit animals bonded without Bile. A girl held a blue-eyed cat close to her chest. A boy cupped a turtle in his hands.

Things change, Abeke reminded herself. And we are part of that change.

Half a dozen Greencloaks stood waiting on the docks, their crisp mantles shining emerald in the midday sun. Tattoos peeked over collars and out of cuffs, and a green-eyed lemur sat on one man’s shoulder, a small dog beside another’s boot. Beside the Greencloaks, a second set of men and women, these dressed in blue and black, stood at equal attention. Silver pins with the serpentine S of Stetriol were fastened to several of their robes.

The sight of them all made Abeke aware of how grimy she was from her days at sea, her hair stiff from salt and her cloak dulled by rain. She wanted a bath, a bed, a night’s rest.

“Do you suddenly feel like we’ve done something wrong?” whispered Rollan, eyeing the Stetriolans’ poise, the Greencloaks’ stiff shoulders and high heads. They did have an almost military appearance, their backs to the growing crowd, their eyes trained on the ship.

But when the plank was lowered and Abeke and Rollan descended on the dock, two of the Greencloaks stepped forward and smiled.

“Abeke of Nilo,” announced the broad-shouldered man with the lemur on his shoulder. “Bond of Uraza.”

“Rollan of Amaya,” announced the other, a woman who looked like she could have taken the first in a fight. A tattoo of salamander curled around her neck. “Bond of Essix.”

As if on cue, the gyrfalcon screeched overhead, before sweeping down to land majestically on Rollan’s shoulder.

The crowd gasped and cheered with approval, even though Abeke doubted the stunt was planned. Essix just liked to show off. A bit like her human, thought Abeke as Rollan preened.

She thought of summoning Uraza for the same effect (even though the leopard was more intimidating than the falcon), but something caught her eye.

A flash of red in the crowd, not burnt brick or dusty orange, but crimson.

Her heart started to race, and she glanced at Rollan to see if he had noticed. But it must have been a trick of the light, because when she looked again, the slice of red was gone.

“Stetriol welcomes such honored guests,” said one of the men in blue and black, a lean figure with a trimmed goatee. “If you’ll follow us ...”

Abeke was glad to be back on land.

The crowd parted around them as they passed. Rollan was tense beside her, but even his eyes were wide at the sight of Stetriol—not only the city’s appearance, but the air. There was a new energy here. In their brief journey through the region before, Stetriol had felt a bit like clothes weighed down by rain. Now, there was a lightness, a buoyancy. Abeke wanted to take in all the changes, but the procession pressed on too fast. Her glimpses of the city were too fleeting.

But even in fleeting glimpses, the change was startling. The Greencloaks had obviously helped import supplies, because everywhere she looked, she saw new construction, old buildings being repaired and new ones being raised. And it wasn't just the buildings. Everywhere she looked, the kingdom was flowering. From the potted plants on sills to the lilies floating in the squares' fountains, to the vines climbing the stone walls of courtyards. It looked like a city waking from a long sleep, and Abeke was happy to see it thrive.

For so long, Stetriol had been a place of sickness and anger.

And as easy as it was to hate the kingdom and the Conquerors for what they'd done, Abeke couldn't blame them for doing it. The First Devourer War was many years ago, but its aftermath had stretched on, forcing people to pay for the crimes of their ancestors. Erdas had isolated Stetriol, kept from them the Nectar, let their people suffer bonding sickness and the desperation it brought with it.

People in that position had only two options: die, or fight back.

Could she blame them, for wanting to survive?

If the strain on her bond with Uraza was anything like the sickness the children of Stetriol had felt, could she blame them for wanting a cure?

Not that she could say any of that to Rollan.

Not when Rollan had nearly lost his mother to the Conquerors' Bile.

Not when Abeke had been the one to first trust Shane.

But she wanted to move forward.

"Where are we going?" asked Abeke as the docks fell away behind them and the streets passed in a blur.

The Greencloak ahead of her—the woman with the salamander tattoo—glanced back. "To the castle," she said.

"The castle?" asked Abeke, startled. Stetriol was a kingdom, of course, but it was one without a king. The throne—Shane's throne—sat empty.

"The Greencloaks have taken up post in the castle," explained the broad-shouldered man with the lemur, whose name was Bern, "since it is currently ... unoccupied.”

“We share it with the Council of Stetriol,” added the woman, Ela. “One of whom, Ernol, greeted you on the docks.” She nodded at the slim man with the goatee who was now part of their procession. “It was part of the agreement for rebuilding this city.”

“So Shane is no longer the rightful king?” asked Abeke, earning herself a warning glance from Rollan.

“Shane is a fugitive,” countered the councilman, Ernol. “He is not here, and in the absence of a king, rightful or not, order must be maintained. The royal family did not have the best reputation when it came to diplomacy. But this is a promising direction.”

The castle loomed ahead of them, and trumpets sounded as the gates fell open onto a bustling courtyard. Essix bristled at the noise and took wing. Their procession dissolved, half the Greencloaks peeling away to other tasks, along with several of the locals.

“Which Great Beast do you think was summoned?” asked Rollan as they crossed the courtyard, ushered on by the pared-down huddle of green and blue cloaks. “I’m betting Mulop the Octopus. Or maybe Cabaro the Lion.”

Abeke hoisted her satchel higher on her shoulder. “I think we’re about to find out.”

The castle sat on a rise in the middle of the city. Abeke paused at the top of the steps and turned to look out at Stetriol. From here she could see the sweep of tiled roofs, the maze of streets, and, in the distance, trees. Along a battered stretch of the city—the buildings reduced to rubble and scorched earth—they’d cleared away the damage and planted trees. Young saplings, none above her knee, but she watched men and women, some in green and others in brown and blue and yellow, planting row upon row of trees.

Abeke’s spirits rose at the sight of Greencloaks and locals working together, at the sight of the new growth, and she turned to tell Rollan. But he wasn’t there.

The rest of the procession had already gone in, and she found Rollan standing in the castle’s entry hall, staring up at a portrait on the wall. Most of the old decorations had been cleared away, exposing the bare stone beneath, but the portrait hung there, one of the only relics of the past.

In it, a girl sat proudly in a chair, a boy at her shoulder. They had the same blond hair, the same sharp eyes, and Abeke recognized them instantly. Even without her Bile-bonded spider, Iskos, Abeke knew the girl was Drina. Royal. Conqueror. And Shane's older sister. Shane himself stood at Drina's shoulder, his painted blue eyes looking down at Abeke.

"Why is this still up?" asked Rollan, an edge in his voice.

"A reminder," said Bern. "It doesn't do to pretend the past didn't happen. We can't erase it. We can only try to overcome it."

With that, they were led through the castle halls to a grand room, where a girl was perched on a chair, reading a book, as if she were sitting alone in a library and not on display in a castle. Men and women in blue and black Stetriolan robes—each with the S pin of the council—gathered around her as if she were a work of art, a priceless artifact. She looked up when they came in, closed her book, and smiled. The brightness of her smile was matched only by her halo of white-blond hair, which was wound around her head in a braid. Her eyes were sapphire blue, and there was something about the girl that reminded Abeke of Conor—of the way he radiated warmth.

"This is Tasha," said Ernol, going to stand at the girl's shoulder.

"Hello," she said brightly, sitting forward. "You must be Abeke, the brave," she added with a nod. "And you must be Rollan, the fierce." Rollan puffed up at the title, and Abeke almost snorted with laughter. "I've heard so much about you both."

She rose from the chair, looking picturesque, graceful. Right up until she took a step forward and tripped on the corner of her own skirt. The girl gasped and stumbled, knocking into a table with a glass vase before one of the Stetriolan nobles shot a hand out to steady her. None of the councilmembers were fast enough to save the vase, but Bern's lemur appeared, catching the glass before it hit the floor.

Tasha straightened and flashed a shy, embarrassed smile. "Sorry," she whispered.

"Definitely Mulop," whispered Rollan.

Abeke elbowed him in the side.

“Tasha,” said Ernol patiently. “Will you show our guests your spirit animal?”

The girl nodded and slid up her sleeve to reveal her tattoo. Abeke’s breath caught. Running the length of Tasha’s forearm was a swan, its wings spread, as if about to land, or about to rise. Its long, elegant neck was curved into an S.

And then, in a flash of light, the mark was gone, its white feathers glowing in the light.

Ninani the Swan.

A reverent silence fell over the room as the Greencloaks bowed their heads and the Stetriolans brought their hands to their chests in reverence.

“No way,” whispered Rollan.

The girls’ parents—they had the same startlingly light hair, the same bright eyes—stood behind Tasha’s chair. Both watched their daughter with pride, and an awe bordering on fear.

It was a sentiment Abeke didn’t wholly understand. Her own father had not been happy when she’d summoned Uraza. He’d seen her gift—and the responsibility that came with it—as a burden on him and his village. Abeke had eventually come to terms with her family, but she knew she’d never see such a look in her father’s eyes.

Tasha’s face, however, was an open book, showing only joy. And why shouldn’t she be happy? Summoning a spirit animal in Stetriol had for so long been a curse, the bonding sickness driving its victims mad. It was only recently a blessing, and a rare one.

And Tasha had not only summoned a spirit animal, but a Great Beast.

And not just any Great Beast, but Ninani.

The giver of Nectar, so long withheld from Stetriol. It was a symbol of new beginnings. How could they see it any other way?

The swan craned her head and considered her audience with stately grace, her onyx eyes settling on Abeke and Rollan. And then, in a flash of light, she was gone again, returned to Tasha’s fair skin as an elegant pattern of feathers and the S-curve of a swan’s neck.

The gathered men and women, nobles and Greencloaks, stood for a moment in silence. And then Rollan spoke.

“How many know?” he asked.

“We have kept it secret,” said the Greencloak, Bern, at the same moment the Stetriolan councilman, Ernol, said, “Word is spreading.”

Abeke’s stomach turned as the two men looked at each other, horrified.

“How many have you told?” snapped Bern.

“The city deserves to know,” retorted Ernol.

“We told you it wasn’t safe—”

“We haven’t gone shouting it through the streets—” cut in one of the other nobles.

“But the people will find out,” insisted Ernol, “whether we tell them or not.” Abeke watched the volley of words, and then looked at Tasha, who stood between them, confused.

“Then let them find out after she’s safely away,” said Bern.

“Away?” Tasha finally cut in, eyes wide with distress. Abeke realized with horror that the girl didn’t know she was in danger, didn’t know they’d come to take her back to Greenhaven. Away from her home, from her family, from her world. She’d only just discovered the joys of summoning a Great Beast.

She’d yet to learn the cost.

“Tasha,” said Abeke gently, stepping forward. “You cannot stay here.”

The girl’s smile wavered. “What do you mean? This is my home.”

“It’s not safe here,” added Rollan.

Ernol bristled. “Stetriol is—”

“This has nothing to do with Stetriol,” cut in Rollan. “Zerif is hunting down all those who summon the Great Beasts. Once he learns you have Ninani, he will come. We’ve already lost too many allies—too many friends—to his attacks. We’ve come to take you with us, back to Greenhaven.”

“Such a gift comes to our country,” said one of the nobles, “and you want to take it away?”

“We want to protect all of Erdas!” snapped Rollan. A rumble went through the gathered men and women at that. For a very long time, Erdas had disowned Stetriol. “The Great Beasts may bond with one person,” he continued, “but they don’t belong to one nation.”

“We cannot force you to come with us,” said Abeke, her attention still focused on Tasha, “but staying here is not only a danger to yourself, but to your city. Plus, you belong with us. Your strength is needed.”

Though the news clearly took the girl by surprise, to her credit, she didn’t cry. She looked around the room, from the Stetriolan nobles to the gathered Greencloaks to her parents. Her mouth opened, and then closed. “Can I . . . ” she started, stopped, began again, “can I have some time to think?”

Abeke and Rollan exchanged looks, but Bern spoke up. “It will take two days to get the ship restocked and set for sail.”

Tasha swallowed and sank back into her chair. She seemed so young, caught between the Greencloaks on one side and the Stetriolans on the other. Ninani may be all grace, but Tasha was all limbs, sharp elbows and bony knees, stretched out in a way she clearly hadn’t grown into yet.

“Then I have two days to decide,” she said. Rollan looked about to argue, but Abeke caught his arm. They could not force the matter. It had to be her choice.

Ernol spoke up, stepping in front of Tasha. “No one is going anywhere today.” Behind him, she saw Tasha’s family fold like wings around the girl. “You both must be weary,” he said, addressing Abeke and Rollan. “Come, let me show you to your rooms.”

Abeke sat in a large tub, scrubbing the salt and sea grime from her skin and wondering what they were supposed to do if Tasha refused to go with them to Greenhaven. When she was done—with the bathing, not the wondering—she found her own cloak was gone. A fresh one, dazzling green, lay folded on her bed. A tray of hot food sat on the table beside it, and Abeke wondered if this was what it felt like to be a royal. She took an apple from the tray, its skin the vivid green of fresh grass.

She and Rollan had both been given elegant rooms in the southern wing of the castle—the castle itself had been divided into north, south, east, and west. The Greencloaks occupied the north and south wings, while the members of the council, a few noble families, and what was left of the royals (a few cousins of Shane's family, mostly), took the east and west. It was strange, thought Abeke, that no one had tried to claim the throne in Shane's absence. Even though Bern had said it was a relic, what with the council in power, she couldn't help but feel like they'd left it empty on purpose. As if they were waiting for their young king to come home.

Abeke leaned her elbows on the window. Her room looked out not onto the city but into the castle grounds and a garden far below. Feeling suddenly restless, she decided to go exploring, in the hopes that a walk through the grounds would do more to clear her head than the bath had.

The sun was setting as she made her way down the stairs toward the gardens. She was nearly there, her mouth full of tart apple, when she almost collided with a boy.

The sight of him made her choke.

The boy—a noble, judging by his clothes—could have been Shane's younger brother. He had the same fair hair, the same slight build, the same intense eyes. The only difference was his mouth. Where Shane's had so often drawn into a smile, especially in those early days—they were, after all, friends before they were enemies—the boy's mouth was a stern line, his eyes hawkish and sharp.

And he wasn't alone.

A small ginger cat, little bigger than a kitten, danced around the boy's legs. Abeke could tell—maybe by the boy's feline grace, or the way they moved in sync—that they were bonded.

Without the Nectar or the Bile, children were bonding naturally. It was becoming even rarer to have a spirit animal, but Stetriol was no longer cut off from the gift.

"Sorry," mumbled the boy, eyes darting over her cloak and face and skin.

"It's okay," said Abeke. "What's your name?"

"James," said the boy.

"And this?" asked Abeke, crouching. "Is she your spirit animal?"

"He," corrected the boy, "is Barnabas."

“Hello, Barnabas,” said Abeke, scratching the kitten’s ears. He purred against her palm.

“Do you have a spirit animal?” asked James, though the green of her cloak meant she obviously did.

“Maybe,” she said with a crooked smile.

“Let me see,” said the boy imperiously.

Abeke grinned, and then released Uraza.

The boy had the decency to look surprised, staggering back as the massive golden leopard sprang into being, paws landing heavily on the stone floor. James’s mouth fell into an O as the big cat, who was nearly as tall as he was, yawned, exposing long, sharp teeth.

When Uraza bowed her head to consider the tiny cat, Barnabas had the audacity to swat a small paw at the leopard’s face. It was roughly the size of her nostril. Uraza watched patiently, even tolerating the cat’s tinny meow, before she finally opened her mouth and plucked the ginger cat up by his scruff.

Barnabas swung indignantly from Uraza’s teeth, and the boy stamped his foot and ordered that the leopard put him down at once.

Uraza glanced at Abeke, an amused glint in her violet eyes. Then she dropped the ginger kitten with a plunk and padded away toward the grounds.

Abeke rushed after, trailing the leopard through an archway and into the castle gardens. They were larger than they looked from above, filled with the kind of maze-like greenery that swallowed you up, got you turned around.

Abeke strolled while the setting sun drew long shadows, and the sounds of the castle and the city beyond began to shift, soften.

There was something wild about this place. She could tell that the gardens had once been groomed, but they’d long overgrown their boundaries. Hedges and low divides interrupted the greens. Some were ordinary bushes, but others were strange, bulbous things. She reached out to touch the nearest bush and was surprised when her fingers went through the layer of leaves and into something beneath.

When she pulled aside the viney cover, she realized it wasn’t a dense plant at all, but a layer of ivy covering the remains of a cage, the old iron warped and broken and swallowed up by green. Abeke glanced around the garden.

How many of these hedges held other things?

Bern's green-eyed lemur sat on a windowsill halfway up the garden wall, and Essix soared in broad circles overhead. Uraza was obviously happy to be free, and began to prowl around the garden, startling anyone she came across. A noble gave a cry of surprise, and Abeke called the cat back toward her. Uraza didn't come, but Abeke could hear her still prowling through the greenery, hunting small game. Hopefully no one had summoned any small woodland creatures and left them to wander the gardens. When the cat finally reappeared, Abeke was relieved to see that her mouth and paws were clean.

Abeke yawned. She didn't realize it was getting dark, not until the sun dipped behind the castle walls, plunging the courtyard into an early twilight.

She was just about head inside when something caught her attention.

Her senses prickled, the way they did when she was being watched.

Abeke scanned the darkening grounds, and then Uraza let out a low growl, and Abeke's eyes tracked up the garden wall and landed on the figure perched on top. He stood, leaning almost lazily against the place where the garden wall met the side of the castle. He'd be hard to notice in the fading light, but Abeke felt her eyes focus with Uraza's keen sight. She could see him clearly, from the sweep of his red cloak to the silvery wood of his featureless mask.

The last time they'd crossed paths, it had been in the middle of a battle, all chaos.

Now, the world was still.

They stood there, staring at one another, her conversation with Olvan echoing in her head.

He helped us.

Yet he conceals his face.

There was something so ... familiar about the figure. Which was impossible, she knew. He was covered head to toe, every inch hidden from view except the faintest glint of pale eyes, and in them, recognition.

Abeke opened her mouth, but the boy held a finger to the lips of his mask. A second later she heard Rollan's voice from the archway at the edge of the garden, calling her inside. She heard his steps coming down the path and looked away, only for an instant, but by the time she glanced back at the wall, the stranger was gone.

THE ARACHANE FIELDS

“THERE’S A SAYING AT MY MONASTERY,” SAID TAKODA AS they made their way down the path on the right. “It goes, ‘There are no easy roads in life. There are no hard ones either. There are only the paths we choose to take, and the places they lead us.’ ”

“Oh, yeah?” countered Meilin. “What about when you choose one path, but it’s full of white-eyed monsters and so you have to double back and take the other road? Is there a saying about that?”

Takoda winced. Meilin knew she was being harsh, but they’d been traveling down the second path for more than an hour, nerves tightening with every passing moment. They’d yet to come upon more of the Many, or a cyrix nest, or anything else that might want to eat them, but Xanthe’s warning at the entryway had them all a bit wound up.

All except for Kovo, who lumbered along with his usual impassive glare. But when it was obvious that Meilin had hurt Takoda’s feelings, the ape signed a word that she didn’t know. She wouldn’t have paid it much attention, if he hadn’t signed this word at her several times so far on their trip—pulling his hand in a gesture over his face.

Finally she asked Takoda to translate. The boy shuffled his feet.

“Um ... ” he said. “It means ‘cranky.’ ”

Xanthe cracked a laugh, and Meilin felt her face go hot. “I’m sorry, the ape who got us trapped under the world is calling me cranky?”

In response, Kovo's red eyes found hers. He made the gesture again, slowly enough for her to follow. Meilin raised her staff. Kovo bared his teeth. Takoda chuckled.

"He doesn't mean anything by it," said the boy, waving his hands. "I think he might just be using it as your name."

"My name," growled Meilin, "is not Cranky. It's Mei-lin."

"If it's any consolation," offered Takoda, "he calls Xanthe Pale Girl." The monk ran two fingers along his forearm to show the sign for pale girl.

"That's because she is a pale girl!" snapped Meilin. "What does he call you? Skinny monk?"

"Um ..." Takoda hesitated, looking to the ape. "Nothing, really. Most of the time he just shoves me."

Kovo lifted his massive hands and Takoda flinched, as if bracing for another shove, but the ape didn't push him. Instead he brought his furry hands up before his red eyes and linked his two forefingers.

Even in the flickering torchlight, Meilin could see Takoda go red.

"What?" she prompted. "What does that mean?"

Takoda smiled shyly. "It means 'friend,' " he translated. Adding, as Kovo made another gesture, " 'little friend.' "

Xanthe broke into a warm grin. "Aw, that's sweet."

But Meilin rolled her eyes. "Oh, of course," she said, "you get the nice name."

Takoda wasn't paying attention. He was busy signing back to Kovo, linking his fingers, then spreading his arms wide. Big friend.

"What does he call me?" asked Conor, his voice soft.

Takoda shot a look at Kovo. The ape hesitated, then curled his hand into a fist, pressed it to his throat, and drew the fist down toward his stomach.

"What does that mean?" asked Conor when Takoda didn't translate.

"Cursed," whispered the boy at last.

Conor swallowed. "Oh."

Briggan growled at the ape. Kovo didn't even flinch.

"Do you hear that?" asked Xanthe. At first Meilin thought the girl was just trying to break the tension, but then she listened and heard it, too. The sound was almost musical, like wind chimes, or the faint plucking of harp strings.

“What is that?” she asked, entranced.

“I don’t know,” said Xanthe honestly.

“Well,” said Conor, “we’re going to find out.”

Up ahead, the tunnel path became narrow and steep, the ground plunging away every few feet, as if they were descending a set of massive stone stairs, each half as tall as Meilin herself.

At the bottom of the steps there stood a kind of archway set into the rock wall. It was made of pale stone, only instead of two limbs, it had seven. It looked like at some point there had been eight, but one had crumbled away with time, and lay in broken pieces on the ground. The archway reminded Meilin of a weeping willow without a trunk, or—she thought with a chill—of the cage of roots in her dream.

Conor was the first one to step through the gateway—Meilin didn’t know if it was because he was tired of being coddled, or annoyed by Kovo’s nickname, or simply in a hurry to keep moving. As he passed Xanthe, Meilin saw the girl recoil slightly. Meilin glared, and when Xanthe’s pink eyes met hers, Xanthe had the decency to look down, ashamed.

Then Meilin heard Conor catch his breath and rushed through the doorway after him, expecting something horrible.

Instead, as she saw what he saw, her mouth fell open in wonder.

One by one, the others followed, and for a moment they all stood there, staring at the world they’d found beneath the earth.

Meilin had seen tunnels and caves and even the sprawling city of Phos Astos. She’d dreamed about the vaulting space beneath the Evertree. But so far, she’d never seen any place like this. The chamber was so vast, she forgot they were underground at all. It didn’t seem possible, when the opening stretched so wide she couldn’t see the walls, so high the roots and rock were lost in darkness.

So much of Sadre had been harsh edges and sharp stone, like the toothy rocks in the cavern with the Many. But here, everything was softness. Silvery curtains spilled down from somewhere high overhead, and though they were standing on a stone ledge, the floor ahead was covered with delicate strands of light. An intricate network of lines, each shimmering with their own glow. Fields of silvery thread.

The music reached them now, clear as bells, and yet still somehow distant, as if the instrument weren't somewhere in the chamber before them, but all around, everywhere at once. And then Meilin realized that it was.

Because the fields themselves were singing.

A breeze blew through the chamber and strummed across the thousands of strings. Their vibrations drew out a faint but steady hum. The sound was eerie and enchanting. Meilin stood there, mesmerized and confused, because she didn't understand what she was looking at, how the floor could make music, how it could be so strange and beautiful. Less like earth than a thousand filaments of light. Like tiny rivers sparkling in the dark floor.

And then she understood.

They weren't lines of water set into the ground.

There wasn't even a ground to be set into.

The threads running together were the ground. Or rather, they were a net.

Like the nets in Phos Astos, the ones that caught them when they jumped.

But there were no currents of air to guide them, and the net was suspended over a hole so vast and deep it plummeted away into nothing.

And besides, what was a net doing here, in the middle of a cavern without any people?

And then Meilin's stomach turned. Because this net wasn't a net at all.

It was a web.

Meilin felt the color drain from her face. Beside her, Xanthe drew in a breath, but she didn't sound scared. Her pink eyes were wide with wonder.

"I know where we are," she whispered. "These are the Arachane Fields."

As if on cue, dozens of small forms as big as Meilin's hand began to crawl up through the spaces between the silver threads. Their bodies glittered like jewels, and their legs—all eight of them—were as spindly as the silk they moved over.

Spider silk.

Meilin looked back at the arch they'd come through. Of course. It had eight legs. She swallowed. She wasn't afraid of many things. Not the dark, not even being buried alive—which was good, considering her current position—but she did not like spiders.

She felt herself backing away, retreating until her shoulders came up against something large and warm and covered in coarse hair. A low growl rumbled through the barricade behind her, and she craned her head to see Kovo's fangs. She scrambled forward, her foot nearly skimming the edge of the web.

"I've heard legends about this place," continued Xanthe, almost reverently. Meilin couldn't help but imagine what Rollan would say to that. Probably that legends were rarely told about happy places where nothing bad happened.

As if on cue, Conor said, "Good legends? The kind where everyone lives?"

Xanthe didn't answer that. Instead she said, "The legends say that the Arachane Fields are one of the three wards of protection around the Evertree. Their music is meant to guard the way against evil."

"And the spiders?" whispered Meilin.

Xanthe swallowed. "Well, if I had to guess, I'd say they're meant to catch anything the music doesn't. But as long as we're careful, they should let us pass."

"Should ..." echoed Conor.

"You said there were three wards of protection," added Takoda, whose eyes were fixed on the field.

Xanthe nodded. "The Arachane Fields guard the passage to the Sulfur Sea, and the Sulfur Sea runs like a moat around the Evertree. Beyond the sea ... Well, the legends get kind of murky, but—"

"One obstacle at a time," said Conor, straightening. "Once we get across the fields, we'll face the rest." Briggan stood tall beside him, ears back but head high, blue eyes trained on the fields ahead.

“There must be another way,” said Meilin, trying to keep the fear from her voice.

But Xanthe was already shaking her head. “There was another way, remember? It was filled with the Many.”

Meilin swallowed. She would rather take on a hundred of the Many than do this. She thought about suggesting it, but Conor’s fevered eyes and Xanthe’s set jaw made her hold her tongue.

Meilin’s stomach turned over as she scanned the expanse of threads, searching for an edge, some way around, and finding none. But then she noticed that here and there the threads wove together into plats. They weren’t as wide as footpaths, but they should hold the weight of four kids. Maybe even Briggan.

But there was no way the field would hold the weight of a massive ape.

Everyone seemed to reach the conclusion at the same time, because they turned back toward Kovo.

“Please,” said Takoda, linking his fingers in the sign for friend. Meilin had only seen the ape agree to take the passive form once, and he hadn’t been happy about it. Now his red eyes tracked over the field. Even the ape must have seen the predicament, because he snorted and brought his heavy hands down onto Takoda’s narrow shoulders, and in a flash of light, Kovo vanished, becoming a massive black tattoo that circled the boy’s neck and crept across his face. Meilin took a deep breath. The air felt lighter without the ape’s looming presence and weighted gaze.

Not that Kovo was the biggest of their problems right now.

Which was saying something.

Conor turned to Briggan, obviously wondering if he should invite the wolf into his passive form, but he hesitated. Boy and wolf met each other’s gazes for several long seconds. While Meilin didn’t know what passed between them, she saw Conor’s hand go to his shoulder, where the parasite was making its slow advance. Was he trying to protect Briggan from the disease? Or to protect the rest of them from him?

Whatever it was, the two seemed to reach a silent agreement, because Briggan and Conor looked away at the same time. “Let’s go,” he said, starting toward the edge.

Meilin was right behind him. Xanthe reached out and took Takoda's hand. She squeezed it, and he squeezed back, and neither one let go.

"Stick to the heaviest ropes," Xanthe whispered to them all. "And watch out for the Webmother."

"What," hissed Meilin, spinning on the girl, "is the Webmother?"

Xanthe managed a nervous smile. "Don't worry," she said. "You'll know her if you see her."

"And if I see her?"

Xanthe bit her lip. "Run."

"Great," said Meilin and Conor at the same time. Even Briggan rumbled. For a long moment, none of them could bring themselves to go. The music played across the field, and the spiders moved along the strings, and it all seemed so delicate. And so dangerous. Like the slightest motion would upset it all.

"Come on," said Xanthe at last, letting go of Takoda's hand. She took a deep breath and set her foot on the thickest strand, testing its weight. It held, and she stepped out onto the cord. The music in the chamber changed ever so slightly with her weight, the resonance shifting a fraction—no, half an octave—lower.

"It's solid," said Xanthe, hands out to her sides for balance.

Takoda went next, taking a strand to Xanthe's right. Briggan sniffed at the cords before padding out onto a third, followed by Conor.

At last, Meilin stepped onto the web. She expected to feel the sickening give of the silk beneath her feet, but it was surprisingly strong. More like metal than cloth. She held her quarterstaff out like an acrobat walking a tightrope, half for balance and half so she had something to look at besides the palm-sized spiders tending the thinner pieces of the web, or the darkness beneath the silver strands.

Darkness that went on and on and on. She couldn't help but feel like, if she dropped something, it would never land.

Don't look down, she told herself. Something the color of rubies skittered to her right. Don't look at the spiders either.

She resisted the urge to squeeze her eyes shut. Now, she thought, would be a great time for some of Jhi's calming influence. But it didn't come. Apparently Meilin was on her own.

This isn't so bad, she told herself, and then immediately took it back, remembering a lecture Abeke had given her once about inviting bad luck. This is bad enough, she corrected, hoping it wasn't too late. This is definitely bad enough.

And yet, somehow, it was beautiful, too. Funny, how things could be both. How the most wonderful places were unsettling, and the most terrifying places possessed a kind of grace.

With every step they made, Xanthe, Takoda, Conor, and Meilin produced a strange sort of music. Xanthe stepped lithely from one strand to another, following the network of strongest lines. As she did, bass gave way to a faint sweet sound. Takoda shifted, and his own tone changed. Briggan padded steadily along. Conor trembled slightly, and the music warbled. Meilin had learned music back in Zhong, in between her lessons in the bow and staff. Now she recognized the trail of keys.

A. C. F.

It was lovely, that music, so lovely that Meilin could almost forget that they were standing on a massive spiderweb. Almost.

"In the legends," whispered Xanthe, her words accentuated by the melody, "the spiders tended the Arachane Fields, but they weren't what stopped people from crossing."

A. D. E.

"That was the music," continued Xanthe. "It was said to trap anyone without purpose. To ensnare those with darkness in their hearts."

To Meilin's right, Conor shivered. She wanted to reach out, to lay a hand on his arm, but he was too far away.

"To drag them under ... " continued Xanthe. "And—"

"You know," said Meilin, careful to keep her voice even. "Maybe now's not the best time for stories. Let's just get across the field."

But the field showed no signs of ending. It stretched on, as far as she could see, the silver threads vanishing into shadow.

A crimson spider with legs as thin and sharp as needles stood several yards away, its many eyes passing over them as it stitched at the web. Nice spider, thought Meilin, feeling queasy. Good spider.

They were almost there. One more obstacle down, one more test passed, one step closer to the nightmarish Wyrms at the roots of the Evertree, a foe Meilin could fight, an enemy she could defeat.

They were almost there.

Another spider, this one emerald, shone in the corner of her sight.

She tried to imagine Rollan there beside her, not because it gave her strength, but because the thought of him having to navigate this place was funny. Rollan, who liked to put on such a face, pretend he was tough. He hated spiders. Hated anything that crept and crawled. He said it was because of his time on the streets, but Meilin knew they just made him squeamish. In her mind, he shuddered, and stuck out his tongue, and hopped from foot to foot in disgust, and the image made Meilin smile.

And then she slipped.

She didn't fall—she caught herself on two silky, silvery ropes, breath held and body taut—but the sudden movement, the force of her slip and the weight of her body landing, was enough to send a tremor through the web.

First one cord.

Then four.

Then eight.

Out and out like ripples in a pond, until the entire web seemed to be shuddering, the movements leading away from—and back to—Meilin.

She went still, as if that would stop the web's tremor, and bit the inside of her cheek against the sound of fear trying to claw its way up. To every side, her friends stilled. Conor, Takoda, and Xanthe froze, Briggan lowering into a crouch, as all around, the jewel-toned spiders stopped their work and turned their myriad eyes, following the movement of the web.

Meilin squeezed her eyes shut and cursed herself, cursed her tired body and her straining mind, cursed her fear, and the fact that after everything, she would be the one to get them killed. She could feel the web shifting beneath her, could feel the spiders' approach, and she forced herself not to fight, because fighting would only draw more spiders. If she stayed still, if she let them come to her and her alone, the others might still get away.

The cord beneath her dipped slightly under the weight of the approaching spiders, and Meilin held her breath.

And then she felt it, on her shoulder, not a spider's needly limb, but a human hand.

Conor's hand.

"I've got you," he said, and even though his eyes were feverish, his grip was strong.

"Thanks," she said, her voice shaking as she let him help her to her feet.

And Conor smiled that warm, kind smile of his, a smile that the infection couldn't take from him, not yet. "You've been saving me a lot lately," he said. "I figured it was my turn."

She saw the ghost of pain crossing his face, felt the tremor in his touch, but he didn't let go, and neither did she.

12

THE FESTIVAL

WHEN ABEKE WOKE THE NEXT MORNING, IN A FOREIGN bed in a foreign city, the air was thick with a coming storm.

She could feel the weather weighing on her chest, brewing in her lungs, and she wished the rain would just start falling. Waiting for storms was always worse than getting soaked.

But all morning, it didn't come.

The clouds hung low with the promise of rain, and made the day muggy, but the storm held back.

Abeke packed and repacked her satchel, read and re-read the note from Olvan saying Conor and Meilin and Takoda were still alive. She was as restless as Uraza, who refused to go back into her passive state, despite frightening half the castle residents and stealing two pheasants from the kitchens. The leopard was stretched at the base of the bed, violet eyes closed but tail flicking side to side.

“Fine, then,” said Abeke after an hour of pleading. “You can stay here in this stuffy room while I go off on an adventure.” She was halfway to the door when she felt the sudden flare of heat against her skin and saw the fresh black of the tattoo running down her arm.

Abeke shook her head. Stubborn cat.

She went looking for Rollan and found him sitting on the floor of a library with the white-blond girl, Tasha. Essix was perched in the windowsill—maybe even she could feel the coming storm. There was a stack of cards on the floor between Rollan and Tasha, but whatever the game was, they were no longer playing it. They were talking. When Abeke caught the edge of their conversation, she hesitated and hung back, hidden from view. It wasn't eavesdropping, she told herself, since they were a team, and she'd have made Rollan tell her everything later anyway.

"... my city," Tasha was saying, "my parents."

"Yeah, but your parents didn't summon Ninani," said Rollan. "You have to make this choice. And I meant what I said, about the Great Beasts not belonging to one land."

"But Stetriol needs me."

"So do the Greencloaks."

Tasha murmured something Abeke couldn't hear, a sound of uncertainty.

"You know," said Rollan quietly, "I didn't want to be a Greencloak at first. I agreed to help them, sure, but I wouldn't put on the color, not for ages."

"Why not?" asked Tasha.

Rollan hesitated. "It felt like too much," he said at last. "It was easier, safer, not to care. You see, for a long time I didn't have anyone, and then all of a sudden there were these people who wanted me around. Needed my help. Cared what happened to me. It was scary, and I knew that if I let it matter, let myself care too much, then I could mess it up. As long as I didn't commit to them, I couldn't really fail. Couldn't let anyone down."

"What made you change your mind?"

"The people I met," he said.

"But I thought they were what scared you."

"They did," he said, then added with a chuckle, "They still do." And Abeke knew he was thinking about Meilin in particular. "But," he went on, "I guess I realized that it's worth it. Caring about people enough to fight alongside them. Caring about something enough to fight for it. There was a Greencloak named Tarik. He showed me ..." Rollan's voice faltered. "He showed me it was worth it."

Abeke peered around the corner, saw the sadness in Rollan's usually guarded face.

"Is he back at Greenhaven?" asked Tasha.

Rollan swallowed, shook his head, and Tasha seemed to understand what he was saying, and what he wasn't.

"I'm sorry," she said, wrapping her arms around her legs, resting her chin on her knees.

"He was like a father," said Rollan after a moment. "And he fought to protect Erdas. All of it."

Tasha's gaze went to the window, to Essix and the storm-laden sky of Stetriol. Abeke pressed her back to the wall and listened.

"It's not easy," said Rollan. "It's scary, and it's dangerous, to stand up for things. But there aren't that many people in this world who can really make a difference, and we can."

"We ... " she said softly.

"You're one of them. One of us. But if you stay here, we can't help you. And you can't help us."

There was a long silence. Abeke bit her lip, and heard Rollan get to his feet. "There's never been a Greencloak from Stetriol," he said. "You'd be the very first."

Abeke heard Rollan walking toward the door, toward her, when Tasha said, "Okay."

Rollan's steps paused. "Okay?" he echoed lightly.

"I'll come with you," said Tasha, her voice gaining strength. "I'll do whatever I have to, to protect Stetriol. And the rest of Erdas."

"I'm glad to hear it," he said.

Rollan sounded so serious, so mature, but when he rounded the corner and nearly ran into Abeke, he jumped and let out a mousy squeak that made her bite back a laugh. "Gah!"

Abeke clamped a hand over his mouth and tugged him down the hall.

"Do you always have to creep everywhere?" he hissed when they were out of earshot.

"It is my way," she said with a shrug and a gentle grin.

"I'm going to put bells on you when you sleep," muttered Rollan, shoving his hands in his pockets. "So I suppose you heard everything I said?"

He sounded a little embarrassed, even though he had no reason to be.

“Enough to know that Tasha’s coming with us,” said Abeke lightly as they stepped through the castle doors and down into the courtyard. “Good job.”

Rollan scuffed his boot and murmured a yeah-whatever-don’t-worry, which was about as close as he got to accepting a compliment. “Ugh.” He made a stifled noise. “It’s so humid I can feel the air.” He dragged his hands back and forth.

Abeke looked up. The clouds were darkening overhead, but still no rain. She bit her lip, trying not to take the roiling sky as an omen. Back home in Okaihee, it wasn’t just the bad weather that people worried about. The violent dust storms were dangerous enough, but what scared the villagers was the time before they struck. The longer it took for the storm to break, the worse it would usually be.

Looking up at the churning clouds, she had a bad feeling about this one. Did Stetriol usually get this kind of weather? Or was it another side effect of the sickening Evertree?

Beside her, Rollan was still complaining as he wrangled himself out of his cloak and rolled it under his arm.

“Come on,” he said, catching her look. “Don’t you ever want to take it off and just be Abeke?”

“I am Abeke.”

“You know what I mean. Not Greencloak Abeke of Nilo, bond of Uraza!” he said, mimicking Bern’s deep booming voice. “Just Abeke,” he added, returning to his own. Abeke laughed, but the truth was, she understood. She didn’t chafe under the mantle like Rollan did, but she still felt its weight. And besides, the humidity from the coming storm was oppressive. She shrugged out of the cloak and folded it over her arm, hiding the mark of Uraza beneath the green fabric.

The two walked beyond the castle gates and into town, looking not like Greencloaks, but ordinary kids.

They didn’t have a destination in mind, not at first, and simply wandered the streets. For all their differences, Abeke and Rollan shared a restless streak, born of their upbringings, one tracking and hunting on the Niloan plains, the other scrounging on the streets of Concorba. They both hated sitting still.

Besides, it was nice to take in Stetriol without the procession of guards or the scrutiny of a crowd. Abeke's first impressions held true. The city was definitely rebuilding. Doors and windows were open, and people stood talking on steps and picnicking in courtyards. In one square, she saw a female Greencloak and a local carrying a piece of slate together. In another, an old Greencloak and an even older Stetriolan were deep into a game of stones; the Greencloak's animal, a raccoon, playing its own game with pebbles under the table.

The serpent—once the symbol of Stetriol—still marked many of the stores and streets, carved into lintels and etched into curbs, and yet its green S-like pattern now reminded Abeke of the curve of Ninani's neck.

"See?" She nudged Rollan's shoulder as they walked. "It's not so bad, is it?"

"It's like a different world," admitted Rollan grudgingly. But he was obviously still skeptical; she could see him fingering the hilt of the dagger on his belt, scanning the city for trouble.

And then, as they walked down a road lined with shops, trouble ran right into him.

Not in the form of an attacker or a thug, but a small girl, no higher than his waist, clutching a disk of bread.

She stumbled, scrambling to catch the dropped disk, while heavy steps rang out on the path. Before Abeke could react, Rollan had the girl tucked behind them, and when the pursuer—a heavysset man in billowing blue robes—appeared, demanding to know if they'd seen a thief, Rollan simply shrugged and said, "Can't help you."

The man turned his sweating face to Abeke. "What about you, girl?"

Abeke shook her head innocently, and the man trudged off, cursing to himself. As soon as he was gone, Rollan swung the terrified girl up into his arms. "There now," he said, his voice gentle, teasing. "The trick is to eat the food while you're running off with it. That way, there's no evidence!"

Abeke was always caught off guard by Rollan's streaks of kindness. At first she'd pegged Conor as the nurturer, but Rollan had a fondness for those in need, and a way with them, too. Within moments he had the girl's tears replaced by a toothy smile, and then a laugh, as he sent her on her way with the disk of bread safely in her hands.

"What?" he said, catching Abeke's look as the girl vanished in the maze of streets.

"I forgot how much you like kids."

Rollan shrugged. "Nothing against kids," he said. "Heck, I'm a kid. It's the grown-ups you have to watch out for." His stomach made a loud growling sound, and he fetched a few Stetriolan coins from his pocket and clinked them in his palm. Olvan had given them some coins before they set out, for necessities, but most of their needs were being met by the castle. Abeke was about to make a joke about them finding some stew when she heard a long, high whistle, followed by a bang.

At first she tensed, assuming they were under attack, but an instant later she saw the burst of purple light against the low clouds, and realized it was a firework.

"Do you hear that?" she asked, craning her head in the direction of the explosion.

Rollan's brows went up. "I think everyone heard that, Abeke."

"No," she said. "Not the blast. I mean the cheering." She didn't wait for him to answer, but started walking, eyes half-lidded, letting her ears sharpen and pick apart the sounds the way she did when tracking prey. Rollan followed, a stride behind, and as they wound through the city, Abeke could hear the sounds of celebration getting nearer. Shouts and cheers, interrupted by the whistles and pops of smaller fireworks.

All of a sudden they rounded a corner and found themselves at the edge of a growing crowd.

It looked like some kind of festival.

"Oh!" said Rollan, his spirits brightening as he took in the line of stalls. After a moment, his attention narrowed like a hawk, everything else forgotten. "I smell meat."

Another firework exploded overhead, shaking the world like thunder—no, there was thunder there as well, rumbling through the clouds—and the people of Stetriol whistled and whooped. Rollan jogged away, but Abeke couldn't tear her attention from the road, where people were pressing, shoulder to shoulder, jostling to see something around the bend.

A procession. When she stretched onto her toes, she could see it rolling down the street toward them.

Men and women in the official blues and blacks of Stetriol waved sticks with bird-shaped kites fluttering on top. It looked like an entire flock. The sticks were a dozen different lengths, the paper birds atop them a dozen shapes and sizes—hawks and eagles, doves and geese—but they'd all been painted white.

Abeke frowned. It didn't make sense. The symbol of Stetriol was a serpent, not a bird.

The air, still thick with impending rain, was now buzzing with excitement, but Abeke's bad feeling was getting worse. "What do you think they're celebrating?" she asked as Rollan reappeared at her elbow with two skewers of what looked like beef.

"Who knows," he said, passing her one of the skewers. "Loosen up. Have a meat stick."

But Abeke waved the food away. Between the brewing storm and the swarming crowd, she was beginning to feel dizzy. The warning plucked at her ribs, and she could almost feel Uraza's coiled energy, her twitching tail, as Abeke's vision sharpened. She scanned the crowd for danger.

Amid the blues and blacks and the fluttering streaks of white, the flash of a red cloak on the other side of the street caught her eye.

"Rollan, look!" she said, tugging on his sleeve. But by the time he turned his attention from his skewer to the crowd, the red had been swallowed up again by the other colors.

"What?" he asked, his mouth full of food.

Abeke shook her head. "I ... I thought I saw—"

She was cut off by a round of fireworks. The sky lit up with bursts of white. The parade had almost reached them, swelling with every block. Men and women and children cheered as the birds swung and danced on the air.

"Excuse me," said Abeke, touching the sleeve of a woman in front of her. "What is all this for? Is it a holiday?"

"Haven't you heard?" said the woman, twisting toward them. Her face was painted with a swan. "Ninani has come to Stetriol!"

It was like a punch to the stomach.

Rollan cursed beneath his breath. “This isn’t good,” he said.

“No,” muttered Abeke. “It’s not.”

The arrival of the Great Beast in Stetriol should have stayed a secret. But Ernol was right. Word had obviously spread like fire. Abeke was just wondering how when she saw Ernol himself at the center of the crowd, waving a stick with a large white swan fluttering on top.

“That fool,” growled Rollan. “He has no idea what he’s doing!”

Another firework exploded. Abeke turned and tried to jostle her way through the crowd, swinging the green cloak back over her shoulders. She felt Rollan behind her but didn’t look back. They had to get to the castle. They had to find Tasha and Ninani and get away from Stetriol before word spread beyond its borders. Before it reached Zerif.

And then, just as she broke free of the crowd, it hit her.

A wave of sickness.

Suddenly Abeke swayed, feeling ill.

It wasn’t the same dizziness that had plagued her through the city with the brewing storm, but a bright, sharp sickness. Her nerves cramped and her muscles twisted around her bones. Pain burned through her, but just as she recognized what was happening and the terror of it hit her, the wave was gone. She could breathe again. She could move. She could think. It had lasted only a second. Long enough to knock the air from her lungs, long enough to make her shake, but even as she trembled, she stared down at her hands, confused. The first time the bonds had strained, the sickness had been much worse. It had seemed to last forever.

Rollan stood beside her, looking pale, his hand bleeding where he’d gripped the skewer too hard and it had broken, cutting into his palm. “Did you feel that?” he mumbled hoarsely. “That was ...”

Abeke swallowed. “Yeah, but it felt more like an aftershock than an event.”

“Yeah,” agreed Rollan nervously, “but doesn’t an aftershock usually come after?”

“Then maybe it wasn’t an aftershock,” she said, trembling. “Maybe it was a warning.”

Rollan opened his mouth, but before he could speak, something caught his attention.

“Hey,” he snapped over her head.

Abeke straightened, following his gaze, and saw red. The figure in the red cloak stood several yards away, noticing them as soon as they did him. Again and again he’d looked like a shadow, a ghost, but now he was very real, the ends of his cloak flicking and snapping in the stormy wind. His mask was smooth and empty, but behind it, his eyes were pale and sharp.

He inched back a step, and Abeke held up her hands. “Stop,” she said. “We just want to talk.”

For an instant, no one moved.

For an instant, she thought he’d stay.

And then a firework went off, shattering any chance of calm.

In the blast of sound and light, the masked boy spun and ran. Rollan growled and Abeke sighed, and the two of them took off at a sprint through the streets of Stetriol.

13

THE CHASE

THE SKY SHUDDERED WITH THUNDER AND LIGHT.

The people cheered and sang and crowded in the streets, making it harder and harder to keep sight of the figure in red, let alone catch up to him.

Rollan was starting to wish he hadn't eaten that skewer of meat.

Even with the crimson cloak standing out against the sea of cooler colors, the boy was fast—too fast. He wove through stalls and vanished for long seconds, only to reappear on the other side of a street or on a balcony, climbing a wall or running along the wooden spines of stalls.

The streets of Stetriol were less a grid than a tangled mess, but the stranger moved the way Rollan once had through the streets of Concorba during his years as an urchin, like he knew every crack in the ground, every twist and turn, every way to disappear.

How is he so fast? thought Rollan as they reached the edge of the crowd and swung a hairpin turn. The figure's red cloak had been trailing like a tongue around the corner, but by the time they rounded it, he was gone. Rollan cursed and kicked a bin.

"Split up!" called Abeke, and before he could say that he thought that was a bad idea (because of the crowd and the storm and the fact that he still felt woozy from the weakened bond), she was gone, ducking down another side street in a blur of speed and grace.

"Enough of this," grumbled Rollan, swinging the green cloak back around his shoulders.

He had spent enough time being chased to know the way a person fled when they wanted to lose a tail. He took a running jump, pushing off a stack of empty crates, and then the wall, nearly losing his balance before he caught the tiled edge of the roof and hauled himself up. Lightning forked across the darkening sky, and Essix's screech cut through the air as he clambered up the slate tiles and got to his feet, scanning the streets below. The city unfolded around him, a maze of roads, houses, courtyards, open in a way it hadn't been from the ground. Sometimes, thought Rollan, you just need a change of perspective. Now, on the roof, he tried to see the city the way he would have back when he was a street thief in Concorba, back before he'd joined the Greencloaks. Before he'd become one of them.

Then again, now that he was one of them, Rollan had something he'd never had as a street urchin.

Rollan dropped to a crouch and closed his eyes.

He clutched the tiled roof as the world tipped away, his vision going dark, and then swinging back into focus, no longer on the roof, but overhead.

The change in perspective was dizzying, tunneling in and out with the weakening bond. Again Rollan wished he hadn't eaten that food, but he wasn't about to forfeit the contents on someone's roof, so he tried to focus on Stetriol through Essix's falcon eyes as she scanned the city, searching for a swatch of red.

The celebrations painted the city in bright colors below, sound tangling with light and movement, all so sharp and—

A firework detonated too close to Essix's head, and for an instant Rollan's vision went blinding white. He gasped, gripping the rooftop, but the falcon wasn't wounded, only stunned, and he could feel her annoyance as she dipped and wove through the firework's falling debris. Her vision—now his—returned, and as it did, Rollan saw the shape of the red cloak sprinting away down an alley two blocks south.

"Got you," whispered Rollan, opening his eyes. His sight bottomed out, then settled back into his head. He took a single steadying breath before launching off along the roof's edge, tracing the gutters and climbing the peaks until he caught sight of the red cloak rounding a corner up ahead.

From his vantage point on the roof, Rollan smiled.

The stranger in red must not know the city as well as he thought he did, because he was heading straight into a dead end. The sides of the narrow street were high, and instead of giving way onto another road, the alley turned a corner and ended abruptly in a brick wall, the back of some tavern or inn.

Rollan ran along the rooftops, and then, before the masked figure could realize his mistake, Rollan dropped from the courtyard wall and landed in a crouch before him, blocking the only way out.

“Aha!” he said with a grin. “Caught you.”

The figure turned, the silvery wood of his mask eerily smooth and faceless. Up close, there was nothing specter-like about the stranger. He was tall—taller than Rollan, anyway—and Rollan tried not to think about the way his opponent had taken on Suka the Polar Bear.

“Take off that mask,” said Rollan, taking a step forward and drawing his dagger. “There’s nowhere to go.”

He heard steps, and Abeke rounded the corner, skidding to a stop beside him when she saw the masked figure.

“Who are you?” she called out, breathless.

The boy in red didn’t speak. He held up his hands, eyes narrowed to slits behind his faceless mask. Rollan didn’t know if he was surrendering or telling them both to stay back. Then, in one fluid motion, the figure spun away and leaped, pushing with startling strength off the corner of the wall and vaulting one, two, three steps straight up the wall before landing on top of the roof. He didn’t flee. From his new perch the stranger turned to face them again, almost taunting.

“No, you don’t!” Rollan tried to follow, took a running start at the wall and jumped. He got one boot up, and almost got two, but before he could manage the second he lost his footing and fell back to the street, landing roughly on his backside. He could have really used Arax’s old talisman right about now.

“Okay,” he grumbled, getting to his feet. “You can stay up there ... ” Over the stranger’s shoulder, he saw Essix diving, talons forward, and smirked. "... For all I care ... "

Essix screeched and sank her nails into the stranger's back. Or at least, she meant to. At the last second the stranger spun, cloak billowing as he dodged Essix's talons and somehow kept his balance on the roof's edge. The falcon tried to bank, but the stranger's hand shot out and caught Essix by the throat.

Rollan let out a panicked sound. Essix tried to claw her way free, but her talons raked uselessly against the stranger's forearm, as if he were wearing armor. The stranger's grip tightened.

"Stop!" cried Rollan, but the figure in red didn't hurt the bird.

"Call her back," he ordered, his voice low and gruff, slightly muffled by the mask.

Rollan didn't hesitate, and neither did the falcon. He called Essix back to him, and Essix came; in a flash of light she vanished from the stranger's hand and reappeared on Rollan's skin. The masked figure turned his head sharply, as if hearing something in the distance. Something besides fireworks and thunder and song.

"Who are you?" demanded Abeke again. The figure's masked face tipped down as he considered her. Another fork of lightning split the sky behind him, and his cloak fluttered ominously in the wind. "Why are you following us?" she added.

When at last the stranger answered, all he said was, "You should go."

"Oh, yeah?" Rollan snapped. "Why don't you come down here and make—"

"Why were you in the forest that day?" cut in Abeke. "And why are you here in Stetriol? Are you trying to collect the Great Beasts for yourself?"

The faceless mask tipped to the side. "No," he said sternly. "We seek to protect the future from the past."

Oh, great, thought Rollan. Now the stranger was talking in the royal we.

Again, something caught the masked boy's attention. Something Rollan couldn't see. "It's not safe here," he said. "You need to ... "

But his words trailed off, swallowed not by a rumble of thunder but by the rushing of blood in Rollan's ears. An instant later, the crushing pain hit him, this time not in a warning, but in a wall. He could feel the bones in his body shudder in time with the Evertree as it trembled halfway across the world. Pain—crushing, tearing, lasting pain—tore through his body, and the next thing he knew he was on his hands and knees, trying not to black out.

He heard Abeke scream beside him, heard her small body collapse to the cobbled street. But Rollan couldn't help her, couldn't even call her name. He tried, but his jaw was clenched, teeth locked together in agony as he curled in on himself, something deep inside him twisting so hard he was sure it would break. Rollan's vision swam, and he pressed his palms against his eyelids, trying desperately to make the stuttering vision stop.

And then, at last, he felt it.

A drop of cold rain broke the fevered spell of the tearing bond, dragging him back to his senses. Cold rain kissed his temple, his cheek. Cold rain slicked the ground beneath him and tapped a beat against his arms. Rollan wanted to stay there, curled on the alley floor, and let the rain wash over him until the last of the burning pain was gone. He wanted to, but he couldn't. It felt like hours lost, when it was only minutes, and he had to get up.

Something was wrong. Hadn't something been wrong?

A boy in red. A girl in white. A swan.

Ninani.

Stetriol.

The parade.

This is how his mind came back to him, in drops of rain.

Thunder rolled through, but it sounded too low, too close.

He heard Abeke's shuddering breath beside him, saw her roll onto her stomach, then rise to her knees.

Everything ached, and his heart was pounding in his head, but he could move again, and he forced himself up to his hands and knees.

"You need to get up," said a voice gruffly.

Rollan looked up. He'd expected the masked boy to be long gone, or at least atop the wall, but he was standing in the alley, masked face bowed over Rollan, boot prodding his shin. "Get. Up."

“Who do you think you are?” snapped Rollan, staggering to his feet, his body still ringing with pain.

“You need to go now,” said the figure in the red cloak. “They’re coming. They were waiting for you to stumble. Now they’re here.”

“What are you talking ab—” started Abeke, but she was cut off by an explosion.

Another firework, only this one wasn’t overhead.

The boom seemed to come from the top of a building nearby, and Rollan’s stomach turned as it was followed an instant later by a scream of terror, the rain of slate tiles crashing to the ground.

Why had someone shot off a firework so low?

In his dazed state, it took Rollan a moment to understand.

Stetriol wasn’t celebrating anymore.

The city was under attack.

UP IN FLAMES

CONOR WASN'T AFRAID OF SPIDERS, AND EVEN IF HE WAS, they were the least of his problems right now.

The group was halfway across the Arachane Fields when his hands started to shake again, and his vision tunneled, and the whispers began to weave through the music in his head. He was getting too tired too fast. He might actually have told Meilin that he needed to stop, needed a break to collect his energy, his thoughts, if they weren't standing rather precariously in the middle of a sprawling spiderweb.

A strand away, Meilin made her way cautiously forward, along with Xanthe and Takoda.

Conor took a step and nearly missed the silver thread entirely when his vision doubled at the last instant. His breath caught as he fought for balance. The web trembled beneath him, and the nearest spider, its body amber and its limbs black, pivoted to look at him with its many, many, many eyes. Conor felt in that moment as if it could see the darkness roiling inside him.

The Arachane Fields ... guard the way against evil.

And the spiders?

... catch anything the music doesn't.

Conor swallowed. The spider chattered, and he could feel the parasite moving beneath his skin. But the more he thought about it, the more the spiders in the web seemed to think about him, so he wrestled with his panic and fear, tried to find calm the way he had so long ago, when he was only a shepherd tending a flock in Trunswick. How many hours had he spent there, gazing up at the sky, finding peace in the slow procession of clouds, the steady blue, or even the soothing sound of rain?

He tipped his head back now, the way he had then, only to be reminded that there was no sky here, clear or stormy. There was only the ceiling of the cave, so high above it vanished into black.

“Conor?” came Meilin’s voice, over the whispers and the field’s strange melody. That voice was the closest thing he had to a sky—not a stretch of blue, but the steady slate gray of a winter afternoon—and he held fast to it. And when Briggan rested his muzzle against his back, Conor grounded himself in that, too. In the simple weight of a friend’s voice and a familiar’s steadfast calm.

He took a deep breath and continued forward, steady, steady.

And then, just as he was stepping from one strand to another, he felt it. Like a blow to the chest, all the air knocked out of him in a sudden burst of pain. At first he thought it was the parasite, clawing through his nerves, but then he saw Takoda gasp and bow his head, saw Meilin stop and clutch her chest, and realized that whatever it was, they could feel it, too, which meant it could be only one thing.

The bond.

Briggan cowered beside him with a whine, and Conor forced his body down into a crouch to keep from toppling over into the dark, bracing himself for the spine-curling agony that had hit him once before.

But it didn’t come.

In fact, almost as quickly as the pain shuddered through him, it was gone. A passing shadow, a glancing blow.

“What was that?” asked Xanthe, pink eyes wide with confusion. “What happened to you guys?”

“The bonds,” hissed Takoda through gritted teeth. “Our spirit animals ... the tree ... ”

“That wasn’t ... so bad,” gasped Conor, still on his hands and knees.

“It doesn’t make sense,” said Meilin, rubbing her chest. “The Evertree is getting worse, not better. The effects of the strain should be getting worse, too.”

“Maybe,” said Conor, trying to suppress the waver in his voice. “But you won’t find me complaining. If I never feel that again, it’ll be too soon.”

He straightened and realized with surprise and dread that the web beneath them was no longer flat, but bowing heavily under a new weight.

Conor looked up and tensed with horror as he saw Kovo standing among them.

Takoda had either summoned the Great Beast, or the ape had been released with the shuddering of the bond. It didn't matter. All that mattered was that the massive ape was now standing in the field of silver thread, and even though the web didn't snap, it warped and bent around Kovo's weight. Realization rippled through the group, but they weren't the only ones.

The spiders around the web had noticed, too.

They clicked and hissed, and began to skitter across the web toward the bowing center.

“Takoda,” snapped Meilin, fighting for balance as the ground tilted beneath her. “Put him away!”

“I ... I can't.”

“Try!” said Conor.

“Come on, Kovo,” said Takoda, voice pleading. The ape only bared his teeth and growled. Briggan snarled back, an alpha trying to subdue a member of his pack, but Kovo was no wolf. He beat his chest and made a sound that shook the strings and sent the melody scattering.

“He's going to break the web!” shouted Meilin as the spiders skittered closer.

“Kovo,” insisted Takoda, trying to keep his voice low and even as he pulled open the collar of his robe and exposed his throat, where the mark of the Great Beast had been. “Please.”

The ape turned his red eyes on the boy, and for a second Conor thought he might actually, grudgingly, obey.

But then something moved behind one of the curtains of silver thread. They all spun as a creature parted the curtains and stepped through. Briggan bristled, and Kovo clenched his fists, and Conor gaped as out came the largest spider he had ever seen. Larger than a spider had any right to be. Its body was as big as Kovo's, its legs as thick as the cords of silver silk they balanced on. A hundred eyes—some emerald and others sapphire and others amber—stared out from its head. Venom dripped from two fanglike pincers that hung below its jaw.

Meilin actually swayed on her feet, the last of the color draining from her face at the sight of the giant arachnid.

The Webmother, thought Conor.

Kovo had disturbed the Webmother.

And unlike the smaller spiders that, until Kovo's reappearance, had left them alone, the Webmother hissed and clicked and immediately started toward them.

"Uh-oh," said Xanthe.

Conor craned his head and could just make out the far edge of the field, the place ahead where silver thread gave way to stone again. They needed to run, but there was no way. The Webmother clambered toward them from one direction, and the dozens of smaller spiders were spilling in from every other side, surrounding the group with eyes and legs and chittering. On instinct, Conor tried to retreat, and nearly lost his balance on the thread.

"Xanthe," he said, voice tight. "Anything in the legends about what to do now?"

"No ... "

"Great," growled Meilin, gripping her staff. "I guess we fight."

"Wait." The pale-skinned girl actually took a step toward the Webmother, hands raised as if in supplication. "Maybe we can talk—"

"Do you speak spider?" asked Takoda anxiously.

"No, but if she understands that we just want to—"

The giant spider hissed her disapproval, jaws opening.

"Bad plan," said Meilin, grabbing Xanthe's shoulder and pulling her backward, narrowly avoiding the bead of venom that dripped from the Webmother's fangs. It fell to the silver cords and sizzled.

While Xanthe and Meilin had been struggling before the Webmother, Kovo had been signing something to Takoda, and after a second Conor realized what the gesture meant.

Fire.

Fire, fire, fire, signed the ape with urgency, tugging on Takoda's bag until the boy took out the unlit torch and the flint.

Xanthe spun at the sound of flint striking.

“No, wait,” she pleaded, but it was too late. A spark caught the torch’s head and lit, burning with reddish-gold light against the field’s blue-silver. Takoda held the flame high, and the surrounding spiders scrambled backward in the face of the torch’s heat and glow, their many eyes alight. The Webmother reared up at the sight of the fire, screeching in anger and shaking the web beneath them.

Meilin tore a piece of fabric from her shirt and wrapped it around her quarterstaff, touching Takoda’s torchlight to the cloth until it caught, too. Takoda faced the Webmother while Meilin swung the quarterstaff back and forth to ward off the smaller spiders, her knuckles white around the wood.

They were surrounded. But the fire seemed to be keeping the spiders at bay.

“Now what?” asked Xanthe.

“We move as a group,” said Meilin. “All together, toward the edge of the field.” And for a few steps, as they shuffled forward, with spiders circling, backs together across the strongest threads, Conor thought it might actually work. They were their own beast, a many-limbed, fire-eyed creature, moving carefully, if not gracefully, across the silver web.

And then the Arachane Fields trembled.

A shudder went through the entire cavern, not just the cords of spider silk beneath his feet, but through the vaulting cave above, as the unseen roots of the Evertree tensed and twisted and writhed.

Oh no, thought Conor, just before the pain hit him like a wall.

If the first shudder had been a glancing blow, this was a beating.

The world around him fell away, the Arachane Fields and the silvery light and the spiders vanishing with the rest of Conor’s sight as the pain ripped through him. His body tore itself away from his will, collapsing to the web like a puppet with the strings cut. He curled in on himself as every muscle in his body spasmed and every bone ached. Somewhere, Takoda cried out and Kovo roared with fury and beat his chest, Briggan howled, a wild, wolfish cry, and Meilin screamed and fell to her knees. Conor fought the sickness, fought the pain, fought his body the way he’d been fighting it for weeks, and struggled to his hands and knees.

Through the tears streaming down his face, he saw the spiders on the web frozen like drops of dew, their many-eyed faces turned up toward the suffering roots.

He saw Meilin driving the end of the quarterstaff into the silver cord beneath her, trying to force herself up.

He saw Takoda sway on his feet, and Xanthe, the only one of them immune, catch the boy before he fell.

Catch the boy, but not the torch.

Saw it go tumbling to the field of thread.

Saw the web catch instantly, the silver thread lighting like oil.

Conor gasped, clawing his way back to his senses as the fire licked outward, and the Webmother and her kin recoiled, and Briggan—his Briggan—eyes wide in animal horror, took off at a run across the igniting fields.

“Briggan!” shouted Conor, scrambling, stumbling, forcing himself back up as the wolf sprinted away across the silver web, looking less like a Great Beast and more like a spooked dog. All around them, the threads began to melt and snap. The music they’d made, once sweet, now warbled and fell apart like a melody dropped, the chords tripping out of tune and then tumbling away entirely, replaced by the shriek of the spiders and the crackle of flames.

“Conor!” called Meilin, now up on her feet. She stumbled backward as a cord in front of her caught fire, and through the billowing white smoke, he saw her point to the end of the field up ahead. But all Conor could think about was finding Briggan.

He spun, disoriented by the echoes of pain and the rising chaos, the light and heat and smoke, and then with terror he saw the wolf trapped by a fiery curtain, the world around him going up in flames, the web warping around the wolf’s paws. Briggan turned in a slow, nervous circle, hackles up, cornered by fire. There was no way back. No way Briggan would ever reach Conor, let alone the edge.

But when he reached out, tried to invite the wolf back into his passive state, Briggan did not come.

A tendril of fire scorched the wolf’s tail and he yelped, tried to pad forward, then back, trapped on the unsteady ropes.

“Briggan!” called Conor, pulling on their bond. But it was too weak, and Briggan’s blue eyes stayed wild. He was too much wolf right now, too little spirit animal ... but Conor knew it was more than that. Knew that, deep down, he didn’t want to let the wolf come back, didn’t want to tether Briggan to his failing body, because he was scared of the parasite infecting him, too.

More web fell away. Briggan’s paw slipped as the silk cords beneath him melted.

Briggan was trapped, and Conor was terrified, and the world was falling apart around them, but he knew that, whatever monsters he had to face, he couldn’t face them without his wolf.

He threw out his hand and pulled on the bond with all his strength.

“BRIGGAN!” he called the Great Beast back.

And, at last, the Great Beast came.

Briggan vanished from the web just before it crumbled underneath him, and in a flash of light and heat he reappeared on Conor’s skin, a wolf leaping up the arm opposite his wound.

The wolf’s return hit him in a wave of energy and relief. Briggan’s wild strength surged through Conor, and he spun and sprinted with a wolf’s power and balance toward the edge of the field, the place where the silver net stopped and the ground—solid rock—began again. His vision blurred with smoke and tears, but all he could think of was reaching the ledge.

One loping stride, then two, and he was there across the threshold, coughing and stumbling gratefully off the crumbling web and onto solid stone.

Safe.

And then, just as suddenly, not safe.

Because what he didn’t see, not until it was too late, was that the stone ground ended almost as abruptly as it began. The rock was not an expanse but a line, a ridge that gave way suddenly, violently, to nothing. A sheer drop. There was no more ground ahead. No more anything. Conor staggered to a stop on the precipice, so close his toes were curling over the edge, loose pebbles crumbling away and falling down into the dark.

He was the first to reach the rock, and he turned to warn the others, to stop them from barreling forward out of fire and into a fall.

“Wait!” he called as Meilin surged forward onto the ledge, her head down.

Too late.

She looked up at the last minute, her face smudged with ash. She didn't see the chasm, but she saw Conor's panic and tried to pull back in time. But she had too much momentum and too little space. The two of them collided on the precipice.

Conor lost his balance, felt the world give way beneath his feet. For an instant, they both hung there, and then they came apart. Meilin dug in her heels, wrenched herself away. She landed on the stone platform, and Conor was falling back, back, into nothing.

A hand caught his wrist.

It wasn't Meilin's.

It was Xanthe's.

“I've got you,” she said, breathless. They both looked at the place where her pale fingers gripped his sleeve. Meilin was on her feet again. She grabbed his other hand and the two hauled Conor upright on the ledge.

Xanthe let go, turning back to the blazing field.

“Be carefu—” she called, but she never had the chance to finish. Takoda and Kovo were barreling forward, the world on fire at their back. Xanthe dove out of the way as the boy and the ape crashed onto the stone ledge, colliding with a force that slammed into Meilin, who slammed into Conor, and suddenly they all went tumbling over the side and into the dark.

ONE SECOND THEY WERE STANDING ON THE LEDGE, A field on fire at their backs, and the next, they were falling. Meilin didn't know what happened, only that she was holding on to Conor, and then something hit her from behind, and the ground she'd worked so hard to reach was suddenly gone.

And she was plunging down through empty air.

Back in Zhong, she'd always enjoyed the rush of sparring with her tutors, the thrill of a challenge, the way her heart leaped into her throat. She did not enjoy the rush of falling. Her heart was still there, in her throat, along with her stomach, and a scream.

Of all the ways to die, this was not the one she had in mind.

But then, too soon, her side hit mud, and suddenly she wasn't falling so much as sliding down a very steep slope covered in mossy earth and slimy stones.

She reached blindly for something, anything, to catch hold of, but couldn't get purchase. Her body had momentum, and she couldn't figure out which way was up long enough to do anything but fall. And then, as suddenly as the world below her had gone from air to mud, it was very briefly air again, and then water.

Meilin broke the surface with a crash, and spluttered and tried to swim before she realized that the water wasn't deep. She was sitting on the silty floor of a pool, or a pond, or a shore. Whatever it was, the water sloshed around her knees as two other bodies thudded into the shallow expanse beside her, followed by a thunderous crash that could only be Kovo.

“Blech,” said Conor, spitting out a mouthful of grimy water. And he was right. The liquid tasted even worse than it smelled, and it smelled pretty awful.

What had Xanthe called this place, the obstacle beyond the Arachane Fields?

The Sulfur Sea.

She thought she understood why. The air was damp and rotting, and there was a gritty quality to the water, though that might have been the silt they kicked up with their fall. Still, it looked black and brackish as it slid between her fingers. Meilin squinted, straining to see the space around her. There was no light, except for the distant burning of the fields far overhead. It cast strange shadows over everything, turned the world to black and white. At their back was the cliff they’d just descended. Ahead, nothing but a stretch of oily water, trailing into darkness. Meilin thought, not for the first time, about how much she preferred the world above ground.

“Is everyone all right?” asked Conor hoarsely.

Takoda mumbled something affirmative, and Meilin got to her feet, brackish water soaking through her shoes and sluicing off her cloak. She’d lost her quarterstaff in the fall, heard it break halfway down. She plunged her hands back into the gritty water to search for the pieces, but her fingers found only mud, rocks. Her hand slid over something smooth, and then moved against something that moved back.

Meilin recoiled.

She couldn’t see through the water. Its surface was a dark slick reflecting only the pale planes of her face and, above, the burning field. Maybe it was best, she thought, even as she forced herself to ask.

“Xanthe,” she said, teeth chattering from the damp soaking through her clothes. “What do you know about the Sulfur Sea?”

But Xanthe didn’t answer.

“Xanthe?” Meilin said again as something brushed her shoe. “Whatever the legends are, we need to know.”

But still the girl didn't speak. Meilin straightened and squinted. In the flickering haze, she could make out the broad shape of Kovo, the narrow one of Takoda, the hunched form of Conor.

No Xanthe.

"Xanthe?" called Conor.

Nothing.

"Xanthe?" called Takoda, voice rising.

Meilin spun in a circle.

There were no pale-skinned bodies floating in the shallows, no girl-shaped shadows standing on the ledge above. Meilin sloshed forward along the shore, heart pounding in her chest. Xanthe knew the way. She was the only one who did.

"Xanthe!" Meilin called out, but she was answered only by her own voice, echoing over the water.

The girl was gone.

ATTACK ON STETRIOL

ABEKE WAS BARELY ON HER FEET WHEN THE BLAST RANG out, far too low for fireworks.

The ground shook with the force of the explosion. The air, once filled with cheers and music, was suddenly overtaken with smoke and screams.

“Get to the castle,” ordered the masked figure. “Find the girl. Get her out.”

And before Abeke could say anything else, he turned and leaped off the wall, vanishing behind it.

Rollan unleashed Essix, and the falcon went soaring angrily up into the sky.

Abeke’s body was still singing with pain, her muscles aching and her thoughts dull, but she managed to mount the wall after the masked boy. His red cloak was already gone, but when she turned to survey what was unfolding across Stetriol, the air caught in her chest. Someone must have set blaze to a toppled supply of fireworks, because another went off, and then another, explosions streaking through the city and colliding with walls, buildings, homes, bursting into flame and light and filling the city with smoke.

Drops of rain hit the ground around her, along with debris—loosened shingles, singed pieces of canvas—but the skies had yet to truly open, and the city was beginning to break and burn.

Figures were swarming through the streets, some human, some animal, their foreheads marked by the horrible black spiral of the infected. Zerif’s creatures. They moved in a kind of hive mind, like a murmuration of starlings or a colony of ants, overtaking everyone and everything they reached. At every street some peeled away, fanning out to maximize the damage, but the core was heading straight for the castle.

She strained to find the Greencloaks and saw with horror that half of them were still on their hands and knees, crippled by the latest bond strain. Rollan had been looking past her up at the sky, swaying on his feet as his vision emptied and Essix's dark shape swept overhead. An instant later he was back, looking ill. And she could tell he'd seen the same things.

"This way," he said, his voice tight as Abeke jumped down, landing in a crouch beside him.

They backtracked out of the alley and reached the nearest intersection just as two infected pinned a man down in the street.

Rollan caught Abeke's arm before she could race forward, pulled her back into the shadow of the wall as one of the infected raised a dagger to the man's neck. Instead of striking, a dark shape emerged from his cuff and slid the length of the metal, latching on to the man's throat. He writhed and spasmed as the parasite crawled beneath his skin, over his jaw, up his cheek. And then, too soon, his fighting stopped. His body went slack and his captors let go, and the next moment he was on his feet again, the spiral pulsing on his brow.

He lunged for the nearest woman—a Greencloak—and Abeke reached for her bow, only to remember it was back at the castle. And then Rollan's knife went whistling through the air and caught the infected man in the hand, buying the Greencloak an extra moment, a chance to get away. Rollan grabbed Abeke's arm as the other two infected turned toward them.

"Come on," he said, pulling her in the direction of the castle. "We can't save everyone, but we have to save Tasha while there's still time."

The streets were full of shouts, but none of them belonged to the infected. That's what unnerved Abeke most, their silence. Their mouths hung slightly open, air rasping between their teeth. But they said nothing, only came with blade and hand and parasite, corrupting all they touched, and killing what they couldn't. And their animals—their animals—attacked, their eyes neither keen nor wild, but empty.

Vessels for something else's will.

A dog bit into a woman's leg, a parasite wriggling between its teeth. A marked lizard snaked across the stone. Overhead, a hawk with a black spiral swooped for Essix, but the gyrfalcon was fast and cunning and got away. Nearby, an owl wasn't as lucky.

Please, thought Abeke as they raced toward the castle, please never force me to see Conor like this.

They raced down the streets—streets they'd so recently wandered through laughing, now a scene of terror.

Abeke and Rollan got to the castle gates hoping to find allies, but they found only more chaos. An hour before, the courtyard had been a hub of life, locals and Greencloaks working together. Now some fought together, and others grappled, and others still struggled against their own infected friends. The courtyard was a mess of bodies, several of them down, the rest fighting. Spirit animals swooped and charged, the infected waging war against the bonded, who desperately tried to ward them off.

The infected wore an array of colors, but the clothes meant nothing to them now. The fabric hung from their bodies, the collars torn, the cuffs ragged. All thought of who they were—who they'd been—was now lost to the sickness. Some looked like they might have once been criminals while others wore the marks of nobles—but now they were stripped of everything but blind service, enslaved by Zerif. By the Wurm.

A handful of Greencloaks were trying to hold the front steps, Bern among them.

"We have to find Tasha!" called Rollan, blocking an infected's sword. He kicked the man in the chest and sent him sprawling backward. The infected were strong, but not agile, and it took the man several seconds to stumble to his feet, where a female Greencloak drove a dagger through his back.

"Still inside!" called Bern as he cut down another attacker, his lemur nowhere to be seen. "Find her and go."

Abeke found a cart of weapons inside the courtyard. She took up a quiver and bow just as a woman threw herself ferally at Rollan. Abeke knocked the arrow and loosed it without hesitation; it plunged into the infected's shoulder. But the woman only hissed and dragged the barb free, seemingly oblivious to the blood running down her front.

"Aim for the heart or the head," ordered one of the Greencloaks. "Nothing else will stop them!"

An osprey shrieked and dove for Abeke's face, talons outstretched, only to be taken down by another Greencloak's arrow. But as she turned to thank the archer, the man fell to an infected with a jagged knife.

Rollan surged up ahead, vanishing into the castle, but just as Abeke reached the entrance, a wild dog sprang through. It lunged for Abeke, its pale fur marred by the black spiral above its eyes as it took her down, pinning her against the landing. She dug her hands into its scruff and fought back its snapping jaws, and then in a flash of light Uraza was there. The leopard pounced, tearing off the dog; it went rolling down the steps. Abeke got to her feet and said a breathless thanks before she and Uraza plunged into the castle.

More Greencloaks fighting. More falling. A blond woman, one of the Greencloaks from the Tellun's Pride II, was now on her knees, clawing at her throat as a dark shape crawled beneath her skin. Abeke saw the horrible moment when the fighting stopped and the struggle went out of her eyes.

"In here!" called Rollan from up ahead.

They found Tasha in one of the great halls, cornered by enemies. Two women, a man, and a jaguar. The man was a Greencloak, and one of the women a Stetriolan noble, and none of that mattered because all of them bore the mark of the infected on their skin. Tasha's back was up against the wall, a broken chair leg clutched in her hands, and Ninani before her with wings raised into a large white shield.

More steps were coming down the hall. Not the even tread of allies, but the lumbering tread of those already lost. Rollan spun and barred the door, shoving a shelf in front of it.

And even though Abeke knew they couldn't go back out that way, knew the odds would only get worse with the doors open, she still felt trapped. Which, of course, they were.

"Hey!" Rollan called to the attackers cornering Tasha. "Let's even things out!"

Two of the infected turned at the sound of Rollan's voice, but the third was undeterred, still advancing on Tasha and Ninani. She was reaching toward the swan, a black worm in her palm.

It all happened so fast.

Ninani hissed and reared, and Abeke drew her bow and launched an arrow, piercing the woman's hand and knocking the parasite to the floor. Tasha surged past the swan and swung the chair leg as hard as she could, missing the first time, but landing a blow the second time that dropped the woman to the ground, dazed.

"Ha!" said Tasha triumphantly, just before the woman grabbed her foot and sent her sprawling to the floor, chair leg rolling out of her grip.

"I'm sorry, I'm sorry," said Tasha as she tried to scramble away, kicking as the woman crawled toward her, grasping.

Abeke nocked another arrow and loosed it.

Aim for the heart or the head.

The barb found its mark, and the woman fell lifeless to the floor in front of the girl.

Tasha's face flooded with relief, but the fight was far from over.

The jaguar turned its hollow gaze on Uraza, who yowled and leaped forward, the two big cats colliding and going down in a tangle of claws and teeth.

Rollan took on one of the attackers, a woman with stringy black hair, and Abeke faced the other, a lanky teen lifting a knife. They both had loose parasites climbing over their clothes, searching for their next host.

"Don't let them touch you," Abeke told Rollan.

"Don't worry," said Rollan, turning a knife in his hand. "I'm not letting them get close."

He slashed with the knife, but the woman dodged, the movement eerily fast and fluid. Her fingers tangled in his collar and he struggled before clocking her upside the head with the butt of the blade.

"Aaahh," said Rollan, shaking the parasite from his cloak and crushing it underfoot as the lanky man slashed at Abeke. He was too close for her to shoot, and when she brought the bow up to deflect, his knife came down hard, cracking the wood. She swept his legs out from under him, then cracked her boot across his face.

Abeke spun, searching for Uraza. The first thing she saw was the jaguar's body slumped on the ground. And then it shifted, rolled aside, and the leopard dragged herself slowly to her feet. A gash ran along Uraza's shoulder, and when Abeke saw her spirit animal's lumbering step, her heart stopped with fear. But then the leopard dragged her gaze up, and her eyes were clear and violet, with no sign of infection, no parasite. Abeke threw her arms around the leopard, pressing her forehead to the Great Beast's muzzle.

"Not to break up a moment," cut in Rollan as he crossed to the window, "but we need to go. Tasha. Ninani."

The girl was on her feet again. In a flash of light, the swan vanished, reappearing as a pattern of wings and the curve of a neck down Tasha's arm.

On the other side of the room, the doors shook.

Someone was trying to get in. Abeke hesitated, glancing back.

"Come on," he said. "Help me get this window open."

"What if it's Bern?" she asked.

Rollan swallowed. "I don't think it's Bern."

"We should make sure," she pressed.

He looked to the doors. "Bern?" he called out. "Is that you?" There was no answer, only a growl, and the shudder of the doors against the chest. Rollan looked back at Abeke. "Not Bern. Come on."

He put his weight behind the massive latch—the wood swollen from the storm—and Abeke and Tasha joined him. Together they got the metal to turn, and the window swung open.

The great hall looked out onto the garden a story below, where the fighting had already spilled into the mazelike greenery. More Greencloaks fought amid the hedges and flower-covered cages, but for every one that won, two seemed to fall, and half of those rose again with vicious black marks across their foreheads. The infection was spreading. There were too many to fight.

There was nothing waiting for them down in the garden except more danger, but the garden was circled by a wall. Its top provided a ledge of ivy-covered stone. On the other side the wall gave way not to the castle, but to the city—and beyond that somewhere, the docks and the ship and the way home.

Only yesterday, Abeke had stared up at the masked stranger in red as he stood on that wall. Now she was climbing through a castle window and lowering herself onto it.

Rollan and Tasha followed. Uraza hesitated, and Abeke held out her arm, inviting the leopard back into her passive state, but Uraza refused and climbed out. Abeke didn't know if the gesture was a sign of protection or a mark of the weakening bond. The leopard padded along the wall with her usual grace, and Abeke was grateful for the gift of her feline balance, while the rest struggled not to fall. The rain was still only a drizzle, but it was enough to slick the tops of the stones on the courtyard wall. Tasha hadn't inherited Ninani's grace and nearly lost her balance twice, Rollan's hand flashing out to steady her before she tumbled over the side.

And then, halfway around the wall, a Greencloak below with a pulsing brand on his forehead saw them and hissed. He began to climb one of the trellises that ran from the garden floor. He moved with the steady fearlessness of the possessed, scaling the lattice and coming toward Abeke, when Essix dove.

The gyrfalcon raked her talons over the man's face. He went over the edge and didn't get back up.

"Good, Essix!" called Rollan shakily as they rounded the edge of the wall. "I love that bird."

One by one, they leaped to the stone street below.

Abeke and Uraza both landed in a crouch. Rollan dropped less gracefully over the edge, but still ended up on his feet. He turned to help Tasha down, but to their surprise, the girl landed and rolled. There was something almost—almost—graceful about it.

"Full of surprises," said Rollan, helping her to her feet.

Castle bells rang out overhead. When Abeke glanced back, craning to see, she thought she caught sight of a Greencloak in one of the higher towers—maybe Bern—summoning the infected, drawing their attention back into the castle and away from the young Greencloaks fleeing its walls.

There was a main road that ran from the castle to the docks, but that one was brimming with smoke and fire and fighting bodies. There were too many falling. Too many spiral marks.

“Rollan,” said Abeke, “can you lead us?”

Rollan flashed an exhausted smirk and tipped his head back for an instant, eyes closed. His lips started to move, and Abeke leaned closer to hear what he was saying—second left, third right, first right, third left—as he tried to memorize the city. When his eyes flashed open again, he nodded, and they set out.

With Rollan’s help—and Essix’s bird’s-eye view—they made it through the city without being seen, let alone overtaken. All around them, swords clashed and arrows flew on the streets. Beastly snarls and shrieks were woven in with the more human shouts. Uraza prowled at Abeke’s side, ears twitching with the sounds of the falling Stetriol.

And then, somewhere between the main square and the docks, the storm truly broke.

Rain pounded the city, weighing down their cloaks and slowing their steps. The leopard growled in displeasure, but Abeke didn’t care about getting wet. They were almost to the docks, and the ship, and safety. Rollan said something, but the downpour swallowed his voice. Abeke could hardly hear over the storm, so she didn’t notice the steps closing in until it was too late.

The back alleys vanished behind them, the roads converged, and the last stretch of space before the docks was laid bare. The docks themselves were eerily empty. A dozen boats ran ashore—a mismatched array of skiffs and galleys and ships, devoid of crews, their ranks now on land, and tearing apart the city.

Abeke, Rollan, and Tasha raced as fast as they could. They were nearly to the mouth of the docks, the Tellun’s Pride II in sight, when the infected finally fell upon them. They spilled like wasps out of the cracks to every side, a voiceless army of empty eyes and marked skin, puppets on someone else’s strings.

Abeke was out of arrows, Rollan out of knives. Tasha’s fists were clenched and shaking from shock.

The infected were a wall, a cage, closing in.

It wasn't fair. The ship was so close. It was right there, beyond a barricade of men and women and beasts.

And then, between a flash of lightning and the echo of thunder, she saw it.

A glimpse of red.

He came back, thought Abeke as the figure in the faceless mask vaulted into the fray.

And this time he wasn't alone.

A sea of crimson followed in his wake. A dozen masked figures, all in red, the others with the faces of dogs and cats, rams and boars and deer. They came with staffs and swords and daggers, and a few even seemed to have claws. They moved with inhuman speed and animal strength, slamming into the wall of enemies, forcing them back and carving a path to the ship.

“Go!” said the boy in the faceless mask.

And they did, lunging through the gap in the infected horde before it could close again. Essix soared ahead, landing on the ship's rail as the others raced down the dock.

“Worthy! Stead! Shadow!” called the stranger. Three of the red cloaks barred the path to the docks, holding the enemies at bay with blade and arrow.

Who were they? How were they so strong? The questions tangled in Abeke's head as they raced to the Tellun's Pride II and freed the ropes from their anchors on the dock. The tethers fell away and the kids clambered up the plank onto the deck. Together, Rollan and Abeke forced the wet canvas of the sails open, and the ship shuddered slightly as the fabric filled with storm wind.

But even as the sails filled, the ship didn't move.

It was caught on something, wedged by some unseen debris.

No, thought Abeke. No, no, no, we're so close.

As if he could read her mind, the figure in the faceless mask peeled away from the fight, leaping over the infected and the barricade of his own, and sprinting down the dock toward the ship.

He took up an oar, braced it against the hull, and pushed with all his strength.

“Please,” called Abeke as the ship groaned and began to move. “Tell me who you are.”

The stranger looked up and met her eyes.

“We are the Redcloaks,” he said.

The ship slid free, jerking away as the wind caught the sails, and the stranger was gone, a blur of crimson back into the fray.

Thank you, she wanted to say, the words now lost with the rest of Stetriol.

The storm battered the water and caught up the ship, dragging it out into the bay.

Rollan leaned into the ship’s wheel while Tasha stood at the side, gripping the rail and watching her home crumble.

Abeke stared, too, feeling numb. What had an hour before been a vibrant city filled with fireworks and celebration was now a city plunged into madness and panic.

All those new buildings, thought Abeke. All those fresh trees.

A cry went up overhead, and she craned her neck to see a bird perched atop the mast. At first she thought it was Essix, but then lightning lit the sky and she saw the parrot’s colorful plumes. Relis!

Abeke was about to call up to the captain’s bird when she heard the creak of racing steps, too late. Essix screeched in warning and a shout went up—Rollan’s—from the other side of the ship, and then something lunged at Abeke, tackling her from behind.

She went down hard on the rain-streaked deck, her head hitting the wood and her vision crackling with light. And then it cleared, and she saw that the thing on top of her wasn’t a thing at all, but a dark-skinned woman with short black hair. Her cloak—once green—was stained by smoke and dirt and someone’s blood.

“Nisha,” gasped Abeke as the woman wrapped her clawlike fingers around Abeke’s throat. “Nisha!”

But it wasn’t Nisha, not anymore.

Her dark eyes were empty, and the spiral twitched on her forehead with her pulse. A guttural sound escaped the woman’s throat, but nothing more. None of the captain’s orders. None of the cheerful banter. Only a hollow rasp. The parrot circled, and cried, unwilling to abandon her fallen captain, unwilling to attack in her stead.

On the deck, Abeke tried to fight Nisha off, but she had no strength left. Her head was pounding from the blow, and she couldn't breathe, let alone scream as a parasite crawled down Nisha's arm toward the hands wrapped around Abeke's throat.

A growl tore free, but it didn't come from her or the infected captain.

Uraza loped across the deck and fell on Nisha, tearing the woman backward by the hood of her cloak. The leopard held fast, shaking her from side to side before throwing her back into the ship's rail, where she lost her balance and went over. Nisha clawed at the air, but it was too late. She plunged down into the churning water, came up, choking and growling, and then went under.

Abeke gasped for air, got to her feet, and found Rollan struggling with another infected, one she recognized with sick despair. Arac. Arac, who had stayed on the ship with his captain, his wife, and fallen alongside her. The black spiral pulsed on his forehead above empty eyes.

"A little help!" choked Rollan as he fought to hold the man back. Tasha came stumbling forward—the swaying ship doing nothing to improve her balance—a bundle of coarse rope gathered in her arms. She tossed the net over the man. He thrashed like a fish, knotted up in the cords, and Rollan shoved him away. The ship rocked and Arac went rolling backward, a tangle of limbs that plunged over the edge and into the churning black water.

For a second, no one moved, every one of them coiled, braced for another attack. But neither Nisha nor Arac climbed back aboard.

At last, Rollan's legs buckled, and he sat down hard on the deck.

Essix landed on the wet boards, missing several feathers.

Tasha stood shivering, her back against a crate.

Abeke leaned hard against Uraza's damp fur.

She scoured the storm-black skies for the parrot, but he was gone.

No one spoke.

They were alive. They had escaped. But it could not be called a victory.

The rain was falling hard now, dousing the many fires, but it wasn't enough to stop the damage or save the people who had fallen. Abeke turned back and watched Stetriol shrink in the distance until nothing was left but smoke and sea.

17

NEWS AT SEA

THE TELLUN'S PRIDE II LOOKED LIKE A GHOST SHIP, DRIFTING through the mist-laced morning.

A vessel fit for a crew of thirty Greencloaks, it now held only three.

Rollan sat on the ship's deck, his back against the wheel, his head bobbing with fatigue. Essix perched on a bundle of rope beside him, preening her wet feathers. Abeke and Tasha were curled up on a tarp nearby. Rollan had found a spare green cloak and wrapped it around Tasha's trembling shoulders, and the two girls had collapsed as soon as the city was out of sight.

Uraza had retreated into her passive state after only an hour at sea, when the sloshing of the ocean and the persistent rain became too much for the leopard, leaving the three humans and Essix drifting toward home. Whether it was the fear of another attack, or the memory of Nisha and Arac and the rest of the crew left in Stetriol, none of them had been willing to go belowdecks. Instead they'd stayed above, braving the last of the weather. They shivered, but not from cold, and even though it went unspoken, Rollan thought they all needed the rain to wash away what had happened that night.

Now, every muscle in his body hurt. Even the ones he didn't know he had. He bore a split lip and more bruises than he could count. He hoped that, wherever Meilin was, she was having an easier time.

He kept a list in his head of all the things he'd tell Meilin when he saw her again. He spent the long hours of the stormy night trying to decide how he would recount Stetriol, not just the battle, but the changes he'd seen in this land at the edge of Erdas: the little girl in the street, the laughter in the air, the mysterious fighters with their red cloaks and their animal masks. He was sure she'd have her own tales to tell.

Rollan yawned. The storm had passed before dawn, leaving only streaks of clouds in its wake, and as the sun finally rose, it turned the sky a bruised purple, then red, before finally showing the first signs of blue. A new day. His muscles begged for sleep, but his mind wouldn't let him rest. Every time he closed his eyes, Rollan saw Stetriol, its shape now lost from sight. He played it all back in his mind—the festival, the bond's strain, the attack—trying to figure out what was wrong.

Because something was wrong. About the night. About the battle.

It had been nagging at him for hours, a question, a name.

Zerif.

Where had the man been during the attack on the city? They'd faced his infected army in Stetriol, but not its leader, and while Rollan shuddered to think about what would have happened to them all if they'd had to face Zerif, too, with his stolen Great Beasts, it just didn't make sense.

Proud Zerif with his broad shoulders and his trimmed beard, his imperious voice and his cruel smile. Zerif was always at the center of his fights, taunting his opponents, calling out orders, relishing his victories.

But he hadn't been in Stetriol, and that made Rollan nervous, because if he wasn't in Stetriol, then where was he?

The bundle of green cloaks shifted on the deck beside him, and Tasha sat up, her white-blond hair, once neatly braided, now a messy, rain-curved nest around her head.

"Morning," said Rollan, trying and failing to keep the exhaustion from his voice.

"Where are we?" she asked, looking around. He realized that this girl had probably never seen the edges of her own city, let alone anything beyond.

"Well," said Rollan with a yawn, "we're somewhere between Stetriol and Greenhaven. I did pay some attention to Nisha when she was at the wheel. We don't have the whales, and the wind's not as strong, but I think I can get us home."

Home. The wrong word to use; he could see it in the pain that flickered across Tasha's face. Abeke stirred beside her, uncurling like a cat.

"What's it like?" asked Tasha, drawing her knees to her chest. "This Greenhaven?"

"It's a castle," said Rollan, "kind of like the one in Stetriol, only not as fancy." He tipped his head back against the crate. "It's more like a well-worn coat. Old stones and lots of green, but full of good people. You'll get to meet them all. And hopefully," he said, voice tightening, "hopefully our friends will be back by the time we arrive. Conor and Meilin. You would like them. But Olvan, he's the guy in charge, and he'll be there to welcome you ..."

He couldn't tell if Tasha was still listening. Her gaze had drifted out to sea. She wasn't looking ahead, toward Greenhaven, but back, toward Stetriol.

"Did this all happen because of me?" she whispered.

"No," said Rollan firmly. "This happened because of Zerif."

Abeke wrapped her arm around Tasha's shoulders. "It will be okay," she said, and they all knew the words weren't enough. But they had to be said. Something had to be said.

Rollan chewed his cheek and then sat forward. "I studied the plans for Stetriol's castle," he offered. "Back in Olvan's rooms, before we left Greenhaven." Tasha looked up at this, but still said nothing. "There are hidden doors," he went on, "pathways in and out of the castle. Ones that lead away from the city, some to the docks, and some farther inland. I'm sure that some people in the east and west wings knew about those doors."

"How can you know?" asked Tasha.

"I can't," he said. "But I can hope."

Rollan looked up, past the sails at the brightening sky, and frowned at the sight of a bird soaring toward them. It wasn't his falcon—Essix was still perched beside him—or one of the gulls he'd seen closer to land, but a raven. Essix saw it, too, head swiveling, and then she was airborne, winging swiftly toward it. Rollan got to his feet, squinting as the bird drew near, and then Essix's screech tore through the air as she charged it, cutting off the raven's path, sharp talons forward. They struggled in midair, a tangle of wing and beak, before Essix sank her talons into the raven's wing.

"Essix!" he cried as the light caught the ribbon on the raven's dark ankle. "It's one of ours!" But it didn't make sense. Olvan used pigeons for messages. Why would he send a raven?

The falcon dove and deposited the raven rather roughly on the ship's deck before swooping to the rail and perching to watch.

The air caught in Rollan's throat.

It wasn't an ordinary raven.

It was Wikerus. His mother's spirit animal. But why would Olvan have used Wikerus? Was his mother at Greenhaven?

The raven struggled upright, fluttering his feathers indignantly as Rollan scooped him up, mumbled an apology, and freed the note from his foot.

Rollan's chest tightened.

The note wasn't from Olvan at all. It wasn't from Greenhaven.

The paper was bound with a yellow ribbon, and yellow meant Lenori at the Evertree. Rollan's chest ached at the thought of news, hope warring with fear. Had something happened? Why wasn't the message coming from Olvan himself? Why was his mother's bird so far from home? Had she gone to the tree? Or had Lenori borrowed the raven to send word? Rollan's fingers shook. Abeke was on her feet and beside him, one hand on his sleeve as he unrolled the slip to reveal the healer's small cursive.

Rollan's heart lurched as he read the words.

There was no mention of Conor, or Takoda, or Meilin.

Only three short lines.

Greenhaven has fallen.

Find Cabaro in Nilo.

Do not return.

18

GREENHAVEN HAS FALLEN

THE GREAT HALL AT GREENHAVEN WAS THICK WITH FEAR and smoke.

The first poured from the people, and the second poured from the hearth, where someone had cast a sack of powder into the fire, hoping to slow the intruders down. It had not worked, of course, and now the Greencloaks stood gathered in the center of the smoke-filled hall, corralled like cattle.

The long wooden table that once ran the length of the hall had been shoved against one wall, clearing the great stone space. Zerif stood atop it, his chest bare beneath his dark cloak, watching as his men, his hands—for that is how he thought of those marked by the seal, an extension of his body, his will—surrounded the men and women of Greenhaven, blocking them in.

Not cattle, he thought.

Mice.

He could smell their defiance, mingled with their fear, and he could not wait to strip them of it. The Wyrms' mark—the raised spiral on his forehead—pulsed faintly, writhing under his skin. With its rhythmic beat, the whispers wound their course through his head, guiding him, not the way they guided his hands, for he was not a mindless slave. No, these whispers were like those of a king to his trusted knight. And soon, Zerif would be much more than that.

Zerif spread his arms wide.

“Greencloaks,” he mused aloud. “The protectors of Erdas. The protectors of the Evertree. The protectors of the sacred bond between a human and a spirit animal. Greencloaks.” He sounded out the word. “Always so eager to be in control. No wonder you fear the loss of it so very much.”

He nodded at two of his hands, and the men dragged a Greencloak forward, one of his eyes swollen shut and blood running from his nose.

It was time to set an example.

Zerif let his arms fall back to his side.

“You all believe there is strength in being chosen,” he continued, stepping down from the table. “But I believe there is strength in choosing. In taking.” With a flick of his wrist, he produced a glass vial. Inside, two parasites squirmed, waiting for their hosts. “Summoning a spirit animal is not the only way to claim one.” His eyes fell on the Greencloak. His collar had been torn open, revealing the tattoo of a bear across his chest.

“Summon your spirit animal,” instructed Zerif.

The Greencloak spit on the hall floor between them. “No.”

Zerif considered the man, the spit, the vial. “Start breaking bones,” he said.

One of Zerif’s hands wrenched the captive’s arm behind his back, and the beginnings of his scream were cut off by Zerif’s command.

“No,” he said. “Not his bones.” He scanned the gathering of Greencloaks, then pointed to another one of their ranks. “Hers.”

Two more of his hands reached for the second Greencloak, a lean older woman. She twisted and fought, her colleagues trying to shield her, but Zerif’s men managed to wrest her from the pack.

“You won’t succeed,” she growled as the infected forced her to her knees. “You never will.”

Zerif ignored her. “Start with her fingers and toes,” he instructed.

“Please,” begged the man.

“Once you run out of bones,” Zerif went on, “kill her.”

“Stop!” said the man.

Zerif turned toward the man again, as if he’d forgotten he was there.

“If you want to spare her,” he said simply, tipping one of the parasites from the vial onto his dagger, the wormy darkness squirming on the blade, “then summon your spirit animal.”

“Don’t, Alon,” demanded the older woman. “It won’t stop him.”

“I said, start breaking bones.”

“Wait!” shouted the man, Alon. A sob escaped his throat, but in a flash of light, the bear was there before him. It reared furiously, teeth bared, but before it could attack, Zerif plunged the dagger with its parasite into the bear’s hide. Not a killing blow, of course; that would be a waste of such a splendid beast. The bear tore backward with a shudder and let out a single, strangled roar before coming down onto all four paws, the spiral pulsing in its forehead.

The man was still sobbing when Zerif took him by the jaw and tipped the second parasite into his mouth. The Greencloak struggled, but Zerif forced his hand over the man’s lips. He felt the man fight the parasite’s hold, watched the darkness creep like a vein up the man’s cheek, around his eyes, before drawing its mark on his forehead.

When Zerif’s hand fell away, the Greencloak knelt calmly, waiting for his orders.

One down.

Dozens to go. He turned back toward the woman, wondering who in the crowd she might care about. How tedious, to have to bend them one will at a time. Surely there was a better way.

He could feel the rising panic of the gathered Greencloaks, the murmurs of those desperate to fight back, and the soft protests of the others, terrified of what would happen if they tried.

“Listen close,” he said, gesturing with his dagger. “You have a choice. Your future is your own to decide. You can die now by my hand, or you can serve at my side. And before you answer, remember that death is a very permanent decision. And you choose not only for yourself, but for your spirit animals. Your friends. Your family. Your Greencloaks. From this moment forward, if any of you refuse my offer, I will kill everyone.”

Silence fell in the hall.

Zerif had learned in his many years that people were always willing to fight for their cause, and often willing to die for it, but rarely willing to condemn others to death.

“Now,” he said with a cold smile, “who’s next?”

They all knelt, in the end.

Most of them no doubt harbored some secret hope that they would be free again one day and seek revenge. Let them dream. Zerif didn’t care why they knelt, or what they thought of as they surrendered, only that they did, swelling his ranks and cutting off the children’s allies. By the time he was done, there would be nowhere to run and no one to run to.

And soon his hands would return from Stetriol bearing three more Great Beasts, and he would be one step closer. The whispers in his head grew louder in agreement, the hush of praise and pride washing over him, urging him on.

The Greencloaks of Greenhaven had all bowed to his will.

All except one.

A woman appeared at his shoulder, the spiral throbbing in her forehead.

“Have you found their leader?” he asked.

The woman tipped her head and pointed at the stairs to the northern turret. Holed up in his own chamber, then. Fear made such cowards of the weak.

As he crossed the courtyard, Zerif saw the bird taking wing from Olvan’s chamber. A messenger.

One of Zerif’s men nocked an arrow, but he held out a hand.

“Let it fly,” he said with a menacing smile as he continued on. Let the old man spread the word while he still could. Greenhaven had fallen, and Zerif was winning.

Tethered in the corner of the courtyard was a moose. Olvan’s spirit animal. An incredible beast. Zerif was planning to keep that one for himself, add it to his personal collection, if there was room. He drew a hand absently over his chest as he reached the tower, tracing the patterns of his collected army. Gerathon. Rumfuss. Halawir. Suka. Arax. Dinesh. Tellun.

He recited the names like an incantation as he climbed the stairs.

Gerathon. Rumfuss. Halawir. Suka. Arax. Dinesh. Tellun.

All his.

Zerif reached the landing outside the old man's chamber. Two of his hands stood guard beside the door, their expressions empty. There had been a time when Zerif wanted passion from his followers. Devotion. Belief. But those things had proved fickle. They could not be trusted. This—servitude—was the true way to power.

Zerif stepped forward and pressed his ear to the wood. Beyond, he could hear Olvan's scrambling steps, the scribble of his pen on parchment.

"A coward's choice, Olvan," said Zerif calmly, "to not stand with your men and women in the great hall. Not very leaderlike at all."

Olvan didn't answer, but Zerif could tell by the hesitation in his steps that he had heard.

"No matter," continued Zerif. "You are not their leader anymore."

He drew another vial from the pocket of his cloak and held it up to the light. Inside, the oily shape of the parasite shifted and slithered like a snail without its shell. From some angles, it looked like smoke, from others, like ink, or grease, or damp earth. It was none of those things.

It was darkness.

A sliver of the Wyrn, a seed set free to find fresh soil and take root.

"You will not win in the end, Zerif," came Olvan's voice through the wood. "I will not see it happen."

Zerif uncorked the vial and knelt, setting the glass on its side at the base of the door.

"It is the end," he said, "and I have already won."

The parasite slid—less like a worm than a snake—from the glass enclosure, vanishing beneath the door. "But you are right about one thing, Olvan. You will not see it happen."

He waited several long moments, and then, beyond the wooden door, at last, the sounds of struggle. A gasp. The crash as a metal pot and a pile of books were swept from a table, and moments later, silence.

Zerif could feel the new link, a pulse in his forehead as Olvan's will became his, and he smiled, knowing that he had claimed the leader of the Greencloaks.

He pressed a hand to the wood. “Open the door,” he commanded.

The spiral twitched in his skin, met by the footsteps across the floor, the sliding of the bolt, the creak of the wood.

Zerif considered the old man, his gray hair, his strong eyes now empty. The great Olvan, nothing but a puppet now.

“Put him with the others,” ordered Zerif. He stepped past the old man and into the chamber, eyes trailing over the wreckage of ink and pots. At the window he looked down on the courtyard, where his hands were gathering, their masses now mixed with figures in forest green. And for every man and woman, a beast.

They watched him, marked faces turned up, and waited for his orders.

Zerif turned away, and instead of going down to meet them, he went up, up a second set of stairs that led from the leader’s chamber onto the battlements above.

From here, he could see the sea that stretched away, toward Stetriol, the hills of Eura, the mountains of Amaya. And even though he could not see the Evertree, he could feel its pull, or rather, he could feel the pull of the thing that lived beneath its roots, waiting to be free.

The wind caught Zerif’s cloak, ran through his dark hair, brushed over the black tattoos that marked his tan skin.

Gerathon. Rumpfuss. Halawir. Suka. Arax. Dinesh. Tellun.

He traced their patterns on his chest, his arms, felt where they wrapped around his ribs and back. Their markings ran together, tail to claw, horn to wing, twisting over him like armor.

The whispers in his head began to coalesce, drawing together from many voices into one. A voice that rumbled and rustled and hissed. A voice that changed its shape as often as the parasite. The Wyrms were getting stronger, and so was Zerif.

And strength, like everything, had two sides.

A body had to be strong enough to face the dangers from without, and the trials from within. Too often people thought only of the outside threats. But what good was a body if it was strong enough to fight off attackers, but not infection?

What was a body, if not a shell, a conduit, meant to harness one’s power, and express one’s will?

Gerathon the Serpent.

Rumfuss the Boar.

Halawir the Eagle.

Suka the Polar Bear.

Arax the Ram.

Dinesh the Elephant.

Tellun the Elk.

Every beast made him stronger. Every beast brought him closer. The markings coiled and curved and charged across his skin. Even in their passive forms, he could feel their strength, their skill, their cunning. The talismans had given him gifts, but none so great as these. The Great Beasts woke to his command and slept against his skin.

He looked down and considered the stretches of unmarked skin.

There was room for more.

Room for Mulop the Octopus, and Cabaro the Lion.

Room for Ninani the Swan, and Kovo the Ape.

Room for Jhi the Panda, and Uraza the Leopard.

Room for Essix the Falcon, and Briggan the Wolf.

The spiral pulsed, and the whispers rose in a chorus, and beneath the roots of the Evertree, the Wurm strained against its prison, longing to be free.

“Soon,” said Zerif to the thing beneath the world. “Soon, I will be strong enough. Soon, I will be ready for you.”

And then, thought Zerif with a wicked smile, I will be unstoppable.

Victoria Schwab is the author of nearly a dozen books for children, teens, and adults, including The Archived and A Darker Shade of Magic. When she's not wandering the Scottish countryside or huddled in a French cafe, she's curled up in her Nashville home with two big dogs and two noisy cats, drinking tea and dreaming up monsters.

You've read the book—now join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Have your ebook ready and enter the code to unlock huge rewards!

N44NH736TG

BOOK THREE:

THE RETURN

Split between two worlds, the team races to stop an ancient evil. Above, Abeke and Rollan infiltrate an impenetrable fortress to rescue the Great Beast within, while below, Meilin and Conor find themselves adrift in a vast underground ocean.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

A sneak peek of the next

Book Three

The Return

By Varian Johnson

ZERIF JAMMED HIS FINGERS INTO A SMALL CREVICE AND climbed onto the narrow, rocky ledge. Ahead, the majestic peaks of the Kenjoba Mountains stretched before him. Below, he could still hear the shouts of the Niloan warriors and Greencloaks in pursuit. They had been chasing him for days. He thought that he would be able to hide in one of the villages in South Nilo, but it had only taken a few days for someone to turn on him and alert the authorities. He bolted as soon as he saw the first Greencloak roaming the small village.

Now that the war was over, Zerif found that very few of his allies remained. Most of the Conquerors had surrendered as soon as they lost control over their spirit animals, thanks to the destruction of the Evertree canceling the effects of Gerathon's Bile. The few warriors that still pledged allegiance to the Reptile King wanted nothing to do with Zerif—and would have probably turned him over to the Greencloaks themselves if they found him.

Not even Zerif's jackal remained. Like the other animals, it had abandoned him as soon as he lost his power to control it.

He was glad that he hadn't bothered to name it.

No matter, he thought. I am Zerif. I will triumph again. As always.

Zerif climbed to another ledge, scraping his hands and face as he pulled himself up. His blue tunic, ripped and withered, flapped against him in the howling winds. The breeze shifted direction, and suddenly the stench of rot filled Zerif's nostrils. He looked around. To his right, on another ledge, large black buzzards picked at the remains of an animal.

Zerif backed up to gain as much running ground as possible. Then he took off, his weakened legs flailing as he leaped through the air. He landed on the ledge and stumbled, almost falling over into the deep, empty valley below. Once he was sure of his footing, he charged toward the birds, driving them away.

Zerif peered at the rotting carcass. There wasn't much left of the wild dog—a few slivers of flesh hung on the otherwise dry bones, and the beast's fur was torn and ripped. Still, he picked up what remained of the animal and flung it over his shoulder. One of the Greencloaks had been traveling with a fox; he hoped the dead animal would help mask his own scent.

After a few more hours of climbing, Zerif stumbled upon a long fissure in the rock face. It took some effort, but he crawled through. Sparse patches of green moss covered the slick, cool walls of the small cavern. The cave was barely big enough for him to sit up in, much less stand. He was shivering so much that his teeth rattled and his fingers were blue, but he didn't dare light a fire.

Anger seethed from him. This was not what was supposed to happen when he allied himself with the Conquerors. They had failed him.

Zerif dropped the carcass beside him and curled himself into a tight ball. He would wait and plan. Eventually, the Greencloaks would abandon their pursuit.

And then, very soon, he would be great and powerful once again.

Two days later, he still hadn't crawled out of the cave.

Every time he considered leaving, he thought he heard the footsteps of Greencloaks or the shouts of Niloan warriors. Perhaps it was just the wind. Or the sound of rocks tumbling down the mountain. Maybe he was hallucinating. He had tried to eat moss to gain strength but had retched the bitter vegetation back up as soon as it hit his stomach.

It was there, lying with his face pressed against the ground, that he first saw the gray worm inching toward him.

It was small and strange-looking. And fluid—almost like a coil of smoke. It moved toward him with an eerie purpose, as if it knew he was there. Zerif had never seen anything like it.

What is this? A leech? A snail?

And is it edible?

Zerif shook his head as he considered what to do. Has the mighty Zerif fallen so low that the idea of eating a worm excites him?

He picked up the worm, hoping to study it. It wriggled up his hand much quicker than he had anticipated. Before he knew it, it was at his elbow. He shook his arm furiously, but the worm remained. It burrowed its way into a deep gash on Zerif's shoulder. Panicked, he hurled himself into the wall, hoping to crush the thing. When that didn't work, he picked up a jagged rock and tried to cut the worm out of his skin.

Nothing seemed to stop the creature. It inched its way beneath his skin, up to his collarbone, then neck, then face. Zerif could feel it writhing. He screamed—both in fear and in pain. He felt it curling at his forehead.

Zerif twisted, clawing at his face, driving deep gouges into his skin.

And then, Zerif fell silent. His legs and arms ceased to move. They no longer belonged to him.

Slowly, he heard ancient whispers echoing in his mind. Soft at first, they intensified, feeding the anger and evil already residing in the depths of his soul.

Power surged inside him. He rose to his feet, no longer hungry or pained. He sensed the voice telling him to leave. To travel north. A being of great power would be there. An eagle.

Halawir.

Suddenly, Zerif found himself surrounded by hundreds of small gray worms. They crept from rocks, seeping out like liquid darkness. Parasites. Allies.

With their help, Zerif would be great once again.

He would be feared and worshipped.

He would rule the world.

Enter your code to
unlock huge rewards:
N44NH736TG

Design your own
spirit animal!

Join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!
Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one
of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SPIRIT ANIMALS

Discover Your Spirit Animal!

Read the Books. Play the Game.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals

SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, AND ASSOCIATED LOGOS ARE TRADEMARKS AND/OR REGISTERED TRADEMARKS OF SCHOLASTIC INC. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

From the publisher of The 39 Clues™ and Spirit Animals™

TOMBQUEST

The tombs are opening . . .

The magic of Egypt has come alive. Mummies are waking. New York is overrun with scorpions. And worst of all, five evil ancients called the Death Walkers have broken free. It's up to one boy to stop them . . . before the Afterlife claims us all.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/TombQuest

TOMBQUEST®

SCHOLASTIC, TOMBQUEST, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

THE STUNNING ADVENTURE
FROM BESTSELLING AUTHOR
RICK RIORDAN

Available in print and
eBook editions

scholastic.com/the39clues

39CLUEse

SCHOLASTIC, THE 39 CLUES, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

INFINITY RING™

FIX THE PAST. SAVE THE FUTURE.

Available in print and eBook
editions.

SCHOLASTIC.COM/INFINITYRING

 SCHOLASTIC

SCHOLASTIC, INFINITY RING, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

IRINGe

Copyright © 2016 by Scholastic Inc.

All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920. SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

The publisher does not have any control over and does not assume any responsibility for author or third-party websites or their content.

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2015950270

ISBN 978-0-545-85442-9

First edition, January 2016

Cover illustration by Angelo Rinaldi

Cover design by Charice Silverman & Rocco Melillo

Art Direction by Keirsten Geise

Metal frame: © caesart/Shutterstock

Wood texture: © CG Textures

e-ISBN 978-0-545-85958-5

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereafter invented, without the express written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

THE NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING SERIES

FALL of the BEASTS

SPIRIT ANIMAS

BOOK 3

THE RETURN

READ
THE BOOK.
UNLOCK
THE GAME.

VARIAN JOHNSON

The world is in peril.

An ancient evil is rising from beneath Erdas, and we need YOU to help stop it.

Claim your spirit animal and join the adventure now:

1. Go to scholastic.com/spiritanimals.
2. Log in to create your character and choose your own spirit animal.
3. Have your book ready and enter the code below to unlock the adventure.

Your code: N7R3DWPTTH

By the Four Fallen,
The Greencloaks

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

I know this is difficult,
but I need you to trust me.
To trust us.

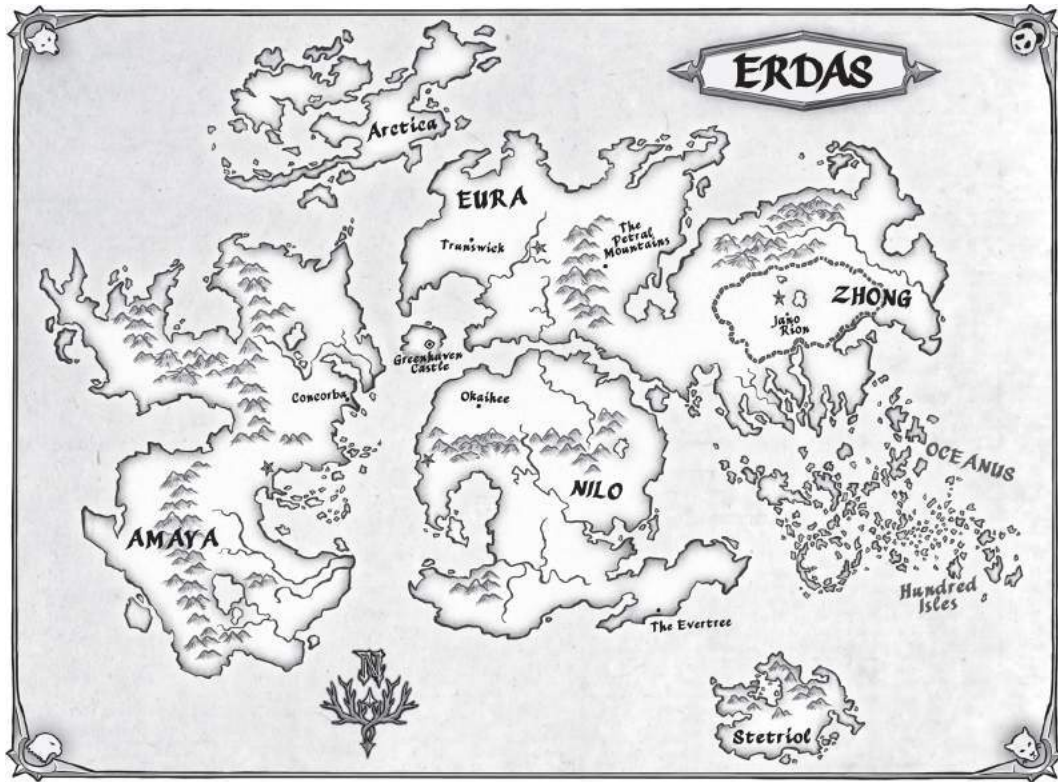

FALL of the BEASTS
SPIRIT
ANIMAS™
THE RETURN

Varian Johnson

SCHOLASTIC INC.

For Savannah, Sydney, Elisabeth, Adrienne, Daniel, Tex, John Marcus, Aidan, and Nadia. And for Theo and Sebastian, two dogs that never met an apple they didn't like.

—V. J.

Contents

Redcloaks Symbol

Greencloak Letter

Quote Page

Title Page

Map

Dedication

1: ZERIF

2: RIPPLES

3: DANTE

4: THE MARKET

5: THE SULFUR SEA

6: SAYYIDAH IOLYA

7: ZOURTZI

8: FAST FRIENDS

9: LAREIMAJA

10: ADRIFT

11: THE MELEAGER

12: CONFRONTING KIRAT

13: ON THE RUN

14: SEA EELS

15: THE ATTACK

16: REDCLOAKS

About the Author

Online Game Code

Sneak Peek

Spirit Animals Game

Copyright

ZERIF

ZERIF JAMMED HIS FINGERS INTO A SMALL CREVICE AND climbed onto the narrow, rocky ledge. Ahead, the majestic peaks of the Kenjoba Mountains stretched before him. Below, he could still hear the shouts of the Niloan warriors and Greencloaks in pursuit. They had been chasing him for days. He thought that he would be able to hide in one of the villages in South Nilo, but it had only taken a few days for someone to turn on him and alert the authorities. He bolted as soon as he saw the first Greencloak roaming the small village.

Now that the war was over, Zerif found that very few of his allies remained. Most of the Conquerors had surrendered as soon as they lost control over their spirit animals, thanks to the destruction of the Evertree canceling the effects of Gerathon's Bile. The few warriors that still pledged allegiance to the Reptile King wanted nothing to do with Zerif—and would have probably turned him over to the Greencloaks themselves if they found him.

Not even Zerif's jackal remained. Like the other animals, it had abandoned him as soon as he lost his power to control it.

He was glad that he hadn't bothered to name it.

No matter, he thought. I am Zerif. I will triumph again. As always.

Zerif climbed to another ledge, scraping his hands and face as he pulled himself up. His blue tunic, ripped and withered, flapped against him in the howling winds. The breeze shifted direction, and suddenly the stench of rot filled Zerif's nostrils. He looked around. To his right, on another ledge, large black buzzards picked at the remains of an animal.

Zerif backed up to gain as much running ground as possible. Then he took off, his weakened legs flailing as he leaped through the air. He landed on the ledge and stumbled, almost falling over into the deep, empty valley below. Once he was sure of his footing, he charged toward the birds, driving them away.

Zerif peered at the rotting carcass. There wasn't much left of the wild dog—a few slivers of flesh hung on the otherwise dry bones, and the beast's fur was torn and ripped. Still, he picked up what remained of the animal and flung it over his shoulder. One of the Greencloaks had been traveling with a fox; he hoped the dead animal would help mask his own scent.

After a few more hours of climbing, Zerif stumbled upon a long fissure in the rock face. It took some effort, but he crawled through. Sparse patches of green moss covered the slick, cool walls of the small cavern. The cave was barely big enough for him to sit up in, much less stand. He was shivering so much that his teeth rattled and his fingers were blue, but he didn't dare light a fire.

Anger seethed from him. This was not what was supposed to happen when he allied himself with the Conquerors. They had failed him.

Zerif dropped the carcass beside him and curled himself into a tight ball. He would wait and plan. Eventually, the Greencloaks would abandon their pursuit.

And then, very soon, he would be great and powerful once again.

Two days later, he still hadn't crawled out of the cave.

Every time he considered leaving, he thought he heard the footsteps of Greencloaks or the shouts of Niloan warriors. Perhaps it was just the wind. Or the sound of rocks tumbling down the mountain. Maybe he was hallucinating. He had tried to eat moss to gain strength but had retched the bitter vegetation back up as soon as it hit his stomach.

It was there, lying with his face pressed against the ground, that he first saw the gray worm inching toward him.

It was small and strange-looking. And fluid—almost like a coil of smoke. It moved toward him with an eerie purpose, as if it knew he was there. Zerif had never seen anything like it.

What is this? A leech? A snail?

And is it edible?

Zerif shook his head as he considered what to do. Has the mighty Zerif fallen so low that the idea of eating a worm excites him?

He picked up the worm, hoping to study it. It wriggled up his hand much quicker than he had anticipated. Before he knew it, it was at his elbow. He shook his arm furiously, but the worm remained. It burrowed its way into a deep gash on Zerif's shoulder. Panicked, he hurled himself into the wall, hoping to crush the thing. When that didn't work, he picked up a jagged rock and tried to cut the worm out of his skin.

Nothing seemed to stop the creature. It inched its way beneath his skin, up to his collarbone, then neck, then face. Zerif could feel it writhing. He screamed—both in fear and in pain. He felt it curling at his forehead.

Zerif twisted, clawing at his face, driving deep gouges into his skin.

And then, Zerif fell silent. His legs and arms ceased to move. They no longer belonged to him.

Slowly, he heard ancient whispers echoing in his mind. Soft at first, they intensified, feeding the anger and evil already residing in the depths of his soul.

Power surged inside him. He rose to his feet, no longer hungry or pained. He sensed the voice telling him to leave. To travel north. A being of great power would be there. An eagle.

Halawir.

Suddenly, Zerif found himself surrounded by hundreds of small gray worms. They crept from rocks, seeping out like liquid darkness. Parasites. Allies.

With their help, Zerif would be great once again.

He would be feared and worshipped.

He would rule the world.

RIPPLES

TAKODA SAT AT THE EDGE OF THE SULFUR SEA. YELLOW, gritty water lapped onto his boots, seeping the worn leather, but he did not want to move inland. This location gave him the best view of the endless sea, the jagged cliffs, and the small strip of beach in between.

Takoda kept searching, hoping to catch a flash of Xanthe's pale skin or white hair. He knew she would find them. She had to. He refused to believe otherwise.

How long had it been since he'd last seen her, when they were running through the Arachane Fields? Hours? Days? Longer? Although he'd only known her for a short amount of time, Takoda had come to enjoy their long talks. She seemed just as fascinated about his life with the monks as he had been about hers belowground. She wasn't just their guide. She was their friend. His friend. And now she was gone. Just like his parents during the war.

Farther along the shoreline, Meilin and Conor hollowed out a large purple gourd. They'd found a field of them while exploring one of the cliff caves. The fruit reeked, almost making Takoda lose the little bit of food remaining in his stomach. But after an initial test, it looked like the hard shell could hold them all for a journey across the sea.

Takoda heard steps behind him but didn't turn around. Even the soft sand of the Sulfur Sea could not mute the heavy, lumbering footsteps of Kovo, the Great Beast. His spirit animal.

A few weeks ago, Takoda wouldn't have needed to rely on footsteps or snorts to know that Kovo was approaching. Before, Kovo's presence hovered just at the edge of his own thoughts. While strange in the beginning, Takoda had come to like the feeling. It reminded him of the quiet, constant buzz of a hummingbird as it neared a flower. But now, as the bonds between spirit animals and their human partners continued to stretch, he could hardly sense the ape anymore.

At first, Takoda thought this would be a blessing. If the bonds broke, perhaps he might finally be rid of Kovo, the cunning, treacherous mastermind responsible for Erdas's two great wars. But now, Takoda couldn't imagine life without him.

In addition, ever since bonding with Kovo, the anger and ache Takoda felt due to the deaths of his parents had dulled. It was there, but subdued. It didn't consume him. He could cope with it. But now, Xanthe's loss had amplified everything.

Kovo dropped a large handful of rockweed beside Takoda. Without Xanthe, Takoda and the others didn't know the difference between vegetation that would sustain them or would make them sick—or worse. Finally, Meilin had discovered a growth of rockweed during one of her explorations. Xanthe had shown them the strange weeds earlier in their journey and taught them how to eat it to draw out its nutrients. Xanthe was still saving them, even now that she was missing.

Kovo pushed Takoda's shoulder, causing the boy to look up and meet his gaze. Takoda was often surprised how gentle the Great Ape's touch could be. Once Kovo was sure he had Takoda's attention, he pinched his fingers and motioned to his mouth.

"Thank you," Takoda said. "But what about Conor and Meilin? Have they eaten?"

Takoda wasn't sure, but it almost looked like Kovo rolled his large red eyes at the mention of their companions.

Kovo and Meilin didn't like each other. They would never admit it, but they were similar in many ways. Both were leaders who *demand*ed information, when asking would have been much simpler.

As far as Conor was concerned, Takoda wondered if Kovo had already given up on him. Conor's sickness worsened as each day passed. The parasite's journey up the boy's arm had slowed, but not stopped. It would soon overtake him.

Takoda picked up some of the rockweed and tried to give it back to the ape. “Kovo, they need to eat, too. And it would probably help them feel more comfortable around you if you were the one that offered it.”

Kovo snorted, then returned back up the beach, knuckling toward the cliffs, his fists pounding into the beach. He kicked up sand as he walked away, covering the abandoned rockweed with grit and grime.

Takoda sighed as he rose to his feet. He shook as much sand from the rockweed as he could, then walked toward Conor and Meilin. He’d tried to help with cleaning the gourd earlier, but Meilin had sent him away when it became clear that Takoda was spending more time watching the sea than scraping away the stinking fruit.

Briggan leaped to his feet and playfully circled Takoda as he approached.

“Sorry, but no meat, I’m afraid,” Takoda said.

Briggan whimpered, then returned to Conor’s side. The wolf had remained close to Conor ever since the fire, even though Briggan appeared to dislike the feel of the black sand on his paws.

“Kovo found some more rockweed,” Takoda said to Conor. Sweat covered Conor’s forehead, and Takoda wondered if it was from the work ... or from the parasite curled at the base of his neck. He understood why Meilin was pushing them so hard. They were running out of time.

“Thanks,” Conor mumbled. “I could use a break.”

“Are you sure it’s real rockweed?” Meilin asked as she continued to scrape away at the gourd. “I wouldn’t put it past Kovo to feed us something poisonous.”

Takoda shook his head. “Will you ever learn to trust him?”

“No,” Meilin said, her voice curt.

Takoda started to laugh, then stopped when he realized that Meilin was serious. He took some of the ropy plant and placed it in his mouth. “It’s rockweed,” he said as he chewed. “That I am positive of.”

“Good. We’ll need to gather as much as we can for the trip.” Meilin dropped the stone that she had been using to clean the gourd and flexed her hands. They were red and raw from all the work. “What do you think, Conor?” she asked. “Good enough?”

After he didn’t answer, Briggan nudged the boy with his nose.

Conor blinked, then looked from the wolf to Meilin. “Sorry. What were you saying?”

“Nothing important,” she said. Meilin closed her eyes, touched the tattoo on the back of her hand, and grimaced. A few long seconds later, Jhi appeared. “Why don’t you get some rest? Jhi will help with the infection while Takoda and I finish gathering the supplies for the trip. We can leave once we return.”

Takoda’s heartbeat sped up. He spat the rockweed from his mouth. “So soon? Maybe you should rest, too. Kovo and I can take the first watch—”

“No way,” Meilin snapped.

“Even if you don’t trust Kovo, you can trust me.” He rustled the green cloak around his shoulders. “Don’t forget, we’re on the same side.”

Jhi, who had been attending to Conor, now paused to watch the exchange between Takoda and Meilin. Her black ears twitched as she sat down, her heavy body settling softly into the sand. She leaned over to give Conor’s skin another lick with her tongue, but her gaze remained on Takoda.

“It’s not that I don’t trust you,” Meilin said. “It’s just that we’re running out of time.” She circled their makeshift boat so she was standing in front of Takoda. “And waiting an extra day won’t bring her back.”

As direct as she was, Meilin might as well have shoved a knife into his heart. “How do you know?” Takoda asked heatedly. He could hear the anger in his voice. The monks would have been displeased. “Xanthe knows these caves better than any of us. She’ll eventually find her way to us.”

“Takoda.” Meilin’s voice was soft, which just made Takoda more upset. “It’s been at least two days. She would have found us by now, if she could.” She looked across the sea. “Official Greencloak or not, you have a duty to save Sadre for Xanthe. It’s what she would want.”

Takoda wondered if there would even be anyone left in Sadre to save. So many had already fallen to the Wyrms and its parasites.

“Help me gather some materials for the trip,” she said, placing her hand on his shoulder. “We still need something to use as a paddle.”

He shook her hand off. “I don’t know if I could ever be an official Greencloak, if it means becoming this cold. I suppose the great Meilin of Zhong must not know how it feels to lose someone important to her.”

Meilin’s eyes widened, then narrowed just as quickly. “Fine. Stay here and feel sorry for yourself. I’ll gather the materials on my own.” She turned and stormed up the beach.

Takoda watched her disappear into a cave. There was a bitter taste in his mouth that had little to do with the rockweed.

He caught sight of Jhi, still staring at him. Their eyes locked, and Takoda felt her enter his mind. Slowly, everything fueling his anger began to fade away. The ache in his stomach from hunger, the sadness from losing Xanthe and his parents, and even the hopelessness of their mission all dulled inside him.

After Takoda’s heart had returned to a normal pace, Jhi released him. Then she looked toward the cave where Meilin had disappeared.

Takoda blew out a deep breath, then circled the gourd and approached Jhi and Conor. The anger that had filled Takoda before was now replaced with shame. “Thank you, Jhi,” he said, kneeling in front of her. “Conor, do you think Jhi wants me to go after Meilin?”

“Better let her calm down first,” Conor said. He gave Jhi a few pats on the head, right between her ears. “But you can follow Meilin if you want,” he said to the panda. Jhi looked at Conor and tilted her head. “It’s okay,” Conor continued. “We both know that there isn’t much more you can do for me, anyways.”

Jhi gave him one last lick across the face, then ambled across the beach toward Meilin. Using the edge of the gourd as a brace, Conor rose from the ground, but he struggled to gain his footing in the sand.

“Let me help,” Takoda said, jumping to his feet. He took Conor’s arm and flung it over his shoulder, and pretended not to notice the parasite wiggling above Conor’s collarbone.

They walked to the base of the cliffs, where they had set up a makeshift camp.

The cliffs stretched so high that it was impossible to tell where they ended and the top of the large cavern began. They had fallen from up above, somewhere, in their rush to escape the burning fields.

The last time Takoda had seen Xanthe, her eyes were wide as she waved at them, trying to warn them to stop. Then, at the last second, she leaped out of the way as he, Conor, and Kovo crashed into Meilin and went tumbling over the ledge.

Once at camp, Conor sank into the sand and unfastened his cloak. “Meilin can be a little stubborn, but she means well. There’s no one else you’d want with you in a battle.”

Briggan lay down beside Conor and placed his muzzle in the boy’s lap.

“I mean, after Briggan, of course.” The animal seemed to grin at this.

“If you thought Meilin was mad a minute ago, you should have seen her when I suggested that you all leave me behind,” Conor continued. “I thought she was going to punch me.”

“I have much to learn about her,” Takoda said. “About people in general. The monks in Nilo were not as ... spirited as she is.”

“I’ll talk to her when she returns. Meilin doesn’t want to admit it, but she needs rest as much as any of us.” Conor sighed. “But she’s right about Xanthe. We can’t wait for her. We have to keep moving.”

Takoda turned toward the sea. If Xanthe was out there, would she see their camp? Or was it too hidden from view?

“Her father,” Conor said.

Takoda snapped back around. “What?”

“Meilin lost her father during the war. The war that Kovo started.” Conor patted Briggan’s flank. “I was there when General Teng died. The Devourer’s crocodile killed him. I watched Meilin as she cried over his body,” Conor said. “Then she stood up, wiped her eyes, and returned to her duty.” Conor lay down beside Briggan. “She knows about loss, Takoda. More than any of us.”

“What happened to her mother?” Takoda asked. Was she a warrior, too? Had she died during the war, like his mother had?

“She died a long time ago. I don’t know the details.” Conor yawned. “Sorry, I just need to rest for a little while. It’s taking everything I have to fight ...”

“To fight the parasite?” Takoda finished.

“No. To fight the Wurm.” Conor glanced at Takoda through lidded eyes. “I can feel it. The closer we get to it, the louder it becomes in my head. Like it’s pulling me to it.”

Takoda watched as Conor closed his eyes. “Does sleep help?” he asked.

“A little,” Conor replied. “For now.”

Takoda wasn’t sure how much time Meilin and Jhi spent exploring the caves. Their time on the beach usually seemed to crawl by at a tortoise’s pace, but with all the chores Takoda had completed while she was gone, he finally stopped counting the seconds.

Takoda didn’t actually notice their return at first. It was Kovo who alerted him to it. The Great Ape sniffed the air, then made a clawing gesture over his face. Cranky. It was what he called Meilin.

A few seconds later, Meilin and her spirit animal came into view. “I didn’t find much,” Meilin said once she reached camp. “A little rockweed, and some vines we can use as a rope.”

Takoda nodded toward the stick in her hand. “And a new quarterstaff?”

She shrugged. “It’s not as long as I’d like, but it will come in handy if we’re attacked from the water.”

“Kovo and I went out as well. We gathered some rockweed, and even found a few of these.” He moved his cloak, showing off two small spheres. “They aren’t as bright as Xanthe’s glowstones, but they will help us to preserve our last wooden torch.” Takoda covered the orbs, then dragged a large mushroom stalk into his lap.

“What is that?” Meilin asked.

“Our oar,” Takoda replied. “I found it while scavenging the shore. Kovo helped me break off the mushroom cap and drag the stalk here. Its fibers are strong—almost like wood—but I think I can sand it down enough to make a handle.”

She was already shaking her head. “It’s much too big to use.”

“For us,” Takoda said. “But not for Kovo.”

Meilin pressed her lips together as she stared at the Great Beast. Kovo stared back, his eyes like red pinholes against his black fur. Meilin brushed her hair from her face. “I suppose we don’t have much choice.”

Takoda rose to his feet and leaned against the half-made paddle. “Sleep. I’ll stand watch while I finish sanding this down.”

“No, I’m—”

“I’m not only suggesting this for your benefit, or because I want to stay on the beach.” Takoda glanced at Conor. Jhi had already returned to the boy’s side. “Conor could use as much rest as we can allow. I promise we’ll leave as soon as you both wake up. I won’t fight you about it.” Takoda waited for Meilin to sit down, then added, “And I’m sorry for what I said earlier. I shouldn’t have been so careless with my words. Anyone who’s faced as many battles as you have was sure to lose loved ones.”

“I guess Conor told you about my father.” She shook her head and gave off a mix of a snort and a huff. “He talks too much.”

“Or perhaps you don’t talk enough.”

Meilin unfastened her cloak and folded it to use as a pillow. “There’s an ancient Zhongese saying: The time of the bamboo flowering comes to us all. It’s the life we lead that matters.”

“The monks have a similar saying,” Takoda said. “It’s not the size of the pebble dropped into a pond that defines our impact on the world—but the ripples that remain in its wake.” He picked up the stone he had been using to shape the oar. “My parents died during the war, too. My mother was a warrior. She died defending Nilo from the Conquerors. My father died while buying me time to escape.”

Meilin blinked at Takoda, her face full of surprise. “I never knew that,” she said softly.

Takoda shrugged. “Perhaps I don’t talk enough, either.”

Meilin glanced at Kovo. The ape had turned from Meilin and was instead looking out at the sea. “How can you stand being bonded to him, knowing what he did? What he was responsible for?”

“When I first called him, I wondered the same thing,” Takoda said. “But the bond actually helps me to deal with the anger. Well, at least it did, until Xanthe ...” He turned from Meilin because he didn’t want her to see that his eyes were beginning to water. “Kovo isn’t evil. Not really. He just sees himself as the best protector of Erdas.”

“By starting two wars?” Meilin mumbled. “Yeah, that’s a great way to show your love for Erdas.”

Takoda finally laughed. “You should get some rest. I’ll see you in a few hours.”

Takoda walked away, dragging the stalk along with him. Kovo followed a few steps behind. Then Takoda stopped halfway across the beach and sank into the sand. He knew his hands would be just as red and raw as Meilin’s once he finished with the oar. It was a small price to pay, given the gravity of their mission.

Kovo gently pushed Takoda’s shoulder, then pointed toward the spot where Takoda usually sat.

Takoda shook his head. “I don’t have time to waste, looking out at the sea. There’s too much to do before Meilin and Conor wake up. And they’re right. There’s nothing more I can do for Xanthe.” He swallowed the lump in his throat. “She was the pebble. We must be the ripples.”

Kovo knelt in front of Takoda. His eyes were so large. So red. But not angry—at least, not right then. Kovo grunted, then closed his hand into a fist and made a small circle motion across his chest.

Takoda sat up. “You’re ... sorry?” he asked. Kovo had never used that word before. “I didn’t think you even liked Xanthe.”

Kovo pointed to Takoda, then placed his two pointer fingers together. Kovo followed this gesture by bringing his open hands down in front of his face.

“Yes, I’m hurt,” Takoda said. “And very sad.” Takoda could hardly believe the conversation that he was having with Kovo. Takoda had always assumed that the ape saw him as a necessary nuisance. Was it possible that Kovo actually cared for him?

He studied Kovo’s face, looking for the arrogance and contempt that usually resided there. Finding none of that, he took his hand, placed it against his lips, then brought it down to his lap. “Thank you, Kovo.” Then he formed a fist and slowly repeated the gesture that the Great Beast had just made. “And ... I’m sorry, too.”

DANTE

STANDING ABOARD THE TELLUN'S PRIDE II, ABEKE'S HEART swelled as she stared at the sand-colored rocky cliffs in the distance. Nilo. Home. Although the busy port towns along the northern border were very different from Okaihee, the idea of being on familiar ground made her ache for the savannah.

Abeke looked up at the sunny sky and floating clouds. The winds blew in their favor, filling the ship's sails and pushing them that much closer to Nilo. The Tellun's Pride II was not meant to be manned by a crew of three, but she, Rollan, and Tasha were making do. She and Rollan had traveled on enough ships in their short time as Greencloaks to understand how to hoist the sails, secure the decks, and steer the ship. They'd found the waters tucked between Nilo and Eura were much calmer than the open sea. Almost pleasant. Out of all of them, it was only Uraza that seemed bothered by the constant, buoyant rhythm of the ship.

Uraza remained still as Abeke reached down and petted her flank. She knew the leopard would rather be in passive state than walking around the boat. The Great Beast had spent the entire trip moaning and growling, her strong legs unsure on the wooden planks. But Abeke couldn't bring herself to call Uraza to her passive state. Abeke could still feel the effects of the last bond-breaking incident. It had felt like her skin—her bones—had been ablaze. And afterward, there was so much silence between her and Uraza. So much distance. She could hardly feel Uraza now. And what if Uraza was in her passive state when the bonds completely severed? What would happen to them both?

Suddenly, Abeke found herself thinking of the Greencloaks who had been infected. What had happened to their spirit animals? And what of Conor and Briggan? Was he still fighting the infection, or had he turned into a mindless slave like so many others?

“I’m sorry,” Abeke said to Uraza. She put her face close to the leopard’s nose. “I know you’re uncomfortable, but I can’t take the chance of losing you permanently.”

Abeke looked up as a shadow approached.

“Am I interrupting something?” Rollan asked with a grin on his face. He’d been trying to keep the mood light, always ready with a new joke or story—most of them dreadfully painful. But today was the first time that she’d seen Tasha smile since their escape from Stetriol. They all deserved a bit of joy before their next mission.

“Don’t be jealous just because Uraza and I are closer than you and Essix,” Abeke said, with a hint of laughter in her voice.

“Hey, Essix and I have a great relationship. She stays out of my way, and I stay out of hers.” Rollan’s chest swelled as he looked up. “She knows where to find me when she needs me.”

“When she needs you?”

“Okay, okay.” Rollan shrugged. “Maybe it’s the other way around.”

“You’re both loners at heart.” Abeke patted Uraza one last time before rising to her feet. “Does that make it ... easier?”

Rollan took a deep breath. Abeke knew she didn’t have to explain what she was trying to ask. “We’ve always been more distant,” he said. “If something happened with the bonds and they actually broke, I think she’d be okay without me.” Rollan flapped his green cloak. “And who’s a loner now?”

Abeke noticed that he didn’t say how he would fare without Essix. “And how is Tasha?”

“Better. She went downstairs to change. I guess she doesn’t want to arrive in Caylif smelling of sardines and cabbage.” Unlike Abeke and Rollan, Tasha had eventually begun sleeping in the captain’s quarters belowdecks. For Abeke, it reminded her too much of Nisha, Arac, and all the other Greencloaks who had been lost to Zerif's parasites on Stetriol.

"I'd hoped that Lenori would send another message, or even Greenhaven," Abeke said. They had only received two missives since departing Stetriol—one telling them that Greenhaven had fallen to Zerif, and the second directing them to a small fishing village west of Caylif. They were to rendezvous with Dante, a former Greencloak.

"According to Essix, we should be arriving soon," Rollan said. "Let's hope this Dante knows where to find Cabaro."

"Do you think we're doing the right thing?" Abeke asked. "Maybe we should go to Greenhaven anyway. Surely there's something we could do to help our friends."

"Believe me, if circumstances were different, I'd easily pick a fight with Zerif over Cabaro," Rollan replied. "But remember how tough he was in Amaya? Now think about how difficult it would be to face him with a castle full of Greencloaks and spirit animals on his side. We don't want to give him the opportunity to steal more Great Beasts."

Abeke nodded. "I suppose you're right." Rollan turned to walk away, but Abeke motioned for him to stop. "Something you just said—you expect a fight with Cabaro? We didn't have any resistance from Tellun or Ninani."

"Tellun and Ninani have always been on the Greencloaks' side," Rollan said. "Cabaro hates humans."

"Maybe he has no choice but to accept humans, now that he's bonded with one."

Rollan's hands tightened around his cloak. "Or maybe that'll give him reason to hate us more."

A few hours later, the Tellun's Pride II drew into a small natural bay. Abeke, Rollan, and Tasha worked together to lower the sails and drop the anchor in the calm, deep blue waters. They thought it would be safer to take a smaller skiff in than to try to navigate the large ship farther into the harbor.

They gathered on the deck and looked out at the small village. It was silent—Abeke couldn't even hear the calls of wild animals. A few withered and fragile piers jutted from the mainland out into the water. A lone man stood on one of the docks, but he was too far away for Abeke to determine much about him. All Abeke could tell was that he wasn't wearing a cloak.

"Is that the person we're looking for?" Tasha asked. "Do you want me to climb to the crow's nest to get a better look?"

"No need," Rollan said. A few seconds later, his eyes went glassy. Up above, Essix soared past, toward the man on the pier.

"Do you think I'll be able to do that with Ninani one day?" Tasha asked. "See through her eyes like Rollan does with Essix?"

It was when Tasha began asking questions that Abeke missed the adult Greencloaks the most. Tasha looked to Abeke and Rollan as if they were experts on all things related to spirit animals. The truth was, both she and Rollan still had much to learn about their own bonds. But Abeke also knew that Tasha needed to believe someone was in charge, even though Abeke wasn't exactly sure that she and Rollan really knew what they were doing.

"Each spirit animal brings different gifts, as I'm sure you've already discovered," Abeke finally said. "I'd bet that you move much faster with her helping you. Your reflexes are also sharper, correct?"

"Ninani makes me much more graceful—I'm all left feet without her."

"All left feet?" Abeke repeated.

"Just slang from back home," Tasha said. "It means that I'm clumsy." She pointed to her boots, which she'd found in an abandoned trunk belowdecks. "You know, like I have two left feet instead of a left and a right one."

Abeke grinned. "Ninani's grace will certainly help with that. And there could be even more gifts that you'll discover in time. The Greencloaks will help teach you."

If any Greencloaks remain, Abeke thought.

Rollan shook his head as his eyes returned to normal. He leaned against the rail and took in a few deep breaths. Even though he didn't want to admit it to her, Abeke could tell that the loosening bonds between humans and their spirit animals were affecting Rollan, too. “That could be Dante,” he said after he caught his breath. “It’s hard to tell. I didn’t see any spirit animal beside him, but it could just be in passive state.”

“I guess there’s only one way to find out,” Abeke said.

Rollan slowly climbed into the docking boat, then Tasha. Abeke started to climb in as well, until she noticed her spirit animal hanging back.

“Uraza,” Abeke called out. “Please.”

“You know, maybe it makes sense for someone to stay here and guard the ship,” Rollan said. “Tasha and I can check things out at the pier.”

Abeke shook her head. “Without knowing what lies ahead, we’re better off staying together.” She closed her eyes, cleared her mind, then called Uraza to her. A second later, the Great Beast disappeared with a hot flash onto a small black mark below her elbow.

The trip to the harbor took less time than Abeke would have liked. While Rollan and Tasha rowed, she held her bow low, the arrow already nocked. With everything else happening in Erdas, they couldn’t take any chances.

The man walked to the end of the pier as they approached. Rollan and Tasha stopped rowing. “Identify yourself,” Abeke called out. She raised her bow, just enough to make sure he saw the arrow.

The man was tall, with broad shoulders, tanned skin, and high cheekbones. His face was clean-shaven, and his long hair was pulled into a thick ponytail. Abeke couldn’t tell where he was from by looking at him, but she was sure that he wasn’t a native Niloan.

“I am Dante,” he said, offering a small bow. “At your service. And you are Abeke and Rollan. And your friend ... are you the one who called Ninani?”

“If you’re really Dante, you would be wearing your cloak.” Rollan placed his hand on the hilt of the knife tucked into his waistband. “Try again.”

“Ah, yes, you are most definitely Rollan. Lenori has spoken much of you.” He pulled a small, rolled note from his hand. “You probably have no idea of how proud you made all of Amaya during the war. You and Essix are national heroes.”

As if on cue, Essix swooped down from the sky and landed on Dante’s shoulder. Dante stretched out his hand, offering up the note to the gyrfalcon. Essix gingerly picked up the parchment with her beak, then flew to Rollan.

Rollan unfurled the note and read it, while Essix rested on his shoulder. “It looks like Lenori’s handwriting,” he whispered. “And clearly Essix trusts him.”

Dante opened his backpack and pulled out a faded green cloak. “Permission to come aboard?”

There was one thing for certain—Dante knew his way around a ship. He worked twice as fast as Abeke, Rollan, and Tasha combined. And when Tasha knocked over a large barrel, almost smashing his foot, he didn’t yell at her. Instead, he calmly showed her a better knot to use to tie down the cargo.

After they had pulled out of the bay, they all met at the ship’s wheel. “We may be cutting it close, but I think we can make it to Caylif before dusk,” Dante said.

“And this is where we’ll find Cabaro?” Tasha asked.

Dante nodded. “Cabaro was summoned by a boy named Kirat. His father, Faisel, is one of the wealthiest merchants in Nilo. Some estimate that he controls a third of the trade routes between Northern Nilo and Zhong. Honestly, I’m surprised that word of Cabaro’s summoning hadn’t reached Stetriol. Faisel has been telling everyone about the lion and has even planned a feast in honor of Cabaro and his son.”

Abeke thought back to their time in Stetriol—how Zerif’s forces had arrived as word of Ninani’s appearance spread. If word of Cabaro had spread similarly ...

“We have to move quickly,” she said. “We must contact Faisel at once.”

“I’ve tried,” Dante said. “Once this latest crisis began, Lenori coaxed me out of retirement. I was on my way to Greenhaven when she sent word asking me to stop here and warn Faisel.” He rubbed his hands together. “Faisel hasn’t been willing to meet with me. He feels that he has no need for our help.”

“Yeah, well, he hasn’t seen what Zerif can do,” Rollan said.

“And Zerif hasn’t seen Zourtzi,” Dante countered.

Tasha frowned. “What’s Zourtzi?”

Dante smiled. “You will see it soon enough for yourself. It’s just around the bend.”

Tasha turned to Dante. “And what’s your spirit animal?” she asked.

As Dante frowned, Tasha brought her hand to her mouth. “I’m sorry. Should I not have asked?”

“It’s okay,” Dante said. He raised his sleeve and rubbed a pale spot on his wrist. “Aputin was my spirit animal. The finest mountain goat ever seen.” He rolled his sleeve back down. “He was killed during the war. It was like losing an arm. No, it was worse.”

No one spoke for a few seconds. Finally, Tasha said, “I’m sorry.”

“Many of us paid a large price during the war.” He rearranged his cloak on his shoulders. “But whether I have Aputin by my side or not, I will always be a Greencloak.”

“What does it mean?” Abeke asked. “Aputin?”

“It’s a type of rock, isn’t it?” Rollan asked.

“Not just any rock,” Dante said. “It’s one of the hardest minerals found in Amaya. Very difficult to cut or shape.” Dante smiled. “It seemed like a fitting name for a spirit animal that liked to head-butt me when we disagreed.” Dante looked at the others. “I guess you all didn’t have to worry about naming your partners.”

Abeke rubbed the mark on her arm. While she was honored to have called forth Uraza, she sometimes wondered what she would have named her spirit animal if she had bonded with another creature instead of one of the Great Beasts. She knew that Tarik, their former guardian, had named his spirit animal Lumeo, which meant “light.” It fit the otter’s playful, clownish nature. And Hano, a boy from her village, had named his anteater Digger because of the way the animal burrowed into the ground with its long snout and sharp claws. Would Abeke have picked a name based on Uraza's nature? Or would she have named the animal after her mother, like she had sometimes dreamed?

A few minutes later, a large stone fortress came into view. Abeke had never seen a structure so tall—it was three times the size of Greenhaven. Large bronze cannons stood at the top of every tower. Even from far away, Abeke could see the sentries at each of the battlements.

“That, my young friends, is Zourtzi. It has been in Faisel's family for generations. The rumor is that its walls have never been breached, even during both of the Devourer wars.” Dante pointed toward the castle. “Save for a small man-made channel, the island fortress is surrounded by a network of shallow, rocky reefs. It makes a water approach nearly impossible, and it also pushes most ships' cannons out of range.”

“What is it made of?” Tasha asked. “The walls look so ... smooth.”

“It's built from solid stone imported from Zhong,” Dante said. “Once the outer wall was completed, each brick was sanded down to make it flush with the mortar. There is no way any animal could scale that wall, much less a human.”

“Unnavigable water and unclimbable walls,” Rollan muttered. “I'm guessing this Faisel guy isn't too keen on people popping in to say hello.”

“I've tried to contact Faisel every way I know how. But perhaps he will listen to the Heroes of Erdas,” Dante said.

Out of the corner of her eye, Abeke saw Rollan frown. She knew how much he hated being called a hero. “Perhaps we could—what's that sound?”

They all looked around as a whistle grew louder. Abeke wasn't sure, but it seemed to be coming from above.

“Take cover!” Dante yelled. “We're under attack!”

Just then, a cannonball splashed into the water, drenching the deck with seawater.

Abeke scrambled to the bridge and jerked the wheel, steering the ship away from the fortress. “Everyone okay?” she asked.

Tasha looked even paler than usual as she huddled against the rail, but she nodded. “I'm fine,” she said, in rushed, ragged breaths. Her braid had come undone when she'd ducked, causing her fine, blond hair to spill across her face.

Rollan pushed himself to his feet and winced as he rubbed his shoulder. "I thought you said that it was too far for cannons to fire?" he mumbled.

"Too far for a ship's cannons," Dante said. "Not Zourtzi's. The additional height of the fortress increases their cannons' range."

"So now what?" Rollan asked. "We're sitting ducks out here."

Abeke shook her head. "The cannonball landed too far away. I don't think they were actually trying to attack us."

"I agree," Dante said. He shielded his eyes from the sun and gazed at the fortress. "It was a warning shot."

Rollan snorted. "Message received, loud and clear."

The sun was just beginning to set as the Tellun's Pride II reached Caylif. Hints of orange, red, and yellow danced along the waterline, reminding Abeke yet again of the plains surrounding her village.

Abeke watched as Dante steered the large vessel into the bay. It was nothing like the fishing village where they had found him—or anywhere else she had been for that matter. Even as evening approached, the docks swarmed with deckhands and merchants. Dante had asked Abeke to drop all the sails except one, using it to slowly maneuver the ship through the docks. He motioned for her to drop the last sail as Rollan tossed a set of ropes to a group of men on the pier. They slowly winched the ship into place, then tied it off on a large wooden bollard.

"Okay, so I have to admit, he has his perks," Rollan said as Dante tossed the men on the pier a few coins. "I don't think we would have been able to get the ship into the dock without him."

"It is good to have someone else around," Abeke said. "Someone older."

"Yeah. It's like it doesn't feel so hard—so impossible—with Dante here. It's almost like ..." Rollan cleared his throat. "It's almost like it was when Tarik traveled with us."

Abeke let the silence linger between them. Much time had passed since their guardian had fallen in battle, but for Rollan it was a wound that still ran deep.

“Are we going into town?” Tasha asked as she exited the ship’s galley. It had been her turn to prepare the meal—not that there was much variety to choose from. They had eaten sardines and pickled cabbage every day since escaping from Stetriol. It was the only food remaining on the ship.

“It would be best to wait until tomorrow,” Dante answered as he joined them. “The market will be closing soon. And the man we need to see probably isn’t there at this hour, anyway.” Then Dante sniffed the air. “Are those pickled cabbages?”

Tasha nodded. “It’s all we have left. That, and sardines.”

“And how are you preparing them?” he asked, drawing in another deep breath. “Are you boiling them?”

“How else are you supposed to cook them?” Tasha asked.

Dante turned to Rollan for help. “Seriously, is that how you all prepare your food?”

Rollan shrugged. “I just eat them raw. Saves time.”

“Tasha, go through my bag and pull out the small package of red and black seasoning.” Dante shook his head and rolled up his sleeves. “Boiled cabbage. What are you all, savages?”

Tasha retrieved the spices, then Dante entered the galley.

When he returned an hour later, he carried a large, heaping plate of food. “I call it Dante’s Stir-Fried Cabbage Surprise.” He handed the plate to Rollan. “Just a little something I picked up from a cook while I was stationed at the Mire. Enjoy.”

“You were at the Mire? In Zhong?” Abeke asked. She had overheard others speaking of the Mire, a Greencloak prison deep in the jungle in Southern Zhong. It was reserved for the most dangerous criminals.

“Yeah. I served as a guard there. Twice.” A small smile spread across Dante’s lips as he cracked his knuckles. “Aputin and I were very good at ... keeping prisoners in line.”

Abeke shuddered as she took the plate from Rollan. As nice as Dante was, there was something dark just below the surface. While Tarik had often wanted to avoid conflict, she got the sense that Dante enjoyed battle.

Tasha scooped some of the food into a bowl next. “Where are the sardines?” she asked.

“They’re in there,” Dante said. “I just chopped them up. They’re less salty that way.”

Rollan had already shoveled three spoonfuls of food into his mouth. “This is amazing!”

“I wish I could take credit, but it’s all in the spices,” Dante said.

“And do you always carry a package of spices with you?” Abeke asked. “Did you pick that up while in the Mire as well?”

Dante shook his head. “Those aren’t Zhongese spices. They’re native to my home in Amaya. Sanabajari.”

Rollan glanced at Abeke. “Why does that name sound familiar?”

“You may know it by a different name,” Dante said, smiling. “Boulder City.”

Rollan’s eyes lit up. “Do you know Monte? Is he still running his trading post?”

Abeke noticed the confusion on Tasha’s face. “Monte is an old friend,” Abeke said. “We met him during one of our first battles.” Abeke decided not to tell Tasha that she had actually been fighting on the enemies’ side back then. But at the time, Abeke hadn’t known that Shane and Zerif were evil. She hadn’t discovered that until Zerif plunged his knife into a defenseless Greencloak’s back.

“No, Monte’s given up the trading post,” Dante said. “I was tending it for him, until Lenori convinced me to come back.” Dante spooned some food into his mouth. “I had been looking forward to seeing Monte again. It’s been too long. His regulars are starting to miss him.”

“Where is he now?” Tasha asked. “Off on another mission?”

Dante’s face soured. “No. He was in Greenhaven, along with the others.”

Tasha took a deep breath. “I’m sorry—”

“There’s nothing to apologize for,” Dante said. “There is never any harm in asking a question. You just have to be prepared to hear the answer.”

Silence followed, while Tasha took this in. Her eyes fell to her hands. Finally, she rose from the deck. “In that case, I think I’ve asked enough questions for tonight,” she said with a weak smile. “I’ll see you all tomorrow morning.”

Abeke watched her disappear belowdecks. “She is so green. I hope she’s ready for what lies ahead.”

“Were any of us really ready when we first received the call? When we first fastened the cloak around our shoulders?” Dante scooped more food into his bowl. “If she’s going to fight among the Greencloaks, she must learn that this life isn’t for the faint of heart. And believe me, it’s best for her to learn this sooner rather than later.”

THE MARKET

ROLLAN WALKED A FEW STEPS AHEAD OF DANTE, ABEKE, and Tasha as they neared the large market in the center of town. He hadn't expected to feel so apprehensive. He had grown up in a large city just like Caylif—out of all of them, he should have felt the most at ease. Yet even as the familiar sounds of the market began to fill his ears—women selling handmade pots, boys hawking fresh fruit, and men counting gold coins—Rollan still felt on edge.

He looked overhead as Essix soared past. She had come to the ship as soon as they docked yesterday evening and had remained through the entire night. He was glad to have her nearby. Unlike the others, the gyrfalcon understood exactly what lay ahead.

Abeke hadn't been with him and Conor when they had first faced Cabaro, here in Nilo. The Great Beast hadn't fought them initially, instead allowing his lionesses to do his dirty work. When Cabaro finally struck, he was ferocious, almost crushing Briggan during the fight. But when the Conquerors arrived to take his talisman, Cabaro did what he did best. He retreated.

It was during his escape that Cabaro had almost trampled Rollan. Rollan could still remember Cabaro's foot coming toward him—his claws were as large as Rollan's body. The Great Lion would have crushed him if Tarik hadn't pulled him out of the way.

Tarik ...

“What's wrong, Rollan?” Abeke asked.

Rollan blinked. He hadn't even heard Abeke creep up behind him. "What makes you think something's wrong?" he asked.

"You haven't told a joke since we left the ship," she replied. "And you hardly ate your breakfast."

"First of all, I wouldn't call leftover cabbage a proper breakfast," he said. "And don't worry about the jokes. I'm saving them all up for Faisel. Maybe a little humor and charm is all we need to convince him to let us steal his prized son away."

"I wouldn't call him prized," Abeke said. "According to Dante, Faisel and his son have a difficult relationship." She sighed. "Perhaps that's one thing he and I will have in common." Then she patted Rollan's shoulder. "I know you're worried about Cabaro joining us because we're humans. But surely even he will understand the importance of what we're trying to do. His fate is tied to Erdas, just as ours is."

Rollan shrugged. He wouldn't admit it to Abeke—he could hardly admit it to himself—but that wasn't the only reason he was feeling squeamish. The fact that they were here to rescue the Great Lion was drumming up some not-so-great memories.

Rollan touched his cloak. Tarik's cloak. Abeke and Faisel's son had difficult relationships with their fathers, but at least they had fathers. Tarik was the closest person to a father he'd ever had. And thanks to the cowardly Cabaro—

No. Rollan couldn't let himself think about Tarik now. Too much was at stake. He had to remain sharp. Focused. Tarik would have told him just as much if he had been there.

Rollan paused at the edge of the market and waited for Dante and Tasha to catch up. The market looked even larger than the main market in his hometown of Concorba. Large multicolored tents billowed in the breeze, and white smoke from the cooking pits filled the air. People pushed and jostled each other as they made their way from merchant to merchant. He could hear at least three different languages, if not more.

He grinned. This was a thief's paradise.

Not that he stole things anymore, but a boy could dream.

Finally, Dante and Tasha joined them. Tasha was the slowest of the group, but Rollan hadn't once heard Dante chastise her for it. She was carrying a wooden baton that she had found in the armory, but the weapon looked out of place in her hands.

“So now what?” Rollan asked. “Should we just walk around until we find his shop?”

“And how long will that take?” Abeke asked. “My entire village could fit inside this market.”

Rollan spotted a small kid huddled in the corner, chewing on a thick slice of bread. The boy’s clothes were much too big for him, and his face was streaked with red dirt. “Hey, kid,” he called. Once the boy looked up, Rollan pulled a small coin from his pocket. The boy perked up and ran over to them.

Rollan dropped the coin into the boy’s hand. “We’re looking for a shop belonging to a merchant named Faisel.”

After staring at the coin for a few seconds, the boy looked at Rollan. “Which shop? Faisel owns a silk shop, a carpet store, a cart for selling spices, a—”

“What about Otto?” Dante asked. “The large, round man with a gray beard. Where can we find him?”

“Hold on. Let me check.” The boy ran to a group of kids huddled around a well. After speaking in whispered tones, he returned to Rollan. “We think he’s at the silk shop today.” The boy pocketed the coin and pointed. “It’s on the eastern side of the market.”

Rollan flashed another coin. “How about you lead us there, and you can add this to your collection?”

The boy nodded, and the others fell into step behind him.

“Who is Otto?” Tasha asked.

“He’s one of Faisel’s business partners,” Dante said. “If we impress him enough—and pay him enough—he should be able to grant us an audience with Faisel. But I should warn you, Otto and I have spoken of this before. It didn’t end well—for him.”

As the group made their way through the market, Rollan noticed a lot of people were staring at them. “Should we take off our cloaks?” he whispered. “We’re drawing a lot of attention to ourselves.”

“No, that’s exactly what we want,” Dante said. “The more important we seem, the more we will impress Otto.” He glanced at Rollan. “When the time comes, we will need Essix.”

Rollan nodded. “She’ll be there.”

At least Rollan hoped she’d be there. He and Essix had always been comfortable working independently of each other, going long stretches of time without direct contact, but even they weren’t immune to the effects of the bond loosening. It took so much effort for Rollan to see through her eyes, and he could only do it in spurts. Almost every time afterward, he felt sick to his stomach, as if he’d drunk a bowl of spoiled milk.

Even now, the bond between them was so faint. He knew that Essix was somewhere above, but that was all he knew. She could have been ten paces away or a hundred. Or a thousand. He could no longer tell the difference.

They had to stop Zerif and fix the Evertree. Rollan had already lost so many others. He couldn’t lose Essix, too.

Rollan flipped the coin to the boy when they reached the shop. “Be sure to share that with your friends,” Rollan said. He hoped those coins would buy a few loaves of bread and blocks of cheese.

The silk shop, with its gold trim and large, flowing flags, was clearly designed to draw attention to itself. Rollan wouldn’t have dared to even approach a store like this when he was living on the street. He would have been thrown in jail or sent to an orphanage for just thinking about entering such a fine shop.

And even though he could now afford to shop here, he still didn’t feel as if he belonged. Maybe he never would.

Dante entered the shop first, ringing a small bell hanging in the doorway. Rollan was the last to enter. As he shut the door behind him, the noises and smells of the market faded away.

“Beautiful,” Tasha said as she ran her hands along a row of colored silk ribbons.

Rollan picked up a dark red silk scarf. Something about it reminded him of Meilin. He hoped she was safe, wherever she was. Lenori hadn’t sent any additional word of her or Conor. Rollan had been telling himself that no news was good news.

“Can I help you?” a young man asked, rushing up to the group. His black hair was slicked back, and his skin looked much too oily, considering the dry atmosphere. “Ah, Greencloaks,” he said. “What can I do for such fine warriors? I’d be happy to show you our new shipment of silks and linens. Or maybe our handmade tunics.”

Dante waved him off. “We’re here to see Otto.”

The young man faltered. “Mzee Otto is extremely busy. Are you sure there’s not something I could help you with?”

Dante placed his hand on the hilt of his sword. “Don’t make me repeat myself.”

The young man nodded, then disappeared in the rear of the store. Abeke shook her head. “Was there not another way? I don’t like intimidating people with violence.”

“Says the girl who met me with a bow in her hand,” Dante replied.

A few minutes later, a large, round man approached the group. Three men followed him, each dressed in black. A small snake had curled itself around one of the men’s shoulders. A monkey hung around the neck of the other. The third didn’t have a spirit animal in sight, but that didn’t mean he wasn’t one of the Marked.

“Dante, you’ve returned,” the man said. “And you’ve brought reinforcements.” He nodded toward the men behind him. “So did I.”

Dante opened his hands, signaling for peace. “Otto, I know our last meeting didn’t end on the best terms, but I wanted to give you another chance to arrange an audience with Faisel. I assure you, he would look at you most favorably.”

“Faisel has no need for a has-been Greencloak and a bunch of kids.”

If Dante was offended, he didn’t show it. “These are not any ordinary children, Otto.” He nodded toward Abeke. “If you don’t mind ...”

Abeke closed her eyes, scrunched her face, and finally Uraza appeared with a flash of light. Then Ninani.

Rollan cleared his throat. Anytime, Essix.

Finally, there was a shriek from an open window. Essix looked at Rollan, as if she were saying, Told you I’d be here.

“Don’t you think it would be fitting for Cabaro to be reunited with the other Great Beasts?” Dante offered.

“They don’t look very great to me,” Otto said.

Rollan crossed his arms. “Bet you wouldn’t say something like that to Cabaro.”

Otto scowled at Rollan. “Boy, don’t forget whose shop you’re in!”

“Faisel’s shop. Not yours,” Dante said. “Exclude me if you must—but let my young friends enter Zourtzi and pay their respects to Faisel, Kirat, and Cabaro.”

Rollan glanced at Abeke and Uraza out of the corner of his eye. They both looked restless. He pulled the bag of coins from his pocket. It was the last of their money, but getting them into Zourtzi would be worth the cost. “Listen to Dante. You could also profit greatly.”

“How much is in that bag, boy?”

Rollan could hear the greed seeping from Otto’s voice. “Take us to Faisel, and you can find out for yourself,” Rollan replied.

“Do you think I need your coins?” Then Otto smirked. “Actually, I will take the money. Your presence alone has probably cost me an hour’s worth of sales. Guards.”

Dante drew his sword as the guard with the snake advanced. Dante’s straight blade looked out of place against the curved swords of northern Nilo. “Otto, we do not want to fight,” he said. “But if we can’t pay you enough to take us to Faisel, perhaps we can persuade you in another way.”

Rollan pulled out his dagger. “Tasha, get behind me,” he whispered.

Tasha fiercely shook her head as she tightened her grip on her baton. “If you fight, then I will fight.”

Great, Rollan thought. That sounded like something Meilin would say. Unfortunately, he knew Tasha didn’t have the skills to back up her words.

Abeke had already pulled an arrow from her quiver, though she’d yet to draw her bow. “You all have spirit animals,” she said to the men. “You’ve felt your bonds straining over the past few days, yes? Something is happening to the connection between humans and spirit animals. That’s why we must find Cabaro. We need his help if we’re going to stop this evil from destroying the world.”

While two of the guards paused at this, the one with the snake charged forward. Dante blocked him, then kicked him in the chest. The man flew backward onto Otto. Even without the help of his spirit animal, Dante was still a gifted fighter.

“Watch out for the snake!” Abeke yelled. “It’s on your arm.”

Dante yelped as the snake’s fangs pierced his sleeve. He shook it off, then kicked the snake across the room, where it disappeared into a pile of silk sheets.

“Dante, are you all right?” Rollan yelled, his voice almost in a scream. As Dante inspected his arm, Rollan replayed Tarik being struck by Gerathon the Serpent.

“Its fangs barely grazed my arm. I’ll be fine,” Dante said as he backed up beside Abeke. The two remaining guards were slowly approaching. The last guard had called his spirit animal, a lynx, which was already lunging at Uraza. “Look alive, Greencloaks!” Dante yelled.

Rollan didn’t have much time to watch Dante and Abeke, as the man with the monkey had almost reached him and Tasha. The guard pulled an ax from his side and swung. Rollan ducked, easily dodging the ax’s blade, then swiped his knife at the guard’s stomach. Rollan missed, catching only the fabric of the guard’s shirt. Before he could swing again, the guard’s monkey leaped onto his face, shrieking and clawing with its hands.

Rollan dropped his dagger and tried to pry the animal off before it scratched his eyes out. Unable to remove it, he fell to the floor and began to roll around.

“Essix!” Rollan yelled.

Rollan sensed Essix taking flight. A few seconds later, the gyrfalcon had pulled the monkey from his neck and face. Then Essix flew off out the window with the monkey still in her talons.

“Bhouhan!” the man yelled as Essix and the monkey disappeared. Then the guard turned back to Tasha and Rollan with renewed determination in his eyes. Seeing Rollan still on the ground, he raised his ax high above his head. He quickly brought it down—and was blocked by Tasha’s baton. Spinning in place, she forced the attacker back and placed herself in front of Rollan. “Are you okay?” she asked over her shoulder.

“I’m good. Thanks!” As Rollan got to his feet, he saw Ninani standing in the corner, her white wings splayed open. She must have been augmenting Tasha’s grace. There was no way that Tasha could fight the guard on her own.

Rollan picked up his dagger. His skin burned where the monkey had scratched him. “Ready?” he called. “Together!”

He and Tasha ran toward the man at the same time. The guard swung again, but Tasha easily blocked his attack, allowing Rollan to bury his knife into the man’s shoulder. The man screamed in pain and dropped his ax. He looked at the blood pouring from the wound and quickly retreated.

Rollan turned toward Abeke and was happy to see that she was holding the other guards at bay with her bow and arrow. One of their attackers had an arrow in his leg, and the other held his shoulder as if it were broken.

“Is everyone all right?” Abeke asked, not taking her eyes off the guards.

“Nothing a cold compress and bandage can’t fix,” Rollan said, wiping the blood away from his face. “Tasha?”

The girl shook her head as she stared at the end of the baton. There were nicks in the wood where it had blocked the ax blade. “I can’t believe I just did all of that. I’ve never even used a weapon like this until today.”

“Well, I’m glad you’re a quick study,” Rollan said. “We should also thank Ninani. I’m sure she had a lot to do with your newfound abilities.”

Ninani waddled over to Tasha and rubbed the girl’s leg with the crown of her head. “Will I ever get used to it? All this fighting?”

Rollan sighed. “Yes. But I suppose that isn’t a good thing.”

Abeke motioned for Rollan to join her. “I’ll talk to Tasha and make sure she’s okay,” Abeke whispered to him. “Maybe you should check on Dante.”

Rollan turned to see Dante standing over Otto, his sword at the large man’s chin.

“Get up,” Dante demanded.

“You idiot, you sliced my leg!” Otto wailed from his fetal position on the floor.

“At least I didn’t break it.” Dante poked Otto with his sword. “Now get up. You’re taking us to see Faisel, even if I have to carry you there.”

As Otto hobbled to his feet, Rollan heard a commotion outside the building. Suddenly, more guards burst through the back entrance, led by the young salesman from earlier. There were at least six men, with more pouring in. They started running toward them but were slowed down by the maze of silk racks.

“Head out the front!” Rollan yelled to Tasha and Abeke. He turned to Dante. “We have to go,” he said. “And you have to leave Otto. He’ll slow us down.”

Dante sneered at Otto but turned and followed Rollan. Outside, two more guards were lying on their backs, moaning in pain. A third was pressed underneath Uraza’s paw. Rollan glanced at Tasha, whose fingers were still tight around her baton. “Remind me never to get in a fight with you.”

“So now what?” Tasha asked.

The yelling in the shop grew louder. “We run,” Rollan said, taking off. He sped into a nearby alley, then slowed to make sure everyone had followed. Dante was holding his arm as he ran. The Greencloak had said that the snake had barely grazed his arm, that the injury wasn’t that bad. But what if he was wrong?

Rollan continued down the alley, sprinting between merchants, shoppers, and carts. He passed the last large group of people, then slid to a halt. Now that the path was clear, he could see the large beige brick wall stretching before him. Even with the help of their spirit animal partners, Rollan didn’t think they would be able to scale the wall. Certainly not before the guards reached them.

Abeke came to a stop beside Rollan. “Now what?” she asked. “Maybe we could hide in one of the carts.”

“Over here!”

Rollan turned around and spotted their young guide from earlier. He was tucked behind two large potted plants. “Follow me!” the boy yelled, before disappearing behind the thick green leaves.

“Can we trust him?” Dante asked.

“I don’t believe we have a choice.” Abeke released an arrow as one of the guards entered the alley, then called Uraza into her dormant state. Rollan assumed that Tasha had done the same for Ninani, because the swan was nowhere in sight.

They pushed their way through the plants, revealing an even smaller alleyway between a high stone wall and a row of rickety wooden buildings. It was tight, especially for Dante and his broad shoulders, but they quickly inched their way through.

“We should have stayed and fought,” Dante said. “We’re Greencloaks.”

“Us and what army?” Rollan quipped. “Just keep pushing ahead.”

Rollan heard the guards behind him. They had reached the alleyway. He only hoped that they didn’t have arrows.

“You stay here,” one of the guards yelled. “I’ll circle around and cut them off.”

Rollan tried to judge how much farther they had until they reached the other side. They were moving, but not fast enough. Now would be a really good time for one of those Redcloak guys to show up, he thought.

Dante must have realized how slowly they were moving as well. “We’ll never make it to the other side in time!”

“We’re not going to the other side,” their guide replied as he climbed—into the wall? Rollan reached the spot where the boy had disappeared. There was a large, jagged hole in the wall, opening up to a weathered rock ledge overlooking the entire city. In the valley below, hundreds of small huts and mud-brick shacks lined weaving streets. Then a wide river cut through the city, dividing it. Large white limestone homes sat on the opposite side of the river. Some houses looked big enough to comfortably hold every Greencloak in Greenhaven. Beyond those homes was the first in a series of mountains, their peaks hazy in the sun’s orange glow. It was all breathtaking, for the few seconds that Rollan had to enjoy it.

“This way,” the boy called as he inched along the wall. “But watch your step.”

Rollan's feet barely fit on the ledge. He slowly followed the boy and tried not to look down.

"We're almost there," the boy said. "There's a sinkhole up ahead. It drops down into a natural well. The water should be deep enough for you to fall through without breaking your legs—I think."

"Could you try to be a little more positive?" Rollan asked.

The boy smiled, then jumped into the hole.

Rollan took a deep breath, squeezed his eyes shut, and leaped after the boy.

At first, there was nothing. And then, after an eternity, Rollan slammed into the water below, his breath knocked out of him. He surfaced, then immediately started swimming. A few seconds later, Abeke splashed into the water, followed by Tasha and Dante.

They pulled themselves onto a small sandstone ledge. The boy led them through a series of interconnected caverns. The stone walls varied in color from bloodred to stark white. Stalactites hung above them like chandeliers in a fancy ballroom. Rollan placed his hand on the wall to one of the caves. It was cooler than he expected.

"Many years ago, a tributary of the Nilo River flowed through here," their guide said, pointing to what looked like a dried riverbed. "Now all that remains are these hollowed-out sandstone caves." He eventually stopped upon reaching a long, jagged crack in the rock wall. He pushed through with Rollan close behind. It was another cave almost totally concealed from view.

The boy led them to a large outcropping of boulders at the back of the hidden cave. "I doubt they'll come this far," he said. "But we'd better hide, just to be sure."

They remained quiet for a while, waiting for any guards to show up.

"I think we're safe," the boy said after some time had passed. "Though we may want to stay here until nightfall."

"We'll have to find somewhere else to hide for the night," Abeke said. "Otto is sure to have more guards waiting for us at the harbor."

"I think we have worse problems," Tasha said. "Something's wrong with Dante."

Dante lay slumped over behind a rock. He had already rolled up his sleeve and had tied a cloth around his bicep. There were two small puncture marks below his elbow. Around the bite, his brown skin had turned red and swollen.

“Dante?” Rollan whispered as he inspected his arm. “Why didn’t you say anything?”

“I really thought it was just a scratch,” he mumbled. “Didn’t realize it was swelling until we were running through the alley.”

Abeke turned to the boy. “What’s your name?” she asked him.

“Madeo,” he said.

“Our friend needs help,” she said. “Is there someone in town who can attend to his wound?”

Madeo nodded. “There’s a woman who lives near the market. Sayyidah Iolya. She will help, but it will come at a price.”

Rollan tightened the cloth tie around Dante’s arm. “Fine. We’ll pay whatever is required. Just take us there.” Rollan helped Dante to his feet. “And hurry,” he added, as images of Tarik flashed through his mind. “We don’t have much time.”

THE SULFUR SEA

MEILIN WOKE UP TO FIND HER FACE PRESSED AGAINST black sand. She sat up, brushed the grit from her cheeks, and let her eyes adjust to the endless darkness. Slowly, she made out the lapping sea ahead of them. It seemed to stretch out forever.

Conor was still asleep. Quietly, she pulled back the cloak that he had been using as a cover. The parasite was at the base of his neck. It would make it to his forehead soon. Their only chance to save him was to find and destroy the Wurm. Which, without Xanthe as their guide, would be much more difficult.

Meilin wished she could go back in time and change how she had treated Xanthe. She knew she had been cruel and cold to the girl, but Meilin didn't like being led around. It wasn't something she was accustomed to. How could she assess the correct path and strategy for her team when she didn't even know which way was north or south? She had lashed out at Xanthe, especially when Xanthe tried to explain how she was navigating the many underground tunnels. It wasn't like Xanthe had memorized a map. She was staking their very lives on her intuition—her hocus-pocus-based navigation.

Meilin looked at the design on the back of her hand. Who was she to question Xanthe's spiritual connection to Sadre? She and Jhi were more than enough evidence that the world above was just as magical. Some things were not meant to be explained. They just were.

Meilin began packing up their meager supplies. She would have traded their entire collection of rockweed for one of Rollan's silly jokes right now. His smiling face was the one she always searched for when things were at their worst. But thanks to Kovo, she was stuck underground while Rollan was up above. She wondered which other Great Beasts had returned. Hopefully, he and Abeke had been more successful than she and Conor.

Takoda joined her at their campsite, dragging the large paddle behind him. “Are you rested enough?” Takoda asked.

“No. Not that it matters.” She reached out her hand. “So you finished the paddle?”

Nodding, he hoisted it up and handed it to her. As she took it, Meilin noticed the redness of his palms, the peeling of his skin. She bounced the paddle in her hands, testing its weight. It was still plenty solid, but not too heavy for Kovo, and the rounded handle would be easy for him to grip. Likewise, she figured that the large, flat end of the paddle would be adequate enough to propel them through the water. She would have preferred a sail to navigate the underground winds, but that would have been difficult to make in such limited time, with such threadbare supplies.

“It looks good,” she said, handing it back. Then, after a moment, she added, “Thank you.”

Takoda looked at the gourd. “I guess we should start packing up the boat.”

She heard the sadness in his voice. “Do you want eat first, and then go? We can take a few more minutes—”

“No,” he replied. “It would better if we ate while we traveled. No point in wasting any more time.”

He walked off toward the boat. Meilin let him go. Takoda was struggling enough with Xanthe’s disappearance as it was, and Meilin didn’t think she had the words to comfort him.

But she knew who did.

She touched the tattoo on the back of her hand, and Jhi appeared in the sand beside her. “I’m going to wake Conor,” she told the panda. “Is there anything you can do to help Takoda?”

After Jhi left, Meilin knelt beside Conor and touched his arm. Slowly, his eyes batted open. “Huh ... Meilin?” He sat up and yawned. “How long was I asleep?”

“Not very long,” Meilin said. She didn’t know exactly how long he had been asleep—this eternal darkness made tracking time nearly impossible—but she knew he’d slept longer than usual. “Are you ready?” she asked him.

He nodded as he scratched behind Briggan’s ears. “Do you think I’ll have to put Briggan in his dormant state?”

Meilin looked at the sea. It seemed fairly smooth for now, but she had no idea what awaited them farther in. “I’ll leave that to you and Briggan to decide,” she said. “There should be enough room in the boat for him, if that’s what you want.”

“I just ... I don’t know if I can trust myself. Especially if I have to lead us to the Wyrms. I don’t know what that will do to the parasite.” He shrugged. “And don’t try to argue with me. It’s our best plan.”

Meilin remained still. Conor had first mentioned that he could sense the Wyrms when they were cleaning the gourd. She hadn’t wanted to use his connection to lead them to it, but without Xanthe, she didn’t see any other option. “That’s a lot to ask of you,” she finally said, her words measured.

“But you would do the same,” he said, cutting into her with his clear blue eyes. He had changed so much, from the ruddy-faced shepherd from Eura to one of the Heroes of Erdas. He was slimmer. Taller. Less naive and more ingrained in this new life of battles, danger, and quests.

She desperately missed the old Conor.

“You will be okay,” she said. “I believe in you. Remember how I fought Gerathon’s Bile? You can do the same. Use the Wyrms, but don’t let it control you.”

“Okay,” Conor said. “But I need you to promise me something.”

Meilin already knew where this was going. “No, Conor.”

He moved so he was sitting right in front of her. “If the time comes ... when the times comes that the parasite takes over my body, you have to stop me. I can’t become one of them. One of the Many.”

Meilin glanced at her hands. She didn’t want to picture using them to fight Conor. But she also didn’t want to see him turn into one of the Wyrms' mindless minions. "We'll ... figure something out," Meilin stammered. "We'll bring ropes. We ... we can tie you up."

"And if that doesn't work?"

Meilin finally looked back up and slowly nodded. "Then I'll stop you," she promised. "One way or another."

She rose then, and joined Takoda and Jhi at the boat. Takoda seemed much more relaxed than before. Meilin knew that Jhi must have used her powers to soothe him. Meilin herself wouldn't have made it through some of her darker days without the Great Beast.

As Jhi walked toward Meilin, she kept stopping to shake excess sand from her black-and-white fur. After a few feeble attempts, Jhi plopped down on her rear and waited for Meilin to come to her.

"Lazy panda," Meilin said with a grin. "I know you don't like the beach, but be careful what you wish for." She rubbed the panda's paws, trying to brush off as much sand as she could, then pulled her to passive state. She would keep Jhi away for as long as possible, but she'd eventually have to come out to care for Conor.

Takoda and Meilin didn't speak as they began loading their equipment into the gourd. Conor joined them a few moments later, lugging some of the supplies from their campsite. Kovo sat a few feet away, his arms defiantly crossed, but Meilin didn't want to ask him for help. The ape would be doing most of the rowing anyway.

She picked up her quarterstaff and placed it in the boat. It felt funny in her hands—it was too short and didn't have the proper weight—but she refused to leave it behind. It was one of the few weapons that remained. They had lost almost everything when fleeing Phos Astos, and the rest while sprinting across the burning Arachane Fields.

Once all the supplies were loaded, Takoda called for Kovo. The Great Beast huffed and grunted, but helped them to push the boat into the water.

"Is he upset about rowing?" Conor asked once the boat bobbed in the sea.

"No," Takoda replied. "He just doesn't like the water." Then he nodded at Briggan, who was timidly pawing at the wet beach. "Perhaps he'd be more comfortable in passive state?"

“Conor and Briggan are fine,” Meilin snapped. She immediately regretted her tone, but at the same time, she didn’t want Takoda to make Conor feel self-conscious, even unintentionally. Water splashed onto her boots and legs as she made her way to the boat. She climbed in. “Let’s go.”

Conor and Briggan followed, then Takoda. Finally, Kovo climbed into the boat. The gourd sank with the addition of each passenger, but remained above water. Kovo positioned himself at the rear of the boat. He jammed the end of the paddle through the shallow water to the sandy bottom of the sea and pushed them away from the beach.

“So what’s the plan?” Takoda asked. “There’s a small current. We can let that carry us for a while. That way, Kovo won’t tire himself out.”

“Well, let’s see if that’s even the correct way,” Meilin asked. “Conor?”

The boy looked paler than usual as he nodded. With one hand on Briggan, he closed his eyes. His breath started slowly at first, then increased at an alarming rate. Sweat poured down his face, and his body began to shake. The parasite at the base of his neck seemed to tremble as well. Meilin wasn’t sure, but it almost looked as if the black mark was moving....

“Conor, snap out of it!” she yelled as the parasite pulsed and wriggled a little higher. She couldn’t let him do this. “Conor!”

“To the left!” he shouted, his eyes flashing open. He pointed a shaky hand toward an invisible point on the water’s horizon. “There. That’s where we want to go.”

Meilin positioned herself beside Conor. “Are you okay?” After he nodded, she asked, “What did you see?”

“Not see,” he finally said. “Feel.” He wiped the sweat from his forehead. “I felt evil.”

Meilin had no idea how long it would take to reach the base of the Evertree. They had been in the boat for hours and didn’t seem any closer to finding it than when they departed. For the most part, they traveled with the current, though Kovo still had to use the paddle when the current shifted and pulled them in different directions.

She had finally ordered everyone to rest. Conor didn't waste any time, falling asleep as soon as he lay down. Takoda was more reluctant, but eventually he closed his eyes. Just before falling asleep, he suggested that she rest as well—that Kovo could take the first watch.

No way, Meilin thought. For all she knew, Kovo would capsize the boat and try to drown them all before continuing on to defeat—or maybe even partner with—the Wyrms himself. Or perhaps he would cast Conor overboard. Kovo hadn't bothered to hide his feelings about the boy. As soon as Conor fell asleep, Kovo and Takoda began signing passionately, with the ape repeatedly flipping his hands over, and then pointing to Conor. Each time, Takoda would pinch two fingers and his thumb together, shake his head, and reply with a resounding No.

Things looked bleak, but as long as Conor was fighting the effects of the parasite, she wouldn't abandon him.

But what would happen if he finally succumbed?

Meilin knew what it was like to not be in control of her own actions, to fight against another will for control of her body. During her Nectar Ceremony—when she summoned Jhi as her spirit animal—her father had secretly given her a concoction called the Bile. It was supposed to ensure that she would summon an animal. Instead, it made her a slave to Gerathon the Serpent, forcing her to do the evil Great Beast's bidding.

Even now, Meilin still remembered the look on Abeke's and Rollan's faces as Gerathon forced her to attack them. Meilin could hear the sound of her staff crashing down on Abeke's head, right before she captured her and delivered her to the Conquerors like a good little mindless soldier.

Meilin had been lucky—she had been able to avoid seriously hurting her friends, and thanks to Tellun, she had finally become free of the Bile. But could Conor hope for the same? And if Conor really did attack her or Takoda, would she be willing to do what was necessary to stop him?

She wondered if she should release Jhi. She could use the panda's comfort, and Conor could use her healing abilities. I'll release her once Conor wakes, she told herself. I will not lose him without a fight.

Meilin pulled her cloak around her arms and repositioned herself in the boat. Across from her, Kovo looked out at the sea. She followed his gaze.

Perhaps he saw something beyond the choppy yellow waves. Meilin searched as well. The water seemed to be breaking against something. Land? A reef? Or a ship? Yes, a ship! The Tellun's Pride cut through the mustard-colored water. Rollan stood on the bow of the ship, his worn green cloak rustling in the breeze. He was smiling and waving, and then he was frowning and shouting, although he was too far away for Meilin to hear him. She leaned closer, and closer, and—

She jerked up. There was no ship, and no Rollan. She had fallen asleep! Across from her, Kovo stared at her, smiling. Weakling, his eyes seemed to be saying.

Meilin sat up, forcing herself into a less comfortable position.

More hours passed. Meilin felt herself drifting off a few times, but was always able to snap awake before she fully embraced sleep. She glanced at Kovo. He sat perfectly still, with the large paddle in his lap. His eyes were closed, and his nostrils slowly brought air in and pushed it out. The mighty Kovo had fallen asleep. Ha! Who was the weakling now?

She was just about to wake up the others when she saw a luminous orb glowing in the distance. It almost looked like a smaller version of the sun, or perhaps a full moon, but they were underground. That was impossible. She pinched herself, just to make sure that she wasn't asleep.

As they approached the orb, Meilin realized that it seemed to be hovering in the air. She thought about the glowing spheres that Takoda had found. They weren't nearly as bright as this one. If she could grab it, they wouldn't have to sit in this eternal darkness.

Meilin stood up slowly, so that she wouldn't rock the boat. The orb was almost within reach. She raised herself on her tiptoes, stretched her arms out, and grabbed it with both hands. It was warm and sticky, but at least the tacky gunk covering it made it easier to hold.

But it wasn't until she grabbed it that she realized the orb wasn't actually floating. It was hanging from something. She could now clearly see what looked like a dark gray, sinewy tree branch attached to it. The branch arched high, then disappeared into the water. What type of tree was this?

She tugged hard on the orb, hoping that she could pull it from the branch. Suddenly, the water around them churned, and the orb began to pull away. Meilin tried to drop it, but it was stuck to her! The tacky substance on the orb's surface had glued her hands to it.

The vine jerked violently away from the boat. Meilin stumbled forward. Her foot caught on the edge of the gourd, and she felt herself falling overboard. She squeezed her eyes shut and braced herself for the impact against the water—but something large and meaty grabbed her waist, stopping her from falling over.

Kovo!

He snarled at her as he pulled her back into the boat. Immediately, the orb began jerking away again, causing Meilin's arms to yank forward. Kovo grabbed the branch, or whatever it was, and tore it away from the orb.

With the tension from the branch immediately released, Meilin fell backward onto her rear, the orb still in her hands. Takoda was awake by now, and Conor was trying to untangle himself from his cloak.

"What's going on?" Takoda yelled.

"I don't know," Meilin said, scrambling back to her feet. "I saw this orb and I grabbed it, thinking we could use the light. But now it's stuck to my hands."

Conor pointed toward the water. "What's that?"

Something was moving underwater. It crested, and everyone gasped. It looked like a deformed, mutated version of an anglerfish. Meilin had heard of them—deep-sea hunters who lured their prey with brightly lit antennas. Double rows of jagged teeth lined the top and bottom of the fish's gaping mouth. Its translucent skin was covered in long spikes. It seemed to look right at Meilin with its large black eyes as it sped toward the boat.

"It's going to ram us!" Meilin yelled. "Hold on."

The fish exploded into the side of the boat, causing it to teeter dangerously to the left. Briggan howled as he slid toward the edge. Conor leaped forward and grabbed the wolf before he fell into the water.

“It’s circling back around!” Takoda said.

Kovo rushed to the side of the boat and stared as the fish raced toward them. He raised the paddle high above his head and brought it down right as the fish rammed into the boat again. The boat tilted sharply once more, and Takoda and Kovo went flying. Meilin jumped in the opposite direction, ramming her shoulder against the inside of the gourd in an attempt to stop it from turning completely over.

“Get to the center!” Meilin shouted. “Otherwise, we’ll sink!”

Everyone crawled to the middle of the boat and waited. At first it continued to rock violently, but after a few tense moments it slowed to a slight bob.

“Is it gone?” Conor asked.

“Yes, I think so,” Takoda replied. “Kovo must have stopped it.” He turned to his spirit animal and made a sign with his hands. Meilin had been seeing him use it more and more lately. Thank you.

Instead of replying, the Great Beast moved to the edge of the boat and looked into the water.

Takoda frowned. “Kovo? What is wrong? Do you think the fish is going to attack again?”

Kovo shook his head. He made a rowing motion with his hands, then pointed behind him.

“What?” Meilin asked. “You want to go in a different direction?” She turned to Conor. “Is that the way to the Wyrms?”

“It’s the paddle,” Takoda said. “Kovo must have dropped it during the last attack. It’s out there, somewhere in the sea.”

Meilin began frantically searching the water. “Does anyone see it?” She held up the orb, which was still stuck to her hands. “It’s probably somewhere behind us.”

“Even if it is back there, how are we going to reach it?” Takoda asked. “We don’t have any way to paddle backward. And we can’t swim with creatures like that in the water.”

“So we’re just supposed to sit here, do nothing, and let the current take us who knows where?” Meilin asked.

“It could be worse. At least we have a current,” Takoda said. “We should take inventory. I saw at least one bundle of supplies fly overboard.”

Conor knelt in front of Meilin and inspected her hands. “Here, let me help you with that.” They both pulled, and eventually Conor was able to pry the orb from her palms, but not without taking a few layers of skin in the process.

Meilin wanted to kick the stupid orb into the water. They were adrift, without a way to navigate, and their handful of limited supplies had just become smaller.

They were at the total mercy of the Sulfur Sea, and it was all Meilin’s fault.

SAYYIDAH IOLYA

TASHA SAT IN THE CORNER OF THE SMALL, SIMPLE, one-room hut with Rollan, Abeke, and Madeo, and took in another spoonful of vegetable soup. Well, she wasn't actually sure what was in the soup, but thinking that the gray blobs floating in the brown liquid were some type of exotic root calmed her stomach. Abeke had almost finished her bowl, while Rollan and Madeo had already moved on to seconds. She would have given anything for some of Dante's special spices right then.

Across the room, Sayyidah Iolya, an elderly, hunchbacked woman, tended to Dante. He had barely been able to stand when they reached the woman's home. Once they described what had happened to him—and paid—she began preparing a solution for his arm in a large copper pot. Whatever the elixir was, it smelled even worse than the vegetable soup. Dante had screamed in pain when she first poured it over his swollen forearm. Now he was silent, and Tasha had no idea if this was better or worse.

After wrapping Dante's arm in a bandage, Sayyidah Iolya hobbled to them. "Your father was struck by a red-striped cottonmouth," she said to Rollan. "He's lucky that the bite was shallow ... and that you reached me when you did. If the snake had sunk its fangs farther into his flesh, he would already be dead and rotting."

"Thank you," Rollan said. "And he's not my father."

Tasha caught the edge in Rollan's voice. She thought about their conversation in Stetriol, about the Greencloak who had been like a father to him. She knew he was no longer alive, though Rollan hadn't told her what had happened to him.

Sayyidah Iolya tapped her knotted, wooden cane on the dirt floor. "Whoever he is, he must remain here for four days. It will take that long for the poison and my antidote to work their way through his system." The woman grinned a crooked, toothless smile. "You realize that the lodging will cost extra, yes?"

Rollan scowled as he pulled a few coins from his bag. "Just in case you didn't recognize the cloaks, we're the good guys."

The woman took the coins and inspected them against a nearby candle flame. "Greencloak, Conqueror, merchant—I don't care what colors or emblems you wear, as long as you carry gold."

Tasha waited for the woman to return to Dante. "At least she didn't charge us for the vegetable soup," she said.

Rollan slowly turned to her. "Tasha, those aren't vegetables."

Tasha's stomach gurgled. "Do I want to know—?"

"No," Abeke, Rollan, and Madeo said at the same time.

Tasha put her bowl down on the gritty floor. Even at its worst, her life in Stetriol was nothing like this. "So now what do we do?"

"We can't wait for Dante to heal," Abeke said. "Madeo, do you know of any secret entrances into Zourtzi?"

Madeo's eyes widened. "The island fortress is impenetrable, and its sentries are cruel. None of us would dare try to sneak in," he said. "Which is too bad. Faisel's always throwing feasts. Some of the kids heard that he feeds entire cases of leftover hens to his hunting hounds."

"We have word that he's preparing another feast for his son to celebrate the arrival of Cabaro," Abeke said.

Madeo nodded. "A seven-day festival. Ships are set to arrive tomorrow. My friends at the pier say that they're coming from as far as Amaya."

Rollan and Abeke shared a long glance. "Word is spreading," Abeke said. "For all we know, Zerif may be on his way."

"With an army of infected Greencloaks at his side," Rollan muttered. "As if this day couldn't get any worse."

“There may be a way inside,” Madeo said. “For festivals this large, Sealy, the head chef, has brought in children to work as servants. He never picks the street kids, instead getting children from ‘respectable’ families who live by the river. Sealy’s already chosen his servants, but I’ll bet I can find three who are willing to swap places with you ... for the right price.”

Abeke nodded. “I suppose that’ll have to work.”

“I’ll send word tonight, and will meet you back here at dawn with your servants’ clothes.” Madeo rose from the floor and looked at Abeke. “Many of my friends love Cabaro, because he’s a lion and from Nilo. But I was always the fastest of my family. My favorite is Uraza.”

Abeke smiled, and in a flash, Uraza appeared. The leopard cautiously approached Madeo.

“You can touch her,” Abeke said. “She’s kind to those who are kind to her.”

The boy slowly placed his hand on the large beast’s back. “While Faisel and his family remained safe in Zourtzi, the rest of Caylif fell to the Conquerors,” Madeo said. “It was hard for us to survive. Many didn’t.” He removed his hand and took a step back. “Thank you for saving us.”

And with that, the boy exited the hut.

Tasha released Ninani. The bird sniffed at her bowl but didn’t eat. “Is being a Greencloak always like this?” she asked. “People expect so much of you. When I was home, all I had to worry about were completing my studies and tending to my chores.”

“Such is the life of a Greencloak,” Abeke said. “Though having a Great Beast draws even more attention.” Abeke petted Uraza, and she murmured a deep purr in response. “But as you just saw, it can also be rewarding.”

“We want you with us, on our side,” Rollan said. “But you don’t have to decide today. You have time.”

“But if Greenhaven has fallen, are there any Greencloaks left?” Tasha asked. “Is there even anything remaining to join?”

“There will always be Greencloaks,” Abeke said. She stretched out and pulled her cloak around herself, almost like a sleeping bag. “We’d better get some rest. Tomorrow will be a long day.”

“But at least we won’t have to eat rat stew if we’re working as servants,” Rollan added.

Tasha’s stomach churned. “Rats? You’re joking, right?”

Rollan’s laughter was the only response she received.

ZOURTZI

ABEKE TRIED NOT TO TUG AT HER STIFF GRAY SHIRT AND long, itchy black skirt. Madeo had been able to find three kids willing to give up their posts for a little free coin, while Abeke, Rollan, and Tasha took their places as servants. Abeke's skirt had been too long, but Tasha was able to quickly alter the hem to shorten it.

Abeke and Tasha stood at the edge of the pier along with twenty other girls. Rollan stood in a parallel line with the boys.

Two piers away, a group of uniformed guards stood in front of the Tellun's Pride II.

A pair of large guards, both dressed in black tunics and boots, stood at the front of each line. As the children stepped forward one by one, the guards gave them a quick once-over, then made a small mark on a parchment before allowing them to proceed onto the sailboat. Madeo and the other children had told Abeke not to worry about the list. The men checking them in had no idea what their servants looked like—they only had their names. Abeke had easily memorized her new name. She hoped Tasha had done the same.

Tasha was fidgeting in front of her, continually loosening and rebraiding a strand of her white-blond hair. Abeke placed her hand on the girl's shoulder. "Try to remain calm," she whispered. "Act like you belong."

Abeke picked up her backpack and took another step forward. She had been able to stuff her and Tasha's cloaks inside the bag, but she'd had to leave her bow and arrows with Sayyidah Iolya. Madeo had promised to check in on Dante and fill him in on the plan. When Rollan tried to give Madeo the rest of the money, he had declined, saying he couldn't take any more money from the Heroes of Erdas.

There were only two children in front of them when Abeke heard a familiar voice.

"Sealy! I know you're in there!"

She glanced behind her. Otto, the merchant from the silk shop, limped past them, a new shiny black obsidian cane clacking with every other step. The guard at the front of the pier didn't speak, instead jerking his head to the boat. Otto grumbled but clumsily climbed the ramp and stepped onto the deck. He disappeared into a small cabin.

Tasha turned around. "Abeke—"

"Lower your voice," Abeke whispered. They took a step forward as another girl was allowed onto the boat. "Don't worry. Nothing will happen if you don't draw attention to yourself."

"We destroyed his shop yesterday," Tasha countered. "Dante sliced his leg. He's going to recognize us."

Abeke knew that they had to get inside Zourtzi, and that this was their only chance. But she also didn't want her desperation to cloud her judgment. She looked over and caught Rollan's eye. She raised an eyebrow as a question. He shook his head in response.

They were in agreement. They were getting on that boat.

"Just keep moving," she whispered, giving Tasha a slight nudge.

As Tasha reached the front of the line, Otto emerged from the cabin. Tasha was checked in and moved toward the boat as Otto began to hobble down the ramp.

Abeke placed her hand on her sleeve and readied herself to call Uraza. But as Tasha boarded, Otto walked right past her, not even glancing in her direction.

Abeke lowered her hand, told the steward her name, and stepped onto the boat. Rollan joined her and Tasha a few moments later.

"How did you know he wouldn't notice us?" Tasha asked. "I walked right by him. He had to have seen me."

"He's a rich, important man," Abeke replied. "And we are servants."

“It would be beneath him to even look at us,” Rollan added. “To him, kids like us barely exist.”

Tasha chewed on her lip as she looked out onto the harbor. Abeke didn't know much about Tasha's background, other than that she was probably wealthier than Abeke and Rollan. Unlike either of them, Tasha still had both of her parents.

Abeke wondered what her own mother would have said if she had been alive during Abeke's Nectar Ceremony. If she had seen Abeke call Uraza. From what she remembered of her, Abeke knew her mother would have reacted much more positively than her father had.

After all the children boarded, the sailboat departed.

“At least the Tellun's Pride II is still there,” Rollan whispered as they passed the ship. “Though with the number of men guarding it, I don't see us boarding anytime soon.”

“We'll have to worry about that later,” Abeke said. “I'm sure Dante could help us find another way out of Nilo.” She smiled. “Or maybe we could hide in my village. Soama could certainly make a meal better than rat stew.”

Tasha groaned. “Seriously. Was that really rat stew that I had been eating?” She covered her mouth. “I think I should sit down. I'm going to be seasick.”

Abeke, Rollan, and Tasha found a quiet spot along the railing to sit. Some of the other kids talked and joked with each other, but Abeke felt it was best if they kept to themselves. She still wasn't convinced that Tasha would be able to speak to the other children without revealing who they really were.

The sailboat, aided by the current and a fast wind, easily outpaced the larger, heavier boats in the open sea. It wasn't long until the majestic fort loomed before them. It was even more spectacular up close. The walls were white and almost looked polished. And its four towers seemed to stretch to the sun.

Rollan pointed to the water. “What types of rocks are those?”

Abeke frowned at the row of pale, angular shapes just underneath the water's surface. The boat cruised a few lengths away from them. Any closer and the rocks would have cut deep gashes into the ship's hull.

“It’s some type of cement,” Tasha said. “It’s man-made.”

“So they somehow created a rock reef to ward off ships?” Rollan asked. “Hopefully it’s easier to get out of this place than in.”

The boat slowed as it neared the stone-bricked pier. The children lined up and disembarked onto a wide gangplank once it had docked. The pier connected to a large promenade shaded by billowing palm and juniper trees. Up ahead, a large, manicured lawn stretched out before a series of wide, steep ivory steps. The steps were like a triangle, wide at the bottom and slowly narrowing as they reached the massive granite double doors at their apex.

Abeke tried not to stare at the guards lined along the steps. Unlike the typical Niloan garb, they all wore black clothes with heavy metal chain mail. Some wore stripes on their shoulders. Perhaps it’s some type of rank, she thought. Each carried a long, curved sword, similar to the ones that the men at the silk shop had used.

She and the others were ushered through a large foyer and down a massive corridor to the servants’ chambers. There, they were greeted by the main servants. Unlike the children’s clothes, the regular servant uniform looked much more comfortable and practical.

Abeke was given her initial duties and was then assigned to her sleeping quarters. She, Tasha, and a young, waifish girl with short brown hair were assigned into a room together. However, before the main servants led them to their quarters, Rollan pulled the brown-haired girl to the side and whispered something to her, quietly slipping her a coin. He grinned as he returned to Abeke and Tasha.

“It seems that everyone’s a businessperson in this city,” he said, picking up Abeke’s bag. “Let’s go check out our quarters.”

The room was small but adequate. Two beds lined the wall farthest from the door, and the other bed stood underneath a small window.

Rollan glanced out the window. “Lucky Essix. Better to be out there than in here.” He flopped on the bed, then winced.

Abeke sat down on the hard bed. “Rollan, were you assigned a task?”

He shook his head as he leaned back, placing his hands behind his neck. “I’m supposed to report to the kitchen in an hour for mine,” he said.

“Me too,” Tasha said. “Since we don’t have to report for a while, maybe we should look for Cabaro now.”

“I don’t think that’s wise,” Abeke said. “It would arouse too much suspicion if we were seen sneaking around, and it could jeopardize our mission.” She opened her bag and pulled out a dagger. “Plus, I already know where to find Cabaro.”

Rollan sat up. “What? You sense him with those cat-reflexes of yours?”

“Funny,” she said, smiling. “But no, that isn’t it. I’ve been assigned to act as one of Kirat’s servants.”

“What? They’re letting us kids serve Faisel’s family?” Rollan asked. “That doesn’t make any sense.”

Abeke shrugged. “From the way I understand it, the regular servants are responsible for attending to all the fancy guests arriving later today. We’ve been relegated to serving the less important people—like his child.” She tucked the dagger into her boot and smoothed her dress. “Wish me luck.”

Abeke and five other servants stood in the service corridor leading to one of the fortress’s many dining chambers. Each servant carried a dish, some two. Abeke held a steaming bowl of warm towels in her hands. Even with the three thick kitchen towels blocking her fingers from the bowl, her skin burned. But she didn’t dare complain. Sealy, the head chef, had already reassigned one child when he accidentally spilled a drop of mango juice on the pristine tiled kitchen floor.

“Line up against the far wall as soon as you enter Master Kirat’s dining quarters,” Ahmar said. He was one of the regular servants and had been tasked with overseeing Abeke’s group. “Whatever you do, do not look directly into Kirat’s or Cabaro’s eyes.” He lowered his voice. “Especially Cabaro. He’s already maimed two servants. But if you keep your head down and limit any sudden movements, you should come out of this with all your digits intact.”

Ahmar knocked on the door three times. When no one answered, he opened the door and led the servants in. The room was massive. Large, scarlet silk curtains hung over each window, casting the room in a dull, reddish tint. Mounted animal heads sat on each wall. Abeke was glad that none of them were leopards.

The focal point of the room was a large, exquisitely carved round wooden table. It was large enough to seat at least twelve people, though only one throne-sized chair stood at the far end. Ahmar placed two gold and ivory utensils on the table, then returned to the wall with the other servants.

The main door swung open. A few men walked in, their boots loud against the floor. They were followed by a tall boy wearing beige linen clothes and gold rings on his fingers. He must have been Kirat.

Then Cabaro appeared.

The girl next to Abeke sucked in her breath, and the plate of eggs wobbled in her hand. Glancing down the line, Abeke could tell that the other servants were equally as rattled.

Cabaro slowly approached the table, his tail lazily swishing back and forth. He looked slightly larger than a normal lion. Like the other reborn Great Beasts, he was a shadow of his former self, yet Abeke reminded herself that he was still a lion.

He yawned, showing all of his white, sharp teeth.

The last time Abeke had seen Cabaro, he had been charging into the Evertree, sacrificing his life to save Erdas. She wondered if any memory of that act remained.

Ahmar snapped to attention as another man entered the room. With the way everyone nodded and bowed at him, including Kirat, he must have been Faisel. His physical traits reminded Abeke of the people of both Zhong and Northern Nilo. She assumed that he was of dual heritage, like Takoda.

Faisel rubbed his graying beard as he inspected the line of servants against the wall. “Do not worry; Cabaro has already eaten.” He smiled at the smallest of them—a light-skinned Euran boy with freckles and brown hair. “Though perhaps he would be interested in dessert.”

Faisel laughed, filling the silent room. Cabaro yawned again, then flopped down on the floor and began grooming himself. He didn’t seem to notice anyone in the room—the servants, the men, or even his human partner, Kirat. The boy had stretched out his arm and was whispering something to the lion, but Cabaro just continued to lick his paws with his tongue.

Faisel turned and saw his son kneeling before the lion. “Kirat,” he snapped. The boy jumped to his feet. “Must you display your shortcomings in front of the entire staff?”

“But I thought ... it felt like—”

“I do not care about your excuses,” Faisel said. “Only results.” Then he joined the other men. They had pulled off to a corner of the room. “When will my son learn how to force his animal into a dormant state?” he demanded, his voice overshadowing all others. “I am paying you far too much for these continued failures.”

Abeke felt sorry for Kirat as the men tried to explain what she already knew. It required trust for a spirit animal to willingly enter the dormant state. It had taken almost a week for Uraza to trust her enough to become passive, and even longer for Rollan and the independent Essix. There was no telling how long it would take Cabaro—if ever. But from her limited observations of Faisel, she could tell that anything other than immediate success would be considered a disappointment.

Kirat slipped into the large chair. “I’m ready to begin,” he said, his voice stronger than before.

Ahmar walked to the table, unrolled a linen napkin, and draped it across Kirat’s lap. Then he clapped his hands. The first two servants moved forward. One placed a glass of juice in front of the boy, and the other placed a plate of fruit.

Kirat took three bites of his fruit and a sip of the juice. “Next,” he commanded.

Abeke frowned as Ahmar collected the plates. He’s finished already?

This continued with each plate. Eggs, smoked fish, baked bread—no matter the food, Kirat only took a few bites before discarding the plate. How could he be so wasteful, when an entire city was starving just beyond his walls?

“Towels,” he snapped.

It took Ahmar clearing his throat for Abeke to realize that this was her cue. She quickly crossed the room and placed the warm bowl before Kirat. Like Otto the merchant and all the other important people she had encountered, Kirat refused to meet her gaze.

Suddenly, one of the servants shrieked.

Abeke turned around. Cabaro had risen to his feet and was walking toward her!

Kirat stood as well. “Cabaro! Be still!”

The lion almost seemed to laugh at the boy’s command—a low, rumbling sound issued from his throat. He continued forward, his tail now dragging against the floor. Perhaps Kirat would not look at Abeke, but Cabaro did. He gazed at her almost quizzically. It was as if he recognized her, but he didn’t know how, or from where.

Abeke placed her hand on her sleeve but didn’t move. She didn’t want to call Uraza, but if he attacked, she wouldn’t have any choice.

“Ahmar, summon the guards,” Kirat said.

“You will do no such thing,” Faisel said, crossing the room. “I will not have one hair on this magnificent beast harmed.”

Cabaro took another step toward Abeke and sniffed the air. His eyes flashed. It seemed he suddenly realized who she was—and also probably realized which Great Beast she could call forth. Abeke had grown up hearing stories of the rivalry between Uraza and Cabaro. Both were native to Nilo. Both claimed to be the greatest hunter in the land.

Cabaro continued to glare at Abeke. He bared his teeth but didn’t roar or advance. She wasn’t sure, but it almost seemed as if his gaze kept shifting from Abeke’s eyes to her arm. Then he snorted and withdrew, his eyes on Abeke the entire time. He flopped back onto the floor and returned to grooming himself.

Abeke slowly lowered her hand. Was Cabaro afraid to face Uraza? Or was he merely too lazy to be bothered with a confrontation right then?

Faisel clapped his hands and laughed, breaking the tension in the room. “It seems that Cabaro has finally met his match.” He pointed to Abeke but kept his eyes on his son. “For the rest of the week, she will act as your primary server. And if you’re lucky, maybe she’ll also teach you how to control your lion.”

FAST FRIENDS

ROLLAN BROKE OFF A SMALL PIECE OF THE LOAF OF bread that Sayyidah Iolya had given them and tossed it to Essix. Essix stared at the bread for a few seconds, then pushed it around with her beak.

“Trust me,” he said, popping a piece into his mouth. “It’s actually pretty good.”

Essix finally picked up the bread, tilted her head back, and swallowed it whole.

Rollan was surprised that Essix had remained in the small room for as long as she had. She hated enclosed spaces. But having her here was good. Focusing on Essix took his mind off other things. Other people. Abeke. Dante. Conor.

Meilin.

He squeezed the stiff loaf of bread. Here he was, safely hidden away in one of the most spectacular fortresses he had ever seen, while Meilin was trapped underground with Takoda and Conor ... and Kovo, easily the most menacing and untrustworthy of the Great Beasts. She would have loved Zourtzi—the architecture was a mix of Niloan and Zhongese styles. Perhaps it would have reminded her of home.

And what about Conor? Even with the healing properties of Jhi, how much longer could Conor last before the parasite took total control of his body and mind? Rollan had seen firsthand what the parasite could do. He was sure that he’d never forget the empty look in Arac’s eyes as Rollan fought him on the deck of the Tellun’s Pride II. He’d never forget the way Arac’s body twisted and turned as it fell overboard into the dark sea.

Rollan had only known Arac for a few days and was still haunted by his attack. How would Meilin feel if Conor attacked her?

Essix flapped her wings, getting Rollan's attention. "Okay, but after this, I'm cutting you off," he said, tossing her another piece of bread. Then he glanced at Tasha. "Why don't you find some rats to chew on or something?"

Tasha groaned on the other side of the room. "Not funny!" Like Rollan, she was feeding her spirit animal. She tossed a piece of bread to Ninani, but it went way off the mark and instead hit the wall behind the swan.

"I thought Ninani was supposed to make you more graceful."

She sighed. "That is more graceful."

Rollan laughed. "So what was life like for you before we showed up? I'm guessing that they didn't serve a lot of rodent delicacies in that fancy castle you were living in."

Now Tasha laughed. "I was practically a stranger in that castle. I had only been living there for a few days before you and Abeke arrived. Even then, I wasn't permitted to roam the halls by myself. There was always some official looking over me, taking notes and scribbling down everything that Ninani and I did." Ninani waddled to her, and she began to stroke the white swan's back. "Before the war, my family lived in a small village farther inland, close to the mountains. My father was the town's farrier." Rollan must have been frowning, because she said, "A farrier is kind of like a blacksmith, but only for horses. The terrain in Stetriol is very rocky. When it comes to hauling equipment or plowing fields, a horse without a good pair of shoes is about as useful as a potbellied pig."

"I'd take a pig over a horse any day," Rollan murmured. "So what happened when the war broke out? Did your father become one of the Conquerors?"

"They asked him, but he refused. He saw what that drink did to the animals—"

"Bile," Rollan said. He could hear the contempt in his voice.

"Yes, the Bile. They had used it on some horses in his care. Most bulked up immediately, transforming from quiet, graceful creatures into something twisted and sinister. I thought that was bad, until I saw what happened when an animal couldn't take the transition. The horses would shudder and break down and ...” Her voice trailed off as she shook her head. “So no, my father refused to drink the Bile and join the Reptile King's army. They instead used him as a blacksmith. But not for the animals. He made weapons. Swords, axes, whatever they required.” She fed Ninani the last of her bread. “He hated it, but it allowed him to provide for us. Food was always scarce, but we never went hungry.” Tasha looked at Rollan, and her blue eyes cut into him. “What was life like for you before the war?”

“Less fighting. More rats.” He stood up. “Sometimes, I think I preferred the rats.”

“But you chose this path. You chose to be a Greencloak. Why?”

“We all have a duty. Even a street kid like me.” Rollan scooped up Essix and walked to the window. “See you tonight,” he said to the falcon. “Do me a favor and check on Dante, okay? And let me know if you see any messages from Lenori or Olvan.”

The bird seemed to nod in acknowledgment, then took off.

Rollan thought about trying to tap into Essix's vision, but decided against it. He didn't want to become sick again, not when he'd have to report to the kitchen soon. Still, he wanted to get a better look at Zourtzi. If it was really that impenetrable, then maybe Zerif wouldn't be able to enter after all. Maybe Cabaro would be better off staying here. And perhaps it would be safe for other spirit animals as well. Tasha wanted to be a Greencloak, but she needed time to think about what she was signing up for. She needed a safe place to think. And maybe this was it.

He turned to see that Tasha had risen from the floor. The sunlight shining in through the window caught her braided hair. It was piled high on her head, and the sunlight made it look that much blonder. “What are you thinking about?” she asked.

“Just wondering if they're going to make me serve the fortress's dogs or Faisel himself,” he said. “Not that one's better than the other.”

Tasha continued toward him. She rose up on her toes and peered out the window. “Abeke warned me that you were good at evading people,” she said. “She was right.”

He rubbed the back of his head. “It takes me a while to warm up to people. Back home, you couldn’t really trust anyone, not even other orphans. They’d get close to you, only to steal your clothes or food. Or turn you in to the militia. Or worst, the orphanages.”

“But you came to trust the Greencloaks,” she said. “Was it because of the man you mentioned before? Travis?”

“Tarik,” Rollan corrected. Just saying his name out loud made Rollan’s throat hurt. “Yes, he was a great mentor, and someone I came to trust with my life. But he wasn’t the only reason I joined. Abeke, Conor, and Meilin had a lot to do with it as well.” He frowned as a large smile spread across Tasha’s face. “What?” he demanded.

“Nothing. Just the way your face looked when you mentioned Meilin’s name,” she said. “It’s clear that you care about her.”

“You would like her. Eventually,” he said. “You’d especially like Conor. He’s a lot like you, but less clumsy. And he’s one of the kindest, most loyal people I’ve ever met.”

Tasha’s face fell. “There it was again. Something in your face—in your voice—when you talked about Conor. Is he okay?”

Rollan squinted at Ninani. “Are you doing this to her?” he asked. “Enhancing her senses or something? Or is she always this inquisitive?”

Ninani flapped her wings. He wasn’t exactly sure, but he thought that the swan might have winked at him.

“All right, enough with all the talking.” He pulled a dagger from his bag and, like Abeke, slid it inside his boot. “Time to go to work.”

LAREIMAJA

WITH AS MUCH FOOD AS WAS STACKED ON TOP OF THE kitchen counters, it was apparent that Sealy and his staff had been cooking since early that morning. However, there wasn't a drop of food on his immaculate white linen jacket.

He frowned at each of the children lined up against the wall. "Let me be clear," he said. "You all are the worst of the worst. The only reason you all even made it inside the fortress is because I needed forty servants instead of twenty-five." He stopped in front of a small boy. Tasha assumed that he couldn't be much older than eight. He was supposed to be outside, playing with his friends, not getting yelled at by an oversized bully.

"Most of you will be responsible for cleaning the floors and the horse stalls. Some get to polish those ivory stairs outside. But two of you get the extreme honor of tending to Lady LaReimaja." He continued walking. "So who will it be?"

None of the kids moved forward. It really said something about the family's reputation that the kids would pick mopping and sweeping to serving Faisel's wife. Tasha looked at Rollan, hoping to catch his attention, but his eyes remained glued to the ground.

There was a quiet cough to Tasha's left. Her stomach sank—it was the small boy from before. He tried to freeze back into position, but it was too late.

"Ah, the runt," Sealy said. "Think you got what it takes to serve our lady?"

The boy looked at the ground and shook his head.

“What’s wrong, boy? Can’t talk?” He leaned closer to the child, who was shaking in his small brown loafers. “You even think about not speaking when Lord Faisel addresses you, and he’ll make you a permanent mute.”

The boy uttered a weak, “Yes, sir.”

“Are you even strong enough to carry a tray?” Sealy poked the boy in the shoulder, causing him to stumble backward. “If you spill so much as one drop of my—”

“I will volunteer,” Tasha said. She took a step forward, hoping that she wouldn’t trip over her clumsy feet. “I would be honored to serve the lady,” Tasha said.

Sealy marched to her. “Think you got what it takes, blondie?”

Tasha willed herself not to back down. “I know I do, sir,” she said.

“Well, you’ve got guts.” Sealy smirked. “But Lord Faisel isn’t afraid to cut those out of kids as well.”

Tasha didn’t respond to Sealy’s horrible joke. She wasn’t some county girl from Stetriol anymore. She was a Greencloak. Or, a Greencloak-in-training. Or, whatever. All she knew was that she couldn’t stand there and watch that boy get bullied.

“So, it’s you and the runt, then.”

“I’d like to volunteer as well.”

Tasha sighed. Rollan.

Sealy walked to Rollan. “I don’t need three of you,” he said.

“I’ll go in his place,” Rollan said, nodding to the boy.

Sealy poked Rollan hard in the chest. Rollan must have been anticipating it, because his feet somehow remained in place, and his body didn’t bend. “At least you look like you could carry a tray of food.” Sealy pointed toward two large platters, each stacked with food, then rattled off directions. “And don’t drop those plates,” he added as Tasha and Rollan exited the kitchen.

Tasha remained quiet as she followed Rollan down the corridor. He was walking too quickly for her to catch up and see his face. Was he so upset with her that he couldn’t even talk?

Finally, she said, “I know you’re mad. I’m sorry. I’m just ... I don’t like bullies.”

Rollan stopped walking. His eyes were too blank for Tasha to read. “Yeah, what you did was a little crazy,” he said. “But you did the right thing.”

“So you’re not mad? I thought, since you weren’t saying anything—”

He shook his head. “No, I was thinking about what Meilin would have done. She doesn’t like bullies, either. Remind me to tell you about how she jumped into shark-infested waters to save some whales.”

There it was again—that sadness. While she could often feel Ninani enhancing her powers of perception, she didn’t need the Great Beast’s help to see this.

“I’m sure she’s okay,” Tasha said. “From what I’ve heard, she’s one of the Greencloaks’ finest warriors.”

Rollan nodded. “If by finest you mean most stubborn, then yes, you’re correct.” He regripped his tray, and they continued walking. “Plus, do you know how big this place is? If we were on cleaning duty, we’d be mopping all day.”

They continued down another long corridor before coming to a grand dining hall. Tasha cautiously entered the room. Large, multicolored tapestries hung from the ceiling to the floor of each wall. She had known many weavers in Stetriol, and knew that it would have taken them months to create artwork so exquisite.

Tasha took a few more steps into the room. “Hello?” she called out.

“Please, come in,” a woman said. Tasha hadn’t seen her before she spoke. The woman wore a loose, flowing red dress, causing her to almost blend in with the room’s satin curtains. She moved away from the window. “I’m LaReimaja,” she said. “You must be the new servants Faisel hired. You may put those on the table.”

Tasha started to move forward, then suddenly went flying. She tried to grab the plates on her tray as she fell, which only caused her to land even harder on the woven rug.

Rollan rushed to her. “Tasha?” he whispered.

“I’m fine,” she said. Most of her plates had overturned, spilling dates, grains, and slices of bread on the floor. Luckily, none of the dishes had broken. Then she noticed the overturned bowl of butter she had been carrying. She crawled to it and flipped it over. The soft butter had already begun to seep into the carpet.

“Oh no,” she moaned as she tried to sop it up with the edge of her dress.

“My dear, it’s okay,” LaReimaja said as she knelt beside Tasha. The lady pointed to Rollan. “There are some towels in the adjacent room,” she said to him.

As Rollan ran off, Tasha dared to look at the woman. Lady LaReimaja was very beautiful, with warm features and dark tan skin. Her friendly eyes were the color of coffee, a drink that the Greencloaks had brought with them to Stetriol and which smelled to Tasha like earth and honey. “I’m am so, so sorry,” Tasha began. “Your carpet—”

“—is just that. Only a carpet.” LaReimaja began picking up the scattered food. Then she paused and placed her hands against one of the green-and-yellow floral designs woven into the rug. “With as much time as I spend in this room, I tend to forget that this carpet is even here.” She patted it. “It’s one of my favorites. I made it years ago. Another lifetime.”

Rollan returned with a few towels in his hands. He hesitated once he reached them, his eyes on LaReimaja. “Will these work?” he finally asked.

“Thank you. These will be fine,” LaReimaja said, taking one of the towels. She began blotting the carpet where the soft butter had spilled. “Why don’t you try to wipe up that jam?” she said to Rollan.

Rollan moved to another part of the carpet and did as he was instructed, but Tasha noticed how, every so often, he would turn and gaze at the woman, each glance longer than the one before. It was as if he was searching her face for something.

Maybe LaReimaja reminded him of his mother. Tasha certainly felt that way. As they worked together to clean up the mess, Tasha thought back to how she and her mother would work together to clean the house while her father traveled from village to village, taking care of people’s horses.

She hoped that she would see her parents again, and that they were safe.

Tasha noticed that LaReimaja had cleaned up all the butter and was now patting the carpet again.

“It’s really beautiful,” Tasha said, touching the carpet as well. “Did you also create the tapestries?”

LaReimaja nodded. “I probably knew how to weave before I could walk. My family owned a carpet shop in the market—my siblings and I would weave the carpets at night and sell them during the day. But after marrying Faisel, I no longer had to make carpets for profit. I could truly engage in the art of loommanship.” She sighed. “However, there are only so many tapestries you can weave before even that becomes mundane.”

Tasha returned to scooping up the grain. She had almost finished when a large, bearded man entered the room. “What is this?” he demanded.

LaReimaja quickly rose to her feet. Tasha started to get up, but LaReimaja nudged her back to the carpet. “It’s nothing, Faisel,” she said, dropping the towel.

“Did these servants—”

“It was my fault,” she said as she rushed to her husband. “I wasn’t paying attention to where I was walking. I collided with the girl and caused her to spill everything.” She took Faisel’s arm and led him to the table. “But there is plenty of food on the other tray if you would like to eat.”

“I have more things to worry about than food,” he said, shaking her arm away. “Our guests begin arriving tonight, and your son still can’t control his spirit animal.”

“Cabaro isn’t any ordinary spirit animal,” LaReimaja said. “And I don’t think the connection works like that. It’s a partnership—”

“If I didn’t know any better, I would say that you sound like a Greencloak.” He picked up a date and bit into it. “I’ve doubled the guards. There’s no way that Dante and his band of Greencloaks are getting inside this castle.”

Tasha had finished cleaning up the food near her, but didn’t dare move to a different location. A few paces away, Rollan pretended to clean the same spot in the carpet, over and over again.

“I know you don’t favor the Greencloaks, but they may be able to help Kirat,” LaReimaja said as she offered Faisel another date. “They cannot be any worse than all those advisers you hired.”

“Well, you’re right about that—those experts are useless. I’ve already dismissed most of them.” He picked up another date. At this rate, Tasha assumed there would be nothing left for LaReimaja to eat. “But an interesting thing happened during Kirat’s breakfast. One of the servants actually stood up to Cabaro. And the lion backed down.”

“Who? Was it Ahmar?”

Faisel smiled, causing a tremor to run through Tasha’s body. He reminded her of the Reptile King’s crocodile. She had seen it once, from afar, during the war. “No, it was one of the new servants. A girl with braids—probably from the savannahs, by the look of her.”

Tasha and Rollan looked at each other. Abeke.

LaReimaja sighed. “Faisel, you promised not to expose the younger servants to Cabaro. Remember what happened to the milk girl?”

Faisel shrugged. “It’s just some village girl. Better for her to lose a few fingers than one of my staff.” He picked up the last of the dates, then walked toward the door. He paused before exiting. “LaReimaja, make sure those servants clean that carpet so it’s spotless. I would hate for someone else to lose a few fingers.”

ADRIFT

LIKE IT HAD BEEN YESTERDAY, AND THE DAY BEFORE, and perhaps even the day before that, the water surrounding their small boat was still, dark, and quiet.

Conor couldn't go to sleep.

He was bone tired, and the many days of remaining so inactive in the boat had made his muscles loose, almost as if they were beginning to forget how to work. He knew that if he slept, he would be able to escape from the dryness in his mouth and the ache in his stomach, at least for a little while.

But every time Conor began to drift off to sleep, he could feel the Wyrms probing his mind. Trying to control him. The whispers had grown louder. And his dreams, once filled with images from the green fields of Trunswick, were now dark and troubling. When he closed his eyes, he still returned to his homeland, but the once-green grass was now dead and brown. Trees and fences were stained with blood. A battle raged throughout the town, with him and the Many on one side, and his friends on the other. And his friends were losing.

Briggan nudged his leg, pulling him out of his current thoughts. He scratched the wolf's muzzle. Conor knew he should put Briggan into his passive state. He was the only animal on the boat—even Kovo had agreed to return to the tattoo on Takoda's neck once they realized that he could no longer help with the rowing. Conor had found a few scraps of leathery, stale jerky deep in his pockets, but that was almost gone. Soon, all that would be left was the rockweed. He wasn't sure if Briggan would even eat it.

He thought about searching through their meager supplies to find something—anything—for Briggan to eat, but he would have to depend more on touch than sight, and that would wake everyone up.

They were down to their last wooden torch. The two glowing spheres that Takoda had found in the caves had already dulled from warm green to dark brown. And the orb that had been attached to the anglerfish had gone dark only a few moments after being separated from the fish.

Conor knew that Meilin felt responsible for everything that had happened during the attack. They had lost their paddle and were now at the mercy of the current. Conor still believed they would make it to the Evertree—eventually. The current seemed to be slowly pulling them in the direction of the Wym. He just hoped he could hold on to his sanity until then.

And then what? he wondered. How were they going to defeat the Wym? They could barely escape an anglerfish.

Briggan nudged his leg again. “I’m sorry, was I drifting again?” he asked. Then he looked at Briggan, his ears sitting straight up on his head, the fur on his neck stiff.

“What is it?” Conor asked.

Briggan looked at Conor, then turned his attention back to whatever was out there. Conor calmed himself and tried to push away everything clogging his mind. Eventually, he found Briggan in the abyss and tapped into his power. The world became even quieter for a second, and then he heard it. Talking. No ... singing.

Someone was out there on the water.

“Wake up, guys!” Conor yelled. He shook Meilin and then Takoda. “Do you hear that? It’s singing.” He pointed. “It’s coming from that way.”

Meilin shook her head, causing her black hair to cascade over her eyes. “I don’t hear anything.”

“Me neither,” Takoda said.

“I couldn’t either, not at first,” Conor said. “But Briggan is helping to enhance my senses.” He rubbed the wolf’s flank. “You hear it, too, right?”

The wolf howled, then nodded. He shakily rose from the belly of the boat, padded to the edge, and pointed his snout in the same direction that Conor had indicated.

Meilin began pulling her hair into a ponytail. “It could just be the wind,” she said. “Or worse, another strange animal intent on killing us.”

“No,” Conor said. “I hear words.” He went silent and let himself tap into Briggan’s hearing. “I’m positive. It’s a group of people singing.”

Takoda pursed his lips together as he studied Conor. It was clear that Takoda was focusing on the black mark making its way up Conor’s neck.

“It’s not the parasite or the Wurm,” Conor added defiantly. “I’m sure.” But was he? How could he even trust his senses?

“Well, even if it is singing, there isn’t much we can do about it,” Takoda said. “It’s not like we can paddle ourselves to them.”

Meilin shifted her body and crossed her arms. Conor knew that Takoda hadn’t been trying to scold or blame Meilin, but she clearly took it that way.

“We have one other option,” Conor said. “We can light the last torch.”

Takoda rubbed his jaw. “I don’t know, Conor. It’s not that I don’t trust you—”

“Then what is it?” Conor asked, his voice hard.

“What if you’re wrong?” Takoda asked. “We might use our last torch, and then be totally in the dark.”

“We’re running out of food,” Conor said. And out of time, he almost added. “Those people out there could help us.”

“Or they could be our enemy,” Meilin said. She slowly stood and moved closer to the two boys. “Or we could light the torch and go unnoticed, and we would be right back in the same position, except without any other light.” Meilin scratched the tattoo on the back of her hand. “Jhi enhances my abilities in many ways, but not in hearing or sight,” she said. “Does Kovo?”

Takoda shook his head. “No. At least not yet. But there’s much about our bond that I still don’t understand.”

Meilin looked into Conor’s eyes. “Are you sure about this?”

“I think it’s our best chance,” Conor said.

“Then that’s good enough for me,” Meilin said. “Takoda?”

He exhaled long and hard, before finally nodding. “I don’t agree, but I’ll defer to your wisdom.” He picked up the torch and handed it to Conor. “You’re the tallest. You give us the best chance of being seen.”

“We should tie it to my quarterstaff with some rope,” Meilin said. She began rummaging through the boat. “That will get it even higher.”

Once they’d lashed the torch onto the staff, Conor lit it and hoisted it high above his head.

“I would call Kovo to hold it,” Takoda said, “but I’m afraid that he would just put it out. He’s ... not your biggest fan. I don’t know if he would believe you.”

“Are you talking about me or Conor?” Meilin asked.

“Um, both of you,” he replied.

Conor tried to ignore their banter, and instead focused on holding the torch high above his head. He tried to wave it a few times, but after almost dropping it, he decided it would be best to hold it still. But his hands were slippery with sweat, and his shoulders ached. He wasn’t sure how much longer he could keep it raised.

Suddenly, Jhi appeared beside Conor. “Please help him, Jhi,” Meilin said. “Conor needs all his concentration to keep the staff still and high.”

Conor immediately felt his heart rate slow down. His arms burned, but not nearly as much. The panda had placed her body right beside Conor, causing everything else to fade away to the background.

Conor looked up. The torch, once blazing bright, had begun to die down. He still hadn’t seen any response from the dark sea. The singing seemed to have stopped, but Conor didn’t know if that was because Jhi was suppressing the outside world, helping Conor focus on the here and now.

Then, finally, a blue light ignited far in the distance. Then another, and a third after that. Jhi pulled away from him, and the real world came rushing back.

“I think they see us,” Meilin said. She took the staff from Conor. “And now, we wait.”

THE MELEAGER

CONOR WAS THE FIRST TO SEE THE SMALL SKIFF MAKING its way through the water to them. All Takoda and Meilin could see was a blue glowstone slowly floating through the darkness. For all Takoda knew, it was another anglerfish and not a boat. But perhaps none of that mattered anymore. Whatever it was, it was on its way, and there was nothing that Takoda and the others could do about it anymore.

Takoda picked up his cloak and fastened it around his shoulders. He pulled it high in order to hide Kovo's mark on his neck. "They'll be here soon. You should probably ask your spirit animals to return to passive form before then."

Meilin leaned over and stared Jhi in the eyes. A second later, she disappeared.

"Conor, did you hear me?" Takoda asked.

Conor looked at Briggan, then at Meilin. "Don't let me fall asleep before releasing him," Conor said.

Meilin frowned. "Conor, nothing is going to happen—"

"Just promise me!" he yelled, his face becoming twisted and angry. He kicked out at a random bag—the one containing what remained of their rockweed. Takoda yelped and caught it just before it went over the edge of the boat.

Meilin held her hands up in front of her. "Conor, you have to calm down," she said, her voice barely audible over the sound of water lapping against the boat. "You're rocking the boat too much. Look at Briggan."

The wolf's legs wobbled underneath him as he tried to position himself between Conor and Meilin. Briggan whimpered, but kept moving until he had blocked Conor from her.

Conor blinked, and his blue eyes returned to normal. "I'm ... I'm so sorry." He hid his face in his hands. "What's happening to me?"

Meilin placed her hand on Conor's shoulder. "Just ask Briggan to return to his dormant state," she said. "He won't do it if he doesn't trust you."

Conor nodded. Seconds later, the Great Wolf vanished in a flash.

"See," Meilin said. "Briggan believes in you, and so do I. You can beat this, Conor."

Instead of answering, Conor retreated to the far side of the boat, away from Meilin and Takoda.

Takoda stepped toward Meilin as she continued to pack their supplies. "The ship will be here soon," Takoda said. "It would be nice to get a real meal. You know, something better than rockweed. Maybe even something warm. Or sweet." He cast another look at Conor, who was silently staring off into the sea. "It will also give us a chance to rest and restock our supplies. We have to be at full strength in order to face what's ahead."

Meilin stopped packing the bag. "Takoda, cut the small talk. Neither of us have the time or energy to tiptoe around whatever's on your mind. Just say it, and let's get this over with."

Takoda felt his face warm. He wasn't used to someone being so blunt. The monks, while direct, often found a way to soften their displeasure with their tone and choice of words. That was not Meilin's way.

"Conor isn't getting better," Takoda whispered. "You remember what Xanthe said. They weren't able to save any of the Many."

"He will be different."

"Meilin—"

"You worry about keeping Kovo in line. I'll take care of Conor," she said. "Now, are we done?" she asked, starting to move away. "The ship will be here soon."

Takoda slid in front of her, blocking her path. "I promise I'm not trying to be difficult. I am hoping for the best for Conor. But we need a contingency plan.”

Meilin’s eyes narrowed. She picked up her quarterstaff and spun it in her hands. “As I said, I will take care of Conor. One way or another. Understood?”

Takoda nodded and stepped out of her way. Their confrontation was just another example of how she reminded him of Kovo. Both were willing to do what they felt was necessary, perhaps even at the sake of their own souls. He couldn’t imagine attacking one of the monks from his monastery. But Kovo had battled the other Great Beasts because he believed he was right and they were wrong. And now, Meilin was willing to face her friend if Conor eventually turned. Would Takoda ever be as brave as them?

He finished packing his belongings, then joined Meilin and Conor at the starboard side of the boat.

Across the yellow sea, the skiff was now close enough for him to see it. Oars moved in sync as they sliced through the water. In. Out. Up. Down. Back. Forth.

“One thing is certain,” Meilin said. “They aren’t infected. There’s no way that the Many would be so organized.”

The strangers’ glowstone went dark as the skiff came to a stop. Takoda could make out faint humanoid silhouettes on the boat—it almost looked like the people were blue-skinned. A horn blew in the distance. “Identify yourselves,” someone yelled from the skiff. “What city do you hail from?”

Meilin pointed to herself, and Takoda nodded in agreement. Then she leaned forward. “We are travelers, new to this land,” she yelled, her voice sounding much stronger than her slight build would have indicated. “We became adrift in the Sulfur Sea and have been at the mercy of the currents ever since.” She looked at Conor. “We would be grateful for any assistance.”

“And what can you offer us in return for our help?” the person on the other ship replied.

Meilin covered her mouth. “Great,” she whispered. “Pirates.” She turned back toward the ship and cupped her hands around her mouth. “We don’t have anything of value on hand, but if you take us aboard your vessel and give us safe passage, we'll find a means to compensate you."

"In other words, you have nothing to pay or barter!"

"No! We have considerable wealth," Meilin said. "It just ... isn't here."

"And where is it? At the bottom of the sea?" Takoda thought he heard laughter from the pirate boat. "Unless you own gills, your treasure is now useless to you."

Takoda leaned over toward Meilin. "The truth?" he whispered.

Meilin shrugged, then nodded. "It's ... aboveground," she yelled. "We are from Erdas."

Silence passed between the two boats for a few minutes. Takoda was not a fighter, but he would have felt more at ease with a weapon in his hand.

The boat began moving again, and the skiff's glowstone was reignited. Takoda realized that a young woman was holding the orb. She moved to the bow of the pirates' boat. Takoda had never seen a pirate before, but he had heard countless stories about them at the monastery. They were described as rough, unkempt, and untrustworthy, usually covered in dirt and grime. The worst stories always featured a captain with rotting teeth, a peg for a leg, and a hook for an arm.

This pirate looked nothing like that. Her gray coat and trousers were neat, perhaps even pressed. Her pale hair was covered with a bandanna, with a single braid hanging over her shoulder. Her sleeves were rolled up to her elbows. A network of small blue veins snaked up her pale arms.

"I am Teutar, first mate of the mighty Meleager." She held up the light and peered at them. "So, this is what uplanders look like."

Takoda didn't respond. He wasn't sure if she was really asking them a question or not.

"Is it only you three?"

They nodded.

"Grab your gear and climb aboard," she said. "We're not usually in the business of taking stowaways, but our captain has always been the curious type. You can take up your request for safe passage with her."

The pirates maneuvered the boat next to them. Meilin stepped on first, followed by Conor and Takoda. The skiff was full, with two pirates to a seat. Takoda realized that they were all women.

Yet another thing to readjust to. In the stories he'd heard at the monastery, the pirates had always been large, bearded men.

Takoda also noticed that all the pirates had a patchwork of blue veins crisscrossing their arms. Some even spread to their necks.

"Like 'em?" Teutar asked. She flexed her arm, and the blue began to glow. Takoda then realized that they weren't veins, but instead a series of intricate, swirling tattoos. "We use special ink to make them light up when we want them to," she said. "Bet you've never seen a fancy tattoo like this aboveground, have you?"

Takoda forced himself to keep his face passive and emotionless. "Yes, very impressive." He wondered if he would have a chance to show off his tattoo.

Slowly, the pirates' ship came into view. He had thought that the Tellun's Pride II was massive, but it was nothing compared to the pirates' vessel. It contained three masts, all reaching so high that they seemed to puncture the blackness above. Cannons sat along the edge of the ship, each seemingly large enough for Takoda and Kovo to climb into, with room to spare.

"Welcome to the Meleager," Teutar said. The crew navigated themselves alongside the ship, where a few ropes hung from above. They attached the ropes to the skiff and were hoisted up.

Takoda tried to ignore all the eyes on him as he stepped onto the deck of the Meleager. He pulled the collar of his cloak tighter around his neck and moved forward.

"Where's the captain?" Teutar asked once the last of the crew had exited the skiff. "She will want to meet these three immediately."

Slowly, the group of pirates shifted and parted. A tall and wiry woman stepped from the crowd. Like the others, her arms and legs were covered in blue tattoos. But hers seemed to be alive, swirling and moving as she walked toward them. "I am Atalanta, captain of the Meleager." She pulled a cutlass from her side. "Who are you?" Then she frowned. "No. What are you?"

Teutar stepped forward. “They’re upsiders,” she said, her voice now much more quiet.

“Impossible!” the captain replied. The tattoos on her arm lit up and began to swirl furiously.

“It’s true,” Meilin said. She made a small bow toward the woman. Takoda and Conor quickly did the same. “We are from above,” Meilin continued. “We were exploring a cave when it collapsed. We’ve been stuck underground ever since.”

Technically not a lie, Takoda thought.

“And how did you come to find the Sulfur Sea?” the captain asked.

“We had a guide—a girl from Phos Astos,” Meilin replied. “But as we crossed the Arachane Fields, we became separated. With no guide to lead us, we finally decided to take to the sea, but lost our oars during an attack from a large anglerfish.”

Atalanta nodded. “Good thing you didn’t try to get into the water. They don’t like our flesh—the ink helps to keep them away—but I bet they would have found you plenty tasty.” The tattoos on her arms stilled and returned to their normal, dull blue. “So, what’s it like up above?” She circled them, then poked Takoda’s shoulder. “Are they all small like you?”

“We come in all sizes, shapes, and colors,” Takoda said. “We would be honored to tell you more about the land above ... perhaps over a meal?”

Atalanta laughed. “Stories for food? Hmm, not quite as profitable as gold or equipment, but I do love a good story.” She slapped him on the shoulder, almost causing Takoda’s legs to buckle. “Come. Tell me your tales. If I’m impressed, I won’t throw you overboard.” Although she was smiling when she said it, Takoda wasn’t sure if her comment was a joke or a real threat.

As they fell into step behind the captain and her first mate, Meilin grabbed Takoda’s arm. “Please tell me you have something impressive to share. Something more exciting than sitting on a hillside in blue robes and chanting.”

He smiled. “We do more than chant,” he said. “And not all of us wear blue robes. Saffron is just as popular.” He waited for Meilin to smile at his joke. When she didn't, he said, "Don't worry. I think I have a tale that will be exciting enough for our new friends. That is, unless you would like to tell the first story. Perhaps something from Zhong, or from the war?"

Something flashed in her eyes, as if she was remembering a painful memory. "Some stories don't deserve to be celebrated."

"But it's through stories that we remember those who came before us," he said. "It's how we honor the fallen."

She shrugged. "Perhaps. But not today." She hesitated, then said, "But ask me again later, and I'll tell you my father's story. He was a great general, a noble warrior, and a wonderful father. And then maybe you'll tell me more about your parents, too?"

"It's a deal," Takoda said.

She quickly moved away from him to join Conor. When Takoda had learned of the Four Heroes of Erdas, he had only heard stories about Meilin in battle. Of how, even at such a young age, she was one of the Greencloaks' greatest warriors. He'd spent so much time thinking about his own parents, he didn't stop to consider that others—even the Heroes of Erdas—had lost loved ones during the war.

Meilin's father had paid the ultimate price. And now, so had Xanthe.

Takoda followed Atalanta, Teutar, and a small group of pirates into a windowless room. Blue orbs hung from the ceiling, casting out faint amounts of light. Even with the orbs, it took Takoda a few moments for his eyes to adjust. Then he noticed the table. This must have been where they dined. Atalanta sat down first. The rest of the crew took seats around her. She pointed to a few chairs. "Sit," she said. "You're lucky. Our cook just whipped up a batch of brinefish and mushrooms. Let's see how you uplanders do with a real Sadrean meal." Then she pointed to Takoda. "Now, where is my story?"

Takoda remained standing while the others sat down. It was how the monks in the order all told stories, and it would have felt uncomfortable to do otherwise. After thinking for a few moments, he decided to tell the story about the founder of their monastery, a great soldier who eventually tired of war, sold his possessions, and began their order. Takoda considered embellishing certain parts, especially the portion of their founder's time as a mercenary, but quickly changed his mind. It was one thing to stretch the truth, but something else entirely to lie about it. It felt disrespectful to both himself and the founder.

As he talked, Atalanta, Teutar, and the other members of the crew cheered at all the parts of the story about war and battle, which he had expected. However, the crew became quiet and contemplative at the redemptive parts of the tale, which greatly surprised Takoda. These pirates were nothing like the stories he had heard at the monastery.

Platters of food continued to be served as he talked. Everyone, including his friends, were able to eat as much as they wanted. Takoda noticed Meilin slipping slices of meat and bread into her bag, hopefully for their spirit animals.

Once Takoda finished his story, he sat down and loaded food onto his own plate. After eating nothing but rockweed for the past few days, the dried, leathery fish and slimy mushrooms tasted like the best of Niloan desserts. He ate quickly and asked for a second plate.

Meilin leaned into Takoda. "Eat fast," she whispered. "We don't have much time." Then she nodded toward Conor. His forehead was covered in sweat. He had only eaten half of his food, and was now staring at the wall.

"He needs to rest," Takoda said. "Perhaps Jhi—"

"There isn't much more she can do for him," Meilin said. "Stopping the Wyrms is the only way to save him now."

Takoda quickly ate a few pieces of fish from his second plate, then slipped the rest of the food into his pockets. "Thank you, Captain," he said. "The meal was excellent."

"As was the story," she said. She stabbed a piece of fish with her knife. "Perhaps now you all will tell me the real reason you were adrift on the Sulfur Sea," she said before popping the fish into her mouth.

The room went quiet as the pirates heard this. Every head turned, focused on the three uplanders.

Meilin slowly pushed her plate away. "You're correct. We didn't travel this way by chance. We came in search of the Evertree."

A few of the pirates began to murmur, but Atalanta motioned for them to be quiet. "I assumed as much," she said. "Congratulations on surviving the Arachane Fields and the Sulfur Sea. I applaud your bravery. A lesser group would have turned back.”

“So will you take us there?” Takoda asked.

Atalanta shook her head. “My friends, there is no profit in that. Only death.”

“But surely you have encountered the Many,” Meilin said. “The Evertree is sick, and the Wyrms are growing stronger with each passing moment. If we don’t find a way to defeat it, both of our worlds will be destroyed.” She looked at each of the pirates at the table. “Phos Astos has fallen. For all we know, you may be the last of your people.”

Atalanta sat back in her chair. “What proof do you have that this is true?”

“We were there,” Takoda said. “They fought bravely, but fell quickly. In less than an hour, the city was completely overwhelmed by the Many.”

The captain let out a long sigh. “And you say this is all tied to the Evertree?”

Teutar leaned toward Atalanta and banged her fist against the table. “You surely can’t be considering taking them—”

“The last time I checked, I was the captain of this vessel. Not you or anyone else.” Atalanta rose from her seat. “Come. Enough talk of this for today. You should rest. We will discuss what to do with you tomorrow.”

Meilin and Takoda quickly stood from their seats, while Conor struggled to push himself away from the table.

“What’s wrong with this one?” one of the pirates asked, walking toward Conor. She took a swig of her drink and wiped her mouth with the back of her hand. “Ate too much fish?”

Takoda rushed around the table to help Conor, but the pirate had already reached him. She took him by the arm and easily yanked him to his feet. Then she dropped her mug and stumbled away from him. “He’s been infected!”

Takoda stepped between Conor and the pirate.

Meilin joined him a second later. “He’s fine,” she said.

“You brought one of the infected onto my ship?” Atalanta yelled. Her tattoos swirled over her skin, casting the entire room in an ethereal blue glow. “You must kill him. Now.”

“Not going to happen,” Meilin said, tightening her grip on her quarterstaff.

“Friend, I wasn’t asking,” Atalanta said. In a flash, an enormous bullfrog appeared at her side. It was easily as large as Jhi. The bullfrog flicked its tongue like a whip. It circled Meilin’s staff and then yanked it away.

“You aren’t the only one with a spirit animal,” Takoda said, pulling back his cloak.

Instantly, Kovo appeared. He let out a loud, deafening roar, causing all the pirates to step backward. The ape picked up two chairs and flung them at the nearest of the crew. One was able to duck in time, but the other fell into a slump as the chair exploded against her.

“Get help!” Teutar said to one of the pirates. Then she drew her sword and advanced.

“We won’t be able to fight them all,” Takoda said.

Kovo roared again, then picked up a large wooden table and swung it like a club, taking out two more attackers. Most of the others had wisely backed up, remaining outside of Kovo’s swing.

Most ... but not all. Teutar timed her advance perfectly, ducking underneath the table and rushing toward the group. Meilin picked up a chair and blocked her thrust before it could connect. Teutar continued to cut away at the chair, slice by slice. Meilin was down to holding the leg when Takoda felt a rush of hot air beside him. Then Briggan leaped into the air, landing beside Teutar. The wolf bit into her arm, and Teutar screamed in pain, lowering her sword. That gave Meilin enough of an opening to strike. A flurry of rapid blows that were almost too fast to see sent Teutar tumbling backward into the row of pirates.

Kovo stepped between them, now holding the table like a shield.

Takoda pointed to the door behind them. It was the only way out of the room. With the pirates between them and the door, there was no way to escape ... but maybe they could force the pirates out.

“The door!” Takoda yelled. “Push them out!”

Kovo lumbered toward the ship’s crew with a menacing grin, looking more than pleased with this plan. The last pirate had just scrambled out of the room before the enormous gorilla rammed the table into the doorway, effectively barricading it. The pirates yelled from the other side, but they couldn't get into the room—at least for the time being.

Takoda glanced at Conor as he began tying up one of the unconscious pirates with a length of rope. “Didn't know if I was going to be able to call Briggan. The bond is so weak, and my head feels really foggy. It's like everything is out of focus.” Conor paused to wipe the sweat from his brow. “I can't put him back into passive.”

“We have bigger problems than that,” Meilin said. “We're stuck in a room with no way out, and an army of pirates between us and the nearest boat.” She picked up her quarterstaff. “I hope Atalanta is the only one with a spirit animal.”

Then something very loud, and very large, rammed into the door. The table scooted back, but Kovo quickly smashed it back into place. Atalanta's bullfrog croaked from the other side, and the door didn't move again.

“I hope that frog is all right,” Takoda said, wincing.

“Speak for yourself,” Meilin said. She quickly surveyed the room. “At least the crew left some of their weapons in here before they retreated.” She placed her quarterstaff on the table, then picked up a sword that had been dropped. She tried to hand it to Takoda, but he shook his head.

“I've never used a sword before.”

“Well, there's a first time for everything,” Meilin replied. Jhi appeared a moment later in a flash of light. She looked around before finding Conor, then lumbered over to him and began licking his face.

“Jhi hasn't given up on him,” Meilin said to Takoda. She pushed the sword into his hand, and this time he took it. “And as long as he fights, so will we.”

CONFRONTING KIRAT

IT WAS STILL DARK WHEN ABEKE WOKE. SHE TOOK A FEW deep breaths and tried to slow her rapidly beating heart. She had been dreaming. She was in Okaihee with her father and sister. She and her sister had just returned from collecting water from the river when Rumfuss the Boar charged into the hut, destroying it. Abeke released Uraza. The Great Beasts squared off while she grabbed her bow and collected her arrows. Then Dinesh appeared, followed by Suka and Tellun. Her father launched a spear into the elephant's side, but that only seemed to make the animal angrier. Dinesh charged at them, but they were able to dodge the elephant's ivory tusks. They escaped from the hut, with Abeke taking the lead.

She stopped once they reached the edge of their village. That's when she noticed the black swirls on her father's and sister's foreheads. She loaded her bow and arrow and warned them to stay where they were. They charged her anyway, their eyes blank.

Then she woke up. Thankfully.

Abeke slipped out of bed and placed her bare feet on the cool floor. Then, after a few seconds of concentration, she released Uraza. Even with Uraza just a few steps from her, Abeke could hardly feel their bond. She rubbed Uraza's spotted flank and immediately felt calmer. They would find a way through this. Together.

After a few seconds, the leopard left Abeke's side and slinked toward the door.

“I’m sorry, girl,” Abeke said as Uraza pawed the wooden door. “You know I can’t be seen with you. There’s only one Uraza the Leopard, and she isn’t bonded to a serving girl.”

She pulled a few strips of bacon from her bag and tossed three to Uraza. It had been easy to pilfer the food from one of the discarded plates that Kirat had barely touched. Abeke had to struggle to hold her temper every time Kirat picked at his food and then cast it away, barely eaten. She had seen enough food wasted to last her village for an entire season. And it wasn’t just the horrible-tasting food that he had cast aside—it was desserts! Custard and cakes and honey-covered biscuits. She didn’t care how much wealth she had, she would never pass up a lemon custard.

Abeke held out another rasher of bacon for Uraza, but instead of letting it go, she used it to play tug-of-war. Uraza played along for a while, growling and grunting at her. But eventually, Uraza released the bacon, causing Abeke to fly backward into the legs of Rollan’s bed.

“Hey, some of us are trying to sleep here,” Rollan grumbled, his eyes still closed. “Watch where you’re walking, Tasha.”

Abeke took the bacon and tapped the wet end against Rollan’s ear. His eyes flashed open. “You don’t have to blame everything on Tasha,” she said.

“Yeah,” Tasha added. She tried to rise from bed, but her blanket was still twisted around her legs, causing her to tumble.

Rollan rolled his eyes. “What were you saying?”

Abeke smiled. “Well, since you’re awake, you might as well get up,” she said. “It will be light soon. You don’t want to miss breakfast.”

“Maybe we could skip,” Tasha said as she began braiding her hair. “LaReimaja is so nice, I’ll bet she would let us eat some of her leftovers.”

“I wish,” Rollan said. “Could you imagine the trouble we’d be in if Faisel walked in on us scarfing down one of those sticky buns?”

“It may be worth taking a chance, if Sealy prepares the same mush that he tried to force on us yesterday,” Tasha said. Then she started humming to herself.

Rollan sat up with a startled expression, his back as straight as Zourtzi's walls. "What are you singing?"

Tasha finished her braid. "Just something I heard LaReimaja singing to herself yesterday during her lunch, when she was trying to convince herself to try Sealy's monkey eyeball soup." She shrugged as she looked at Abeke. "Supposedly, it's a delicacy in the Kaisung Mountains."

"If I can, I'll try to retrieve some of Kirat's leftovers," Abeke said.

"No thanks," Rollan said. "I don't want a spoiled rich kid's hand-me-downs."

Tasha cleared her throat. "Um, I wouldn't mind some plums."

"Plums for one, it is." Abeke scratched Uraza's belly. The leopard stretched out, splaying her claws, and purred softly. "Hopefully I'll find some time to speak to Kirat, without his advisers or father hovering around."

"Have you figured out how you're going to get him to come along?" Rollan asked.

Abeke shook her head. "Outside of force ... I'm unsure. Do you think you could speak to Faisel's wife about it? If she's as understanding as you and Tasha claim she is, maybe she could be an ally."

Rollan rubbed his jaw. "Maybe. Faisel's hatred of Greencloaks runs deep, but LaReimaja seems more even-tempered about us. She even understands how the bond works between us and our spirit animals."

"Do you think she has a spirit animal?" Abeke asked. After Tasha and Rollan shook their heads, Abeke rose to her feet. "Well, I should get moving. Faisel wants his son's breakfast delivered early this morning. He's taking Kirat gazelle hunting with some of his guests." Abeke smiled. "Maybe that'll get Cabaro to move, and at least act like a lion. Usually he just lays there and waits for me to place his food before him."

"That doesn't surprise me. His laziness transcended even death," Rollan said. "Knowing Cabaro, he only picked you because he likes the idea of you and Uraza waiting on him hand and foot."

Uraza growled, seemingly in agreement.

"Hush, Uraza. Not you, too!" Abeke said. "I don't even know if Cabaro remembers me. I only saw him once, at the Evertree."

A scowl spread across Rollan's face. "Consider yourself lucky."

Abeke tossed the last piece of bacon to Uraza. She didn't like to see her friend like this, so angry and sullen. She knew he was cranky because he was worried about Meilin, but it was clear there was more to it.

She knelt in front of Rollan. "I wasn't with you when Tarik and Lumeo fell. I know how—"

Rollan fiercely shook his head. "I don't want to talk about it."

"I understand." She patted his hand. "But if you do, you know you can."

He looked at the floor for a long time, not speaking. Finally, he nodded, mumbled an acknowledgment of Abeke's comment, then walked to the window.

Tasha cleared her throat again. "So, how about that breakfast?"

"There's one other option we should talk about before we leave," Rollan said, still staring out the window. "Maybe we shouldn't try to take Kirat."

"Zerif will eventually come for him," Abeke said.

"But can he get to him?" Rollan asked, turning around to face her. "You've both seen how protected this castle is. If Zourtzi was strong enough to keep the Conquerors at bay during the war, then perhaps it could keep Zerif out, too. It's at least worth considering." Rollan glanced at Tasha. "And maybe Kirat's not the only one who should remain."

Tasha's hands balled into fists. "You want me to stay here?" she asked, her voice rising. "I know I'm a little clumsy, but I deserve a chance to fight for Erdas, like you and Abeke."

"The best thing you can do for Erdas is to keep Ninani safe," Rollan said. "And that might mean staying here. I'm sure if we explained it to LaReimaja, she would find a way to keep you within the fortress."

"And what about you and Abeke?" Tasha demanded. "Will you remain in Zourtzi as well?"

"We can't," Rollan said. "But perhaps, when Dante gets well he can stay with you and—"

"Enough," Abeke said. "None of us are staying here." Abeke moved to the center of the room and crossed her arms. Uraza stood beside her. She didn't want to come across as taking over—they were a team, and everyone deserved to have a say. But she also knew that she had to keep them focused on their mission. She looked squarely at Rollan. “I may not know Cabaro, but I know Zerif. I’ve seen his methods up close. Trust me, he will come, and he will take Cabaro and any other spirit animal he can find.”

Rollan nodded. “Fair enough.” After Tasha remained stone-faced on the other side of the room, he added, “It was only a suggestion, Tasha. I just want you to be safe.”

“The next time you want to volunteer someone to hide from a fight, start with yourself first,” Tasha said.

Rollan sighed as Tasha yanked open the door and marched out of the room. “And I thought Meilin was a handful,” he muttered.

“Come, my friend,” Abeke said. She flexed her arm, and Uraza disappeared. “Let’s get breakfast.”

Abeke only had a few moments to swallow down her food before she had to rush to gather Kirat and Cabaro’s meals. As their primary server, she was solely responsible for delivering breakfast and lunch to Kirat’s personal dining room. She quickly loaded the food onto a cart and wheeled it through the halls. She knew she was running late, and prepared herself to be scolded by Kirat and whomever else was in attendance. The bell in the northern tower chimed just as she arrived at the room.

It was empty.

Surely Kirat hadn’t left before breakfast. If he had, Sealy would have stopped her from delivering the food. She went ahead and laid all the plates out on the table. She even served the three plates of raw boar for Cabaro.

Finally, Abeke exited the room and slipped down the hallway. She knew where Kirat’s personal quarters were located. Perhaps he was still there, preparing for the hunt. She wondered if a boy as spoiled as Kirat even knew how to use a bow and arrow. Or was he only used to being served his food on his father’s golden platters?

She arrived to find the door to his quarters slightly ajar. She nudged it open and peered inside. Kirat stood with his back to her, and his arm outstretched. Cabaro was sprawled on the floor in front of him.

“Come on, you stupid lion!” Kirat yelled. “I command you to enter your dormant state.”

Cabaro didn’t move.

“You can’t keep embarrassing me like this. My father will not allow it.” He rubbed his arm. “I should just starve you. Maybe then you’ll learn your place.”

Cabaro let out a loud yawn, then rolled onto his back.

Kirat picked up a pillow from his bed and hurled it at the animal. “You stupid—”

The boy stopped talking as Cabaro growled and leaped to his feet. The lion pinned the pillow between his golden paws and mouth, and ripped it in half with one long, slow pull. He growled again and took a step closer to Kirat. The boy stumbled backward, then quickly climbed onto the bed.

Abeke burst into the room. “Are you okay?”

“Who is—oh, it’s only you,” Kirat said. He held another pillow between himself and Cabaro—not that it would do any good if the lion really wanted to reach the boy. But Cabaro had already stopped his advance. The lion slowly moved toward a large blanket by the fireplace. He lay down and began grooming himself, looking at Abeke all the while.

“How do you do that?” Kirat asked. His voice was shrill, but he seemed to be genuinely curious. “Why does he respect you, and not me? I am his master.”

Abeke moved farther into the room. Perhaps now was the chance to get Kirat on her side. “From what I understand, the bond between humans and spirit animals doesn’t work like that. It’s a partnership. One does not control the other.”

“But my father says—”

“You’re the one who has called a spirit animal. Not your father,” Abeke said. She paused, letting her words sink in. “How can he guide you on how to work with a spirit animal when he doesn't have one himself?"

Kirat slipped off the bed. Tall and lean, he looked to be a bit younger than her and Rollan. Now that Ninani's Nectar was not required for a stable bond, children as young as eleven had been calling spirit animals all on their own.

"It's comical," he said. "I'm surrounded by the smartest, richest people in Erdas, and the only person I can talk to is someone like you."

Abeke willed herself to hold her temper. Part of her wanted Cabaro to sink his teeth into the boy's flesh. Maybe that would teach him to learn his place.

"Perhaps you should try talking to your mother about this," Abeke said. "The other servants say that she's very wise."

"If it was up to her, she would have shipped me off to the Greencloaks as soon as Cabaro appeared."

Abeke's heart leaped. "Yes, the Greencloaks." She thought about her words carefully. She may not have another chance to talk to him. "I've heard that they are the best at helping the newly Marked in their relationships with their spirit animals." She took a step forward. Cabaro shifted but didn't move from his blanket. "I know of a Greencloak in the village. He could take you to their fortress in Greenhaven."

"My father would never let me go. He hates the Greencloaks. They meddle too much in his affairs. Slow down his business. They think they're above the laws of the land."

So does Faisel, Abeke thought. She took a deep breath. "Kirat, you just called Cabaro, one of the mightiest of the Great Beasts," she said. "At some point, you must follow your own heart."

"Perhaps I'll consider it later, after the festival." He pulled a beige linen vest over his silk shirt. "But now, I need to eat. I have to go hunting, even if that stupid animal refuses to enter his dormant state."

Abeke stepped in front of him, stopping him from reaching the door. "I don't think you should wait." She took another deep breath. She knew she was taking a risk but felt she had no choice. "You called Cabaro a few weeks ago, correct? It was a strong connection at first. But then something happened. Something that loosened the connection between you both.”

Kirat watched her suspiciously. “It happened two days after I summoned him,” he said. “It was like my skin was ablaze. Every joint in my body locked up—I couldn’t move, couldn’t speak, couldn’t think.” He frowned. “My father told me to stop complaining. He said that it was part of the process of bonding with Cabaro.”

“Your father cannot speak about what he doesn’t understand,” Abeke said. “What you felt were the effects of a great sickness afflicting the Evertree. It’s dying. And once it perishes, so will the bond between humans and spirit animals.”

Kirat blinked at her. “How do you know all of this?”

Abeke pushed up her sleeve, showing the mark.

“You have a spirit animal?”

Instead of replying, Abeke released Uraza beside her. The leopard quickly surveyed the room with her violet eyes, before her gaze landed on Cabaro. He had already risen to his feet, and began circling the room.

Clearly, there was no love lost between these two.

“I am Abeke.” She patted Uraza. “And as I’m sure you already know, this is Uraza, the Great Leopard.”

Kirat’s gaze moved from Abeke to Uraza. “You’re a Greencloak,” he sneered.

“I’m not here to bring you or your family any harm,” she said. “But there’s a man who is coming to take Cabaro from you. His name is Zerif. He’s already stolen most of the Great Beasts from their rightful partners. He won’t stop until he’s collected them all.” She placed her hand on his elbow. “But if you come with me—”

Kirat flung her hand away. “Get off me,” he said, his voice rising. Cabaro’s growl had grown as well.

“Please, remain calm,” Abeke said. “You’ll only agitate Cabaro. You have to remember that the connection works both—”

“My father warned me that you all would try to steal me away,” he said. “You were one of the Greencloaks who attacked my father’s silk shop.”

“It wasn’t like that. We had to defend ourselves.”

Kirat tried to get past Abeke. “Guards! Help!” he yelled. “I’m being kidnapped!”

Abeke had no choice. She punched Kirat in the stomach, causing him to double over. As he fell to the ground, Abeke pulled her dagger from her boot. “Be quiet,” she hissed as she pressed the blade to Kirat’s throat. “All I want to do is talk.”

She glanced at Uraza. She and Cabaro were still staring each other down, but neither had engaged in battle. “Do you see your spirit animal?” she asked Kirat. “Do you understand why he isn’t fighting us? We are not your enemy. We’re only trying to—”

“What is it?” someone yelled. Abeke froze as two guards entered. “It’s another spirit animal!” the other guard yelled. “Get her!”

So much for this plan, Abeke thought as the guards moved toward them. Abeke knew she and Uraza could take them—they were slowed by heavy chain mail. But she also knew that more guards would arrive soon.

As Uraza leaped on one, Abeke ducked as the other swung a curved sword toward her. She kicked her opponent in the leg, then pushed him into the wall. Uraza had the other guard’s back against the fireplace.

More footsteps echoed from the hall outside. Abeke turned to Kirat. “You have to come with us. Now!” she yelled.

Kirat shook his head. “I’m not going anywhere with you, Greencloak.”

“You’re making a terrible mistake,” she said. “If Erdas falls, it will be on your conscience.” She ran to the door and peeked out. Abeke quickly counted at least five guards sprinting toward Kirat’s room. She slammed the door shut and bolted it.

“That’s the only way out,” Kirat said. “You’re trapped.” He started toward her, his hands raised as if he wanted to fight.

Abeke picked up a small wooden stool from his vanity and brought it over her head. “Be still,” she warned.

Kirat paused but kept his hands balled into fists. Cabaro backed away from Uraza and stood behind Kirat. “You can’t escape,” Kirat said. “The guards will eventually break down my door.”

Abeke looked at the nearest of the room’s stained-glass windows. “Then I’ll have to find a new way out.”

She hurled the stool at the window. The glass shattered everywhere, causing multicolored shards to rain across the carpeted floor and down into the courtyard below.

“No! Stop!” Kirat yelled.

“Stay back,” Abeke said, looking at his bare feet. “As pigheaded as you are, I still don’t want you to get hurt.”

Using one of his satin pillows, she pushed her way through the remaining glass to the now-open window. Abeke ignored the people pointing at her from below, assessing her situation. They were three stories up. Much too high to jump, even with Uraza’s help. But just below and to the right of her was another stained-glass window with a ledge. And then another a little below that.

She climbed onto the window frame. “Let’s go, Uraza.”

Uraza rushed beside her. Cabaro began to follow, but stopped once he noticed that Kirat was not following.

“Kirat, one day you will learn to trust your spirit animal,” Abeke said. “I only hope this lesson comes before Zerif steals him from you.”

Not waiting for a reply, she stepped out of the window and onto the narrow ledge. “Uraza, give me strength,” she murmured. Then she leaped to the next ledge. She let her legs bounce off it, using her inertia to carry her to the one below it, and then to the ground after that.

As soon as Uraza landed behind her, they took off running. There was no point in trying to blend in. Abeke had already drawn too much attention to herself. Many of the guests were wearing their riding gear in anticipation of the large hunt later that morning. They all stopped and stared at her and the dashing leopard, but none of them tried to get in her way. Up above, she heard the sentries yelling, but so far, no arrows came raining down on her and Uraza.

Abeke rushed across the courtyard and burst through another door, and only then did she stop to catch her breath. Although she wasn’t as familiar with this part of the fortress, she knew her sleeping quarters were close by. She had to find Rollan and Tasha and warn them. It was only a matter of time before the guards connected her to them.

She crept down a few silent hallways, and slowly, pieces of art began to look familiar. She was close. She had to be. Glancing behind her, she turned the corner and entered the hallway that she believed would finally lead her to Rollan and Tasha.

Then she froze. A sea of arrows was pointed directly at her.

“You’re full of surprises,” Faisel said as he stood behind the wall of guards. “Unlike my son, I’m sure you’ve mastered the art of calling your spirit animal into its dormant state.”

Abeke swallowed hard. Heat flashed underneath her skin as Uraza returned to the black tattoo on her arm.

“Good girl.” Faisel snapped his fingers, and one of the men stepped forward. “Throw her in the dungeon.”

A decorative graphic featuring a central, pointed, light-colored shape with a dark, bold number '13' inside. This central shape is flanked by two symmetrical, spiral-like patterns that resemble ram's horns or stylized shells, rendered in a light gray tone. Below this graphic, the title 'ON THE RUN' is written in a large, bold, black, serif font.

13

ON THE RUN

AFTER BREAKFAST, ROLLAN AND TASHA RETURNED TO their room so they could feed their spirit animals before reporting to serve LaReimaja. Rollan had swiped a few sausage patties and slices of bread while passing through the kitchen. Ninani was already swallowing down the bread, leaving the sausage for Essix. The gyrfalcon had faithfully appeared every morning of her own accord, partially for breakfast, Rollan assumed, and partially to check in. In the past, Rollan could usually call to her with his mind from afar, but he hadn't dared to try since the last bond-breaking incident.

As Rollan stared out the window, waiting for Essix, Tasha began singing again. "Stale bread, stale bread. Eat it hard or go unfed. If you ___"

"What is it with you and that song?" Rollan asked.

Tasha shrugged. "It's catchy, don't you think?"

Rollan didn't want to admit it, but it was catchy. And familiar. "Are you sure—"

He was interrupted by a squawk from outside as Essix swooped down into the window. He offered his arm to her. "Cutting it close, bird."

The falcon shook her head, and took back off.

"What is it?" Tasha asked. "Is Essix not a fan of sausage?"

Rollan dropped the food. "Something's wrong. Essix wants me to see something."

"Do you think it has something to do with Dante?" Tasha asked. "Maybe he took a turn for the worse."

“We’ll find out soon enough,” Rollan said. He braced himself against the wall. “Lock the door.”

Rollan closed his eyes and concentrated.

Nothing.

He squeezed his eyes tighter, and his hands balled into fists. He tried to forget about the smell of sausage and bread in the room. He tried to push aside thoughts of Abeke and Tasha, Meilin and Conor. And then, finally, he saw clouds and blue sky.

Essix was flying fast. Really, really fast. She must have realized that the bond would not remain stable for very long. Essix flew past the harbor and into the market in Caylif. She swooped down toward Faisel’s silk shop and landed in an open window.

From what Rollan could tell, most of the damage had been repaired. Essix looked toward the counter in the back of the shop, but a stack of crates blocked her view. The falcon lifted off the windowsill and fluttered farther inside.

Quietly, Essix crept along a bin of multicolored handkerchiefs, drawing closer to the back of the shop. She stopped once she had a clear view of the counter. The young boy who had tried to sell to them was there, talking to a man in a hood and dark robe.

Rollan didn’t think it was Dante, but he couldn’t quite tell. The way the man was turned, he couldn’t get a good look at his face.

Suddenly, the man hurled something at the boy’s chest. He struggled, then his eyes became blank as a black spiral appeared on his forehead.

The man removed his hood. Zerif.

“Now,” Zerif said, handing the boy a knife. “Go get Otto.”

The boy disappeared into the back of the store. Otto started yelling a few seconds later. “What are you doing with that—get your hands off me! How dare you!”

The boy dragged Otto to the counter. Zerif didn’t bother trying to talk to him. Taking the knife from the boy, Zerif sliced a small incision on Otto’s forehead, then pressed a squirming gray parasite to the cut. It buried itself into his skin, then quickly took effect.

“Now take me to Zourtzi,” Zerif said. He stopped and sniffed the air. “Actually, wait. I need to take care of something first.” He opened his robe, then spun around and looked directly at Essix. A second later, Halawir the Eagle appeared. “Time to add to the collection.”

“Essix! Fly!” Rollan yelled. Or maybe he just thought it. He wasn’t sure. But the bird didn’t need any additional encouragement from Rollan. She had already taken off, though from the sound of it, Halawir was in quick pursuit.

Essix squawked, and then Rollan saw Halawir’s large dark wings and golden beak. Feathers from both birds flashed across Rollan’s eyesight.

And then Rollan was falling away, with his vision getting dimmer and dimmer, until he was back in the room at Zourtzi.

“Essix!” he yelled, stretching out his hands as his legs buckled.

Tasha caught Rollan before he completely fell to the floor. She helped him to a bed, then handed him a canteen. “Is something wrong with Essix?” she asked.

Rollan took a few deep breaths, then swallowed a sip of water. His stomach was a jumble of knots, but at least he could still feel the gyrfalcon out there.

“She’s okay, I think.” I hope. He loosed his collar as sweat poured down his neck. “Zerif is in Caylif. He’s already infected Otto. He’s probably on his way to the castle now.” Rollan rose to his feet. Tasha tried to steady him, but he shook his head, and she pulled away. “Abeke was right. Zerif doesn’t need an army to scale these walls. Not when he can just get Otto to hand-deliver him to Faisel.” He flung the canteen onto his bed. “So much for being impenetrable.”

“So now what do we do?”

“We find Abeke, and we talk to LaReimaja. Time to put all our cards on the table.” Rollan grabbed two daggers and Tasha picked up a broom.

She leaned it against the wall and stomped on it, breaking the broom’s head away from the handle.

“Not quite a staff, but it will have to do.”

They opened the door and stepped into the hallway. Suddenly, they heard shouting. “What’s going on?” Tasha asked. “Is it an attack? Is it Zerif?”

“It must be something else. Even he can’t make it here that quickly.” Rollan took off down the hallway, with Tasha close behind. They ran to a window and peered outside. Abeke and Uraza were running full sprint across the courtyard. A garrison of soldiers shouted at her from a few flights above.

“They must have discovered who she was,” Tasha said. “We have to help her!”

“Abeke can take care of herself,” Rollan said. “We need to find LaReimaja.”

“But—”

“Our mission is to get Kirat and Cabaro to safety,” he said. “It’s what Abeke would want us to do.” He watched as Abeke slipped into a large wooden door. “She’ll be okay,” he said. He didn’t really believe that, but he needed Tasha to believe it for now. “We’ll be in a better position to help Abeke once we get LaReimaja on our side.”

They ran down the hallway toward her quarters. Halfway there, they encountered their first set of guards.

“They’re the ones with the Niloan girl!” one of the guards yelled. “Greencloaks! Capture them!”

“Okay, new plan,” Rollan said. “We fight our way into her room.”

The guard on the left swung his sword. Rollan easily blocked the blow with a dagger, then slashed at him. The blade brushed against the guard’s chain mail, doing no real damage. The guard swung again, but Rollan dropped to the ground and put a deep cut into the guard’s leg. The man yelled out and fumbled his sword.

Rollan turned to help Tasha, only to see her spinning through the air, the broom handle twisting in her hands. She clocked the other guard over the head, then landed softly on her feet.

A few steps away, Ninani squawked and flapped her large white wings.

“You know, you should always keep Ninani out,” Rollan said as they continued running.

They reached the corridor leading to LaReimaja’s quarters, only to find more guards standing in front of her door.

Rollan spun around and began to dash off in the other direction. He quickly skidded to a stop. Three additional guards advanced toward them. And these were not normal guards. They were each accompanied by a spirit animal.

It was the men who had attacked them at the silk shop.

“That’s enough, knife-boy,” one of the guards finally said as he leveled a crossbow at Ninani’s chest. “Not unless you want me to put an arrow through that fancy bird.”

Rollan dropped his knife. “Call Ninani into passive form,” he said quietly.

The swan raised her wings, then disappeared with a flash of warm radiance.

“I’ll alert Lord Faisel,” one of the guards said. The others grabbed hold of Rollan and Tasha, walking them back down the hall toward the larger group.

“I can’t believe you Greencloak scum thought you could sneak into Zourtzi,” one of the guards said. He wore a series of red stripes on his shoulder. He must have been the one in charge. “If you’re lucky, Lord Faisel will kill you quickly. Otherwise, he may leave you to starve to death in his dungeon.”

Banging sounded from the other side of LaReimaja’s door. “What’s going on out there?” she yelled. “I demand that you open this door.”

“My lady, it isn’t safe,” the head guard said.

“That is for me to decide,” she replied. After a few seconds of silence, she continued. “Tyrus, open this door now. Unless you want to explain to Faisel how you and the men under your command have been taking an extra percentage of my husband’s silk profits for yourselves.”

Tyrus’s tanned face suddenly turned pale. He motioned for the guards to open the door.

LaReimaja stepped out of the room. Her eyes widened as she saw Rollan and Tasha. “What are you doing with those children?”

“They tried to kidnap your son,” Tyrus said. “They are not servants. They’re Greencloaks in disguise.”

LaReimaja’s brow furrowed. “Is this true? You’re Greencloaks?”

“Yes, but we weren’t trying to steal Kirat away,” Rollan said. “We only came to warn him about—”

“That’s not what Kirat says.” Faisel walked up the corridor, flanked by two guards. “He said that your companion attacked him.”

“She was only trying to warn him about Zerif,” Rollan said.

The guard holding Rollan shook him so hard that his teeth rattled. “Watch your mouth. You are only to speak if Lord Faisel asks you a question.”

LaReimaja kept her eyes on Rollan as she walked to her husband. “Is there any truth in what they say?”

“Of course not,” he said.

“I know you don’t approve of Greencloaks, but perhaps we should listen to them. If our son is really in danger—”

“LaReimaja, watch your tone,” Faisel warned. “Remember your place. Your allegiance is to this family now. Not anyone you left behind in Caylif.”

And suddenly, Rollan knew.

He was actually surprised it took him so long to piece it all together. There were the carpets and the song that Tasha had been singing. There was LaReimaja’s dark hair and tan skin. Her broad shoulders and strong eyes.

“Hey, not all of us Greencloaks are that bad,” Rollan said.

Faisel sighed. “Tyros, please teach our young prisoner some manners.”

The head guard grabbed Rollan by the shoulders, then slammed him into the brick wall. “Now shut up.”

Rollan’s head spun and his eyes watered. “Hey ... I bet it’s pretty dark in your ... dungeon,” he said between spurts of breath. “Can you guys at least spare a torch or a candle?”

Tyros punched him in the stomach. “Stupid Greencloak. You’re begging me to crack your skull.”

Rollan coughed and spit up part of his horrible breakfast. Then he took a deep breath and righted himself.

“What do you call a light in your native language?” Rollan asked. He bypassed Tasha’s face, her eyes wide and worried, and looked directly at LaReimaja. “Maybe ... Lumeo?”

The guard shook his head as he cocked his arm.

Rollan braced himself as Tyrus's fist came racing toward his face.
Then came the pain.
And then, nothing.

SEA EELS

SURELY, ROLLAN AND ABEKE MUST BE IN A BETTER situation than we are, Meilin thought. In the hours since they had first barricaded themselves in the room, the shouting from beyond the door had stopped. Every so often, Teutar or one of the other pirates would yell at them, reminding them that they couldn't remain in the room forever.

As much as Meilin didn't want to admit it, the pirates were right. Even with the leftover food in the room, she and Takoda would only be able to last a few more days without water. Conor didn't have nearly as long. The parasite was easily visible on his neck now, and steadily moving toward his head.

What will happen to him when the parasite finally takes hold? What happens to Takoda and me if we're stuck in this room with him?

"Has Kovo had enough to eat?" Meilin whispered to Takoda. He made a sign toward Kovo, bunching his fingers together and pressing them against each other. The Great Beast shook his head.

"He's fine," Takoda said.

"Good. So is Jhi, and Briggan, too, I think." The wolf hadn't touched the mushrooms that Conor had tried to feed him but had happily laid into a pile of the fish. "We'll need all of our strength to fight off those pirates." If they could make it to the skiff, they had a chance.

"So how much longer should we wait?" Takoda asked. He readjusted his hold on the sword. Meilin had tried to show him a few pointers—how to parry and block. With Kovo's help, he could probably hold his own against a few of the pirates. She hoped.

Before Meilin could reply, Conor sat down across from her. He'd spent most of his time in the corner, with Briggan and Jhi. But eventually, Jhi had stopped caring for him and returned to the tattoo on Meilin's hand. The panda had done all she could for now.

"Are you ready?" she asked Conor, staring into his blue eyes. Her friend was still there.

He let out a long sigh. "Meilin ..."

"No," she said. Her voice sounded weaker than she wanted it to be. "Don't you dare even say it."

Conor placed his hand on Meilin's arm. Each of his fingertips sported hard callouses. Such tough hands didn't match his soft, kind face. Had his years of carrying a crook as a shepherd hardened his fingertips, or was it the ax that he had carried into all of their battles together?

"You have a duty. Not to me, but to Erdas," he said. "Let me turn myself over. You and Takoda still have a chance to stop the Wurm."

Meilin shook her head. "But I can't—"

"Take care of Briggan for me," he said. "Just promise me that."

Meilin offered him a small, quick nod. He rose from the floor and returned to Briggan. As he whispered something to the wolf, Briggan began to whimper.

Kovo grunted, causing both Meilin and Takoda to turn to him. The ape lifted his open hands and then closed them into fists.

"Yes," Takoda said, repeating the gesture. Tears were streaming down the boy's face, but he didn't bother to wipe them away. "He is very brave." Takoda dropped his hands into his lap. "How do you ever become used to this, Meilin? To losing so many people?"

Meilin squeezed her quarterstaff. "You don't," she finally said. "It hurts, every time." She could feel tears forming in her eyes, and she willed them to stay in place. Crying wouldn't do them any good.

She rose to her feet, and Takoda did as well. She cleared her throat as she walked to the door. "We've decided to surrender," she yelled.

"How can we trust you?" someone responded. Meilin thought it was Teutar, but she wasn't sure.

"We'll call back our spirit animals," Meilin said. Then, after looking at Briggan, she added, "All except the wolf. He must remain free."

A few seconds of silence passed. “Come out. Slowly,” Teutar finally said.

Kovo pulled back the table, then disappeared onto Takoda’s neck. Meilin pulled open the door. At least twenty pirates stood outside of the mess, each carrying a weapon.

Meilin stepped out, followed by Takoda and Conor. Briggan followed, his tail between his legs, head lowered.

Teutar slipped a pair of shackles around Meilin’s wrists, while another pirate did the same with Takoda. A third pirate held the pair of shackles meant for Conor, but she seemed too afraid to approach him.

Conor jutted his hands toward her. “Go ahead,” he said. “I’m harmless.”

“Hurry and do it,” Atalanta said as she made her way through the group of pirates. Her gigantic bullfrog was still out, hopping along beside her. Briggan growled but remained in place.

“And someone put a muzzle on that beast,” Atalanta added. She stopped in front of Meilin and Takoda. “I should throw you overboard, but what profit would there be in that?”

“Please, you must take us to the Evertree,” Meilin said. More like begged. But at this point, her pride was nothing but a distant memory. “You have a spirit animal, just as we do. You must have felt your connection weaken. The bonds will only worsen, and then they will eventually break completely. But we still have time to stop it ... if you take us to the Evertree.”

“I can’t take you there. Not even if I wanted to.” Atalanta began to pace the deck. “We have noticed all these changes to our land—and not just the Many and the loosening of my bonds with Perth. The sea is different. More dangerous. Creatures that are usually docile and passive are now openly aggressive.” She looked out across the water. “The Sulfur Sea is like a moat surrounding the Evertree. The sea itself is usually enough to deter most from trying to reach it. But now there are two large eels guarding the island.”

“Xanthe, our guide, told us of three levels of protection,” Takoda said. “Could these creatures be part of that?”

Atalanta shook her head. “The wards of protection are meant to stop evil. Those eels have destroyed anything in their path—good and evil alike.” She nodded toward Conor. “We can’t be sure, but we think they carry the mark of the Many.”

“It would be a fool’s errand to even attempt to approach the island,” Teutar stated. “Those creatures have destroyed ships twice the size of the Meleager.”

“You must let us try,” Meilin said. “Just give us a boat and point us in the right direction.”

“You would be destroyed,” Atalanta said.

“We’re willing to take that chance,” Takoda said.

Atalanta let out a long sigh. “You all are very brave, I’ll give you that much.” She motioned to one of the pirates. “Ready a set of provisions. Food, water, weapons. Whatever we can spare.”

Teutar frowned. “Captain, are you seriously considering their request?” she asked. “Why should we give up our hard-earned food and weapons for a suicide mission? There’s no profit in this.”

“Teutar, did you not see the animal with them? It was the Great Ape warrior. The one that warned of the Wurm many eons ago.”

“That’s impossible,” Teutar replied. “That’s just a story.”

“Most stories, however fantastical, hold some version of the truth.” Atalanta looked at Takoda. “It is him, isn’t it?”

“His name is Kovo,” Takoda said. “He’s one of the Great Beasts of Erdas.”

Atalanta turned to Teutar again. “We won’t go with them,” she said. “But if they can truly stop the Wurm, then we must allow them to continue.” She smiled. “What use is profit at the end of the world?”

Teutar scowled but nodded. “And what of the infected one?”

Atalanta drew her sword. “There’s only one choice, I’m afraid.”

Meilin stepped to block Atalanta’s path. “Please, I beg you. Don’t do this. If we stop the Wurm, we can save him.”

“If we don’t kill him now, he will infect us all.” She nodded to a member of her crew, who picked up Meilin and pulled her out of the way.

Briggan whimpered again. “No, it’s okay,” Conor said softly. His blue eyes were crystal clear and free of tears. “It’s okay ...”

Then, suddenly, he began to convulse. Teutar pulled her sword from its sheath. “He’s changing! We must kill him now, before he fully converts.”

“No!” Meilin said. “The parasite is still at his neck. It’s something else!”

Conor’s body shook so hard that Meilin was afraid his neck was going to snap. Finally, he settled, pointing a shaky finger out to the sea. “It’s coming.”

Just then, a horn blared from the crow’s nest—one long blow, followed by two short ones in rapid succession.

“There’s something out there,” Teutar said. “Something fast.”

Atalanta snapped her fingers, and a second later someone had placed a telescoping spyglass into her hand. She extended it and looked out to the sea. She inhaled sharply. “Battle stations!”

“What about them?” Teutar asked, nodding toward Meilin and the others.

“Release them,” Atalanta commanded. “We’ll need all the help we can get.”

The pirates removed their shackles, then began to scramble. Some grabbed crossbows and arrows while others began to load the cannons.

“What is it?” Meilin asked Conor. “What’s coming?”

“I ... I don’t know,” Conor said. “But it’s big.”

Meilin looked back toward the sea. She could see ripples in the mustard-colored water as something below the surface raced toward them. Another horn sounded, and the first volley of cannonballs fired. Whatever was in the water didn’t seem at all bothered by the firepower.

“Reload,” one of the pirates yelled.

“Too late!” another screamed.

A pair of large, scaly eels breeched the surface of the water. Their snouts bore the huge black swirling marks of the parasite.

In a way, the eels reminded Meilin of the dragon kites flown in Zhong’s New Year Festival. But these creatures were nothing like a child’s toy. They let out screeching yells, each showing off a pair of curved, sharp fangs and long, forked tongues. Yellow water dripped down their shiny skin as they arched their bodies. Glaring down on the ship, the eels seemed to focus their dark red eyes right at Meilin and Conor.

The eels let out more earsplitting screeches as they slammed their bodies into the sea, creating a tidal wave. The Meleager groaned as it tipped on its port side. Crates and containers snapped loose from their tie-downs and slid across the polished deck. Meilin leaped into Conor, pushing him out of the way just before a rolling cannonball collided with his legs.

He blinked, and it took a few seconds for his eyes to land on Meilin. “Oh, thanks,” he said.

“Conor, you have to focus!” Meilin said. She pointed toward a few pirates desperately holding on to the railing. “You and Takoda pull them back up,” Meilin said. “Then help with loading the cannons. I’m going to find Atalanta.”

Takoda called forth Kovo. He, Conor, and their spirit animals all raced toward the pirates hanging on to the railing, while Meilin ran toward the ship’s bow. There stood Atalanta and Teutar, their arms wrapped around the railing.

“Ready those cannons!” Atalanta barked as Meilin reached them. “One of the eels is coming back around.”

“But where’s the other one?” Teutar asked. “It must be—”

“There!” Meilin yelled, pointing to a long, muddy shadow curving toward the boat. “It’s about to hit us!”

Meilin had just enough time to brace herself against the rail before the eel rammed into the ship. Meilin flew forward, badly skinning her knee and arms, while Atalanta, Teutar, and Atalanta’s bullfrog slammed into the deck. Planks of wood splintered and cracked all around them, and one of the ship’s large masts snapped off and fell into the sea.

Meilin pulled herself up and crawled to Atalanta. She was huddled over her bullfrog.

“Is he all right?” Meilin asked.

“Perth will be fine,” she said. “Unfortunately, I cannot say the same for the Meleager. We’re already taking on water.”

“What can we do to help?” Meilin asked.

“Can you serve as runners from the armory to the cannons?” Teutar asked. A trail of blood dripped from a cut on her forehead. “Half of our gunpowder just went overboard.”

“No,” Atalanta said. “Go to the armory but forget the powder. Grab whatever weapons you need and get off this ship.” Then she turned to Teutar. “Swing us around and open the sails. We’re going to the Evertree.”

“But we don’t stand a chance—”

“Girl, do as I say!” the captain yelled as her skin exploded in blue light. “The Meleager is already lost. We don’t stand a chance against those eels. If we can get them to the Evertree, perhaps they can save Sadre before—”

Another eel rammed into the ship.

Atalanta, Meilin, and Teutar fell to the deck.

Perth, Atalanta’s bullfrog, went overboard.

“No!” Atalanta yelled. She reached futilely for the space where the bullfrog had just been. She rose to her feet and peered over the edge. “I can’t see him, but I can feel him. He’s alive.”

“Can you call him back?” Meilin asked.

Atalanta shook her head, frantically scanning the water. “He’s too far away. The bonds are too weak.” She began unbuttoning her jacket.

“No, Atalanta!” Teutar said, grabbing her arm. “You can’t.”

Atalanta gave her a sad smile. “My child, he is my spirit animal. I have to try. I would sooner lose my legs than lose him.”

“But the water ... the eels,” Teutar stammered. “You’ll drown.”

“Better to die a hero than live a coward.” She removed her jacket and flung it aside. “Take care of the crew, Teutar. They’re your burden now. And when you tell my story, make sure it’s a good one.”

With that, Atalanta pulled her sword from its scabbard and leaped over the railing.

Meilin and Teutar watched silently as Atalanta dove into the water. They waited and waited.

She never resurfaced.

“I’m sorry,” Meilin said.

Meilin's voice seemed to awaken the ship's new captain. "Why are you still standing here?" Teutar demanded through clenched teeth. She shoved Meilin away from her. "Go downstairs and gather your provisions." Then Teutar cupped her hands over her mouth and yelled to the pirate steering the ship. "Open the sails and turn her around! We sail to the Evertree!"

Teutar took a flight of stairs to the bridge of the ship and began helping to spin the wheel. Meilin cast one last glance over the railing. There was still no sign of Atalanta. Teutar was the new captain of the ship.

Meilin took the stairs to the armory below and grabbed as many weapons as she could find—swords, knives, and a quarterstaff. She even found a few glowstones. She felt the ship swinging around and tried to keep her balance as the eels continued to pummel the hull.

By the time she made it back upstairs, she could tell that the ship was riding dangerously low in the water. She found Takoda and the others at a cannon, firing round after round at the eels that ran along the ship's bow. The Meleager was slicing through the water, but the eels were just as fast.

"Come on," she said. "We've got to go!"

"But what about the cannons?" Takoda asked.

"It's pointless," she said. "We have to abandon ship."

She led the others back to Teutar. The woman stood alone at the ship's wheel, struggling to keep the Meleager on course, despite blow after blow from the eels. Finally, she let go—just as the wheel began to spin uncontrollably. "The rudder broke off. I can no longer steer."

"How close are we to the Evertree?" Meilin asked.

"As close as you're going to get," Teutar said. She raced from the bridge to one of the skiffs. It was attached to a large wooden crane meant to safely lower the boat into the water. "Aim that way," she said, pointing a shaky finger out into the darkness. "The current will guide you there."

"Come with us," Meilin said. "The ship can't take much more damage."

For the first time since meeting her, Teutar smiled. "I am the captain. I cannot abandon my crew. Now get on board. I'll lower you down."

Meilin climbed aboard first, followed by the others. Kovo remained on deck. “What’s wrong with him?” Meilin asked Takoda. “Whether he likes it or not, he’s got to come with us.”

“It’s not that,” Takoda said as Kovo gently nudged Teutar out of the way. Then the large ape rose up and pushed the boat so it was dangling over the water.

Takoda leaned over the side of the boat. “Thank you, Teutar.”

“Good luck,” she replied. Then she nodded to Kovo. He let out a booming roar, then smashed the wooden crane holding the lifeboat to the ship.

Meilin’s stomach instantly flew into her mouth as they plummeted straight down. The fall seemed to take hours. Finally, they crashed into the sea with an impact that sent Meilin’s teeth rattling. A second later, something large splashed into the water beside them.

“It’s Kovo!” Conor yelled. “Pull him in.”

“I have a better idea.” Takoda closed his eyes, and Kovo disappeared from the water, materializing as a tattoo on the boy’s neck. Then, as fast as he was gone, he reappeared inside the boat.

“Row!” Meilin said. “We have to get as far away from the ship as we can. We can’t let their sacrifice be in vain.”

Everyone picked up an oar and started rowing furiously. Meilin’s hands, arms, and back screamed in pain, but she continued to paddle. Every few minutes, she cast a look back at the Meleager as it sank farther and farther into the sea. The boom of the ship’s cannons still rang in her ears long after they had stopped firing.

They kept rowing. And the Meleager kept sinking.

She thought about asking Conor if he could see any ships in the water. Any survivors. But she chose not to. She didn’t want to know the answer.

Finally, a stretch of shore appeared ahead.

“Aim for the small inlet to the left,” Meilin said. “We have to get out of the water before the eels come.”

They redoubled their efforts. Meilin put every ounce of power, anger, and fear into each stroke.

Once they reached the shore, they grabbed the packs Meilin had scavenged from the Meleager and stumbled out of the boat. Something large and dark loomed before them, but it was too difficult to see without any light. Meilin tried to open her pack, but her fingers had cramped up too much for her to work the latch.

“Massage your fingers first,” Takoda said, kneeling beside her in the sand. “If you’re not careful, you could do some real damage.” He reached out to her. “Here, let me help rub your hands.”

Meilin shook her head. “In a second. First, can you light a glowstone? We need to see where we are. Something’s up ahead, but I can’t tell what it is.”

Takoda nodded, then took the pack from her. After he found the glowstone, he struck it and held it up for them to see.

The outline of a ruined city stretched before them.

“It’s ... huge,” Conor said. His voice was shaking. “I bet it’s even bigger than Phos Astos.”

Kovo grunted and pointed above. They all looked up to see the silver roots of the Evertree stretching out across the top of the cavern.

And there—high above the city and nestled in the Evertree’s roots—was a black, oozing polyp. It looked like a rotted egg, with a giant crack in its side.

Meilin took a deep breath. “The Wyrn.”

THE ATTACK

ABEKE'S CELL WAS DARK AND COLD. IT WAS ONE OF MANY in Zourtzi's dungeon, but Abeke believed she was alone. She hadn't heard any voices coming from the other cells, at least. She only recognized the sounds of rodents scurrying around the dungeon. Perhaps she should release Uraza, she thought. The leopard could use a snack.

As she sat there, Abeke found herself thinking about the last time she had been imprisoned. Shane, her friend—former friend—had been her captor. At the time, Abeke hadn't known that he was the Devourer. The King of Stetriol. He'd passed himself off as a helpless pawn in the war between the Conquerors and the Greencloaks, even while keeping her in chains in the brig of a ship, and later, the dungeon of a Niloan manor not so different from this one.

Even when Meilin had warned Abeke about trusting him, Abeke had chosen to put her faith in Shane. He was her friend. He cared for her. And it looked like her friendship would be rewarded, as Shane helped her to escape and returned with her to Greenhaven. She discovered too late that it was only a ruse, so he could sneak into the Greencloak stronghold and betray them from within.

Now she wondered if her instincts had failed her again. She knew she had pushed Kirat—perhaps too fast—but she had no other choice. She could only hope that Rollan and Tasha had been able to escape.

She leaped to her feet as the heavy door to the dungeon swung open. Then, just as quickly, her heart sank. Tasha was led in first, a guard on each side of her. Abeke gasped. The guards were dragging Rollan in. He was unconscious. Or worse.

The main guard unlocked the heavy iron gate to Abeke's cell. They shoved Tasha in, pushing her into Abeke. Then they brought Rollan inside. They glanced around the bare cell, perhaps searching for something to lay him on. The cold stone floor was barely covered with hay.

Abeke struggled to her feet. "Please don't drop him," she managed to say, rushing forward. She froze as one of the guards aimed an arrow at her. She held up her hands. "I just want to help my friend."

"Give him to her," the main guard said. "Lord Faisel will want to interrogate him later. The boy can't talk if his head is splattered all across the floor."

Holding Rollan in her arms, Abeke half-dragged, half-carried him to the corner. Tasha had already begun collecting as much straw as possible to create something soft to rest his head on. Abeke laid him down and inspected him. Blood ran from his nose, and a spot on his forehead had already turned purple.

"What happened to Rollan?" Abeke asked as the guard locked the cell and left the dungeon.

Tasha ripped a piece of cloth from her skirt and started to clean Rollan's face. "He wouldn't shut up. He kept talking, even when the guards warned him to stop." She shook her head. "I have no idea why."

Abeke patted her friend's hand. "I'm so sorry," she said. She wanted to talk to him, even though she wasn't sure if he could hear her. "If I hadn't pushed Kirat about leaving, none of this would have happened." She took the cloth from Tasha and took over cleaning the dried blood from his face. "For a moment, I thought I had convinced him. Even Cabaro seemed to be on our side. Then he summoned the guards. I thought I would be able to escape, but the guards eventually surrounded me."

Tasha moved closer to Abeke. "Do you have any ideas on how we can get out of here?" she whispered. "Maybe we could somehow get to that window," she said, pointing up.

“There’s no way we could climb that high,” Abeke said, touching the cell’s walls. “But perhaps, once Rollan wakes up, he and I can boost you up there.”

“I’m not leaving without you,” Tasha said forcefully. “If we can’t get out through the window, then—as Rollan would say—we’ll have to come up with a new plan. We’ll fight our way out.”

Tasha’s braid had come undone, and wispy strands of white-blond hair lay plastered to her forehead. The girl’s eyes seemed harder than before. Tasha had grown up so much since meeting Abeke and Rollan. What happened to the shy, awkward girl who had loved reading books? Abeke wondered. Would she ever return?

“We can discuss this when Rollan wakes up,” Abeke finally responded. “And perhaps Rollan was right. Maybe we’ll be better off in Zourtzi, even if it’s in the dungeon.”

“No,” Tasha said, her eyes wide. “That’s why we were trying to get to LaReimaja. We were trying to warn her. Zerif is in Caylif. Rollan saw him through Essix’s eyes. Zerif infected Otto with one of those parasite things.”

“Then we don’t have much time,” Abeke said. She looked back at the window. “As soon as Rollan wakes, we have to get you out of here.”

“Like I said—I’m not leaving you two,” Tasha repeated. “And don’t preach to me about the mission, or protecting Erdas, or anything like that.” Tears had welled in her eyes and began spilling down her cheeks. “You and Rollan are the only people I know. The only people I have left in this world. I don’t even want to think about what might have happened to my parents—” She stopped talking as a sob escaped from her throat.

“Okay,” Abeke said softly. “We’ll figure something out.” She searched around the cell. “Maybe we can just release our spirit animals. Ninani could fly out the window. And while Uraza won’t like swimming from the castle, she could do it if she had to.” Abeke turned back to Rollan. “But we’ll wait until Rollan wakes before we decide anything.”

She squeezed his hand. Please wake up.

A churring sound came to the window above. Abeke looked up and smiled as a familiar face appeared. Essix. “He’s okay,” she said to the Great Beast. “We’ll take care of him.”

Abeke wasn't sure how much time had passed when she heard talking from outside the dungeon door. She nudged Tasha, who had nodded off. Get ready, she mouthed. Faisel.

Rollan still hadn't woken up, but Abeke couldn't take the risk of waiting for him. If she and Uraza rushed the guards as soon as they opened the cell, and if Tasha held back to protect Rollan, she figured that they had a chance.

The heavy, thick door swung open. A guard awkwardly entered the dungeon, but instead of heading toward them, he walked toward a nearby cell. No, not walked. Someone was pushing him.

A woman stood behind him, her face covered by a red cloak and hood. Could it be one of the Redcloaks who helped us before?

"LaReimaja!" Tasha yelled, jumping to her feet.

The woman smiled as she pushed the tip of her sword into the guard's back. "Ahmar, take his keys."

Ahmar, the servant who had been helping Abeke, entered with a ring of keys in his hand. He unlocked the empty cell and pushed the guard into it. He then bound the guard's mouth closed with a scarf. "We don't have much time, my lady," Ahmar said to LaReimaja once he had finished.

"Where are their bags?" she asked him.

"I sent one of my helpers to collect them."

"I hope it's someone you can trust." She nodded toward Abeke and Tasha. "Unlock the cell."

Ahmar did as he was instructed, and they both entered the cell. Abeke didn't know what to say to the woman. Her son favored her—he had clearly inherited his skin and long frame from her. But there was something else that felt familiar about her.

LaReimaja knelt in front of Rollan. She softly placed her sword on the ground and checked his pulse. "I am sorry," she whispered as she pulled her hood from her head. "But we don't have time for you to wake on your own." She pulled a small pouch from her belt, then poured a pinch of dried multicolored herbs into her tanned hands. Abeke covered her nose—she could smell the stench from all the way across the cell.

“Concentrated ginger and xercia,” she said. “If this won’t wake him up, nothing will.” She pulled Rollan onto her lap, cradling his head, then pressed the herbs to his nostrils. At first, nothing happened. Abeke’s heart thundered.

Suddenly, Rollan jerked awake. “What? Who—”

“Calm down, Rollan,” LaReimaja said, patting his cheeks. “Take a moment to gather yourself. You took quite a blow to the head.”

Tasha stepped forward. “How do you know his name?” she demanded. There was a coldness to her voice, something Abeke hadn’t heard from her before. “I know he never told it to you.” They had all been together when Rollan reminded Tasha not to reveal her real name, as that could compromise their ruse.

“I don’t know who you are,” LaReimaja said to Tasha. “But once Faisel mentioned that one of the Greencloaks had Uraza the Leopard as a spirit animal, I knew it had to be Abeke of Nilo.” She put her hand against Rollan’s forehead. “Which would make him Rollan, caller of Essix the Falcon.”

“Her name is Tasha,” Rollan said. “She called Ninani the Swan, though with the way my head is pounding, I really wish it had been Jhi. I would kill for a little magical healing right about now.”

“I heard you were a jokester,” LaReimaja said. “I can see why my brother was so close to you. So close to you all.”

Abeke moved forward. “I don’t understand. Your brother?”

Rollan grinned. “Abeke, I would like to introduce you to Reima. Tarik’s younger sister.”

“Reima,” the woman repeated softly. “I haven’t been called that in a very long time. Tarik gave me that nickname.”

Abeke stared at the woman. She could see it now, the similarities between her and their former guardian. “How did you know?”

“Well, I didn’t for sure,” Rollan replied as he sat up. He gingerly touched the bruise on his head. “But there were a lot of little clues, like the carpets, and the song that Tasha overheard Reima singing to force herself to eat bad food ... and Kirat’s name.”

“It was two years before Faisel realized that his son’s name was Tarik spelled backward,” LaReimaja said with a laugh. “He didn’t speak to me for a month, but there was little he could do about it at that point.”

Essix left her perch at the window and flew into the cell, landing on Rollan’s shoulder. “Hey there, girl,” Rollan said. “I knew you could handle yourself against Halawir.” He opened his shirt, and the falcon disappeared as a tattoo on his skin. “Tarik only mentioned you once, but when he did, it was clear that he cared greatly for you,” he said as he refastened his shirt. “Tarik also mentioned that something else had happened—something that he didn’t want to talk about, even with me.”

The woman gave them a sad smile. “Our family did well for many years after Tarik left us to join the Greencloaks. Then the carpet shop fell on hard times, and my father became gravely ill.” She twisted the weathered gold ring on her finger. “Faisel was rich and had always fancied me ... and my family’s business. He proposed our union as more of a merger than a marriage. It would allow me to obtain the expensive medicine that my father desperately needed, and it would strengthen Faisel’s carpet business. Of course, it also resulted in a beautiful son. Spoiled, but beautiful.” She sighed. “But before I could marry Faisel, I had to denounce all my ties to my brother, because he was a Greencloak.” She nodded toward Ahmar, who stood just outside the cell. “Ahmar grew up with me and Tarik. He would pass news my way about my brother whenever he heard rumors in the market. It was Ahmar who told me that the Four Fallen had returned, and that Tarik had been chosen to serve as the guardian of their human partners. I was—am—so proud. It was only recently that I learned of his death.” She looked at Rollan. “How did he die?”

Rollan’s mouth fell open—maybe the first time that Abeke had seen him without a quick response. She was sure that Rollan was struggling with what to tell her. How would LaReimaja feel knowing that her brother died here in Nilo, partially because of the stubbornness and cowardice of Cabaro, her son’s spirit animal?

“He died honorably,” Abeke finally said. “A Greencloak to the end.”

“He saved my life,” Rollan added. “And now, you’re doing the same.”

Abeke tensed as footsteps echoed down the hallway. Someone was approaching.

“I retrieved their belongings,” a servant said, entering the dungeon. She lifted the cover on her tray, revealing Abeke’s pack. “But we must hurry. I told the guards at the top of the stairs that I was coming to bring food for the prisoners. I fear that they will become suspicious.”

“Then go,” LaReimaja said. She took the pack and handed it to Abeke. “We’ll find another way to get out.”

The servant nodded at LaReimaja before casting a worried look at Ahmar. She disappeared out the door.

Abeke opened the bag and pulled out the few remaining weapons. She threw a green cloak to Tasha before fastening her own around her neck. She then handed Rollan his cloak. She expected him to put it on, but instead he just held it.

Of course. Tarik’s cloak.

Abeke motioned for Tasha to follow her out of the cell. “Give him a minute,” she whispered.

“What’s going on?” Tasha asked.

“It’s Rollan’s story to tell, not mine.”

Abeke watched as Rollan spoke to LaReimaja in hushed tones. He handed her the cloak, and she took it into her arms and breathed it in. Then she slowly returned it to Rollan. He tried to push it back into her hands, but she refused. Then she took a small pendant from her neck, pressed it into Rollan’s palm, and whispered something in his ear.

Rollan and LaReimaja joined the others outside the cell. “Rollan says that you have to take my son with you,” she said, sliding her sword back in its sheath. “Is this Zerif really that dangerous?”

Tasha nodded. “His forces overthrew the imperial castle of Stetriol in a matter of minutes,” she said.

“He’s on his way to Zourtzi now,” Abeke added. “Taking Kirat away from here is the only way we can protect him and Cabaro.”

“And where will you take him? Greenhaven?”

Abeke didn’t falter. “We’ll take him somewhere safe. Somewhere that Zerif can’t reach him.”

LaReimaja looked at each of the children before letting her gaze land on Rollan. “So be it.” She walked toward the door. “Come. There’s a secret staircase built into the west wall. That will give us the best chance of reaching Kirat's quarters unnoticed."

LaReimaja pulled the hood back over her head so that only her chin was exposed. She peeked her head out the door, then stepped into the hallway. Ahmar followed her out next, and then the others.

Once they reached the wall, she pulled back the green-and-gold tapestry to reveal what seemed to be solid brick. Abeke narrowed her eyes and looked closer—she could faintly see the pattern of a door in the brick.

"We just have to find the lever to open it," LaReimaja whispered. She began pushing on each brick on the wall. "Help me, children. Try the lower ones. Ahmar, you watch our back."

The servant nodded as he readjusted his sweaty hold on a butcher's knife. While LaReimaja seemed so confident and sure of herself, Ahmar looked like he was a few seconds away from dropping his weapon and retreating to the safety of his quarters.

"Be sure to try the ones all the way at the bottom," LaReimaja said. "The lever has to be here somewhere."

They tried every brick they could reach—some two or three times. When that plan didn't work, they tried to push the door itself. It refused to budge.

"Maybe we should turn back and try another way," Abeke said.

LaReimaja shook her head. "There is no other way. The guards' quarters are right off the main staircase. There's no way we can sneak past them."

"Wait. Up there!" Tasha yelled. She pointed all the way to the top. A small brick seemed to jut slightly out of the wall.

"He must trigger it with an arrow," LaReimaja said. "If we throw a knife—"

"I have a better idea," Tasha said. Ninani appeared beside her with a flash. Tasha picked up the swan, nearly toppling under the bird's weight, and pointed to the top of wall. "See it, Ninani?"

The swan nodded. Tasha threw her into the air, and Ninani flapped her wings and soared to the top of the wall. She struck the brick with her beak, and the door immediately receded backward.

“Good job,” Tasha said as the swan returned to her.

“We should all call our spirit animals,” Abeke said. “Best to be prepared. We won’t know what to expect at the top of the stairs.”

“I finally get Essix to go passive, and you want me to pull her right back out?” The falcon appeared in the air beside Rollan, her wings spread wide. “Hey, don’t look at me,” he said to the bird. “It was Abeke’s idea.”

They entered the stairwell and pushed the door shut behind them. LaReimaja lit one of the torches sitting in a metal sconce on the wall. The air inside the stairwell was stale and hot. Abeke immediately felt claustrophobic.

Ahmar followed LaReimaja up the stairs. “My lady,” he mumbled. “How will you get them out?”

“There is a secret exit in Faisel’s study,” she said.

“I know,” he said. “But even then, how will they get across the sea without being noticed?”

“One problem at a time.”

“But, my lady—”

“Just say what you’re really thinking, Ahmar,” LaReimaja said.

He gulped. “Aren’t you worried about what Lord Faisel will do once he discovers what you—what we—have done?”

She shook her head. “My old friend, thank you for all of your help. You can leave us. I won’t hold it against you. And I’ll make sure Faisel understands that I forced you to assist me.”

His face relaxed. “But, my lady, what about you?”

“The only person I love more than my brothers is my son. I will not let harm come to him, no matter the consequences to me.” She continued up the stairs. “Enough talk. Wait until we reach the top, and then return to your room,” she said.

Rollan snapped his fingers. “If you don’t mind, I’ll borrow that knife.”

Ahmar handed it to him. “Good luck.”

The staircase was long and winding, with uneven steps. They lit what torches they could, but the sconces were spaced very far apart, causing them to pass through some stretches in complete darkness.

They were almost at the top of the staircase when a loud explosion rocked the castle.

“What was that?” Tasha asked, bringing up the rear of the group. “A cannon?”

“Impossible,” LaReimaja said as she raced up the last few steps. “There isn’t a ship in Erdas that could launch a cannonball into Zourtzi’s walls. The waters surrounding us are too shallow for a ship that large.”

LaReimaja pushed open the door, causing light to spill into the stairway. “Follow me,” she said. “It’s empty.”

They ran down the hall, pausing momentarily when another cannon shook the fortress. Rollan went to a window and gasped. “Look!”

They crowded around him. Zourtzi was indeed being fired on—by its own cannons. From where they stood, they could see the cannons on two of the towers pointed at the castle’s interior walls. Below, some of the fortress’s guards shot arrows at the men manning the towers. But whenever one hit, another man would immediately take his place.

“Over there!” Tasha said, pointing.

Outside the castle, a swarm of people swam across the sea. Those closer to the castle, in the shallow part of the channel, were climbing over the man-made reefs. Animals swam and ran alongside them.

They were too far away to see if any of the attackers carried a black swirl on their forehead, but they could easily see the green cloaks around many of their shoulders.

“Are those all the Greencloaks?” Tasha asked. “There are so many.”

Abeke forced herself to look away from the swarm of Greencloaks. “It’s hard to say. I don’t know how many were in Greenhaven.” For once, Abeke was glad that Meilin and Conor were trapped underground. She didn’t know if she would have been able to fight her friends if they had been the ones storming the fortress.

“How many of the fortress guards have spirit animals?” Abeke asked LaReimaja.

“A handful,” LaReimaja replied. “But not enough to stop an army of Greencloaks.” She sighed. “Zourtzi will fall. It’s inevitable.”

“Look alive, guys,” Rollan said, turning. “We have company.”

A group of ten soldiers came barreling down the hallway, their weapons drawn. But instead of attacking, they stopped in front of the group. “We’ve been ordered by Lord Faisel to escort you and Kirat to safety,” one of them said.

“Good, let’s go,” LaReimaja said. They continued to Kirat’s room. LaReimaja flung the door open, not even bothering to knock.

Kirat stood at his closet, with Cabaro close by him. A bag was in Kirat’s hand, half full of clothes.

“Mother!” He ran to her and they embraced. “One of the guards was just here,” he said. “We have to leave.”

“I know.” She took the bag from him and threw it on the floor. “Forget the clothes. Grab whatever weapons you have.” She turned to Abeke. “You prefer a bow and arrow, yes? Kirat has a brand-new bow and a quiver full of arrows in that top drawer,” she said.

“Mother!” Kirat exclaimed. “What are you doing with these prisoners? Why are you giving her my bow? It was a gift from Father.”

“Yes. A gift you never learned to use,” she said. “Best to give it to someone who knows what she’s doing with it.”

Abeke found the bow. As she slung the strap of the quiver over her shoulder, she noticed Uraza and Cabaro circling each other.

“Play nice, Uraza,” she said.

Uraza hissed as she walked away from Cabaro. The lion growled at Ninani and Essix. Neither bird moved.

“I think they’re used to his empty threats,” Rollan said. “No lionesses to fight for you this time, Cabaro?”

The lion snarled at Rollan. He wisely backed up.

“Mother, what’s going on?” Kirat asked. “I demand that you tell me what you’re doing with these Greencloaks!” He pointed to Abeke. “Especially that one. You see what she did to my room. My window! If father knew you were—”

“Enough with the questions,” LaReimaja snapped. Then she sighed. “My son, you are spoiled. I’m sorry about that, as it’s as much my fault as anyone else’s. But today you must grow up.” She pointed to one of the guards. “You—give me one of your swords.” She took it, then pressed it into her son's hands. "I hope you haven't forgotten everything you learned in all those dueling lessons."

Rollan picked up a staff leaning against the wall. "Better than a broomstick, right?" he asked, handing it to Tasha. "Ready?"

She spun the weapon in her hands. "Ready as I'll ever be. And what about you?"

He held a dagger in one hand, and Ahmar's knife in the other. "I'll be fine."

"I'll take the lead," Abeke said as she nocked an arrow into the bow's string. "Can we get to Faisel's study from the secret passage?"

"Yes," LaReimaja said. She turned to the guards. "Kirat, stay close to me. Guards, take up the rear."

The walls had already begun to collapse as they made their way back to the stairway. Uraza walked in front of Abeke, deftly leaping over the huge chandeliers that had fallen from the ceiling and the large marble statues that lay broken in their path. Even with a faint bond, Abeke could feel Uraza's energy coursing through her own body as she sidestepped the bits of debris that continued to fall around them.

Uraza's ears flattened as they reached the door. Abeke could hear it as well. There were voices in the stairway.

She nodded to one of the guards. With his sweat-covered forehead, he reminded her of Ahmar. "Pull it open," she said. "But slowly. I'll look inside."

As he cracked open the door, Abeke raised her bow and peeked down the passageway. A swarm of guards, guests, and Greencloaks quickly climbed up the stairs. Each bore the mark of the parasite on their foreheads. Leading the pack was Ahmar, his face now a blank canvas. Directly behind him was Dante, his arm still covered in a white bandage. Abeke wondered how Zerif had found him.

"What do you see?" one of the guards asked behind her.

Abeke waved her hand behind her, trying to get the guard to remain quiet, but it was too late. The swarm of people had heard them and were now rushing up the stairs.

"Close it!" she yelled. "We need to find another way down."

The guard slammed the door shut, while two others dragged a statue to it. They propped it against the door. “That should stop them,” the bearded one said.

Rollan shook his head. “No, it won’t.”

LaReimaja pointed to three of the guards with the end of her sword. “You three will take Kirat and the Greencloaks to Faisel’s study. Don’t use the main stairs—try the ones in the southwest corner. That will give you the best chance of making it to the bottom level unnoticed.” She looked at her son. “There is a small exit built into the floor underneath your father’s desk. Take that tunnel—it will lead you to the outside of the south wall. From there, you will have to find a way to Caylif. But I know you can do it.”

Kirat lowered his sword. “But ... you’re not coming with us?” he asked, his voice quiet as realization dawned on his face.

She shook her head. “We will remain to hold them off.”

Just then, they heard pounding from the stairwell. The door, braced by the statue, held. For now.

“Mother,” Kirat said. Tears had formed in the corners of his eyes.

“Be brave,” she said, hugging her son. “Remember, your uncle was a great warrior—his blood flows through your veins, too.” She turned to Rollan. “Tarik gave his life for yours. In return, you are now responsible for my son’s life. He’s in your care.”

Rollan nodded and gave her a small bow. “I won’t fail you.”

They took off down the hallway while LaReimaja and the remaining soldiers readied themselves. Abeke slowed down and glanced behind her once she had reached the top of the stairs at the end of the hallway. LaReimaja had positioned herself and the other guards right in front of the door—probably to try and cut down the infected as they exited. It’s exactly what Tarik would have suggested.

Abeke joined the others, who had already started down the staircase. It didn’t take Uraza’s enhanced hearing to know that there was a battle going on downstairs.

“I’m not sure how much better off we are going this way,” Tasha said. “It sounds pretty bad down there.”

“Is there another way to Faisel’s study?” Abeke asked the bearded guard.

“We could try the main stairs,” he replied. “But we would be totally exposed. Anyone fighting in the foyer would see us as soon as we started down.” He hesitated. “Maybe we should go back.”

“No,” Abeke said. “We cannot fight what is up above.”

“There are more sentries downstairs,” the youngest of the guards answered. “We have a fighting chance.” He shrugged. “At least, a better chance than ...”

He must have noticed the twisted and sad look on Kirat’s face. “I’m sorry, my lord.”

“Apologize later,” Rollan said. “Let’s go. We have to make the most of the time LaReimaja bought us.”

“Agreed,” Abeke said. “We’ll try to sneak down and get as close as we can before they notice us. We’ll engage whenever we have to.”

Abeke and Uraza moved to take the lead. The winding staircase was built like a corridor with high walls. They wouldn’t be seen by anyone downstairs until the last turn.

Suddenly, they heard footsteps rushing up the stairs. Abeke steadied her bow, ready to sink her arrow into whomever appeared. Then she gasped as the figure turned the corner.

Olvan!

He was riding his moose, which was almost too large for the small staircase. The spiral on Olvan’s forehead seemed to swirl with every step closer he came. He growled at them, and his moose matched him with a deep, guttural moan. Abeke was glad that the staircase was so steep and narrow. She was sure that the Greencloak leader would have reached them by now if he had been on foot.

“What are you waiting for?” Kirat asked. “Kill him.”

“I ... I can’t.” She glanced over her shoulder at Rollan, hoping that he would have a plan. His face had paled, and his mouth hung open.

“What should I do?” Abeke asked him.

Rollan’s eyes were glassy as he shook his head. He either couldn’t answer, or wouldn’t.

Abeke turned back around. Olvan's moose had sped up—he would be within striking distance soon. She raised her bow again and pointed her arrow at the swirl on his forehead. Would she forever be remembered as the girl who killed the great Olvan?

Abeke took a deep breath, shifted her aim, and released the arrow. It sank into Olvan's shoulder, causing him to fall off his moose. He tumbled backward down the stairs, before landing awkwardly on his arm. The moose, suddenly free of Olvan, reared back, then charged them.

Uraza sprang forward, landing right in front of the beast. She lowered herself to the ground, a deep growl in her throat. The moose lunged and tried to swipe her with his antlers, but Uraza slipped to the side and ran her claws against his flank. The moose swung again, this time catching Uraza and slamming her against the wall. She seemed dazed, but she quickly rose to her feet and took a defensive stance against the animal.

"Watch out for his hooves," Abeke said as the moose began to stomp. She tried to aim her arrow at the creature but was afraid that she would miss and hit Uraza instead.

"Kirat, ask Cabaro to help," Rollan said. "If he and Uraza work together, they can stop Olvan's moose."

Kirat shook his head. "Why should I put my animal in danger? We wouldn't be in this mess if she had shot him like I demanded."

"For crying out loud, get over yourself!" Tasha said. "If you and Cabaro are too scared to fight, Ninani and I will do so in your place. Ready, Ninani?"

But Ninani wasn't preparing to join the battle. Instead, she was standing in front of Cabaro, staring at him. The lion tried to move out of the way, but Ninani kept placing herself in front of him, her eyes boring into the lion's. Finally, Cabaro roared at Ninani. Then he shook out his mane and bounded down the stairs, taking five at a time. He landed on the moose's back and sunk his teeth into him.

The moose struggled, trying to shake off Cabaro. The lion bit down harder. Slowly, the moose sank to the ground. Cabaro released his grip and roared. The fur surrounding the lion's bite was drenched in blood.

"Tell him not to kill him!" Rollan said. "He's a friend."

“Some friend,” Kirat murmured.

The lion moved off the moose’s back, but only because Uraza had pushed him out of the way. The leopard had a few scratches from the moose’s antlers but was otherwise unharmed.

Abeke looked at Olvan as he remained still on the stairs. “Is he ... should we check—?”

“No point,” Rollan said. “There’s not much we can do for him, anyway.” He held up his dagger. “Ready?”

Abeke nodded. “Which way are we heading?” she asked the guards.

“Straight ahead and to the left,” the younger guard said.

Abeke counted to five, then ran down the stairs and took the last turn in the foyer.

It was a full-out brawl. There were only a few fortress guards remaining, with most of them lying on the floor ... or worse, infected by Zerif’s parasites.

“Don’t let the parasites touch you,” Abeke yelled as she let her first arrow fly. It landed in a Greencloak’s leg. She quickly released another, this one finding its way to her side. Abeke didn’t know this Greencloak, but that did not make the attack any less painful.

Abeke blocked a staff attack from another Greencloak. It was Errol! He had assisted in one of Abeke’s first training exercises at Greenhaven. Uraza had already jumped on Errol’s spirit animal. Uraza shook the lemur hard before flinging it against the wall. Errol momentarily paused, turning toward his animal. That gave Abeke a chance to jab an arrow into his chest, but not his heart.

“I’m sorry,” she whispered as he fell to the ground.

Rollan sliced his Greencloak in the stomach as Essix picked up his lizard spirit animal. “Where’s Kirat?” he yelled, spinning around.

“There!” Abeke said, pointing. She started toward Kirat, then stumbled as she saw who was ahead. “No!”

A few steps away, Kirat fought one-on-one with Finn, their friend from North Eura. Cabaro faced off against his black wildcat. Finn, usually a pacifist, had once been one of the Greencloaks’ best warriors. And Kirat was actually holding his own against him! Kirat may have been even better than Meilin with a sword, although Abeke would never say that to either of them.

“Can you shoot him in the shoulder?” Rollan asked. “Like you did with Olvan?”

Abeke nocked an arrow, then shook her head. “They’re moving too fast. I might hit Kirat my mistake.”

“But it’s Finn!” Rollan said. “Kirat will kill him!”

Donn, Finn’s wildcat, sunk its teeth into Cabaro’s leg. The lion whimpered, causing Kirat to falter. That gave Finn an opening, and he took it, slicing a gash into Kirat’s arm. The boy screamed but didn’t drop his sword.

Abeke raised her bow. She didn’t want to hurt Finn. He was their friend. A fellow Greencloak. But she also had to protect Kirat.

Tasha and Ninani reached Finn before Abeke could release the arrow. As Finn swung at her, Tasha arched backward, ducking his sword. She swung her staff low, striking Finn in the knees. Then she hit him across the head, knocking him unconscious.

“I could have handled it,” Kirat said as he inspected his arm.

“You’re welcome,” Tasha replied.

“Back-to-back!” Rollan yelled. “That’s the only way we’re going to get out of here.”

“There’s no way we can make it to my father’s study,” Kirat said. Blood dripped from his wound and down his arm. He was leaving a trail of it behind him.

“Then we go out the front door,” Abeke said. “Now move!”

The group slowly inched their way to the main entrance. The three guards caught back up with them and took flanking positions around the kids. Even though the guards looked to be in worse shape than Kirat, they were still fighting to protect him.

A few steps away from the door, an older Greencloak with a white beard flung himself at the group. The Greencloak flailed at them, but the guards easily pushed him away. As the man slid across the floor, Abeke tried to remember his name. It wasn’t until she saw the giant tortoise beside him that she realized it was Erlan, the librarian. Was no one safe from Zerif’s parasites?

“Get it off me!” the youngest guard yelled as he dropped his sword and began wiping at his face. But it was too late. A parasite had already made its way underneath the skin and was curling into a spiral on the guard’s forehead. Abeke looked back at Erlan and caught a glimpse of the empty vial in his hand.

“Cut it out!” one of the other guards yelled, raising his sword.

“No,” Rollan said. “It’s too late.”

The infected guard’s eyes went blank. He roared at the group, then lunged at Kirat. The bearded guard jumped in the way, blocking him.

“We’ll hold him off!” the bearded guard said as he struggled with the infected one. “Get out of here!”

They ran toward the main doors. “We’re almost there!” Rollan yelled, hurdling over a shattered wooden chair.

“And then what?” Kirat asked.

“We make a break for the sailboat,” Abeke said. “If we can make it there, we have a shot of getting off this island.”

They smashed through the doorway, pushing infected Greencloaks out of their way. As Abeke glanced behind her to see if the others had followed, she saw a streak of red out of the corner of her eye. Then two more flashed among the green cloaks and the guards’ silver chain mail.

Could it be ... ?

She searched through the crowd, and finally, she saw them.

The Redcloaks.

Farther away, a group of them fought alongside Faisel’s guards. Some had weapons, and some fought with their bare hands. Although they were few in number, they seemed to be holding their own.

“Follow me,” one of the Redcloaks said, appearing beside Abeke. “We have a boat ready.” Unlike the others, whose white masks were all fashioned in the shapes of animals, his was featureless. Abeke wasn’t sure, but she believed that he was the same one who had saved them before in Stetriol.

As they raced across the courtyard, Kirat slammed to a stop. “Father!” He pulled away from the group and took off across the battlefield.

“Come back!” Rollan yelled. He tried to grab Kirat’s arm, but just missed.

Across the way, Faisel himself was engaged in one-on-one combat with a hooded man in black.

The man turned, and Abeke gasped. Zerif.

Cabaro growled and pawed the ground before eventually following Kirat.

“You all head to the boat,” the Redcloak said. “I’ll get the boy and the lion.”

“No,” Abeke replied. “Take Tasha and Ninani to the ship. Rollan and I will get Kirat.”

Tasha shook her head. “But—”

“This is not up for discussion,” Abeke said. “Go!”

The Redcloak hesitated as he stared at her. Though Abeke couldn’t see his face, she sensed that he wanted to argue. Finally, he nodded. “We’ll wait as long as we can,” he said, his voice surprisingly soft. Then he took Tasha’s arm and led her away.

Abeke and Rollan took off across the courtyard. Uraza ran along with them, while Essix flew up above. Kirat had almost reached his father when an infected guard rammed into the boy, knocking him to the ground.

“Kirat!” Faisel screamed. He abandoned his fight and ran toward his son. With the merchant lord’s back now to him, Zerif pulled a knife from his waistband and hurled it at Faisel. Even with all the other noise in the courtyard, Abeke heard the unmistakable sound of metal settling into flesh as Faisel fell to his knees.

Essix reached Kirat before Rollan and Abeke, and began to claw at the guard’s face. Then Rollan leaped forward and sunk his dagger into the man’s chest. The guard finally fell.

Abeke helped Kirat to his feet. “Are you hurt?”

“I’m fine!” he said, pushing her away. “But my father ... !”

Abeke grabbed his shirt before he could rush off. “You can’t help him if you’re dead,” she said.

Faisel remained facedown on the ground. Abeke couldn’t tell if he was breathing or not.

“We must go,” she continued. “Now! Do not let your parents’ sacrifice be in vain.”

“Leaving so soon?”

Abeke spun around and saw that Zerif had somehow flanked them and was now blocking the way to the pier. He held an unstoppered glass vial in one hand and a throwing dagger in the other.

She put herself in front of Kirat and reached for an arrow, but her fingers slid through empty air. Her quiver was empty.

Abeke gripped her bow in her hands like a club and readied herself for Zerif’s attack.

But instead of charging forward, Zerif only smiled. He tilted the vial, and a parasite scurried out onto his hand.

“I’ve never liked you,” Zerif said. “I’m going to march you right off a cliff as soon as I have you under my control.”

Then he hurled the parasite at Abeke.

Everything moved in slow motion. Abeke readied herself to try to deflect the worm, knowing full well how improbable that would be. But before she could even swing her bow, Uraza leaped into the air—into the space between Abeke and the parasite.

“No!” Abeke shrieked. She dropped her bow and sprinted forward.

Uraza twisted and turned, then dropped to the ground, trying to paw the gray worm off her fur. But it was no use. It was already burying itself into her skin.

Suddenly, the leopard stopped wriggling. Her body went completely still. Then she rose slowly to her feet.

Abeke’s mind went silent, and her skin became cold. No, not cold. She was beyond feeling any type of sensation, as if her arms, her legs, her entire body had ceased to exist.

She crumpled to the ground. She could barely think. She knew she needed to do something—anything—but her mind kept reaching into the void, searching for a connection that was no longer there.

She saw Zerif in front of her. His lips were moving, but she couldn’t hear him. Her ears, like the rest of her body, refused to operate.

“Interesting,” Zerif said as Abeke was finally able to focus in on his voice. “This is even better than walking you off a cliff.” He stroked his beard. “Uraza. Kill her.”

Uraza hunched her back and growled. Still paralyzed, Abeke tried to reach out again with her mind, to find the bond between her and her spirit animal. But there was nothing, not even the faint remnants of a connection.

Their bond had been severed completely.

Uraza, please. Hear me! She searched the leopard's violet eyes. It was as if the animal had never seen her before.

And then Uraza jumped toward Abeke, claws out and teeth bared. Abeke braced herself for the impact.

Cabaro leaped over Abeke and collided with Uraza. The two cats tussled and snapped at each other as they rolled across the ground.

If not for the lion, Uraza would have ripped her apart.

"Don't hurt her!" Abeke said. The paralysis that seized her lifted somewhat, allowing her to finally control her numb body.

"So who's next?" Zerif said breezily. He had already produced another black vial. "Cabaro? Essix?"

"No one," the red-cloaked warrior said. He stood behind Abeke, with a crossbow aimed at Zerif.

"Do you think you can shoot me before I throw this?"

"Do you want to take a chance and find out?" the Redcloak replied.

Zerif smiled.

A second later, Uraza disappeared with a flash. Zerif lifted up his shirt, admiring his new tattoo.

All the air emptied out of Abeke's lungs at once.

"Move. Now!" Rollan said.

Abeke just stared at Zerif—at the image of Uraza stretched across his side. She felt someone pulling her to her feet—the Redcloak—and they somehow made their way through the fighting. She heard him yelling instructions to the other warriors in red—first on the battlefield, and then on a small skiff. But it was as if Abeke was hearing him underwater.

Her heart, her soul, was still on the battlefield, with Uraza.

REDCLOAKS

ROLLAN WAS SPEECHLESS. THEY HAD ESCAPED YET again, but their freedom had come at a terrible price. Once they made it out of the channel, the Redcloaks had taken them to their ship. There were at least twenty of them on board. Rollan caught some of their names—Howl, Worthy, and Stead, to name a few. They seemed respectful enough to give Rollan and the others their space, but now it was time for some answers.

Rollan walked over to Tasha and Kirat as they sat at the base of a flight of wooden stairs. Tasha hummed a tune to herself while rebraiding her hair. Kirat aimlessly worked a knife against a piece of wood that he must have found lying nearby. Tasha had called Ninani back into her dormant state, but Cabaro remained out on the deck. The lion scowled every time the boat hit a rough patch of sea, but he didn't move from his position. Rollan wasn't sure if he remained out to comfort Kirat, or if he was still too proud to go into his passive state.

"You should go below and have someone tend to your arm," Rollan said. Kirat had tied it off in an attempt to stop the blood flow, but the makeshift bandage was already seeped through. "We didn't rescue you just so you could die from blood loss."

"I didn't ask you to save me at all," he said. His voice was barely louder than a whisper. "I should have remained with my parents. Perhaps with my help, we could have stopped them."

"More likely, you would have ended up dead," Rollan said. "Or a slave to one of those parasites. We helped to save your life, Kirat. You should be grateful.”

Kirat rose from the ground and jammed his knife into the wooden railing. “None of this would have happened if you hadn’t shown up!”

“You know, I’m sick and tired off all your bellyaching,” Rollan said. He got into the boy’s face and jabbed his chest. “You had a good life, Kirat. A great life. But that life is over. Your parents and those men gave their lives to protect you. The least you can do is honor their sacrifice.” He shook his head. “Now get downstairs and clean that wound.”

Rollan turned and began to march away.

“Wait,” Kirat said. His voice, while defiant, didn’t carry the same arrogance as usual. “Who was the man that you and my mother were talking about? Who’s Tarik?”

A wave of emotions flooded Rollan. He hoped it wasn’t apparent on his face. He couldn’t afford to break down in front of Kirat. “He was a Greencloak. One of the finest men that I have ever known.” He paused and took a deep breath to help settle his nerves. “He was also your uncle. Most of us hope to be half the Greencloak he was.” Rollan could feel the pressure building behind his eyes. He was losing it. “He ... he gave his life for me. He—”

“Rollan, it can wait until later,” Tasha said. She rose from the ground and placed her hand on Kirat’s shoulder. “Come on. I’ll help you with your wound.”

Rollan nodded at Tasha and watched them disappear below. He saw why Ninani had come to her. They both seemed to know just when someone needed a helping hand.

Rollan pulled the pendant that LaReimaja had given him from his pocket.

A bronze oval with two intersecting lines. LaReimaja had said it was the symbol of life. The pendant had been handed down from generation to generation in her family, and she wanted Rollan to give it to Kirat when he was “ready.”

Rollan had pressed LaReimaja more about this, but the woman had just smiled and said that Rollan would know.

He pocketed the pendant and moved to the other side of the ship. Abeke stood along the rail, her gaze fixated on Zourtzi. The fortress was barely visible, but they could still see the smoke rising into the sky.

“How are you?” he asked.

She shrugged. “Empty. Lost. Alone.”

Rollan wrapped his arm around her shoulder. Her skin was like ice. “You’re not alone,” he said.

Abeke gave him a blank stare. “She was there, and then in the space of a heartbeat, she was gone. She looked at me like I was a stranger. It was as if our bond had never existed.”

“We’ll get her back,” Rollan said. “I promise.”

Abeke and Rollan turned as someone approached them. It was the head Redcloak. The one with the faceless mask. The one who had saved them, time and time again.

“Is everyone in your party okay?” he asked. He may have been speaking to them both, but Rollan noticed that he was only looking at Abeke.

“We’ll survive,” Rollan said, answering for both of them. “Now, how about explaining what’s going on here?” He crossed his arms. “We need some answers.”

“Soon,” the Redcloak said. “Be patient. We’re taking you somewhere safe.”

“Yeah, and where is that?” Rollan asked. “If you haven’t noticed, nowhere seems to be safe anymore. Zerif can get to us anywhere. In Zourtzi, in Stetriol, and even at Greenhaven.”

The Redcloak sighed. “So the rumors are true,” he said. “Greenhaven has fallen as well.” He looked out at the sea. “You should rest. There will be more battles to come.”

“At least tell us your name,” Abeke said. “You’ve saved our lives again and again.” She took a step forward. “Tell us who you are, so we can thank you properly.”

The Redcloak hesitated. “I’m called King,” he said. “I am the leader of the Redcloaks.”

Abeke offered him a slight bow. “Thank you. We are forever in your debt.”

King began to walk away, but stopped.

He slowly turned around and stared at Abeke. "I used to be known by another name." He reached behind his head and slowly unfastened his mask. "You knew me as Shane."

Rollan stumbled a step backward. It was Shane, but he wasn't the same as when Rollan had last faced him. His eyes were yellow, like a crocodile's.

Abeke inched forward. "You!" she hissed. "I should have known! You're somehow behind all of this, aren't you?" She pulled back her sleeve, then gasped. Rollan realized that she had tried to call Uraza, but of course the leopard was no longer here. "It doesn't matter," she said, balling her hands into fists. "I'll face you with or without Uraza."

Rollan grabbed Abeke's arm before she could swing. "Calm down," he said. "He just saved our lives."

Abeke shook Rollan off. "And do you remember the last time Shane saved my life? He used it as a way to sneak into Greenhaven and betray us."

"That was before," Shane said. "A lifetime ago. Much has changed ... obviously." His gaze had fallen to his feet, his yellow crocodile eyes small and sad. He let out a deep breath, then returned the mask to his face. "I know this is difficult, but I need you to trust me. To trust us," he said. "There's something you need to see. It may be the key to saving Erdas, and perhaps the key to saving Uraza as well." He took a step forward and looked out across the water. "We sail to the Place of Desolation."

Varian Johnson is the author of six novels for children and young adults, including the middle-grade capers The Great Greene Heist and To Catch a Cheat. A former structural engineer, he now lives outside of Austin, Texas, with his family and two cocker spaniels.

You've read the book—now join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Have your ebook ready and enter the code to unlock huge
rewards!

N7R3DWPTTH

BOOK FOUR:

The Wurm has awakened.

It has corrupted friends and stolen spirit animals.
It has toppled cities and poisoned the Evertree itself.

Working with the Redcloaks, the young heroes learn of a plan to destroy this evil forever.
But they'll only get one chance. And if they fail, the world will be consumed.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

Enter your code to unlock huge rewards:
N7R3DWPTTH

Design your own
spirit animal!

Join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!
Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one
of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SPIRIT ANIMALS

SPECIAL EDITIONS

Discover the Hidden Tales of Erdas!

There's more to explore in the Spirit Animals world! These Special Editions reveal the secrets of Erdas in ways you never saw coming...

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SCHOLASTIC and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

SPIRIT ANIMALS

Discover Your Spirit Animal!

Read the Books. Play the Game.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals

SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, AND ASSOCIATED LOGOS ARE TRADEMARKS AND/OR REGISTERED TRADEMARKS OF SCHOLASTIC INC. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

From the publisher of The 39 Clues™ and Spirit Animals™

TOMBQUEST

The tombs are opening . . .

The magic of Egypt has come alive. Mummies are waking. New York is overrun with scorpions. And worst of all, five evil ancients called the Death Walkers have broken free. It's up to one boy to stop them . . . before the Afterlife claims us all.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/TombQuest

TOMBQUEST

SCHOLASTIC, TOMBQUEST, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic, Inc.

THE STUNNING ADVENTURE
FROM BESTSELLING AUTHOR
RICK RIORDAN

Available in print and
eBook editions

scholastic.com/the39clues

39CLUESe

SCHOLASTIC, THE 39 CLUES, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

INFINITY RING™

FIX THE PAST. SAVE THE FUTURE.

Available in print and eBook
editions.

SCHOLASTIC.COM/INFINITYRING

 SCHOLASTIC

SCHOLASTIC, INFINITY RING, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

IRINGe

Copyright © 2016 by Scholastic Inc.

All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920. SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

The publisher does not have any control over and does not assume any responsibility for author or third-party websites or their content.

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2015956411

ISBN 978-0-545-84207-5

First edition, May 2016

Cover illustration by Angelo Rinaldi

Cover design by Charice Silverman & Rocco Melillo

Art Direction by Keirsten Geise

Metal frame: © caesart/Shutterstock

Wood texture: © CG Textures

e-ISBN 978-0-545-84208-2

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereafter invented, without the express written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

THE NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING SERIES

FALL of the BEASTS

ASPIRIT ANIMALS

BOOK 4

THE BURNING TIDE

READ
THE BOOK.
UNLOCK
THE GAME.

JONATHAN AUXIER

The world is in peril.

An ancient evil is rising from beneath Erdas, and we need YOU to help stop it.

Claim your spirit animal and join the adventure now.

1. Go to scholastic.com/spiritanimals.
2. Log in to create your character and choose your own spirit animal.
3. Have your book ready and enter the code below to unlock the adventure.

Your code: N7DDG7FRTJ

By the Four Fallen,
The Greencloaks

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

The Wurm is waking, and when it hatches,
it will devour
everything in its path.

FALL of the BEASTS
SPIRIT
ANIMALS™
THE BURNING TIDE

Jonathan Auxier

SCHOLASTIC INC.

CONTENTS

Gorilla Symbol

Greencloak Letter

Quote Page

Title Page

Map

1: FROM THE STARS

2: HUNTER AND PREY

3: THE FROZEN SEA

4: THE MOLTEN RUINS

5: THE SNARE

6: NIRI

7: THE PRISONER

8: THE FALLEN CITY

9: VOICE FROM AFAR

10: KOVO SPEAKS

11: HALF A PLAN

12: MARCH OF THE MANY

13: URNS

14: XANTHE RETURNS

15: THE WYRM

16: SACRIFICE

17: WHAT LIES BENEATH

18: TO ARMS

19: KIRAT

20: THE BATTLE BEGINS

21: FLAMES AND FROST

22: LAST WORDS

23: LOSS

24: SLAVE AND MASTER

25: THE BURNING TIDE

26: HUNTER AND PREY

About the Author

Online Game Code

Spirit Animals Game

Copyright

FROM THE STARS

THE SKY WAS FALLING.

It had started seven moontides before. The elder ape of the tribe was about to commence the last feast when he spotted something in the heavens above—a small speck of light burning in the sky. But unlike the stars, this speck was moving straight toward Erdas.

This was long ago, back before Kovo even had a name.

He remembered his entire tribe stopping their eating to stare up through the dark canopy of trees, all of them thinking the same thing—

The sky was falling.

“What?” Kovo’s mother had asked, signing the question with her black gorilla hands.

The elder ape had wrinkled his gray brow and gestured with his hands. “Do not know.”

Concerned grunts moved through the tribe. It was the first time Kovo or anyone else had heard the elder ape say he did not know something. Usually such an admission would mean death—the other silverbacks in the tribe would have attacked, in order to take his place—but they, like Kovo, were transfixed by the light above.

Kovo knew their land was surrounded by a vast ocean of stars, which spun in their own paths. But even as the sky churned in its usual course, this burning piece broke the harmony, cutting a path in its own direction.

Every night Kovo's tribe gathered and watched the speck again, and every time it looked bigger and burned brighter. Soon they were able to see the speck even during the day. It became clear that this falling piece of sky was moving toward the land.

The other animals in the jungle knew of the sky falling too. Kovo had seen some boar herds in the lower brush congregating to watch the approaching speck. He heard the nervous chatter of the falcons in the east as they circled the sky in a wide arc. Kovo could not commune with other beasts, but even so, he knew the meaning of their falcon cries: This was where the burning piece of sky was to land.

It was a place Kovo knew well. A place every creature knew.

The tree.

The tree was sacred. Its roots stretched to every corner of the world. Every blade of grass, every beating heart, had sprung from it. And now the sky was plummeting toward it.

Kovo remembered wondering what would happen when the piece of sky reached the tree. A thing like this had never happened before.

The silverbacks in Kovo's tribe gathered together. One of them should go to the place where the falcons flew—to bring back news of the thing that fell. They needed a young ape who could still move quickly through the trees. Someone who could be trusted not to become lost or distracted by the creatures and sights beyond their jungle canopy. They picked Kovo.

It was a great honor. And before Kovo left, the elder ape began to sing for him, cooing into the night air. He was joined by the others, one by one, in a chorus more wonderful than anything Kovo had heard since.

Kovo's mother joined last. Her hands found his and she pressed her nose to Kovo's. To this day, he still remembered the smell of her.

Kovo left the safety of the canopy in search of the place where the sky would land. The world was a vast continent that contained jungles and dunes and mountains and snowfields, all connected together. As he traveled, he saw other beasts moving in the same direction as him: a lion from the plains, an octopus from the sulfur delta, a serpent from the desolate bogs, even a polar bear from the high glacier rim. Usually Kovo would have tried to fight with these beasts, or they would have fought with him, but it seemed they all had a similar mission.

Kovo and the other beasts finally found themselves at the top of a high mountain covered in lush vegetation and strange greenery. There were thousands of animals, all different species, all come to bear witness. The trees were low and not good for climbing, but they were heavy-laden with fruit. Kovo did not recognize the fruits growing in this place, and so he ate nothing.

At last he reached the tree. It stood within an emptied mountain—its trunk impossibly tall. The enormous, lush branches stretched out in every direction, strong and silvery. Kovo could feel the tree's life-giving roots whispering in the rich soil beneath him. He climbed atop a large, mossy boulder and watched the falling piece of sky. From here, Kovo could see the land stretching out for a thousand miles in every direction.

By now, the piece of sky burned as large and hot as a second sun. The speck had a trail of flames behind it, as though it were leaving a tear in the very atmosphere, roaring as it hurtled straight toward the tree. The roaring reverberated through the entire forest around Kovo, and many of the watching beasts fled in terror. Kovo felt that same fear, but he did not run. The fur on his arms had a static tingle of expectation. He wanted to hold his breath.

And then it landed.

Kovo shielded his eyes as the great piece of sky crashed through the branches of the tree and plunged deep into its trunk. When it finally struck the ground, the impact was like nothing Kovo had ever conceived.

In a flicker, the trees all around him bent sideways, as if they were blades of grass flattened under Kovo's foot. The sound, if it made a sound, was so great that Kovo's ears stopped working—his head filled with a devastating thrum that threatened to crack his skull in two. The ground beneath Kovo seemed to ripple and heave, throwing him backward.

And then there was the storm.

At the moment of impact, a burst of blinding light struck Kovo—searing his eyes through his eyelids. Wind and fire enveloped the sky, everything around him coming ablaze. It was like a crack of lightning had moved right through the land.

Kovo did not remember landing—for the next moment, his whole world went black.

When Kovo woke again, it was as though waking from death. Steam rose up from the scorched ground, burning the side of his face. The sky overhead was a swirling darkness that blotted out the sun. Kovo pushed himself up on his knuckles, retching some horrible black sap that seemed to have pooled beneath him, coating his fur. He could feel his bones screaming in protest as he stirred, and he wondered how many of them had been shattered.

Kovo rose and beheld the forest around him. But there was no forest. The trees were gone. The rocks were gone. Indeed, the very ground had been turned into an enormous smoking crater.

He looked to the place where the sky had landed.

The tree was still standing—ever standing—but its trunk was twisted and scarred, torn down the middle where the sky piece had struck it.

Kovo could still feel the life of the tree moving beneath the ground, but something about it had changed.

The tree wasn't the only thing that had changed. Despite his injuries, Kovo felt somehow stronger, and his mind felt more clear. He scrambled up over the steaming rubble to the crest of the crater.

Destruction. For miles in every direction. Huge black cracks had formed in the earth, and already he could see water flooding into the gaps, dividing earth, pushing the lands apart from one another. Storms were brewing, and he knew somehow that the rest of his tribe was gone. Perhaps other creatures from farther lands had survived the impact, but Kovo's jungle was no more.

The young ape flared his nostrils, squeezing his eyes tight. He wanted to beat his chest, to roar and rage. But who could hear such a cry? He was alone.

Kovo turned, hearing a wheezing snuff nearby. Rubble pushed apart and he saw the trunk of an enormous elephant burst from the earth, dripping with black sap. The beast had somehow survived, just like him. There were more sounds and soon other survivors emerged.

There were fifteen of them in all.

Like Kovo, the beasts looked different—stronger, larger than before. Kovo and the others slowly moved toward the tree in the center of the steaming crater. The thing that had fallen from the sky had burrowed deep into the earth, leaving a trail of foul black sap in its wake.

Some of the beasts were unable to make the descent, or too afraid, but Kovo had to see. He had been sent by his tribe, by the elder ape, by his mother, to witness the falling sky, and he would finish his task.

He approached the gash in the trunk of the tree. It looked so fragile, and he feared it might break under his touch. But when he grabbed hold of the smoldering bark, he could feel the tree shifting beneath his fingers—fighting back against its own destruction, forcing itself to grow anew.

The sky had plunged straight through it and deep into the ground. The hole was steep and treacherous, but Kovo felt strong and agile. Soon even the falcon and swan had given up the pursuit, but Kovo traveled on.

At last he found the bottom of the hole, deep within the roots of the tree. The space was a little bigger than the canopy where his tribe ate their meals.

The hole was so dark that Kovo could barely make out his own hand. But the silver light from the tree's roots was enough to see what he had come for. Lodged deep within the ground was something large and round.

It looked like a rock, only made of a substance Kovo had never seen before. Something strong enough to cut through the world itself.

Kovo drew in his breath. He could sense something moving beneath the surface. A tremor of life that pulsed like a heart. Something was inside, trying to get free. Kovo stepped back, staring at the thing below, and realization washed over him.

This was not sky.

This was not stone.

This was an egg.

HUNTER AND PREY

THE HOODED MAN MOVED LIKE A SHADOW BENEATH the moonlight. His skin was impossibly pale—purple veins could be seen tracing along his temple and neck, pulsing like little tendrils just beneath the flesh. The man’s eyes looked inhuman—pupils so large there was almost no white to speak of. “And these travelers,” he said, his lips stretched thin, like his patience. “Where are they now?”

“I do not know, sire!” Hazeel cried, his voice shaking. “The travelers docked for only a night to replenish supplies and get fresh water.” It was hard for Hazeel to speak on account of being suspended by his ankles over the edge of the stone pier. A pulley and rope—meant for loading and unloading ships—was looped around his feet, leaving him dangling above the water. Thirty feet below, violent white breakers smashed against the rocks along the shore. He had been hanging like this for hours and the air had turned cold with the sinking sun. “P-p-please,” he stammered. “I am only a humble harbormaster.”

“You’re more than that,” the hooded man said, tugging off one of his leather gloves. Hazeel caught a glimpse of a tattoo running the back of his hand—a spirit animal under his control. “You are the last living person to see those I seek.” The man flashed a poisonous smile. “Whether you continue to be living is entirely up to your friend up there.”

Hazeel twisted his neck and stared above him—stared at the silver-furred rat who sat at the top of the pulley, chewing on the knot that kept Hazeel aloft. The rat was Hazeel’s spirit animal, Poe. His only friend. Except Poe did not belong to Hazeel anymore. The hooded man had done something to the creature, infected him with some sort of wriggling black parasite that severed Hazeel’s spirit animal bond ... and now the rat was a slave to the hooded man.

Hazeel swallowed. Even though it was cold, he felt a rivulet of sweat running down his upside-down head. He watched Poe greedily gnawing at the strands of the rope, which was already groaning under Hazeel’s weight. A few more strands and Hazeel would fall to his death.

“These travelers,” the hooded man said, “did they have spirit animals with them? A falcon and a lion and a swan?”

“I saw no animals, sire,” Hazeel said. But then he decided that his best tactic might be to tell the man what he clearly wanted to hear, so he quickly added: “But it would not surprise me! It was obvious they were hiding something. The entire crew wore red cloaks and masks that concealed their faces. And when they paid me, they used silver fronds—the currency of Zourtzi.”

The hooded man fixed his dark-dark eyes on Hazeel. “And which way did they go when they left your port?”

“They went south. Straight for the Frozen Sea.” Hazeel shook his head. “I warned them that only shipwreck awaited them in those frosty waters, but they would not listen.”

The hooded man nodded, pleased with this information. He turned toward someone behind Hazeel—one of his own crewmen—and snapped his fingers. “Prepare the ship with fresh rations. We sail into the Frozen Sea. Tonight.” The crewman, dressed in a green cloak, bowed and rushed to fulfill the orders.

Hazeel watched the crew, all of them dressed in tattered green cloaks. He felt a prickle of confusion—these were not the Greencloaks he knew.

They all had pale faces and hideous, pulsing black marks on their brows—like coiled worms buried just beneath the flesh. Perhaps they were under the hooded man’s control, like his own Poe. But when he looked at the hooded man, he saw that the man, too, had the mark. Was he also under the control of something even more powerful than himself?

Hazeel’s body lurched and twisted as another strand of the rope broke under the rat’s gnawing teeth. He closed his eyes, forcing himself not to look at the rocky shore below. “I’ve told you what you asked! Will you not release me?”

“You have set us in the right direction,” the hooded man said. “And for that, I will spare your life.” He clucked his tongue and Poe scampered immediately from the ropes and to the man’s side—as if they’d been practicing that trick their whole lives. He turned and started walking toward the gangplank of his waiting ship.

Hazeel was overcome with relief ... until he realized that the hooded man meant to leave him dangling above the water. “And what of me, sire?” he cried to the man’s receding figure. “Will you not take me with you? It could be weeks before another ship comes to this remote port.”

“You had better hope it’s sooner,” the man called over his shoulder.

“Sire!” Hazeel cried to the hooded man. “You will never find your quarry in those waters. It is a graveyard for ships. Even if you knew where you wanted to go, it would be impossible to get there without a guide. I’m sure you’ve heard tales of how in the Frozen Sea a compass’s needle never stops turning—it’s true. You will be chasing your own wake before sundown. I alone know those currents. Spare my life and take me with you. I will guide you to those you seek!”

The hooded man paused at the edge of the pier. “An interesting offer,” he said. “But I already have a guide.” He lifted up the edge of his tunic and touched a tattoo on his side that seemed to depict some sort of spotted cat. There was a flash of light, and then an enormous leopard appeared next to the man. The creature narrowed its violet eyes, licking its gleaming fangs.

Hazeel had little to show for education, but he knew enough to know what he was looking at. “Is that ... Uraza?” he said, his voice a whisper.

“The Great Beast.”

“It is indeed.” Zerif knelt down and pet the leopard, touching a spiral mark on her brow. “And she’s all mine.” He peered into the face of the beast, whose nostrils were flared. Her fangs glowed white in the dim light, and she was growling. “I have no need for your services,” the hooded man said. “Uraza is a huntress. She will lead us to her prey. And then her prey will die.”

THE FROZEN SEA

ABEKE CROUCHED IN THE CROW'S NEST, STARING OUT over the choppy surface of the water that stretched clear to the white horizon. She clutched a small obsidian stone in her hand, which she was chiseling to a razor point to create an arrowhead. One of dozens she had stowed in the pack of her quiver. The water was bitterly cold, just like the air. But neither was half so cold as she was inside. She pulled her tattered cloak around her shoulders, but even that gave little comfort. She wore the colors of a Greencloak, but what right did she have to such a title? Greencloaks had spirit animals. And Abeke had nothing.

The ship, a creaking frigate named the Expiator, keeled to one side, and Abeke had to grip the ropes of the crow's nest to prevent being flung into the water a hundred feet below. Beneath her, she could hear the sounds of the crew working the lines to keep the ship upright as they charted a course ever southward. She and Rollan had been traveling for several days, moving swiftly through an uncharted sea whose only reputation was for storm and shipwreck. Even now, she could see the jagged shards of floating ice that stuck from the water's surface like fifty-foot teeth, waiting to devour them. Cold wind shivered past the top of the mast, and she wondered how many ships had found their ends in these waters. And where did these waters even lead? All they had been told was that they were being carried to a place called “the snare,” but none of the crew was willing to tell her more.

Abeke was startled from her work by the sound of someone ascending the rungs. “Mind if I join you?”

She glanced over her shoulder to see Rollan hoisting himself up onto the deck of the crow’s nest. His face was chapped from the cold, and she knew that he, like her, was unused to such weather. That he had come upon her so stealthily was not surprising, but it was distressing. If Uraza had still been with her, Abeke would have sensed his approach.

“Shouldn’t you be babysitting our new recruits?” she said, helping him up the top rung. Rollan had been tasked with keeping tabs on two newer children who had recently summoned Great Beasts, Kirat and Tasha. The thought of Rollan playing the role of Greencloak mentor almost made her smile. Quite a change from the boy who once loudly claimed to care for no one but himself. She suspected their own mentor, the late Tarik, would have shared her amusement.

“I set Kirat to swabbing the latrine,” Rollan said. “Thought it would build character.” He dug into the pockets of the fur-lined coat that the Redcloaks had given him and removed a rasher of dried shark meat. “I swiped a second helping of lunch. Thought you might be getting hungry up here.... ” But even as he said this, his eyes fell on the pile of untouched food at her feet—several days’ worth of rations.

Abeke gave a tight smile. “Not a big fan of seafood, I’m afraid.” The truth was, she hadn’t eaten in two days. She simply didn’t have an appetite. “It gives me a bad stomach.”

Abeke saw worry flash across Rollan’s face, which he quickly replaced with a forced grin. “Oh, well. More for me!” He chomped down on a strip of meat and settled in beside her, apparently unable to take the hint that she wanted to be alone.

The deck of the crow’s nest was designed for one adult, and there was hardly enough room for the two of them. Rollan sat with his back against Abeke’s, each of them staring out in a different direction.

“You haven’t seen Essix up here, have you?” he said through bites of shark meat. “She’s been acting strange for days now, swooping around in big uneven loops, high then low then high again.... I can feel her uncertainty, as if the air were making her dizzy. If I didn’t know better, I’d say she’s been nipping at the Redcloaks’ grog barrels.”

He probably meant this as a joke, but Abeke couldn’t manage even a smile. “I tried bringing her into passive state, but the moment I did that, I started feeling dizzy, too. Just this morning I threw up my whole breakfast on the deck. Hence the fresh appetite.” He sighed, chuckling. “I swear that bird will be the end of me. My life would be ten times easier if I’d gotten a three-toed sloth ... or maybe a nice, slow beetle. A beetle would have been grand!”

Abeke pulled her knees tight against her chest. “At least you have a spirit animal,” she said quietly.

She felt Rollan take a deep breath behind her. For once, he seemed to be at a loss for a witty retort. “Wonder how much farther it is to this mysterious Redcloak base?” he asked more seriously. “Never imagined a place could be so crushingly cold. No life, hardly any fish even. Just huge chunks of jagged ice. This place makes Suka’s ice palace look positively cozy.”

Abeke nodded, smiling despite herself. What felt like a lifetime before, she and Rollan had ventured to the northernmost mountains of Eura to find the talisman of the Great Bear, Suka. But that particular talisman had been stolen by Shane, the Devourer. The very same Shane who now captained the ship they were traveling aboard. Even now, it was unclear whether they were guests or prisoners.

“Do you really think we can trust them?” Rollan said, as if reading her thoughts. “I know they saved our lives back in Nilo—more than once, even. But still. We’ve been deceived before.”

Abeke eyed the crew moving far below, all of them wearing long red cloaks and cloth masks over their faces. Each mask was marked with the image of a different animal. The masks provided some warmth from the bitter cold, but that was not why they wore them.

These “Redcloaks” wore masks to hide their faces. Every single one of them, down to the last woman and man, had a pair of inhuman eyes peering out from the folds of her or his mask. The few who had been bold enough to take their masks off around Abeke and the others revealed patches of skin that were disfigured into a twisted hash of animal and human.

Abeke still wasn’t sure what had happened to produce this strange result, but it was unnerving to say the least. Shane himself had greeted her in Nilo with the cruel yellow eyes of a reptile—the eyes of his lost spirit animal.

Perhaps that was no less than he deserved. The boy’s crocodile tears had once convinced her to lead him right into Greenhaven, where he promptly betrayed her. That Shane now wore the symbol of his deception seemed only fitting.

But thinking of Shane and his crocodile only made her think of Uraza. Abeke closed her eyes, remembering the moment when Zerif’s parasite infected her beloved spirit animal. How Uraza’s violet eyes had suddenly clouded over. And worse than that, how a part of Abeke’s own heart and soul had just as suddenly vanished.

Once in control of Uraza, Zerif had ordered the leopard to kill Abeke ... and Uraza had listened. Without a moment’s hesitation, Uraza had pounced at her, claws out. Had it not been for Cabaro intercepting the attack, Abeke would be dead. But then, how much worse could death really be from what she was already feeling?

All that would have been difficult enough for Abeke to process, but the recent discovery that the leader of the Redcloaks was none other than Shane—the Devourer who had once set out to destroy them all—was more than she could handle. She had trusted Shane once before and paid a dear price for it. And yet here she was, sailing to a secret location on a ship under his command.

But what choice did they have? With Zerif’s army of infected Greencloaks hunting down the other Great Beasts, they had nowhere else to turn.

“I don’t know if we can trust him,” Abeke said at last. “But when I look at him now ... some part of me thinks he really has changed.”

“Oh, he’s changed all right—into a lizard-eyed freak. If anything, he looks more like the Devourer than ever before. Not exactly reassuring.”

“Still,” Abeke said. “If he wanted us dead, he could have just let Zerif do the job. He needs us for something. It’s just a question of what.” She shivered, pulling her cloak tighter. “Wherever he’s taking us, let’s hope we get there before we freeze to death.”

Their conversation was interrupted by a faint cry of a bird. “It’s Essix!” Rollan said, climbing to his feet. “She sees something.” The cry had come from far ahead, somewhere deep in the clouds. Abeke watched as Rollan closed his eyes and put a hand to his temple—trying to see through his spirit animal’s eyes. Abeke had seen him do this many times before, but only now did it fill her with a pang of jealousy. A moment later he stepped back, blinking. He had the slack-jawed look of someone who had just beheld a wonder beyond his own imagining.

“What is it?” Abeke said, standing. “Did you see the Place of Desolation?”

“One thing’s for sure,” he said, shaking his head in disbelief. “We’re not going to freeze to death.”

THE MOLTEN RUINS

GROWING UP IN AMAYA AS HE HAD, ROLLAN HAD certainly heard stories about volcanoes—tales of long-dead kingdoms now buried under blankets of petrified ash. But none of those stories had captured just how awesome it was to behold an actual live volcano. Rollan had seen it first through Essix’s eyes, and then only for a brief moment—a glowing red cauldron spewing miles of steam into the cold air. His falcon had returned to him shortly after, and she seemed grateful for the chance to rest herself on the edge of the mast.

It was nearly an hour before the Expiator came within view of the steaming black mountain that towered over the horizon. Having only seen it from Essix’s eyes overhead, Rollan was unprepared for its size. The volcano was massive—large enough to hold half of his home city of Concorba inside of it.

“I’ll say one thing for our friend Shane,” he muttered to Abeke. “He knows how to make an impression.”

“Land ho!” a female Redcloak with a bird mask called, ringing a bell on the ship’s fore. “All hands to the main deck!”

Rollan and Abeke went belowdecks to find Kirat and Tasha and gather what few belongings they had managed to bring with them when they fled Zerif's army back in Nilo. They came upon Tasha practicing the defensive forms that Rollan had taught her, a large staff gripped tightly in her hands. In the past few weeks she had shown herself to be a dedicated student ... though it had quickly become apparent that stationary fighting positions were best suited for the girl. Tasha couldn't seem to walk ten steps without tripping over her own feet.

Kirat, meanwhile, was caught in yet another battle of wills with his Great Beast. Proud, fierce Cabaro was apparently as prone to seasickness as Uraza had been, and had hidden himself under Kirat's bunk, refusing to leave even for meals.

"I'm trying to help you, you overgrown house cat!" Kirat said, hands in the air. "If you go passive, I can escort you down to land myself. Everybody wins!"

In reply, the lion bared his white teeth and growled.

Kirat showed his own teeth, which were chattering in the cold. "When you die down there, I think I'll have you turned into a nice fur coat. At least then you'll be of some use to me."

Rollan put a hand on Kirat's shoulder. "Leave him. He'll come out when he's ready. I know from experience there's no use commanding a stubborn spirit animal. They're Great Beasts. Not servants."

As he said this, he couldn't help but glance at Essix, who had perched herself on his right arm, refusing to move from that spot. The gyrfalcon gripped him so tightly that he could feel it through his thick leather gauntlet. Rollan suspected that whatever strange disruption the falcon had felt in the air had made her wary of flying. He reached up and scratched her under the beak, and surprisingly she let him. Whatever it was about this place that made her so uncomfortable, he hoped it faded soon. He didn't want to find himself in a fight without Essix at his side.

Their packs gathered, Rollan and the others were summoned by a Redcloak called Stead who wore the mask of a ram.

"King has gone ahead. You four are to follow me," the boy said, in the tone of one who was used to having his orders obeyed. "Watch your step on the gangplank. If you fall into the water, you'll be frozen before we can fish you out."

The base of the volcano was encased in the thick shell of an enormous icy glacier. Rivulets of steaming red lava snaked through the ice, filling the air with a damp, sulfurous odor. The Expiator had been docked at a pier that looked to have been chiseled out of the side of the glacier. Small huts and glistening bridges were similarly cut from the ice. Rollan and the others shuffled down the gangplank and onto the glacier's surface. Unlike the snow up north, the ground here was hard and unyielding—the sort that would hurt to fall on.

"Careful," Rollan said as Tasha rushed down the platform right behind him. He heard a cry as the girl slipped on her very first step on the ice and landed hard on her rump—her pack spilling out behind her. "Maybe we can fashion you a sled," Rollan said, reaching down to help her to her feet. "Ninani can pull it."

Tasha ignored his extended hand. She swung her foot around, sweeping Rollan's leg from behind and sending him crashing onto the ice beside her. He felt his face grow hot as every Redcloak watching burst into laughter. "On the bright side," he said, wincing as he pulled himself back up, "at least I know you've been practicing."

Stead led them up some narrow steps that curved around the edge of the volcano, providing them an overhead view of the camp. Glancing below, Rollan saw that everyone was wearing red cloaks—except for a small pack of kids just a bit younger than him. There were maybe a half dozen of them, all wearing sealskin coats.

"What's the story with them?" Rollan said, nodding at the group. "You ran out of red fabric?"

"I'm surprised you haven't guessed," Stead said, his voice heavy. "Those are the other victims of Zerif's parasites. Kids like you, who summoned Great Beasts as spirit animals."

Squinting down, Rollan realized that he recognized the face of Anda among the other kids—the Amayan boy who had summoned Tellun. But how had he ended up here? The last time Rollan and Abeke had seen Anda was in Greenhaven. Olvan had been preparing to send him back home to Amaya.

“Zerif tracked them all down and stole their spirit animals,” Stead said, “sometimes destroying their homes and families in the process. They’re here to take back what was stolen from them.” It was all Rollan could do not to sneak a glance at Abeke, who undoubtedly recognized her own pain in their hollow faces.

The children were all working diligently, helping to dig trenches in the ice, cooking food, mending boots. The idea that these Redcloaks had managed to gather the other Great Beast summoners—while he and Abeke had failed—irked Rollan. “Must be nice to have your own personal army of servants,” he muttered.

Stead turned and regarded Rollan through his strange white mask. “They aren’t our servants,” he said finally. “They’re here because King rescued them. He wants to help.” Then he turned and began scaling the path again.

“What we really need is an army of fighters,” Stead continued as he walked. “But it’s too late to train these children. Especially without their spirit animals.” He cocked his head to one side, studying Rollan. “Or maybe you could help with that? I hear you have a gift for mentoring young warriors.”

Rollan couldn’t tell if he was being mocked or not, but the proposition horrified him. “Not me,” he said, nodding to Kirat and Tasha. “I’ve paid my dues with these two, and that was plenty. Trying to teach Kirat anything is like trying to get Cabaro into passive state. Impossible.”

Kirat scowled. “Maybe if you actually knew what you were doing, I would listen.”

Rollan looked at the boy, who was the very picture of smugness. That this boy was the nephew of Rollan’s old mentor, Tarik, was almost impossible to believe. He thought of the amulet resting at the bottom of his pack. The amulet that Kirat’s mother had given him. It was Rollan’s job to hold on to it until Kirat had matured enough to follow in his uncle’s footsteps. At the rate things were presently going, Rollan would die of old age before that happened.

“Think you can do better?” Rollan said, nodding to the children working below. “Be my guest.”

He had meant it as a joke, but Kirat seemed to consider the idea. The boy folded his arms. “Maybe I will.”

“Later,” Stead said, interrupting the contest of wills. “Right now we should eat, before King comes. He’s going to want to talk to you.”

“King ... ?” Abeke said. “That’s what you call Shane?”

Stead nodded. “He tells us not to, but ... old habits die hard.”

Rollan looked at Abeke, trying to read her face. The Shane they knew would probably have forced people to call him king on punishment of death. It was hard to imagine him as anything but a ruthless leader. “Stay close,” he whispered as they followed Stead up the snowy path. “And keep your bow handy.”

Rollan and the others soon found themselves sitting in an alcove carved into the side of the mountain. A small group of Redcloaks joined them there, but stood aloof several feet away. It was as if they were afraid of Rollan and Abeke. Afraid ... or ashamed.

Stead removed his mask to reveal a pair of horizontal pupils in his eyes—just like a ram.

The other Redcloaks appeared to be from all different parts of the world. As they slowly removed their masks, Rollan saw a girl with the flitting black eyes of a bird, a man with pinhole pupils like a lizard, and another with sad, doglike eyes and a rash of long fur that crept up his neck. It was all Rollan could do not to stare.

Though the air outside was frigid, the temperature in the alcove was comfortable. A vein of red lava flowed through a man-made channel that ran around the perimeter, warming the ground just enough so Rollan could breathe without his teeth chattering. The Redcloaks outside were busy tending to an enormous cauldron of stew that was hanging over a pool of bubbling lava.

Stead was watching them, his strange eyes moving between the figures. Many of their masks were off now. It seemed they were preparing to eat. “This is Shadow,” Stead said, gesturing to a woman with catlike eyes.

“And these”—he nodded toward two boys who had kept their masks on—some kind of wildcat and a bird with a long straight beak—“are Worthy and Jolt. Though you may already know them by different names.”

The boys slowly removed their masks, and Rollan’s mouth fell open. Beside him, Abeke sucked in a hiss of air. Standing before them were none other than Devin Trunswick and Karmo—two of the young Conquerors they’d beaten back in Eura while searching for Rumfuss’s talisman.

In the handful of brief and unpleasant encounters he’d had with Devin, Rollan had never once seen the boy without a sneer. Now the Euran noble’s catlike eyes seemed weighted to the ground—like he was ashamed to be seen.

Karmo’s own wide brown eyes were on Abeke, who glared right back at him.

There was a great deal of glaring back and forth, in fact. Stead coughed uncomfortably.

It was Devin who broke the silence. “So ... ” he said, his eyes finally rising. “How’s Conor?”

Rollan barked out a hard laugh and shook his head. “If this is your idea of a joke,” he said, “I’m not looking forward to the punch line.”

“It’s no joke,” Stead said, sighing. “King suspected you’d be mistrustful. I don’t blame you. But know this—Worthy and Jolt, like all of us, are here to atone for their crimes.”

Rollan decided to take the boy at his word ... at least for now. “So you all get to pick secret names?” he said. “Can I request that people start calling me Handsome?”

“Most names are based on our spirit animals,” said another Redcloak woman with black, hungry eyes that reminded him of a bat. “So maybe we should call you Featherbrain?”

The others all laughed at this jibe, and even Abeke smirked. Rollan was annoyed at being the object of ridicule, but also surprised. Up to this point the Redcloaks had been completely humorless. But seeing them crouched around the stewpot, he wondered if the things they’d endured had built a bond between them ... just like the bond he felt with Abeke, Conor, and Meilin.

Perhaps Stead was being more forthright than Rollan gave him credit for. This wasn't an army. These were friends.

Rollan took a seat with Abeke, Kirat, and Tasha. Karmo—Jolt—served them steaming bowls of what smelled like fish stew.

“Ugh,” Kirat said, wrinkling his nose. “More fish.”

“At least it’s hot,” Rollan said, spooning sips into his mouth. “If experience has taught me one thing, it’s that you never turn down a hot meal. You never know if it will be your last.” He quickly finished his bowl and passed it back for another. He couldn’t help but notice that Abeke accepted a bowl, too, but only held it in her hands to warm herself.

“Guess I’m not very hungry,” she said with a weak smile when she noticed Rollan watching her. “Maybe Essix wants it?”

She set the stew on the ground. Rollan stared at Abeke’s face, at her blank expression, almost devoid of life or energy. Was that what it meant to lose a spirit animal? The thought made him shudder. Strained though his relationship with Essix could be at times, he couldn’t fathom the pain of not having her with him.

Essix hopped down to the offered bowl, pecking at the contents as best as she could. Rollan reached down and pet her cowl, glad for the reassuring touch of her presence.

There was a sound of footsteps echoing off hard stone. All at once, the relaxed manner of the Redcloaks changed as they put down their bowls and sprang to attention.

“Now that you’ve all eaten,” said a voice from behind them, “it’s time we get down to business.”

Rollan looked up to see Shane standing in the mouth of a tunnel, his figure lit orange against the magma glow. He had taken his mask off, and Rollan was again struck by his changed appearance—his yellow crocodile eyes and the glimpse of scaly green flesh creeping up his neck.

Shane had once been a strong, handsome ruler—heir to the throne of Stetriol. Now he looked like a monster.

The boy stepped into the middle of the room with the bearing of a king. Rollan had to begrudgingly admit that the name fit. “I’m sure you’re all curious why I’ve brought you here,” Shane began.

“I assumed we would go sledding,” Rollan said. “Maybe have a nice snowball fight.”

Shane ignored him and took a seat on a rock, facing the group. “We Redcloaks ... ” He paused and shook his head, as if unable or unwilling to say what needed to be said. “I’m sure you’ve recognized some former Conquerors among our people. Worthy and Jolt you’ve even fought personally.”

“And suddenly you’re acting like our best friends,” Rollan said. “It’s downright creepy ... and don’t even get me started on your weird faces. I get why you guys use masks.”

“Watch it!” Stead said, leaping to his feet, one hand on his sword.

“Stead,” Shane said in a commanding voice. The young man stopped, still glaring at Rollan, his jaw clenched. Finally he sat back down. Shane turned back to them. “Forgive our hot tempers. It’s a sensitive subject for some of us.”

“What happened to you all?” Abeke said, her voice hoarse. “I think you owe us that much, at least.”

Shane watched her for a long moment, then nodded. “It’s hard not to think of it as a punishment. Every one of us drank Gerathon’s Bile. When the Bile’s power faded, most Conquerors simply lost their spirit animals. Freed from our control, the beasts either attacked their former masters or fled. For a small number, however, there was no escape. One day I awoke to find I couldn’t summon Grahv from his passive form. The tattoo on my chest began to itch and fade, and in its place I found ... ”

Shane lifted his shirt, revealing a wide swathe of green, scaly skin where Rollan had once seen a crocodile’s jaw curving around his neck.

The former king of Stetriol let out a husky sigh. “It’s the same for all the others. Somehow, our spirit animals have become a part of us. Any gifts they gave us in their active states—strength, speed, uncanny powers—have returned, but at the cost of our humanity. We are all changing. Into what, I can't say."

"How awful," Tasha said. Her clear blue eyes were wide with pity.

"I suppose it is," Shane said. "But we have so much to atone for. Me most of all." Even behind Shane's eerie stare, Rollan thought he could detect genuine pain in his face. "What we did in the war, what I did to all of you—" He looked up for a moment, his yellow gaze set on Abeke. "There's nothing I can do to fix it ... no matter how I wish I could." He shook his head, blinking at the ground.

"Is that it?" Rollan said. "You dragged us here so you could apologize? You could have written a letter and saved us all a lot of time."

"This is not just about me, or what I've done." Shane took a deep breath. "I brought you here because I need your help. Erdas needs your help." He turned his yellow gaze on Rollan. "There's someone you need to meet—someone who needs to talk to you."

Rollan rolled his eyes. He was getting tired of Shane's dramatics. "And where is this mysterious someone?"

A creaking voice whispered beneath his feet. "She's right here, birdyboy."

The voice was so close to Rollan that he immediately shouted out in surprise and leaped clear off his seat, fumbling for his dagger. The bowl of stew that he'd been holding flew up into the air and landed with a loud slosh! right on his head.

Rollan spun around, staring at the person who had spoken to him. It was an old woman with cracked, leathery skin, laughing with a huge toothless smile. She was lying on the ground at his feet, arms at her side. Her white hair was tangled and greasy, hanging limp from her thin face. And her eyes ... were gone. Where two eyes should have been there were only soft dents in the flesh—as if someone had sculpted her from clay and forgotten that one feature.

Rollan wiped fish stew from his face, still breathing heavily. For the third time in less than an hour, he was surrounded by laughing Redcloaks.

He glanced down at Essix, who seemed similarly amused. “Very funny,” he muttered, flinging boiled fish guts from his cloak.

“Sorry to have startled you, birdyboy,” the old woman said, then sniffed the air. “Or is it fishyboy? I can’t tell for sure.” She reached a gnarled finger toward him and scooped a glob of fish stew from his shin. Then she put it into her mouth, tasting. Apparently the crone approved of the taste, because the next moment she reached out again for more.

“Get off me!” Rollan cried, shoving her back. He turned toward Shane, blade raised. “Who is this crazy old bat?”

The old woman moved closer, wriggling across the ground. “I am no bat, birdyboy. Yumaris is an earthworm!” She scrunched up her face. “So tiny I can wriggle through the cracks of the world. So quiet I can hear the whisperings of tomorrow ... or is it yesterday?” She shook her head, as though confused about the difference between the two.

“Her name is Yumaris,” said a quiet voice. Rollan was surprised to see that it was Abeke who had spoken. Her voice sounded different, tense. “She was one of the Conquerors with Gar,” Abeke went on. “I saw her when Zerif brought me to Gar the first time, and then again when Meilin and I were taken prisoner. I think she was a seer of some kind.”

The old woman clapped her hands. “Not just was, hollow-girl! For all my blindness, Yumaris remains a seer still. And what I see now ... ” She shook her head, her strands of limp hair swaying back and forth. “What I see now ... ” Apparently whatever the old woman “saw” was too much to speak of, and she started muttering, twisting at the ends of her hair. The next moment she was talking to the tips of her fingers, like each of them was a little pet.

“Great,” Rollan said, sitting back down. “You dragged us halfway around the world to meet a crazy person.”

“Yumaris is crazy,” Shane agreed. “And dangerous.” It was clear from the tone of his voice that he might have resented the woman’s help. Rollan wondered what else had transpired between the two of them. “But she’s also useful. In these times, we can’t afford the luxury of picking our allies.”

“Tell me about it,” Rollan said, snorting.

“Her visions have kept us alive these last months,” Shane continued. “And they led us to these ruins, where even Zerif couldn’t find us. She wasn’t always quite this ... eccentric. Her spirit animal was an earthworm that gave her glimpses of the future. When she inherited these powers in full ... Well, she’s a bit confused now.”

“She thinks she’s an earthworm,” Stead said flatly.

Rollan watched Yumaris, who was currently trying to claw her way into the rocky wall with her bare hands. It looked painful. She gave up with her hands and started chewing the rock. “So why bring us to her?” Rollan said.

Shane met his eyes, his face deadly serious. “Because she’s the only thing standing between us and the destruction of the world.”

THE SNARE

THEIR MEALS FINISHED, SHANE ROSE AND APPROACHED a narrow tunnel. “Stead, please take Tasha and Kirat to the others, and help them set up camp.”

“We’re not here to do servants’ work,” Kirat said, standing. “We’re coming with you.” Cabaro was similarly inclined and growled in agreement.

“You seem to think you have some authority in this place, little lord,” Shane said, leaning against the rock wall. Rollan smiled to himself, thinking that Shane might dislike Kirat as much as he did. “Everyone does their part here. The truth is we only brought you along to keep Cabaro away from Zerif. I’m just as happy to throw you in a cell, if you’d prefer. What I have to say is for Greencloaks alone.”

Out of the corner of his eye, Rollan saw Abeke lower her head. “Then maybe I should join the others,” she said.

“Stop that!” Rollan swatted her arm. “You’re still a Greencloak—spirit animal or not. And there’s no way I’m going to follow Mistress Wormbrain and King Lizardface into a steaming volcano without some backup.” He made a stern face to show her that he was only half kidding. That he really did need her.

Abeke rolled her eyes, but Rollan could tell she was doing it to conceal a smile. He couldn't possibly imagine what it would be like to lose a spirit animal, but he knew that without Uraza, Abeke needed a friend now more than ever.

"King," Stead said, approaching Shane, "there was some talk of Kirat training the other Great Beast summoners in combat. Perhaps he can do that instead of chores?"

Shane considered it. "It couldn't hurt. Very well." He signaled for Stead to lead Kirat and Tasha to the outer camp.

Rollan and Abeke followed Shane and Yumaris down a steep tunnel staircase that seemed to go straight into the base of the volcano. Steaming pools of lava filled the cold air with an eerie red glow. "Are you sure it's safe to chisel away the walls of a volcano?" Rollan said, hopping over a hissing puddle of lava. "What if you, um, spring a leak?"

"That's not likely," Shane said. "These tunnels were here long before we arrived. The ruins themselves are carved from some kind of rock that doesn't melt—something mined deep within the ground."

He led them past a small balcony that overlooked the inside of the volcano. Where Rollan had expected a molten lake, he instead found an enormous round stone door made of overlapping blades that intersected in the middle—like the folds of an iris.

"The main volcano cauldron has been stopped up for centuries," Shane explained. "The lava you're seeing here is all flowing from cracks in and around the surface. So long as you watch your step, you should be fine. Plus it helps light the way."

As they circled around the floor of the ruins, Rollan noticed a towering shard of ice in the center of the cavern—a frost-covered stalagmite that was nearly as tall as the mountain. "What's with the giant icicle?" he said.

Shane shrugged, peering up at the tower. "We're not sure. There's some sort of structure underneath, but cold air from the mouth of the volcano has encased whatever it is in a sheet of ice too thick to penetrate. The tower is clearly connected to the ruins, but until we learn more, we've decided to leave it alone."

The path inside the mountain was not a straight line; rather it crisscrossed and branched a dozen times over to create an enormous maze. They continued turning one way, then the next, descending deeper underground.

“Stay with the group and keep your eyes open,” Shane said. “If you get lost in here, it could be days before we find you again.... That is, if you manage not to fall down a lava flue first.”

Despite his warning, the party was not being led by Shane. Yumaris guided the group, running her hands along the walls, sniffing the air, and getting into arguments with the stones.

Rollan watched her scramble down to her knees and rub her hair into the ground. “You sure the old lady’s fit to guide us?” he said.

“If Shane trusts Yumaris, then so should we,” Abeke said firmly. “He’s got more reason to hate her than most. She helped kill his sister.”

Rollan looked up at Shane, whose face was half covered in shadow. “The past is the past,” the boy said curtly. “Like the rest of us, Yumaris is trying to make up for old sins.”

Rollan eyed the old woman, presently sniffing some dirt she found on the tunnel ground. “Yeah, she seems really torn up about it.”

Yumaris popped the dirt into her mouth, made a face, and spit it out. “I can feel things,” she whispered. “Vibrations echoing deep underground. Footsteps long passed and footsteps not yet come.”

“That’s how you and your Redcloaks were able to track us,” Abeke said to Shane. “Yumaris could sense where we were moving.”

“Exactly,” Shane said. “But it was all we could do to keep up with Zerif. He’s clearly got his own way of tracking the Great Beasts, and it won’t be long before he finds us here.” He put his hand along the rock wall. “Luckily these ruins aren’t without natural defenses. When he gets here, we’ll be ready.”

“What exactly is this place?” Rollan said. He had by now noticed that the walls were covered in all manner of carvings. “Some kind of lost temple?”

“Not exactly a temple,” Shane said. “The ruins are an ancient trap. The work of Hellan priests that lived here centuries ago.”

“The Hellans?” said Rollan. “Someone needs to brush up on his geography.” Rollan had never had any formal schooling, but even he knew about the ancient Hellans. They were a people who lived in the garden paradise of Athenos a thousand years ago. “Hellans worshipped the sun and walked around barefoot. Why would they travel all the way to this frigid rock? That’s completely insane.” He glanced nervously at Yumaris. “No offense.”

“Yes, offense!” Yumaris exclaimed merrily.

“That’s true about Athenos,” Shane said, “But these carvings tell a different story. The Hellans were more far-traveled than we realized. One group of Hellan priests exiled themselves here, to the bottommost pole of the world.”

“Not a pole! A hole!” Yumaris chimed in. “It’s the gullet of Erdas, what runs from tail to tip.”

Rollan was a bit confused by all this, but Abeke seemed to follow. “So this volcano is at the world’s axis,” she said. “Well, that would explain what’s gotten into Essix.” She pointed to the falcon, who still sat perched on Rollan’s arm. “She can barely keep upright in this place.”

Rollan scrunched up his face. “What would that have to do with how she flies?”

Abeke explained, “In Nilo, every spring would bring huge flocks of homing cranes, traveling thousands of miles to a specific lake ... almost as if they had a map and compass. Our village Greencloak once told me that the birds followed magnetic currents that moved with the tides—that’s how they knew how to find their way home each year. If we’re at the bottom of the world, then those invisible currents are stronger than anything Essix has ever felt ... strong enough to completely scramble her sense of direction.”

“It’s true,” Shane said. “A few of our Redcloaks were bonded with birds. They find themselves constantly disoriented.”

Rollan wasn’t so sure. The idea that the Great Beast Essix could be bested by some “invisible currents” was alarming to say the least. And what would happen if they faced Zerif's army in this place? Rollan would be as alone as Abeke. "So why did the Hellans build all this?" he said, returning to the subject at hand. "And why risk your own life just to show it to us?"

"These ruins are more than just some remote outpost. This whole place is an enormous snare." Shane fixed his yellow eyes on Rollan. "They built it to stop something called ... the Wyrm."

Just hearing this word made Yumaris shriek in terror. "The Wyrm! The Wyrm!" she cried. "I can hear it, uncoiling in its foul egg ... hatching deep below! We must hide! Hide!" And the next thing Rollan knew, she had scattered off down some dark tunnel, abandoning the rest of the group.

Shane shook his head, like he had seen this before. "She can really run when she puts her mind to it. I should know better than to mention the Wyrm in her presence. She'll be useless for the rest of the day."

"How ever will we survive?" Rollan said with mock despair.

"I've heard of the Wyrm before," Abeke said. "Zerif mentioned it when we fought in Amaya. He said it was awakening, and that he was awakening with it."

"If Zerif likes it, then I hate it," Rollan said. "So what exactly is this Wyrm thing? Some kind of fancy new spirit animal?"

"I don't think it's new," Shane said, continuing down the path. "I think it's older than the Great Beasts. And if I'm reading these carvings correctly, it's the source of the parasites—everyone who is infected is somehow drawn to the Wyrm, forced to do its bidding."

Rollan knew this wasn't quite true. "Hate to contradict you, boss, but we've seen the effects of the parasites firsthand. Everyone infected is under Zerif's control, not some Wyrm. Once they're infected, beasts and humans alike do exactly what he commands." He tried not to look at Abeke when he said this—recalling how Uraza had tried to attack her in Nilo.

"That may be true," Shane said. "But what if something else is controlling Zerif? What if he, too, is being used by the Wyrm?"

"Zerif commands an army of humans and spirit animals," Abeke said. "Could this Wyrm possibly be so powerful?"

“I don’t know,” Shane said, shrugging. “Gerathon could exert control over those of us who drank the Bile, but not on this level. All I know is what these carvings tell us. They say that the Wyrms egg fell from the stars and landed in a place called Sadre, deep under the earth. It’s been living dormant underground for centuries. Until now. The Wyrms is waking, and when it hatches, it will devour everything in its path.”

Rollan swallowed. “Conor and Meilin are underground. They were trapped after falling into some hidden doorway. You’re saying they’re down there with that thing?”

“Possibly,” Shane said. “And my source tells me they had another with them, a boy named Takoda, who summoned his own Great Beast.”

All of this was true, but Rollan was surprised that Shane knew it. “Just how many spies do you have?” he said.

Shane shrugged. “Only one—but he’s very good at his job. I’m taking you to meet him now.”

Shane pointed to the wall beside him, which was etched with drawings of ancient figures digging holes at different points on the globe, meeting in the middle. “According to these carvings, the volcano was drained to make room for some kind of snare. Beneath those doors in the floor of the chamber is a tunnel that goes clear down through the center of Erdas. And somewhere in the middle is a thing called the Chamber of Tides. It’s a construction powerful enough to stop the Wyrms.”

“So if the Hellans completed the trap,” Rollan said, “then why haven’t they used it yet? Why is the Wyrms still alive?”

“It’s not so easy,” Shane said, and he led them down the corridor. “This trap can’t be sprung until after the Wyrms hatches. And it’s unclear how we’re supposed to open the doors and activate the trap—they wanted to keep that a secret. If we’re reading the carvings correctly, there’s only one living soul who knows how to activate the snare. The same one who helped build this place. Though getting his help might be difficult.”

“I’d imagine so!” Rollan quipped. “This place is thousands of years old. Whoever built it is probably a bit indisposed at the moment. Dead like the rest of the Hellans.”

“Unless ... ” Abeke said. “They weren’t human hands.” She turned to Shane. “The one you’re speaking of wasn’t a Hellan, was he? You’re talking about a Great Beast?”

“A Great Beast built this place?” Rollan said. “Which one?”

“An old friend of ours,” Shane said as he rounded a corner. He pointed into the shadows toward a face carved into the stone. Rollan peered through the lava-lit corridor and stared at the carving. It was a large face, with a heavy brow, dark eyes, and sharp fangs. It was a face of pure evil.

“Kovo?” Rollan said. “You’ve got to be kidding.”

ABEKE GLANCED AT ROLLAN, WHOSE FACE WAS TWISTED with confused disbelief, and she thought she knew how he felt. They had just been told by Shane that Kovo—the Kovo—was the secret mastermind of this centuries-old plan to stop the Wym.

“Kovo ... ?” she said, unable to look away from the hideous carving before her. “But he’s ... he’s ... ” She shook her head, somehow unable to form a complete thought.

“He’s pure evil!” Rollan burst out.

“You don’t have to tell me that,” Shane said. “I was as shocked as anyone.”

Abeke nodded, swallowing. Shocked didn’t begin to describe what she was feeling. Her hands were clammy and she could feel her heart racing in her chest. Even after all that had passed between her and Shane, so many betrayals, she still somehow believed he was trying to help. But one look at this carving and she knew the truth: Shane would never change.

“You’re working for Kovo,” she said, inching away from Shane, who was watching her intently. “How could I have been so stupid to trust you?”

“I’m not working for Kovo,” Shane said to her, his voice pleading. “All I know is what the carvings have told us—that Kovo knows the secret of this place. Whether we like it or not, he is the key to destroying the Wyrn.”

“You ever think that he’s just trying to eliminate the competition?” Rollan said. “Kovo is evil, end of story. If he made this snare, then it can only be for his own selfish gain. We’d be fools to trust him.” He shot a look at Shane. “Or you, for that matter.”

“Don’t forget that I saved your life,” Shane said, stepping toward him. “More than once.”

“Stop fighting,” Abeke said. She pushed both boys apart. “Whatever we’re feeling doesn’t matter. Zerif’s army is out there, and he’s collecting Great Beasts—three of which are currently residing on this island. If we want to have a chance of stopping him or the Wyrn, we need to act quickly before he finds us.” It wasn’t exactly what she felt, but the force of her words seemed to make an impact on the boys.

“Four,” Shane said quietly.

“What?” Rollan snapped.

“There are four Great Beasts on the island.” He turned toward a narrow corridor leading away from the middle of the volcano. “Follow me.”

Abeke and Rollan trailed Shane through several corners, the tunnel growing colder and colder until they reached a large chamber carved out of rock deep underground. They were far below sea level, and the tunnel should have been flooded. Abeke reasoned that the dip had actually trapped the air inside.

A small pool of warm water bubbled up in the middle of the floor, creating a steaming hot spring that made the air damp and salty.

Sitting at the edge of the water was a small girl with strange, almost bluish skin. She was dressed in draped cloth. Her bare legs rested in the pool, and she was weaving a blanket from strands of long seaweed.

Shane approached the girl. “Niri, say hello to our friends.”

The girl put down her work and turned her head toward them. “We’ve been waiting for you.” She said this warmly but made no effort to stand and greet them properly.

Abeke stepped closer and saw that Niri’s skin was painted blue with swirling tattoos that covered her whole body. “You’re from the Hundred Isles,” she said. She offered a kind smile, knowing something of those tropical climes. “You must hate the snow almost as much as I do.”

“Niri was there when Zerif and his army burned her entire village to the ground,” Shane said darkly. “She’s probably beyond hating things like weather.”

“Forgive me for not standing to greet you,” the girl said. “I find myself unequal to the task.” She lifted the corner of her seaweed blanket to reveal that her legs were both thin and misshapen.

“Your legs don’t work,” Abeke said, trying not to sound horrified. “Did Zerif do that?”

“I was born unable to walk or even swim,” Niri said simply. “In the Hundred Isles, our lives are lived in the sea. Not being able to swim made me an outcast. Not even the healers would agree to see me. They believed my family had violated tapu. My father and mother cared for me in isolation, far from shore, shunned by the rest of our tribe.”

“In the end that’s what saved her,” Shane said. “When Zerif’s army landed, all her kinsmen rushed to fight him, but she was left behind in the jungle. He burned the village down looking for Niri, but she was smart enough to keep herself hidden until the Redcloaks could rescue her.”

“Why did Zerif want you?” Rollan said.

“He didn’t want me,” Niri said. “He wanted him.” The girl pointed to the ceiling of the cave. There was a place where the rock had been replaced with a sheet of solid ice that shone blue light on them—sealing them off from the ocean water. The ice was cloudy, but on the other side Abeke could just make out the shadow of a large creature floating back and forth in the water. A creature with eight legs.

“Mulop!” Abeke said.

Indeed it was Mulop, and upon hearing his name spoken, the octopus swung his many arms in greeting. The Great Octopus looked smaller than when Abeke had last seen him in the grotto beyond Dagger Point, but he was still enormous. The shadow darted from view and a moment later there was a splashing at Abeke’s feet as a large tentacle rose up from the pool of water and nuzzled itself against Niri’s hand. Mulop’s skin had an iridescent glow, like the inside of an oyster shell—a hundred colors reflecting in the cavern all around.

“Tell you honestly,” Rollan said. “I’m relieved to see it’s Mulop you’ve got down here. I was afraid we were going to be shaking hands with Gerathon!”

“Mulop saved my life in more ways than I can count,” Niri said. “When Zerif attacked my village, Mulop was able to cloud the minds of his army and keep me hidden. And even before that, he changed my life. Mulop’s thoughts stretch to every corner of Erdas, and he shares a connection with every living thing. Through our bond, I’ve felt my own senses expand, letting me experience parts of Erdas I would never have imagined. That’s how I was able to sense the Redcloaks coming to my aid.”

Abeke looked at the girl, her bony legs thin beneath the blanket. She wondered what it would have been like to grow up not knowing the joy of running or swimming or climbing a tree. The appearance of Mulop must have been a revelation—it was a chance at a new life.

But thinking of someone else’s spirit animal only made her miss her own. She tried to picture Uraza somewhere far from here. Even knowing that the leopard was under Zerif’s control, she still wished she could see her spirit animal once more.

“What do you mean by sense?” Rollan said, interrupting Abeke’s thoughts. “Mulop gives you the power to feel the minds of others?”

Niri nodded. “He can also cloud our own minds, making us harder to sense—which is what he’s doing right now.”

“That’s the reason we’ve been able to stay hidden from Zerif’s army for so long,” Shane said. “So long as Mulop is on our side, Zerif will never be able to track us here. But the time for hiding is over. Now we need Mulop to help us find Kovo.”

“Wait,” Abeke said. “Kovo is underground with Meilin and Conor. Why not have him talk to Briggan?” Her mind flashed to Conor’s face, sick with worry over his own infection. She hoped he was all right.

Rollan swallowed beside her. “Or maybe, um, Jhi?” Abeke glanced at the boy whose cheeks seemed to have reddened at the mention of Meilin’s spirit animal. “Just a thought.”

Shane shook his head. “I’m afraid we can’t. Since he was reborn, Mulop’s powers are considerably diminished. He’ll only be able to maintain a connection for a very short time. And in order to talk to Kovo, Mulop will need to stop hiding our locations. We’ll be exposed. Once that happens, Zerif will come for us. Hopefully we’ll have enough time to learn how to trigger the snare.”

“What if Kovo doesn’t want to help?” Abeke said.

Shane met her eyes. “Then we’re all as good as dead.”

THE PRISONER

MEILIN DIPPED A MOSS SPONGE INTO A STONE BASIN filled with stagnant water. She wrung it out and dabbed it across Conor's burning forehead, across the dark spiral that spread along his skin like a cancer. His clothes were soaked in cold sweat, and he was shivering. "This will help the fever," she said, hoping it was true.

The boy lolled his head in her direction, swallowing with cracked lips. There were dark wells below his eyes. Conor hadn't taken food in days. "Meilin," he said, his voice faint and pleading. "Let ... me ... go."

"You know I can't," Meilin said. She looked down at the ropes bound around his wrists and ankles. Conor had cut deep wounds into his flesh trying to pull himself free. The wounds would become infected soon if they didn't find some way to clean them. But she knew that releasing him would be his death. Ever since setting foot in this cursed city, Conor had become overwhelmed by a desire to reach the Wyrms. He would have blindly scaled the spiraling bell tower in the middle of the city, which stood directly beneath the Wyrms' pulsing glow. And when there was no more tower to scale, he would have jumped from the tower, trying to reach the egg, his thin arms outstretched, falling to his death. Meilin knew this was true because the courtyard around the tower was already thick with the broken bodies of those who had tried the very same thing. Sacrifices to the Wyrms.

Conor had been infected by one of the Wyrms' parasites in Nilo. He had fought bravely against the corroding power, but it was clear that his constitution was fading. When they first landed in this fallen Sadrean city, the home of the Wyrms, Conor had tried running toward the egg, fighting anyone who dared to get in his way, even his own spirit animal, Briggan. Meilin and Takoda had finally resorted to binding his hands and feet so he couldn't run. Briggan now lay beside Conor, curled up like a guard dog. Whether he was trying to protect Conor from the group or the group from Conor was unclear.

"We can't release you," Meilin said again. "Not until you're free of the Wyrms' control. It's for your own protection."

Conor grit his teeth, lurching as if a surge of pain had just slithered through his whole body. "Let me GO!" he growled. He jerked his arms and feet, pulling at his ropes, even though the struggle clearly caused him more pain.

Meilin set down her sponge and touched the tattoo on her arm. Jhi, the Great Panda, appeared at her side, yawning. Meilin reached out and scratched the black fur behind Jhi's ears. "Can you help him?" she whispered. "Can you stop the cuts on his arms and legs from getting infected?"

Jhi cast a doubtful look at the boy but nodded solemnly and lumbered toward Conor. Meilin noted with a pang of sympathy that Jhi's body looked thin, which was not a good look for a great panda. There had been little food beyond what mushrooms and roots the group could forage—and these were not things that Jhi enjoyed eating. Meilin tried to keep her in passive state as often as possible, but she also knew that Conor needed all the help he could get.

She watched as Jhi stepped around Briggan to Conor's side. The panda leaned down and licked the wounds around Conor's bound ankles.

"Get away from me!" Conor screamed, kicking his legs.

Jhi gave a sharp yip as Conor's foot struck her in the muzzle.

“Conor!” Meilin shouted, standing. She already had her fists out, ready to defend her spirit animal. Briggan had sprung to his feet and was crouched beside her, also growling at Conor.

Jhi turned toward both of them and shook her head, letting them know that she was unharmed. She turned back to Conor and again began ministering to the boy’s wounds. Conor struggled but soon gave way to exhaustion and fell back asleep.

“Thanks,” Meilin said, looking down at Briggan. “I know this can’t be easy for you, either.”

The wolf let out a quiet whine, his tail slunk down, and returned to Conor’s feet.

THE FALLEN CITY

AFTER SUMMONING JHI BACK INTO PASSIVE STATE, Meilin left Conor to visit the top deck of the lighthouse. A modest structure overlooked the shores of the Sulfur Sea. This building, like everything else in the city, was carved from some sort of rare stone that she had never seen before. She found Takoda at the top of the steps, seated at the open window.

“I heard shouts downstairs,” Takoda said. “Conor?”

Meilin nodded, chewing at the inside of her cheek. “He’s asleep now. Jhi is tending to him.” Kovo was nowhere to be seen, which didn’t surprise her. The Great Beast spent most of his time maintaining the glowstone perimeter that he had set up around the center of the city. The Many were afraid of the light, and the glowstones created a barrier that protected them from approaching the bell tower. Kovo was almost fanatical about the glowstones. He spent every day maintaining them, searching for new stones to replace those that had begun to dim.

Meilin joined Takoda at the window, which overlooked the eastern half of the city. The lamp in the lighthouse was meant to be fueled by glowstones, which Kovo had taken away. In their stead he had stocked the lighthouse with clay urns of oil and medicine that he had gathered from apothecaries and abandoned shops around the city. He insisted that the urns remain untouched but when asked what they were for, he refused to explain.

Meilin, Conor, and Takoda had been traveling the caverns of Sadre for what must have been weeks now. Down here it was like a second world, one hidden beneath the surface of Erdas, populated by its own tribes and creatures. Meilin certainly missed the warmth of the sun, but what she missed most was the simple ability to count the days. In Sadre there were no days, only perpetual darkness—one endless night.

“You don’t know how important sunlight is until it’s gone,” she said.

Takoda nodded slightly, his eyes fixed on the slightly phosphorescent waves lapping against the shore. “It’s kind of peaceful, though,” he said.

Meilin didn’t know how to respond to this, and so she said nothing. She stared at the Sulfur Sea, which even from here emitted an unpleasant brimstone aroma. They had only barely escaped those dark waters.

In her mind, Meilin could still hear the piercing shriek of the corrupted eels that had nearly devoured her and her friends. She tried not to think of Teutar and the rest of the crew of the Meleager, who had sacrificed themselves so Meilin and her friends could continue their quest to stop the Wyrn.

And now, after so much struggle and pain, they had reached their destination: a fallen city that looked to be older than time. Giant stone towers connected by bridges and twisting staircases were chiseled right out of the strange rock.

“It must have been beautiful, don’t you think? Before everything?” Takoda had asked the question upon landing on the shores of the city. Meilin noticed that Kovo had grimaced at his human partner—almost like a smile.

Even after all their travels, after all they had endured together, Meilin was still uncomfortable having the Great Ape in their party. He made no move to betray them, but she couldn’t erase the memory of that final battle against Kovo at the Evertree. The gorilla was selfish, cruel, and, worst of all, he was smart. If it weren’t for the fact that he alone seemed to have some sense of what was going on, she would have left Kovo behind a dozen times now.

Takoda had always argued that he thought Kovo's reasons for trying to take control of the Evertree were more complicated than just world domination. Now, seeing its roots firsthand, Meilin could only begrudgingly agree.

The city was located directly below the Evertree, whose silver roots spread across the cavernous ceiling, bathing the entire place in an eerie glow. And tangled in the roots of the tree was an enormous pulsing egg sack, tucked between the tendrils: the Wyrm.

Kovo had signed to Takoda that this place was called Hole, which was a strange name for a city. Meilin suspected that this was a bad translation. Then again, what did she know about these people or their naming customs? She had also noticed some carvings in the walls that seemed to be Hellan, which made sense. The Sadreans were descended, in more ways than one, from the ancient culture.

The Wyrm had not yet hatched, but Meilin could tell from the fractures in the egg's membrane that it would soon. The Evertree roots around the egg were starting to rot and fray—which also frayed Meilin's bond with Jhi. Even now, thousands of tiny wriggling parasites slithered from the cracks and fell to the ground far below. The same parasites that had spread all across Sadre, taking over any living thing they touched.

The people of Hole had long since been overwhelmed by the parasites. They were now what the Sadreans called the Many—shuffling, mindless drones enslaved to the will of the Wyrm. Meilin closed her eyes, thinking again of Conor. How much longer until he joined their ranks?

The streets were clogged with the Wyrm's wriggling parasites, and so they had been forced to make camp on higher ground in the lighthouse at the edge of the city. Takoda and Kovo had blocked all the lower entrances. It was a safe place, but they were still trapped. And eventually, the Many would find a way in. The Many always found a way in.

Meilin knew this because she had already seen it happen in the city of Phos Astos. The Many had overwhelmed the Sadreans who lived there and destroyed them. If it weren't for the actions of a brave girl named Xanthe, Meilin and her friends might have been among the casualties. Xanthe had led them away from the destruction—away from her own crumbling home—in order to find the Wyrms.

"I wish Xanthe was here," Takoda whispered, as if reading Meilin's thoughts. "I'll bet she knows a lot about this place."

Meilin bristled. The girl had been lost during a fiery race across the Arachane Fields—Xanthe had begged them not to set fire to the fields, but Takoda hadn't listened.

And now Xanthe was gone.

Takoda had taken the loss especially hard, and Meilin suspected that he secretly blamed himself for it. But blame aside, she knew that this was no time for mourning.

"Knew," Meilin said, more brusquely than she meant. "She knew about this place. She's gone, Takoda. The best thing you can do to honor her sacrifice is finish what we set out to do."

Takoda looked at her with his deep, dark eyes. "You don't know that she's dead," he said. "Not for sure."

"Maybe not," Meilin said. "But I do know that we need you here. This whole place is swarming with the Many, and that egg is on the verge of hatching. We can't have you pining at the window for your lost crush."

Takoda could never know it, but Meilin's words were just as much for herself as him. She, too, had left someone behind. Someone she desperately longed to see once more.

"This is war, Takoda. We have to behave like warriors."

Takoda narrowed his eyes. "You sound like Kovo. Besides, if you truly believed that, you would have left Conor behind."

"Conor got infected trying to save you!" Meilin said, stomping her foot. "Besides, he's a Greencloak. He's one of us."

"Greencloaks ... " Takoda's face twisted with disgust. "You all think that having a spirit animal is what makes someone special," he said, his expression strained with emotion. "A spirit animal isn't a gift. It's a curse. It defines you before you have a chance to define yourself. After my parents died, the monastery was the only place I'd finally felt at peace. I was supposed to be a monk, to spend my life transcribing scrolls and ringing holy bells. Now I'm nothing but Kovo the Ape's human partner. A sidekick to a monster."

Takoda was usually so meek and conciliatory, but not now. His hands were clenched into tight fists at his side. He looked like he wanted to throttle something. It was clear he had been sitting on this well of anger for some time. "If I didn't have a spirit animal, I'd still be home with my brothers and sisters. And Xanthe would still be safe."

"There is no safe," Meilin said, softening her tone. "Not anymore." She remembered her own mighty empire of Zhong falling to waves of Conquerors. She remembered her father dying on the battlefield, his life snuffed out as she watched. "Your monastery would have been destroyed by the Many, or Zerif, or the Wyrms. Xanthe's city would have fallen even if we hadn't arrived. What threatens us now threatens all of Erdas. If you want to save Nilo and Phos Astos, then we have to destroy the Wyrms—quickly, before it can hatch."

She crouched down and began drawing a map of the city in the dusty floor with her finger. "I've been thinking: Maybe Kovo can help us salvage parts to build a siege engine. With a catapult we could launch some kind of missile at the egg. My father's armies used them to defend their fortresses. I think I can draw up plans." She knew doing such a thing would also damage the Evertree, but she thought it was worth the risk.

Takoda stepped back. "We've been through this already," he said firmly. "Kovo says we have to wait."

"Wait for what?" Meilin said, striking the ground with her hand. Ever since reaching the ruined city, there had been ongoing tension about how to destroy the Wyrms. Meilin knew they had to act, but Kovo—again and again—insisted that they not disturb the egg.

She stood up, meeting Takoda's eye. "The Wyrms are only going to get stronger. We've journeyed all this way, racing to get here before it hatches. And now we're supposed to just sit around and wait for it to do just that?"

"Yes."

Meilin threw up her arms. “If you hate Kovo so much, why are you taking his side?”

Takoda sighed. “I don’t hate him. I wish I could, but my bond won’t let me. And I—I can just tell that this is different.... ” He shook his head, trying to describe something indescribable. “Kovo may hate humans, but he hates the Wyrms even more. He wants to stop it as much as anyone. When it’s time to act, he’ll let us know.”

Meilin blew a strand of dark hair from her face. “And just when will that be? Because soon every person in Erdas will become infected by the Wyrms’ parasites. What’s happening to Conor downstairs will happen to all of us unless we act. Do you want that blood on your hands?”

Before Takoda could answer, there was a loud whump from the other end of the room. The impact was so great that it shook the floor beneath them.

Meilin turned to see Kovo had scaled the tower from outside, returning from his rounds. The Great Ape lumbered in through the window, eyes wide. He looked out of breath, like he had raced clear across the city to reach them.

“What’s got you all worked up?” she said.

The ape ignored her, staggering closer. He placed an enormous black hand on Takoda’s shoulder. The moment he made contact with his human partner, the boy gasped, as if the very breath had been pulled from his lungs.

“I ... I ... ” the boy said, his voice hollow and strange.

Meilin stared at Takoda’s dark eyes, which had changed to a shimmering, iridescent color—like the inside of an oyster shell. She saw now that Kovo’s eyes were likewise transformed.

“Takoda?” Meilin said. “What did he do to you?”

The boy turned toward her, blinking his swirling eyes.

“I have a message from Abeke and Rollan.”

VOICE FROM AFAR

MEILIN STARED AT TAKODA AND KOVO, BOTH OF THEM opal-eyed and unblinking. “You have ... what?” she asked.

Takoda tilted his head, as if trying to hear a faint sound. “Someone named Shane is with them.”

Meilin nearly choked on her spit. “Shane? The same Shane who tried to conquer the world?” If Shane was with them, it could only mean that they were in trouble.

Takoda shrugged, shaking his head. “I’m just the messenger,” he said. “I actually don’t really understand what’s happening.”

Kovo grunted and made a gesture to Takoda with one hand. The boy nodded and turned back to Meilin. “Kovo says it’s him. I ... I think he’s trying to help. He’s been working to keep the Great Beasts from Zerif, just like your friends. He’s trying to make up for past sins.”

Meilin narrowed her eyes. “He told you all that with just a flick of his wrist?” She knew that Kovo and Takoda had devised a way of communicating through gestures, but this seemed different.

Takoda shrugged again. “He didn’t have to say it. I just ... knew.” Takoda seemed as genuinely confused by all this as she was. “It’s like I can hear different voices in my head. Kovo ... and a girl I don't know, and one more ... Mulop?"

"Mulop?" Meilin said. Something like comprehension began to dawn on her. "The Great Beast?" She took a trembling breath. It was obvious that something strange was happening to Kovo and Takoda, even if she couldn't tell what. She didn't trust it. For all she knew, this was another plot by Shane, or perhaps some new effect of the Wyrms. "How are they contacting us?" she said carefully.

"How are you contacting us?" Takoda repeated. He cast his ear to the air and responded a moment later. "Mulop has linked minds with Kovo ... but the connection will not last very long. We are ... very far away, and Mulop's powers are weak." Takoda's voice was stilted, as though he were carefully repeating something that was being dictated to him. "Where are you?"

"I'm not sure we can tell them that," Meilin said, inching back. "How do we know we can trust you?"

Takoda repeated her question and then listened for the answer. He snorted slightly before saying, "Rollan would like me to ask Jhi what it's like being bonded to a snotty general's daughter. Also, he wants to know if stubbornness is a skill you picked up from your fancy tutors."

A smile spread across Meilin's face. "That's Rollan, all right." She hoped that neither Takoda nor Kovo could hear the catch in her voice or see her blushing. "Fine," she said, regaining her composure. "What do you need to know?"

10

KOVO SPEAKS

ROLLAN STOOD NEXT TO ABEKE AND SHANE IN THE cold cavern, shivering. Drops of water ran down icy stalactites and splashed on the wet floor in small puddles. Before him sat Niri, her legs dangling in the steaming water. The girl's eyes swirled with a rainbow of colors, her blue-inked fingers clutching Mulop's tentacle.

It had worked. They were actually talking to Meilin. Which meant Meilin was alive. A thousand questions churned around in Rollan's mind as he tried to decide what to ask.

But before Rollan could say anything, Shane spoke up. "What can Kovo tell us about the Wyrm? Does he know how to stop it?"

Rollan gritted his teeth. "Why does he get to do all the talking?"

Abeke put a calming hand on his arm. "If it weren't for Shane, we wouldn't be here at all."

Niri asked Shane's question. After a moment, she began speaking for Kovo. It was her voice, but the phrasing and tone sounded different—like she was channeling Kovo's cold growl with every word.

"Aeons ago, the Wyrm's egg fell from the stars," she began, "like a stone plunging into a pool. It was a time before humans fouled the soil with their presence." The girl screwed up her mouth, as if trying to find a word.

“Things were quiet. Still. The world was golden and blue... Beasts lived alongside one another in harmony—fed by the Evertree. Spirit animals didn’t exist. Neither did the Great Beasts.”

Rollan had trouble imagining a world without humans or spirit animals or Great Beasts. The thought of a world without Essix saddened him.

“In those ancient days,” Niri continued, “the continents were a single mass that covered half the world. Mountains and deserts and snow were all together in this place—all of Erdas’s wonders in a single room. When the Wurm’s egg struck the earth, the impact was so great that the land shattered into pieces, floating apart from one another.”

“So a falling egg shattered the world?” Rollan muttered, with not a small amount of skepticism. “In my experience, that’s not what happens when eggs hit the ground.”

Niri shook her head, clarifying in her own voice. “I don’t think it was an ordinary egg. Its shell was made from a rock stronger than anything on Erdas.” A moment later, she continued speaking for Kovo. “The Wurm was drawn to the Evertree—it could sense the life coursing through its branches. When the Wurm landed, it caused great destruction—storms, floods, and earthquakes—that wiped out nearly every living thing for miles. Only fifteen creatures survived—sheltered from death by the branches of the Evertree.”

“The Great Beasts ... ” Abeke whispered. “That’s why you know all this. You were there.”

Rollan shot a look over to the girl. Abeke’s eyes were wide with wonder. “So, you’re telling us that the Wurm somehow created the Great Beasts,” he said slowly.

“Yes,” said Niri after a moment. “Our peaceful lives were over. Everything we knew and loved had been destroyed. We fifteen beasts were all that remained. But worst of all was what the Wurm did to the tree itself. The Evertree survived the impact, but it was different.”

“Different how?” Rollan said.

“The tree no longer gave mere life. It did something more dangerous—it forged an invisible bond that flowed between living things.” She paused a moment to let these words sink in. “The Evertree is the source of the spirit animal bond. And the Wyrms are the source of that power. Everything leads back to it.”

“You’re telling us that it’s the Wyrms that created the spirit animal bond,” Rollan said, and this time there was no skepticism in his voice. “Why would it do that?”

“The same reason all creatures do what they do,” Niri said for Kovo. “Because it is hungry.”

“I don’t buy it.” Rollan waved his hands, interrupting Niri. “If the Wyrms created spirit animal bonds, then it’s good. Isn’t it? Why would an evil creature bring life? That doesn’t make any sense.”

“It’s a good question,” Shane said.

Niri asked the question aloud and then gave Kovo’s response. “The Wyrms are a parasite that feeds on life itself. And like any parasite, it is both hungry ... and patient. In order to feed, it needs two things. First, a food source. Thanks to the Evertree, it now has that in abundance. Second, it needs a host in order to fully mature. Once hatched, it will bond itself to that host—and then it will be unstoppable. For centuries, it has been waiting for a creature strong enough to contain it. And for just as long, I alone have been working to stop it.”

“Kovo the long-suffering hero?” Rollan threw his hands up. “I thought Yumaris was crazy, but this takes the cake.”

“Impudent human!” Niri’s lips curled suddenly into a snarl. All at once, Rollan could see Kovo’s scowling face peering out through the girl’s features.

“Niri?” Shane asked, stepping tentatively forward.

“I alone sensed the Wyrms’ hunger,” Niri growled, her voice thick with contempt—she wasn’t just translating for Kovo anymore; it was like he was speaking directly through her. “The weakness twisting beneath the world. The corruption that fueled every spirit animal bond. My war against the Greencloaks was a war against the Wyrms—for only my brethren and I could possibly contain its power.”

Niri was practically spitting now, her face a mask of fury. Her gleaming opal eyes flared red. “My first attempt to destroy it with the Hellans failed. Human civilizations are castles made of sand—easily washed away. So I took matters into my own hands. I would gather the talismans and wrest control of the Evertree, by force if necessary. Better a thousand kingdoms fall than the Wyrms should claim its host. Better my siblings die than become slaves to such a thing.”

Rollan glimpsed Shane, who was watching the girl with his mouth agape. Rollan felt a rare twist of sympathy for the fallen monarch. Shane’s kingdom had been one of those thousands that Kovo was so willing to sacrifice.

He also felt confusion. Rollan tried to consider what was being said—that Kovo’s wicked plotting had all been in defense of Erdas—but he couldn’t believe it. Kovo had killed too many, had destroyed too much, to ever be good.

“Once the Evertree was destroyed,” Niri continued, her face softening, “its grip on the Wyrms loosened. The Wyrms grew restless. It will wait no longer. Through its parasites, the Wyrms is creating its own perfect host. Someone more powerful than all the Great Beasts combined.”

“Zerif,” Abeke said. A silence shivered through the cavern. The thought of an even more powerful version of Zerif—one bonded with an aeons-old malevolent Wyrms—was too frightening to contemplate.

“This all sounds nice, but it’s just a theory,” Rollan said. “If the egg isn’t hatched, how does Kovo know what the Wyrms is planning?”

“He’s telling the truth about Zerif,” Shane said. “Mulop has been peering inside Zerif’s mind. Zerif thinks he’s in control, but he’s being manipulated, just like all of the infected.”

Niri swallowed, her face trembling from the strain of the connection. Drops of sweat fell from her hair. “The Wyrms is waiting until Zerif has gathered enough power,” she said slowly, “and then it will break free from its egg and find him. Once they’re bonded, nothing will be able to stop it from consuming the world.”

“We know these ruins are some sort of trap that Kovo helped the Hellans build,” Shane said. “We need to know how to trigger the trap. How do we stop the Wyrms from hatching and bonding with Zerif?”

Niri frowned, her breath coming in ragged gasps. “How do we stop the Wyrms?” she said. She turned her head, as though she were having trouble hearing the response. When she spoke, her words were halting. “The ... only way to trigger ... the snare ... ” She interrupted herself with a sharp gasp. Mulop’s tentacle slipped from her grip, sliding back into the pool of water. Niri fell backward, her body limp.

“The only way is what?” Shane cried, running toward Niri, who had slumped over on the rock. He grabbed her by the shoulders, shaking her. “How do we trigger the snare?”

“It looks like our little chat is over,” Rollan said, noting that he could no longer see Mulop’s shadowy form on the other side of the icy wall.

Niri turned her head toward Shane, blinking. Her eyes had returned to normal, and her face was pale from fright. “Zerif,” she whispered. “He’s found us.”

HALF A PLAN

MEILIN STOOD IN THE DARKENED LIGHTHOUSE, staring at Takoda, whose eyes had returned to their normal brown color. Both he and Kovo looked like they were recovering from a bout of particularly bad nausea.

“Are you okay?” Meilin asked, grabbing the boy by the arm so he didn’t tumble out the open window.

Takoda ran a trembling hand through his dark hair. “Just dizzy,” he said. “I had four separate voices echoing in my head. It was hard to make sense of it all.” His eyes flashed to Kovo, who seemed to have become very interested in the view out the window.

“Well, just take a moment to catch your breath,” Meilin said. “Jhi can help with the nausea.” And so saying, she summoned Jhi, who immediately toddled to Takoda’s side and began nuzzling a place on the boy’s temple.

Kovo remained where he stood, but his bearing was altogether less fierce than it had been half an hour before. It was clear that his little tirade had drained him.

The ape reached out a giant hand and patted Takoda on the shoulder in a way that alarmed Meilin for its gentleness. Perhaps their little conversation had changed the way Takoda and Kovo felt about each other. She glanced at Jhi, following the panda as she worked. Meilin wondered what it would be like to truly inhabit the mind of her spirit animal. A part of her feared what she would learn if she could hear Jhi's true opinion of her.

"Do you know why the connection was cut short?" she asked after Takoda had more fully recovered. "What happened to Abeke and Rollan?"

Takoda swallowed. "I don't know.... Mulop couldn't maintain the connection. Something pulled his attention away. I could feel it, too, for a heartbeat—the thing that interrupted him. I could sense something approaching."

Kovo nodded, making a sign that she recognized as "danger."

"Zerif," Meilin said, stepping back. "He must have found them." She closed her fists tight, wishing she could fight alongside her friends. She didn't know what to make of the fact that Shane was with them now, but she hoped the former Conqueror could protect Abeke and Rollan in the coming battle.

Meilin shook these fears from her mind. They had a mission to complete, and she couldn't let herself get distracted. "We have to destroy the Wyrm before it can hatch and bond with Zerif," she said. "Let's get started."

"I don't think we can kill the Wyrm before it hatches," Takoda said. "The only thing that can get through that egg is the Wyrm itself. It would have hatched already, if it weren't for those roots binding it tight—the tree is trying to save us all."

"But I thought the Evertree was part of the Wyrm's evil plan?" She was still struggling to process this new idea that the spirit bond was really the product of the Wyrm. "The tree is a puppet, just like the rest of us."

"Maybe so," Takoda said. "But maybe, like us, the Evertree knows what it means for the Wyrm to hatch. Just like we're fighting against its power, so is the tree."

Meilin cast a sidelong glance at the boy. She didn't know how things went in southern Nilo, but in Zhong, people didn't believe that plants had feelings. "If the Evertree can't stop it, then how do we?"

Takoda eyed the ceiling. "It's like the Sadrean elders told us in Phos Astos. Kovo helped the ancient Hellans build this place to stop the Wyrm."

“I remember,” Meilin said. “They said he constructed some kind of secret weapon.” She turned to the gorilla. “So where is this weapon?”

The ape snorted and then made a gesture.

“We’re standing in it,” Takoda explained. “The city is the trap.”

“Great,” Meilin said. “So all we have to do is set it off. How do we do that?”

“Kovo won’t say. Even though I could see inside Kovo’s mind, hear his thoughts, it was clear that he wanted to keep that knowledge hidden.” The boy touched the handle of an enormous iron mallet propped against the wall. Kovo had found the mallet on their first day in the city and now kept it with him always. “I think it has something to do with this mallet.”

Kovo turned, glaring at them both and snarling. He marched over to Takoda and snatched the mallet from the boy, as though it weighed no more than a twig. He obviously wanted to cut short their speculation about how this trap might actually work.

“This is no time for secrets,” Meilin said, following after the gorilla. “If you know something, you have to tell us.”

“Don’t judge him too harshly,” Takoda said. “He’s guarded this place for centuries. I think he’s afraid of one of us becoming infected by the Wurm’s parasites and betraying our plan.”

“As if we’re the ones who can’t be trusted,” Meilin said, folding her arms. “Speaking of traps, this feels an awful lot like we’re walking into one.”

She recalled with a flash of rage the way Kovo had manipulated and used humans, animals, and even his fellow Great Beasts. How he had raised up an army of Conquerors to destroy the Greencloaks. “Who’s to say Kovo’s not just plotting to take control of the Wurm and harness its power for himself? It wouldn’t be the first time he’s tried it.”

The gorilla gave a low, dangerous growl, his black hands tensed around the mallet as though he might be considering its use on her skull.

“Stop!” Takoda said, pushing himself between them. “Kovo is not the enemy.”

“Not the enemy?” Meilin actually laughed aloud. “Tell that to the legions of Greencloaks who died trying to protect Erdas. Tell that to Tarik, and Barlow, and my father.”

“And my family ... ” Takoda said. “You’re not the only one who’s lost something.” He looked back at the gorilla, his expression torn between anger and empathy. “I know Kovo’s done wicked things. But he’s fighting a bigger war—one older than the Greencloaks. Kovo is no friend of humanity, but we all share a common enemy in the Wurm. And he’s sacrificed more than any of us in order to stop it. We have to trust him.”

Meilin could not believe what she was hearing. “An hour ago, you hated Kovo as much as anyone—now suddenly he’s your best friend?”

Takoda frowned. “The Kovo you battled at the Evertree is gone. When I summoned him as a spirit animal, he had no choice but to see the world through human eyes—at least a little bit. You don’t have to trust him, but you should trust me.” Takoda stared at her, his eyes wide and pleading. “What do you say?”

Meilin eyed the iron mallet clasped in the gorilla’s huge hand. “So it has something to do with that mallet. What are we supposed to do with it? Whack the Wurm on the head?” Her gaze moved past Kovo toward the window, which looked out into the center of the city.

Which looked out to the bell tower.

It really was an enormous structure. Its base was covered with pillars and round platforms. In the dim light, they almost looked like stone cogs and pistons—parts of some ancient machine.

“The bell tower,” she said. “That’s the trigger for the weapon, isn’t it?”

Kovo blinked, his face screwed up. He looked annoyed, but not at her. After a moment, he made a few hand gestures, which Takoda was able to translate.

“It is not a weapon like you’re thinking. It’s more like a trap ... and even that word isn’t quite right. He keeps talking about the tides.... ”

“So we’re meant to drown the Wurm?” Meilin said, struggling to follow. “I’d think a creature able to destroy all of Erdas could swim.”

Kovo shook his great head and gestured again, growing more frustrated.

“That’s not right, either,” Takoda said. “It’s ... it’s Erdas. Erdas will stop the Wyrms.” Takoda shook his head, struggling to keep pace with Kovo’s gestures. “It’s too complicated to explain. But I think I know how these ruins are meant to work.” He pointed out the window. “There are two towers—one here, and the other where your friends are—and they’re connected by a tunnel that runs right through the heart of Erdas. When the bell is rung, the towers will be activated and the trap will be set into motion.”

Meilin nodded vaguely. “So we need to ring the bell to spring the trap?” She looked out the window toward the middle of the city, at the bell tower that rose above the rest of the buildings. “That explains why Kovo was so eager to protect the tower from the Many. He must have been afraid that the Many climbing all over it would damage the bell.”

Kovo nodded and made more gestures to his human partner.

Takoda watched, his eyes following the quickly moving hands. It seemed to Meilin that since communing with Kovo through Mulop, the boy was better at understanding his spirit animal’s gestures. “Until the Wyrms hatch,” Takoda said, “it’s our job to protect that tower from the Many. If the Wyrms learn of our plan ahead of time, it might try to destroy the tower before it can be activated.”

Meilin leaned against a giant urn of spiced truffle oil and blew a strand of hair from her face. “Let’s just hope we don’t die of hunger before the moment arrives. Or boredom.” Waiting might have been something a monk like Takoda could do, but Meilin was a warrior, a person of action. She felt Jhi place an understanding paw on her foot. The panda, it seemed, knew Meilin’s discomfort.

She heard a sharp bark as Briggan appeared at the top of the stairs. The wolf had remained with Conor below for the conversation, but was now pawing at the floor, whining.

“Something’s wrong,” Takoda said, already moving. “I think he wants us to go downstairs.”

Meilin grabbed her staff and followed after them. Briggan was growling, and his fur had bristled along his back—he looked frightened. As soon as Meilin reached the bottom of the stairs, she saw why.

In the corner of the room was a pile of worn rope.

And no Conor.

“Conor,” she said, her heart pounding in her ear. “He’s gone.”

Takoda, Kovo, and Jhi were soon at her side. They looked in every corner of the room and double-checked the door, which was still barred from the inside.

“He must have climbed out through the window,” she said, peering out into the streets below. “If he survived the fall.”

“Have you noticed something else?” Takoda said, standing beside her. “The streets—they’ve all gone dark.”

Takoda was right. The barrier of glowstones that they had placed around the perimeter had all been extinguished.

“And if the lights are out,” Meilin said, “then the Many could be anywhere.”

Meilin inched back from the window as she heard a gargling hiss from just outside. The pale hand of what might have once been a woman appeared on the open sill, her fingernails cracked and black. The creature reached up another hand and pulled herself over the windowsill, peering into the darkness. She snarled at Meilin and Takoda.

Meilin already had her quarterstaff in her hand, and she swung it at the woman with such force that her head snapped back with a violent jerk. The creature snarled and gave a choked howl as her body fell from the window and plummeted to the ground below.

Meilin and Takoda raced back to the window, peering down to the streets. In the glowing light of the Evertree, they could just make out the broken body of the creature, dragging herself along the pavement.

“We need light,” Meilin said, and ran to the bag that they’d managed to salvage from the Meleager. Inside was a small ball resembling a soft nut—one of only three they had left. Meilin hurled the nut out the open window onto the street below. The ball struck the ground and splattered phosphorescent milky goo in every direction. Eerie pinkish light filled the street, and in that light they could see dozens of the Many teeming in the streets, climbing on top of one another, all moving toward the bell tower.

The Many snarled, recoiling from the flash of light, which was already beginning to fade. Meilin stared at their hideous faces, skin drawn tight on their sharp bones. On each forehead she could see the rotting purple spiral of the parasite that had infected them. The Many were all bald, and their clothes, if they had any, were rotted rags.

All but one of them, who moved at the front of the line. His yellow hair looked dark in the shadows, and over his shoulders hung a tattered green cloak. Unlike the others, who howled and hid from the glowstone, he marched right to the light and, removing his cloak, laid the fabric over the splattered goo, dimming it so the others could continue their charge toward the Wurm. The boy remained where he was, staring up at the lighthouse—staring straight at Meilin.

Briggan gave a sharp whine, pushing his muzzle into Meilin's sleeve. She stared at the boy below, whose figure was now only the ghost of a shadow. But even that glimpse had been long enough to confirm her fear.

“Conor,” she said, stepping back, her heart throbbing in her chest. “He’s raised an army against us.”

MARCH OF THE MANY

CONOR DIDN'T REMEMBER HOW HE HAD MANAGED TO escape his bonds in the lighthouse. Judging from the throbbing pain running up his arm, he thought he must have dislocated a thumb in the process.

The pain, however, didn't matter. Nor did the hunger gnawing in his stomach. Or the cold chill of the air without his cloak.

All that mattered was the Wyrm.

Conor had to reach the city square. He knew something, something about the bell tower in the middle of the city. Something about it was a threat to the Wyrm. He didn't understand how he knew this. He only knew that anything that tried to stop him would fall at his hand.

This would be a difficult journey—something or someone might try to stop him. For that reason, he had taken pains to extinguish the glowstone lamps set throughout the city. The light bothered his eyes, but not nearly as much as the others, who were burned by the light as though by fire. He knew that if he could darken those lights, he would soon have a legion at his side.

And so it was. No sooner had the first glowstone been shattered than he could sense his brethren skittering out from the shadows to join him. He could hear their heartbeats, beating with his own—steady and strong. He could see that they suffered just as he did—they were tormented with their desire to follow the Wyrms' command. And he could help lead them.

They were all children of the Wyrms.

Truly, it was a feeling of peace. The calm that comes from one finally accepting his place in the world. His whole life, Conor had been torn between duty and desire—always playing the meek shepherd, even when he wanted so much more. And now, at last, the Wyrms had called to him, had chosen him. And with that call came a promise of something so powerful, so pure, that he knew he would die if he could not touch it.

But even as he staggered over the cracked stone streets, moving toward the middle of the city, he felt another pull. He had a vague unease echoing in the deepest parts of his mind. A mournful baying—like the howling of a wolf—that seemed to tell him that what he was doing was wrong. That the Wyrms were dangerous. That he had to stop it before it was too late.

But that sound was faint in comparison to his own throbbing heart, which beat like a drum, compelling him to march forward. Conor's dark eyes slid to the hundreds of others walking beside him. How could so many souls be wrong? And when he finally reached the Wyrms, he knew that voice would be silenced at last.

"Conor!" a voice cried out in the darkness before him. It was not a voice in his head, but a real voice. It was the voice of a girl.

There was a flash of wincing light, which sent the others into hiding. Conor remained where he was. The light revealed their path—the path that led directly to the bell tower in the middle of the city—and it was blocked by two children and three beasts. The girl who had called to him was standing in the middle of the group. She wore a green cloak and held a long staff. Conor thought her name might be Meilin, and then he wondered how he knew that.

"Conor," the girl said, her body crouched like one preparing to fight. "You have to stop. You don't know what you're doing. You're being controlled by the Wyrms. You need to resist its power."

Conor felt his entire body flood with nauseous hatred as he recalled who these people were. These were interlopers. His former friends, who had held him captive in the tower, tied at the wrists and ankles. They had tried to keep him from the Wyrms. And now they were blocking his path.

These are my enemiessss, a voice said in his mind. It was a deep, pulsing voice that seemed to reverberate through his very bones. A voice that spoke without actual words in a language even older than the stars. A voice of limitless power.

Protecttt mee, the voice said.

Protecttt mee, and killll them.

MEILIN HAD NO REAL WAY OF KNOWING HOW TO STOP what was coming. They were two children and three spirit animals against an army of hundreds—maybe even thousands. The last time they had encountered the Many in Phos Astos, they had barely escaped with their lives. And now they were somehow supposed to defeat them in battle, with one of her closest friends leading the opposite charge.

She stared at Conor shuffling toward her, his lifeless eyes glossy and dark. The boy she knew was barely recognizable.

“Conor!” she called again. “You have to fight the Wyrms! Resist its call!”

If Conor heard her plea, it did not show on his face. That was perhaps a blessing. Conor had fought countless battles at Meilin’s side. He knew her weaknesses as a fighter, and he could certainly exploit them. Already he had shown himself cunning enough to extinguish the lights around the main square—enabling the Many to come to his side.

She wondered whether he had overheard any of their conversation at the lighthouse. How much did he know about Kovo’s plan? And if Conor knew, did the Wyrms know as well?

Meilin felt a shiver in the air that made the hair on the back of her neck stand up. Briggan whined, his hackles raised, as though hearing the cry of an unheard song. Jhi, who was beside Meilin, seemed similarly agitated.

The Many had also stopped their approach, all of them tilting their heads up toward the Wyrms, which pulsed above the city like an oozing black sun.

“What’s happening?” Meilin said, adjusting her grip on her staff. “Why did they all stop?”

Kovo made a gesture beside her, which Takoda translated. “The Wyrms,” the boy said. “It’s speaking to them.”

She stared overhead at the pulsing polyp that was the Wyrms’s egg. Through the crack in its shell, she could see a red light glowing. The red light opened, like an eye, rolling back and forth and blinking. The egg shuddered, as if whatever was inside was struggling to break free.

“It’s waking up,” Meilin said.

The Many, all of whom had been distracted by the Wyrms’s movement, turned their attention back to the street. Their pale faces were twisted with animal hatred. Conor raised a thin finger, pointing toward Meilin. With a hideous, inhuman roar, the Many rushed past him and charged toward Meilin and Takoda, hands outstretched like claws.

Briggan bared his teeth, growling. Even Jhi seemed ready to head-butt whoever might approach.

Meilin knelt low, preparing for the first assault. She grunted, swinging her staff upward with a jaw-breaking crack against the face of her first opponent—a man in the ragged robes of a Sadrean elder. The man flew backward, falling to the ground.

With so many coming, there was hardly time to breathe, let alone change footing. Meilin brought her staff down without pausing, bashing a Sadrean boy who looked even younger than Takoda. A moment later, both the boy and the elder were trampled under the feet of the Many who had taken their place.

Takoda fought beside her with more passion than skill. In a surprising display of strength, he swung Kovo’s iron mallet over his head and brought it down with a terrible crunch. The mallet weighed nearly as much as the boy, and his swing was strong enough to topple a trio of the Many, who flew backward, unconscious.

Briggan had managed to fell half a dozen already. Meilin could not take time to note whether or not the injuries the wolf inflicted with his jaws were fatal. Nor could she contemplate how she might feel if they were.

Meilin rolled across the ground, knocking out a man who very nearly managed to grab Takoda from behind. She felt a slithering sense of horror as she realized that one of the Wyrms' parasites had managed to attach itself to her neck. She ripped the thing off and flung it into the shadows.

"Get to higher ground!" she called out, springing to her feet. "We need to rekindle those glowstones and keep them at bay." She leaped backward to some fallen rubble on the blockade.

Jhi, meanwhile, had taken it upon herself to amble directly into the fray and lead off a faction of the Many, who pursued the panda with blind fury. Meilin watched from her new height as Jhi led them straight off the edge of a rocky ledge that opened into a deep well below. Dozens of the Many followed Jhi into the water, sputtering and splashing to keep from drowning.

Meilin grinned and touched her arm. A moment later, Jhi's mark appeared on her flesh. She pressed it again and Jhi appeared at her side, soaking wet and looking quite proud. "Nice work!" she said. "Care to try it again?" Jhi scrambled down from the barrier to lead off another group of the Many. Meilin watched her spirit animal rush headlong into danger, marveling at how she could have ever doubted the Great Panda's courage.

Meilin kicked her boot at the hand of a grasping man who looked like he was some kind of warrior. She brought her staff down on another, a woman who might have been beautiful if she hadn't been pale and hairless.

The Many were not strong, but they fought with absolutely no regard to personal safety, which made them relentless in their assault. However many Meilin knocked down, twice that number appeared a moment later. The fight was made even more difficult by the fact that the only light available was from the silvery roots of the Evertree. Meilin was battling an army of shadows.

"How are those glowstones coming?" Meilin shouted to Takoda, who was somewhere behind her.

“Gone!” he cried. “Conor shattered them all. We’re out of light.”

“That’s just perfect!” Meilin said, ducking as Briggan leaped over her head to attack an approaching Sadrean. She recalled that Jhi was somewhere in the city, having led off another group of the Many. She had forgotten all about her! When she summoned Jhi into passive state, and then to her side, she saw that the panda’s right haunch was red with blood. “Stay close to me,” she whispered. “You’ve done more than enough.”

Meilin scanned the slack faces before her, looking for Conor. Searching farther down the street, she saw that the boy had not charged the barrier with the others but had instead climbed up to the top of a small footbridge.

From there, he was now directing the rest of the Many like a general—pointing straight at the bell tower.

“Conor’s leading an assault against the tower!” she called. “We have to stop him.”

Meilin wished she had the ability to throw something far enough to knock Conor from his perch. She looked around for Kovo, but the gorilla was nowhere to be found.

“Takoda!” she cried. “Can you summon Kovo? We could really use an extra pair of fists right about now!” Kovo had single-handedly fought back the Many at Phos Astos.

“I’m trying, but it’s not working!” Takoda shouted, wrenching his mallet free from a man who had grabbed hold of the handle. “He ran inside the lighthouse, telling me to seek shelter!”

“Seek shelter?” Meilin said, taking out a pale-faced old woman with a roundhouse kick. “Now’s not really the time for retreat!” Even as she said this, she could feel Jhi’s muzzle on her side, pushing her backward toward one of the crevices in their stone barricade. “What are you doing?!” she shouted, tripping over the back of her cloak and falling onto flat stone.

But then, up above her, she saw a dark figure standing atop the roof of the lighthouse. It was Kovo, and he was holding an enormous clay urn over his head—one of dozens that he had been collecting from all across the city over the last few days. A curl of black smoke leaked out from the mouth of the jar.

“Get back!” Meilin cried, her eyes widening.

With an earthshaking roar, the Great Gorilla hurled the urn toward the street below. It struck the ground with a crash as it burst into a ball of red flames.

The Many howled in pain at both the light and the heat as the fire raged in the street—scattering them in all directions. But Meilin’s sense of triumph was over as soon as it had sparked when she looked to the bridge where Conor had been standing only a moment before—now a pile of burning rubble.

Briggan whined beside her and made to leap into the flames. Meilin grabbed his scruff, stopping him from finding his human companion. “You can’t!” she cried. “We need you here.”

The ruined city echoed with the moans of the Many as they scrambled to reach the shore and douse the flames that had engulfed their bodies. Already Kovo had raised another urn over his head. It came down with an explosion even bigger than the last, sending the horde even farther back.

Meilin scrambled to her feet, feeling a new hope swelling in her breast. There were at least twenty urns of oil in their tower—enough to build a flaming barrier around the middle of the city. That might at least buy them time to rest and recover, until they formed a new plan.

“We need to use the flames to create a perimeter around the bell tower—to cut them off from approaching.” She turned to Takoda. “Run. Tell Kovo to throw one urn at every major inroad.”

Her hope in victory, however, was short-lived. Meilin heard a snarl at her feet, and she glanced down just in time to see a black hand burst from the rubble and grab her ankle. “Ahhh!” she cried, as the hand pulled her toward the flames below. Meilin grabbed her staff and brought it down—so hard that it snapped in half against her attacker’s head. Her assailant, however, was undeterred. He grabbed her with his other hand, pulling her closer to the consuming flames. And when Meilin looked upon his face, the fight went out of her.

“Conor,” she whispered, for indeed it was. He stared at her with his dead-dark eyes, his skin charred and burned. The parasite burrowed into his brow was pulsing—it throbbed just beneath the skin like a second heart.

With a roar, Conor flung Meilin aside—showing more strength than she knew him to possess. It must have been the power of the Wyrms coursing through his veins.

Briggan growled and charged Conor, biting down on the boy's leg and pulling him away from Meilin. Conor stumbled down to his knees without crying out, kicking and fighting to get free of the wolf's jaws. But the damage had already been done. With Meilin and Briggan so distracted, there was nothing to stop the charge of the Many clambering up and over the flaming barricade. Despite the excruciating pain of the flames, these mindless captives were undeterred, using their own bodies to smother the fire so that those behind them might continue their assault.

Meilin felt Jhi beside her, tending to the burns on her leg where Conor had grabbed her. She watched, helpless, as hundreds of the Many charged straight through the flames, flowing into the center of the city.

Kovo hurled more urns in a desperate bid to stop them from reaching the spire, but it was useless. The Many cared not for their lives. They clawed at stones and bricks and bannisters—trying to rip the bell tower apart with their bare hands.

“It's over.” Meilin felt the sting of smoke in her eyes as she blinked away hot tears. They had traveled all this way, sacrificed so much, only to fail in their task. And in that failure would come the destruction of all of Erdas. She clung to Jhi, burying her face in the panda's warm fur. “There's just too many of them.”

“Well then,” said a voice beside her, “maybe we should even the odds?” Meilin looked up to see Takoda, who, despite being covered with bruises and burns, was breathless and wide-eyed. “I think our prayers have been answered.”

Before Meilin could ask him what he meant, she heard a shrill whining sound out in the distance. It was coming from the direction of the water. Meilin stood, recalling that piercing cry, which she had only heard twice before, while defending the walls of Phos Astos from the Many.

“Screamers,” she said, speaking the name of the peculiar mushrooms that the Sadreans had used to defend their perimeters.

The sound was even louder now, so loud that the Many took leave of their work in the city square and turned toward the water—from which direction shone a dazzling pinkish light that cut sharp shadows across the streets. Meilin stood and shielded her eyes from the glare. At the water, she could see a dozen galley ships riding the dark waves to shore—all of them bearing enormous glowstones at the helm to light their paths. On the decks stood dozens of Sadrean soldiers, all of them wearing glittering crystalline armor and holding crystal swords and axes.

Even at this distance, Meilin could see the glint of determination burning in their pink eyes. And there, at the front of the prow, the small figure of a girl bearing a long spear. The girl’s face was hidden behind a crystal helm, but Meilin could see clearly enough the glowing paw print showing on the breast of her tunic—a mark that Kovo himself had given her after their first battle in Phos Astos. “It can’t be,” Meilin whispered.

“It’s her,” Takoda said, the smile nearly splitting his face. “It’s Xanthe.”

XANTHE RETURNS

HAVING BEEN RAISED IN A MONASTERY, TAKODA HAD been taught to see tiny miracles in the world. But these were always small things. A rainbow cast off the glint of a dewy spiderweb. The first cry of a newborn babe. The music of a stream as it rippled by.

In this moment, however, as Takoda looked out past the rippling flames and saw Xanthe's face approaching from the sea, he finally understood what it was to behold a real miracle.

"She's alive," he said, barely able to form the words.

"And more important," Meilin said, standing beside him, "she's brought an army!"

Already the ships had reached the shore, and soldiers were racing down the gangplanks and into the city streets, weapons raised. The Many had greater numbers, but the Sadreans were well-armored and fierce. They fought with the might of a population that had survived the crucible of battle, only to emerge with newly forged strength. Xanthe herself fought as bravely as any of them, using her crystal spear to impale the Many who got in her way.

"Xanthe!" Takoda shouted, running to the top of a smoldering staircase and waving both arms over his head. "Over here!"

Xanthe turned her head and saw him. The girl's face broke into an astonished smile. There was a glint in her pink eyes that made Takoda's heart beat out of his chest. "You're alive!" she shouted, racing to meet him.

"I can't believe you found us!" he exclaimed. "How did you survive the Webmother?"

Xanthe shrugged. "I'm a Sadrean wanderling. Surviving the tunnels is what I do best." She was breathing hard from the fighting. "Besides," she said, looking down to the ground, "I thought you might miss me."

Takoda's mouth fell open. He didn't know what to say in response. There was something about the way Xanthe had said this that made him think maybe she felt the same way about him as he felt about her. "I ... um ... " He swallowed, his cheeks flushing.

Takoda was saved, as it were, by an interruption in the form of a loud crash. The battle was still raging around them, and hundreds of the Many had broken through the flames and were now scaling the side of the bell tower, tearing at the stonework and buttressing. They had just succeeded in breaking the masonry around one of the tower's lower turrets, which had fallen free from the main tower and crashed to the ground.

A huge cloud of dust filled the air. Takoda coughed, reaching out a hand to steady himself. His fingers found what he realized too late was Xanthe's hand. "S-sorry!" he stammered, pulling away. "I—I—I couldn't see."

"Then you should stay close," he heard Xanthe say, and the next moment he felt her hand take his own, their fingers entwining between one another. Takoda found himself grateful that the dust obscured his cheeks, which had begun shining brighter than any glowstone.

"Enough chatting," Meilin said, appearing in the thinning dust. "We have to stop the Many from destroying that bell tower." She crouched and swept her staff across the ground—tripping a flaming man on his way toward the city square.

"That tower is part of Kovo's plan to stop the Wyrms," Takoda explained to Xanthe. "If it falls, we're lost."

Xanthe stepped away from Takoda and raised a sort of horn made from a hollowed-out mushroom. She blew into one end, releasing a battle cry.

“Protect the tower!” she cried. Soldiers streamed past her, running to the center of the city. They fought with determination and fury, cutting through the mob and forming a tight circle around the edge of the tower.

The Many were defenseless against the glowing crystalline blades of the Sadreans. Every cut seemed to scald the very flesh of those infected by the parasites—causing them to collapse to the ground, clutching their wounds as though they had been burned.

When the base of the tower had been secured, a small troop of white-haired slingmaidens positioned themselves on the remaining turrets, and they used the slings to launch glowstones on the Many below, driving them back into the shadows.

When the last of the Many had been vanquished, the Sadreans let out an enormous ululating cry that echoed in the caverns below. The sound was so strong that it made the roots overhead tremble, which in turn made Takoda tremble.

Conor, who had fought even more fiercely than the other Many, had finally been restrained by two burly Sadrean shieldwardens. They bound his arms behind his back and brought him to Meilin and Takoda. Briggan remained by their friend’s side, while Jhi moved between the Sadreans, tending to their wounds as best she could.

“We only found the city just in time,” Xanthe said, running to meet Takoda. “If those yellow flames had not appeared on the horizon, we might have gone off course and impaled our ships into the stalagmite reefs.”

Takoda smiled, turning toward his spirit animal, who had positioned himself at the mouth of the tower—his great fists clutching the iron mallet, his small eyes trained on the Wyrms overhead. “The fire was Kovo’s idea. He used it to drive back the Many.” He shot Meilin a look. “Maybe you should thank him for saving our lives?” He still remembered the harsh things she had said about Kovo back in the lighthouse.

“I’ll thank him when this is over,” Meilin said darkly. She was still watching Conor, who seemed to have calmed down. The boy stared back at Meilin with empty, wrathful eyes. “Keeping this tower safe is only the beginning of this fight.”

Xanthe stepped away from Takoda and knelt in front of Conor. “I’d assumed that you had abandoned him when he turned too far. That you carried him with you, even like this ... ” She looked down, and Takoda felt a pang of guilt. It was Xanthe who had been abandoned. And it had been his fault.

Conor gave a sharp snarl, lunging for Xanthe. The girl screamed, falling backward. The Sadrean shieldwardens kept him in place, but it was clear that something had happened to set him off. The possessed boy lurched up from the ground. All traces of the modest shepherd Takoda had first met in Nilo had vanished. Now he looked almost as inhuman as the Many. Conor snarled and hissed, staring upward with his dark eyes.

Briggan whined, backing away from his human partner.

“What’s Conor doing?” Meilin said.

“Whatever he’s doing, he’s not alone.” Xanthe pointed toward the shadowy city. “Look.”

Takoda peered past the glowstone perimeter and saw that the surviving Many had emerged from the shadows, their long teeth flashing in the dim light as they all opened their mouths and made a sort of moaning sound. But they were no longer looking at the Sadrean army, or even the bell tower.

They were all staring upward, their long, bonelike fingers outstretched, swaying backward. The sounds of their moaning had a droning, almost hypnotic quality to it—like some sort of chant. Takoda couldn’t help but think of the evening songs at his monastery.

A shivering hssssss echoed through the darkness. Takoda looked up toward the egg, which was shaking and shuddering, trying to work its way free of the Evertree’s roots. He heard a snapping sound as one of the thicker roots broke loose.

Rocks and dirt fell from the cavern ceiling, along with another huge snarl of root. It flopped to the floor, limp and dead—the silver glow already fading from it.

Takoda hadn’t just heard the root breaking—he had felt it. The moment it happened, he gasped, staggering back. It was as though the very breath had been ripped from his chest. Meilin, too, seemed to have been similarly afflicted. She recovered and quickly placed Jhi into passive state—as if to fortify the spirit bond that had suddenly come under assault. Takoda tried to do the same, touching the place on his throat where Kovo dwelled in passive state, but the skin remained clammy and cold.

Kovo felt as distant from him as a stranger.

Another tendril of the Evertree’s roots snapped, and this time the Wurm’s egg dropped several feet—its weight apparently too much for the young roots to bear. The egg thrashed and swung as whatever lived inside struggled to free itself.

The Many were now howling and shrieking, all reaching toward the Wurm, all begging for it to free itself. Conor was howling with them, twisting his body and trying to get free of his restraints.

“Stay back!” Meilin cried, pulling Takoda and Xanthe clear of Conor’s gnashing teeth. “Give him some space.”

Kovo lumbered past her, right to Conor, and gave the boy a “tap” on the side of the head with the flat end of his mallet. The boy fell back to the ground—unconscious but otherwise unharmed. The Great Ape then turned toward Meilin and made a smug gesture with his hands: “Problem solved.”

“Takoda!” Meilin snapped. “Get control of your spirit animal. Tell him if he touches my friend again, I’ll make sure he lives to regret it.”

“We’ve got bigger problems,” Takoda said, his eyes fixed on the egg overhead. “The Wurm is coming.”

Meilin stared at the Wyrms, unable to look away. More roots from the Evertree had snapped loose, and now the egg was hanging by a single thread. The egg itself was swinging and thrashing, as whatever was inside fought to free itself from the roots. Black ooze dripped from the large crack in the shell. Takoda could see dark and slimy tendrils moving between the fissures, writhing and twitching. Then the tendrils slid back, and he saw the red eye of the Wyrms, huge and searching.

Meilin heard a groaning sound as the last strand of the Evertree's roots snapped and the egg finally broke free. It fell down to the ground, landing with an earthshaking shudder.

Rubble and smoke burst into the air. Meilin fell to one side, trying her best to protect Jhi from falling rubble. In the chaos, all she could hear were the snarls of the Many. And then above that, a new sound. A low, gurgling hiss that seemed to slither right up her spine and land in the back of her teeth.

As the dust cleared, Meilin rose and stared at the place where the egg had fallen. There was a dent in the stone floor from the impact. The shell had cracked open and now lay in several pieces. Black ooze seeped out from the spot, spreading across the ground in greedy little rivulets. And there, in the middle of it all, lay a roiling black knot of slick tendrils.

The arms—there must have been a dozen of them—slithered and flailed, pulling themselves apart like a knot untying itself. At the center of these was the Wyrm. The head—if you could call it a head—was somewhere in the middle of its enormous body. The thing blinked its red eyes—Meilin counted at least four—and then opened what must have been its mouth. It was a hideous, leechlike ring of razor-sharp teeth that seemed to flex and twist as it moved. The Wyrm let out a hoarse screech.

Meilin clutched her staff. “It’s ... like something from a nightmare.”

She had been expecting to see a creature that looked like a lizard or salamander, or maybe even a snake, but the Wyrm did not appear so simple. Its movements were so fluid that it was difficult to grasp its full shape. Staring at it, Meilin was reminded of the way oil shifted and slid across the surface of water.

The appearance of the Wyrm seemed to have made an impact on the Many, who rushed closer to the glowstones—now unafraid of the searing light. They were all staring at the bell tower—at Meilin and her friends. The Wyrm was also facing them, its four eyes narrowed into hateful red slits. It screeched again, and the Many all charged through the perimeter—straight for the tower.

“Like I said,” Meilin said, rotating her staff into a fighting position, “we’ve got a long way to go.”

“Incoming!” Xanthe shouted, and then sounded the attack on her horn. “Brace for impact.”

But trying to brace for this attack was like trying to stand up against the crashing tide. The Many hit them like a wave of claws and teeth—sweeping Sadrean fighters right off their feet as they rushed past. The Wyrm’s army moved with a possessed fury—driven on by the shrieks of their master. Screams rang out as the Many grabbed hold of Sadrean soldiers and dragged them to the Wyrm as live offerings.

“Into the tower!” Meilin screamed, falling back with the others. She and Xanthe tried to close the iron doors, but they burst apart from the force of the frenzied mob. Meilin and Xanthe leaped back from the door and raced up the curved staircase, taking the steps two at a time. The Many were right behind them, hissing and clawing and snarling—climbing on top of one another to reach their prey.

Meilin brought Jhi into passive state to keep her safe. Briggan ran in front, attacking the few Many that had climbed in through the windows. Kovo had an unconscious Conor slung over one shoulder. Even with one hand, the Great Beast fought like a titan, grabbing the creatures and flinging them out open windows like rag dolls.

The entire tower shuddered and groaned as the horde began scaling the walls outside, tearing apart anything they could get ahold of. Meilin heard a scream as one of the slingmaidens was wrestled from her turret and thrown to the ground below—another offering for the Wyrms.

“Keep moving!” Meilin shouted. She felt like her heart would burst from running. She closed her eyes, forcing herself to climb even faster. They had to reach that bell before the tower came down on top of them.

At last she staggered onto the platform at the top of the tower. Briggan and Xanthe were close behind her. The huge iron bell hung in the middle of the room. Glowing moss covered the outside. This bell had been silent for thousands of years—waiting for this moment.

“Take care of the bell!” Meilin screamed to Kovo as she assumed a low position with her staff. “We’ll hold the stairs.”

Kovo dropped Conor and leaped clear over her head, landing behind her with a crash. He stomped toward the waiting bell, heaving the iron mallet over his head—

But then, he stopped.

The Great Beast gasped, stumbling backward as if he’d been pierced by some invisible blade. He lurched to one side. The iron mallet slid from his grasp and clunked to the floor.

“This is your chance, Kovo!” Meilin shouted over her shoulder. “What are you waiting for?!”

But the ape did not hear her. He had staggered away from the bell toward the window. Meilin saw that Xanthe had stopped fighting, too. She and Kovo were both staring outside.

Meilin grunted, kicking back a possessed Sadrean girl who was clawing at her boot. She ran to the window. The moment she got there, she knew what had stopped Kovo and Xanthe. She saw the Wyrms writhing and shrieking at the foot of the tower—the ground around it was littered with the corpses of its prey. And clasped in one of its oozing tentacles was a small boy with dark hair, screaming for his very life.

“The Wyrms,” Meilin whispered. “It’s got Takoda.”

IF IT HADN'T BEEN FOR TAKODA, XANTHE WOULD BE dead.

When Xanthe had first met Takoda in the caverns above Phos Astos, she thought him funny, if a little exotic. He was small, weak, and gentle. It was clear that he had no place among Meilin and the Greencloaks. When Xanthe learned that this quiet young monk was the human partner to the great Kovo she nearly laughed aloud.

But Xanthe soon realized that Takoda was nothing to laugh about. There was a strength to that boy, who could say more with a silent look than most people could with a thousand songs.

When Xanthe had been lost in the burned-out remnants of the Arachane Fields, alone and defenseless, it had been Takoda who kept her alive. She knew that she had to see him again—to make sure he was okay. She was afraid what might happen to him if she couldn't be there to help protect him from the Wurm. And that fear had given her the strength to survive.

She had kept the sound of Takoda's voice in her mind as she wandered through the dark tunnels, without so much as a glowstone to find her way, until she finally stumbled into an intact Sadrean outpost—full of living, breathing, uninfected survivors.

In trying to save Takoda, Takoda had saved her.

Xanthe had continued thinking of him as she rallied those survivors and told them of the return of the Great Ape. Takoda was first in her thoughts as she led their fleet across the Sulfur Sea. And when the ships finally reached the ruined shore, and she saw Takoda's face amid the flames and rubble—the sight of him somehow opened up a part of her that she didn't even realize existed. It was as if she could see all of Erdas—the aboveground world she had only dreamed of—shining in his dark eyes.

And now, after all that struggle and pain, Takoda was about to die.

At first, Xanthe hadn't realized that Takoda had not made it into the tower with Meilin and the others. But when she heard his screams echoing up from the battlefield, she realized her error. She had abandoned him to die among the Many—to die as an offering to that oozing nightmare of tentacles and eyes and teeth that the elders called the Wyrms.

From the high window, she could now see the boy grasped in one of the Wyrms' arms. It was coiled around his body, crushing the life out of him. The Wyrms raised Takoda over its hideous mouth—its hundreds of drooling teeth twitching in anticipation of its next meal. Takoda dangled upside down, his face pale and bloodless, his gaze wide with terror and shock. His eyes looked upward, straight into hers.

For a moment all the sound seemed to vanish from the world. All Xanthe could hear was the dull throbbing of her own heartbeat.

“Takoda!” she shouted from the balcony. She slung her spear across her back and started to climb over the edge. “I'm coming!”

But before she could even put one leg over the railing, she was knocked to one side by Kovo. The Great Beast let out a terrifying roar and charged for the window. He dropped one knuckle down and leaped clean over the stone banister, sailing through the darkness and landing on the ground far below with a tremendous crash!

Kovo was on his feet again in a heartbeat, swinging his fists wildly as he bounded toward the Wyrms—sending the Many and the Sadreans alike scattering in all directions.

Xanthe had seen Kovo fight once before in Phos Astos, but that was nothing compared to what she witnessed now. The ape roared and lunged for the Wyrms, hurtling toward the creature with both fists drawn over his head.

The Wyrms, sensing the approach, flung Takoda to one side and raised its tentacles. Kovo's body hit it with the force of a cannonball, and the two of them spiraled backward across the ground, smashing clean through the wall of a building.

Xanthe's eyes scanned the teeming chaos below, searching for Takoda's body. But it was impossible to see from up here. She slung her spear over her shoulder. "We have to get Takoda," she said.

Meilin's hand grabbed her arm. "Don't you dare leave me up here!"

Xanthe turned around to see that the entire belfry had been overrun by the Many. Possessed Sadreans were swarming the bell and were trying to rip it free of its yoke. Briggan snarled and snapped, pulling them away with his jaws.

"That bell is the weapon," Meilin said. She swung her staff, knocking back an attacker who was trying to climb over the edge of the railing. "We have to ring it before the Many tear it to pieces."

"But Takoda's down there!" Xanthe yelled.

"Takoda can wait," Meilin said, kicking a hissing assailant square in the jaw. "This is war." Her voice was cold and without emotion, and Xanthe wondered just how much war this girl had seen in her lifetime. "Our mission is to stop that Wyrms before it can find a host. This tower won't stand much longer." She knelt down and wrapped her hands around the handle of the iron mallet. The thing was enormous—almost as big as she was. "Help me."

Xanthe tore herself from the window and grabbed the handle. She and Meilin both lifted at the same time, and the mallet's head rose from the ground. They carried it toward the bell—gaining speed as they moved. Acting as one, she and Meilin swung the mallet over their heads and—

WHAT LIES BENEATH

CLANGGGGG!!

The sound was almost deafening in Meilin’s ears. The possessed Sadreans that had been clinging to the bell instantly fell away. The chime echoed and reverberated across the city, growing louder and louder.

Meilin staggered back with Xanthe, letting go of the mallet, which fell to the floor with a heavy thud. They had done it—the trap was sprung.

“What happens now?” Xanthe asked her.

Meilin shook her head. “I have no idea.”

But it was clear that something was happening. The entire tower was trembling. Rubble sprinkled down on her as the platform—no, the entire structure—began to slowly rotate. Screams rang out from the ground below. Meilin ran to the window, Xanthe right behind her.

The ground was changing beneath them. The floor in the center of the city was drawing back like the folds of a paper fan to expose a dark chasm below. The Sadreans and the Many screamed, running to safety around the edges of the town.

“The ground is opening up around us,” Meilin said.

That wasn’t all the bell was doing. Meilin could feel something happening inside her—it felt like her stomach was turning inside out. She staggered to one side, suddenly unable to stand. She touched her tattoo to summon Jhi, but when the panda appeared at her side she, too, was showing the same symptoms. Meilin's vision blurred—like she was seeing two different things at once. It was almost like she could see herself outside of her own body.

Meilin and Jhi weren't the only ones. Briggan was whining over Conor's unconscious body, pawing at the boy.

"What's happening to you?" she heard Xanthe say.

"The snare," Meilin said through gritted teeth. "It's doing something to our spirit bonds." It felt like her whole body was dissolving with every breath.

She pulled herself to her knees and stared over the window railing. The tower was still turning slowly in the middle of the chasm, and it made her motion sick to stare at the ground below. She glimpsed Kovo staggering through the chaos. Red blood flowed from the Great Beast's body where the Wyrms' teeth had cut him. The ape stumbled and swayed, struggling to remain upright.

And then she saw the Wyrms. It was hissing, writhing in pain, its movements jerky and uncontrolled. The infected Sadreans around the Wyrms had stopped moving completely, as if the breath had just gone out of them. Whatever was happening to Meilin and Jhi looked like it was also happening to the Wyrms and its minions—only on a much bigger scale. "It's working!" Meilin cried, gripping the bannister. "The Wyrms' guard is down.... This is our chance ... to kill it.... "

But then, with a sharp jolt, the tower stopped moving. Meilin lurched to one side, nearly falling to the floor. She heard a groaning sound as the gears deep within the tower walls strained against something that was blocking their motion. It shuddered and then stopped altogether. "No!" Meilin said, scrambling to her feet. "Keep going!" She kicked the iron bell, trying to start the mechanism, but it was useless.

The snare had stopped.

Already Meilin's head felt clearer—whatever had been happening between her and Jhi had halted along with the tower. She clenched her teeth and struggled to stay upright. She looked to the battlefield and saw that the Wyrms had also recovered. It released a furious shriek, and the Many around it seemed to snap back to attention.

Meilin watched as the creature slithered toward the edges of the hole that had half opened up before it—the doors halted along with the tower. It reached a quivering tentacle out into the void. The tentacle flicked like the tongue of a serpent tasting the air. With a screech that seemed to echo as much in Meilin’s own mind as it did across the crumbling city, the Wyrms slithered forward and melted into the darkness.

A few of the Many leaped into the hole after their master. Their cries echoed for several seconds as their bodies plummeted down. The rest of the Many broke formation and scurried away from the light of the flames and Sadrean blades—disappearing into the darkness of the outlying tunnels.

“Is it over?” Xanthe whispered beside her.

Meilin shook her head, her eyes fixed on the bottomless hole. It seemed to plunge down straight through the heart of Erdas. “I don’t think so.” She ran her hand through Jhi’s fur, taking comfort in the warmth of her spirit animal—in the strength of the bond they shared.

Meilin heard Briggan yip behind her. The wolf was bleeding badly from his side where the Many had attacked him. Conor lay unconscious beside him, bleeding, pale, but still alive. Briggan pointed his muzzle toward the stairs and Meilin and Xanthe followed him out of the tower.

Meilin and the others stepped outside to find Kovo at the far edge of the chasm, clutching Takoda in his enormous arms like one might hold an infant.

Jhi ambled to the boy, tending to an ugly gash in his chest—the place where the Wyrms’ tentacle had pierced through him.

“Takoda!” Xanthe cried, rushing to his side. The girl took Takoda’s hand in her own. The boy’s face was gray. He had clearly lost a lot of blood.

“Is he ... ?” Meilin said, unable to form the question.

“He’s alive,” Xanthe said, her voice shaking. “Kovo saved his life.”

Meilin sighed, swallowing down her worst fears. She was glad, but also heartbroken. All this destruction, and for what? They had failed in their mission. “We may be alive, but so is the Wyrn,” she said. “And I have a feeling it’s headed straight for Zerif.” She tried not to think of Rollan and Abeke having to face that creature. She met Kovo’s eyes. “Still. Thank you. Leaping out from the tower to save Takoda ... I didn’t think you had it in you.”

The gorilla huffed, blinking.

“The snare was working, just like you said it would,” Meilin said. “But then it stopped. What happened?”

Kovo shook his head: I don’t know. He made several gestures with his hand. Before Meilin could explain that she didn’t understand his signs, Takoda stirred, turning toward her. “Kovo says ... the snare is jammed.” He swallowed. “Something must have stopped it from turning ... something on the other side.”

“So just like that, it’s over?” Meilin said. She could feel her eyes welling up. “All this death. All this pain. Just so we could lose by something getting jammed?”

The Great Beast made a series of angry gestures—he looked as frustrated as she did about the failure of the snare. “All is not lost,” Takoda said, struggling to translate. “There is a second bell, at the place where your friends are. If they can ring it, there may be a chance.... ”

“Do they know about the bell?” Meilin said, stepping closer. “Do the others know how the snare works?”

Kovo lowered his hand, shaking his head.

“I don’t know,” Takoda said.

Meilin released a long breath, exchanging a look with Xanthe. “Well then ... let’s hope they figure it out fast ... while there’s still an Erdas to save.”

18

TO ARMS

BEING A LEADER IS OFTEN DIFFICULT. IT REQUIRES THAT you continually put the needs of others before your own desires.

When Shane was the king of Stetriol, his uncle Gar had once told him he should put his will first—rule with an iron fist. Even then—as he made some of the worst mistakes ever witnessed by the long history of Erdas—Shane had known better. It wasn't a fist that had won him the Greencloaks' talismans. Sacrifices had.

Sacrifices he now regretted.

Shane stood crouched in the icy chamber where, a moment before, he, Abeke, and Rollan had been communing with the Great Beast Kovo. The same Great Beast who had once manipulated him into collecting the talismans and conquering the world.

“Zerif's found us?” he said, clutching Niri's arm. “Are you sure?”

The girl, whose eyes had returned to a sea green color, nodded. “He's got a fleet of ships with him and he's heading this way.” Niri's spirit animal, Mulop, had already withdrawn from the chamber and was now swimming in the cold open waters. She tilted her head to one side, as though hearing a voice. “They'll be here by nightfall.”

“So soon!” Rollan muttered. “And here I was hoping we’d have a snowball fight!”

Shane stood and shot him an icy glare. “This is no time for jokes,” he said as he marched toward the main tunnel, his hand resting on the hilt of his saber.

“I disagree,” Rollan said, following after him. “This is the perfect time for jokes—then at least we can die with smiles on our faces!”

“Wouldn’t that require actually being funny?” Shane said, raising an eyebrow. He was gratified to see Abeke purse her lips in an attempt not to laugh at her friend. Shane turned toward the tunnel. “We have to get aboveground.”

“Wait!” Niri called after him. She was pulling herself upright at the edge of the water with her thin arms. By her strained expression, it was clear that the maneuver took all her strength. “There’s something ... I can still hear them talking in Sadre.” She swallowed. “Mulop is too weak to speak with them, but he can still hear what they’re saying to Kovo.... ”

“You can hear Meilin?” Rollan said, stepping toward her. “Is she talking about me?” He swallowed. “Or, um, Abeke? Any of us really? Forget I asked.”

Niri shook her head, screwing up her face. “They’re arguing about something. It has to do with the snare and the Wyrm and ... ” She winced and then sighed. “It’s hard to follow.”

“Keep trying,” Shane said, moving into the tunnel. “In the meantime, we need to prepare for war.”

“Um, maybe we should listen to her?” Rollan said, hanging back.

“Your girlfriend can wait!” Shane shouted, drawing his sword. “I have fifty Redcloaks up there who are depending on me to lead them. Not to mention the other Great Beast summoners. Zerif is coming, and we need every hand we can get. That includes you. Now let’s move.”

Shane knew it was a mistake to give someone like Rollan direct orders, but that didn’t seem to be the problem at the moment. Rollan was concerned with something else that he had heard.

“G-g-girlfriend?” he stammered, his cheeks turning crimson. “Who said anything about that?”

Shane rolled his eyes and swept up the tunnel. Abeke followed close behind him, her bow drawn. “You really think we can fend off Zerif’s army?” she said. “They’re as fast as they are deadly. We both saw him take down the greatest fortress in Nilo in a matter of hours.”

“We’re not in Zourtzi anymore,” Shane said. “And Faisel was unprepared. The Hellans took more than a few precautions when building this place. We’ll be ready for them.” He slowed, fixing his eyes on her. “I promise.”

Abeke sighed, not meeting his gaze. “I’ve heard that before.”

Shane nodded, feeling the sting of her words. “You’re right,” he said, realizing that words—no matter how sincere—would never win her trust. He wondered how many times he would have to save her life before she began to believe that he was truly changed.

As many times as it takes, he silently promised himself.

The trip aboveground seemed to last forever. Shane’s Redcloaks hadn’t had a chance to map all the twisting tunnels in the base of the mountain, and it was difficult to navigate without Yumaris at his side. Soon, however, he found himself at an open ledge in the main chamber of the ruins, where the volcano’s cauldron had been blocked off with stone.

If Kovo was to be believed, beneath that stone floor was a tunnel that went straight to the Evertree. And somehow these two sets of ruins contained enough power to stop the Wurm. If only they knew how.

The bleating trumpet of a conch shell sounded in the camp, signaling that the watchmen had spotted ships approaching.

Already Shane could hear the footsteps of his fellow Redcloaks as they rushed up and down the footpaths. The open pathways wound inside the volcano like a spool of thread.

His Redcloaks were preparing for battle. They had known this day was coming, and they were ready.

Stead met Shane halfway down the lower stairs. Shadow and Jolt were behind him. “How close are they?” Shane said, joining Stead’s side. “What are their numbers?”

Stead shook his head. “We’re not sure, King. Our lookouts spotted ships on the horizon, but we can’t see more than that.”

“I can tell you,” Rollan said, following a few feet behind. He put a hand to his temple. “Essix was flying out in that direction. I’ll take a peek.”

Rollan closed his eyes and tilted his head upward. “She’s flying better now,” he said. “I think she’s gotten over the pull of the poles enough to fly straight.” He drew in a sharp breath and his skin turned a slight greenish. “Sorry ... a little motion sick.”

“Do you see Zerif’s ship?” Abeke said, taking Rollan’s hand.

Rollan nodded. “I do. Along with one ... two ... three ... four ... five others.”

“Half a dozen ships?” Stead said, looking to Shane. “That’s an entire fleet.”

“Whatever it is, we’ll be waiting for them,” Shane said, refusing to let his own concern cloud his face. “Good work, Rollan,” he said. “Now tell Essix to get back here before she’s spotted by Zerif’s men.”

He knew from experience that Zerif and his army of enslaved Greencloaks wouldn’t hesitate to send their own flying spirit animals after the falcon.

“Oh, they saw her, all right,” Rollan said, opening his eyes. “She swooped over the deck and left a little, er, present for Zerif.” He broke into a devilish grin.

Shane shook his head. “I know you only saw them for a brief moment, but did you get a count of how many crewmen Zerif has?”

Rollan’s smile faltered. “Maybe a hundred Greencloaks—and that was just above deck.”

Shane nodded gravely. “There’s probably another hundred below. That means we’re outnumbered almost four to one.” He became aware of Abeke watching him.

“You don’t seem worried about those odds,” she said.

Shane gave her a smile that he could only hope looked herolike. “We’ve got a few tricks up our sleeves.” He turned to Stead and the other Redcloaks. “Get to your stations. Don’t act until I give the signal.”

Stead and the others saluted and ran off in different directions. He watched as Jolt leaped from rock to rock, until he had reached a platform with a window that looked out over the water. Already the Redcloaks had assembled javelins made of ice for throwing at the landing party.

“I was kidding when I said I wanted a snow fight,” Rollan said. “You really think icicles will stop Zerif’s army?”

“They don’t have to. All we need to do is slow down Zerif’s forces and cut them off with the lava flows.” So saying, he led them to a small platform cut into the side of the rock that overlooked the sea. Along one wall was an iron contraption made from ancient gears and levers that went straight down through the heart of the mountain. He didn’t know how they all worked, and the main set of gears had remained stubbornly in place even when his best tinkerer, a girl named Talon, had tried to release them. He suspected those ancient gears were somehow connected to the Sadrean city on the other side of the world.

“What do you want us to do?” Abeke said.

Shane nodded, pulling a lever in the wall. A small door opened and a stream of molten lava oozed out, running down a small channel that was dug into the floor. “Zerif’s still looking for the last of the Great Beasts—the smart thing would be for us to keep Rollan, Kirat, and Tasha out of the fight.”

“Yeah, but you know that’s not going to happen,” Rollan said, his hand on his dagger. “Besides, this is the end of the line. Either we fend off Zerif, or it’s over for good.”

“Much as it pains me to say it, I think you’ve got a point,” Shane said, pulling another lever to release more lava down another channel. “Especially now that we know his numbers. There’s a lava gate on the eastern end of the volcano that needs soldiers. One of my best Redcloaks, Howl, is already there, but he might need help to operate the mechanism.”

“We’ll do our best,” Abeke said.

“Good,” Shane said, nodding. “Warn Tasha and Kirat to be careful with their spirit animals—that’s why Zerif is here in the first place. They should keep Ninani and Cabaro passive, if possible. Only summon them if it's a true emergency."

"Speaking of Great Beasts," Rollan said. "Right as we were leaving, Niri was trying to tell us something about Meilin and Takoda. They were saying something to Kovo—don't you think one of us should check on her?"

"There isn't time," Shane snapped. Why did this kid have to question his every order? He was trying to keep them safe. "Niri is safe for now belowground. We'll have to worry about Kovo and the Wyrm once we've taken care of Zerif. For now, I need you to watch after the others."

"We're about to dive into war and you want us babysitting," Rollan said. "You sure this isn't just a way to keep us out of your hair?"

Shane couldn't resist a small grin. "Can't it be both?" He turned on his heel and rushed into the tunnels, his red cloak flapping behind him.

KIRAT

ROLLAN AND ABEKE WERE LEFT TO FIND THEIR OWN way to the camp. Redcloaks ran all around them, shouting commands—some of them sounding more animal than human when they spoke. As soon as Rollan set foot outside of the warmth of the volcano, he was again struck by just how cold this place was. Icy wind swept past him, going straight through his threadbare cloak.

“You’d think the Hellans could have picked a warmer spot,” he said, rubbing his arms.

“They didn’t have a choice,” Abeke said, trudging forward through the snow. “They needed to build along the axis of Erdas. I’m guessing that the snare somehow manipulates the magnetic forces swirling around this point—the same forces that confuse compass needles and make it difficult for Essix to fly.”

Rollan wasn’t sure how magnetic forces could stop the Wyrms, but he chose not to argue the point. It was clear from the conversation with Kovo that there was more to these ruins than he could understand. Essix, for her part, seemed glad to see Rollan out in the open, and she allowed herself to be put into passive state—if for no other reason than to warm up before another flight.

The outer camp of the island was made up of a series of deep, icy trenches that stretched in every direction. Rollan recalled what Shane had said about the lava flues, and he wondered if these trenches were actually part of the mountain's defenses.

They soon found their way to the shelter where the bereft had been staying. The room was empty but for Tasha, however, whose face and eyes were red. Rollan realized that she had been crying. Ninani the Swan sat next to her, trying to comfort her by rubbing her head against Tasha's hand.

"What's going on?" Abeke asked. "Where are the others?"

"They heard the conch shell and shouts of alarm." Tasha shook her head. "I tried to tell them they had to stay, but ... but he wouldn't listen." She stomped the snowy ground.

"Let me guess," Rollan said, folding his arms. "Kirat?"

"We need them," Abeke said. "Where did they go?"

Tasha and Ninani led them to the icy port where the Expiator was moored. Kirat and the other children were standing at the bottom of the gangplank, caught in an argument with Devin Trunswick—or Worthy or Wiggly—whatever he was calling himself.

"I command you to step aside!" Kirat shouted, one hand on the hilt of his rapier. "We are commandeering this vessel!"

The Redcloak folded his arms across his chest, laughing. "You'll have to do better than that." Rollan had to admit: Devin's new catlike eyes truly complemented his smug, disinterested demeanor.

"Come on, Devin!" whined one of the other children, a curly-haired boy Rollan only now recognized as Dawson Trunswick. "Let us through."

"No way, little brother," said the Redcloak. "I'm not moving unless King says so. Besides, we need these cannons to fend off the incoming ships."

"Wait," Rollan said, stepping in front of Kirat. "You're trying to take Shane's ship?"

"It's not Shane's ship," Kirat snapped. "It belongs to Cordalles's family." He nodded to one of the children huddled around him. "She loaned it to the Redcloaks, and now she wants it back."

"And I wonder who gave her that idea?" Rollan muttered.

“Enough,” Abeke said, putting herself between the two boys. “Zerif’s found us. His ships will be here before sundown.”

Kirat rolled his eyes. “Obviously. The only question is whether or not you two are stupid enough to stick around and die with the rest of those red-cloaked freaks.” He gestured to the other children, who were all huddled around him. “Do what you want, but we’re getting out of here.”

“You cowardly little snot!” Tasha said, pushing toward him. “Rollan and Abeke risked their lives to rescue you from Zerif!”

“They brought a marauding army to my father’s doorstep!” Kirat shouted, his voice cracking with real emotion. “My life was perfect before they showed up! And make no mistake, they care nothing for me or you. They only care about our precious spirit animals.”

Rollan peered around, looking for Cabaro. “Where is that big cat anyway?”

Kirat glared at him superciliously. “He’s in passive state, of course.” He pulled back his collar to reveal a lion-shaped tattoo on the back of his neck. “He finally accepted who his master is.” Even though Kirat’s fingers had touched the tattoo, Cabaro had still not appeared.

“Let me guess, master,” Rollan said, a grin playing at the edge of his mouth. “He went passive and now he won’t come back?”

Kirat’s dark cheeks turned darker. “I don’t need a spirit animal anyway—all he did was lie around and take up space.”

“Can we save the bickering for after the battle?” Abeke said. “The Redcloaks need help—from all of us. And they need this ship’s cannons to defend the shore. Zerif has eight Great Beasts at his command and a fleet of ships filled with Greencloaks. Do you really think you can evade that?”

“We don’t have to,” Kirat said, sniffing. “If Zerif wants Great Beasts, he can have mine. I’ll turn Cabaro over myself in exchange for my life.”

“You’d have to summon him first,” Rollan muttered.

Abeke shot him a glare that seemed to say that he wasn’t helping things. “Turning over the Great Beasts is not an option,” she said flatly.

“That’s easy for you to say!” said an Ardu girl named Anuqi. “You still have your spirit animals—you have something worth fighting for. Some of us have lost our families, our homes, everything. Why is it always fight with you Greencloaks?"

Rollan looked at Abeke, knowing how the girl's words must have stung. "Actually, I don't have a spirit animal," Abeke said in a quiet voice. "Zerif took control of Uraza when we were in Nilo." She lowered her head.

Rollan put a hand on Abeke's shoulder, a pathetic attempt at consolation. "You'll always be a Greencloak," he said.

"Save your sob stories for someone who cares," Kirat said, planting his hands on his hips. "We're done being pawns in your little Greencloak spat." The other children muttered in agreement.

"This isn't a spat!" Rollan shouted, feeling like he might very well explode on the spot. "We're trying to save the world!"

He felt a hand on his arm. It was Abeke. "Yelling isn't going to make them fight," she said gently. She pulled Rollan back from the group, speaking in a low voice. "Look at them. They're scared. Most of them have already lost their spirit animals. That's a pain greater than you could ever understand." And here her face flickered with the pain of her own loss—of her own Uraza ripped from her. "They don't need threats. They need a reason to keep on living. They need to be inspired."

Rollan rolled his eyes. "Inspiration really isn't my style." He desperately wished that Meilin were there—she would certainly know how to rally their spirits.

Abeke nodded, dropping her voice even lower. "We already have a born leader in our midst." She nodded to Kirat, who had resumed his argument with Devin on the gangplank.

"Kirat?" Rollan said. "You've got to be kidding."

Abeke shrugged. "Perhaps we've done him an injustice by treating him like a helpless child. He was not raised to take orders, he was raised to lead. Don't forget, Tarik's blood runs in his veins."

The mention of Tarik's name put a lump in Rollan's throat. Their old Greencloak mentor had been the only adult who had ever really believed in Rollan. He had trusted Rollan when everyone had lost faith in him. And Rollan knew that Tarik would want him to show that same faith in his nephew. “Ugh,” he muttered. “I hate it when you’re right.”

Abeke nodded to him and together they stepped past the other Great Beast summoners, approaching Kirat. The boy had been scratching Cabaro’s mark on his neck with no success at drawing forth the Great Lion. “We owe you an apology,” she said.

“Keep your apologies,” Kirat said, lowering his hand. “I’d rather keep my life.”

Abeke nudged Rollan, and he realized that she was expecting him to do the talking.

Rollan was good at begging, at lying, at swindling for food, but not this. He took a breath, trying to think about what he could say to make Kirat understand. He tried to imagine how Kirat felt in this moment, having fled from the destruction of his home to find himself in this desolate place.

“It’s okay to be scared,” Rollan said slowly. “But it’s not okay to run from your duty. You agreed to protect these children, and they’re depending on you. Your father fought before giving up Zourtzi. Do you really think he would run in this situation?”

The mention of Kirat’s father was clearly a sore spot, and the boy’s face softened slightly.

“The Redcloaks need this ship, not to mention the extra hands,” Abeke added. “These others won’t listen to us—we’re wearing the same cloaks as the army that’s coming this way. But they will listen to you. You’re a trained fighter, and you’ve spent a lifetime watching your father build and protect the greatest fortress in all of Nilo by inspiring thousands of subjects. We need you to lead.”

Rollan reached into his pack and removed a small amulet with an iron chain. “This belonged to your uncle, Tarik.” He held out the chain for Kirat to see. “The man you were named after. He died trying to protect the world from Zerif. And now it’s your turn to join the fight.” He ran his thumb over the cracked green stone. “Your mother gave it to me. She told me I should save it for when you were ready to follow in his footsteps. It was her last wish.”

Kirat's face softened even more. "She ... my mother told you that?"

Rollan nodded. "She did. The only question now is: Are you ready?"

Kirat reached out a hand, which Rollan couldn't help but notice was shaking. The boy took the amulet and stared at it in the cold afternoon light. He held it for what felt like an eternity. Then he dipped his head and placed the chain around his neck. It was not an expensive amulet—Kirat's silken socks were probably worth more than the common gemstone—but when the boy raised his face again, he looked more richly garbed than any prince Rollan had ever seen.

Kirat turned away from them and faced the other children, who were huddled at the bottom of the gangplank, waiting for him to speak.

"Are we going?" asked Cordalles. "We're running out of time."

"There's no time." Kirat took a deep breath and turned toward them. "I did you a disservice by leading you to this port—by letting you think there was a way out of danger. I claimed that it was the smart thing to do. But it wasn't intellect that motivated me. It was cowardice."

"Better to live a coward than die a hero," said Dawson.

"You're probably right," Kirat said, shrugging. "I've never been too impressed by courage. I remember my tutors and scrollmavens talking fondly about courageous heroes falling in battle. Hearing those songs and ballads, I always thought that it was a flimsy reward for losing one's life." A few of the children chuckled at this nervously. "But really," Kirat continued, "all my scorn for courage was an attempt to cover up my fear. My whole life has been dominated by fear. My father was the most powerful merchant lord in all Nilo, second only to the high chieftain. Some would have called him a tyrant. I was terrified of him. But all his soldiers and battlements and might were nothing in the face of Zerif's army." He closed his eyes, taking a deep breath.

"Not exactly the rousing speech we were hoping for," Rollan muttered.

"Shh," Abeke whispered. "At least they're listening."

Rollan looked at the other children and saw that Abeke was right. The children were hanging on to Kirat's every word, some of them even nodding. "I'm done being afraid," the young lord continued. "I've already lost everything. My family, my wealth, my home. You have all lost even more than that—having your spirit animals ripped from you. Which means you have nothing to fear. How can we possibly fear a thing like death, when we’ve nothing to live for?” The boy stood before them, his uncle’s amulet glinting against the afternoon sun. “Truly, it is Zerif who should fear us.”

He paced in front of them, raising his voice, speaking more quickly. “We are not ordinary children. We didn’t just summon spirit animals. We are the first in the history of Erdas to summon Great Beasts.” He pointed to different children as he spoke. “Rumfuss the Boar ... Suka the Polar Bear ... Halawir the Eagle ... Arax the Ram ... Tellun the Elk ... Dinesh the Elephant.”

“But Dinesh is gone,” said a Zhongese girl. “So are the rest of the Beasts.” She had tears standing in her dark eyes.

Kirat nodded. “Dinesh may be gone, but you remain, Kaiina. And you have his resilience within you.” He spread his arms wide. “The same is true for all of us. Our beasts didn’t just come to human partners at random. They came to us ... because each of us has something inside ourselves that reflects the nature of our Great Beasts. The wisdom of the elk, the courage of the eagle, the determination of the ram, the cunning of the boar, the strength of the polar bear.” His eyes flicked to Tasha and Ninani. “The grace of the swan.”

Rollan looked at Tasha and the other children. They were all watching Kirat with intense expressions. A few of them looked like they were about to cry. Rollan had to admit that Kirat had a way with words.

Kirat paced in front of them, standing tall. “But this is not a time for mourning. This is a time for action. The same Great Beasts that came to each of us have now been captured by a force more evil than any Erdas has ever faced. They need our help.” He drew his gilded rapier from its sheath, raising it over his head. “Would we really turn our backs on them? Or will we FIGHT?!”

“We fight!” the children cried. There was a flash and the next moment Cabaro stood beside Kirat. The lion raised his head and released a tremendous roar that rocked the boat and shook the water.

The other children stared at the beast in awe. Rollan stared, too. It seemed the great Cabaro had suddenly decided to lend his support to his human partner. And Rollan thought he understood why. This was a whole new Kirat.

THE BATTLE BEGINS

WHILE ABEKE AND KIRAT LED THE NEWLY ENERGIZED children into the caverns, Rollan remained outside to let Essix stretch her wings and fly a few laps around the mountain. He watched her soaring through the cold air and wondered what it would feel like to be so high above the world. He could, of course, share her vision and see it, but that wasn't the same.

"You make sure to stay safe for what's coming," he said to the falcon as she landed again on his arm. Win or lose, he didn't want to end up like the other Great Beast summoners. Like Abeke.

By the time Rollan caught up with them in the caverns, he found them all paired off in sparring formation, each clutching swords. Kirat stood in front with Tasha, who had her staff and was preparing to charge.

"Keep your knees bent," Kirat said instructively. "Don't watch your opponent's eyes or even their hands—the feet can tell you everything you need to know. Wait for them to make the first move, and when they are transferring weight between feet"—he swung the dull end of his rapier under Tasha's leg as she charged—"you draw your weapon in the opposite direction." Tasha flipped backward, landing hard on her back. "Let their movement work against them."

Several of the children managed to apply this technique with similar success. Rollan clapped, stepping into the room. “Not bad,” he said. “Seems you were paying attention to my lessons on the Expiator.”

“Only as an example of what not to do,” Kirat said, stiffening. “I enjoyed seven years of training under the best duelists in all of Nilo. It’s time I put that knowledge to use.”

Rollan couldn’t help but smile. It seemed that even the new-and-improved Kirat could still talk back. He turned to Abeke, who was at the far wall conferring with Howl, his face covered with a white coyote mask.

“What’s going on over here?” he said.

“We’re stuck.” Howl shook his head, his ears twitching slightly behind the mask. “We need to raise this lava gate, but it’s encased in ice.” He pulled against a lever that refused to budge. “We could melt it with torches, but that could take an hour.”

“Allow me,” Kirat said, joining them. He nodded to Cabaro, who was crouched behind him. The lion rose to his feet and moved to the lever. With one swipe of his mighty claw, the ice shattered, releasing the gate’s lever.

“Problem solved,” Abeke said.

Howl pulled the lever, which now moved easily. There was a ratcheting sound inside the cavern wall, and then a stone gate opened near Rollan’s feet. Steaming lava slid from the hole and ran down a groove in the cavern floor, filling up a sort of cauldron at the edge of the window. “So how does this work?” Rollan said.

Howl pointed at the basin of bubbling lava. “This fills up to create pressure. Like a water tank. And when we pull the main winch”—he hiked his furry thumb at a huge handle—“then the basin will drain into those trenches around the perimeter.”

“A lava moat,” Rollan said. “Not bad.”

“It could be better,” Kirat said. He didn’t sound arrogant, just matter-of-fact. “What if we used archers to drive the incoming forces to that ice shelf near the edge of the island? Then when the lava sweeps through, it will drop them into the freezing sea.”

Rollan, Abeke, and Howl all looked at Kirat, who blushed. “It’s ... just an idea.”

“No, it’s a great idea,” Howl said.

Rollan had to agree. He may have enjoyed more experience in hand-to-hand combat, but he knew nothing about strategy. “There’s one problem,” he said. “Those are still Greencloaks out there—possessed or not. They’re our friends. We’re not going to kill them.”

“Our friends?” Kirat turned toward him, eyes flashing. “Tell that to everyone in this room who’s had their family killed.” The boy shook his head, taking a deep breath. Rollan could actually see him forcing back his own emotions. “I know this is hard for you, Rollan. But this is war. And if we don’t stop them, a lot more people will die.”

“He’s right,” Abeke said. “We can’t let our feelings about the Greencloaks get in the way of stopping Zerif.”

Rollan looked at Abeke, shocked to hear such a thing coming from her. Then again, she was a hunter. She always had more of a killer instinct than he did. “Fine,” he said, sighing. “But let’s at least try to keep the casualties to a minimum.”

“I’ll alert Shane to prepare the archers,” Abeke said, stepping back.

Rollan still didn’t feel completely comfortable with Shane. And he knew that Abeke’s feelings were even more complicated.

“You fighting with Shane ... ” he said carefully. “Are you sure that’s a good idea?”

“He’ll need archers,” she said firmly, “and I’m the best shot he’s got.”

Howl pulled up his mask and offered a toothy grin. “Don’t let Talon hear you say that. She’s a master with a crossbow.”

The debate was cut off by the sound of a conch shell from one of the lookouts. Rollan and the others all rushed to the window and peered out over the frozen sea.

Zerif’s fleet was fast approaching: six ships surrounded by a swirling cloud of white fog. The cloud lifted up from the boats and moved closer to them—growing larger and larger.

“What is that stuff?” Rollan said. “It’s too cold for fog.”

Howl narrowed his lupine eyes. “That’s not fog.” He ran to the tunnel and cupped both hands around his mouth. “INCOMING!” he hollered. “Everyone! Back from the windows!”

The next minute a snowy tern darted through the window and plunged its beak straight into Tasha’s leg. She screamed, and before Rollan or anyone else could react, Cabaro pounced on the bird and snatched it in his mighty jaws. He snapped the bird’s neck and flung it to the ground. The tern lay dead and twitching, its head marked with the swirl of Zerif’s parasite.

Rollan looked out the window and saw that the cloud was really thousands of birds—all flying toward them at deadly speed. He ducked to one side as three more snowy terns darted into the window, each one hurtling toward a different target. There were screams all through the camp as birds swept into the mountain, attacking Redcloaks. They were not hard to beat away, but there were so many of them that it was nearly impossible to see.

“Defensive position!” Kirat called, and they all raced to the middle of the room, backs together.

The air shuddered as he heard cannon fire from the Expiator. Rollan and Essix fought against two birds that were swarming around Abeke. The war had begun.

Essix screeched, grabbing a possessed tern in her razor claws. “Go!” Rollan cried, slicing his dagger through the other bird’s extended wing. Abeke locked eyes with Rollan for one last moment, and then she was gone.

FLAMES AND FROST

ABEKE RACED THROUGH THE TUNNELS TO THE ARCHERS' keep along the high rim of the volcano. She didn't want to admit it, but she was glad to be away from the other Great Beast summoners—she had been afraid that Howl would insist that she belonged with them. Zerif's terns squawked and slashed through the caverns. The Redcloaks had drawn their arms and were swiping at the birds, chasing them through the maze of tunnels.

"The birds are a distraction!" Abeke yelled. "Everyone stay at your posts!"

Abeke followed the winding path that moved up the inside of the volcano. The path led her through an archway that was nearly as high as the icy tower. She ran through the arch to find a narrow cavern with a series of slat windows cut into the rock—the archers' keep. Shane was there with a handful of other Redcloaks. Yumaris was with him, too, huddled in the corner, fending off an attacking bird that had found its way through the slats. Abeke drew her own bow, quickly nocked an arrow, and cut through the bird—killing it in one shot.

"Oh, bless you, hollow-girl," the old woman said. "That early birdie was trying to get the worm."

“Don’t mention it,” Abeke gasped. Steam rose from her mouth as she struggled to catch her breath. Icy wind whistled through the windows, covering the floor of the cavern with a thin layer of snow. Apparently the Hellans’ lava channels couldn’t go this high.

“What are you doing here?” asked the birdlike girl named Talon. She was loading a bolt into her crossbow. “Shouldn’t you be babysitting the others?” She took aim and shot her bolt straight through the heart of an approaching tern, which veered off course and slammed into the opposite wall.

“Change of plans,” Abeke said, lowering her bow. “We need to save our arrows for the landing party. We’ll drive them to the far trench by the water and then release the lava gates.”

“Who died and put you in charge?” Talon said, her sharp eyes darting between Abeke and the window.

“No,” Shane said, stepping to Abeke’s side. “It’s a good plan.” He turned to the row of archers. “Hold fire. Let’s wait out this first wave until Zerif lands.”

Another possessed bird swept through the window.

“What’s the point of waiting if we’ve been pecked to pieces by the time Zerif gets here?!” shouted a boy with a bear mask. He snarled, swatting at the possessed bird, which was trying to claw out his eyes.

Shane drew his sword and cut toward the bird, sending it wheeling out of the tower. “We’ll have to find some other way to take the birds out.” He turned back toward Talon. “Tell Stead to release the gate on balcony number six!”

Talon ran to the archway and shouted the command into the tunnel. The order echoed down the mountain until it reached Stead’s ears. A moment later, a vent of simmering lava spilled out from the side of the rock, directly onto a pile of loosely packed snow at the base of the mountain. The snow hissed and melted to create a huge cloud of billowing vapor. The cloud was enough to blind the incoming birds, which suddenly were unable to navigate. Pained squawks rang out as the soaring flock missed their targets and instead crashed against the outside wall of the mountain.

“Nice work,” Abeke said, shivering.

Shane’s astonished smile at this meager praise sent a tremor of guilt through Abeke’s chest. He looked like she’d just kissed him on the cheek.

Catching himself, the leader of the Redcloaks coughed, pursing his lips into a thin line. “The birds were just a distraction,” he said brusquely. “The real fight is still to come.”

The ground shook as two mortar shells from the incoming fleet struck the side of the mountain—Zerif’s fleet was now in firing range. There was the sound of an explosion near the port, and Abeke watched as the Expiator burst into splinters and sank into the cold water.

“There goes our ride home,” Abeke said as the ship’s mast slid below the surface. She stared at the approaching fleet, half shrouded in smoke from the cannon fire, searching for a sight of Zerif’s dark tunic.

“Ready arrows!” Shane called. “Wait for my mark.” He and the other Redcloaks positioned themselves at the windows. “There’s a cache of arrows along the back wall,” he said to Abeke.

“Thanks, but I brought my own.” Abeke drew back her green cloak and removed a single arrow from her full quiver. The black point glinted in the light of the setting sun—it was sharpened obsidian. She had spent most of her voyage honing them to razor points—sharp enough to cut through any armor or shield Zerif might use. She nocked it into the string of her bow, steadying her aim.

“Obsidian points,” Shane said, eyeing her full quiver. “How many of those are for Zerif?”

Abeke tightened her grip on the end of the nocked arrow. “As many as it takes.”

“I’d hate to have you as an enemy,” he said weakly. “Again.”

Abeke looked at him, unable to tell if this was a joke. It was harder to read his expressions now—the reptilian glint in his eyes made him appear less human.

“I’m not going to shoot you, if that’s what you’re asking,” she said, turning back to the window. She had thought about it, of course. But whatever anger she felt toward Shane was tempered by her memory of their time together among the Conquerors.

Once, Shane had been a guide and friend to her. Maybe the first true friend she ever had. He had been the one who taught Abeke that she could find family wherever she was and encouraged her to find it in Uraza.

There was another rumbling sound—much louder than the mortar shots. Abeke placed her hand on the ledge to keep herself from falling. She could feel the entire mountain shaking from the vibrations. “Sounds like they found a bigger cannon,” she said.

“Not a cannon, hollow-girl,” Yumaris said, shaking her head. She touched the ground, which was still shaking. “Something much bigger. Something deep below ...”

The old woman gestured for them to come to the archway and look inside the mountain. Abeke joined her. The icy tower in the middle of the volcano was slowly rotating, dropping huge chunks of ice onto the floor. She feared the ice might crush the Redcloaks, but when she looked farther down, she saw that the floor was gone. The wedge-shaped sections of the stone around the tower had begun to slide away from one another—pulling apart like the folds of an iris. “Um, what’s happening to your base?”

Shane stepped beside her and shook his head. “No clue. It must have something to do with what your friends were up to.”

The shaking stopped as abruptly as it had started.

The panels in the floor had pulled a few feet from one another, revealing gaps that led to a hollow chamber deep below—how deep, it was impossible to tell. The tower in the middle groaned and shuddered, unable to turn any farther. “Whatever that tower is supposed to do, I think it’s broken,” Abeke said. “The ice must be jamming the mechanism—preventing it from fully opening the floor.”

“I hear it down there,” Yumaris whispered next to them. “So, so hungry ...”

Abeke didn’t have time to consider the old woman’s words, because the next moment a mortar shell from Zerif’s fleet crashed into the rock just above their keep. The impact seemed to jolt the entire ledge, nearly knocking Abeke into the abyss below.

She and Shane both ran back into the keep and resumed their positions, just as another cannon fired—striking the keep directly. The impact of the shell knocked the archers backward, raining rubble and shards of ice down from above.

Shane dove on top of Abeke, knocking her clear of a huge chunk of rock that had been blasted loose—rock that would have easily crushed her. Abeke blinked up at Shane, who was staring at her, his expression unreadable. “I ... can’t breathe,” she said.

Shane nodded and pulled himself off her. “A simple thanks would suffice.” He dusted off his red cloak and picked up his fallen saber.

Abeke sat up, rolling her eyes. When it came to her and Shane, there was nothing simple about it.

“If Zerif keeps up this cannon fire, we won’t live to see the landing party,” she said.

Shane nodded and helped her to her feet. “I agree.”

“King!” Talon shouted. “Check the water! We may be in luck.”

Abeke and Shane rushed to the ledge and looked out toward the fleet. White foam sprayed against the choppy waves. Shouts from possessed Greencloaks rang over the water. The largest ship in Zerif’s fleet was keeling heavily to one side—nearly capsized. Abeke searched the waters for a reason. Was something attacking the ship from below?

Then she spotted it.

At the helm, three long tentacles with opalescent skin were wrapped around the ship’s wheel. The other five were presently engaged in grappling the helmswoman, dragging her away from the steering.

“Mulop!” Abeke said. “He’s attacking the fleet.”

Another ship sloshed to one side as the first boat rammed into it. There was an earsplitting crack that rang out over even the sounds of birds and waves and cannons—the mast snapping in two. It crashed down onto the deck of the second ship, shattering wood and sending it careening to the side. The cannons that had a moment before been pointing straight at the mountain were now ripped from their stows and flung into the water.

Mulop was single-handedly disarming the entire fleet.

“So much for the cannons!” Shane said, grinning.

But the celebration was cut short before it had even fully begun, for the next moment, Abeke saw the tentacles spasm in pain and grow limp—sliding from the Greencloak and wheel. The octopus’s iridescent skin seemed to change before her eyes, turning to a dull, pale color.

“Mulop,” she said. “He’s been infected.”

She thought of Niri sitting underground—the agony the girl must have been experiencing as her spirit animal was ripped from her soul and bonded with Zerif. “Someone should get Niri,” she whispered. “She’s trapped in that cavern.”

“No time ... ” Shane said. “They’re here.”

Animal snarls and roars filled the air. Zerif’s ships had reached the port and an attack party had thrown claw-shaped anchors into the ice. Greencloaks roared as they slid down the ropes and landed at the edge of the island. Animal companions leaped from the ship and joined their sides—snarling and squawking and growling. Abeke watched, openmouthed, trying to count the forces, which seemed to have doubled in size since she last saw them. Zerif must have been adding to his numbers as his fleet traveled from port to port in pursuit of the Expiator.

“Wait for my mark,” Shane called. “We’re going to be driving them to the ledge on the eastern shore, so focus on the group in front. Push them to our left.”

Abeke and the Redcloaks held their arrows tight, waiting for his command. Even at this distance, Abeke could see the black stains on their foreheads, marking them as slaves to Zerif. And somewhere in that horde was Zerif himself. She adjusted her grip on the end of her arrow.

“Fire!” Shane cried.

Two dozen arrows soared out from the keep and plunged down to the ice below—lodging into Greencloaks. Screams rang out through the air as six men staggered to their knees, their animal companions faltering beside them. The remaining Greencloak forces veered to one side to avoid the assault.

“Perfect!” Shane said, nocking another arrow. “Keep pushing them in that direction.”

Abeke drew another arrow from her quiver and took aim.

“Fire!”

Another volley, this one more successful than the first. A group of fifty or so Greencloaks had splintered off from the main group and was moving closer to the shelf. Abeke and the other archers reloaded and shot again, pushing the invading group to the edge of the ice.

“Release the flue!” Shane cried into the tunnel.

Abeke heard the sound of gears moving deep within the rock and the next moment a burst of searing lava erupted from the side of the mountain. It filled one of the icy trenches, which hissed and steamed, dividing the approaching forces in half.

The lava continued down its path until it reached the fifty Greencloaks huddled on the eastern shelf. Here the trench branched into two smaller streams, which surrounded the group. The ice at this point was thinner, and as soon as the lava made contact, it burned right through and plummeted into the freezing water.

The entire shelf splashed into the ocean. Greencloaks and beasts screamed and splashed, trying to swim to shore in the cold sea.

“Oh-ho!” Yumaris shouted, clapping. “All those nasty greenie-cloaks turned to icicles!”

Abeke glared at the old woman. “If you don’t stop talking about my friends and allies like that, there’s going to be one more icicle floating around out there.”

Shane nodded solemnly at Abeke. “We take no pleasure in this,” he said, “but the plan worked well.”

Abeke only frowned, turning back to the window. Cheers could be heard echoing up from the chambers below. The Redcloaks hadn’t defeated Zerif’s forces, of course, but they had reduced its numbers by a quarter.

Still, the battle was far from over. Already another wave of Greencloaks had descended from the ships. And the possessed Mulop was already in the water where the Greencloaks had fallen. He was using his tentacles to catch and drag them back to shore—freezing cold, but still alive.

The Redcloaks released another two gates, filling trenches with lava to drive back the incoming forces. The flow created a molten perimeter around the mountain. There was a shout below as another gate opened at the base of the volcano.

This time, instead of lava, there was a flutter of red fabric as a troop of Redcloaks slid down the icy slope, swords in hands. These Redcloaks were not ordinary fighters, for they all possessed traits of the animal companions that they had merged with. They were faster, stronger, fiercer than any human could hope to be. They met the approaching Greencloaks head-on, pushing Zerif's forces back toward the water.

“Fire!” Shane cried, and another volley rained down on the Greencloaks. Abeke crouched beside him, lending her arrows to the cause. Shane and his Redcloaks were fine shots, but none half as good as her. When she let fly an arrow—it always found her mark.

“Nice work, Greencloak!” Talon said, reloading her crossbow. “I think half the fighters in that field have your arrows in them.”

Abeke didn't have time to respond to the compliment. She was too busy searching the field for her real prey. And then, in the shifting steam, she saw him—

Zerif.

The man had let his troops charge ahead of him like a coward. Now he was stepping down from the gangplank of his ship, his dark tunic rustling in the wind.

Abeke held her breath, drawing back her arrow. Zerif probably thought he was well out of range, but he couldn't account for the arrows Abeke was using—their obsidian points chiseled to perfection. The ends had been nocked with feathers taken from Essix herself.

The air was cold, but a thin trickle of sweat ran down Abeke's brow.

“Patience,” she whispered to herself. She would only have one chance to surprise him.

Zerif reached the shore and marched into the fray—a pair of short swords in his gloved hands. Zerif had seen his share of battles, and even without the power of his Great Beasts, he was a formidable swordsman. He charged toward a Redcloak named Flip who had managed to bound over the main Greencloak forces with a series of impossible, froglike jumps.

Zerif crouched down and slashed one blade quickly through Flip’s heel. The Redcloak collapsed, screaming. Zerif stomped on Flip’s neck to stifle his cry, before pushing his sword through his heart and silencing him completely.

Abeke wanted to look away from the scene, but she didn’t dare blink, for fear of losing her target.

“Patience ... ” she whispered to herself, steam rising from her mouth. The air was blisteringly cold, and she had to fight to keep her aim steady. She could feel the other archers watching her now. Shane had suspended fire, so none of them could distract her from her target. One clean shot and she could end this entire war. “A little closer ... ”

Zerif was almost in range now. He had released his Great Beasts, which slithered and stampeded alongside him—his personal guards, all bonded to him through the parasites: Dinesh the Elephant, Rumfuss the Ram, Gerathon the Serpent, Tellun the Elk, Suka the Polar Bear, Arax the Ram, Halawir the Eagle, and ...

Abeke caught her breath. “No ... ”

Shane appeared beside her, glancing out the small window. “What’s wrong?” he said. “You have a shot, take it.”

Abeke blinked, her arrow still nocked in her bow. She adjusted her grip.

“I ... I can’t ... ” Standing in front of Zerif was a sleek yellow beast with deep purple eyes. It was Uraza. Her Uraza. The leopard had climbed onto a hunk of fallen ice and was blocking Abeke’s shot. If she missed by even an inch, it would go straight through Uraza’s neck. The leopard paused, tilting her head up toward the mountain—and then looked directly at Abeke.

Abeke lowered her bow, dropping to the ground. “I can’t do it,” she said. Her voice was shaking. Her hands slick with sweat. “I can’t shoot her....”

She caught the eyes of Talon and Shane, both of whom were looking at her in confusion.

“I’m sorry,” she said. She sat up and looked back toward the battlefield—but Uraza and Zerif were both gone.

The ground shook beneath her, violently enough that she had to steady herself against Shane’s arm. Chunks of rock and ice fell from the walls around her. There was a huge cracking sound and the entire island shuddered. Redcloaks and Greencloaks alike cried out as the impact threw them all to the ground. A huge crack formed up the side of the volcano wall, showering rubble down on the fighters below.

“What’s going on down there?” Talon shouted. “It feels like the mountain’s being torn apart from the inside.”

Yumaris, who had been huddled in the corner, skittered out from the shadows. “That is the sound of destruction. The end of Erdas.” Her face was pale, and for once she sounded completely sane. “Look! Look!” She dragged Abeke and the Redcloaks through the archway to the path overlooking the volcano floor.

The stone panels at the base of the tower had been smashed apart, creating a larger hole. From somewhere deep below, a gargling shriek rang out, curdling the air. Abeke felt a prickly nausea stutter up her spine. She inched closer to the edge of the path for a better look. The broken floor revealed a deep steaming hole that seemed to disappear straight into the heart of Erdas. Streams of hot lava trickled from the edges, bathing it in a dark orange light. And slithering out from that hole was a hideous creature made of slick black tentacles and glowing red eyes.

“The Wurm,” Yumaris whispered. “It’s here.”

A decorative graphic featuring a central, dark, pointed shape resembling a drop or a stylized flame. The number '22' is printed in a bold, black, sans-serif font in the center of this shape. On either side of the central shape are two symmetrical, light-colored, spiral patterns that resemble nautilus shells or stylized wings, curving outwards and upwards.

22

LAST WORDS

WHEN ABEKE WAS YOUNG AND AFRAID OF THE DARK, her mother used to tell her that fear of a thing is more terrible than the sight of it—that the imagination conjures visions worse than anything nature can produce. She would light a torch in their rondavel and explain there was no terror so great it could withstand the light of reality.

But now, staring at the Wurm, Abeke knew her mother had been wrong. This creature was more disturbing than anything she had ever conceived—and the light of the cavern only served to expose its horror.

The Wurm was a roiling, slithering nightmare that coated whatever it touched in black ooze. It perched itself on the edge of the chasm from which it had crawled, peering around at the ruins with glowing red eyes. It opened its mouth to reveal row after row of razor-sharp teeth, and screeched.

“Wow,” Shane said. “The Hellan carvings didn’t quite do it justice.”

Yumaris started shaking, backing away from the ledge. “So hungry ... so hungry ...”

Battle cries rang out as a few Redcloaks on the lower levels charged the creature, blades drawn. The Wurm hissed and shot its tendrils out, snatching up the Redcloaks. It snapped their bones like twigs before hurling them away.

“Shane!” It was Talon. Her face was pale. “You need to look outside. The Greencloaks—something’s happening to them.”

Shane and Abeke pulled themselves away from the sight of the Wyrms and followed Talon back to the window. The icy battlefield was strewn with the bodies of fallen Greencloaks—cut down by arrows and lava and Redcloaks.

But now they were moving. One by one the fallen Greencloaks picked themselves up from the snow. The resurrected army raised their weapons and cried out, their voices as one, in a sort of inhuman roar.

“The Wyrms,” Yumaris said, clutching Abeke’s arm in her gnarled hands. “It calls to them. Makes them stronger.”

“How much stronger?” Shane said, readying his bow.

But he found out soon enough. The reinvigorated Greencloaks charged toward the mountain, cutting past the remaining Redcloaks like they were nothing. Shane called a volley of arrows down on them, but even though most of the arrows found their marks, the horde kept running. They tore through the stone gates with their bare hands and swept into the mountain.

Abeke listened to the shouts and clashing blades as the battle moved inside the volcano. She thought of Rollan, who was on one of the lower outposts—maybe even within reach of the Wyrms. She closed her eyes, hoping he was smart enough to stay clear of its flailing tentacles.

“How do we stop that thing?” she said.

Shane shook his head. “I have no idea.” He had cast aside his bow and drew his saber. The other Redcloak archers drew their own swords. “But we’ll die trying.”

Abeke followed Shane and his forces down the tunnels—running as fast as her legs could carry her. She had seen the new ferocity of the Greencloaks. She and the others were heading straight into slaughter, but what choice did they have? If just one of them could get close enough to stop the Wyrms, maybe they would have a chance at slowing Zerif’s forces.

Shane and his Redcloaks had the advantage of animal speed and were pulling ahead of Abeke—leaping from level to level. Abeke cursed her slowness as she slung her bow over her shoulder and clambered down a pile of rubble where the path had fallen away.

“Hollow-girl!” a voice cried beside her.

Abeke dropped down to the path to see Yumaris there. The old woman’s mouth hung open in surprise. “There’s a message from below. You must follow me. Quickly! Quickly!”

She tried to grab Abeke’s hand, but Abeke pulled back. “I don’t have time for this,” she said. “Shane and the Redcloaks are about to attack the Wyrms before it can reach Zerif.”

But Yumaris ignored her. She snatched Abeke’s arm and held it fast. “You must speak to the newling, hollow-girl. Quickly!”

Abeke followed Yumaris through the battle. The closer they came to the hole in the middle of the volcano, the more violent the combat became. Redcloaks fought valiantly against possessed Greencloaks—and the sight of her former comrades fighting tooth and claw against Shane’s desperate forces stole her breath away.

Screams and snarls rang out in every direction. Yumaris dragged Abeke through a tunnel that opened into a familiar chamber—to the lava gate where Rollan had been posted with Kirat and the Great Beast summoners.

Howl and Tasha stood at the mouth of the tunnel, fending off approaching Greencloaks, the bulk of whom had focused their efforts on reaching the Wyrms.

“Welcome back,” Tasha said as Abeke ran past her and into the cavern. The floor of the cavern was littered with the corpses of snowy terns. Abeke’s eyes instantly found Rollan slumped against the wall, Essix on his shoulder.

“You’re still alive!” she said, running to him and wrapping him in a hug.

“Barely,” Rollan said. He pointed to a bloody gash along his cheek. “Parting gift from one of Zerif’s thugs, who managed to scale up through the window. What do you think? Handsome?”

“I’d say you got off easy.” She winked. “Meilin will love it.”

Rollan's eyes went wide. "Who said anything about Meilin?"

"Enough joking around," Kirat said, rapier in hand. "We have someone who needs to talk to you."

Three of the summoners stepped back from the corner to reveal someone else in the room. A small girl was huddled on the ground, wet and trembling.

Niri stared up at Abeke with shimmering green eyes.

"Niri?" Abeke said, rushing toward her. She knelt down next to the girl, whose face was pale. Niri had red rings under her eyes. It looked like she'd aged ten years in the last three hours. "Mulop," Abeke said. "You lost him."

Niri nodded, her body shaking. "One moment I could feel him ... and then he was gone.... It felt like I was ripped in half...." She closed her eyes and tears spilled down her cheeks.

Abeke placed a hand on hers. "I know how it feels." She took a deep breath. "The pain fades, gets duller." This was not exactly true, but she felt like she had to offer some consolation. Abeke looked at Niri's thin legs, which lay motionless on the earth. Her shins and feet were raw and bleeding. "How did you get up here?"

"I pulled myself up from the cavern." She swallowed, massaging her palms, which were also cut. "Dragged myself all the way here. I had to find you." She blinked her eyes, as though trying to stem a fresh tide of tears. "Before Mulop—before it happened—I could hear what was happening in Sadre. I know how the trap works—it changes the tides of Erdas. Kovo and the others tried to start the trap in Sadre, but it didn't work. Something went wrong."

Abeke remembered how the rotating tower had stopped abruptly. "It got jammed."

"You have to start the trap—before the Wurm has a chance to bond with Zerif. Once it finds its host, it will be too powerful."

Abeke straightened up, releasing a steady breath. Having grown up hunting, she knew a thing or two about traps, but this sounded a lot more complicated than what she could pull off with ropes and counterweights. "How do we spring the trap?"

“They started the trap in Sadre ... by striking a bell.”

“There’s no bell in these ruins,” Howl said. “King’s had us travel through every corridor and passage. Did they tell you where it was?”

“I’m sorry. I don’t know any more.” Niri shook her head, staring up at them. “But I do know that if you fail, everything is lost.”

Rollan scratched his head. “No pressure.”

“All right,” Kirat said, stepping back. “So our first task is to keep Zerif away from the Wyrm until we can locate this bell. We can set up a perimeter around the edges of the fortress, to keep the Wyrm in the middle of the cavern floor. We don’t want it accidentally bringing this entire mountain down on top of us.” As he spoke, he drew marks in the dirt with the tip of his sword. “While the Wyrm is distracted, we’ll need a second party to sneak into the lower tunnels in search of the bell.” He turned to Howl. “I’m guessing you have a good nose. Do you think you could lead the search?”

Howl gave a lupine grin. “Try and stop me.”

“Good,” Kirat continued. “Tasha should go with you. She can summon Ninani to search places that are out of reach or might be hidden from the ground.”

Abeke was impressed. Kirat really did sound like his uncle. And more important, he had a plan.

Rollan must have read her mind. “He’s been like this since you left. I’d be annoyed if it weren’t for the fact that I know Tarik would approve.” He shrugged. “Besides, it’s nice to have someone else to blame when things go wrong.”

“Let’s not talk about things going wrong,” Abeke said.

A cry broke out from the tunnel as Howl and Tasha were knocked backward by a snarling streak of yellow. The two screamed in pain, clutching their arms. Blood seeped from long claw marks where they had been slashed through their cloaks.

Standing above them was a sleek creature with violet eyes.

ABEKE STARED AT THE BEAST, HER HEART RACING. “Uraza?” she said. It was the closest she’d been to her spirit animal since losing her on the rocky shores of Zourtzi.

The Great Beast stalked closer to Abeke, licking her white fangs. The parasite beneath her leopard brow was pulsing and black, wriggling and twisting beneath the flesh. The rims of Uraza’s eyes were bloodshot and dark. She looked like a changed creature.

Rollan and the others drew their blades.

“Weapons down!” Abeke shouted. “No one hurts her.”

She lowered her own bow, keeping her eyes fixed on Uraza’s. “I don’t know what Zerif’s done to you, but I know you, Uraza.” Her voice was shaking. “Deep down, I know you don’t want to hurt—”

Uraza roared, leaping straight at her, claws raised—pouncing to kill.

“No!” Abeke screamed, stumbling backward.

She registered a flash of red fabric and Uraza’s body suddenly hurtled to one side—veering off course and smashing against the cavern wall. The beast roared and snapped at the thing that had prevented her from killing Abeke.

Rollan rushed to Abeke’s side, helping her up.

Abeke could only stare at the swirling red cape rolling across the ground, the figure fighting to subdue Uraza. One of the Redcloaks had leaped to save her. She caught a glint of yellow eyes behind a plain white mask as her rescuer drew his saber.

“Shane,” she whispered.

Even with his heightened speed, Shane was too slow. Uraza bit down on his side, and Shane cried out in agony, dropping his sword. The Great Beast drew him off the ground and shook him back and forth, driving her teeth deeper into his flesh.

Abeke had hunted with Uraza countless times. She’d seen her do similar things to finish off wounded prey. But now the prey was Shane.

“Let him go!” Abeke scrambled across the dirt and grabbed her bow. This time she did not hesitate. She nocked an arrow and aimed it at Uraza.

The arrow plunged straight through Uraza’s leg.

The Great Leopard snarled and stumbled back, releasing Shane, who fell to the ground with a dull thud.

Uraza gave a gargling wheeze, as if struggling for air. Blood ran freely from her wound. She roared at Abeke and then—in a flash of bright light—vanished from her spot, leaving only a red stain on the cavern floor. She had been summoned into passive state by her new master.

“Shane!” Abeke ran to the boy, falling to her knees.

Shane moaned in pain. Dark blood soaked his side. His skin was pale and covered with perspiration.

“Just keep breathing,” she said, taking his head in her hands. “Keep breathing....”

Shane lolled his head toward her, opening his yellow eyes. “I ... saw Uraza running toward the tunnel and I was afraid she might ... hurt you.” He flinched, clenching his jaw tight as he gave a painful cough. When he opened his mouth again, there was blood on his lips.

“I ... I’m sorry, Abeke.” His voice was so weak she could barely hear it over the sounds of battle echoing up from the tunnels below. “I’m sorry for everything.” He winced, giving another violent cough.

He did not move again.

“Not you.... Not you.... ” Abeke clutched the boy’s lifeless body in her arms, pulling him close to her chest. He had given his life trying to win her forgiveness. If she had only told him before how she felt, what he meant to her, he might still be alive.

Abeke clenched her eyes shut, letting the tears spill down her face. Tarik, the Greencloaks, Uraza, Shane ... It was all too much loss. Too much destruction. Her legs felt numb beneath her. Her entire body shook as she released a rasping sob.

She became aware of new people charging into the chamber. There were shouts, and the clashing of swords, and animal roars—a short scuffle that seemed to end as soon as it had begun. Abeke wiped her eyes and looked up to see three dozen of Zerif’s Greencloaks lining the wall of the cavern, each with swords at the necks of her friends. If there had been a fight, it was a quick one—normal children were no match for trained Greencloaks.

Her eyes found a tall figure wearing a dark tunic, who was watching her with an amused expression.

“Zerif,” she said, releasing her grip on Shane’s body.

“Poor little Abeke,” the man said, stepping close to her. “How far you’ve fallen.” His tunic was torn, revealing the intersecting tattoos of his stolen Great Beasts—including the shape of Uraza. “I remember when I first found you: half-feral, fresh from hunting alone in the savannah, despite your father’s disapproval. You were meek and obedient at the time, but I could sense—deep down—that you had the instincts of a killer.”

Zerif’s lip curled in disgust. “Now look at you. A whimpering child, crying over the corpse of the boy who betrayed you. I had such high hopes for you once. You traded unlimited power for a shabby green cloak.” He shrugged. “Then again, maybe I should thank you. If Kovo had succeeded, then I might not be here right now. Commander of eight Great Beasts—oops, make that nine!” He smiled at Niri, who was still lying defenseless in the corner. “Mulop says hello.” He held out his palm to reveal a tattoo of an octopus.

“If it’s all the same to you,” Rollan said, “I’d rather you just kill us. Anything is better than listening to you gloat.”

“Now, now, Rollan.” Zerif wagged a finger. “Don’t be a sore loser. Besides, I wouldn’t dream of killing you ... yet.” He gave a poisonous smile. He pointed to the boy’s chest, where the mark of Essix was visible beneath a tear in his shirt. “You have something I want. Besides, you Greencloak brats should be alive to witness your defeat firsthand.”

Abeke was pulled to her feet by a Southern Zhonghese girl.

“Abeke, meet Raisha,” Zerif said cheerfully. “I don’t believe you two have been introduced. Raisha was a wonderful assistant when I first began this little undertaking. She helped me gather so many of the Great Beasts. And then, when she herself summoned Gerathon the Serpent, Raisha became an even greater help.”

Raisha’s eyes were dark and expressionless. The girl’s skin was so pale it was almost translucent, and her hair had grown brittle and thin. Abeke tried to pull herself free, but Raisha’s grip was inhumanly strong. And it made sense. There was hardly anything human about her anymore.

“We’ll just hang on to those,” Zerif hissed as Raisha removed Abeke’s bow and quiver, heaving them around her own shoulder.

Abeke and Rollan and the other children were led through the tunnels into the central chamber of the volcano. The half-opened floor of the ruins glowed orange from the streams of fresh magma pouring into the chasm. The frozen tower in the middle of the volcano had begun to thaw in the heat, leaking streams of water that ran down through the cracks and fizzled into clouds of sulfuric steam.

The perimeter of the chamber was lined with Redcloaks, all of whom were also being held at swordpoint by Zerif’s thralls. And in the middle of the crag, perched on the edge of a shard of rock, was the Wyrn.

“Whoa,” Rollan muttered. “That thing’s even uglier up close—unngff!” He grimaced as the Greencloak holding him twisted his arm.

“Ugly?” Zerif said, turning around. “I think it’s rather beautiful.” He placed his hands behind his back, staring at the twitching beast before them. “A creature of raw and infinite power—power that will soon be mine.”

Abeke stared at the Wyrn, which was watching Zerif with its glowing eyes. She had no idea whether the creature could understand what Zerif was saying or if it cared. The Wyrms' expression was inscrutable, but she had the uncanny feeling that it was hungry.

"You really think you can control that thing?" she said.

Zerif gave a wary chuckle. "You ask this of the man who commands two hundred Greencloaks and a battalion of Great Beasts? The man who devastated the fallen King Shane and his ridiculous Redcloaks." He turned back to the waiting Wyrms. "This creature understands the natural order of Erdas—it will submit to one more powerful than itself. And if it resists, I have ways to change its mind." He slid a hand into his haversack and removed a small glass vial. Inside was a tiny black parasite—the same sort of parasite he had used to possess Uraza and the other Great Beasts. The same parasite that controlled his Greencloak army.

Abeke watched him uncork the vial and walk toward the Wyrms. "Easy now," he said, holding the bottle out in front of him. "This won't hurt a bit. ..."

The Wyrms did not recoil or show any signs of struggle. Instead it opened its mouth and gave a sort of chirping shriek. At once, the Greencloaks closest to Zerif marched toward him and grabbed the man by the arms, pinning him to one spot.

"Stop!" Zerif cried out in surprise. "I command you to release me!"

But the Greencloaks held him fast.

Zerif's vial fell to the ground, shattering against the rock. The parasite, now freed, wriggled its way across the stone until it reached the Wyrms.

The huge creature extended one of its oozing black tentacles. With a touch, the parasite's writhing shape melted away—their shining black hides melding into one.

"The parasites ... " Abeke said. "They're part of the Wyrms." She looked around at the blank expressions of the infected Greencloaks and Great Beasts, and thought she understood what was happening. All of them, human and animal alike, were being controlled by the Wyrms—they had a fraction of the Wyrms inside their minds.

The Wyrms shrieked again, and the Greencloaks holding Zerif pulled him toward the creature's open mouth.

“This is not what was supposed to happen!” Zerif screamed, kicking out his legs. “I command you! Let go!” He pulled and thrashed, trying to get free, but the possessed Greencloaks dragged him ever closer.

Abeke watched in horror, finally understanding.

Zerif was never the hunter, she realized. He was the prey.

The Wyrms hissed as its every tentacle descended upon Zerif—plunging right into his flesh.

“Noooooo!” the man screamed. Thin black tendrils snaked beneath his skin, flooding his body with viscous ooze. As this happened, the Wyrms itself became smaller—it was as though the creature was pouring itself into his veins.

Abeke shut her eyes, unable to watch. She wished her hands were free so she could cover her ears to block out Zerif’s cries.

He was evil. He deserved to die. But no living creature deserved this.

A moment later, the screaming stopped. Abeke opened her eyes again to find that the Wyrms was no longer there.

Instead there was only Zerif. The man had been released by the Greencloaks and now lay collapsed on the ground, gasping and wheezing. He slowly pulled himself upright. For a moment Zerif just stood there, teetering under his own weight, his dark eyes shining against the red light.

Then he spoke.

“At lassstttt,” he said in a deep, inhuman voice—one that seemed to reverberate through his every pore, “I am fully borrrnnnn.”

SLAVE AND MASTER

ABEKE STARED AT ZERIF ... OR RATHER THE THING THAT had been Zerif just a moment before.

His eyes were completely dark—shining pools of ooze that swirled and shifted unnaturally. His skin was a dull gray, lined with twitching veins that pulsed and shifted as he breathed. He was not a man anymore. He was a shell.

Abeke wanted to scream, to run away from him. But Raisha held her fast to her spot, her scaly hands digging deep into Abeke's flesh.

"What did you do to Zerif?" Abeke said to the Thing standing before her.

The Thing that had been Zerif tilted its head, an almost curious expression on its ghastly face.

"Whatt I diddd?" Its words were garbled, as though it were still learning how to use its new human mouth. "Whatt I diddd?"

The Thing stretched out its hand toward one of the nearest Redcloaks—a woman named Shadow. Thin black tentacles shot out of its fingertips and wrapped around the woman's neck. Shadow let out a cry as she was lifted clear off the ground. Abeke watched in horror as her skin went from brown to gray to white. Even her dark hair lost its color. It was as though the Thing were sucking the very life from her. With a final twitch, the woman's body went limp.

The Thing jerked its hand and flung Shadow's lifeless body into the gaping chasm behind it.

"Aaahhhh," the Thing sighed as its tentacles withdrew back into its hand. It licked its teeth, which were stained black.

"Zerif, can you hear me?" Abeke shouted, hoping desperately that he could. "You have to resist the Wyrms' power—you have to fight back before it consumes you!"

"Conssssummmme ... " the Thing said. "Yesssssss." It turned its eyes toward something just behind Abeke. It flicked out a tongue, as if tasting the air. A hungry smile spread across its black lips. "Aaaahhhh ... "

Abeke craned her neck to see that the Thing was looking straight at Rollan. The boy stared right back at it, his eyes burning with hate. "Just try it, you ugly sack of—"

Before he could even finish speaking, the Thing had lashed out at Rollan with its tentacles—lifting him clear off the ground.

"No!" Abeke screamed, pulling against Raisha's grip. The girl held her fast.

Rollan screamed, his body contorting in pain. With a desperate roar, he ripped his left arm free of its oozing binds and touched the tattoo on his chest. In a flash, Essix was above him, beating her wings.

"Essix, fly away!" Rollan screamed. "Don't let it take you!"

The gyrfalcon didn't listen. She screeched, swooping straight at Rollan's attacker with her talons spread.

The Thing that had been Zerif was ready. It raised its other hand and quickly caught Essix in its tendrils—holding them both aloft over the gaping pit.

Abeke watched, trembling, as Rollan and his Great Beast screamed in pain—their eyes growing dimmer as the Thing sucked the very life from them. In another minute, they would both be dead. She had to do something!

She scanned the cavern and saw Niri. The girl had been dragged through the tunnels by one of the Greencloaks. Niri had told her that they had to find some sort of bell—but there was no bell—and even if they could find it, it was already too late.

Rollan screamed again. Abeke clenched her eyes shut, feeling the full weight of her failure. She had fought for so long, and for what? Everything she touched turned to destruction. Soon even these ruins would crumble around her.

She opened her eyes and saw that the ground beneath her feet was wet. Thin streams of water cascaded down from the ice into the middle of the ruins. She blinked, peering up the length of the tower.

A small circle of red sky was still visible overhead. The top of the tower glinted against the setting sun as the final bits of ice melted away, revealing an open platform just beneath the stone cornice. Hanging from the ancient rafters was something dark and heavy and made of iron—

A bell.

Abeke stared up at the bell, catching her breath. It had been right in front of them the whole time. Only now it was too late. Even if ringing the bell could somehow help, she was a hundred feet beneath it with only seconds to spare.

“Sssooo sssweet,” the Thing snarled, raising its prey higher over its head. Rollan screamed out again, but his voice sounded fainter, like the last drops of life were being sucked from him. His eyes met Abeke’s. He moved his lips, but no words came out. She knew that she was seeing her friend for the last time. This was the end.

Abeke didn’t have time to consider the odds. She didn’t have time to consider her pain. She had to act. With a desperate cry, she swung her head backward, slamming her skull into Raisha’s jaw. Her captor screamed and staggered backward, as much out of surprise as pain. Abeke spun around and snatched the bow and quiver from Raisha’s shoulder.

Raisha shrieked, trying to grab her lost prisoner. Abeke dove clear of her grasp and rolled across the ground. She sprang to her feet with her bow raised—an arrow pointed directly at the Thing. “Let them go!” she said, her obsidian arrowhead glinting in the magma's warm light. She could feel the others in the chamber watching her, confused, terrified.

The Thing that had been Zerif seemed to pause a moment, keeping Rollan and Essix both hanging in the air, somewhere between life and death. "It would threaten meeee?" It stretched its mouth into a rictus grin.

"The arrow's not for you," Abeke said. And quick as a flash, she raised her bow over her head and let fly.

THE BURNING TIDE

ABEKE'S ARROW ARCED THROUGH THE AIR FOR WHAT felt like an eternity. Finally it sliced up through the high bannister railing and struck the edge of the bell with a light ting!

The sound was barely a whisper, but it echoed through the whole cavern. Everyone around Abeke seemed to be holding their collective breath, waiting to see what would happen next. Even the Thing dropped its prey and was watching the bell.

And when Abeke saw its face, she could tell that it was nervous. “It knowssss this ...” it hissed. “Turningggg ...”

The ringing of the bell finally gave way to another sound—a deep rumbling that shook the entire mountain. The tower in the middle of the ruins trembled and then shifted, slowly rotating on its axis. Rubble and ice fell from the walls of the volcano, crashing to the cavern floor around Abeke. There was a ripping sound as part of the bottom wall broke loose—letting a flood of cold water gush in from the ocean outside.

The biggest change, however, was in the hole. The panels of the cavern floor retreated into the walls of the mountain, revealing a huge chasm that went straight down into the heart of Erdas. Redcloaks and Greencloaks alike scrambled to find stable ground around the perimeter. The Thing had also moved, stranding itself on the front steps of the bell tower, which was now surrounded by yawning darkness on all sides.

The bell tower continued rotating. Its foundation seemed to go down as far as the chasm. Stone buttresses secured the lower tower to the inside walls of the tunnel, and as these moved, giant cracks appeared in the hole. Bubbling magma from deep within the earth spewed out, filling the hole to the very brim. The magma churned and frothed—creating a hissing whirlpool around the spinning tower.

As the tower turned, Abeke felt a sort of queasy shift in the air, like her stomach was folding inside out. The hair on the back of her neck stood on end, and she feared her teeth were going to crack. She wasn't the only one experiencing strange symptoms. Yumaris and the Redcloaks were all clutching their heads in agony, as if they were being ripped apart from the inside. Zerif's Greencloaks had dropped to the ground and were snarling and shrieking and snorting in furious confusion. Some tried to dig into the rock with their hands. Others were climbing the walls. Their spirit animals staggered around, bumping into one another as though confused about where they were.

The only ones unaffected by the tower seemed to be Abeke and the other kids who had lost their spirit animals. They all remained standing, watching the chaos around them.

“What’s happening to my brother?” Dawson Trunswick said, backing away from Worthy. Devin was writhing on the cavern floor, clutching his head. “What did you do?”

Abeke swallowed, shaking her head. “I have no idea.”

There are some moments that seem to be almost infinite.

When Rollan saw Abeke’s arrow soar up toward the sky and strike the bell, he felt as though it was the death knell of his own existence. The Wyrms creature had sucked him dry, and all that was left for him to do was let go and slip into death. But then something strange happened. That bell’s chime continued to ring and ring and ring. It rang so loud that the entire world around him began to shake and blur. He felt a prickling nausea sweep through his entire body and the next thing he knew, he was floating high in the air, staring down at his own body, which lay at the foot of the stone tower.

This is what people must mean by an out-of-body experience, he thought. Rollan flapped his wings, watching as his thin body lurched forward, blinking in confusion, darting its head all around. The sight was so strange that it took Rollan a second to realize that he was flapping his wings.

Rollan opened his mouth to let out a cry, but all that came was a raspy squawk! The boy on the ground darted his head up and stared at Rollan—looking truly bewildered.

And that's when the true realization came over him. He wasn't Rollan from Concorba. He was a bird. And not just any bird ... He was Essix ... or rather, his mind was inside Essix's body.

Rollan let out another bewildered squawk and rose up higher into the air.

All he could think to do was fly higher and higher until he burst from the mouth of the volcano. He stretched out his wings and let the cold air beat against his face.

For the first time in his life, he felt truly free.

Deep underground, on the other side of Erdas, Meilin felt a rumbling beneath her as the snare in the middle of the fallen city began to turn once more. She stumbled to one side and in the space of a shuddering heartbeat, she found herself staring out from a different pair of eyes—dark, animal eyes pressed into the muzzle of a soft, round face. She stared at her paws, black fur stained red with blood from the battle against the Wyrms.

She blinked, looking out at the host of wounded Sadrean soldiers in the Fallen City. Every face she saw filled her with an aching pang. She felt an overwhelming desire to care for every person suffering—to make each of them whole again.

She padded onto the battlefield and began to help.

For Conor, it was like waking from a terrible dream. Dreams were something Conor was good at—and more than once he had experienced dreams that showed him his own future. But all of those were nothing compared to this. He had been trapped inside his own body for so long, unable to fight the power of the parasite.

But then he opened his eyes and knew—knew instantly—that something had shifted in Erdas. The fever was gone. The wriggling parasite no longer burrowing into his flesh. The Wyrms' voice no longer hissing in his mind.

The shores of the Sulfur Sea had drawn back, as if pulled away from the city by some invisible force. Conor drew himself up and limped over to a pool of dark water left in the sand. He bowed his head, lapping at the pool with his pink tongue. Then he stood upright and stared into his reflection. Blue eyes as deep as the sky. It was the face of Briggan.

Abeke stared at the cavern, which was now echoing with the sounds of hundreds of confused Greencloaks and their even more confused spirit animals. But as she watched them, she began to see how they were behaving—the humans acting like beasts, and the beasts like humans.

Everyone except Abeke and the other children who had lost their spirit animals.

“The snare,” she said. “It’s somehow reversed the connection between humans and their animal companions.”

The words sounded ludicrous coming out of her mouth, but her eyes told a different story. She stared up at the tower, which was still turning, though more slowly now. The swirling lava bubbled and hissed around it, creating a fiery whirlpool. “Look at the tides!” called the girl Cordalles, pointing at a gaping hole in the rock.

Abeke looked outside and saw that the ocean was churning, swelling up into huge waves that swirled in the same direction as the lava. Even the spilled water from the icy tower was cutting an arc across the ground, moving on its own.

Abeke looked back toward the tower—at the Thing that was Zerif. The figure remained standing but was staring around at the cavern with a confused expression, inching back from the swirling lava at his feet. And when Abeke saw his eyes, she caught a slight flash of hazel. The same eyes she had first seen in her village in Nilo.

“Zerif!” she shouted. Abeke still had her bow and quiver. She wanted to shoot every arrow she had at the man—but one look at his face and she knew that he was just as much a victim of the Wyrms as anyone. She didn’t need revenge. She needed to stop the Wyrms. “Zerif!” she called more loudly.

The man fixed his bloodshot gaze on her. “What ... what have you done to me?” he said, his voice shaking. “What’s happening?”

“There’s no time to explain,” Abeke said, racing to the edge of the lava pool. There was a groaning crunch as a huge crack ran up the length of the tower, which had begun to slow its rotation. The strain of Erdas was too much for the snare. “The bell has put you in control of the Wyrms,” she said. “You have one chance to stop it.”

“Stop it ... ?” he said blankly. Zerif glanced down at his gray hands, which were still pulsing with the black veins of the Wyrms.

Cracks spread up the volcano walls, raining down rubble. Abeke shielded her face as huge chunks of stone fell around her.

“The tower won’t last much longer!” she screamed. “Zerif, please!” The idea that she was pleading with Zerif of all people to stop the Wyrms was beyond comprehension. But she had no choice.

What was a hero but someone who had chosen one time to do the right thing? Shane had saved Abeke from Uraza. Kovo had built the snare.

Could Zerif kill the Wyrms?

“I can’t force you to do anything,” she said. “Either you kill the Wyrms now, or you will spend the rest of your life enslaved to it.”

The stone tower cracked in half, falling into the molten pool, which swallowed it whole. The whirling lava stopped churning and started to drain back into the earth. Abeke could feel a static prickle in the air as Erdas pushed back against the turning. The swirls of water cutting across the stone floor exploded into a scatter of droplets.

“There’s no time!” Abeke screamed.

All around her, the Greencloaks and spirit animals were calming down—their minds returning to their rightful bodies. The Redcloaks had begun to stir. Zerif staggered to one side, doubling over in pain. When he looked up at her again, one of his eyes had turned to black. “Ssstopp meeeee?” he hissed in the voice of the Wyrms.

“Fight back, Zerif!” Abeke cried.

Zerif planted a hand against the rumbling tower, the other pressed to his temple. “Get out of my head!” he roared. His one human eye was clenched shut, streaming tears. She could see him fighting the Wyrms for control.

“Do it!” she begged.

Zerif screamed like a man being torn in two. With a desperate cry, he pushed himself away from the tower and staggered toward the lava, leaping from the edge of the rock—

The moment his feet left the ground, his body contorted and spun around. The Wyrms took control of his body once more. Black tendrils shot outward, flailing in the air as it plummeted down into the chasm and the churning lava.

Abeke scrambled to the edge and watched as the Thing that was Zerif disappeared beneath the fiery surface of the magma.

She sat back, breathing hard. Abeke stared at the lava, still terrified that the creature might somehow pull itself free. That it had somehow survived.

But then she heard the voices behind her. Not just one, not just a dozen, but hundreds of voices. Men and women, muttering to one another in bewildered tones. Abeke turned around to see Greencloaks, many of them kneeling on the floor of the cavern, some in tears. Those who could walk had rushed to the sides of the Redcloaks to help them. The Greencloaks' faces were battered and bleeding from the fight, but their eyes—their eyes showed the clear glint of humanity.

The Wyrn was truly gone.

HUNTER AND PREY

ABEKE TIGHTENED HER HAND AROUND THE GRIP OF her bow. It was a crude weapon—she had carved it from the soft limb of a baobab tree. Usually, baobab would be terrible for bows, with not enough tension in the string. But this baobab, like every tree in Erdas, was changed now, its roots infused with the power of the revived Evertree. She could feel life coursing through the pores of the bow's grain, connecting with her hand, her spirit.

Abeke ducked down, hearing a rustling in the bushes below. She was in the hot jungles of Stetriol. Sweat beaded her brow. The jungle floor was thick with vines and brush, and so she had been forced to make her way through the canopy of trees, carefully climbing from limb to limb. She had been living like this for weeks, barely eating or sleeping.

She was a hunter. And she would have her prey.

Below her, the jungle wildlife ticked and croaked—oblivious to her presence. It had been months since the destruction of the Wyrn at the hands of Kovo's ancient snare. For one brief moment, all of Erdas had been transformed. Spirit bonds across the world were reversed. Seas had drawn back from the shores. Storms had raged in the sky. The Wyrn, housed inside Zerif's body, had been plunged into the burning whirlpool in the center of Erdas. And then, just like that, everything had returned to normal.

But of course, everything wasn't normal. The Wyrms had left one final gift to the world it tried to destroy. The power that fueled the Wyrms was washed into the tides. Every spring began to bubble with the same power that fueled the bond between humans and beasts. Every blade of grass and flower and tree became a smaller version of the Evertree.

The world was connected in new ways. Abeke didn't know what this meant for Erdas. She hoped it was good.

But amid that new life, there was still pain.

Abeke recalled the moments after the death of the Wyrms. A stillness had settled over the molten ruins in the Frozen Sea as the humans and beasts who had been possessed by the Wyrms' parasites recovered—blinking as if waking from a slumberless dream.

Abeke could still hear the haunting wails of grief that rang out inside the volcano as the Greencloaks regained their minds and recalled the horrific things they had done while under Zerif's control.

They were free of Zerif perhaps, but they would forever be captive to their own guilt.

Mulop, again restored to Niri, had been able to speak with Kovo underground, and arranged a reunion. Abeke and Rollan managed to get passage to Eura, where they met Conor and Meilin, who had emerged safely from the tunnels of Sadre. Takoda was with them, too, his hand intertwined with a pale girl named Xanthe's.

For the first time in centuries, the Sadreans and the people of Erdas met and communed with one another. This was important, because it would take every living soul to repair the damage Zerif and the Wyrms had done. Every port Abeke and Rollan passed, they saw firsthand the destruction that the Greencloaks had wrought.

When Abeke finally saw Conor and Briggan waiting for them at the shore, she leaped clear off the edge of her ship onto the decks and sprinted toward him at a full run.

Conor, like the other Greencloaks, had recovered from his parasite infection. But just like them, he was haunted by his actions while under the Wyrms' control. All traces of the youthful shepherd had disappeared, leaving him looking older, more wary. And just like the Greencloaks, he now had a thin, colorless scar on his forehead, only visible in certain light.

Rollan and Meilin were surprisingly awkward upon seeing each other again. Rollan, usually quick with a joke, said almost nothing, while Meilin rambled on with uncharacteristic speed. Neither made eye contact, or even tried to approach the other. It wasn't until Jhi padded next to Meilin and shoved her straight into Rollan—forcing them into an accidental hug—that things began to turn back to normal.

They were a family restored—all of them together once more.

All but one.

Beyond the safety of her friends, Abeke had one all-consuming concern: What had happened to the Great Beasts that had been bonded with Zerif?

This was a question no one could answer. Not even Mulop, with his powers, had been able to sense Uraza's presence. Some people speculated the Great Beasts had died when Zerif hurled himself into the lava. Others said that they had been released into the burning currents beneath Erdas and spread to a thousand shores.

But soon enough, reports began to arrive of Great Beasts being spotted all across the world.

A gallant elk emerged from the mists of Northern Amaya one morning, appearing to a tribe of nomadic hunters. The elk walked unworriedly through their encampment as the hunters gaped on, until it had reached their young healer.

In Southern Zhong, a crowded marketplace erupted into chaos one steamy evening as an enormous elephant appeared from the jungle, wearing silks across its back and bracelets on its tusks. A small grinning girl sat astride it, waving to the crowd.

In Eura, a band of pirates was arrested when their ship crashed near a port city. They claimed an eagle had ripped their sails to shreds just as they tried to seize a merchant vessel. After leaving a steaming present on the hull of their pirate ship, it landed on the arm of a girl with a dignified squawk.

One by one, every Great Beast reappeared—

Every beast but one.

Abeke didn't know why Uraza remained hidden. Soon after the death of the Wyrn, the spot on her arm where Uraza's tattoo would be began to tingle, which she took as proof that Uraza was out there somewhere. But for some reason, the Great Leopard had not tried to find her.

Then again, maybe Abeke already knew why. Every night as she went to sleep, her dreams returned to the horror of a possessed Uraza killing Shane—her sharp teeth locked around his lifeless body. And then she felt the wrenching pain of letting fly her own arrow straight into her spirit animal's side.

At first, when Abeke had told her friends that she needed to leave in search of Uraza, they had tried to come with her. But she explained that she needed to do this alone. For six months, the huntress had kept her ear to the ground, searching for rumors of the great Uraza. The rumors had taken her to nearly every continent, but everywhere she went, she found nothing.

Now, at last, her search had brought her to Stetriol. The last place on Erdas. The jungles here were dangerous. Beasts that had once been enslaved by the Bile lurked in the untamed wilds—their anger at humans meant that more than a few of them would be happy to eat her if she wasn't careful. But she couldn't turn back. She knew she was close. She had to be close.

Her arm seemed to sense the spirit bond between her and Uraza. The tingling sensation grew, until she could almost feel it vibrating as she came closer to her prey. Abeke wanted to call out, to let Uraza know she was there, but she was afraid to frighten her off.

There was a rustling in the jungle beneath her. Abeke turned around and saw something watching her from the shadows. Something with flashing purple eyes. The eyes held her gaze for a moment, and then a sleek golden leopard poured out from between the leaves.

Not since that first day in Okaihee had the sight of her spirit animal filled Abeke with such unrestrained joy. She nearly burst into tears right there.

Instead, Abeke just grinned, leaping down from the trees.

Uraza stepped forward, watching her tentatively. Abeke had expected the leopard to be angry with her, perhaps even fearful. Instead, she was surprised to see shame in Uraza's violet eyes.

Abeke extended a slow, shaking hand outward. Just as slowly, the leopard brought her face forward—and nuzzled into her palm.

With that touch, everything was right again. Joy flooded through Abeke like rain on a parched savannah. Suddenly she was crying, harder than she had let herself cry in a long while.

Apologies would come with time. Apologies and forgiveness. For now, Abeke's body was electric with relief. Unsure what to do with this sudden rush of energy, she whooped into the trees.

Uraza purred heavily, slinking away. Her eyes flashed with a playful gleam. Abeke suspected that her spirit animal had some ideas for how to celebrate their reunion. In seconds, the leopard had disappeared into the brush.

Abeke's face split into a smile as she followed Uraza into the trees.

The hunt was on.

Jonathan Auxier writes strange stories for strange children—including Peter Nimble and His Fantastic Eyes, The Night Gardener, and Sophie Quire and the Last Storyguard. Raised in Canada, Jonathan now lives in Pittsburgh with his wife and family.

You've read the book—now join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Have your ebook ready and enter the code to unlock huge rewards!

N7DDG7FRTJ

Enter your code to unlock huge rewards:
N7DDG7FRTJ

Design your own
spirit animal!

Join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!
Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SPIRIT ANIMALS

SPECIAL EDITIONS

Discover the Hidden Tales of Erdas!

There's more to explore in the Spirit Animals world! These Special Editions reveal the secrets of Erdas in ways you never saw coming...

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SCHOLASTIC and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

SPIRIT ANIMALS

Discover Your Spirit Animal!

Read the Books. Play the Game.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals

SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and ASSOCIATED LOGOS ARE TRADEMARKS AND/OR REGISTERED TRADEMARKS OF SCHOLASTIC INC. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

Some houses are more than haunted...
THEY'RE HUNGRY.

Can five kids make it out of Shadow House alive
or will they be trapped forever?

DOWNLOAD THE APP, IF YOU DARE!

Read the ghost story, then live
your own haunting in the app!

SCHOLASTIC and associated logos
are trademarks and/or registered
trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

 SCHOLASTIC
scholastic.com/ShadowHouse

SHAJ0010052

From the publisher of The 39 Clues™ and Spirit Animals™

TOMBQUEST

The tombs are opening . . .

The magic of Egypt has come alive. Mummies are waking. New York is overrun with scorpions. And worst of all, five evil ancients called the Death Walkers have broken free. It's up to one boy to stop them . . . before the Afterlife claims us all.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/TombQuest

TOMBQUEST

SCHOLASTIC™, THE 39 CLUES™, SPIRIT ANIMALS™ and TombQuest are trademarks and the logo is a trademark of Scholastic.

THE STUNNING ADVENTURE
FROM BESTSELLING AUTHOR
RICK RIORDAN

Available in print and
eBook editions

scholastic.com/the39clues

39CLUESe

SCHOLASTIC, THE 39 CLUES, and associated logos are trademarks and registered trademarks of Scholastic.

INFINITY RING™

FIX THE PAST. SAVE THE FUTURE.

Available in print and eBook
editions.

SCHOLASTIC.COM/INFINITYRING

 SCHOLASTIC

© 2015 Scholastic Teaching Resources. All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior written permission of Scholastic Teaching Resources.

IRINGe

Copyright © 2016 by Scholastic Inc.

All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920. SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

The publisher does not have any control over and does not assume any responsibility for author or third-party websites or their content.

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2016940992

ISBN 978-0-545-83214-4

First edition, September 2016

Cover illustration by Angelo Rinaldi

Cover design by Charice Silverman & Rocco Melillo

Art Direction by Keirsten Geise

Metal frame: © caesart/Shutterstock

Wood texture: © CG Textures

e-ISBN 978-0-545-83215-1

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereafter invented, without the express written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

THE NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING SERIES

FALL of the BEASTS

A SPIRIT ANIMALS

BOOK 5

HEART OF THE LAND

READ
THE BOOK.
UNLOCK
THE GAME.

SARAH PRINEAS

The world is in peril.

An ancient evil is rising from beneath Erdas, and we need YOU to help stop it.

Claim your spirit animal and join the adventure now:

1. Go to scholastic.com/spiritanimals.
2. Log in to create your character and choose your own spirit animal.
3. Have your book ready and enter the code below to unlock the adventure.

Your code: NFWTMMJD4X

By the Four Fallen,
The Greencloaks

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

We are all of Erdas, united.

FALL of the BEASTS
SPIRIT
ANIMAS™
HEART OF THE LAND

Sarah Prineas

SCHOLASTIC INC.

To all the Greencloak readers and your spirit animal companions.

—S.P.

Contents

Gila Monster Symbol

Greencloak Letter

Quote Page

Title Page

Map

Dedication

1: PRINCESS SONG

2: THE CITADEL

3: A MESSAGE

4: THE EMPEROR

5: BETRAYAL

6: VENOM

7: ANKA

8: SECRETS REVEALED

9: WIKAM THE JUST

10: THE TORCH

11: NIGHTMARES

12: PREY

13: AMBUSH

14: HERO

15: GLUE

16: SNEAK ATTACK

17: HIGHNESS

18: THE WAVE

19: STORM

20: HEART OF THE LAND

21: THE HAMMER

22: BLOOD AND ARROWS

23: BLOOD AND AX BLADES

24: BLOOD AND AMULET

25: REDCLOAKS

26: WORTHY

About the Author

Online Game Code

Sneak Peek

Spirit Animals Game

Copyright

PRINCESS SONG

PRINCESS SONG, DAUGHTER OF THE EMPEROR OF ZHONG, paced her chamber in the Council Citadel. Soon the leaders of the four main governments of Erdas, plus Stetriol, would meet for the first time since they'd gone into hiding during the turmoils of the Devourer's invasions and the Wyrn's attack.

A certain princess had not been invited to this meeting.

She was not happy about it.

Song remembered to make her steps small and dainty, not the sweeping strides she felt like taking. From the outside, she knew she looked serene, her black hair braided and held in place with jewel-tipped pins, her robe exquisitely embroidered in the colors of deep ocean green and rich emerald. Inside, her heart fluttered. She wanted to be more than decorative. She was determined to be a princess in deed and not just in name.

From the hallway came the sound of heavy footsteps, a guard speaking, and then the heavy door of Song's chamber swung open. The Emperor of Zhong entered, followed by two of his Oathbound guards, both wearing plain black uniforms with brass wrist protectors and brass neck-collars that kept their chins held high. The blank-faced Oathbound took up their stations on either side of the door.

The emperor was a big man dressed in ceremonial armor made of lacquered and gilded bamboo. It clattered when he walked. He wore his hair long in a warrior's braid, even though, Song knew, he hadn't fought in the war against the Devourer. He had been in hiding, guarded by his loyal Oathbound, just as the Queen of Eura, the Prime Minister of Amaya, and the High Chieftain of Nilo had been. Now that the danger had passed, they all had taken up their old positions again, ruling the world.

"Daughter," the emperor said in a deep, commanding voice.

Song lowered her eyes, folded her hands gracefully together, and bowed low, showing deep respect. "Father," she said softly.

As she straightened, her father's sharp eyes studied her, looking for any fault, any blemish. Song held herself still under his gaze. His eyes narrowed as he saw the emerald and ocean of her embroidered robe—green was not a favored color at the moment. "I understand you wished to speak with me," he said.

Song bowed again. "Yes, honored Father. With your permission, I would like to attend the meeting of the Council tomorrow."

"The meeting is for the leaders of Erdas," he responded.

Song clenched her hands together, then forced herself to relax. She couldn't let him see how much this meant to her. "Please, Father," she begged.

The emperor observed her again for a long, judging moment. His mouth settled into a strict line, and Song knew what his answer would be before he spoke. "No," he said. No further explanation, no justification.

"But—" Song blurted.

Her father raised a hand, silencing her. "The meeting is no place for a dutiful daughter."

"I will not speak," Song promised. "I will only be an observer."

His face stayed as still as if it had been carved out of jade. Song knew that look. He was angry.

"It will be good," she said quietly, "if the other leaders of Erdas can see that your daughter survived the recent conflicts. Thanks to your care and foresight." She glanced quickly at the guards who flanked the door. "And the loyalty of the Oathbound."

The straight line of his mouth relaxed. Slowly the emperor nodded. "Very well. But you will remain silent and standing behind my chair."

His gaze flicked over her again. “And you will wear a robe of a more suitable color.”

Song lowered her eyes so he would not see the sudden wave of fury that had risen in her. Always he treated her this way, as if she were an object—a beautiful doll—but not his living, breathing daughter. Carefully she bowed. “It will be as you say, Father.”

As the emperor turned and left the room, Song held her bow until she heard the Oathbound guards close the door behind him. Then she straightened. If she could have seen her face in a mirror, she would have noticed that her mouth was set in the same straight line as her father’s.

She would attend the meeting, but not as mere observer. She would not stay silent. The Council—and her father—would hear what she had to say.

THE CITADEL

“I DON’T LIKE THE LOOK OF THIS PLACE,” ROLLAN SAID, gazing up at the Council Citadel. It was a massive castle built of dark-gray stone, quarried from the Petral Mountains, which loomed behind it like a bank of storm clouds.

From the road where she stood with Rollan, Meilin, and Conor, Abeke could see that the Citadel consisted of a huge central tower; jutting out from it were four “wings,” each built in the style of one of the four main lands of Erdas. The brightly colored flags of Nilo, Zhong, Eura, and Amaya hung from a wide gateway in the main tower, but they couldn’t hide the fact that half the Citadel’s windows were broken. Moss encrusted the slate roofs, and several of the walls looked ready to buckle under their own weight.

To Abeke, the Citadel looked like what it was: an important building that had been neglected for a long time.

Meilin’s nose wrinkled. “It is a little run-down, isn’t it?” She stood next to Rollan. Jhi was a furry black-and-white boulder at Meilin’s other side.

“More than a little,” Abeke said. She pointed at the part of the Citadel that had been built in the blocky style of a Niloan fortress. “Do you see the holes in the roof there? If it rains, anybody sleeping in those rooms will wake up in a wet bed.” She glanced over her shoulder at Conor, who stood half a pace behind the other three.

Abeke waited for him to add something, to make a comment about the Council Citadel. But he did not speak. The fight against the Wyrms had ended months ago, but it was clear to her that Conor was still gripped by the horror of what the Wyrms' parasite had done to him. The Wyrms had affected many of the Greencloaks. She and Uraza had been marked by it, too, but somehow it had been worse for Conor. At least he had the strong, steadfast support of Briggan, who never left his side.

Just as she had Uraza. Abeke felt the leopard sitting close beside her—closer than usual, trying to reassure her that their bond held, after it had been so cruelly ripped apart by Zerif. Uraza's ears were pricked, and her long, fluffy tail curled around Abeke's ankles. Abeke smiled at Conor, trying to get a smile from him in response.

Conor looked away, rubbing his forehead as if it ached. Maybe it does, Abeke thought. The Wyrms' hideous black spiral had pulsed on Conor's brow for many days. The mark was faded now, but Abeke knew better than any of them that the horrors of the Wyrms could not be easily forgotten. If Conor needed her, she vowed to herself, she would be there for him.

"We'd better go inside," Meilin said. "We don't want to be late."

"We already are late," Rollan added. Overhead, Essix flew in a wide circle, a distant shape against a cloudy gray sky.

"Olvan and Lenori and the rest of the Greencloak contingent must be here already," Abeke said.

"And we would've been on time," Rollan put in, "if a certain black-and-white bear hadn't stuffed herself with an entire forest of bamboo and then needed three days to recover."

"It's not Jhi's fault her favorite food just happened to be growing beside that inn," Meilin protested.

When they'd received the summons from Olvan, Meilin and Rollan had been traveling together to see Jano Rion, the city where Meilin had grown up. Conor, Abeke knew, had been with his family near Trunswick. She hoped they had taken good care of him, but she knew the simple shepherds couldn't really understand everything that had happened to him. After re-bonding with Uraza in Stetriol, Abeke had gone to see Kirat and Cabaro in Nilo.

She had missed her friends, but it had been good to have a rest—and to go out with Uraza and her bow and a quiver of obsidian-tipped arrows, hunting for gazelle. She and Uraza had been about to travel farther south to visit her family in Okaihee when the summons had arrived. As eager as she'd been to see her friends again, she had enjoyed a little time without the excitement and worry that came with being a Greencloak. And not just any Greencloak—one of the Four Heroes of Erdas.

Obeying Olvan's summons, the four of them had met up at Greenhaven, but they had arrived too late to travel with the rest of the Greencloaks. After hurrying to cross Eura, they had taken a coach that left them a mile down the road from their destination, to give their animals some time to stretch their legs (or wings, in Essix's case) before they were cooped up in the Citadel.

The Four Heroes of Erdas, along with Briggan, Jhi, Uraza, and Essix overhead, headed for the Citadel's main gate, a stone arch with a raised portcullis that looked like a row of iron teeth. The flags of the four lands fluttered in the breeze.

"No Greencloak flag," Meilin observed.

Abeke wasn't sure what to think of that.

Five guards dressed all in black, armored with brass vambraces and collars, watched as the four kids approached. All the guards wore swords sheathed at their hips, but only one of them was Marked, a big woman with pale blond hair cut very short. Around her upper arm was coiled a slim brown snake. As the leader of the guards, she held up a hand, stopping them. The snake twined down her arm and threaded itself through her fingers. Its tongue flickered, tasting the air.

Conor stepped up beside Abeke. "I know that kind of snake," he whispered to her. "It's from Eura, a stone viper."

"Is it dangerous?" Abeke asked.

Conor nodded. "It's not often seen. It hides under rocks, but its bite is deadly poisonous. Its venom turns its victims into stone, and they can only be saved by an antidote."

"Halt," ordered the Marked woman. "I'm Brunhild the Merry." The woman's already sour face deepened into a frown. Abeke wondered if perhaps "merry" was a family name. This person certainly didn't look very happy to see them. “I demand that you state your business,” Brunhild barked.

Meilin pointed at her green cloak, then at Jhi. “These make our business pretty obvious, don’t you think? We’re here as part of the Greencloak contingent.”

“The Greencloaks arrived yesterday,” the woman named Brunhild said. Her voice sounded slithery, almost like a snake’s. “They didn’t say anything about a bunch of kids joining them. This is a gathering of the leaders of Erdas. You have no standing here.”

“Excuse me?” Rollan said, folding his arms. “We’re not just a bunch of kids. We saved the world.”

“Twice,” Abeke said.

“Heroes of Erdas,” Rollan added. “Maybe you’ve heard of us?”

“You think I’ve heard of four sniveling brats?” the guard sneered.

“I’m not a brat,” Rollan said. He glanced aside at Abeke. “Are you a brat?”

“No,” Abeke answered. “And I don’t snivel, either.” She had a bad feeling about this. Clearly Uraza did, too; she felt the leopard grow tense, ready to pounce. She laid a hand on her spirit animal’s head, steadying her.

Meilin sighed loudly. “Enough. We don’t want a fight.” Jhi lumbered to her side and sat, as immovable as a wall. “The Greencloak leader, Olvan, summoned us. Whether he left word about us or not, we’re supposed to be here.”

“I don’t think so,” snapped Brunhild the Merry. She put a hand to her sword and took a swaggering step forward. “You may not enter. Now leave here, Greencloaks.” She hissed the last word as if it were a curse.

Beside Conor, Briggan emitted a low, rumbling growl. The thick ruff of fur at his neck bristled.

In response, the guard held out her hand; the snake that was coiled around her wrist reared back as if ready to strike. Abeke saw the glint of poison dripping from its retractable fangs.

Conor’s hand was on his ax. Meilin drew her own sword and took up a fighting stance. Abeke fixed her eyes on the snake, ready to use her bow to block its strike if it came for any of them.

“Don’t let them enter the Citadel!” Brunhild the Merry ordered. The other four guards surged forward, drawing their swords.

“No blood!” Meilin warned as Abeke nocked an arrow. Abeke nodded, understanding. They were not going to gain entrance to the Citadel by wounding or killing its guards. They had been invited; they shouldn’t have to invade!

With a yell, one of the guards chopped a sword at Meilin, who coolly sidestepped it and nodded for Briggan and Conor to deal with him. Three more guards converged on her. Abeke saw Meilin smile slightly, and then suddenly she laughed and tossed her sword straight up into the air. As it spun upward, flashing in the light, Meilin elbowed one of the charging guards in the head, whirled to duck a sword thrust and swept the legs from a second guard, and then, as her sword reached the top of its arc and began to fall, she used a palm-strike to the chest to take out the third guard. The sword fell. As it reached her, Meilin snatched it out of the air by the hilt and waved its point threateningly over the three guards who writhed in pain at her feet.

Meanwhile Briggan had his powerful jaws clenched around the leg of a fourth guard—not enough to draw blood, but enough to make her screech and try to wriggle away. And Uraza had flattened Brunhild the Merry with one leap. The leopard had her front paws on the woman’s chest, so she couldn’t get up. Brunhild’s stone viper was nowhere to be seen.

Abeke wanted to laugh. The entire fight had taken less than ten seconds, and she hadn’t had to fire a single arrow.

“Look out!” she heard Rollan shout, and turned to see ten more black-clad figures armed with swords and spears pour out of a guard house next to the Citadel gate.

Uraza snarled, and Abeke drew back her bowstring. There was going to be blood after all.

Abeke was about to let an arrow fly when she heard a high voice call, “Stop!” She saw a swirl of green silk as a black-haired girl strode from the gateway and stepped between the Citadel guards and the four Greencloaks and their spirit animals. She was tiny, no taller than a ten-year-old child, but her face was very beautiful and she looked their own age, or maybe a little older. When she spoke, her voice was commanding. “Stand down,” she ordered the guards. To Abeke’s astonishment, they immediately sheathed their swords and grounded their spears. The guards the Greencloaks had defeated scrambled away, picking up the weapons they’d dropped during the fight.

Brunhild the Merry climbed to her feet, then stepped back and bowed her head. There was still no sign of her stone viper. “Your Highness,” she murmured.

The girl nodded briskly, then turned to face the four Greencloaks. For a moment Abeke caught a glimpse of something in the girl’s face besides beauty—power, maybe, and determination or anger—and then whatever it was became hidden as the girl placed her tiny feet together, primly folded her hands, and nodded gracefully.

“I, Princess Song, daughter of the Emperor of Zhong, welcome you. I beg you to forgive these guards. They are Oathbound, and thus are sworn to protect the leaders of the four lands, and so they acted hastily, seeking to bar you from the Citadel.”

Abeke lowered her bow. She, Conor, and Rollan all looked at Meilin, hoping she would respond. Not because she was from Zhong, like Princess Song, but because she had been trained in etiquette and knew best what to say in situations like this.

Meilin straightened and sheathed her sword. Looking every inch the daughter of a high-ranking Zhongese general, she nodded to the princess. “They did act too fast. As you saw, we had no trouble with the first five guards. We could have easily taken the rest of them, too.”

Abeke heard Brunhild the Merry give a derisive snort.

“It may be so,” Princess Song said. She turned a frowning gaze on the guards. “These are the Heroes of Erdas,” she explained to them. “They are the young Greencloaks who so bravely fought the Devourer and helped save us all from the Wyrms. Brunhild, you and the other Oathbound were in hiding with the leaders, so you did not witness their acts of bravery. You should do these young people honor.”

Reluctantly the Oathbound guards bowed.

“Now,” Princess Song added, “I will bring the young Greencloaks to their chambers.” She turned to lead the way into the Citadel.

But before they could follow, Brunhild raised her hand, stopped them. “A moment, Your Highness,” she interrupted. “Perhaps you forget the rules of this place.” Her mouth stretched into an ugly, particularly un-merry smile. “The Greencloaks cannot bring their spirit animals inside.”

“What?” Abeke asked, not understanding. They couldn’t exactly leave their spirit animals outside, while they went in.

Brunhild folded her brawny arms across her chest; her snake, which had remained hidden during the fight, slithered onto her shoulder, where it rested its slim head, watching them with slitted red eyes. “To be admitted to the Citadel, you Greencloaks must put your animals into their passive states.”

“Yours isn’t,” Meilin argued.

“Because I am a loyal Oathbound, a protector of the leaders of Erdas,” Brunhild said smugly. “You are Greencloaks. Clearly not to be trusted, since you attacked us just now without provocation.”

That was an outright lie! The Oathbound had attacked them first. Abeke opened her mouth to protest, but fell silent when Meilin shook her head and drew the three of them aside for a quiet word. “I hate to say this,” Meilin whispered as they put their heads together, “but they’re not entirely wrong.”

“No, they’re only completely wrong,” Rollan put in, his voice low and angry.

“Yes, Brunhild was lying about us attacking the guards,” Meilin said, “but they do have a reason not to trust us.”

Abeke saw Conor reach up to rub his forehead, where the mark of the Wurm had been, and she knew what this meant.

“Oh,” Abeke breathed. “It’s because so many of the Greencloaks were taken by the parasites and forced to serve the Wurm.”

Meilin nodded reluctantly. “A lot happened when Zerif had his own little personal army of Greencloaks. We may be mistrusted by some people who don’t know the full story.” She cast an apologetic glance at Conor, who wouldn’t meet her eyes. “I think we’ll have to do as they say.”

“I don’t like it,” Rollan said flatly. As if responding to his anger, Essix dove, swooped low over their heads, then arced back into the cloudy sky.

“I don’t like it, either,” Meilin shot back. “But I don’t think we have any choice.”

Slowly, the four of them straightened. Meilin reached up to ruffle the black fur behind Jhi’s ears. Without speaking, she held out her arm. She would never order the panda to take the passive state, not after their history together, but she would hope for the best. Jhi sighed deeply and then disappeared, reappearing as a black-and-white tattoo on Meilin’s forearm. “As you see,” Meilin said to Princess Song and the Oathbound guards. “We will abide by the Citadel rules.”

“You do us great honor,” Princess Song said softly.

Conor had already called Briggan into the passive state. Seeing as she had no choice, Abeke stroked a finger over the fine fur of Uraza’s nose and then gave the leopard a nod. Uraza disappeared with a flash.

Rollan stood with his hands on his hips, gazing up at the sky. His green cloak was more ragged and faded than the newer cloaks the rest of them wore. It fluttered in the breeze. Essix circled high above, riding that breeze, showing no sign of descending again.

“Well?” Meilin asked him.

“She has no intention of coming down here,” Rollan said, not taking his eyes from the bird.

Meilin rolled her eyes, then nodded at Abeke and Conor. “You two had better go in and get settled. We’ll wait out here until Essix is feeling more cooperative.”

“It could be a while,” Rollan put in.

“Then it’s a good thing I’m so patient,” Meilin replied.

“You, patient?” Abeke heard Rollan say, and then Meilin said something in response that made him laugh.

Abeke followed Princess Song and Brunhild through the huge gate of the Citadel; Conor trailed behind her, looking around with wide eyes. The flags of the four regions flapped overhead, and the sharp iron teeth of the portcullis seemed about to take a bite of them. Abeke shivered, already missing the reassurance of having Uraza at her side, and hurried to keep up. The princess was tiny, but she walked swiftly, sweepingly, as she led them up a set of broad stairs to the main double doors of the Citadel's central chamber.

"You are Abeke, are you not?" Princess Song asked, falling into step beside her. At Abeke's nod, Song glanced back at Conor, who lingered behind them. "I hope you can answer my question. I have heard that one of you—Conor—was taken by the Wym. Is this so?"

Abeke glanced quickly back. Conor's face was blank, but he was only a step behind; he must have heard the princess's question.

"By one of the Wym's parasites," Abeke corrected.

"I'm sorry to have to ask this," Princess Song went on, "but he served your enemy. Are you certain that you can trust him?"

Abeke raised her voice, to be sure Conor would hear her next words. "He served the Wym against his will, and he is free of it now. He is just as trustworthy as the rest of us."

"That's not saying much," blond Brunhild put in, casting a suspicious glare over Conor.

Abeke felt her temper rise at the guard's remark, but she took a deep breath to calm herself. They'd had one fight at the gate; she couldn't start another one already.

They entered a huge entrance hall hung with curtains of cobwebs and dust. Princess Song flagged down a passing man dressed in plain brown. "This servant will direct Conor to his rooms in the Euran part of the Citadel, and I will bring you to your rooms in the Niloan wing, Abeke."

The brown-clad servant bowed and gestured toward a passage leading away. Conor started toward him.

"Wait," Abeke said abruptly, and Conor paused, looking over his shoulder at her with raised eyebrows. "Do you have separate rooms for all four of us?" she asked the princess.

"Of course," Song answered. "There is a place for Rollan in the Amayan wing, and I've requested that Meilin be given rooms next to mine in the Zhongese wing."

Abeke shook her head. Conor seemed all right to her at the moment, but he shouldn't be left alone. With Briggan forced into the passive state, Conor needed his friends around him. So did she, for that matter. "We will share a room," she said firmly.

Princess Song blinked. “All four of you?”

Conor rejoined them. “Yes,” he said, nodding. “That would be good.”

The big Oathbound guard was standing behind Princess Song. “I know of a good room for them, Your Highness,” Brunhild said smoothly. She set off toward another hallway. Abeke, Princess Song, and Conor followed. “Though a prison cell might be the best place for the likes of you Greencloaks,” Abeke heard Brunhild add under her breath.

Abeke came to a sudden stop. Conor crashed into her from behind, but she kept her feet. The Oathbound guard and Princess Song turned to face her.

“I am not one to make threats,” Abeke said quietly. She felt Conor’s warmth behind her; his presence gave her words weight and strength. “So listen well, Oathbound,” she went on. “We are not called the Heroes of Erdas because we spent the Second Devourer War or the struggle against the Wyrms hiding in a bunker. We have fought, and we have lost much, and some of us have suffered in ways you can’t even imagine. You will not say bad things about Conor, or any of the Greencloaks, or you will have me to answer to. Do you understand?”

Brunhild went pasty pale and fell back a step. Her stone viper was nowhere to be seen. “Y-yes,” she stammered. “I understand.”

Beside her, Princess Song raised a finely etched eyebrow. “Clearly, Abeke, you are fierce, just like your leopard spirit animal.” She turned to face the guard, frowning. “These are honorable Greencloaks, Brunhild. Treat them as they deserve. Do you understand?”

Cringing, Brunhild bowed deeply. “Yes, Your Highness.”

Princess Song gave Abeke and Conor an apologetic look. “I beg your forgiveness, young heroes. The Oathbound mean well. There’s been so much destruction and confusion in the last year. And after so long serving as guards, they long to act.”

“It’s all right,” Abeke said. On the one hand, Meilin had been right—the Greencloaks didn’t have the best reputation at the moment, so the Oathbound couldn’t be faulted for their bad attitudes. On the other hand, she thought the Oathbound could bear watching. They might be loyal guards, but it was possible that they could be dangerous, too. And clearly Brunhild did not live up to her name.

A MESSAGE

WHEN HE'D FIRST JOINED THE GREENCLOAKS, CONOR'S dreams had been powerful, prophetic. On their very first mission, he'd had a dream so vivid it had felt like real life—he had dreamed about Arax the Ram and the path to find him. Later, it had been his dream that had sent the Greencloaks to Stetriol for the final battle against Gerathon and the Conquerors, a vision that had led them to victory.

Now, every time he closed his eyes, his dreams were filled with black tendrils that reached out and pulled him into a sea of oozing slime. He struggled against the writhing tentacles, but they gripped him firmly, thrusting him toward four red eyes that arose from the darkness and glared malevolently at him. Then a huge, leechlike mouth appeared and gaped wide, revealing rows of triangular teeth dripping with corrosive acid.

The Wyrms!

Its grating shriek filled his head. The spiral mark on his brow amplified the sound until it was everywhere; there were no more Greencloaks, no more friendship or hope or light, no more Conor. He was the Wyrms and the Wyrms was him, and that was all.

The maw of the Wyrms gaped wider. The tendrils dragged him closer.

No! he shouted in his dream, struggling.

"No!"

And then he felt a hand on his arm, and he fought his way out of the oily darkness, opening his eyes to see someone gazing down at him, her brown eyes soft and worried.

Abeke. It was Abeke.

He took a ragged breath that was almost a sob.

“It’s all right,” she said quietly. She was on her knees next to the low bed. He remembered where they were. The room they’d been given was tiny, with one rickety bed, blank stone walls, a narrow slit of a window, and an inch of dust covering everything. In the distance was the sound of hammering—the Citadel being fixed up after years of neglect. Despite the noise, Conor had been so tired after their journey from Greenhaven. He’d sat down on the low bed just for a moment....

He swallowed, his throat dry and raw as if he’d been shouting.

Maybe he had been. “I must have fallen asleep,” he croaked. Slowly he sat up, leaning his back against a stone wall. It was cold and clammy. A swirl of dust glinted in the dim light that shone through the narrow window.

Abeke shifted to sit next to him. “Another nightmare?”

Conor nodded.

“The Wyrms?” Abeke pressed.

“Yes,” Conor admitted. He reached up to rub the lingering ache in his forehead.

Intercepting his hand, Abeke pushed up his shirtsleeve, exposing the shape of Briggan in his passive state, a dark mark on his pale skin. Then she placed her own arm next to his, the mark of her leopard a swirling spotted shape on her warm brown skin. “We both suffered,” Abeke said. “The Wyrms took Uraza from me, and it took you from yourself.” She stroked a hand over her tattoo as if petting the leopard. “But we came through it. We survived. And we’ll keep surviving. We defeat the Wyrms every day that we go on.”

Conor stared down at the marks of Briggan and Uraza, side by side. Somehow seeing them together made him feel better, even without the comforting feel of Briggan’s rough head under his hand. He thought about how Abeke must feel. Her bond with Uraza had been shattered. And ...

“Do you still think about him?” he asked.

“About Shane?” Abeke asked. At Conor’s nod, she went on. “Yes. I’m still not sure how I feel about him. It’s complicated. He betrayed me—more than once. I fought a duel against him, and it was the angriest I’ve ever been in my entire life. But he died saving me when Zerif forced Uraza to attack.” She shook her head sadly. “Shane was my first friend.” She leaned closer and looked into Conor’s eyes. He saw wisdom in her face, and hope. “But you are my truest friend.”

Conor wasn’t sure what to say. As someone who had worn the Wurm’s mark on his forehead, did he deserve a friend like Abeke? He was saved from having to respond when the door banged open and Meilin and Rollan strode into the room.

And stopped short, looking around.

“This is where they put us?” Rollan asked. “A closet?”

Meilin ran a finger over the sill of the narrow window. It came away coated with dust. “I see they got it ready for us.” She pointed at the bed. “Are those sheets clean?”

“Probably not,” Abeke said, getting to her feet. The bed creaked alarmingly as she stood up. “What have you two been doing for all this time?”

“Oh, you know, waiting for Essix,” Rollan answered. He tapped his chest as a way of telling them the falcon had finally gone into the dormant state. He leaned against the wall as if he was tired, then slid bonelessly to the floor. “Also we spent some time being glared at by those Oathbound guards. And we did some sparring.” He nodded at Meilin. “She kicked my butt.”

“As usual,” Meilin said primly.

“I tried to get her to teach me that throw-the-sword-in-the-air thing she did out there by the gate,” Rollan said. “You saw it?”

Abeke and Conor nodded. It had been an amazing move.

“Yeah, well,” Rollan went on with a wry grin, “when I tried it I almost cut my own hand off.”

Meilin’s smug smile turned into a frown as she looked around the room, hands on her hips. “You know, I think this room could be a message for us.” Reaching behind her, she closed the door. She crouched on the floor, and the others leaned closer to hear what she would say. “Listen, there’s something very strange going on here.” Meilin spoke in a near whisper. “It’s supposed to be an important meeting of the leaders of the four lands, but it seems as if the Greencloaks are barely tolerated. And they really don’t like our spirit animals.”

Conor nodded. From everything he’d seen in the Citadel, this was true.

“Brunhild—who isn’t very merry, by the way—gave us some more trouble on our way here,” Abeke put in.

“Not surprising. The Greencloaks have a complicated history,” Meilin reminded them. “But even with that, it’s weird.”

“Maybe we got too comfortable being heroes,” Conor said quietly.

Meilin watched him for a moment, her dark eyes pitying. “Maybe,” she said, nodding. “But I have to wonder: If they dislike us so much—if they don’t believe we are truly heroes—then why did they invite us and the other Greencloaks to the Citadel? What is really going on here?”

THE EMPEROR

BEFORE THE OTHERS WERE AWAKE, MEILIN SLIPPED OUT of their tiny room. It was located high in a crumbling tower of the Euran wing of the Citadel. As she descended the spiral staircase, she stretched her arms over her head and worked the kinks out of her back. She had asked the servants for more sleeping pallets, but they'd been little more than thin pads laid over the hard stone floor of the tower room. She didn't want to be stiff and sore if they had challenges to face while they were here.

A few brown-clad servants eyed Meilin as she crossed the entrance hall on the way to the Zhongese part of the Citadel. At those doors, she was stopped by an Oathbound guard, who looked her over suspiciously. Meilin had been well trained as a warrior and as the daughter of a general. She knew how to give orders that would be obeyed. After fixing the Oathbound with a regal glare, he bowed and admitted her. She wanted to talk to Song. The imperial princess had helped the four Greencloaks at the gate. If Meilin was right and something strange was going on, then she might be a valuable ally.

As Meilin stepped from the dusty, echoey entrance hall into the Zhongese section of the Citadel, she paused for a moment, closing her eyes and taking a deep breath. The air was scented with tea and jasmine incense and boiled rice. Smelling it, she felt a sudden, fierce homesickness. It was accompanied by a wave of sorrow for her father, killed on a battlefield during the Second Devourer War.

She and Rollan had been on their way to Jano Rion, the city she'd grown up in, when they'd received the summons from Olvan. They would go back someday soon; maybe Abeke and Conor would come, too.

Opening her eyes, Meilin went on. The Zhongese servants must have been hard at work, for there was no dust in this part of the Citadel, and a glistening carpet covered the stone floor of the passageway. A servant hurried before her, then opened a wooden door carved with Zhongese water dragons, ushering her into a big, bright room hung with embroidered tapestries. The furniture was made of black-lacquered wood and was draped with jewel-toned silk and plump pillows with tassels at every corner. Seated before a low table was Princess Song. A girl stood behind her, putting a last pin into her gleaming black hair.

"Meilin!" the princess exclaimed, jumping to her feet.

Meilin bowed, keeping her face blank. "Your Highness."

Song gestured at the maidservant. "Tea, at once."

To her chagrin, Meilin's stomach growled, loudly. She hadn't had breakfast yet.

"And bring spiced buns," the princess added smoothly, "and some fruit." She seated herself at the low table. "Won't you join me?"

Meilin sat down, feeling uncharacteristically awkward as her sheathed sword bumped the table. The princess was so tiny, so perfect and delicate in her exquisitely embroidered robes. Song wasn't wearing green today, Meilin noted, but purple and deep blue.

"We have met before, haven't we?" Princess Song asked.

Meilin was surprised she remembered it. "Yes, Your Highness. Once. Briefly. A long time ago." Her father had been reporting to the emperor, bringing six-year-old Meilin with him so she could see the vast palaces. A few years older, Princess Song had been like a painted doll. The two girls had played stiffly and politely with the princess's toys, tiny perfect houses with tiny perfect people. Meilin had been reminded of those toys not that long ago when she and her Greencloak friends had gone to the artificially preserved village of Samis in pursuit of the Crystal Polar Bear of Suka.

"I have admired you for a long time," Princess Song said softly.

Meilin swallowed her surprise and called on her lessons in etiquette. One of the main things she had been taught was to conceal her emotions, to be always calm, self-possessed. She raised her eyebrows. “Indeed?” she said carefully.

“Yes.” Song fell silent as the servant girl set tea and food on the table and then left the room. “You are a brave and skilled warrior. I know how difficult it is for a Zhongese girl to study the martial arts.” She leaned over the table and touched the edge of Meilin’s cloak. “And to become a true warrior, as you are. A Greencloak. I have to admit that I envy you.”

Meilin felt a sudden burst of sympathy for the other girl. No doubt, as an emperor’s daughter, Song led a life of formality and quiet obedience. “We’re not just fighters,” she said after swallowing a bite of spiced bun, “and it hasn’t all been exciting adventures.”

“But you have loyal friends at your side,” Princess Song said.

Meilin took a drink of hot green tea. The princess, she realized, was lonely. “If you’re interested in learning to fight, I could teach you while we’re here.”

Princess Song’s cheeks went pink. “I am afraid ... it would not be permitted.” There was a rush of footsteps outside in the hallway. “But I thank you,” she added quickly, and rose gracefully to her feet. “It must be time for the meeting.”

Grabbing a spiced bun for each of her friends, Meilin stood, just as the door opened. Two black-clad Oathbound stepped into the room, followed by a big man who could only be the emperor.

He glanced at his daughter and nodded, then looked at Meilin, eyebrows raised. “A Greencloak—here?” he asked in a deep voice.

As Meilin bowed awkwardly, one of the spiced buns bounced out of her hands and rolled across the carpet, coming to a stop at the emperor’s feet.

He ignored it. “You are Zhongese?” he asked.

Her face flaming with embarrassment, Meilin answered, “Yes, Your Majesty. I am Meilin, the daughter of General Teng, who died fighting for Zhong during the Second Devourer War.”

The emperor nodded. “Your spirit animal is Jhi, the Great Panda.”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Meilin answered. She couldn’t stop staring at the spiced bun. If he took a step forward, he would squish it.

“The children of Zhong who summon spirit animals should not be given to the Greencloaks,” he said grandly. “Especially when their spirit animals are the very embodiments of our history. They belong to Zhong.” And with that pronouncement, he turned and strode out of the room, followed by his loyal Oathbound guards.

“Belong?” Meilin repeated. She wished Rollan was there—he would have a smart answer to the emperor’s comment.

“Hurry, Your Highness,” called one of the guards. With a quick nod to Meilin, Princess Song rushed out of the room after them.

As she followed them out, Meilin swooped down and grabbed the spiced bun she had dropped.

Outside the Citadel meeting chamber, Meilin found Abeke, Conor, and Rollan waiting for her. Quickly she handed them each a spiced bun.

Rollan took a big bite of his, then looked suspiciously at it. “Gritty,” he mumbled through his bite.

Meilin gave him a bright smile so he wouldn’t suspect that his had been the bun that dropped on the floor.

“What?” he asked.

“Nothing,” she said with an innocent blink.

“You’re staring at me.” Rollan rubbed at his cheek. “I have something on my face, don’t I?”

He did, in fact. Meilin still wasn’t used to seeing the scar that ran under Rollan’s left eye and across his cheek, a wound he’d sustained during the climactic battle to stop the Wurm. It had faded to pink and now was a thin line of white, but it was a reminder of what he’d been through.

Conor, she noticed, looked tired. His scars weren’t like Rollan’s—they weren’t visible. But they went deeper and would be slower to heal. Meilin hoped he was starting to recover.

Rollan nudged her arm and she looked up to see the leader of the Greencloaks, Olvan, with Lenori at his side; they were followed by a full contingent of Greencloaks, some of whom Meilin recognized and some she didn't.

Other people were starting to gather. Many stared at the Greencloaks as they passed and muttered comments to each other. Meilin saw a proud-looking old man in Niloan garb with a retinue of Oathbound; he had to be the High Chieftain. He was followed into the meeting chamber by the Prime Minister of Amaya and her advisers. The prime minister had a face like a pickled plum, Meilin thought. Wrinkled and sour.

Last came the Queen of Eura, a young woman who was dressed in lace and velvet, with a fur-lined cape. As she crossed the threshold into the meeting chamber, the queen tripped over the edge of her long dress, landing on the floor in a heap of flounces. She shrieked, and three of her courtiers scurried to her side, lifting her to her feet and making soothing noises.

Olvan greeted the young Greencloaks with a nod. He had been taken by the Wym, just as Conor had, but he didn't seem to be as weary or troubled as Conor was. Perhaps he only bore the burden more easily. Lenori looked strange without her spirit animal, a gorgeously feathered rainbow ibis, on her shoulder, but she gave them a welcoming smile.

Olvan glanced over at the people streaming into the meeting chamber. "We had better get in there." He placed his hands on Meilin's and Conor's shoulders, drawing them all closer so they could talk without being overheard. "We thought this meeting would be a formality, but it seems there are some serious proposals on the table. Proposals about what to do with the Greencloaks."

Rollan narrowed his eyes. "Have they considered maybe just leaving us alone?"

It was a good question, Meilin thought. "They don't have any authority over us, do they?" she asked.

"These are the leaders of the four major governments of Erdas," Lenori reminded them.

"And Stetriol," Conor put in, pointing out the last leader entering the chamber, a young woman dressed in blue and black—an ambassador from the Council of Stetriol. She wore a pin with a silver S on her jacket.

“Right,” Olvan said. “Since Zerif used us to spread the Wyrms’ parasites across Erdas, there have been big changes in the world. These leaders are powerful people, and we have to work with them. Be careful in this meeting.” He fixed Rollan with a severe gaze. “And don’t say anything.”

“I wasn’t going to say anything,” Rollan muttered.

“Oh, sure you weren’t,” Abeke whispered to him.

The four followed Olvan, Lenori, and the other Greencloaks into the meeting chamber.

The room was massive and echoing. Six stone walls towered over the proceedings, and banners representing each region hung from a very high ceiling; the same flags hung from five of the stone walls. It was more and more significant, Meilin decided, that the Greencloak flag was missing, even though there was a place for it.

In addition to the main entrance, there were doors in each of the walls. Tall windows let in the gray light from outside. In the center of the room was a huge six-sided wooden table. At the table sat the Niloan High Chieftain, the Euran Queen, the Ambassador from Stetriol, and the Amayan Prime Minister, one on each side. At a fifth side sat the Emperor of Zhong, with Princess Song standing quietly beside him. Oathbound guards stood at attention behind all the leaders.

Clearly the sixth side of the table was intended for the Greencloak contingent. There were no chairs.

From the beginning, Meilin had had a bad feeling about this; now the feeling got worse. They were supposed to stand—almost as if they were on trial, and all the lands’ leaders were the judges. She saw Olvan and Lenori hesitate for a moment, and then the two Greencloak leaders went to stand at their side of the table, their heads held proudly high. Meilin, Conor, Rollan, and Abeke stood just behind them with the other Greencloaks.

“I will begin,” said the oldest of the leaders, the Niloan High Chieftain, “by welcoming you here, to the first meeting between the leaders of the four great lands of Erdas in many, many years. Let us hope that this meeting marks the beginning of a new era of peace and prosperity.”

An adviser, standing behind him, leaned over to whisper something into the High Chieftain's ear. He scowled, then nodded. "The four great lands are represented here ... and Stetriol, of course." His dismissive glance showed what he thought of the island continent that had for so long been an enemy of the other lands. "We have much to discuss," the high chieftain went on. "The first issue on the table ... " His dark eyes surveyed the room. "What to do about the Greencloak problem."

"Problem?" snorted the Prime Minister of Amaya. "It's more than a simple problem."

She definitely resembled a pickled plum, Meilin thought. The woman's mouth was pursed in disapproval, and her nose wrinkled as if she smelled something foul.

"If she's not careful," Rollan leaned over to whisper in Meilin's ear, "her face is going to freeze like that."

Meilin stifled a smile. "Rollan," she chided. They needed to be on their best behavior.

"The Emperor of Zhong has asked to be the first to speak," the high chieftain went on.

The emperor nodded, his mouth set in a severe frown. "The Second Devourer War forced the leaders of Erdas into hiding, where we were protected by our Oathbound guards. Then, just as we emerged to begin rebuilding, another attack began. We heard stories of terrible violence. And this time, who was responsible for this destruction?" He raised his hand and pointed across the table, straight at Olvan. "The Greencloaks."

Beside Meilin, Rollan stirred, as if he was going to protest. She nudged him with her elbow. When he looked over at her, she shook her head. He gave a slight nod.

She knew he didn't like it. Neither did she. But she had a feeling that speaking now would just make things worse.

The emperor went on, his deep voice filling the room. "The very leader of the Greencloaks was taken by the Wyrms, spreading its corruption. As a group beholden to no nation, but with unparalleled access to all of them, they spread this corruption farther than any other force could have. It is clear to everyone here: The Greencloaks have become too powerful, and far too dangerous."

“This is true,” the Amayan Prime Minister added in a sharp voice. “They cannot be trusted.”

The Ambassador from Stetriol had a soft voice, but somehow she made herself heard. “We in Stetriol,” she began, as the others fell silent to listen, “have good reason to hate the Greencloaks, who for so long denied us the Nectar that would have prevented the bonding sickness. And yet ... ” Serenely, she looked around the room, making sure everyone was listening. “And yet we see the Greencloaks now as allies. With their aid, Stetriol is at last taking its proper place in the world—no longer outcast, no longer forgotten. We value the Greencloaks. For us, they are not a problem, but a solution.”

Meilin felt like cheering at the ambassador’s words.

But the other leaders, even the wide-eyed Euran queen, were starting to look like the prime minister: They were making that disapproving pickled-plum face.

The high chieftain was nodding. “Speaking of the the oh-so-precious Nectar. We all know that the Greencloaks jealously guarded the secret of its creation. Only they were allowed to administer its protective power. But now the Nectar Ceremony doesn’t exist,” the high chieftain said. “The Nectar of Ninani is no longer needed. The Greencloaks, too, are not needed as they once were.”

“Exactly,” boomed the emperor, and slammed a fist onto the table, claiming everyone’s attention. “And so I propose that the Greencloaks should be disbanded.”

Meilin gasped aloud. There were murmurs and nods of agreement from the other leaders. Except for the Ambassador from Stetriol, who frowned and gazed down at the tabletop.

The emperor went inexorably on. “Each of the Marked must be returned to their own nations, to serve their proper lords.”

So that’s what the emperor had meant by belong, Meilin realized. She found herself shaking her head. Looking aside, she saw the same denial on Abeke’s face. Beside her, Conor had gone pale. Break up the Greencloaks? This was wrong. So, so wrong.

But they had been ordered to stay silent. Olvan was the Greencloaks’ leader; he would speak for them.

To Meilin's dismay, Olvan's head had lost its proud tilt, and he was staring at the floor as if he couldn't think of a response. Beside him, Lenori looked troubled. It was true that some of the Greencloaks, including Olvan, had fallen prey to the Wurm, but they had served it against their will. And they had defeated it, in the end. That is what Olvan should tell the leaders.

But it was Princess Song who spoke next. Standing just behind the emperor's chair, she looked so small, like a child, and almost fragile. But when she spoke, her voice did not have the soft, sweet tones of a well-bred Zhongese girl. Instead, she sounded like a true leader.

"I disagree with my father," she said firmly. All the other leaders stopped their stirring to stare at her. The emperor's face went as still as stone. He folded his arms across his chest, as if denying his daughter's words.

The princess went bravely on. "Have you forgotten that the Greencloaks saved the entire world?"

"Twice," Meilin heard Rollan whisper.

"If not for the Greencloaks, the Devourer and his Conquerors would have destroyed everyone in this room," Song declared. "We owe them our lives. We owe them a place of honor in this remade world!"

Her words rang out, and the room fell into utter silence.

Then her father pushed back his chair and got to his feet, his face a mask of anger. Deliberately he stepped in front of Princess Song, blocking her from the table. "My daughter speaks without permission," he snapped. "The words of a disobedient girl mean nothing. Do not listen to them."

"We cannot break up the Greencloaks!" Princess Song insisted.

Her father whirled to face her, fury in every line of his body.

Meilin found she was holding her breath.

But before the emperor could act, all six doors leading into the meeting chamber banged open at the same time, the sounds echoing from the stone walls.

In each doorway stood a man or a woman wearing a green cloak.

They were here to help, Meilin thought, feeling relieved. They would speak to the leaders of Erdas about the Greencloaks' heroic actions in the wars.

One by one, the green-cloaked figures brought their spirit animals out of their passive states. A hyena crouched at the feet of one, wild-eyed and drooling. A bat swooped over the head of another. There was a raptor of some kind; a small, lithe pantherlike cat; and a white rat with glittering pink eyes.

As one, the Greencloaks in the doorways drew their swords.

Wait. Were they going to ... ?

Before Meilin could shout out a warning, the Greencloaks and their animal companions hurled themselves into an attack.

There were screams. The room erupted into chaos.

BETRAYAL

“WHAT ARE THEY DOING?” ABEKE BLURTED OUT AS THE attackers stormed into the room.

Rollan glanced at her. Abeke’s eyes were wide and horrified.

“It looks like—” He broke off. “They’re Greencloaks, aren’t they?”

Rollan looked around wildly, seeing one of the green-cloaked figures stalk into the room. Her lithe, pantherlike jaguarundi, an animal from Amaya, crouched and then leaped toward the Ambassador of Stetriol, snarling. There was a shrill scream. Some of the leaders were shouting for the Oathbound guards to protect them. Another one of the attackers slashed with his sword, and blood spurted from the chest of one of the queen’s courtiers.

“Who are they?” Conor gasped, drawing his ax.

“We can’t fight them,” Rollan said, shaking his head. “They’re Greencloaks.”

At the table, Olvan had called forth his spirit animal. The mighty moose tossed its antlers, sending the white rat flying. “Call forth your spirit animals!” Olvan roared at the other Greencloaks. “Defend the leaders!”

Meilin was the first to leap into action. Ripping her sword from its sheath, she dove, sliding across the surface of the six-sided table just in time to stop the jaguarundi from advancing on Princess Song.

Roughly, Meilin grabbed Song and shoved her under the table.

“Stay there!” she shouted—and took up a defensive stance. If the invaders wanted to get to the princess, they would have to go through her. A moment later, Jhi was at her side.

Conor had already brought Briggan out of his dormant state. The wolf leaped and intercepted the hyena in midair. There was a crash of bone and fur and the gnashing of teeth.

Beside Rollan, Abeke had strung her bow and was taking careful aim at one of the invaders’ spirit animals, a huge bat with leathery wings that was swooping down and scratching at the eyes of anyone defending the leaders.

“Let Essix get it!” Rollan shouted to her, calling forth the falcon. As Essix streaked across the room toward the bat, Abeke nodded, then she searched out another target. Rollan heard Uraza’s roar as the great leopard came out of passive state.

All around Rollan was chaos, snarling, and screams. People stumbled past with blood streaming from their wounds. He caught a quick glimpse of Meilin, relieved to see her on her feet, still protecting the princess. Wielding his long knife, he cleared a space around Abeke so she could take aim without worrying about being attacked.

He blocked a thrust from one of the green-cloaked invaders, then kicked at the white rat, which was coming at him with its teeth bared.

There was a lull in the fighting. Everything fell suddenly into quiet while attackers and defenders caught their breaths and decided their next moves. In the silence, the Emperor of Zhong stepped onto a chair and then onto the top of the six-sided table.

“Traitors!” he thundered, pointing at the invaders. “The Greencloaks have shown what they truly are. Traitors!”

As if in answer, there was a growl from across the room. The steep-shouldered hyena, bleeding from where Briggan had slashed it with his sharp teeth, sprang past Meilin, past Olvan. It snarled, leaped onto the table, and tore out the emperor’s throat.

All watched in stunned horror as the emperor staggered back, blood spraying from his neck, and collapsed onto the tabletop. Rollan couldn’t even move. It had happened so suddenly.

The hyena bayed with bloody fangs, a howl of triumph.

It was answered by a shrill whistle—a signal—and the green-cloaked invaders and their spirit animals headed for the main exit, slashing and stabbing at anyone who got in their way. They plunged through the doorway. One of Abeke’s arrows thudded into the door just as it slammed behind them.

The room was thick with blood and the moans of the wounded. Several people were shouting.

The ones doing most of the shouting, Rollan realized, were the Oathbound. He hadn’t noticed them in the fight, but they must have defended the leaders.

He saw Meilin on the other side of the table, bending to help Princess Song out of her hiding place. Meilin tried to turn Song away from the sight of her father’s body, but the princess had a will of iron. She said something to Meilin and then jerked herself away.

Taking a deep breath, the princess pointed at a tipped-over chair. The Oathbound guard leader, Brunhild the Merry, leaped to set it upright.

Brunhild gave Song her hand, helping her to step onto the surface of the table.

“I must speak again,” Princess Song began, her voice steady. All in the room stopped what they were doing and turned to listen. She stood there, her hair tousled, her gown torn, a smear of blood across one pale cheek. At her feet, her father’s body lay in a pool of blood that was already growing sticky. Yet she did not waver. “In this attack, the Greencloaks have shown their true colors. Not green.” She bent to touch the table, then stood and held up her hand, which was covered with her father’s blood. “Their true color is red. Bloodred. My father was right. We have seen what they are—traitors.”

The princess stared at her own blood-smeared hand, and finally her control broke. She fell to her knees beside her father’s body and wept. With a tearstained face, she pointed straight at Olvan and Lenori. “Oathbound, don’t let the rest of the Greencloaks escape,” she ordered. “Arrest them at once!”

VENOM

CONOR KNEW ROLLAN WELL ENOUGH TO KNOW WHAT he was going to do. “No time to argue,” he told his friend. Briggan bounded to his side, panting, his fur spotted with blood.

“But—” Rollan protested, gripping his knife.

“We can’t fight them,” Conor said. He sheathed his ax.

On the other side of the table, the Oathbound were gathering. Brunhild pointed at the remaining Greencloaks. As a group, they started across the room, drawing their swords, while Brunhild, four steps behind them, called forth her spirit animal, the stone viper.

“No, don’t,” Conor said, grabbing Abeke’s hand to stop her from drawing the last arrow from her quiver. “It’ll just prove what the princess said. We have to get out of here!”

The black-clad Oathbound guards were closing in, seizing the remaining Greencloaks and forcing them to the floor. Lenori’s spirit animal, the brightly colored ibis, perched on her shoulder and spread its wings, a distraction to the guards. Lenori, who hated violence of any kind, stepped forward with her hands raised, trying to explain to the guards that they had not been part of the attack.

“Arrest the Greencloaks!” shouted Brunhild.

As Princess Song issued crisp commands, Olvan put his moose into passive state and gathered up Conor, Abeke, and Rollan; Meilin was still on the other side of the table. “You cannot be captured.” He started clearing their way to the door. “Come!”

“Meilin!” Rollan shouted, pointing at the door. Conor saw Meilin nod and then sheathe her sword. Jhi, huge and implacable, lumbered into two approaching Oathbound soldiers, giving Meilin a path of escape.

When they got to the door, Meilin quickly called Jhi into passive state. Olvan shoved them all outside, leaving Lenori and the other Greencloaks to hold off their pursuers. He almost caught Essix’s tail feathers in the door when he slammed it closed.

“To my room—the Euran wing,” he ordered. “Hurry!” Bringing his spirit animal out of the passive state again, he left the moose to guard the door while he and the others sprinted down the hallway that led to the Euran wing of the Citadel. As they fled, Conor heard the sound of the moose trumpeting a challenge, and then the clatter of running feet coming after them.

Breathless, they reached Olvan’s set of rooms, all decorated in a style very familiar to Conor—they looked like Devin Trunswick’s rooms back home in Eura.

When they were all inside, Olvan quickly closed the door, locked it, and turned to face the kids.

Briggan crouched at Conor’s side, his tongue lolling. Essix was nowhere to be seen, but Rollan didn’t look worried, so Conor knew the independent falcon was safe. Uraza was sleek gold and black as she padded around the edge of the room, sniffing at the heavy wooden furniture.

Conor noticed that Meilin was very pale. He saw Rollan edge closer, so his arm was touching hers. She swallowed and then clenched her teeth, as if holding in tears. Then he remembered that she’d seen her own father cut down on the battlefield—maybe the death of the emperor was making her relive that awful moment.

“All those Greencloaks were new recruits,” Olvan said, striding across the room to a carved chest. The box sat under a window with lots of tiny, diamond-shaped panes.

“Not Greencloaks,” Rollan said angrily. “Fakecloaks.”

Shaking off her distraction, Meilin nodded. “They were impersonating Greencloaks to make us seem like criminals.”

Abeke was busy checking the string on her bow. “But who are they, really?” she asked, looking up. “Who sent them? Who hates the Greencloaks that much?”

“The emperor,” Rollan answered. “Who’s dead.”

“Less chatter,” Olvan ordered, opening the chest under the window. “The Oathbound are just behind us. Meilin is right—there is no coincidence that this happened in front of the leaders of Erdas. Someone is trying to sabotage the Greencloaks. Lenori and I are certain to be blamed for this attack, and arrested.”

As if confirming his words, there was a rush of footsteps out in the hallway. A moment later came a loud banging on the door. “Open up!” shouted a booming voice.

“You four have a chance to get away,” Olvan said hurriedly, tossing clothes out of the chest, searching for something. “There is something you must do.” He paused. “Ah, here it is.” From the chest he took a cloth-wrapped object, about the size of a baby’s fist. “For many years, this gift has been passed down from one leader of the Greencloaks to the next. There is a saying associated with it: When Greencloak fights Greencloak, that which is hidden must be revealed.”

The door to the room shuddered under the blows of the guards trying to get in. The wood around the lock was starting to splinter.

“And now that warning has come to pass. Greencloak has fought Greencloak.” Olvan held out the small bundle to Meilin. “Take it.”

“What are we supposed to do with it?” Meilin said, taking the gift and shoving it into a little pouch that she wore on her belt.

Olvan was about to answer when Conor noticed that silence had fallen out in the hallway. He turned and saw a slim flicker of brown slither through the crack at the base of the door.

The stone viper—the spirit animal of Brunhild the Merry!

“Look out!” he shouted. He seized Abeke’s arm and pulled her away.

“What?” Rollan asked, looking for a threat coming through the door.

“Snake!” Conor pointed at the floor. “It’s fast! Don’t let it bite you!”

Briggan growled, on guard. “No!” Conor yelled. He gripped Abeke’s arm. “Don’t let Uraza near it,” he said urgently, and she immediately grabbed the scruff of the leopard’s neck, holding her back.

The snake was no bigger than a pencil, but moved with terrifying speed. As the Greencloaks backed away, the stone viper darted to the middle of the room and paused, its tongue flickering, sensing the location of each body in the room.

“Quick!” Olvan called, gesturing to another door. “Go that way. Straight along the passage, second right, then down the first set of stairs you come to. It’ll take you to the Citadel walls.”

As she hustled toward the door, Meilin asked her question again: “Olvan, what are we supposed to do with the gift?”

“Reveal it,” Olvan responded. He was about to add something when the snake made its choice.

Moving with lightning speed, it struck like an arrow, sinking its fangs into Olvan’s leg, just above his boot.

Conor gasped as the viper’s poison already began to take hold. First Olvan’s leg froze in a rigid stance, then his other leg, and then his arms.

Olvan spoke quickly as the stone venom crept over his chest. “You must find out who is trying to break apart the Greencloaks,” he wheezed. As he spoke, the poison crept up his neck to attack his face, turning his skin gray and pale. His breath rasped. “The same ... force will try to divide you.” His voice slurred, his mouth hardly able to move. “Stay true to ... each ... ”

The four kids stared in horror as the poison overcame Olvan. The big man’s body wobbled off balance, then he tipped over and crashed onto the floor. His green cloak settled over him.

At the same moment, the door splintered under the blows of the Oathbound guards.

ANKA

“COME ON!” MEILIN SHOUTED, FLINGING OPEN THE DOOR Olvan had said led to a way out of the Citadel. “It’s clear,” she said over her shoulder. “Let’s go!”

“What about Olvan?” Conor protested as the Oathbound fought their way past the door they’d broken open.

Rollan’s heart lurched at the thought of leaving Olvan behind. But they had to flee. “We can’t help him now,” he answered, grabbing Conor and checking to see that Abeke was coming. “He told us to escape, so that’s what we have to do.”

Snarling, Briggan and Uraza held off the Oathbound guards as the kids made it out of the room, then raced down the hallway.

“Olvan said we should turn at the second right,” Abeke called, a step behind Rollan.

“Second left,” Meilin corrected, and they pelted around a corner. Bounding, Briggan caught up to them, followed by Uraza, silent and deadly.

“Are you sure it’s left?” Conor panted.

“No!” Meilin shot back.

They reached a crossroads where two passageways met. Meilin looked right, then frantically left. From behind them came the sounds of pursuit, growing louder.

“I’m pretty sure it was straight,” Conor put in.

And then, suddenly, someone else had joined them.

“Gah!” Meilin shouted.

Rollan was used to seeing better than anyone, thanks to his connection to Essix, but the Greencloak who appeared at Meilin’s shoulder had come out of nowhere. It was a woman, he could see that much. But her features were oddly blurred and ... was her skin gray? Like the stone walls of the passageway?

“Where did you come from?” Rollan demanded.

“I’ve been here the whole time,” the mysterious Greencloak answered, “and I’m here to help. This way.” She pointed at a door that they hadn’t noticed, then flung it open and started down a set of stairs.

No, Rollan was certain. The door had not been there before! Had this Greencloak hidden it somehow?

Briggan growled. The Oathbound were after them. Rollan could hear their footsteps coming from Olvan’s room.

“Hurry!” called the Greencloak woman. “I can hide you!”

“Who are you?” panted Meilin as the four kids, Briggan, and Uraza rushed out of the passageway and onto the stairs, Conor quietly closing the door behind them.

“Shhhh,” hissed the Greencloak. “Shut up for half a moment, if you can.”

Rollan so wanted to snipe at her for that comment, but he saw the wisdom of staying quiet. The stairs were dark; even Rollan’s keen eyes couldn’t make out more than shadows. Their panting breaths sounded loud in the silence.

“Won’t they just open the door and come after us?” Meilin whispered to Rollan.

He shrugged, even though he knew she couldn’t see him in the dark. He was starting to suspect what the mysterious Greencloak’s spirit animal might be. If he was right, the guards wouldn’t even see the door.

From above came the sound of the Oathbound pursuers. Their feet pounding, they ran straight past the closed door.

Yep. Rollan’s guess was right.

“Come on,” whispered the Greencloak woman from ahead. “Follow me, and stay absolutely quiet.”

They did as she'd ordered, Conor putting Briggan into passive state and Uraza padding on stealthy paws at their backs. Essix, Rollan knew, was waiting for them outside, circling high above the Citadel.

At the bottom of the stairs they turned right, down another long, dark passage. At its end was a doorway leading to a courtyard, and then the outer wall of the Citadel. Rollan could hear shouts in the distance: the Oathbound guards searching for Greencloaks to arrest. A booming echo was the portcullis at the front gate slamming closed. They definitely weren't getting out that way. As he watched, two brown-clad servants rushed across the courtyard. The entire Citadel was stirred up, on the alert. Escaping was going to be impossible.

Unless ...

In the light of the doorway, Rollan got his first really good look at the new Greencloak. She seemed to have dark hair in a long braid down her back, and skin the same light brown as his own.

"Weren't you ... grayer before?" Rollan whispered to her.

She shot him an annoyed glare. "Yeah, they warned me about you," she said sharply.

"The smart one?" Rollan asked.

"Smart mouth, more like," she whispered back.

Rollan found himself grinning. He liked her already. "Chameleon spirit animal, right?"

He saw a flash of surprise cross her face. Then she gave a brusque nod. Rollan caught a glimpse of a small lizard-ish shape on her shoulder, blending in with the green of her cloak. Chameleon. Without the keen sight he got from his bond with Essix, he never would have noticed it. "What's your name?" he asked.

"Anka," she answered.

Meilin joined them. "I assume we're getting out that way," she whispered, pointing at a door in the outer wall of the Citadel, across a stone-paved courtyard. "But how are we going to get over there without being spotted?" As she spoke, two Oathbound guards clattered into the courtyard, swords drawn, clearly searching for the escaping Greencloaks. After seeing that the area was deserted, the guards rushed away.

“Now,” Anka whispered. “Quickly. If I say still, stand against the wall and don’t move.” She turned her glare on Rollan. “And don’t talk. Don’t even breathe.”

“But—” Meilin began to protest. Rollan knew her—she wanted explanations.

But they didn’t have time. “Just do it,” Anka said, and Rollan nodded to reassure Meilin.

Abeke had put Uraza into passive state, and the four kids, led by the mysterious Greencloak, Anka, started around the edge of the courtyard, keeping close to the stone walls that enclosed it. Behind them, the Citadel buzzed with activity.

They were halfway around the courtyard, ten steps away from the gate in the outer wall, when they heard the sound of Oathbound guards approaching—from the passageway they’d just left!

“Still!” came Anka’s swift order.

Obedying, Rollan flattened himself against the wall, his shoulder against Meilin’s, Anka beside him. He knew Conor and Abeke had done it, too. Not one of them moved.

Don’t even breathe, he told himself.

The two Oathbound took several steps into the courtyard, looking around. Their eyes passed right over Rollan and the others, but they didn’t react.

Without moving his head, Rollan looked aside at Meilin. He knew she was there, and his Essix-enhanced eyes had keener vision than most, but all he could see of her was the faintest of outlines. Thanks to Anka’s chameleon spirit animal, all five of them were invisible—they had blended right into the wall.

“They’re not here,” one of the Oathbound guards said, turning away. “Let’s check the other passageway.”

“Wait,” said the other, a tall man with a broad, handsome, brown-skinned face, framed by flowing black hair.

Rollan realized that the man was Marked. He carried his spirit animal in the crook of his arm—it was a fluffy, brown, almost wingless bird that had two nostril holes at the end of a long, thin beak. It was a kiwi bird, from a small island near Stetriol, and it had a dangerously keen sense of smell.

Which meant the Oathbound who held it might not be able to see them, but his nose might tell him they were there.

Trying not to move, Rollan sniffed the air to see if he could smell himself. Uh-oh. He should have taken a bath at the last inn. The others were probably just as stinky.

In the center of the courtyard, the Marked Oathbound had closed his eyes and stood drawing in the air through his nose. The kiwi in his arms blinked its tiny black eyes.

Rollan held his breath.

Frowning, the Marked Oathbound opened his eyes again and looked carefully around the courtyard. He sniffed and took a step closer to where they were hidden.

“They’re not here,” his partner said impatiently.

“They were here,” the Marked Oathbound said. “And not that long ago, either.” Another sniff, and he shrugged. “But I don’t see them. We’d better report in.”

Rollan let out a relieved breath as the two guards hurried away.

At his side, Abeke looked confused. “He looked right at us,” she whispered.

Rollan opened his mouth to explain.

“Let’s go,” Anka interrupted, and started off before checking to be sure the kids were following.

Quietly, the five of them slipped through the door in the wall and into the forest that surrounded the Citadel. For a while they could hear the uproar as the rest of the Greencloaks were arrested and the Citadel was being searched, but the noise soon fell away behind them. They padded on quiet feet through a shadowy forest, where the ground was thickly carpeted with pine needles. Ferns brushed at their knees, and the high branches of the pine trees cut off the light.

“All right, that’s far enough,” Meilin said, stopping.

Rollan went to stand at her side, along with Abeke and Conor, who had brought their spirit animals out of passive state. Briggan sat at Conor's side, and Uraza crouched at Abeke's feet, looking ready to pounce. Essix, he knew, was perched in a tree nearby, watching.

Anka turned to face them. Her skin, Rollan noticed, had taken on a greenish tinge, making her blend into the forest. "Weren't you ... browner before?" he asked her.

She shot him an annoyed look.

He grinned back at her. Having Anka around to aggravate was going to be fun.

"You're a Greencloak?" Meilin asked Anka, beginning the questions.

Anka turned to show off the green cloak she wore. "Obviously."

"There's nothing obvious about it," Meilin shot back. "At the meeting in the Citadel, there was an attack by Greencloaks. Olvan said they were new recruits. And we've never seen you before. How do we know we can trust you? How do we know you're not one of those false Greencloaks?"

"Fakecloaks," Rollan put in.

"I've been around," Anka said, folding her arms. "You just never noticed me."

Abeke made the connection. "Oh, I get it. The way the guards didn't notice us in the courtyard. Chameleon spirit animal?"

Anka gave a smug nod.

"Can we see him?" Abeke asked. She turned and spoke to Conor. "Chameleons are really cute. Have you ever seen one before?"

Conor shook his head. "Never."

"Toey is shy," Anka said, her usually sharp voice softening for the first time. "You might catch a glimpse of him now and then."

Meilin still looked suspicious. Rollan caught her eye. "She's telling the truth, as far as I can see," he told her. "I think we can trust her."

"Oh, thank you," Anka said sarcastically. "I save you from the Citadel and you think you can trust me?"

"We've seen betrayal before." Meilin's face was serious. She patted the pouch where she'd put the gift from Olvan. "And we have a mission. We can't be too careful."

Rollan saw Briggan prick up his ears and then nudge Conor's leg with his nose. In response, Conor cocked his head, listening. "Uh, we'd better keep moving. I think the Citadel has sent somebody after us.”

“Oathbound,” Anka told them. “They’re expert trackers—we have to go. Now.”

SECRETS REVEALED

THE OATHBOUND WERE RELENTLESS.

They tracked the five Greencloaks all afternoon, never giving them time to rest or even catch their breaths. Abeke was glad she'd spent the months after the defeat of the Wurm hunting in Nilo. It meant she could run for a long time without getting tired.

As the sun set and the forest grew darker and colder, Abeke followed Anka through the pine trees, Uraza at her side and Meilin a step behind. Next came Rollan, with Conor and Briggan bringing up the rear.

The sounds of pursuit had fallen away behind them, but Abeke knew the Oathbound were following. Still, they had to rest sometime. Anka couldn't keep leading them on through the entire night. Or could she?

Abeke paused and let Rollan and Meilin pass her, and then fell into step beside Conor. Uraza and Briggan trailed behind them. "I keep thinking about Olvan," Abeke whispered. The last they'd seen of the Greencloak leader, he'd fallen to the floor after being bitten by the Oathbound leader's stone viper. "The snake's poison," she went on. "Do you think it killed him?"

"There is an antidote," Conor responded. He shot her a worried look. "They would give it to him, wouldn't they? They wouldn't let him die?"

"I hope not," Abeke said grimly. She wished she could go back to the Citadel and help Olvan, but she knew that all they could do was try to fulfill the mission he'd given them. If they could figure out what they were supposed to do.

She checked Conor and saw he looked pale. Dark smudges under his eyes showed how tired he was. Because of the nightmares, he hadn't had enough sleep for weeks. Or for even longer—not since he had been taken by the Wurm. He couldn't keep up this pace. But she knew he wouldn't complain.

They walked on as night fell and a full moon rose above the forest, bright enough that they could see where they were going. Silver-edged shadows lurked beyond the path, and a cold breeze blew through the branches overhead.

After another hour of walking without the sounds of Oathbound pursuers, Anka called a halt. The four kids gathered around her. "Meilin," Anka said, keeping her voice low, "you said you have a mission. We need to know where we're going."

Meilin gave a weary sigh. "I have no idea what Olvan wanted us to do." She took the cloth-wrapped gift out of the pouch. "He gave us this and said it had to be revealed, whatever that means." Carefully, she unwrapped the gift.

In the pale moonlight, it looked like ...

"It's a rock," Rollan said.

Abeke tossed her braids over her shoulder and leaned closer to see. He was right. It was a scaly-looking black rock about the size of a baby's fist.

"Ah." Anka reached out a finger to touch the rock, then drew back. "I know what this is, and what you're supposed to do with it."

"How do you know?" Meilin asked suspiciously.

"You may not have noticed me before," Anka said, "but I am a Greencloak. And I know some secrets that have not been revealed to you."

"But you're going to reveal them now, right?" Rollan put in.

Anka looked around at the dark forest. There was no sound of pursuit. "We can sit and rest for a few minutes, and I'll tell you."

Relieved, Abeke and the other kids sank wearily to the ground. Uraza crouched close beside Abeke. Essix had flown down to perch on a nearby branch. The moonlight filtered between the trees, pushing back the shadows. Despite the light, Abeke could barely make out Anka's figure; thanks to her chameleon spirit animal, she blended in with the night.

Anka spoke from the shadows. "This rock is not what it appears to be. It's one of a set of four items precious to the Greencloaks. Olvan knew this. Why didn't he tell you when he gave it to you?"

"We didn't exactly have time," Conor said. At his side, Briggan flopped down to lie with his big head on Conor's foot.

Anka nodded, understanding. "Olvan would have told you that long ago, the four regions of Erdas bestowed the Greencloaks with gifts as thanks for ending the First Devourer War. Four items wielded by four ancient heroes of Erdas—"

"Four items," Rollan put in, "wielded by four heroes?"

"Don't interrupt," Anka said sharply.

"Yeah, but I can't help but notice that me, Conor, Abeke, and Meilin add up to four," Rollan said.

"And you didn't even have to count on your fingers," Anka sniped. "Now be quiet so I can tell you the rest." She paused, then shrugged. "But it probably is important that there are four of you, each from a different region. It makes sense that this quest would fall to you. Anyway, the four gifts were symbols that the Greencloaks were of and for all Erdas."

"Not broken up, as the leaders seem to want now," Meilin observed.

"No," Anka said. "Greencloaks united. Loyal to each other. Willing to serve all nations."

"So, back to the rock that is more than it seems," Rollan reminded her.

"Yes." Anka pointed to the rock. "As its gift, Amaya sent a legendary polished jewel called the Heart of the Land. As you can see, it's been disguised somehow, and it must be revealed. Zhong gave something called the Dragon's Eye. Nilo and Eura gave gifts, too, but I can't remember their names. The gifts, all except for the Heart, have been hidden."

“And we have to find them,” Abeke realized. “If there are four gifts that are meant to show the four lands that the Greencloaks are for everyone, then we need to find them all.”

“We should reveal the Heart first,” Meilin said. “Like Olvan ordered. The only question is how?”

“Amaya,” Anka said softly. “I don’t know much, but there’s a place in the region that’s connected to the gift.”

“Wait a minute,” Rollan said, pointing at the rock. “We have this object, right? And we’re supposed to collect these other objects and use them to save the world? Sounds familiar, doesn’t it?”

“No,” Meilin answered. “Before, the Greencloaks had to save the world—”

“Twice,” Abeke and Conor said at the same time.

“But this time,” Meilin went on, “for the world, we have to save the Greencloaks.” She held out the rock, a dark lump in her hand. “So we’ll take up this quest to reveal the Heart of the Land and then find all the gifts?” she asked.

“Yes,” Abeke said without hesitating, putting her hand onto Meilin’s, feeling the rough surface of the rock under her palm.

“Yes,” Conor agreed, putting his hand over hers.

“Definitely,” Rollan said, and put his hand on the top.

“For the Greencloaks,” Meilin said solemnly.

“For the Greencloaks,” Abeke, Conor, and Rollan repeated.

Abeke looked around at her friends, the three people she trusted most in the world. Anka, she realized, had faded completely away. For a moment, Abeke felt sorry for her. The chameleon made it so she was always around, but never noticed.

Then Abeke’s keen senses went on the alert. While they’d been talking, the wind had stilled and the forest had grown completely silent. Too silent. Fog was creeping in, flowing like long, white snakes between the tree trunks.

Anka appeared again, standing a few paces farther down the path. She whirled to face the kids. “We’ve stopped for too long. The Oathbound are coming.”

Abeke leaped up. “We can’t let them catch us.”

As she stood, Meilin wrapped up the Heart of the Land. She quickly stowed it in her belt pouch.

Abeke checked Conor. He was getting to his feet slowly. “Are you all right?” she asked him.

“I’m fine,” he answered, but she didn’t think he was.

Essix took off from her branch, quickly disappearing into the night. “So we’re heading for Amaya?” Rollan asked.

“Less talking, more running away,” Anka said, appearing at his side. “They’re coming. Let’s go!”

Wearily slinging her bow over her shoulder, Abeke got ready to run for the rest of the night.

WIKAM THE JUST

THE ROCK WASN'T HEAVY, BUT MEILIN FELT THE BURDEN of carrying it.

For three days and three nights they traveled through the forest, with the Oathbound in pursuit. Anka led them along the southern coast of Eura, heading for a port where they could get a ship to Amaya. The Oathbound wouldn't be able to track them over the sea, so they'd be free to reveal the rock and find the other three gifts that had come down to them from the time of legends.

But the four Greencloaks and Anka still had to get away from their pursuers. They slept only in snatches, with one person on guard, until all of them felt so weary it was like they were carrying loads of bricks on their backs.

One day at sunset, they stopped in a clearing in a pine forest to eat a cold dinner—they made no fire to give them away to the trackers—and huddled together, shivering, as the twilight advanced. During the day Anka had left them for a time, to slip into a village and buy supplies. At least, Meilin hoped she'd paid for the food; with her chameleon spirit animal, Anka would probably make a very good thief. Maybe that was why Rollan seemed to like her so much, despite her sharp voice and her short temper.

“What am I eating?” Rollan asked, inspecting the food Anka had given him.

“Meat,” she answered.

“I don’t even want to ask this question,” Rollan said, taking a bite, “but what kind of meat?”

“The chewy kind,” Anka answered.

“Mmm,” Rollan mumbled. “My favorite.”

Conor, Meilin noticed, had fallen asleep already, with his head on Abeke’s shoulder, his dinner uneaten.

Meilin was glad for Jhi’s warm, furry bulk at her back. With a sigh, she ate her serving of “meat” and a hard biscuit, and listened to Rollan and Anka talking.

“So this quest we’re on. How do we reveal what is hidden?” Rollan asked. He shifted closer, so his shoulder was touching Meilin’s.

“Greencloak lore says that the rock is called the Heart of the Land,” Anka answered. “And it comes from Amaya, where there is a place called the Heart of the Land. An island in the middle of the large lake that lies to the northeast of Concorba.”

“Yeah, I’ve heard of the lake,” Rollan said. “So we have to go there?”

“It’s the most likely place.” Anka’s voice answered, but Meilin couldn’t see the young woman anymore; she’d faded away as the forest grew darker.

“Can we rest here tonight?” Abeke whispered. “Conor needs to sleep some more.”

Anka didn’t answer, so Meilin spoke for her. “We’ll stay for as long as we can.”

They sat quietly for a few minutes. As the sun set completely, the moon rose, flooding the clearing with silvery light.

“If the rock is from Amaya,” Rollan asked, “and I am from Amaya, why didn’t Olvan give it to me to carry?”

“Because I’m the responsible one,” Meilin said, smiling to herself.

Rollan bumped her shoulder with his, and she heard him laugh.

Then it occurred to her that maybe Rollan should be the one carrying the Heart of the Land. She sat up. “Anka said the four gifts were wielded by four heroes. That means they must have some power, don’t you think?”

Anka answered from the shadows. “It is likely that the gifts are more than just symbols. We just don’t know what power they have.”

Meilin dug the rock from her pouch and unwrapped it. “Here,” she said, holding it out to Rollan. “Take it.” When he did, she asked, “Do you feel anything? Any connection? Any power?”

Rollan closed his hand around the bumpy rock, waiting to see if anything happened. “Nope,” he answered at last. “Nothing.”

“Because it’s hidden. It hasn’t been revealed yet,” Anka said impatiently. “Until then it really is just a rock.”

Rollan handed it back to Meilin, and she put it away again. She leaned back against Jhi, who sighed and shifted to make herself more comfortable. Looking up at the sky, she saw the pinpricks of stars. Something drifted across her vision. It was a faint thread, glinting in the moonlight. Sleepily, she watched it unspool across the clearing. Then another silvery thread floated past, just overhead. They looked like silk. So pretty.

Across from her, Conor jerked awake. “They’re coming,” he blurted.

Meilin sat up and listened. She heard nothing but the wind in the trees. “Are you sure?” Maybe it was another one of Conor’s bad dreams.

Abeke was getting to her feet, checking her bow and quiver, which had just one arrow in it. “Yes, he’s sure,” she said, as Conor stood up with Briggan beside him.

Meilin stood as well, then offered her hand to Rollan. She hauled him to his feet. “I don’t hear anything,” he said.

“Shhh,” cautioned Anka. “They could be sneaking up on us. Put your animals into passive state. We’ll go quietly, and I’ll hide us, just in case.”

Without speaking, the five Greencloaks left the clearing. Meilin led the way. Thanks to Anka’s chameleon, when Meilin glanced over her shoulder to check on the others, they all looked like nothing more than shadows gliding through the darkness. Essix, who refused to go into passive state unless it was absolutely necessary, flew from branch to branch. The falcon flew on silent wings and wouldn’t give them away.

The path was like a dark tunnel before them. Meilin paced along it, trying to stay quiet. As she walked, a thin thread of spidersilk broke across her face. She brushed it away and kept going.

Then, ahead, she saw an entire spiderweb stretched across the path. It was about the size of a shield, and it glinted in the moonlight. A little dark blob of a spider sat in its center.

Meilin was not afraid of spiders. At least, that's what she told herself. Ever since she and Abeke had seen Shane's sister, Drina, killed by her own spider spirit animal, she'd felt a little queasy about them. And then there had been the Webmother in the dark passages of Sadre. She tried to think of spiders as mice. Cute, furry, baby mice that happened to have eight legs and completely creepy eyes. And fangs ...

As Meilin cautiously approached the web, she reached to sweep it out of her way. But the threads were like glue—they stuck to her arm. Two more steps, and another web appeared in her path, at the same height as her head. Before she could duck, she'd stepped into it—and the sticky threads wrapped around her face like a net. “Ick,” she whispered.

She stumbled to a halt, trying to wipe the web out of her eyes.

“What's the matter?” Rollan whispered, right behind her.

“I'm just ... stuck!” she answered. Finally she managed to scrape it away, just in time to see something plummet from the trees and land at Rollan's feet.

“Essix!” Rollan exclaimed, and crouched beside her. The falcon was wrapped entirely in sticky spiderweb. She shrieked, outraged.

A skittering sound came from the forest all around them.

Meilin caught a glimpse of something moving through the branches.

No, not something. Lots of things—spiders, thousands of spiders. They were led by one spider larger than the others, which moved with uncanny intelligence.

In a flash, she realized what was happening. “One of the Oathbound has a spider spirit animal!” she shouted. And it had called other spiders to help it spin webs to entrap them.

“Run!” Abeke yelled.

Rollan scooped the entangled Essix into his arms and sprinted past Meilin.

Meilin started to follow when she heard a shriek from behind and turned to see Abeke wrapped in web, struggling to get free. Conor was frantically ripping at webbing that had covered his feet, holding him in place.

A second later, Meilin felt something—a mouse-sized spider crawling up the back of her neck. More spiders leaped at her from the trees, trailing threads of sticky web. As she went to draw her sword, another web, as wide as a net, drifted down from the trees, covering all five of the Greencloaks. They fought as it settled over them, but the harder they struggled, the more tangled they became, until they could barely move. Spiders crawled all over them, as if checking to be sure they were really caught. Meilin shuddered as a spider walked right over her face.

“Now I know what a fly feels like,” Rollan gasped as he tried to protect Essix’s feathers from the web.

When they were completely trapped and all five of them had fallen to the ground in one squirming, web-covered lump, Meilin saw dark shapes emerging from the trees. They were dressed in black, with the distinctive brass collars and wrist-guards. One of them was unusually tall and thin, with parchment-pale skin and deep-set eyes. Gripping his bony shoulder with huge talons was a hunched, black-feathered bird with a cruelly hooked beak and a wrinkled red head.

“That’s Wikam the Just,” Meilin heard Anka whisper. “One of the Oathbound’s leaders. His spirit animal is a vulture, and it’s a lot more dangerous than it looks. Listen,” she went on quickly, “Wikam is not to be trifled with. His name might be Just, but he will not treat you fairly. Don’t even bother trying to argue with him.”

“I suppose you mean me,” Rollan muttered.

“Shhhh,” Anka hissed, sounding worried.

One of the other Oathbound gave a signal, and the swarm of spiders skittered off into the forest—except for one spider, his spirit animal, which scurried up his body to perch on his shoulder. The spider was small, brown, and furry—and really, Meilin had to admit to herself, nothing at all like a mouse. The moonlight glinted from its many-faceted eyes.

Wikam the Just folded his long arms and looked them over. “Well, well, well,” he said in a deep voice that sounded like it was speaking to them from the other end of a cavern. “Look at you wiggle, little Greencloaks. But we’ve got you now. You will face your punishment for attacking the leaders of Erdas.”

“But we didn’t do it!” Meilin protested.

“You know something?” Wikam sneered. “I actually believe you.” The Oathbound soldier leaned casually against a tree, his eyes sparkling with cruel amusement. “I just don’t care. You could be as innocent as ... well, as children. I’m going to bring you in anyway, and earn the glory for your arrest. You’ll be put on trial for assassinating the Emperor of Zhong. And when you are convicted—which you will be, after I reveal to the leaders that you confessed your heinous crimes to me—the penalty will be death.”

THE TORCH

DURING THE FINAL BATTLE AGAINST THE WYRM, THE Redcloaks' polar ice fortress, the Place of Desolation, had been rendered uninhabitable. Its lava tubes and mysterious markings from the Hellans were all gone now.

Ever since then, Stead, who had taken over as the leader of the Redcloaks after Shane's death, had been looking for a new place to make their headquarters. After scouting a few likely locations, he had decided to build a high tower on a remote beach on the south coast of Eura. Anybody who climbed to its very top could look out over the ocean and see the Greencloaks' castle on the island of Greenhaven, way in the distance.

Yes, Worthy had been up there. He was pretty sure that Stead's choice of a new location, and its view of Greenhaven, meant something. The Redcloaks were outcasts, and Stead wanted back in.

Well, that wasn't going to happen, Worthy felt sure. All any of them needed to do was look into a mirror to know why.

And yeah, he wanted in, too, though at the same time he rather liked his slit-pupiled golden eyes, not to mention the muscles he'd put on since he and his black panther spirit animal had merged. The retractable claws were good, too.

Still, Worthy saw Stead's point. Every one of the Redcloaks had made mistakes. Their late, great leader, Shane, had given them a reason for being—to redeem themselves. And according to Stead, despite their honorable fight against the Wyrms, they weren't done yet.

Stead stood on the wide, sandy beach, watching the workers he had hired putting a few last touches on the tower. It was built of sand-colored stone, with a roof of hammered copper that glowed flame-bright in the setting sun. It was so bright that anybody standing on the walls of Greenhaven and looking in this direction could probably see it, shining like a torch across the water.

Maybe that was the point.

“Hey, I know what you should name the tower,” Worthy suggested. “The Torch.”

Stead didn't answer. He looked all heroic, with his mask in place and his red cloak curling around his legs in the sharp breeze off the ocean. Waves crashed against the sand, and seabirds circled overhead. At Stead's feet, Yumaris squatted, picking with gnarled fingers through a pile of seaweed and shells that smelled like dead fish. She couldn't see what she was doing—she was more worm than human, really—but she sniffed at the sand and nibbled at the seaweed and seemed perfectly content.

Unlike Worthy. He sighed loudly, waiting for Stead to tell him why he'd been summoned. But Stead was becoming more and more like the spirit animal that was now part of him—as stubborn and hardheaded as a ram.

As if sensing Worthy's impatience, Stead looked over at him. Worthy caught a glimpse through the mask of Stead's odd, rectangular pupils.

“I've had some reports,” Stead began.

Here we go, Worthy thought. He folded his arms and prepared to listen.

“The leaders of the four lands have come out of hiding,” Stead said. “A few days ago, they gathered for a meeting at the old Citadel, on the border of Eura and Zhong.”

“Yep!” Yumaris put in happily.

Worthy glanced down at the eyeless old woman. She was knotting bits of shell into her long, gray-white hair. Grinning with her toothless mouth, she draped a long scarf of seaweed over her shoulders.

“Very nice,” Worthy said to her.

In response, she cackled and then threw a handful of sand in his general direction.

Stead went on. “The reports say that something went wrong at the meeting. The Greencloaks attacked the leaders, an act of terrible betrayal. The Ambassador from Stetriol was wounded, and the Emperor of Zhong was killed.”

Wait, what? “The Greencloaks did this?” Worthy interrupted.

“Of course not,” Stead said impatiently. “According to my sources, the attackers had only recently joined the Greencloaks. Clearly they joined intending to carry out the attack. And now the leaders of Erdas are convinced that all Greencloaks are criminals. They have ordered their Oathbound to track down and arrest every single Greencloak left out in the world.” He pointed toward the island of Greenhaven. “Once they’re captured, they’ll be brought to their castle and imprisoned, and then they will all be put on trial.”

Worthy felt a twinge of uneasiness. “So who set them up? Who wants to destroy the Greencloaks?”

Stead shrugged. “No idea. One of the leaders, perhaps? The Greencloaks have plenty of enemies, especially after so many of them fell to the Wurm. They still have enemies in Stetriol, too, people who feel as Shane once did, that the Greencloaks were to blame for years of suffering by those who called spirit animals and didn’t have the Nectar to ease the formation of the bond. So you see, Worthy, it could be anyone. Even a fellow Greencloak gone rogue.”

“Or a Redcloak?” Worthy suggested.

“No,” Stead said flatly. “Definitely not.”

Worthy shrugged. As far as he could see, anybody was capable of anything. He wouldn’t count out one of the Redcloaks until he was absolutely certain. “So what do you want me to do?”

Stead nodded. “Our favorite group of young Greencloaks managed to escape the Citadel without being captured.”

Worthy felt his uneasiness growing. “You mean Conor and the other three?”

“Yes, the Heroes of Erdas,” Stead answered. “I want you to help them.”

“But they hate me,” Worthy protested. At least Conor did, and he had good reasons for it, too.

“Make them trust you,” Stead countered.

Worthy shook his head. “They are never going to trust me.” When Stead didn’t comment, Worthy went on, “I mean it. Never. Not ever. You’ve picked the wrong person for this mission.”

Behind his mask, Stead narrowed his eyes. “Think of it this way, Worthy: It’s your chance to be the good guy. The rescuer.”

Oh, Stead was good. He knew exactly what Worthy wanted—what he had always wanted, from before the time he’d failed to summon a spirit animal at his Nectar Ceremony. He wanted to be the hero. Like ... well, like Conor, who had been his servant, who he had treated as badly as he could get away with. Conor, who had summoned one of the Great Beasts and had gone from being a shepherd to becoming one of the Four Heroes of Erdas. “What would I have to do?” Worthy asked.

“Find the kids,” Stead answered. “They probably think they’ve escaped, and they’re wrong about that. They need to know that the Oathbound are rounding up all the Greencloaks in the world. Tell them what you know about the gifts. Help them.”

“I don’t know anything about any gifts,” Worthy said blankly.

“Yumaris says otherwise,” Stead said. “But you’re right, nobody knows much about them. The ancient Greencloaks had a nasty habit of wiping out any information they thought was too dangerous. The gifts have apparently been lost for many years. But it’s time they were found.” He pointed at Yumaris. “She had a vision of you and the gifts, and now she will tell you about them.”

Worthy groaned. “She’ll tell me all about the consistency of dirt particles, is what.” He glared at Yumaris.

She grinned up at him. “Gifts!” she said happily. “Rock and claw! Circle! And that other thingie!”

“Thingie,” Worthy muttered. “So helpful. Thank you so much.” Then he shrugged. He was a Redcloak, and Stead was his leader, and maybe this was his chance to finally prove that he was worthy in more than just name.

And ... claw. Hmm. He just might know something about that. “All right,” Worthy agreed, nodding at Stead. “I’ll do it. What will you be doing in the meantime?”

“The Oathbound serve the leaders of Erdas,” Stead answered. “Their intentions are honorable, but they’re wrong about the Greencloaks. They’re being manipulated by someone else. Just in case, we’re going to need a larger force. I’ll be gathering the rest of the Redcloaks, so we’re ready to protect the Greencloaks if we have to.”

Worthy had to admit that it sounded like a good plan. “Fine.” He sighed. “I’ll go find the Four Heroes. And whether they trust me or not, I’ll make sure they’re not captured. And I’ll help them with the rock, the claw, the circle, and ... ” He glared at Yumaris. “With the other thingie.”

11

NIGHTMARES

“I FEEL CLOSER TO YOU ALL THAN I’VE EVER FELT BEFORE,” Rollan said in a muffled voice.

“Rollan, your elbow is in my face,” Abeke complained.

“I would say that I’m sorry,” he answered, “except that your knee is up my nose.”

“Stop wiggling,” Anka grumbled. “It’s just making it worse.”

All five of the Greencloaks lay in a heap on the pine-needled ground. They were wrapped tightly together in the sticky spiderweb.

Most of the Oathbound had gone to fetch a wagon to transport the captured Greencloaks back to the Citadel, leaving the Marked man with the spider spirit animal and one other Oathbound on guard.

“Conor,” Meilin whispered. “See if you can reach the knife on Rollan’s belt.”

“All right,” he whispered back, and groped with his hand. He felt the grip of the knife with the tips of his fingers, but he was too entangled in web to reach it. Anyway, one knife would not be enough to cut them free of the web.

There was only one way out of this. From where Conor lay, tightly bound up with the others, he could see both of the Oathbound a few paces away, leaning against a tree.

“Listen,” Conor whispered. The three other kids and Anka fell silent. “We have to escape now, before Wikam the Just—”

“The Unjust,” Rollan interrupted.

“Right, Wikam the Unjust,” Conor went on. “We have to escape before he gets back with the wagon. On the count of three, we’ll all call our spirit animals at the same time and break out of this web.”

“One,” Meilin whispered.

“Two,” Abeke added.

“Three,” Rollan shouted.

Jhi burst from the passive state, tearing through the web that wrapped Meilin like it was tissue paper.

At the same moment, Uraza leaped forth, and her sharp claws shredded the web entangling Abeke.

And Briggan snarled, ripping the web away from Conor, who rolled free and jumped to his feet, pulling out his ax, ready to fight.

The Oathbound guards shouted; one of them drew her sword and the other snatched the spider from his shoulder and threw it at them. Sticky threads unfurled behind it, settling over Rollan, who was trying to struggle out of the net that had covered them before. Essix was still tangled, no help to him. Anka was fighting the web that covered her and her chameleon, too.

Drawing her sword, Meilin charged to meet the Oathbound guard, blocking her attack. Reversing the sword, Meilin struck with the pommel, knocking the guard unconscious; then she whirled and knelt beside Rollan, pulling the layers of web away from him. As they dried, the spider threads had become less sticky, but the kids all had rags of web clinging to them.

“Thank you, My Lady Panda,” Rollan gasped as he finally broke free, still cradling Essix in his arms.

Abeke nocked her one remaining arrow and trained it on the Marked Oathbound, who stood with his hands raised in surrender. His spider had retreated into a pocket on the front of his uniform; Conor could see a brown, furry leg peeking out.

“Ugh, spiders,” Rollan said, trying to free Essix’s wing from the sticky threads without damaging her feathers. “One crawled right across my face.” He shuddered.

“Just think of them as mice,” Meilin advised him.

“Mice? Seriously?” Rollan shot back.

She gave him a smug nod. “That’s what I do.”

“I don’t want a mouse walking over my face, either,” Rollan muttered. In his arms, Essix shrieked out a protest at being trapped. “All right, I’ll get you untangled,” Rollan said to her. “Just hold still.”

Finally, Anka freed herself from the last of the web. She had turned silvery white, like the strands that had covered her. “The rest of the Oathbound will be back soon,” she said sharply as her skin, hair, and clothes darkened to match the color of the forest. “Let’s get out of here.”

They ran.

Conor had thought before that he was too tired go any farther. But as the sun came up, he found himself with the others, stumbling to a halt at the edge of a port town.

During the night they’d outdistanced their pursuers. Once they found a ship and left Eura and the Oathbound behind, they could begin their quest to find all four of the gifts. And he would be free to sleep.

Without nightmares, he hoped.

With Anka keeping them unnoticed, they slipped into the town, heading for the docks. There, Anka booked them passage on a ship bound for Amaya, paying the captain extra to finish loading their goods quickly, so they could catch the next tide. She hustled the kids onboard. They only had enough money for one cabin with two hammocks in it, so they would have to take turns sleeping.

They stood now, checking out their cabin. “The hammocks sort of remind me of spiderwebs,” Rollan observed. “Creepy. I’m never going to fall asleep wrapped up in one of those things.”

“Some of us aren’t afraid of spiders,” Meilin told him.

“Uh-huh,” Rollan said skeptically.

As they took off their boots and weapons, he ran his fingers up the back of Meilin’s neck. “Spider!” he warned.

She flinched and swatted, then turned red as she realized that she’d betrayed her fear.

“Mouse, I mean,” Rollan teased.

Meilin folded her arms and glared at him.

“A cute, little, fluffy, brown mouse,” Rollan went on, grinning, and Meilin gave in, laughing.

“You sleep first,” Abeke said to Conor. She’d been keeping an eye on him, ever since their conversation in the Citadel. He remembered what she had said—that he was her truest friend. And what Olvan had warned as the stone viper venom had taken him—stay true to each other. Conor was determined to be as true and worthy a friend to Abeke as she was to him.

With a nod of thanks, Conor climbed wearily into the hammock, which swung to the side as the ship turned into the wind, heading out to sea. The one porthole in their cabin showed the afternoon sun glinting on the surface of the water and the port town receding into the distance. They were safely away. The Oathbound would never catch them now. They’d have to go back to the Citadel and guard the leaders of Erdas, as was their duty.

Rollan had climbed into the other hammock. He’d spent the night running while trying to free Essix’s feathers from the sticky spiderweb. Finally the falcon had stopped struggling and had gone into passive state, but Conor knew his friend was almost as tired as he was.

Uraza, who hated being at sea, was in passive state, and so was Briggan. Jhi had settled in a corner, filling a quarter of the cabin’s space with her calm, healing presence. Meilin and Abeke sat on the deck, leaning back against the panda.

Anka was nowhere to be seen, but unless she moved, Conor tended to lose track of her. He figured she was in the cabin somewhere.

His hammock swung gently back and forth as the ship cut through the waves. Sleepily, Conor listened to Meilin and Abeke’s quiet conversation as they shared out a meal of ship’s biscuit and dried apples.

From the other hammock came the faint sound of Rollan, sound asleep, snoring.

“Rollan probably never had a bad dream in his life,” Meilin said. Conor could hear the smile in her voice as she spoke about him.

“I bet he dreams about Tarik,” he heard Abeke say.

“Yes, you’re probably right,” Meilin agreed.

There was a silent moment. “I have nightmares, too, once in a while,” Abeke said softly.

“About what?” Meilin mumbled through a bite of biscuit.

Abeke’s voice sounded sad. “Losing Uraza. And that moment when she attacked me. I was so afraid. Of her. If Shane hadn’t stepped in, Uraza would have killed me.”

“You’re not afraid anymore, are you?” Meilin asked.

“No,” Abeke said. “But I still think about it.” Conor knew how hard it was for Abeke to be having this conversation without the comfort of Uraza’s presence. But the big cat hated water; she was better off in passive state.

Meilin was quiet for a minute. “I know what it’s like to doubt your bond with your spirit animal. You just have to trust.”

“I do. I trust Uraza completely,” Abeke said. There was a rustling sound. “I have a comb. Do you want me to unbraid your hair for you?”

As Meilin answered, Conor felt himself drift into sleep.

Where the Wyrms was waiting for him.

At first he was floating in a soft darkness, gently rocked by unseen waves. Then he looked down at himself. He was standing. At his feet, the darkness was moving. It was not soft or peaceful, he realized, and dread prickled over his skin. It was a seething mass of oily, black parasites. As he watched in horror, they flowed up, over his legs, their touch icy cold, until they covered his entire body. Then they pushed through his skin until he wasn’t a boy anymore, just a boy-shaped collection of black, pulsing worms, with a piercing pain in his forehead where he’d worn the Wyrms’ spiral mark. He opened his mouth to scream, and writhing black worms flowed out of him.

As his shout echoed in the tiny ship cabin, he jerked awake, then struggled out of the hammock, landing with a thump on the deck. He crouched there, shivering, still feeling the cold touch of the parasites.

The red light of sunset streamed through the porthole, turning everything in the cabin the color of blood.

And then Abeke was crouched at his side, taking his hand. “It’s all right,” she assured him.

“What’s going on?” came Rollan’s sleepy voice from the other hammock.

“Nothing,” Meilin answered. Her hair was unbraided, a long, straight curtain of black silk that hung down her back. “Go back to sleep.”

Conor kept shivering, still seeing the parasites. He reached up to rub his forehead, which ached.

“Look at me,” Abeke said firmly, taking his chin in her hand. “You’re all right.” To his astonishment, she pushed his hand aside, leaned closer, and put her lips to the very spot where the Wyrms had marked him. After the kiss, she leaned back, and he stared into her wise, brown eyes.

“Let Jhi help,” Meilin said, and moved aside so the big panda could come closer.

Jhi put a big paw on Conor’s shoulder, and he felt the wet rasp of her tongue as it stroked over his brow, over the mark, over the place where Abeke had kissed him.

The constant pain of his forehead faded. The creeping dread of the Wyrms lifted.

A feeling of peace and healing spread through him.

Abeke nodded. “You’re all right,” she repeated.

“I’m all right,” Conor agreed.

And suddenly, it was true. He let out a relieved breath. Even with everything that had happened, the terrible things he’d seen, the blood, the fighting, he wouldn’t want to go back to being a simple shepherd. He was with his friends. He was where he belonged.

It had taken a long time. But thanks to his friends, he was finally, truly, free of the Wyrms.

“WE’RE BEING WATCHED,” ABEKE SAID, STOPPING IN THE middle of the road. She’d been feeling prickly for the past hour, and she was a hunter—she knew when to listen to her instincts. At her side, Uraza crouched, her long tail twitching.

“But we left the Oathbound behind in Eura,” Conor responded.

“Maybe we did,” Abeke said, looking around alertly. “But we’re still being watched. Followed. Stalked, maybe.”

On reaching Amaya they had left the ship, and now they had almost reached Concorba. The dirt path they were on ran straight toward the city, through a forest crowded with trees that Abeke didn’t know the names of, their leaves turning autumn colors—bright yellow, brown, flaming orange.

And ... red. She caught a glimpse of something red disappearing behind a nearby tree. But it wasn’t a leaf.

“I was right,” Abeke whispered. “There’s someone here.”

“Should I hide us?” Anka asked. She hadn’t taken on the colors of the forest, but her features seemed blurred. Somehow it was hard to get a really good look at her.

“No,” Meilin decided. She put her hand on the pommel of her sword. She raised her voice. “Whoever is following us should show himself.”

The only move from the forest was the rustling of leaves in a cool breeze.

At Abeke's side, Uraza's keen, violet eyes gleamed. Briggan stood beside Conor, his ears pricked, his big nose sniffing. Jhi was in passive state, and Essix floated high above the forest on a current of warm air.

"Behind that tree over there," Rollan said, pointing to where Abeke had glimpsed the bit of red.

Abeke grinned suddenly, feeling the thrill of the hunt. "Go get him, Uraza." At her words, the big leopard sprang forward. She leaped once, bounded around a tree, and pounced. There was a yell and a scuffle of leaves. The kids and Briggan raced after her.

As they came around the tree, they found a boy in a white mask and red cloak sprawled on the ground with Uraza's front paws on his chest. Uraza flexed her claws, and the boy yowled and squirmed, but she didn't let him up.

Red cloak. Cat mask.

"Worthy," Meilin said, sounding disgusted.

"Unworthy is more like it," Rollan put in.

"What are you doing sneaking around here?" Meilin demanded.

"I wasn't sneaking," Worthy protested.

"Following, then," Abeke said. "Stalking. Watching."

"All right," Worthy said, giving up. "Get this overgrown house cat off me, and I'll tell you."

It was a good time to stop to eat lunch, so the four kids pulled bread and cheese out of their one pack and sat on the leafy ground. They introduced Worthy to Anka, who nodded and then did her usual fade-into-the-background thing. Abeke, with her honed hunter skills, knew where Anka was, but all she could see, even looking straight at her, was a faint outline against the trunk of a tree. She wondered if Anka's skin only looked like tree bark, or if it had taken on that nubbled, rough texture, too.

"All right, Unworthy," Meilin said, pointing at him with the knife she was using to cut a piece of cheese. "Talk."

Abeke saw the Redcloak's strange slitted eyes blink behind his mask. "Our leader, Stead, sent me to warn you."

“Uh-huh,” Rollan said skeptically. “Warn us about what?”

“The Greencloaks are officially being broken up.” Ignoring their gasps, he went on. “The leaders of Erdas have ordered the Oathbound to arrest every Greencloak in the world,” Worthy answered. “You are all to be put on trial for what happened at the Citadel.”

“But we had nothing to do with the attack,” Meilin protested.

“I know that,” Worthy said. “All the Redcloaks know it. But to the rest of the world, you are renegades. You’re to be arrested on sight. The Oathbound know you are here. They’re tracking you. Stead sent me to warn you—and to help you.”

The four Greencloaks looked at each other in dismayed silence. They had thought they’d escaped, but they were in much greater danger than they’d realized.

“Maybe we should abandon our quest for the four gifts,” Meilin said slowly. “What Worthy is talking about—the suspicion, the arrests, the trial. It means the true end of the Greencloaks. Maybe we should try to figure out who is behind it all.”

Abeke saw the logic of this. She saw Rollan and Conor considering it, too.

“No,” came a voice from the edge of their clearing. Slowly Anka’s form took shape as she stepped away from the tree where she’d been sitting. “The quest for the four gifts is far more important than you realize. You must find them. And isn’t it the task that Olvan assigned you?”

“That’s true,” Meilin said. “It is. But still, I think—”

“Consider this,” Anka said, stepping forward. Somehow her face was still in shadow, blurred, so Abeke couldn’t get a good look at it. “The two tasks are connected. The gifts, once you’ve found them all, can be used to remind the leaders that the Greencloaks have always served the four lands of Erdas.”

Abeke saw her point. “I think Anka’s right, and we should continue,” she said. “We should do as Olvan ordered. We should go on with the quest for the four gifts.” She looked around the circle of her friends, and they all nodded agreement.

“I can help with that,” Worthy said. “I know about your quest. I can help you find the rock, the claw, the circle, and the ... uh ... the other thing. And I can help you escape the Oathbound.”

“Are you saying you want to join us?” Rollan asked skeptically.

“No way,” Conor interrupted. “Have you forgotten who he really is? Devin Trunswick. He’s a bully, and a liar, and he betrayed all of Trunswick when he joined Zerif.”

“I was having a bad day,” Worthy mumbled.

“He drank the Bile,” Conor went on.

“I drank the Bile, too,” Meilin reminded him.

“Not on purpose,” Conor countered. “Not like he did. Who knows what else he’s capable of? We can’t let him join us.”

As Rollan was nodding agreement, Abeke was shaking her head, setting her braids swinging. This kind of anger—it wasn’t like Conor. She knew he didn’t like Worthy; Devin Trunswick had treated him badly when he’d been the older boy’s servant. Clearly the usually very forgiving Conor had not forgiven him yet.

She tried to reason with him. “But Worthy fought the Wurm, just as we did,” she said. And she couldn’t forget that he was a Redcloak—just like Shane. No matter what else he had done, Shane had died a hero’s death.

“And he seems to know more about the gifts than we do,” Meilin put in.

“Not much more,” Abeke noted, wondering where Worthy had gotten his information about the rock, claw, circle, and other thing.

“I really do want to help,” Worthy said, sounding intentionally pitiful, Abeke thought.

The four Greencloaks exchanged a look. Rollan raised his eyebrows. Then Meilin nodded, and so did Abeke. Conor shot Worthy a look of deep dislike, and then he shrugged. “Maybe,” he said reluctantly.

“We can give him a trial period,” Meilin said, with a nod. “If he really is helpful, he can stay; if he’s not, he’ll have to leave. Agreed?”

All the kids nodded, and Worthy sighed loudly, as if they were being stupid for not accepting him immediately.

Abeke vowed to keep an eye on him, just in case. She accepted a piece of cheese on stale bread that Meilin handed her, sharing pieces with Uraza, who snapped them up and made a contented rumbling sound in her chest.

Abeke chewed a bite of bread, thinking. “You said the Oathbound are tracking us?” she asked Worthy.

He was looking longingly at the bread. He nodded, then pointed with his chin in the direction of Concorba. “They’re probably lying in wait for you. They’re not sure where you’re going, but they expect you to pass through the city. That’s where they’ll capture you.”

“We have to go into Concorba for supplies,” Anka said, from just outside their circle.

As she spoke, Worthy jerked in surprise. “Yipes! I forgot you were there.”

“Happens a lot,” Anka said acidly. And, Abeke thought, a little sadly.

“Anka is right,” Meilin said, holding up the heel of the loaf of bread and a rind of cheese. “This is the last of our food.” After hesitating, she held it out to Worthy, who seized it and started eating, tearing off pieces and stuffing them under the mask, into his mouth.

Abeke stared at Anka, who was fading back into the color of the tree she was leaning against.

The Oathbound were tracking them. She realized that she needed to stop thinking like a hunter, and start thinking like the hunter’s prey. It meant becoming more like Anka—passing through the land unnoticed.

“The Oathbound are hunting Greencloaks,” Abeke said slowly.

“That’s what he said,” Rollan mumbled through a bite of bread, nodding at Worthy.

“Meilin, take out the gift,” Abeke ordered. When her friend had taken out the rock and unwrapped it, Abeke pointed to it. “The rock is hidden. Unrevealed, as Olvan said. We have to be the same way. As the Heroes of Erdas, we’re too easy to track. We have to go in disguise. We can’t be Greencloaks anymore.”

AMBUSH

ROLLAN GULPED DOWN HIS BITE OF BREAD AND CHEESE and jumped up. “No,” he said forcefully. “Greencloaks are who we are. We can’t take off our cloaks.”

They all got to their feet, staring at him.

Rollan felt a red flush creeping up his face. “I know, I know. I was the last of the four of us to become a Greencloak. But look”—he pointed in the direction of Concorba—“I spent a lot of time hiding in that city, trying not to get caught by the militia. I didn’t like sneaking around then, and I don’t like the thought of it now. And remember what Tarik told us? He said we should never take off our cloaks. He said, We must stand behind who we are and what we represent. Remember? We should keep wearing our cloaks, and just be more careful.”

“What’s the problem, Rollan?” Worthy put in with a shrug. “Your cloak is basically rags. You should throw it away anyway, and get a new one when this is all over.”

Worthy’s comment hit Rollan like a punch in the stomach.

“Shut up, Unworthy,” Conor said, glaring. At his side, Briggan growled, sensing the sudden tension in the air.

“What?” Worthy said, raising his hands as if surrendering. “What did I say?”

“This,” Rollan said in a shaking voice, holding up the ragged edge of Tarik’s cloak, “was given to me by a man who was braver and more worthy than you will ever be.”

Worthy’s face was hidden behind his mask, so it was hard to see how he was really feeling. But he took a step back and lowered his head.

Rollan clenched his fists. He wasn’t particularly good at fighting. He usually managed to talk himself out of tricky situations. But if Worthy so much as opened his mouth, Rollan was going to punch him. Surprisingly, the Redcloak stayed quiet.

It was Meilin who spoke. “Rollan,” she said softly, “I know you don’t want to set Tarik’s cloak aside. But Abeke is right. We take too great a risk being Greencloaks at a time when the Oathbound are hunting us.”

“If they really are hunting us,” Rollan shot back. He pointed at Worthy. “We only have his word for it that they are.”

“We can’t take the chance,” Abeke said. “And remember, we have taken our cloaks off before.”

Rollan remembered. He, Conor, and Abeke, along with Finn and the other Greencloaks, had been in Stetriol on what they had thought would be a suicide mission. It had been a matter of life and death. This situation wasn’t so dire.

“We don’t have any choice,” Meilin said. Giving Rollan a sympathetic look, she unpinned her cloak and rolled it into a lump. “It’s not safe to carry them with us,” she continued. “If we really are fugitives, there’s going to be a bounty for our capture. People will be watchful. We might even have our packs searched. We can’t hold on to any liabilities.”

Then she stepped to the edge of clearing and dug a small hole with her sword. She kneeled there, tucking the bundle reverently into the earth. Abeke, Conor, and Anka followed one by one, each relinquishing their cloaks to the soil.

Maybe they were right. Slowly Rollan took off his tattered cloak. As he folded it carefully, Essix dove toward their clearing. She banked, circling him once and brushing his face with a wing tip, then settled onto his shoulder, a heavy weight. His cloak had a patch of leather sewn onto the shoulder so she wouldn’t shred it when she perched there. Without it, her sharp talons pierced his shirt, like needles poking into his skin. She was not a comfortable passenger.

The falcon was not usually affectionate, but she bent her sleek head and ran the curve of her beak along the edge of his ear, comforting him. He reached up and stroked the dappled feathers on her chest, feeling better. Then he felt worse, realizing that if they were in disguise, their spirit animals would have to be hidden, too. He didn't look forward to convincing Essix to go into passive state again.

They decided that because Rollan knew Concorba best, he and Conor would go into the city to buy supplies. Meilin and Abeke would wait in the woods nearby, hidden by Anka, until they got back.

When Worthy insisted that he should go, too, Rollan and Conor ignored him.

“No, really,” Worthy said. “I can carry the supplies.” When they didn't answer, he slumped, as if disappointed. “I just want to help, that's all.”

Rollan heard Conor mutter something about Unworthy. It was a good name for the Redcloak. More appropriate than the one he had chosen, anyway.

Anka gave them a few coins, and Conor slung the pack for groceries over his shoulder. To Rollan's surprise, Essix went meekly into passive state; Conor had rolled down his shirtsleeves to cover the tattoo of Briggan on his arm. They set off toward Concorba, leaving their weapons behind, taking only the small knife that Rollan kept hidden in his boot. Being without his cloak made Rollan feel strangely defenseless, as if it were more than just cloth. As if it were a shield. To anyone seeing them, Rollan and Conor looked like two ordinary boys; specifically, Rollan looked like a rather scruffy kid from Concorba, and Conor looked like a slightly better-dressed Euran visitor.

They entered the city, keeping an eye out for the distinctive black uniforms of the Oathbound. They walked slowly, trying not to call attention to themselves. Rollan sniffed the air, smelling the familiar scents of roasted corn, pine smoke, horse dung, and drying chilies.

He glanced aside at his friend. When they'd first met up again on their journey to the Citadel, Conor had looked pale and unhappy, and though he wasn't the chattiest of kids, he'd been even quieter than usual. Rollan's ability to read people's moods had shown him how dark the other boy's thoughts had been. But Conor looked better now. "You having those dreams still?" Rollan asked.

Conor looked startled. "The Wyrms? No." He frowned down at his feet, thinking. "But last night I had another dream. About a wave."

Rollan flapped a hand at him. "That kind of wave?"

Conor laughed. "No, the watery kind."

"A prophetic dream?" Rollan asked.

"I'm not sure." Conor shrugged. "I'll let you know."

They kept to the side of the road, on a boarded sidewalk, until they came to the store that Rollan knew belonged to Monte, a Greencloak they'd met when they had come to Amaya in search of Arax the Ram. Monte and his partner, Barlow, had run a trading post in Boulder City, a remote village. Barlow had been killed in a fight against the Conquerors, who had tried to take the Granite Ram talisman. Later in the war, Monte had fought with the Greencloaks against the Conquerors in Stetriol. When that battle had ended in victory, the man had returned to Amaya to set up a new store in Concorba.

Rollan had been looking forward to seeing bald, cheerful Monte, still telling jokes and selling supplies to travelers, but the front door of the store was locked, the windows shuttered.

"Won't find him here," a dry voice said.

Rollan and Conor turned to see an old man dressed all in brown rags sitting on the edge of the sidewalk, his bare feet in the dust of the road.

"Where is he?" Rollan asked.

"Well, now, let me think. Hmm." The old man held out a filthy hand, asking to be paid for the information.

With a sigh, Conor dug out some money—too much, Rollan noted—and gave it to him.

The old man eyed the coin. "Huh." He fixed the two boys with a bloodshot eye. "Monte's a friend of yours?"

"None of your business," Rollan said, before Conor could say anything. He knew his friend wasn't used to dealing with this kind of thing. "Where is he? Why is his shop closed up?"

The old man pursed his lips. “No need to get snippy, boy.” Then he shrugged. “Some guard types came. Arrested Monte, took him away. A couple days ago, that was.”

“Guard types,” Conor repeated. “Dressed in black? Wearing brass collars?”

“Yep.” The old man nodded enthusiastically. “Said they had orders from the Prime Minister of Amaya to arrest every Greencloak they could find. Would seem Monte is in big trouble.” His rheumy eyes narrowed. “You wouldn’t know nothing about Greencloaks, would you? There’s a sweet reward out for information about them.”

“No,” Conor said hastily. “We don’t know anything about Greencloaks. We’ve, uh, never even met a Greencloak.” He gulped. “I’m not even sure we know what—”

“All right, thanks,” Rollan interrupted quickly, seizing Conor’s arm and pulling him toward the street before he could completely give them away. “Less is more, Conor,” Rollan said as they hurried across the road. When Conor gave him a blank look, Rollan explained. “If you’re lying, don’t explain too much. It’ll give you away every time.”

“I know,” Conor said, looking chagrined. “It just felt like he knew what we are. Do you think he suspected us?”

“Probably.” Rollan looked back over his shoulder. There was no one sitting in front of Monte’s store. Uh-oh. The old man had been suspicious, which meant he’d scurried away to tell somebody about the two boys asking after a Greencloak friend of theirs. It wouldn’t take long before that information reached the Oathbound.

They had to hurry.

And Rollan had to admit that his friends—and Worthy—had been right. If they’d been wearing their cloaks, they would have been arrested already.

Moving fast, they found another store that sold supplies for traveling. The storekeeper seemed very curious, asking them where they were headed. When Conor started to answer truthfully, Rollan elbowed him in the side to silence him. He lied, saying they were heading for the coast to go fishing.

They came out of the store loaded with supplies—a full pack slung over each shoulder and their arms full. Staggering, they headed for the poorer section of the city. Dust swirled around their feet as they made their way down a narrow street, where the houses were little more than huts, and skinny dogs growled at them before skittering away.

Seeing a few familiar faces, Rollan nodded, returning their greetings. He'd grown up here, after all. People were bound to recognize him as one of the Heroes of Erdas. "This is not good," he said to Conor through clenched teeth. "A lot of these people know that I'm a Greencloak."

"Maybe we should get out of the city," Conor said worriedly.

"One more stop," Rollan said. "It won't take long."

"Where are we going?" Conor asked.

"Just down this street." A few months ago he'd gotten a letter from his mother describing what she'd been doing ever since the end of the Second Devourer War. "My mother opened a school. It should be just around this corner."

Conor blinked. He'd met Aidana, so Rollan knew how surprising this information was. "A school?"

"Yeah." Rollan took a few more steps, and then he stopped. "Look, you know that I was a street kid here for a long time. When my mom abandoned me, she did it because she couldn't take care of me. She had the bond sickness. She thought I'd be better off without her."

Conor nodded solemnly.

It was hard to talk about this stuff, but Rollan made himself go on. "I know she felt guilty about it for a long time." He pointed down the street toward a big building made of hard-packed adobe bricks. "She didn't get the chance to help me, so now she's trying to help other street kids. She opened up this free school." He shrugged. "Maybe they'll have some useful information."

"And you get a chance to see her," Conor said.

"Yeah, that too," Rollan admitted.

They dumped the heavy bags of supplies on a porch in front of the school. Just before they stepped inside, Rollan paused. "Go ahead. I just have to do something."

Conor nodded and went inside.

Quickly, Rollan dug into a small satchel at his side and pulled out his cloak. It had been less ragged and faded many months ago, when he and Tarik had been trapped by the Conquerors and only Rollan had been able to escape through a space too small for Tarik to fit into. As Tarik sent Rollan to safety, he'd smiled when his own green cloak settled over the boy. Shortly after Tarik's sacrifice, Rollan had taken his vows and had become a true Greencloak, united in purpose with his friends for the first time.

Rollan would never forget the pain of saying good-bye to the man who had become like a father to him. Even if he and his friends had to sneak around, he wouldn't leave Tarik's cloak behind. He stuffed it deep into the bottom of one of the sacks full of supplies. Then he followed Conor into the school.

As he stepped from the bright, sunny outdoors into the dimness of the schoolroom, all the students in the class stared at him. They sat on rows of benches, separated by a center aisle. Each kid held a notebook and pencil. Conor was already sitting down on one of the benches, as if he was one of the students.

And then Rollan saw his mother. She was standing at the front of the room, facing a wall painted black, writing some numbers with a piece of chalk. Her hair was a long black braid hanging straight down her back.

His mother, teaching math. He'd seen some strange things in his life, but this was possibly the strangest.

"Pssst," whispered a nearby kid. She poked his leg with a sharp finger. She was Niloan and had intricately braided hair and wore a sand-colored robe. "You better sit down, or you're going to be in trouble." She scooted over, giving Rollan room to sit on the bench beside her. "I'm Ngozi," she added.

"Your teacher's pretty tough?" Rollan whispered to Ngozi.

As she nodded, another girl, Amayan by the looks of her, leaned in and gave them both a stern look. "Our teacher," she said sharply, "is wonderful."

"Why's that?" Rollan asked, trying not to smile.

"I love, love, love math," she answered. "And Miss Aidana is a very good math teacher." This girl wore neat, colorful clothes and had long black hair, which, probably not by coincidence, she'd braided in the same style as his mother.

Ngozi rolled her eyes. "That's Sora."

"How did you find her school?" Rollan whispered.

"She found us," Ngozi began, "because we're—"

"Shhhhhh," Sora hissed, glaring. "We're not supposed to talk about that with"—she shot a knifelike glance at Rollan—"with strangers."

Rollan grinned, then saw his mother turn away from the blackboard, saying something about the math lesson. Her eyes rested on him and she froze. The chalk fell from her fingers.

"Ohhhh, you're in for it," Ngozi whispered.

Rollan's grin widened. "You have no idea," he whispered back.

"We've been studying numbers," his mother said loudly. "Specifically the number one."

"Here it comes," he said to Ngozi and Sora, and got to his feet.

His mother had her hands on her hips. "The number one," she repeated. "Which is how many letters my son has sent to me in the last three months."

All the kids were staring at him, wide-eyed.

Rollan couldn't stop smiling. "We were traveling," he told his mom.

She mock-glared at him. "No excuse." She opened her arms, and he went down the central aisle to the front of the room, where she pulled him into a hug. Then she set him back and looked him over, a hand on his shoulder. With the tip of a finger, she traced the scar on his face that he'd gotten during the battle against the Wurm. "You've grown taller," she said softly.

She had a few more lines at the corners of her eyes. And she was even more beautiful than he remembered.

She cocked her head. "You said you were traveling." A smile hovered at the corner of her mouth. "With that darling girl, Meilin?"

Rollan felt a blush prickling on his face. "Mo-om!" he protested.

"Miss Aidana," shouted a tall, red-haired boy from the back of the room, interrupting them.

"Yes, Jean-Luc," his mother said, without looking away from Rollan's face.

“There’s a bunch of people wearing black clothes outside,” the boy said. “They have swords. And shiny collars.”

Conor stood up from the bench where he’d been sitting. His eyes met Rollan’s.

“Oathbound!” they said at the same time.

“You’re in trouble?” Rollan’s mother asked. Then she waved her hand. “Never mind. Of course you’re in trouble. Need to escape?” At Rollan’s nod, she pointed toward a door that opened from the back of the schoolroom. “Quick. This way.”

Conor raced down the center aisle; Rollan met him at the door, which his mother flung open. It opened onto an alley. A figure dressed in black was coming from the right.

Rollan paused to give his mother a quick hug good-bye.

“Write to me,” she said sternly, and pointed left. “That way. Run!”

Rollan and Conor went left, and the Oathbound came after them. They raced down the alley, bursting out into the area in front of the school with their pursuer on their heels.

Five more Oathbound were there, weapons drawn.

Frantically, Rollan glanced over his shoulder. The one from the alley was closing in from behind.

They were surrounded!

HERO

WORTHY GROANED.

Rollan and Conor. Greencloaks. Stupid. So stupid.

Of course the Oathbound knew about Rollan's mother's school. Even though Aidana wasn't a Greencloak, it was well known that her son was. But the two idiots, loaded with supplies, had walked right up to her front door in broad daylight.

At least Worthy'd had time to get the supplies hidden in a nearby alley before the Oathbound had shown up.

Worthy had been following Rollan and Conor since they'd entered the city, hardly noticing the odd looks from passersby. Ever since he'd taken up the mask of a Redcloak, ever since he'd woken up one morning unable to summon his spirit animal, Elda, he'd gotten used to stares. And then his eyes had changed, and his hands ached as retractable claws replaced his fingernails, and he grew sleepless with the prowling intensity of the big cat. His hair had turned sleek and dark ...

... and really, nobody needed to know about the tail.

Now was his chance to prove to Conor and the others that he was worthy enough to join them. If only he hadn't made the stupid mistake about Rollan's cloak. Abeke had explained where he'd gone wrong, how Rollan had been a street kid who'd come to see Tarik as a kind of father—and how Tarik had been killed right in front of Rollan, leaving the boy holding his green cloak.

So yeah, he could see why it was important.

He'd make up for his mistake. He'd get them all to trust him.

At least Abeke was talking to him. She was a hunter, but she was wise and kind, too. Meeting her now as an ally, Worthy could see why Shane had been in love with her. Whether he'd admitted it to himself or not.

The beautiful, terrifying Meilin, though. He'd keep his distance from that one. She could probably take him apart with her little finger. Scary. Brrr.

He wasn't sure yet about the sharp, shy chameleon woman, Anka, though the Greencloaks seemed to trust her.

But for now, Worthy had to help the boys.

Crouching in an alley with the bags of supplies piled behind him, Worthy's panther-aided senses were on full alert. The six Oathbound rushed into the area in front of the school. Their leader gestured, and one of them broke off, circling around the back of the building.

An ambush.

Worthy heard a shout, and then Rollan and Conor raced around the corner of the school and stopped short, seeing the five Oathbound waiting for them; the sixth was coming from behind. Rollan pulled out what looked like a little knife from his boot. But it wouldn't be enough.

Good, Worthy thought.

The Oathbound closed in on the boys, brandishing their swords. Their leader, a tall, gaunt-faced man, was Marked. He had a huge black-feathered bird, a vulture maybe, riding on his shoulder.

Six adults, armed and well trained, versus two stupid kids who hadn't even called forth their spirit animals yet. Worthy waited another moment, just so they'd know how much danger they were in before he heroically rescued them. Before going, he checked that his long panther tail, which sometimes liked to wave free when he got into a fight, was hidden away. All set.

Just as the Marked Oathbound was about to grab Rollan, there was a flash of light, and Essix appeared in full flight, shrieking and slashing with her sharp talons at the face of the attacker, who fell back, wailing loudly. Essix arced higher to gain altitude for a strike against the vulture, which had launched itself awkwardly from its perch. Rollan leaned back to let an Oathbound woman's blade pass him by, then ducked and used a low kick to sweep her legs out from under her.

A move he'd learned from the terrifying Meilin, no doubt.

The woman scrambled away from Rollan, then got to her feet and fled down the street.

At the same moment, Conor called forth Briggan, who leaped from his arm, teeth bared, and knocked an attacking Oathbound to the ground; a quick bite to the shoulder and the man was writhing in the dust, moaning. Meanwhile, Conor caught the knife Rollan had tossed to him. He ducked a sword thrust from another one of the Oathbound.

What had been two versus six was already two versus three, and Conor was attacking, using the speed and agility he gained by Briggan being in his active state.

Whoops, Worthy thought. Better get in there and be a hero quick, before the Greencloak boys rescued themselves.

Feeling ridiculously gleeful, Worthy burst from his hiding place. One pantherlike leap, and he was close enough to the fight to rake his retractable claws down the arm of an Oathbound. Then he spun into a jump that took him behind the man Rollan was fighting. With a growl, he aimed a blow at the man's head. The Oathbound swayed before falling to the ground, landing with a thud. The man Conor had been fighting was trembling on the ground, with Briggan's big paws on his chest, holding him down.

Worthy, Conor, and Rollan had a moment to stand looking at each other as the dust of the fight settled around them.

Overhead, Essix soared and let out a fierce cry.

"More Oathbound coming!" Rollan gasped, blinking, and Worthy knew he'd been looking through the falcon's eyes.

The three whirled to see nine more black-clad figures charging down the street, led by the one who had run away. Uh-oh, Worthy realized. She hadn't been fleeing—she'd been fetching reinforcements.

Three against ten was another story. No, make that twelve—two members of the original Oathbound ambush were climbing from the ground, picking up the swords they'd dropped.

Rollan and Conor took up defensive stances, back-to-back. “Stay with us!” Rollan shouted at Worthy, as if they were going to protect him!

Both of the boys were panting. Conor gripped the small knife, their only weapon. Essix had landed on Rollan’s shoulder; Worthy saw the boy flinch as she caught her balance, her talons clinging to him. Briggan crouched at Conor’s side, ready to attack.

Worthy formed up next to them. “What’s the plan?” he asked.

“Uh, don’t let them capture us?” Rollan said. He kept his eyes on the Oathbound, who were being ordered by the tall, thin Marked man with the vulture to split into groups. They’d attack from three sides.

“No plan,” Conor said quickly. “We can’t defeat that many. We’ll have to fight our way free and run.”

“Oathbound!” came the harsh call from the Marked leader. “Attack!” His vulture was perched on his shoulder. At his order, its ragged wings spread wide and it launched itself into the air, swooping closer as the black-clad soldiers drew their weapons—mostly swords, with just a few spears to keep things interesting.

Worthy extended his claws and crouched, ready to spring into action.

And then the Oathbound were on them.

Growling, Briggan leaped, tackling a soldier and sending his sword flying.

Overhead, the vulture, twice Essix’s size, battled the falcon; the two birds clashed and then tumbled to the ground, trailing feathers. The vulture had no vocal cords, so it had no call, but it made a guttural hissing sound as it tried slashing Essix with its hooked beak. Worthy heard the falcon shriek with fury and saw her hurl herself into the air again, pursued by the ponderously flapping vulture.

Worthy lithely avoided the thrust of a spear and then bonked the Oathbound holding it on the head; the woman collapsed almost gracefully onto the ground. Worthy then whirled in time to see Rollan fighting hand-to-hand with a man he must have disarmed; another Oathbound came at Rollan from the side, slashing the boy’s arm with her sword. As Rollan flinched, the man he was fighting struck him hard in the face.

Rollan fell heavily to the ground, then rolled away from the fighting, shaking his head as if he was stunned. Blood spurted from the sword cut on his arm. He gripped it with his other hand, but blood leaked out between his fingers. “I’m out,” he gasped, catching Worthy’s eye.

And suddenly it wasn’t about being a hero anymore.

Rollan was hurt.

Conor and Briggan were surrounded.

It was time to really fight.

Ripping off his mask, Worthy snarled out a challenge. For a moment, the Oathbound fell back before his rage—and at the sight of his slitted golden eyes and the claws that extended from the tips of his fingers. But at a shouted order from their leader, they seemed to take courage, gripping their weapons and surging back into an attack.

This is it, Worthy thought as he yowled and leaped to meet the onslaught. It didn’t matter how well he fought—they were too many. Rollan and Conor were the ones they wanted; if Worthy ran, they probably wouldn’t come after him. But he wasn’t going to abandon the Greencloaks. He would do whatever he could.

Just as the Oathbound began their charge, the double doors to the school burst open, and three of the students, with Aidana, rushed out.

All three of the students were Marked!

Aidana flung out her arm, and her spirit animal, a raven, flashed into the air. With a harsh cry he joined Essix in fighting the huge vulture. Aidana followed it into battle, going straight to crouch at her son’s side. Whipping off an embroidered scarf, she wrapped it around his arm to stop the bleeding.

Meanwhile, her three Marked students had joined the battle. They were surprisingly skilled, Worthy could see at once. As he fought off the Oathbound leader, an Amayan girl called forth a flamingo, which flapped awkwardly into the air, joining the aerial battle among Rollan’s falcon, his mother’s raven, and the huge vulture. At the same time, a tall Euran boy drew a longsword and joined the fray. His spirit animal, a stag the same red as his hair, leaped past him and slashed at an Oathbound soldier with antlers as sharp as knives.

The third student was a Niloan girl. With calm and precision, she drew a throwing knife from the sleeve of her sand-colored robe, took aim, and hurled it toward one of the attackers. At her feet bounded a little gray fox with huge ears. Worthy heard it make a yipping sound—it was picking out targets for the Niloan girl’s knives!

Clearly Rollan’s mother was teaching more than just reading and math in her school. One day her students might become powerful Greencloaks.

The battle swirled around Worthy, and he fought with all his panther-given speed and skill. Even with the help of Aidana and the three students, it was only enough to give Worthy, Rollan, and Conor an opening to escape.

At the mouth of the alley Worthy had been hiding in before, Briggan gave a sharp bark, summoning them. “We have to run!” Worthy shouted.

“Yes, go!” Aidana struck with her staff. “Jean-Luc,” she shouted at one of her students, “there’s one behind you!” She whirled and yelled, “We’ll hold them off. Run!”

Retreating, Rollan stumbled to the alley, Essix on his shoulder. A moment later, Conor joined him, calling for Briggan. Worthy snatched his mask from the dusty ground, then bounded into the alley, where he scooped up the bags of supplies. Handing one to Conor to carry, he followed as Briggan led them through a maze of winding alleys. The sounds of the battle in front of the school receded behind them.

“Left here,” Rollan gasped. “Then straight on.”

Oh, yeah, Worthy remembered. Rollan had grown up as a street kid in Concorba. He’d probably lived in these very alleys. A glance over his shoulder showed Worthy that Rollan had fallen a few steps behind. Sheathing his claws, he slowed and waited for him to catch up.

“We can rest a minute,” Worthy said, putting down his load of supplies. His tail had been trying to escape; he tucked it quickly away before the two Greencloaks could see it.

Rollan nodded and leaned against a brick wall, breathing hard. He had a growing bruise on one high cheekbone, where the Oathbound had punched him. The scarf his mother had wrapped around his arm was stained with blood.

Conor turned back and set the bag he was carrying on the ground. A nod to Briggan, and the wolf flashed into his dormant state. “Better not to be noticed now,” he said.

The three boys stood in the shadowy alley, catching their breaths. Worthy listened intently for sounds of pursuit but heard nothing. Just the everyday noises of a busy marketplace not far away, and a horse passing in a nearby street. “I think we’re clear,” he said quietly.

“For now,” Rollan said. “But they’ll be coming.”

Worthy nodded in agreement.

“That was good, remembering the supplies,” Conor said to him.

Worthy bent his head to tie on his mask, not wanting to reveal how pleased he was by Conor’s comment. Maybe the ice between them was beginning to thaw. With his toe he shoved one of the bags closer to Rollan. “I knew I had to get that one.” Mask in place, he looked up at the other boy but said nothing more.

He’d seen what Rollan had stored inside the bag.

Rollan just stared at him for a moment. Then he nodded. He glanced back the way they’d come. “I hope she’s all right.”

Ohhhhh. Worthy suddenly realized what he’d been unable to see before. Of course Rollan had known the Oathbound would be a danger, but he’d gone to see his mother anyway. He loved her. Just as he’d loved that Tarik guy.

Devin Trunswick had grown up with everything—family, a luxurious home, servants, and the knowledge that he would be an earl someday. And yet he’d still always hungered for more.

It was a hunger that had led him straight to the Conquerors.

When Devin eventually lost everything that he’d thought he wanted, he discovered what truly mattered to him. There was one person in his life who’d always love him, even when he made a mistake as big as joining an evil army. His brother, Dawson.

It was Dawson for whom Devin had finally decided to be Worthy.

Rollan, in contrast, had grown up with nothing, not even a family. The people he loved probably mattered more to him than anything.

Worthy swallowed. “I’m sorry about”—he flashed his eyes subtly toward the bag—“before.”

Rollan nodded. "It's all right," he said briefly. He studied Worthy for another moment. Then his mouth quirked into half a grin. "You yowled during the fight, didn't you?" he said.

Worthy blinked. Was Rollan teasing him? "I didn't yowl," he protested.

"Yes, you did," Conor put in seriously.

"See?" Rollan said, as if he was being completely reasonable. "You howled, Worthy. Like a cat with its tail being pulled."

"Yowled, you said, not howled. And I never yowl," Worthy corrected. "Or howl." He waited a beat. "Though I have been known to caterwaul now and then." Then he realized that Rollan, for the first time, had called him by his chosen name. And even Conor had joined in the joke.

As he returned Rollan's grin, he realized that maybe, finally, he had proved himself worthy of it.

“I NEED MORE ARROWS,” ABEKE SAID. AT HER SIDE, URAZA stood and stretched, then resettled in a patch of sunlight. Her violet eyes dropped shut as she dozed off again.

“We need more everything.” Meilin lifted her sword and inspected the blade, newly sharpened. Light glinted off the polished metal. Sheathing the weapon, she got to her feet. “Rollan and Conor should have been back with the supplies by now.” And Worthy. The Redcloak had spoken briefly with Abeke, and then he’d disappeared. Following the boys into Concorba, she assumed. Helping, he probably thought of it.

And speaking of disappearing ... Meilin glanced around the clearing they’d been waiting in.

There, a movement, and she caught a glimpse of Anka’s outline, blending into the rough brown bark of the tree she was leaning against.

So far, the Greencloak woman had been a valuable asset. But Meilin had long ago stopped thinking of people only as resources to be used. Maybe Anka could be a friend, too.

Meilin stretched, then ran through a few simple fighting forms, just to limber up. Then she paused. “Anka, would you like to spar with me?”

“No,” came the brusque answer. “I don’t fight. I hide.”

Nodding, Meilin stepped closer, then crouched near where she thought Anka was sitting. “Would you put your chameleon into passive state?” she asked. “I’d like to see what you really look like.”

There was a moment of silence. Meilin knew that Abeke was listening, too. “Nobody sees me as I am,” Anka finally said. The usual sharpness was missing from her voice.

“Sometimes,” Meilin said, “you don’t have to hide.”

“I would like to see you, too,” Abeke put in.

“All right,” the Greencloak woman said softly. There was a flash as the chameleon went into the dormant state.

Meilin saw Anka take shape before her. The woman sat very still—she must have trained herself to move as little as possible, in order to stay hidden. Revealed, Anka wore her green cloak. She sat cross-legged, her arms folded. The mark of her chameleon was wrapped around her wrist like a bracelet. Her hair was black and bristly, cut very short. Her eyes were dark brown, her face plain and ordinary, and ...

“You’re from Zhong!” Meilin exclaimed, delighted.

“You noticed,” Anka said dryly.

“I would have noticed before, if you’d let me,” Meilin said. And now she knew another reason why Anka didn’t know how to fight—in Zhong, girls weren’t supposed to study the martial arts. “Let me teach you a few forms, Anka,” she insisted, getting to her feet. “You never know when you might need to fight.” She took up a basic stance, standing very still; then she made a quick strike at the air and returned to her stance. “See? You could hit somebody out of nowhere. They’d never see you coming. Come and try it.”

“If you insist,” Anka said, standing up, but Meilin could see that she was interested.

They spent an hour this way: Meilin teaching, Anka awkward at first but learning quickly. Meilin was showing her where to strike an opponent’s neck to incapacitate him or her, when Uraza lifted her head and pricked her ears, alert. The tip of her spotted tail twitched.

Meilin heard it next—the sound of leaves crunching underfoot. Someone was coming, and not being too stealthy about it. Abeke got to her feet, raising her bow and nocking her single arrow.

Then Meilin relaxed. Coming through the trees were the three boys, carrying bags of supplies.

Her eyes went straight to Rollan. His face was bruised, and she saw with alarm that he was wearing a makeshift bandage. It was stained with blood.

“Can I get some panda spit here?” he asked, holding up his arm. He smiled to show her that he was essentially all right.

“Trouble?” Abeke asked.

Conor nodded and dropped the bags he’d been carrying onto the leafy ground. “Worthy was right—”

“You hear that?” Worthy interrupted, grinning. “Me. I was right.” He thumped himself proudly on the chest.

Conor stared at him for a long moment, then gave his head a rueful shake. “Anyway. The Oathbound were on the lookout for us. Wikam the Just was leading them.” Kneeling, Conor was unwrapping another bundle that he’d been carrying. He handed it to Abeke. “Arrows.”

“Ah, thank you!” Abeke said, seizing them and inspecting each arrow. She’d want to be sure they were made well and would fly straight.

Rollan settled on the ground and started trying to untie the bandage around his arm with one hand. “We had a little scuffle.”

“It was hardly little,” Worthy said. He’d taken up a position at the edge of the clearing, looking back in the direction they’d come. “We’ve only got a couple of minutes. The Oathbound will be on our tail soon. Our trail, I mean.”

Something had changed, Meilin realized. She knelt beside Rollan and carefully unwrapped the scarf from around his arm. The boys were treating Worthy as if he was ... well ... a friend. Even Conor was looking at him without frowning, and Meilin knew that Conor had very good reasons for hating Devin Trunswick. Clearly Worthy had proved himself in that little scuffle they’d had. It must have been quite a fight.

As Meilin took off Rollan’s bandage, she saw that he had a gash on his arm about as long as her hand. It wasn’t too deep, but it oozed blood, and she knew it had to hurt. With a quick gesture she summoned Jhi from passive state. The big panda yawned and rubbed at her eyes sleepily.

Rollan held up his arm. “Give me the spit, bear,” he said. Jhi sniffed at it, then licked it three times with her pink tongue.

Meilin saw Rollan relax. Yes, it had been painful. Now at least it wouldn't hurt as much, and there wouldn't be any danger of infection. Meilin didn't have time to stitch it up, but hopefully there was a field medical kit in the supplies and she could see to it properly later.

Suddenly Anka was at her shoulder. As soon as the boys had returned, she had called her chameleon spirit animal and faded once again into the background. "Conor said Wikam the Just was leading the Oathbound. We need to go."

From his lookout spot, Worthy nodded. "Yeah." He nodded at Rollan. "You all right?"

"Fine," Rollan said, and pulled his sleeve down over the scarf that Meilin had finished retying over his wound.

Conor and Abeke each picked up a bag of supplies. Meilin, Anka, Rollan, and Worthy did the same.

"Let's go," Anka said, and they headed out.

By traveling hard and sleeping light, and never kindling a campfire, they managed to remain ahead of the Oathbound scouts who hunted them.

All six of them had faced such hardships before. Their spirit animals helped them; they knew how to cross the land without leaving a trace. But they were still in danger from a scout who searched for them from above.

Every now and then Rollan caught sight of Wikam the Just's vulture floating in wide circles over the land, its ragged wings catching every warm updraft, its keen eyes in its featherless red skull searching, always searching. Whenever Essix gave a warning cry, Anka had the four Greencloaks and Worthy freeze where they stood, and she camouflaged them until the huge bird had passed.

Every evening, Rollan sent Essix aloft to check on their pursuers. He would close his eyes, unsteady on his feet until he blinked and opened his eyes again.

"Still on our trail," he reported every night.

Relentless.

The Oathbound were relentless.

The Greencloaks, with Anka in the lead and Worthy bringing up the rear, were crossing a land of bare, weathered red rocks that the wind had twisted into odd, bulbous shapes.

Rollan was walking two steps ahead of Meilin. He closed his eyes and suddenly tripped, sprawling onto the stony ground.

“Ow,” he mumbled. He scrambled to his feet, looking up at the cloudless sky. “Essix is to the south. The vulture is coming.”

Anka, who looked reddish and weathered like the rocks they were crossing, hissed out what sounded like a curse. “Hurry.” She pointed at a shelf of rock with a shady spot below it. “There.”

Quickly they put their spirit animals into dormant state and shoved their bags of supplies into the hiding place, then squeezed themselves in so the shadow of the rock overhead covered them. Anka went still, and they all turned the same lined, red shade of the rocks.

The air was dusty, and it tickled in Meilin’s nose, but she didn’t dare sneeze. She was sitting next to Rollan, with Abeke on her other side. They waited in a heavy silence for a few minutes.

“Anything?” Anka whispered to Rollan.

There was a pause while he looked at the land through Essix’s eyes. “It’s still circling,” he reported.

They were silent. Meilin felt the hardness of the stone beneath her. She wished she could shift to a more comfortable position, but that would give them away to the bird that hunted them.

After a few more quiet minutes, Conor asked a question, hardly moving his lips. “I’ve been thinking. What if the leaders of Erdas and the Oathbound do break up the Greencloaks? What will happen?”

They all considered it. Meilin knew that, while the Oathbound were a threat, the real enemy was whoever had sent the Fakecloaks, as Rollan had called them, to attack the meeting in the Citadel. That mysterious person or group was the true enemy—they had tricked the leaders of Erdas into thinking the Greencloaks were assassins. They were using the leaders and the Oathbound for their own purposes. Breaking up the Greencloaks might be only part of their plans.

A moment later, Meilin heard Abeke’s soft voice. “Do you remember our Greencloak vow?”

Rollan answered immediately. “Yes.”

“Shhhh,” interrupted Anka.

Rollan went on in a whisper. “Our vow is a lifetime commitment to stand united with the Greencloaks and defend Erdas.”

“Exactly,” Abeke said. “United. It’s like what Olvan said when he sent us on this mission.”

“We have to stay true to each other, he said,” Conor put in.

“Not only that,” Abeke went on. “We Greencloaks are ... ” She paused. “I don’t know how to describe it. We’re like the glue that keeps all of Erdas from falling apart.”

“Glue, seriously?” whispered Rollan.

Meilin heard Worthy snort out a laugh.

“Can you all please shut up?” Anka hissed in a whisper. “Or at least don’t move for the next ten minutes? Unless,” she added acidly, “you actually want that vulture to see us.”

As she spoke, Meilin saw the shadow of the great vulture cross the sunlit rock just beyond their hiding place. She stilled, trying not to breathe.

And she remembered what the emperor had said to her—that the Marked of Zhong should belong to Zhong. He had seen her not as a person, not as Meilin, daughter of General Teng, but as an asset and a resource. “If we were just Marked,” she whispered slowly, “and not Greencloaks, eventually our countries would use us as weapons.”

“But there’s no war,” Conor whispered.

“There would be,” Worthy put in, his voice sardonic.

Meilin didn’t nod, but she agreed. Without the Greencloaks to keep the peace, the great countries of Erdas would fracture. Everything would fall apart.

“We would have to fight each other,” Conor said, and Meilin could hear the horror in his voice.

She felt it, too. Fight against Abeke? Against Conor? Against Rollan? No. Never.

But what if none of them were given any choice?

Abeke’s voice was the barest whisper. “It’s up to us. There is some force that’s trying to disband the Greencloaks. It will try to divide us from each other. In the same way, it wants to divide the great nations of Erdas from each other. But we have to fight it. Together. The gifts will help, starting with the Heart of the Land. And so will our friendship. We are all of Erdas, united.”

At Abeke’s words, Meilin felt goose bumps prickle over the skin of her arms. She had always admired her friend’s wisdom, but Abeke had spoken a deeper truth. They faced a mysterious force that had already killed the Emperor of Zhong, and now it was going after the Greencloaks. It would try to divide them. To destroy the Greencloaks forever. After that, there would be chaos. War. Death.

There was a long, awed silence.

“So you’re saying we really do have to be glue,” Rollan whispered. “I guess that means we’re stuck with each other.” Meilin could hear the strain in his voice. He was trying to lighten a heavy moment.

Moving slowly, Meilin edged her hand over the cool, lined rock until her fingers touched his.

Yes, Rollan, she thought. We’re stuck.

SNEAK ATTACK

THE NEXT MORNING THEY LEFT THE STONE LANDS, moving into a rocky, forested area thick with pine trees and loud with waterfalls. Rollan remembered passing through land like this before, on his first mission with the Greencloaks—before he'd actually been a Greencloak. They'd followed Conor's vision of Arax, trying to find the Granite Ram talisman. In this part of Amaya, the air was dry and cold, and the sky was a deep blue without a single cloud.

The lake with the island called the Heart of the Land was not far away, Anka told them. They only had to stay ahead of Wikam the Unjust and his Oathbound trackers for a few more days, and they would be there.

And then, they all hoped, they would figure out how to reveal the rock.

Rollan still wasn't sure what that meant, exactly. The night before, Meilin had brought the rock out again, had unwrapped it, and they'd gathered to look at it.

"So what're you supposed to do with it?" Worthy had asked.

"Reveal it," Meilin had told him.

Then he'd reached out, grabbed the rock, and started picking at the scales that seemed to cover it.

"Stop that!" Meilin said. "You'll break it."

Worthy had dropped the rock on the ground, then bent to pick it up again. “It’s a rock. It’s not going to break.”

At that, Meilin had snatched the rock away from him, wrapped it up, and turned her back on Worthy.

The masked boy shrugged. “I was only trying to help.”

After a day of hard travel, they set up a rough camp at the side of a stream that rushed loudly through mossy stones. They ate a cold dinner of travel biscuits, jerky, and dried apples. Anka, of course, was not to be seen. Conor sat quietly talking to Abeke, Briggan close to his side. Uraza was at the edge of their camp, on guard. Worthy sat on a fallen log, throwing bits of twig into the stream.

Jhi, who was not the best traveler, had been dormant all day. With a flash of light, Meilin called her out. The panda’s black eye-spots made her face seem almost mournful as she looked around the meager campsite; then she lumbered to a nearby tree and started stripping it of its brown, late-autumn leaves.

“Not her favorite,” Rollan said. His arm barely hurt anymore, and didn’t need any more Jhi spit. He still had a smudge of a bruise, a sore spot over his cheekbone, another reminder of their fight.

“She’d rather have bamboo,” Meilin acknowledged.

Rollan pointed upstream. “Essix saw a waterfall up that way,” he said to Meilin. “Want to take a look?”

Meilin set aside the sword she’d been sharpening obsessively and got to her feet.

Worthy turned his slitted pupils on them. “Where are you going, Rollan and Meilin?” He grinned. “Reilin, I mean.”

Looking over at Meilin, Rollan saw that her face had turned bright red. He knew he was blushing, too. For once, he didn’t have a sarcastic answer ready. Instead, he just glared at Worthy.

Worthy laughed—until Meilin turned her own glare on him. “Yipes!” Worthy said, and fell off the log he’d been sitting on.

Rollan stalked out of the camp, heading upstream. Meilin followed him, leaving Jhi to her dinner.

Reilin. Ridiculous!

They went along the stream in awkward silence, climbing over mossy rocks, winding around ferns and pine trees, until they came to the pebbly bank of a pool. The fresh, clear water stood at the base of a waterfall, which poured from a notch in a cliff high above. The falling water hitting the pool was so loud, Rollan could feel it in his bones.

The air was colder here, and a chilly mist from the waterfall drifted over them. Meilin shivered, and Rollan stepped closer. In silence they watched the swags of white water pour down, turn to lace, and then slam into the pool at the base of the cliff. Rollan had never seen anything so beautiful in his life.

He moved even closer to Meilin, speaking right into her ear so she could hear him over the roar of the waterfall. She had droplets of water in her braided hair, shining like pearls. “I remember something Tarik once told me,” Rollan said. “He said, I want to know Erdas in all her different forms of beauty. And so do I.”

Meilin nodded, her face still and serious. “Erdas would be less beautiful if it was divided, or at war.”

Rollan looked down, because meeting her eyes would be too intense. “I can’t imagine having to fight you, Lady Panda.”

“For one thing,” Meilin said, smiling, “you’d lose.”

Rollan laughed. That was true.

And then, a smile still on her lips, Meilin leaned closer.

They had kissed each other once before, but it had been during a moment of excitement and happiness, and it had lasted about two seconds. Maybe less. Was she ... Were they going to kiss again?

Rollan felt half afraid, half excited, and half ...

Wait, that was too many halves.

Shut up, he told himself, and, leaning toward Meilin, he closed his eyes.

A shrill scream pierced the air, even louder than the booming roar of the waterfall.

Rollan jerked away from Meilin. His eyes popped open.

There were sounds of shouting and yowling—Worthy—the roar of a big cat—Uraza—and then the clash of weapons.

“The camp,” Meilin gasped. “It must be under attack.”

As one, they turned and raced toward the others, dodging trees, skidding over the mossy rocks. The sun was close to setting—it was hard to see where they were going.

Meilin reached camp first, Rollan half a step behind her. Their friends were in the thick of a battle, one they were already losing. The shadowy forest around their campsite was swarming with Oathbound fighters, who darted and hid between the trees, not venturing into the clearing, but flinging knives, shooting arrows, and hurling spears.

Briggan was a gray blur as he leaped on the nearest Oathbound and bore her, screaming, to the ground. Conor had pulled out his ax, but he had nobody to use it on—the Oathbound attackers kept striking briefly and then melting back into the darkening forest.

There was a scream from among the trees—Uraza was out there, stealthily hunting, a swift and deadly shadow.

A thrown spear had pinned Worthy’s crimson cloak to the log he’d been sitting on; he was frantically trying to get the cloak off so he could stand up and fight.

Abeke had just finished stringing her bow. From his place on the edge of the camp, Rollan saw an Oathbound aim an arrow at her.

“Abeke!” he shouted. “Look out!”

The enemy arrow streaked across the camp. Calmly, Abeke looked up, and with leopardlike speed, snatched the arrow out of the air, flipped it, knocked it on her bowstring, and fired it back in the direction it had come from. Rollan heard a cry as it struck the Oathbound archer.

Meanwhile, another Oathbound was venturing into the camp with a spear ready, approaching Conor from behind.

Rollan drew his long knife and opened his mouth to yell a warning to his friend, when Anka struck the spearman from nowhere, a focused blow to the face. Then she disappeared again, and the spearman dropped to the ground, blood fountaining from his nose.

“Did you teach her that?” Rollan asked Meilin.

“Duck!” she shouted.

He didn't question that kind of order. He hit the dirt, and Meilin aimed a swift blow where his head had been, knocking the swooping vulture out of the air. The bird flopped to the ground, then awkwardly flapped its wings to get airborne again.

Climbing to his feet, Rollan heard Essix's outraged shriek—the falcon really hated the vulture. Using the speed of his bond with the bird, Rollan swooped into the clearing. His dagger blocked a knife thrown by a shadowy figure, who now darted behind a tree. "There!" he shouted to Essix, and the falcon dived down to claw at the knife-thrower's eyes.

Finally freeing his red cloak, Worthy jumped up from the log, his curled fingers bristling with his retractable claws. Seeing that the Oathbound were hiding among the trees, he yowled in frustration. "Cowards!" he shouted at them.

But even more Oathbound were coming. The air was thick with arrows that, somehow, didn't quite seem to hit their targets—Rollan thought they probably had Anka's chameleon power to thank for that. A dagger flashed past his face and embedded itself in a tree behind him.

"There are too many!" Meilin shouted as she fought against three shadowy figures at the edge of the camp.

"We have to retreat," Anka ordered. She was a blur of night-black and green. "Come on!"

"But the supplies!" Worthy protested.

"Leave them!" Anka ordered.

Meilin disarmed one opponent, ducked a spear thrust from another, and raced to follow Anka. Conor and Briggan followed, as did Worthy.

Rollan started after them, then took a quick detour to grab the pack containing Tarik's cloak. An arrow hit the pack as he slung it over his shoulder; he raced past Abeke, who was backing out of the clearing, keeping an arrow nocked, covering their retreat. Uraza bounded past her, and she turned and ran.

The five Greencloaks and Worthy fled from the camp, past the waterfall, and kept going farther upstream until they had left their attackers behind. Panting, they stopped in a clearing, where they stood knee-deep in ferns. The sun was just setting, and the dim and dusty light of evening had settled over the forest. In half an hour, it would be fully dark.

Rollan saw Conor cock his head, listening, his hearing acute thanks to his bond with Briggan. “They’re not coming.”

“We’re clear—for now,” Abeke agreed.

Rollan pulled out the arrow that had hit the pack and handed it to her; she nodded and added it to her quiver. He was aware of Essix perched on a nearby branch, settling her feathers after her fight with Wikam the Just’s vulture.

“Is everyone all right?” Meilin asked, inspecting her sword, wiping it clean on her trousers, then sheathing it. She looked around to see everyone nod.

Rollan frowned. “Why did they let us go?”

“We were too mighty?” Worthy said with a shrug. “We fought too fiercely?”

Rollan gave him a look that said, You are such an idiot.

“I mean it,” Worthy protested. “Did you see that thing Abeke did, catching the arrow?” He mimed drawing back a string and firing a bow. “It was amazing!”

“Yeah,” Rollan agreed. “But the Oathbound outnumbered us five to one.”

“They definitely could have taken us,” Meilin put in.

Rollan knew she was right. Then he let out a breath, realizing what was happening. “They haven’t been hunting us. They’ve been driving us.” He glanced at Abeke, the best hunter in their group, and she nodded, agreeing. “Oh,” Rollan went on. “They don’t want us.”

“What do you mean?” Worthy asked. “They’re hunting and arresting all the Greencloaks they can find.”

“They might want us,” Rollan clarified, “eventually. But what they want first is the rock. The gift. Wikam the Unjust must know about the Heart of the Land.”

Meilin nodded, understanding. “I think you’re right. They’ll wait for us to reveal the rock, and then they’ll try to take it from us.”

“We can’t let that happen,” Conor said seriously.

“Maybe we should split up,” Abeke said. “Conor and I could lead them astray while Meilin and Rollan head for the island in the lake.”

“And me,” Worthy said.

“No,” Meilin said. “I know we’ve had to split up on other missions, but on this one we can’t. It’s like what Rollan said: We’re glue. We have to stick together.”

“We have to stay true,” Conor added, “like Olvan said.”

Anka stepped out of the shadows; her features were blurred, hard to read. “Make up your minds. What are we doing?”

“We can’t turn back,” Meilin said. “Somehow, the four gifts are the key to saving the Greencloaks.”

“And maybe more than that,” Abeke put in.

“So we head for the lake,” Meilin said, “and once the rock is revealed, we’ll figure out how to evade the Oathbound trackers. Anka can help us with her chameleon powers. Agreed?”

The others, including Anka, nodded.

“Can we rest here tonight?” Worthy asked.

“It depends on how close the trackers are,” Meilin answered. “Rollan, can you take a look?”

With a nod, Rollan called up to Essix; he could see her amber eyes watching him from a high branch in a nearby tree. With a rush of wind, she launched herself into the air, swooping high, flapping her wings to gain height.

Rollan closed his eyes, felt the usual dizzying rush of darkness and wind, and then saw a falcon’s view of the forest. From this high, the sky was pinkish-gray to the west where the sun had gone down, and deep blue-black to the east where the night was rising. The waterfall was a strip of lacy white that almost glowed in the fading twilight; the stream was a shiny black ribbon running through the dark clouds of trees. Essix’s keen gaze showed Rollan the Oathbound trackers in the Greencloaks’ camp, going through the packs, tossing food and other supplies onto the ground. Wikam the Just watched them with arms folded, his bony shoulders hunched.

“They’re searching for the rock,” he said aloud, without opening his eyes.

He tried to count. The Oathbound wore black, so they were hard to see among the trees, but he thought there were about fifteen of them, including Wikam. A few had been wounded in the fight; they were being tended.

From the corner of Essix's eye Rollan saw a flash of black, and Wikam's vulture struck the falcon hard from the side—a sneak attack. His vision whirled as Essix tumbled, then steadied as she caught herself and banked and met the vulture's next attack head on. The two birds clashed together—Essix's talons tearing at the vulture's wrinkly red-skinned head and malevolent mud-brown eyes. Its hooked beak—made for disemboweling already-dead prey—ripped at the falcon. There was a spray of blood, and Essix released her talons and fell away. The vulture gave a harsh croak of victory.

The ground spun closer as the falcon plunged downward.

"Essix!" Rollan gasped, dizzy.

"What's going on?" he heard Meilin ask.

"Hold on a minute," he panted, and felt a hand on his shoulder, steadying him.

Come on, Essix—fly!

There was another terrifying moment of Essix plummeting from the sky. Then the falcon's wings caught the air, and her fall turned into a wobbly glide. Rollan spied the vulture, slower, flapping after her. She went higher, using her speed to stay ahead of the other bird.

As the falcon climbed even higher, Rollan realized what the vulture had been trying to prevent Essix from seeing.

With a gasp, he opened his eyes, blinking, then gazing around in horror at his friends, at Worthy, at the faded shadow that was Anka.

"It's not just trackers," he said. "Those are only scouts. There's a whole army of Oathbound out there. And they're coming after us."

HIGHNESS

AT THE DOOR WAITED THE LEADER OF THE CITADEL'S Oathbound guards, Brunhild the Merry. "Your Highness," she said, bowing.

Princess Song did not turn from the mirror. Her hair was smooth, intricately braided, secured with jeweled pins. Her face was heavily made up, her lips red, her eyes outlined in black, her dainty nose and cheeks dusted with rice powder.

"Your Highness," Brunhild repeated.

Song watched her own face. It was perfect. Unmoving, like ice.

The proper way to speak to a princess was to call her Your Highness. A ruler—an emperor, a king, or a queen—was addressed as Your Majesty.

It meant something, Song knew, that the leaders of the lands of Erdas still referred to her as Highness and not Majesty.

Her father, the emperor, was dead. Zhong needed an empress.

Lifting her chin, Song considered her own face. Every feature was perfect. It was the face of a Highness, but it was not majestic. Not as her father had been. People did not look to her for guidance. No, they thought quiet and obedient and pretty.

Song had told Meilin that she envied her, and it was true. Even without the careful makeup of a royal princess, Meilin was beautiful—as beautiful as a drawn sword. Meilin looked the way a true empress would look. Powerful. Skilled. Dangerous. Deadly.

Song knew she would never look like that.

In order to take her proper place—in order to help the people of Zhong—she would have to prove herself all those things.

“Your Highness,” Brunhild repeated again from the door.

Song allowed one carefully penciled eyebrow to lift just a hair higher. It was an expression her father had made many times. In the mirror, she saw the Oathbound guard’s reflection shift uncomfortably.

“Your Majesty,” Brunhild corrected herself.

Song did not allow herself to smile. But she was satisfied.

She owned Brunhild’s loyalty. The Oathbound was sworn to serve her. But she had a great deal of work to do before the leaders of Erdas would consider her an equal. And then, on returning to Zhong, she would have to convince an entire country of her ability to rule. To be Majesty instead of Highness.

Gracefully, Princess Song rose to her feet. “Have the leaders gathered?”

Brunhild bowed. “They have. They await you.”

A regal nod, and Song led the way from the Zhongese wing to the Citadel’s main meeting room.

The chamber in which her father had been killed.

By Greencloaks.

Despite an intensive search by the Oathbound, the four youngest Greencloaks had all escaped, leaving their comrades behind.

As Song stepped into the meeting chamber, her eyes went to the six-sided table that stood in the center of the room. Its surface had been scrubbed, but the stain of her father’s blood remained, soaked deeply into the wood.

Sitting at the table was the Niloan High Chieftain, old and set in his ways. Next to him was the Euran Queen, who was always accompanied by a retinue of three or four nobles from her kingdom. She was young, very blond, and had oddly vacant eyes. The other leader was the Amayan Prime Minister, a middle-aged woman with a disapproving pout on her face. The Ambassador from Stetriol was there, too. She had been wounded in the same attack that had killed Song’s father. Her arm was crooked in a sling and her skin was ashy pale. She should probably still be in bed, recovering.

Song circled the table until she reached the Emperor of Zhong's seat.

The last time the leaders had met, she had stood behind this chair, eyes lowered, until she had dared speak out, defending the Greencloaks.

Zhong must not appear weak to the other nations, even now. Especially now.

Decisively, she sat in the emperor's chair, folded her hands in her lap, and looked around the table at the other leaders.

They stared back at her. But none challenged her right to sit at the table with them. Song allowed herself a tiny moment of triumph. The rest of the meeting would be a challenge—her chance to begin proving herself as a true leader.

The Niloan High Chieftain cleared his throat and began. "Now that the princess has finally arrived," he said in a voice tinged with complaint, "we can decide what to do next about the Greencloaks."

"I'll tell you what we must do," said the Amayan Prime Minister sharply. "The Greencloaks must be broken up and returned to their own lands. Those who were involved in this disaster must be rooted out and prosecuted."

"The Greencloaks are bad" was the Euran Queen's contribution.

"Bad doesn't even begin to describe them," complained the Niloan High Chieftain. "They are corrupt. They serve only each other. They owe their proper leaders no allegiance. Clearly they cannot be trusted."

The queen looked around the table, blinking. "They cannot be trusted," she repeated.

Princess Song sighed inwardly. The Euran Queen was lovely, but there wasn't much going on behind her pretty blue eyes. "I advise patience," Song said.

"Patience," scoffed the Amayan Prime Minister. "There can be no doubt about the Greencloaks. The attack in this very chamber told us all we need to know about them."

"And yet they have served all the nations of Erdas," Song said.

"They served in order to gain power for themselves," the prime minister said. "And look where it has led!" She pointed at the bloodstain in the middle of the table. “Your own country, Zhong, has been left leaderless!”

Song took a steadying breath. Yes, she mourned her father. But now was a time for action, not tears. She would guide her people, if they’d only give her a chance. “As we all know,” she said calmly, “Greencloaks all over the world are being arrested and arraigned.”

“And when we catch them all, we’ll put their traitorous leaders on trial—for murder!” shouted the Amayan Prime Minister.

“The Niloan Greencloaks must be returned to Nilo,” the high chieftain put in, folding his skinny arms. “In my country we have harsh penalties for betrayers.”

“They must be treated fairly,” Song insisted. Carefully she caught the eye of the Euran Queen and gave an encouraging nod.

“They must be treated fairly,” the queen repeated.

The ambassador had not yet spoken. Now she cleared her throat and said, “The world is watching us now.” She nodded at Song. “Stetriol agrees with ... with the daughter of the Emperor of Zhong. The Greencloaks must be gathered and sent to Greenhaven, where they can be imprisoned until they’re given a trial—a fair trial.”

“Did they give the emperor a fair trial before they killed him?” demanded the high chieftain. “They are assassins. Which one of us will they attack next?”

The meeting continued. Now Princess Song stayed quiet, observing how the leaders’ tempers were fraying. There were signs of disunity. As the leaders argued, they didn’t seem to realize what a danger that meant. Maybe they had been hidden away for too long to understand that leaders were supposed to lead. Not sit around arguing with each other. At one point, the Amayan Prime Minister banged her fist on the table and sourly told the Euran Queen to stay quiet unless she had something intelligent to say. In response, the queen’s eyes filled with tears. Gathering her courtiers, she fled the room, weeping. The Niloan High Chieftain followed, snorting his disgust and stalking out.

As the meeting ended, Princess Song, followed by her Oathbound guards, headed for the Citadel tower where the two Greencloak leaders were still imprisoned. The rest of the Greencloaks captured in the Citadel had been sent ahead to Greenhaven, but these two remained for questioning.

At the tower, a guard bowed and opened the door. Princess Song entered the cell where the Greencloak leader was being held. The other one, Lenori, was next door, but it was Olvan who Song wanted to see.

Olvan had been bitten by Brunhild the Merry's spirit animal, a viper. The snake's venom had turned his body hard, like stone. Orders had been given that Olvan should be treated with just enough of the antidote to keep him alive, but not enough to allow him to move or to be a danger. He could only breathe, and blink.

The Greencloak leader was a big, gray-bearded old man with a stern face set in a fierce frown. Some of the guards must have lifted him out of bed, for Olvan was propped against one wall, as still as a sculpture.

Seeing Princess Song, he blinked. His lips twitched, as if he wanted to speak. But the venom had its hold on him, so he could not move any more than that.

"Greetings," Song said politely. "I expect you are worried about the four young Greencloaks. The Heroes of Erdas, as they're called."

Olvan blinked.

"They have not been captured. At last report, they fled to Amaya." Song stepped to the cell's window and looked out. "You have a nice view here of the mountains." She glanced at the old man, who could only stare straight ahead. "I don't suppose you've seen it, though, have you?"

She stepped into his line of sight. His face, she thought, grew sterner. Angry, even. She sighed softly. "Why Amaya?" she wondered. She gave her head a brief shake. "They cannot hope to escape. The Oathbound are everywhere."

She waited a moment, as if to allow him a chance to respond. When he remained silent, she went on. "Your Greencloaks are being gathered in Greenhaven. The castle is to become their prison. We thought it a small mercy to hold them in a familiar place until they can be put on trial."

As she continued, she lifted her chin, as if wrapping a cloak of Majesty around herself. She spoke as the Empress of Zhong would speak. "On trial for what, you may wonder? And I will tell you. You, Olvan, and all the Greencloaks, are charged with treason, and with the coldhearted murder of the Emperor of Zhong.” For just a moment, she remembered the bloodstained table, and her voice wavered. “My father.”

The Greencloak leader did nothing but stare straight ahead, without even blinking. It was as if he hadn’t even heard her words.

THE WAVE

ABEKE HAD CHECKED HER ARROWS THE DAY BEFORE.

As morning approached, she checked them again, looking them over one by one as she walked. The shafts were straight, that was the main thing. The feather fletchings were balanced. The tips were razor-sharp. These arrows would fly true.

They would need to. Rollan's report the night before had horrified all of them.

An army. An entire army of Oathbound soldiers, hundreds of them, with the relentless Wikam the Just as their leader. Abeke glanced at the sky, but she didn't see the vulture. She had tried shooting at the bird before, but it usually flew too high. Now she couldn't risk losing any arrows.

After hearing Rollan's report, Anka had led them through the forest, keeping them invisible so any Oathbound scouts would not be able to track them. They had no time to stop and rest for the night. The trail led uphill toward the lake where the island called Heart of the Land was located. If they went quickly and quietly, Anka said, they could reach the lake by early morning.

Just as the sky lightened with dawn, Anka let them rest for a few moments. While Abeke inspected her bow, Uraza flopped on the ground beside her. The others sat, and Worthy pawed through the one bag of supplies that Rollan had managed to rescue from their camp.

Worthy pulled something out of the pack and quickly handed it off to Rollan. Abeke didn't get a good look at the object.

Standing, Rollan yawned loudly, then he stepped away to stretch and get ready. When he returned, he was wearing an enormous brown cloak he'd picked up in town. It looked bulky and warm in the Amayan heat, but Abeke supposed he found the weight of it comforting, after giving up Tarik's cloak.

Worthy peered into the bag. "Nothing in here but medical supplies." He looked up, his eyes wide behind his mask. "Do you know what this means?"

"No," Conor said wearily. He sat with his back against a tree, Briggan's head on his leg. "What does it mean?"

"No breakfast," Worthy said sadly.

And no dinner, either, Abeke knew. She gritted her teeth and tried not to think about it.

"Let's go," Anka said. The sky was growing light. "It's not far now."

Groaning, they all got to their feet. Abeke saw Meilin pat the pouch where she kept the rock—the unrevealed Heart of the Land. Checking to be sure it was still there.

The path they followed wound between huge pine trees. It was studded with stones and crossed by twisted roots—Abeke had to watch where she was going, or she could easily fall. Uraza paced beside her, ears pricked, violet eyes watchful. Anka and Conor hiked a few steps ahead with Briggan. Meilin, Worthy, and Rollan came after.

"Did you hear that?" Worthy asked.

"What?" Meilin asked, stopping in her tracks and cocking her head. "Is it the Oathbound scouts?"

"No," Worthy said, sounding disgusted. "It was my stomach."

Uraza turned her head and growled at him.

"Yes, growling," Worthy complained. "I'm starving!"

"You've missed exactly one meal," Meilin said calmly, and started walking again. "You're hardly starving."

"I am," Worthy said dolefully, following. "Starving to death." Then he glanced over his shoulder at Rollan, who walked two steps behind him with Essix. The gyrfalcon had been slightly wounded in her fight against the vulture. She was now riding on Rollan's shoulder, looking ruffled and annoyed. "Rollan," Worthy said, "you're from Amaya. You must know how to forage for food. Tell us where to find roots and berries."

"Oh sure," Rollan said sharply. "If somebody threw roots and berries on a trash heap in Concorba, I'm your guy. That's the kind of foraging I know about."

"Cranky," complained Worthy.

Abeke couldn't stand another second of this. "Worthy, were you ever in your entire life unsure of where your next meal was coming from?"

"Not until now," Worthy answered grumpily.

"Oh, poor you," Abeke heard Rollan mutter, and he did sound a little cranky.

Abeke didn't blame him. They might have let Worthy join them, but the Redcloak boy was still intensely annoying. Some of the time.

They traveled as the morning continued, climbing higher and higher, until Abeke felt light-headed from hunger and the altitude.

Ever since the attack on their camp, there had not been a sign of the Oathbound, neither the trackers nor the army. Abeke thought it meant Rollan had been right the day before—Wikam the Just and his Oathbound knew about the rock and wanted the Greencloaks to reveal it before they pounced.

Well, she and her friends would be ready for them. Uraza was ready, for sure. Abeke had never seen the leopard so on edge, or Briggan, either. Both spirit animals were eager to fight.

There was a grumbling sound.

"Did you hear that?" Worthy said.

"Stop complaining about your stomach!" Meilin snapped.

"I'm not!" Worthy protested. Abeke turned to see him pointing at the sky. "Thunder," he said grimly.

He was right. Abeke had been watching the path, trying not to trip, and she hadn't noticed how the morning was getting darker instead of lighter. Now the clouds were gray, and so low they seemed to be snagged on the pointed tips of the pine trees. Distant thunder growled again.

Quickly, Abeke unstrung her bow and wrapped it in its leather case. The string couldn't get too wet, or it wouldn't function when she needed

it. She wrapped the arrows in the quiver, too.

“No, Worthy,” she heard Meilin say, a little scornfully, “we are not stopping to shelter from the storm. We have to go on.”

There was more grumbling. Worthy, this time, and not the thunder.

Abeke smiled to herself. She suspected this was more than just Devin Trunswick’s fussiness showing through. As a Redcloak, Worthy had taken on aspects of his spirit animal, the black panther.

Conor stepped up to walk at her side. “What are you smiling about?” he asked.

She shrugged. “Worthy. He’s like Uraza—like most cats. He doesn’t like getting wet.”

Conor glanced down at Briggan, who trotted at his side with his tongue lolling. “We don’t mind the rain.” Then he nodded toward Rollan, who was coming up the rutted path behind them. “But I bet we’re all going to wish for our old cloaks by the time today is over.”

Perhaps Rollan had been wise to replace his after all. Abeke agreed, and they went on. A few spatters of rain began to fall, heavy drops that made little craters in the dusty path.

“Abeke,” Conor said, in a low voice, “speaking of getting wet . . . ”

She nodded to show him that she was listening.

“Four nights ago I had a dream,” he said.

She glanced quickly at him. “Not a—”

“No,” he reassured her. “Not a Wyrms nightmare. I’m done with those. Something else.” He swallowed and looked away. “Almost as scary.”

Abeke stopped short and called to the others to join them. They gathered on the path in a tight circle.

“What’s the matter?” Meilin asked.

“Conor must have grown faint from hunger,” Worthy said.

All five of the Greencloaks scowled at him.

“Sor-ry,” Worthy said, rolling his eyes.

“Conor had a dream,” Abeke explained. As she spoke, the wind from the coming storm grew stronger. The pine branches in the forest all around them trembled, and the air turned sharply colder. Thunder rumbled in the sky, closer than it had been before.

Rollan glanced up at the gray clouds. “Ominous,” he said.

“You had a prophetic dream?” Meilin asked, all business.

Conor nodded. “I think so. I’ve had it twice now, so I figure I’d better tell you about it, just in case.” He looked around the group. “I was standing in a high place. The first time I had the dream, I couldn’t tell where I was. The second time, I could see that I was standing on a stone surface, maybe the tower of a castle or a cliff. At the beginning of the dream, everything is dark. Then a light comes up, and I’m looking over the surface of an ocean.”

His blue eyes seemed to be seeing that sight again, Abeke thought. They had a faraway look.

“The ocean is completely flat,” Conor went on. “It’s creepy. Too quiet. I stand there for a long time, and then I notice that the water is pulling away.” He shook his head. “Or like it’s taking a deep breath. Then the noise starts.” Above them, the thunder grumbled, and Conor jerked with surprise. “Like that. Like thunder, but without stopping. I’m still looking out at the ocean, and I see a shadow in the distance. It grows taller and taller, rising from the surface of the water, as tall as a mountain, until it blots out the light, and then I see that it’s a wave. A huge wall of water rushing toward me.” He swallowed.

Abeke was staring at him; so were the others, their mouths open, their eyes wide.

“And then what happens?” Anka asked dryly.

Conor took a deep breath. “The wave leans over, and the top of it turns white with foam as it crests.” He shook his head. “I can’t do anything. I just stand there and watch it as it arches overhead. It’s roaring, thundering. My heart is pounding, but I can’t move. And then it crashes down over me.”

“Let me guess,” Worthy put in. “Then you wake up.”

Meilin turned a fierce glare on him. He made a noise that sounded like meep and backed away.

But Conor was nodding. “Yes, then I wake up.”

To Abeke’s surprise, Anka had put her spirit animal, the chameleon, into passive state. She stood there, unhidden. Her face was pale, and she had deep shadows under her eyes. “Come with me,” she said, without her usual sharpness. “I want you to see something.”

They followed as Anka led them up the steepest, rockiest part of the path yet. The trees grew closer together, too. With the clouds like a low ceiling overhead, it was almost like being in a dim cave, Abeke thought.

And then, suddenly, the path grew level. Four more steps, and they came out of the forest to stand on the pebbled shore of a lake so wide they couldn't see the other side of it.

In the middle of the lake was an island.

“Is that it?” Anka asked in a subdued voice, pointing. “Is that what you saw in your dream?”

As one, they all turned to Conor to see what he would say.

STORM

RESTING HIS HAND ON BRIGGAN'S ROUGH-FURRED HEAD, Conor gazed out at the island in the middle of the lake.

He had expected the Heart of the Land to look like a regular island. Like a low hump in the middle of the lake, with trees growing on it.

This island was nothing like that.

It was like a huge, square pillar jutting out of the water. There was a thin ribbon of beach around its base, where waves lapped, but then it went straight up—all gray, rocky cliff face—until it ended in a flat top. It was taller than the tallest castle tower Conor had ever seen, and from where they stood on the shore of the lake, its steep sides looked impossible to climb.

But that's where they had to go to reveal the rock that shared its name with this island—the Heart of the Land.

"Is it?" Rollan interrupted.

Conor blinked. "What?"

"Is that the place you were standing in your dream?" Meilin said, pointing at the island.

Conor frowned and studied it. "I don't know." His dream had been so dark. "I'm pretty sure it was an ocean, not a lake."

"Water, though," Rollan pointed out, "and a high place."

"It could be," Conor said slowly. He looked around at his friends, and at Worthy and Anka. "It doesn't matter if it is or not. We still have to go out there, right?”

“No way,” Worthy said quickly.

“Shut up, Worthy,” Rollan and Abeke said at the same time. They grinned at each other, then quickly turned somber again, knowing how much danger they were about to put themselves in.

“No, seriously,” Worthy said, putting his hands on his hips. “I mean, look at the island. It’s not even an island! It’s made out of cliffs! And we don’t have a boat, so we can’t get out there. You can’t, I mean, because I’m not going. And then you’ll have to climb to the top of it in the middle of a storm. And now there’s this wave thing that Conor dreamed about that might be coming? You’d have to be crazy to try it.”

“So anyway,” Rollan said, ignoring Worthy, “I’ll send Essix out to take a look around.”

“We need to hurry,” Meilin reminded him. “The Oathbound will know we’re here, and they’ll be coming.”

Rollan nodded, then turned and whispered something to Essix on his shoulder. After a moment, Essix launched into the air. With a shrill cry, she swooped higher, buffeted by the gusts of wind that were coming in ahead of the storm. Steadying herself, she flew straight toward the island.

Rollan closed his eyes and he frowned, concentrating. Conor knew he was seeing through Essix’s eyes.

“As much as I hate to admit it, Worthy’s not wrong,” Rollan muttered. Conor could only barely see Essix in the distance, circling the island. “This thing is all cliffs. But there might be a way up. There’s a flat area at the top, and a big rock shaped like a crescent moon. Huh. I thought there might be an arrow with a sign saying ‘Reveal the Heart of the Land here.’ ” He opened his eyes again. “But there’s not.”

“It doesn’t sound too promising,” Abeke said.

Rollan shrugged. “We still have to try to get up there.”

“You can’t climb the island,” Worthy put in, “because you can’t even get to the island.”

Rollan raised his eyebrows. “Essix showed me a way out there.” He pointed with his chin along the curve of the lake. “Over that way is a long strip of sand that leads out to the island. Sort of like a bridge.”

“It’s probably not sand,” Worthy said glumly. “I bet it’s quicksand.”

All four Greencloak kids glared at him.

“I know, I know,” Worthy muttered. “Shut up, Worthy. But I’m not wrong. This is a completely terrible idea.”

It was hard to admit, but as he stood at the end of the sand path, Conor thought Worthy might be right—again.

What Rollan had called a bridge was a thin line of sand winding in an S shape from the pebbly shore toward the pillar-like island. The clouds overhead were roiling, and growing darker by the minute. Thunder growled, and lightning flashed on the distant horizon. The lake’s waves were whipped by the wind, washing over the narrow strip of sand. They’d be lucky to make it out to the island.

Meilin had decided that Anka and Worthy should wait on the lakeshore to keep an eye out for the Oathbound army, and to prevent them from crossing the sand bridge if they decided to come after the Greencloaks.

“That doesn’t sound like a very rewarding task,” Worthy complained.

“You could come with us, Worthy,” Meilin said, and she gave him a sweet smile.

He flinched. “No, that’s all right. You go ahead.” Then he added under his breath, “And try not to kill yourselves while you’re at it, all right?”

To Conor’s surprise, he found himself stepping closer to Worthy. “She gave you a dangerous task,” he said. It was hard to read the face behind the white mask, but Conor thought Worthy was worried. “We’re counting on you.”

“I’ll do my best,” the other boy said. Then he added in a rush, “And ... and I’m sorry for the way I treated you, Conor. You know, back in Trunswick, and the rest of it.”

“You were having a bad day?” Conor asked.

He saw Worthy gulp. “Ha-ha,” he chuckled awkwardly. “Yes. A bad year. A bad everything. But I’m trying to be better.”

Conor was silent for a long moment. “Before the Wyrms, I might have thought that anyone who did the things you did was beyond saving. But ... ” He shook his head soberly. “When the Wyrms took me, I did bad things. And I thought for a while that it made me a bad person. But it didn’t. I am worthy. And maybe, so are you.”

He saw Worthy’s slitted eyes blinking rapidly behind his mask. Then he whispered, his voice shaking, “I hope so.”

Conor put a reassuring hand on the Redcloak boy’s shoulder. “I’m sure you will be.”

As thunder rumbled and the storm prowled closer, the four Greencloaks set off across the sand bridge. The sand was soft underfoot and shifted at every step. Waves washed across their feet. Across the choppy water, the island loomed closer as they struggled along the narrow bridge of sand. Uraza led the way, leaping from one dryish spot to the next, clearly unhappy about getting her paws wet. Abeke followed, her strides long and powerful thanks to her bond with the leopard. Then came Meilin, followed by Rollan, then Briggan, with Conor bringing up the rear, bounding with wolflike confidence.

At a distance, the island’s cliffs had seemed unscalable, like slick stone walls. But as they grew closer, Conor saw that the cliffs were covered with fissures and ledges. Even so, it still looked difficult to climb. Each wall sloped gradually outward; the top of the island was bigger than the bottom.

Ahead of Conor, Essix whirled past on a gust of wind. The blast had them all fighting to keep their feet on the sandy path. Then she banked and landed awkwardly on Rollan’s shoulder, flapping her wings to steady herself.

“She can’t fly in this storm!” Rollan shouted. His brown cloak whipped in the wind. Its shadowed inner lining almost looked green under the stormy sky.

Conor nodded, and they went on.

The thunder grew louder. Conor saw fingers of lightning probing the lake. The clouds lowered until it was almost as dark as twilight, and the wind gusted. Ahead, Conor saw Meilin stumble. He yelled out a warning, and Rollan grabbed her arm before she could tumble into the freezing lake water.

At last they trudged from the path to the narrow strip of rocky shore at the base of the island. At the same moment, the clouds opened, and an icy rain pelted down.

They gathered into a tight group. Uraza looked wet and miserable, and Briggan's tail was lowered, raindrops dripping from his fur.

"What now?" Abeke shouted to be heard above the wind and the pounding rain.

Rollan wiped the rain off his face and pointed. "There's the way up," he shouted.

At first, Conor only saw the dark gray cliffs looming overhead, streaming with water. Then he saw what Rollan was talking about.

All down the cliff face ran a narrow rock tube like a chimney, about two feet across. Water gushed down it. It was a waterfall, running from the top of the island to the bottom. They were supposed to climb up this way?

Conor glanced at Rollan, who nodded.

He knew what Worthy would have to say about this: You're all completely crazy.

The spirit animals would not be able to make this climb. Uraza and Briggan, and even Essix, joined Jhi in passive state.

Thunder crashed overhead, and they started up the cliff. First Rollan, who as a street kid had climbed the roofs of Concorba, evading bullies and the town militia. Then Meilin, then Abeke, and Conor last.

Rollan climbed a few feet and then shouted down at them, "There are handholds! Somebody's come this way before!"

Conor followed, finding it was true, though the handholds were covered with slippery moss and slick from the rain. The thin stream of the waterfall rushed past his right shoulder. As he climbed, he fell into a rhythm. When Abeke's booted foot left one tiny shelf of rock, Conor put a hand there and pulled himself up. The rock was gritty under his fingers, which were growing numb with cold. But the chimney of rock protected them from the worst of the wind.

Halfway up the cliff, there was a ledge just a few inches wide, a resting place. Rollan waited there for the rest of them to catch up. The four kids clung to the gray rock face, trying to catch their breaths as the wind battered their backs.

Conor looked over his shoulder, then closed his eyes, dizzy.

“Don’t look down!” Rollan shouted from close beside him.

But Conor had already seen the tiny strip of beach where they’d started their climb ...

... and from this height, the lake surface seemed smooth. Just like in his dream. Turning his head, he looked toward the horizon, half expecting to see the huge wave. If it was coming, it would crash into the island and wash them all off the cliff and into the lake.

Instead he saw the worst of the storm bearing down on them. The boiling clouds were a sickly greenish-black and flashed with continuous lightning. Thunder boomed overhead, loud enough to shake the island.

All four of them cringed against the cliff face, holding on for dear life. Rain lashed down. The howling wind pried at their fingers as if it wanted to whirl them away to their deaths.

“We have to keep going!” Conor heard Meilin shout.

Conor opened his eyes and nodded. Following the others, he edged toward the next handhold, and suddenly his foot slipped from the edge. The sickening feeling of falling flashed through him—and then Abeke’s hand grabbed his arm.

“Hold on!” she yelled, steadying him.

It reminded him of the time he’d been having a prophetic dream at Greenhaven Castle and had sleepwalked right off the edge of a tower. Essix had snagged his cloak in her talons long enough for Abeke to grasp his arms and pull him up. Ever since then he’d been a little queasy about heights.

Abeke remembered, too. “Steady on!” she said, with a reassuring nod. She started climbing again. Conor took a deep breath, then followed. Blinking the rain out of his eyes, he looked up just as a clap of thunder broke right over the island. The rain turned abruptly colder, and every handhold became instantly crusted with ice. Lightning flashed, blindingly bright. In its aftermath, Conor saw Rollan, who was still leading, take a bad step. His boot slipped from an icy foothold, and he plunged downward.

Falling.

HEART OF THE LAND

ROLLAN HEARD ABEKE SCREAM AND AN ANGUISHED CRY from Meilin. Terror slammed into him—I'm falling, I'm going to die—when suddenly he wasn't falling. He was choking, and banging hard against the bumpy gray face of the cliff.

Something had him around his neck. Reaching up, he snagged taut cloth with his hand. Hoisting himself up, he eased the pressure on his throat. His feet found a tiny crack of rock to stand on, and, gasping for breath, he pressed himself against the rock face. Eyes closed, just breathing, Rollan clung to the cloth, his heart beating so hard that it felt like his whole body was shaking.

"Are you all right?" he heard Conor call from above him.

Without opening his eyes, he nodded. His throat felt bruised, and his shoulder was scraped from where he had slammed into the rock. His fingers were numb, but they clung like claws to the fabric that had stopped his fall.

Opening his eyes, he saw what it was.

Tarik's cloak, just beneath the brown layer, was now torn along the edge.

It had snagged a corner of rock, saving him.

Rollan released a shaky breath. "Thank you, Tarik," he whispered as the wind howled around him and the icy raindrops pricked like needles on his skin.

And ... thank you, Worthy, for handing him the cloak earlier.

Looking up, he saw that his friends were waiting for him. "Keep going!" he shouted at them, his voice hoarse. He saw Meilin nod and lead the way.

Trying to steady his shaking hands, he made certain his green cloak was still covered beneath the brown one, and followed. Don't look down, he'd told Conor. He took his own advice, focusing on each handhold, the stone gritty and cold under his fingers, streaming with icy water. At last he looked up and saw Meilin at the edge of the cliff, helping Conor over and then reaching down to him. As he stretched to take her hand, the storm gave one last roar of thunder, and the wind yanked him away from the cliff face.

But Meilin held on tightly and dragged him over the edge of the cliff and onto the top of the island.

Rollan flopped over and lay there for a second, his eyes closed, feeling the last of the rain patter on his bare face. The stone was bumpy and hard against his back. And solid. He'd come closer than he ever had before to dying. Climbing down the cliff was going to be ...

Well, he didn't want to think about it. Shivering, he opened his eyes and sat up. The other three were sitting, Abeke with her head on her knees, Conor looking out toward the horizon, where the storm was walking away on legs of lightning.

"Looking for the wave that you dreamed about?" Rollan croaked. He rubbed his throat, which was still sore. I'll have bruises there, he thought.

Brushing his wet hair out of his eyes, Conor shook his head. "I'm pretty sure this isn't the place."

"Completely sure would be better," Rollan said. Buffeted by the last of the wind, he got to his feet and surveyed the top of the island. As he'd seen through Essix's eyes, it was roughly square, and strangely flat, as if human hands had smoothed it. In its center was a weathered black rock about as high as his head, curved in the shape of a crescent. It seemed oddly familiar. Something about its shape ...

Meilin stepped up next to him. "It's got the same surface as the gift," she said, reaching into her pocket. Carefully she pulled out the cloth-covered rock and unwrapped it. Conor and Abeke came to look at it, too.

And yes, Meilin was right. The huge, crescent-shaped rock in the center of the island was covered with obsidian-like black scales, just like the Heart of the Land stone.

“So now we reveal it,” Rollan said. Followed by the others, he headed for the big rock, studying it, trying to figure out why it looked so familiar. In the middle it stood about head height, and it tapered down as it curved on each side to about a foot off the ground. He stepped into the center of the crescent; Meilin stood close beside him, and Abeke and Conor just behind. It was almost like being inside a circle, enclosed by the stone. It was quiet there, a kind of stillness that went beyond protection from the last of the storm’s winds. It felt old, Rollan thought. Nobody had stood in this place for a long, long time.

“I think it’s important that we’re all here together,” Abeke said softly from behind him.

Rollan nodded. She was right. Without each other’s help, none of them would have made it to the top of the island.

Feeling almost reverent, Rollan laid a hand on the surface of the rock. It felt smooth under his fingers. Each scale was rounded, like a bump. Now that he was close to it, he could see that it wasn’t entirely black; some of the bumps were a lighter color, almost orange, in a strange, mottled pattern.

“There,” whispered Meilin, pointing.

Rollan looked and saw a hole in the huge stone, right at chest height, big enough to put his hand into. Immediately he understood. That is where they would reveal the Heart of the Land.

Meilin held out the rock. “You’re from Amaya,” she said to Rollan. “You should reveal it.” Conor and Abeke nodded, agreeing.

Rollan felt goose bumps creep over his skin, and it wasn’t because his clothes were sopping wet from the climb up the island. He looked around at his friends’ faces, all as serious as he knew his was. “All right, I’ll do it,” he said. In the enclosed space, his voice echoed strangely.

Solemnly, he took the rock. It was heavier than it looked, and almost seemed to pulse with warmth. Turning to the huge stone that surrounded them, he gripped the rock in his fist and put his whole hand into the hole.

It was like a tube, with a niche at the end. He pushed the stone into it. There was a click, the sound of a key turning in a lock. Quickly Rollan pulled his hand out.

A faint trembling arose from the stone at their feet. He and the others stared at each other. The mottled pattern on the huge stone that surrounded them became clearer, orange scales among the black.

Rollan examined it. He knew this pattern. At the same time, he finally realized why the shape of the rock had seemed so familiar. One end of the crescent had been roughly carved into the shape of a head with a wide, lizardlike mouth; the body of the lizard sculpture curved around them, ending in a stubby tail.

“A gila monster,” he breathed. He’d seen gila monsters before. They were lizards of Amaya, desert reptiles that moved slowly over the stones that baked in the summer heat. But most were much smaller than this carved monolith.

Rollan had heard the legends of the great gila monster, of course. Every region of Erdas had its own myths, stories of powerful animals and their human partners. Typically they roamed around, rescuing maidens or princes and granting wishes and some such nonsense.

Zerif had once hoped to bank on those stories by bonding four young Conquerors to imposter legends, in order to discredit the newly reborn Four Fallen. Devin Trunswick, now Worthy, had been one of those very Conquerors.

“Rollan,” whispered Abeke, her eyes wide. “Was this carving made to honor the real gila monster?”

As she spoke, there was a distant sound, like one huge rock scraping over another, and the trembling of the stone floor turned to shaking. A faint mist arose from the ground, filling the area inside the crescent. Then the mist started spinning slowly, becoming thicker.

To Rollan’s astonishment, as the mist swirled around, it drew into itself into the shape of a woman standing in the center of the round room made by the curve of the gila monster’s body. Her outlines were hazy, but he could see that she had a broad face with high cheekbones, a short, stocky, broad-shouldered body, and hair in two braids that hung down almost to her waist.

She was a woman long dead. She, Rollan felt sure, must have been the human partner to that legendary gila monster.

When the spirit spoke, Rollan heard it inside his head, not with his ears—a hollow, echoing rumble.

The lands of Erdas are facing their greatest threat, the spirit grated out, and they send children. Children! Her misty eyes seemed to look them over. Eura. Nilo. Zhong. Seeing Rollan, she nodded. And Amaya. I am Kikimi.

Rollan felt deeply reverent. This spirit existed outside of time. She was a legend. He bowed. “Greetings, Kikimi.”

Then he felt Meilin’s elbow in his side. “Did she speak to you?” she whispered.

“You didn’t hear her?” Rollan whispered back.

All three of the other Greencloaks shook their heads, wide-eyed.

Rollan turned back to the spirit. “Kikimi,” he said carefully, “we’ve come to reveal the Heart of the Land.”

With a sound that rumbled in Rollan’s bones like an earthquake, Kikimi nodded. Her face took on more heavy solidity. She looked like an idol carved out of living rock. When she spoke again, her hollow voice grew deeper and more echoey inside Rollan’s head. There is a great force in nature—and in human nature—that wants everything to fall apart, to be torn until there are no countries and no families and no friendships, and there is nothing left but a vast wasteland. That is the way of distrust, disunity, division, darkness, and ... She paused, and Rollan felt the weight of centuries bearing down on him. Death, the spirit concluded.

“What’s she saying?” Abeke whispered to him.

“Darkness, other d-words, death,” Rollan answered. “Now be quiet. She’s saying something else.”

The other way is unity, Kikimi intoned. Do you choose the way of life and warmth and hope?

“Yes,” said Rollan. He turned to his friends. “Say yes,” he urged.

“Yes!” they all said together.

It is well, the spirit said. The Heart of the Land has been revealed. Take it.

Rollan turned and saw that a warm glow was emanating from the hole in the side of the gila monster structure. Carefully he put his hand in, and he felt the bumpy surface of the rock—and more. Grasping it with his fingers, he pulled it out. The others gathered closer to see. In his hand, the scales covering the rock started to crumble like a burned crust, and fell away to show the revealed Heart of the Land, which glowed softly, a rounded chunk of amber stone with something dark trapped in its center. It had been carved and smoothed into the shape of a gila monster, tightly curled, its stubby tail tucked under its chin. And it was set on a chain—an amulet.

Rollan could feel it pulsing with power and possibility.

The spirit of the hero nodded, as if she could read his mind. Anyone wielding the Heart can be as the gila monster, she said.

Rollan looked up at her. Kikimi's eyes were oddly piercing, as if she were looking at him from across many, many years. "Be as ... how?" he asked.

It is called the Heart of the Land for a reason, Kikimi said. It was our two hearts, made into one. Unified. The spirit cast a mournful glance at the face of the lizard that surrounded them.

And it offers great power, but power can be misused. The spirit turned, as if she was looking past them, toward the shore of the lake. Then she turned back. Others are seeking the Heart. They will try to take it from you.

As she spoke, the ground started trembling again. Little rags of mist started tearing from Kikimi's shape and whirling away. Her image faded. Beware! her hollow voice said, echoing in Rollan's head as she disappeared. The Heart will give great power to whoever wields it, even if they are not Marked. You must not let the Heart fall into wicked hands!

And then every wisp of mist was gone.

Rollan looked away and saw the other three Greencloaks staring at him.

Then they looked down at the amulet in Rollan's palm. It still glowed softly with its own light. The pattern on the sculpture that surrounded them had faded. It was as if they had been in a room separate from the outer world; all of a sudden, sounds from outside penetrated the room, and a breeze curled around their feet. Rollan looked out to see the clouds breaking up and the surface of the lake glinting where it was touched by beams of sunlight.

And ... something else.

Quickly Rollan stepped out of the embracing circle of the gila monster sculpture and called Essix from passive state. She flashed out, catching the wind with her wings and soaring from the top of the island. Closing his eyes, Rollan looked at what she saw.

Black-clad figures had gathered on the shore of the lake.

Anka and Worthy stood on the sand bridge that led to the island. They were fighting, but they were being driven back, step by step.

The Oathbound army had arrived.

21

THE HAMMER

“THEY’RE HERE,” ROLLAN SAID, WITH A QUICK GLANCE at Meilin.

She nodded, immediately understanding. The Heart of the Land had been revealed, and now the Oathbound would try to take it, and then arrest the Greencloaks.

“Let’s go!” Abeke said. She headed for the edge of the island, where they could start climbing to the beach, far below. Meilin and the others followed.

Conor went first, resolutely not looking down. Then Abeke, and then Rollan, who was busy putting the revealed Heart into his pocket, and then Meilin was sliding on her stomach over the edge of the cliff, feeling for the first foothold with her boot.

She felt the need to hurry making her nerves jangle, but every step had to be carefully considered. She could hear faint shouts from the Oathbound as they rallied on the lakeshore.

Battle was awaiting them. They would need every weapon at their disposal.

“Rollan!” she called over her shoulder. Glancing down, she saw him pause and look up at her, then nod to show that he was listening. “How can we use the amulet in the fight?”

Rollan started climbing down again, his gaze on the stone cliff two inches from his nose. “I’m not sure,” he panted. His voice sounded hoarse. “Kikimi—the spirit—she said that the Heart can make the wielder as the gila monster. I think gila monsters have a venomous bite. But there are stories.... ” He paused while climbing over a tricky spot. “Be careful here,” he said. “The rock’s a little slippery.”

Carefully, Meilin continued. Climbing down was definitely harder than climbing up. At least they weren’t doing it in the middle of a howling thunderstorm. “Stories about the gila monster?” she prompted.

“Myths, really,” Rollan called up to her. “They’re sacred to some of the people who live in the west of Amaya. The gila monsters are burrowers. But,” he added, sounding doubtful, “I don’t think they are very powerful. They’re kind of slow, and they like to stay hidden. The Heart might not be able to help us much.”

Well, then, they wouldn’t count on any help from the Heart. They were on their own. Meilin tried to ignore the dread gathering in her chest. There were hundreds of Oathbound waiting for them on the lakeshore. They’d been in some tough fights before, but they’d never faced odds this terrible. What if the Oathbound army’s orders were to kill them instead of arresting them? They might not get out of this alive.

Below her, Abeke had reached the pebbly beach; a moment later, Conor joined her and they both called forth their spirit animals. Uraza bounded from the passive state with a snarl. Briggan raised his head and howled out a challenge to the Oathbound on the lakeshore. Essix swooped lower as Rollan jumped down to the beach, his heavy brown cloak swirling behind him. The falcon settled on his shoulder, her wings half open, ready to launch herself into flight as soon as Rollan gave the word. Abeke was busy stringing her bow and unwrapping the piece of leather that had protected the arrows in her quiver from the rain.

Meilin jumped down beside them and called Jhi from passive state. The panda yawned and then settled on her haunches, as if waiting to see what was going to happen. The presence of Jhi made Meilin feel suddenly stronger and more steady.

From the direction of the lakeshore came the sounds of shouted orders. The Oathbound had seen them reach the base of the cliff. Halfway along the bridge of sand, Worthy was fighting alone to keep a line of Oathbound attackers from crossing to the island. Fortunately, because the sand bridge was so narrow, he only had to face one attacker at a time. He was so fiercely fast and lithe from his black panther traits that he didn't even need any weapons, just his retractable claws. Behind him crouched the faint outline that was Anka. Hiding, not fighting.

The man coming for Worthy had a long spear. Worthy leaped back to avoid a thrust, and as his feet hit the sand it quivered and turned to liquid. He started sinking. Meilin heard the Redcloak yowl as he sank up to his knees. It had turned to quicksand—just as Worthy had feared!

The army of Oathbound soldiers—over a hundred, Meilin guessed—were massed on the beach, ready to converge on the Greencloaks once they fought their way across the bridge and reached the lakeshore.

“We are in big trouble,” Rollan said, pulling out his knife.

“Six against a hundred or more,” Abeke added. Gripping her bow, she bounced on the balls of her feet, looking ready to leap into action. “And they've got at least three Marked warriors with them.”

Rollan squinted, using his keen sight to scan the enemy. “Yep. Wikam the Just with his vulture, and the spider guy. And an Amayan ... ” He shook his head. “His animal is something that flies really, really fast. I can't get a good look at it.”

Meilin stepped quickly to Rollan's side. “If we're captured, can you give Essix the Heart so she can escape with it?”

He jerked out a quick nod, then rubbed his throat as if it hurt.

“Listen,” Meilin said. Unsheathing her sword, she glanced around at her friends and their spirit animals. “We don't have to defeat them. We just have to fight through and escape. All right?”

“We're ready,” Conor said, resting a hand on Briggan's head. The wolf panted, eager for battle.

Rollan nodded, and Abeke gave a neat salute with her bow. “Ready!”

“For the Greencloaks!” Meilin shouted, her heart pounding. “Let's go!”

She led the way, racing over the sand bridge. By the time she passed Anka and reached Worthy, he was up to his waist in the quicksand, bleeding from a wound in his side but still fighting furiously. With one swift stroke of her sword she dealt with the spearman who'd been poking at Worthy. He tumbled, shrieking, into the icy lake water.

A blur of gold and black, and Uraza bounded past. Abeke fired an arrow as she leaped, followed closely by Briggan and Conor, whose ax whirled above his head.

Meilin yelled in the direction she'd last seen Anka. "Help them!"

As she moved, Anka revealed herself, sand colored. She nodded, looking grim and a little scared, then went after the other Greencloaks.

There was a ripple down the line of Oathbound on the sand bridge, as the attackers turned to defenders, and their warlike shouts turned to cries of fear.

Quickly sheathing her sword, Meilin found firm footing. Behind the mask, she could see Worthy's eyes, wide and frightened.

"I'm very glad to see you at this particular moment," he gasped.

Seizing his hands, Meilin pulled with all her strength. But he was stuck, sinking deeper into the sucking sand. Ahead, she could hear the sound of Uraza's snarls, and screams and splashes as Abeke and Conor, with Anka's help, battled their way through the line of Oathbound on the sand bridge. But there were still way too many Oathbound, led by Wikam, waiting for them on the shore.

Panting, Meilin kept pulling at Worthy's hands, but he was already up to his chest. "Stop struggling!" she yelled at him. "You're only making it worse!"

Then, from behind her came a deep roar—a quick glance over her shoulder showed Jhi, her heavy body starting to sink. The panda lurched, and the quicksand flowed over her paws.

"Oh no," Meilin panted. Releasing Worthy's hands—he yowled in terror—she turned to call Jhi back into passive state; the panda went with a mournful roll of her dark eyes.

To her dismay, Rollan wasn't coming to help. He stood at the beginning of the sand bridge, and his lips were moving as if he was talking to himself. His long knife was lowered.

"Rollan!" she yelled. They needed him to fight!

He nodded, looking distracted. "Coming!" he shouted, but he didn't move.

Behind her, Worthy was babbling. "I'm sorry I ever thought you were scary, Meilin, just get me out of here, it's—gah! I'm sinking! I promise

I'll do anything you—”

Meilin turned back to face him. “Shut up, Worthy,” she muttered. He was up to his armpits now, his chin raised, keeping his mouth above the waves that lapped over the sand bridge. Grabbing his hands, she pulled.

Then, to her horror, the sand under her feet suddenly turned to liquid and she started to sink. In a blink, she was ankle deep in the sand. She tried to pull one foot out, and the other sank deeper.

“We are so doooooomed,” she heard Worthy moan.

A second later, and she was trapped up to her knees. Twisting her body, she saw that Rollan had finally stepped onto the sand bridge. He looked like he was coming to help.

“Stay there!” she yelled frantically. “If you try to help us, you’ll get trapped, too!”

But he kept coming, striding over the quivering sand. As he came, he raised his fist—he was holding the Heart amulet, and its amber glow leaked between his fingers.

Meilin felt a grinding thunder rumbling up from below. All around, the lake’s waves churned, white with foam.

“Hold on!” Rollan shouted at her. Taking another step, he brought the hand holding the Heart down like a hammer. A deep boom rolled out from it, and with a whoosh, the quicksand holding Meilin and Worthy spat them out like a couple of melon seeds. Meilin stumbled to her knees, panting. Worthy lay on his stomach, trembling. “Ground,” he mumbled, talking to the sand bridge, “if my arms were long enough, I would hug you right now.” He got shakily to his feet. Blood was streaming from a cut over his ribs.

Without stopping, Rollan strode past them. “Get down!” he shouted to Abeke and Conor, and as they flattened themselves he brought the hammer down again. Meilin clung to the sand bridge as it writhed like a snake in an earthquake. Worthy wobbled and went to his knees behind her. All along the heaving bridge, the Oathbound were tossed into the lake, shrieking, throwing away their heavy weapons so they could swim.

Rollan whirled. Catching Meilin’s eye, he grinned wildly, his hair tousled, his brown cloak whipping around him. “Heart of the Land, Meilin!” he shouted, and raised the glowing amulet in his clenched fist.

“We should have realized—the gila monster has the power of the earth!”

BLOOD AND ARROWS

THE BRIDGE-QUAKE HAD KNOCKED ALL THE Oathbound into the lake. Abeke climbed to her feet, holding her bow well above the water so the string wouldn't get wet. Uraza bounded ahead of her. After a quick glance to see Conor and Briggan just a pace behind her, Abeke followed on light feet. Farther back was the blur that was Anka, and Meilin, her sword glinting in the light. Worthy was taking giant pantherlike leaps, his red cloak swirling behind him, and then came Rollan with Essix swooping low over his head, shrieking out a challenge.

Shaking back her braids, Abeke echoed that cry. "For the Greencloaks!" she shouted.

"For the Greencloaks!" her friends joined in.

"And the Redcloaks!" Worthy yowled.

Her teeth bared with excitement, Abeke looked ahead as she raced along the narrow bridge. On the shore awaited a wall of Oathbound soldiers, all dressed in black uniforms with brass armor protecting their necks and their lower arms. Farther back she saw Wikam the Just, taller than all the others, issuing orders. The huge vulture was hunched on his shoulder.

Wikam, who wanted to unjustly arrest the Greencloaks, throw them into a prison, and condemn them to death—for something they hadn't done!

He would be her target.

Snarling, Uraza reached the shore first, and the Oathbound soldiers fell back before her, giving Abeke room to begin her attack. As the other Greencloaks swarmed off the sand bridge, Abeke and Uraza cut sideways, using their leopard-given stealthiness to dodge a spear thrust. Another leap, and Abeke was past two more Oathbound swordsmen, drawing an arrow from her quiver and trying to spot Wikam amid the whirl of fighting. Uraza crouched beside her, ready to pounce. From the lakeshore by the sand bridge came the sound of clashing weapons, shouted orders, and then Briggan's howl as he entered the fray.

Wikam was pointing out where his soldiers should strike next, surrounded by a personal guard of six burly warriors, all bearing sharp-pointed pikes that kept him clear of the battle. His vulture launched itself from his shoulder, flapping its wings to gain height.

Uraza snarled, keeping the attacking Oathbound at bay while Abeke drew back her bowstring, sighting down the arrow at her target.

At that very moment, Wikam turned, and they locked eyes across a mass of Oathbound who were charging into the fight.

You're mine, Abeke thought fiercely. She felt the rightness of the shot and released the arrow. It flashed across the space separating her from Wikam, flying straight and true toward his heart.

Abeke had time to feel a moment of exultation—got you!—when a huge, black-feathered shape swooped down and snatched the arrow out of the air just before it reached its target. The bird flapped upward, croaking in triumph, the arrow clutched in its bony talons. Wikam's vulture!

Immediately Abeke reached for another arrow, nocked it, and fired. Seeing it coming, Wikam grabbed one of his own soldiers, pulling the man in front of him. The arrow plunged into the man's chest. Blood splattered across Wikam's face. Almost carelessly, he tossed the man aside like a cracked shield. Abeke was ready with another arrow, but it was too late. The Oathbound guards had closed in around Wikam, making him impossible to reach.

She heard Wikam scream an order. A troop of ten Oathbound split off from the main battle. Bearing swords and spears, they advanced on Abeke. Uraza snarled, and ten more warriors came after her.

Backing away, Abeke trained an arrow on one, and then another of the Oathbound.

But she only had seven arrows left.

It wouldn't be enough.

BLOOD AND AX BLADES

WHEN ABEKE AND URAZA WENT LEFT, CONOR AND Briggan cut their way into the middle of Wikam's fighters. Conor's wolflike strength and speed meant none of the Oathbound could match him, and Briggan at his back meant they couldn't attack him from behind.

With a yell, Conor whirled his ax over his head, clearing a space around himself and Briggan. One big Oathbound warrior with a huge double-bladed ax stepped over a wounded comrade, right into the opening. He had braided both his fiery red hair and his long beard. The man roared out a challenge. "Come to me, Greencloak!" he shouted. "And learn how to die!" And with heavily muscled arms, he strode forward, swinging the ax, trying to chop Conor in half.

Conor felt the breeze of its passing as he ducked out of the way.

With a frustrated shout, the warrior lifted the ax high above his head and brought it down like an executioner, aiming for Conor's neck. Conor leaped aside, and the ax thudded into the stony ground.

Too close, Conor thought. The man was big, but he was fast, too. Conor had to end this.

Another dodge and a roll, and Conor got inside the warrior's guard. Reversing his grip on his weapon, Conor smashed the butt of his ax under the warrior's bearded chin.

But the blow just seemed to make him angier. Roaring with pain and outrage, the warrior went berserk, his ax hacking wildly through the air.

Conor couldn't fight a madman. "Let's go!" he shouted to Briggan, and they retreated, pursued by five Oathbound and the bearded warrior.

BLOOD AND AMULET

ROLLAN SET FOOT ON THE LAKESHORE JUST AS WORTHY, yowling out a challenge, landed crouched in the middle of a group of Oathbound. They converged on him, and then there was a sort of explosion as Worthy turned into a snarling, whirling weapon of destruction. Screaming black-clad figures went flying in every direction.

Off to the side, Abeke was taking aim at something with her bow, and Meilin had drawn her sword while calling Jhi out of passive state. Conor was being chased by a pack of Oathbound, with Briggan protecting his back. Even Anka was using her new fighting skills to attack Oathbound seemingly out of nowhere.

In Rollan's hand, the Heart of the Land burned hot like stone that had been baking under a desert sun. Frantically, he racked his brain trying to remember the stories he'd heard about the legendary gila monster. The amulet was clearly powerful. If he could figure out how to use it, they might be able to defeat the Oathbound army.

Something green and black whizzed past his head, and he flinched away. An arrow?

No—it swooped around, chirping angrily, and darted back toward him. A hummingbird! Not too much of a threat, he thought. It was only a tiny bird. It was the spirit animal of the Marked Amayan Oathbound, who raced toward Rollan brandishing a rapier—a thin sword with a wickedly sharp point. Still holding up the Heart, Rollan ripped the long knife from his belt in time to block the Marked Oathbound's attack. The hummingbird flashed past his face again, distracting him, and he barely managed to evade the next thrust. He felt a thin line of pain along his cheekbone. Shaking his head, a few drops of blood flew out. Had the bird cut him? Then the Oathbound struck again, and the rapier slid past Rollan's ribs, ripping a hole in both of his cloaks. At the same moment, the hummingbird darted straight toward his face. It was aiming its sharp beak at his eyes—it was trying to blind him!

Seeing Rollan in trouble, Essix dove in, her talons reaching for the hummingbird, but it was too swift, easily evading her and flashing in for another attack.

Rollan threw up his arm to protect his eyes from the hummingbird's sharp beak.

Then something hit him hard from the side and he was slammed to the ground. As he landed, the Heart of the Land amulet popped out of his hand and went tumbling among the stones that littered the lakeshore. Rollan struggled against the heavy weight that had hit him—an Oathbound twice his size with hugely muscled arms.

Rollan slashed at her with his long knife, but the edge of the blade hit her brass collar. She responded by jerking him to his feet and wrapping one of her arms around his neck.

“Wikam's orders!” shouted the Oathbound to the Marked Amayan as Rollan struggled to breathe. His feet weren't even touching the ground! “Get the amulet!” she screamed.

The Marked Oathbound went to his knees, the hummingbird circling his head. To his dismay, Rollan saw him pick up the Heart—then came a blur of feathers, and Essix swooped down to snatch it from his fingers, soaring into the sky with the Heart clutched in her talons.

Rollan choked out a yell of triumph, and the Oathbound woman squeezed harder, cutting off his air. He'd already been choked once today—this was really too much! Black spots formed before his eyes, and he clawed at the burly arm that was wrapped around his throat. He was starting to see why wearing neck armor might be a good idea.

Then he heard a grunt and the pressure on his throat let up. As he went to his knees, gasping for breath, the Oathbound crashed to the ground beside him, unconscious. He looked up to see Anka fading into the background.

“Thanks!” Rollan rasped.

He saw what looked like a faint grin cross her face, and then she disappeared again.

He climbed to his feet, rubbing the new bruises on his neck, trying to spot Essix—and the Heart—but what he saw made his own heart sink.

Twenty feet away, Meilin had been separated from Jhi and was surrounded by Oathbound. She was a whirlwind of attacks, all efficiency and focus. Her movements were a blur—a chop at one Oathbound’s neck, a blow aimed at another’s ribs, followed by a precise strike at that particular place where boys really don’t want to be hit.

But when that Oathbound fell at her feet, writhing in pain, another leaped forward to take his place. There were too many of them!

Worthy was surrounded, too. The Redcloak was bleeding from wounds on both arms, a leg, and his chest, and every time he whirled to rip at an Oathbound attacker with his claws, droplets of his own blood sprayed around him. His mask had been hacked in half, revealing one catlike eye and a snarling mouth. He was fierce, but his movements were slowing.

Conor was outnumbered, too, though he had used his ax and wolf-given speed to clear an area around him. Abeke had run out of arrows and was using her bow as a staff as she fought an Oathbound armed with a spear.

“Essix!” Rollan shouted desperately, searching the sky. Then he glimpsed the falcon from the corner of his eye. With Wikam’s vulture on her tail, she dove toward him, holding the Heart in her talons. Rollan reached to meet her, and his fingers closed around the amulet. The vulture, a moment behind, raked its claws across Rollan’s hand, trying to get him to drop the stone, but he held on, ignoring the flash of pain over his knuckles.

The vulture gave a guttural hiss and banked awkwardly, coming around for another attack.

As Rollan ducked, he saw that Wikam had ordered another group of Oathbound to form up for an attack—at least twenty of them. Worthy and Meilin would be overwhelmed; Conor and Abeke would not be able to help.

Rollan slashed at the diving vulture with his long knife and then tried the same move that had cleared the Oathbound from the sand bridge, bringing down his hand holding the Heart like a hammer. Thunder rolled out, and under the Heart's power the land bucked and heaved. The attacking Oathbound were flung onto their knees. But so were his friends. As the earthquake passed, they all jumped to their feet again, picked up the weapons they'd dropped, and the fight resumed.

"All right, that didn't work," Rollan muttered to himself. "Gila monster." He backed away as two Oathbound came at him with swords drawn. "Lizard," he chanted frantically. "Uh ... burrows in the ground." He gripped the Heart. "Burrower!" he shouted.

The group of Oathbound had almost reached the spot where Meilin and Worthy were now fighting back-to-back.

Swooping forward with the speed of one of Essix's dives, Rollan punched the fist holding the amulet toward the Oathbound attackers. He felt power roll out, and with a rumble and a heave of dirt, a sinkhole opened right under the Oathbounds' feet. All twenty of them tumbled down, shrieking. Their cries grew louder as Rollan gestured again and the dirt flowed back, covering them up to their necks.

"Hah!" he yelled.

Worthy echoed him, yowling with glee.

Meilin connected a blow with an opponent's head and then spun around, checking for attackers, but she'd dealt with all of them. Rollan's eyes met hers; she gave a nod of approval.

And then she looked past him, and her eyes went wide with dismay.

Whirling, Rollan saw what she was looking at.

Wikam had been holding even more Oathbound in reserve. A large group of archers aimed their powerful longbows. They had nocked their heavy arrows, tipped with razor-sharp barbs. At Wikam's shouted command, the archers drew back their bowstrings.

Rollan's heart froze. The Oathbound leader was not trying to capture them anymore. This wasn't about justice. His archers were aiming to kill.

"Get down!" Rollan heard Abeke scream.

But it was too late.

The archers fired. A storm of arrows streaked through the air.

Aimed at the Greencloaks' hearts.

AS THE OATHBOUND ARCHERS RELEASED THEIR arrows, Meilin knew she was about to die. She and her best friends would be struck by enough arrows to kill them instantly. Instinctively, she looked for Rollan, expecting to see his face pale with fright as he faced death.

But instead, his eyes were bright as he held up the glowing Heart of the Land. “Gila monster!” he was shouting. “Armor!”

The arrows, black and deadly, hissed through the air. They were mere inches away as Rollan’s hand went out in a blocking gesture, and every single arrow suddenly stopped, hung in the air for a second, and then fell to the ground with a clatter.

“Rollan, I think I love you ...” was Worthy’s breathless comment.

“Ooh, arrows!” Abeke exclaimed. She started gathering them up, stuffing as many as she could into her quiver.

“Another gila monster trait,” Rollan said, grinning. “They’re associated with armor. The other one that I can think of is their venomous bite.” He cocked his head. “Think I can get close enough to Wikam to bite him?”

Meilin glanced in that direction. Her heart dropped. “No,” she said briefly, and raised her sword, ready to fight. Behind her, Jhi gave a mournful roar.

The Oathbound archers had set down their bows and had drawn swords. A shrieked order from Wikam, and they charged toward the five Greencloaks and Worthy.

“Time for another sinkhole!” Rollan said, raising the Heart of the Land.

But the Oathbound were ready for that.

As Rollan punched his fist, holding the Heart toward the mass of fighters, they parted, racing around the sinkhole that opened in the ground. Another wave of attackers followed.

A moment later, Meilin and her allies were surrounded by a thicket of gleaming swords.

“Surrender!” screamed Wikam, who had followed his fighters. They were opening up a way for him to get to the Greencloaks. His vulture swooped low, then landed on his shoulder, its ugly face looking smug with victory.

Meilin saw Worthy’s shoulders slump, and Abeke lowered her bow. A glance at Rollan, and he shook his head, eyes wide. The Heart couldn’t save them now.

“There’s nothing I can do,” Anka said from beside her. “I can’t hide us when we’re right in front of them.”

“Throw down your weapons, renegade Greencloaks,” Wikam ordered, “and put your spirit animals into passive state!”

Meilin saw Rollan glance up, looking for Essix—she could escape with the Heart.

“If I see that falcon come near the amulet,” Wikam shouted, “I will have it shot from the air!”

Rollan gulped and lowered his fist. The Heart of the Land’s glow was fading.

Slowly, Meilin straightened. The excitement of battle drained from her muscles, leaving her shaking. It was over. They couldn’t resist without being killed. She called Jhi, and the panda went into the passive state; Abeke and Conor had done the same with Uraza and Briggan. Essix was nowhere to be seen.

“Lay down your weapons!” Wikam ordered. Tall and gaunt, he stood with arms crossed, just behind the first row of Oathbound fighters, who still had their swords drawn. “It is time for you to face the justice you deserve.”

Meilin knew that justice was exactly what they wouldn't get from Wikam.

All he would offer them was death.

Conor was bending to set his ax on the ground when suddenly Worthy ripped off the remains of his mask and let out a sound that was part snarl, part wowl, and fiercely triumphant. "Redcloaks!" he shouted. "To me!"

Meilin stared in astonishment as a group of twelve red-cloaked, mask-wearing fighters burst from the forest near the lake and raced across the pebbly shoreline toward them.

Seeing the new threat, Wikam whirled and started shrieking orders to his Oathbound. Half stayed to guard the Greencloaks; the other half, at least forty fighters, split off to meet the newcomers.

The Redcloaks were outnumbered three to one, but each of them had the power, speed, and strength of the spirit animals they were once bonded with. It was an even fight ... almost.

"Now is our chance to escape!" Worthy shouted.

Meilin nodded; the others were already raising their weapons again. She saw Worthy exchange a kind of salute with the leader of the Redcloaks—who wore a white mask in the shape of a ram's face.

Worthy, she realized, had known the Redcloak fighters had been coming to help them!

No sense in wasting this opportunity.

"Let's go!" Meilin shouted, and with a lightning-fast move, she disarmed the nearest Oathbound fighter, seizing her sword for herself. A sweeping strike with that sword, and she was through the line of guards; the others followed. In the distance she heard a howl of outrage as Wikam realized the Greencloaks were getting away. A group of Oathbound broke off from those fighting the Redcloaks and started in pursuit. The Redcloaks, using their superhuman speed, raced to block them.

"Shouldn't we help?" Abeke called, looking back over her shoulder. She had one of the Oathbound arrows in her hand and looked ready to nock it and let it fly.

"Stead and the others are giving us time to escape!" Worthy panted. He pointed toward the forest path.

“Wait!” Rollan shouted, and stumbled to a halt. The others gathered around him, panting. “They’ll know exactly where we’ve gone, and we can’t outrun them for long. The vulture will track us.”

Down the beach, the Redcloaks were fighting wildly, holding back the mass of black-clad Oathbound.

“We have to go!” Worthy yowled frantically.

“We’d better run,” Meilin agreed.

“No,” Rollan said briefly. “I just realized what it means that gila monsters are burrowers.” He raised his hand—still holding the Heart of the Land. It glowed brightly again. “Tunnel!” he shouted.

With a rumble, the pebbles at their feet shifted; they all jumped back as a hole in the ground opened, just big enough to crawl into.

Rollan bent to peer into it. “It’s a tunnel, all right.” Crumbles of dirt fell from around the opening. It didn’t look very stable.

“You go first,” Worthy said, looking doubtful.

Rolling his eyes, Rollan crawled in. His voice drifted back to them. “It’s opening up ahead of me. It’s leading away! Come on!”

One by one, they followed, keeping their spirit animals in passive state. Meilin went last. As she crawled into the hole, following Worthy, the dirt caved in behind her. She felt a moment of panic—they’d be trapped!—when she realized that the tunnel was closing behind them, hiding where they had gone.

She crawled for what seemed like a long, long time in utter blackness.

“I hate this,” she heard Worthy mutter.

She didn’t like it much, either, but there was no way the Oathbound could track them underground. This was their best chance to escape.

“It’s really dark in here,” came Worthy’s complaining voice. Then Meilin heard him mutter, “Shut up, Worthy.”

She had been about to say the same thing. Instead she reached forward in the dark until she felt Worthy’s ankle. She gave it a reassuring pat. “It’s all right,” she said softly. “We’re all scared.”

“Even you?” he whispered.

“Even me,” she said.

“Oh,” she heard him say. And then, even more quietly, “Thanks, Meilin.”

Her knees were starting to get sore, and she knew she was covered with dirt. She had dirt in her hair and under her fingernails. She really hated being dirty.

Something long and soft—a furry rope?—brushed her face, and she flinched back. The tunnel fell in behind her, forcing her to go on.

The furry rope touched her cheek again, and she reached up quickly, grabbed it, and pulled hard.

“Owww!” Worthy yowled, from just ahead of her.

Quickly she let go of the furry rope. Wait. Was it a—? Did Worthy have a—?

There was a sudden muffled shout from ahead, and a burst of light blinded her.

WORTHY

WITH A HEAVE, THE GROUND SPAT THEM ALL OUT. ALL six of them—the four Greencloak kids, Anka, and Worthy—lay on the forest floor, panting. The tunnel had disappeared. There was no sound of fighting. There was no path.

Worthy knew he should get up, but he felt so comfortable, just lying there. Above, pine branches swayed quietly in a light breeze. So peaceful. His eyes dropped closed.

Around him, the others were sitting up.

“I think we’re clear,” he heard Meilin’s voice say.

“I’ll ask Uraza to check our tail,” Abeke said. “Our trail, I mean.”

Worthy heard other sounds, and then he felt prickly, as if he was being watched. He opened his eyes to see Meilin standing at his feet, looking down at him. The panda loomed behind her.

Nearby stood Abeke, holding her bow, and Rollan, with Essix on his shoulder. Next to them was Conor, Briggan panting at his side. Anka was there, too, a blur of forest green.

For some reason the four Greencloaks and Anka were all smiling at him.

Worthy sat up, then climbed wearily to his feet. He was so tired—even his bones hurt. He glanced down at his arm.

There was a slash in his sleeve. A wound! “Gah!” he exclaimed. “Blood!” There was blood on his pants, too, and on his shirt. A second later, he felt the pain from four different wounds hit him at once.

With a yowl, he flopped back onto the ground. "I'm dying!" he moaned. "Farewell. Think kindly of me when I'm gone."

Meilin crouched beside him. "Worthy."

He gazed pitifully up at her. "What?" he said weakly.

"These are flesh wounds," Meilin said.

He blinked. "So I'm not dying?"

"No, you're not dying." He started to sit up, but she put a gentle hand on his shoulder and held him down. "You are hurt, though. Stay there."

"What you need," Rollan said, "is some panda spit."

"Yes," Meilin agreed. "Jhi can help."

Worthy lay still as the big panda lumbered over to him. Her pink tongue licked the slash on his arm, then the cut over his ribs, and then the two other wounds. A feeling of peace settled over him. The stinging pain from his injuries faded away. "Panda spit," he murmured. "I see what you mean."

Now he really didn't feel like getting up.

"Just rest," he heard Meilin say.

No problem. Worthy lay there listening to the Greencloaks tell Anka what had happened up on the Heart of the Land island while he and the chameleon woman had fought together on the sand bridge. Something about a spirit and a warning, and a gila monster.

"It's quite a ... um ... tale," he heard Rollan say.

Wearily, Worthy let their words wash over him. In a minute he would tell them what he knew about the second gift to the Greencloaks. Or, rather, what he'd guessed. His own family had once possessed an ancestral sword. It had been modeled after a famous sword from Euran history.

Something about a claw.

Eurans had always told stories about a legendary black wildcat. Long ago, such a wildcat had roamed the country with his human partner. The tales told of a great sword that the two used to defend their home.

The Wildcat's Claw.

This gift probably had great powers, just like the Heart of the Land, but it had been hidden, too. And nobody knew exactly what its powers had been.

Devin Trunswick's family sword had just been a replica of that great sword, but if there was a record of the real gift, it was likely somewhere in Trunswick.

He, Worthy, would lead them to it.

The Greencloaks were still talking.

"You know," Conor was saying, "Princess Song was on our side before. I think we should try getting a message to her."

"Telling her what?" Worthy heard Meilin ask.

"We might be able to convince her about the Fakecloaks," Conor answered.

Typical, Worthy thought to himself. Conor always thought the best of people. He wondered if Conor thought the best of him now. Had he proven himself enough? Would the Greencloaks let him stay with them?

"No," he heard Anka say. "We can't risk contacting anyone. We have to keep going. We have to find the other gifts."

"And we don't even know where to start," Meilin said.

Worthy smiled, knowing they would trust him even more, once he'd helped them with that. "So ... " he interrupted, opening his eyes. "Was I a hero? During the fight with the Oathbound?"

The five of them broke off their conversation and glanced over at him.

He sat up.

Did the Greencloaks approve of him? Did they truly accept him? He knew his expression was giving away how desperately he hoped they did, so he groped in the pocket of his cloak for the extra mask that every Redcloak carried at all times. Carefully, he tied it over his face, concealing his features.

But he couldn't conceal what he knew, not any longer. "We'll have to look for the sword next. The Wildcat's Claw, wielded by a legendary hero of Eura." He gulped. "When I ... when I went over to the Conquerors, I let Zerif bond me to the black panther." He looked up, meeting Conor's eyes. "I'm really, really sorry about that. I wanted ... " He shrugged. "I wanted to be a hero."

All four of the Greencloaks looked down at him. Meilin's eyebrows were raised. A corner of Rollan's mouth quirked up.

“You definitely were a hero in the battle against the Oathbound,” Conor answered at last. Even Briggan looked like he was smiling.

“We are very glad to have you with us,” Abeke added.

Worthy let their approval sink in for a moment. Then, with a weary sigh, he climbed stiffly to his feet.

They were all grinning widely at him.

He smiled back at them. He really was part of the team. He’d never been happier. Then, to his horror, he felt his long, furry secret uncurl from behind his red cloak.

Rollan gave a shout of laughter.

Oh no! Worthy buried his masked face in his hands.

“Wait, what?” he heard Anka’s sharp voice exclaim. “Worthy has a tail?”

Sarah Prineas is the author of The Magic Thief, Winterling, and Ash & Bramble series. She lives in Iowa with her mad-scientist husband, two kids, two dogs, two cats, chickens, and a bunch of goats.

You've read the book—now join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Have your ebook ready and enter the code to unlock huge
rewards!

NFWTNMJD4X

BOOK SIX

THE WILDCAT'S CLAW

Now fugitives, the young heroes must clear their names while evading the ruthless Oathbound. Together, they head for the familiar town of Trunswick, seeking a legendary sword. But they find the city transformed: the castle burned to the ground and the townsfolk poor and desperate.

With a handsome reward being offered for their capture, who can the heroes trust?

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

A sneak peek of the next

Book Six

The Wildcat's Claw

By Varian Johnson

LENORI

LENORI PACED HER CRAMPED QUARTERS—WHICH WERE little more than a small, single holding cell with meager wood furnishings. She hadn't had contact with Olvan, or any other Greencloaks, since being imprisoned. Most of the others had been captured and returned to Greenhaven Castle, where they would be held for trial, but she and Olvan remained in the Citadel.

Olvan.

He'd been struck by a stone viper's fangs, and most of his body was turned to stone. Thanks to her rainbow ibis, Myriam, Lenori could sense his presence. He was in pain, but alive, though she didn't know for how long.

She didn't know how long any of them had.

The Second Devourer War had taken a heavy toll on all of the nations, and the Wurm's destructive reign of terror only amplified people's fears. The Greencloaks had saved the world, but it had come at a great price. Despite their best efforts, many people had suffered.

Zerif, under the Wurm's control, had used his immense powers to ravage the world. But these battles weren't just fought in far-off lands like Stetriol or Arctica. There was bloodshed in every village. Neighbor against neighbor. Brother against brother. Mother against daughter. Father against son.

The Greencloaks themselves had inflicted some of the worst damage.

Zerif, armed with the Wyrms' parasites, had taken control of most of their order, and had then turned them loose to wreak havoc in every corner of every land. There was no village, no militia, and no army that could prevail against a legion of Greencloaks when they partnered with their spirit animals. With their true, uninhibited powers now unleashed, the Greencloaks had shown the world just how powerful they'd become.

People were afraid of them. They were angry. They were distrustful. And Lenori couldn't fault any of them for feeling that way.

She and Olvan thought that by coming here to meet with the leaders of the nations, they would be able to soothe any doubts and remind the world that the Greencloaks only wanted to preserve peace. They had even brought along the Four Heroes of Erdas—each from a different nation, but united in their oath to serve and protect all lands. But thanks to traitors within their midst, the Emperor of Zhong had fallen, and the real Greencloaks were left to take the blame.

Lenori pressed her ear against the door to make sure that no one was nearby, but heard only a quiet dripping from the Citadel's leaking roof. She released Myriam from passive state. The ibis strutted around, proudly displaying her rainbow feathers and shaking her long, thin legs.

"No time for showing off, Myriam," Lenori said. "We must find our young friends."

She sat down on the stone floor and closed her eyes. She pushed the cold of the room, the fear of her imprisonment, and worry for her fellow Greencloaks from her mind. Her pulse slowed and her body relaxed. It was just her, Myriam, and Erdas, united as one.

A hazy image floated before her. She concentrated, trying to sharpen its edges. Trying to bring it into focus. It was a ship, cutting across the ocean. Squeezing her eyes tighter, she saw the Four Heroes huddled in a small room. No—not four. There were six of them. They had been tested recently—she could see the weariness of their faces—but they exuded a sense of accomplishment. Her mind centered itself on Rollan. Her gaze fell to the thin leather strap around his neck.

The Heart of the Land. He had revealed it!

She heard something in the distance. Echoes? Footsteps?

Was there danger on the boat? A trap waiting to be sprung?

She shook her head. Those sounds weren't coming from the ship. Someone was approaching her room.

She blinked, and her mind returned to her cell. She looked at the ibis, sitting calmly beside her. "Myriam, back to me. I don't want them to know that you've been loose."

The rainbow ibis disappeared just as the heavy wooden door swung open. Two Oathbound warriors, both dressed in black, entered the room. She recognized the one with the short blond hair. Sure enough, the woman's brown stone viper flashed into view, curling around her large arm. Brunhild the Merry. She was the one who'd poisoned Olvan.

The other warrior was new to Lenori. Like Brunhild, this woman wore a black uniform with brass neck and wrist collars, but the woman also sported shiny, gaudy rings on most of her fingers. Her long brown hair was twisted into an intricate braid that trailed over her shoulder, like an embroidered rope hanging from a curtain.

The unknown woman snapped her fingers, and another warrior entered the room, carrying a tray full of breads, dates, and cheeses. Lenori willed her stomach to remain silent. It was the first food she'd seen in two days.

The warrior placed the tray before Lenori, then left the room. The woman with the long braid took a step forward. "Don't you want to eat?"

Lenori pretended that the food wasn't there. "No, I want to be set free."

The braided woman shook her head. "Don't ask for the impossible," she said. "Go on, take a bite. Eat it all. Gorge yourself." She grinned. "I promise it isn't laced with stone viper venom."

Lenori instead curled her hands into her lap. "What do you want from me?"

"We know why your young friends were in Amaya," the Oathbound woman said, whipping her ponytail over her shoulder and behind her back. She began to pace, her boots echoing on the scarred stone bricks. "For such a small amulet, it carries quite a punch. The children were lucky to escape with it." She pulled a red-tinged sword from her side. It sparkled as light hit its blade. "We've heard reports that they're on a ship headed for Eura,” she said. “What’s there? Another of these so-called gifts?”

Lenori stared ahead, saying nothing.

The woman kneeled so that she and Lenori were face to face. Her hazel eyes were as cold as the floor. Then she placed her sword on the ground, well within Lenori’s reach. It was almost as if the woman were daring Lenori to try to grab it.

“I understand that you don’t want to betray your friends,” the woman said. “But they’re just children. They shouldn’t be fighting these battles. Take pity on them. Spare them any further pain and hardship.”

“They’ve saved the world twice,” Lenori said. “You should not underestimate them.”

The woman inspected her own hands, tracing her fingertips across her numerous rings. The ring on her middle finger was adorned with three small, cone-shaped spikes. She twisted the ring so that the spikes faced the inside of her hand. Then, with a wry smile creeping across her face, the woman slapped Lenori, causing her to cry out more from the shock than the pain. She struck Lenori again, even harder. Lenori’s face burned. The woman’s ring had left its mark.

“And you should not underestimate me,” the woman replied as she twisted her blood-tipped ring back into place.

Lenori let her gaze flicker to the sword lying on the floor. She considered lunging for it, but stopped herself. She was sure that was exactly what the woman wanted. Lenori refused to give her the satisfaction.

Leaving the sword on the floor, the woman picked up a loaf of bread. She tore off a small piece, then popped it into her mouth. “Delicious.” Then she held the bread under Lenori’s nose. “I know you want a bite. You must be delirious with hunger.”

Lenori shook her head.

The woman sighed, then ate a larger piece. “Where are they going, Lenori? What are they searching for? Is there another gift out there? Is it just as powerful as the Heart of the Land?” The woman dropped the remaining bread on the tray, picked up her sword, and returned to her feet. “I promise, if you help me, I will capture them safely and return them unharmed.” The woman glanced at Brunhild. “You know what happened to Olvan. I would hate for a similar fate to befall those children.”

“You’ll never find them,” Lenori said.

For the first time since entering the room, the woman stopped smiling. “Perhaps another two days without food will help you change your mind.” She snapped her fingers, and the Oathbound warrior returned. Lenori’s insides seized as he picked up the tray.

The braided woman held up her hand, signaling the warrior to stop. With her sword, she sliced off a minuscule hunk of cheese. Barely enough to fill a thimble.

“On second thought, why don’t you keep a piece,” she said, tossing the food at Lenori. It bounced off her leg and landed on the floor beside her. Specks of dirt covered the once pristine cheese.

“See how kind I am? I could have left you with nothing.” The woman stepped out of the room. “But like that food, by kindness will not last forever. Tell me what I want to know, or prepare yourself for death.”

The door slammed shut, leaving Lenori in silence. She picked up the small slice of cheese. Her mouth watered... It smelled even better once in her hands.

Then, slowly, she ground the food between her fingers, disintegrating it.

Her faith may be tested, but she would not falter.

She was a Greencloak.

Committed to the end, no matter what.

ACROSS THE OCEAN

CONOR GLANCED OUT OF THE PORTHOLE OF THE SLEEK clipper as it sliced through choppy seas and strong winds. They had boarded the boat in a small coastal town just north of Concorba. Thanks to a small collection of coins from Worthy—and Rollan’s skill with negotiations—they had been able to secure a cabin with four beds, along with two packs of meager provisions. The room wasn’t nearly big enough for all six of them to comfortably sleep at one time, but Conor and his friends weren’t in the position to be choosy.

Stepping closer to the window, Conor squinted at his reflection in the dirty, smudged glass. He reached to his forehead and ran his fingers along his skin, right where the mark of the Wyrms used to be. The black, swirling mark had faded from view, but he could still feel its power. Its weight. It was an invisible burden he feared he would carry for the rest of his life.

“See anything of interest?” a voice asked behind him.

Smiling, he turned around. Abeke was always light on her feet, even with Uraza, her leopard, in passive state on her arm. Conor flexed his own forearm, watching his muscles ripple underneath Briggan’s mark. He hated leaving the Great Wolf in passive state for so long, but their current mission required stealth, not strength.

Conor looked back out the window and started into the distance. “It could be a mirage, but I think I see land in the distance.”

“I just spoke with the captain,” she said. “We’ll reach port soon.”

Conor grinned. Eura. Green fields. Light blue skies and a cool breeze on his face. “Do you think I’ll be able to see my family?” Conor asked. Although he had seen them recently, he always loved spending time with his parents and brothers. He didn’t even mind getting up early in the morning to herd and shear the sheep. Seeing his family helped to remind Conor that as a Greencloak, he not only fought to protect Erdas, he also fought to protect those closest to him.

“I could show you guys a real Euran meal,” he continued. “Shepherd’s pie and all.”

Abeke frowned, which was more than enough of an answer for him. Rollan had gone to see his mother in Amaya, and as a result, the Oathbound had almost captured them. If it weren’t for Worthy, they probably wouldn’t have escaped.

Abeke saw something in his face—perhaps worry for his family—because she suddenly smiled and said, “Maybe the bounties put out for us by the Oathbound haven’t yet reached all parts of Erdas. If so, and if time allows, I’m sure you’ll be able to see your family. And it would be nice to have a normal meal for once.” She turned to their friends, still asleep. “We should wake the others.”

“You wake up Rollan,” Conor said, pointing to one of the cots on the other side of the room. “He’s always cranky when he doesn’t get enough sleep.”

Conor went to rouse Worthy and Anka while Abeke crossed their quarters. Worthy was curled into a fetal position on his bed, his red cloak draped over his body. Conor wasn’t sure, but he thought that he might have been purring in his sleep.

“Get up, Worthy,” Conor said, giving him a slight nudge.

The Redcloak yawned and stretched, his golden eyes blinking behind his white, cat-shaped mask. Worthy tried to stand, but became unbalanced with the shifting of the ship. He slowly sunk back to the flat mattress. “You should have woken me when we reached land.”

Conor shook his head. In addition to his heightened reflexes and strength, Worthy had also gained his former spirit animal's dislike of water—and a black tail that he preferred no one talk about. Conor wondered what other traits Worthy had inherited when he merged with the wildcat. Hopefully he wouldn't start shedding or hacking up hairballs.

Anka stirred in the bunk beside Worthy. At least Conor assumed it was Anka. Thanks to her chameleon's powers, she had blended in with the threadbare blue blanket covering her, making her almost invisible to the eye. As she sat up, her skin shifted from the muted blue to a warm brown, matching the planks on the cabin walls.

Across the room, Meilin and Rollan yawned. Meilin jumped out of bed, but Rollan remained in the adjacent bunk, pulling his thick brown cloak around him and squeezing his eyes shut. The cloak had seemed too warm for Amaya, but it would serve him well on their journey through Eura. Conor knew how cold the nights could get, and he wondered if they had been too hasty in leaving their trusty green cloaks along the roadside in Amaya.

"I don't always agree with Worthy, but he kind of has a point," Rollan said. "How about you wake us up when we get there?"

Meilin leaned over and thumped Rollan's ear. "Don't you want breakfast?"

Rollan groaned. "Salted flounder and stale biscuits. For the tenth day in a row." He faked a smile. "Yum."

Meilin thumped his ear again. "You've had worse. Remember that meal of seal fat in the Ardu settlement?"

"Don't remind me," he said, rubbing his ear. "I'll take the fish."

"First things first," Anka said, rising from the bed. Her skin a transparent blur. "Worthy, now would be a good time for you to fill us in on everything you know about the next gift."

Worthy leaned back against the wall with his hands behind his head. He had seemed to enjoy withholding this information from them, probably because he wanted to make himself feel more important. For Worthy's sake, Conor hoped that he really knew where the next gift was. If not, Meilin was liable to toss him overboard.

Worthy's gaze settled on Conor. "Do you remember the stories about the great Euran warrior and his black wildcat?" he asked him.

Conor nodded. "A little. The rumors were that the wildcat was as large as Tellun."

"No, even larger," Worthy said. "The beast's booming roar was as loud a thousand erupting volcanoes. Its fur was as dark as midnight during a lunar eclipse, and its diamond-forged claws and teeth could shred the densest of rock."

"I bet it couldn't slice the armor of the famous Amayan gila monster," Rollan mumbled.

Meilin, who was now sitting on the bed beside Rollan, jutted her elbow into his side. "Hush," she warned.

"There was also a rumor about the warrior wielding a powerful sword," Worthy continued. "Its hilt contained a yellow gem that matched the beast's eyes. And its blade was supposedly as sharp as the black wildcat's claws." Worthy paused. "That's what they called it: the Wildcat's Claw."

"Do you know where this sword is?" Abeke asked.

He shook his head. "We used to have a replica of the sword at Trunswick Manor. I used it during the war—that is, until it broke. So much for it being forged from the finest Trunswick iron. Anyway, while it wasn't the real thing, my father kept all sorts journals and histories about to our local legends at the manor. It was sort of an obsession of his. His library would be the best place to research the location of the real Wildcat's Claw."

Conor had remembered seeing the replica of this sword, but only once, when he was working as a servant to Worthy. Worthy had just been the spoiled Devin Trunswick back then, and Conor had been a simple shepherd's son. How times had changed.

"Without any other leads, it seems like our best course of action is to travel to Trunswick," Meilin said. She had risen from the bed, and was now spinning a quarterstaff around herself. "Hopefully we can find the records that will lead us to the real sword."

Conor knew he was beaming, and he didn't even try to hide it. Trunswick! Perhaps he would be able to see his family after all. They lived close to the city, easily within a day's travel.

"We'll need more supplies," Abeke said. "The weather will not be as forgiving as Amaya."

"There are plenty of trading posts on the way to Trunswick," Worthy said. "I think I have enough money to get us what we need."

"Yes, thank you for that," Anka said. "After so many days on the road, it was nice to sleep in a real bed."

"Don't thank me," he said. "Thank the Redcloaks. Shane left us a small fortune when he ... you know ..."

Conor was glad that Worthy didn't finish his statement. Abeke had turned toward the wall, away from them. Shane, the former leader of the Redcloaks, had died while fighting against the Wurm. Abeke didn't speak of him much, but she'd cared greatly for him, even if those feelings were complicated.

"We'll need a lot more than clothing," Anka said. "We need food, weapons, supplies." She leaned against the door, blending in with the splintered wood. "Instead of traveling directly to Trunswick, we should first gather supplies at the Redcloak headquarters. You said they're close, correct?"

Worthy tugged at his collar. "I don't think that's a good idea," he said.

"I agree," Abeke said. "We need to find the next gift as quickly as we can. The longer we wait, the more dangerous it becomes for us and the rest of the Greencloaks."

Rollan cleared his throat. "Look, I'm not a big fan of the Redcloaks—no offense, Worthy—but maybe Anka has a point. It would be nice to get some decent food—something better than flounder, anyway. And maybe some more arrows for Abeke." He glanced at Meilin as she continued to spin her quarterstaff. "And maybe something with a blade for Meilin."

Rollan had been forced to throw in Meilin's sword as part of the deal when he booked the team's passage. She had swiped the sword off an Oathbound in Amaya, and had boasted about using the blade on Wikam the Just whenever they faced off again. Even though Meilin was perfectly capable of besting most warriors without any weapons, Conor and the others always breathed a little easier when Meilin was well-armed—especially when they were facing an army as large as the Oathbound.

Meilin stopped spinning her quarterstaff. “The Redcloaks are formidable warriors,” she said, almost begrudgingly. “And there are a lot of Oathbound out there, and only six of us.”

Worthy stood and moved to the center of the room. “They didn’t hold off all those Oathbound in Amaya for us to just show up at their front door,” he said. “We all know we’re being tracked. The last thing I want to do is lead the Oathbound to the Redcloaks. If we fail, the Redcloaks will need to be ready to protect Erdas in our place.”

“Whoa! Hold on there, buddy,” Rollan said. “I just want the Redcloaks’ help temporarily. Erdas doesn’t need their protection full time. That’s why there are Greencloaks.”

“You mean the Greencloaks currently locked up in Greenhaven Castle?” Worthy asked. “The Greencloaks jailed at the Citadel?”

“Enough,” Abeke said. “We’re supposed to be the glue, remember. We need to stick together, not fight.” She turned to Conor. “You’ve been quiet. What do you think? Should Worthy take us to the Redcloak base?”

It took Conor a moment to realize that Abeke was talking to him. He was still caught up in the conversation, in hearing his friends argue with each other. If they weren’t successful in saving the Greencloaks, it could soon be them fighting against one another, split among their home nations’ armies. Conor against Abeke. Eura against Nilo. Nation against nation. There was no way that Erdas would survive that.

“How far away is the Redcloak headquarters?” he asked.

“At least a week’s journey,” Worthy said. “And that’s if we can travel during the day. It would be much longer if we have to sneak around at night.”

Conor rubbed his arm. He wished Briggan were at his side. He was always more at peace with the wolf beside him. Just running his hands through Briggan’s luxurious gray-white fur calmed him. “We can’t afford to lose that much time,” he said. “I think we should head directly to Trunswick. But if we can’t find anything, Worthy takes us to Redcloak headquarters to regroup and come up with a new plan.”

Everyone slowly nodded in agreement. The glue holding them together was still there, at least for now.

“Enough talk,” Rollan said, clapping his hands. “Who’s up for some stale biscuits?”

After breakfast, which unfortunately was more fish scales than meat, Conor took to the deck of the ship, dodging deckhands as they prepared for landing. A fog had descended over the sea, surrounding the boat and slowing its progress. Conor could no longer see land, but he knew it was there.

He heard the boat’s floorboards creak behind him. Turning, he saw Worthy slowly making his way toward him.

“For being part cat, you’re not very quiet,” Conor said. “You should take lessons from Abeke.”

Worthy snorted at a few sailors as they sped by, their eyes on the ground the entire time. The crew had been leery of him even since they’d left port—the eyes and the mask made him stand out more than the others. Worthy put on a good show, but Conor knew that the whispers and judging looks bothered him. He’d spent enough time with Worthy—and Devin—to recognize when things got under his skin.

Worthy leaned against the railing, then clutched it as the boat lurched again, his claws lodging themselves into the cracked wood. “We’re close,” he said. “I can smell land, even over all this salt water.” He glanced at Conor. “Look, I just wanted to thank you for taking my side back in our cabin.”

Technically, Conor hadn’t taken anyone’s side. He just wanted to get to Trunswick as quickly as possible.

“During our meal, Abeke mentioned that you’d spent time with your family before joining the Greencloaks at the Citadel,” Worthy said. “Did you, um, make it into town?”

Conor shook his head. “No, I mostly stayed close to home. It didn’t seem smart to travel into Trunswick.” Even though the Wyrms had been defeated, people were still distrustful of men in uniform, especially Greencloaks. For many Eurans, the Greencloaks were just like the Conquerors, only more powerful.

“There’s probably something you should know,” Worthy began. “I ... well ... I kind of don’t know where the records are that will lead us to the Wildcat’s Claw.”

“What?”

“You see, there was a fire at the manor. It was the only way to protect Dawson.” Worthy shook his head. “It’s hard to explain. I was having a really bad day.”

Conor couldn’t believe what he was hearing. “So where are we supposed to look?” he asked.

“My father probably saved his library before he was run out of town. I hope. The fire wasn’t that bad. The last I saw, it had only consumed the top of the castle. And maybe the west wing. And the servants’ quarters.”

“The more you talk, the worse this sounds.” Conor started to walk off. “I need to tell the others—”

“No! Wait.” Worthy jumped in front of him. He blinked his catlike eyes at Conor. “Please don’t tell them. I want them to trust me.”

“You don’t gain people’s trust by lying to them.”

“I know, it’s just ...” He shook his head. “I just want to be important. I want to be ...”

“Worthy?”

He nodded. “I want to be a hero, like you all.” He sighed. “The records are there somewhere. I’m sure.” □Conor stared at Worthy for a long moment. He wished he could see the boy’s face. His mask hid too much, making it hard for Conor to read him. Finally, Conor nodded. “Fine. We’ll keep this between us for now.” He looked back into the fog. “I just hope you’re right about those records. All of Erdas is depending on it.”

Enter your code to
unlock huge rewards:
NFWTNMJD4X

Design your own
spirit animal!

Join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!
Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one
of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SPIRIT ANIMALS

SPECIAL EDITIONS

Discover the Hidden Tales of Erdas!

There's more to explore in the Spirit Animals world! These Special Editions reveal the secrets of Erdas in ways you never saw coming...

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SCHOLASTIC and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

SPIRIT ANIMALS

Discover Your Spirit Animal!

Read the Books. Play the Game.

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals

SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, AND ASSOCIATED LOGOS ARE TRADEMARKS AND/OR REGISTERED TRADEMARKS OF SCHOLASTIC INC. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

Some houses are more than haunted...
THEY'RE HUNGRY.

Can five kids make it out of Shadow House alive
or will they be trapped forever?

DOWNLOAD THE APP, IF YOU DARE!

Read the ghost story, then live
your own haunting in the app!

SCHOLASTIC and associated logos
are trademarks and/or registered
trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

SCHOLASTIC
scholastic.com/ShadowHouse

SHADOWHOUSEe

THE STUNNING ADVENTURE
FROM BESTSELLING AUTHOR
RICK RIORDAN

Available in print and
eBook editions

scholastic.com/the39clues

 SCHOLASTIC

39CLUESe

SCHOLASTIC, THE 39 CLUES, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

Copyright © 2017 by Scholastic Inc.

All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920. SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

The publisher does not have any control over and does not assume any responsibility for author or third-party websites or their content.

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2016962660

ISBN 978-1-338-11665-6

First edition, May 2017

Cover illustration by Angelo Rinaldi

Cover design by Charice Silverman & Rocco Melillo

Art direction by Keirsten Geise

Metal frame: © caesart/Shutterstock

Wood texture: © CG Textures

e-ISBN 978-1-338-11666-3

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereafter invented, without the express written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

THE NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING SERIES

FALL of the BEASTS

ASPIRIT ANIMALS™

BOOK 6

THE WILDCAT'S CLAW

VARIAN JOHNSON

An ancient evil is rising from beneath Erdas, and we need YOU to help stop it.

Claim your spirit animal and join the adventure now:

1. Go to scholastic.com/spiritanimals.
2. Log in to create your character and choose your own spirit animal.
3. Have your book ready and enter the code below to unlock the adventure.

Your code: NRR42GWX4W

By the Four Fallen,
The Greencloaks

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

“Tell Dawson
I was a hero.”

FALL of the BEASTS
SPIRIT
ANIMALS™
THE WILDCAT'S CLAW

Varian Johnson

SCHOLASTIC INC.

For Crystal, who gives us treats even when we misbehave—VJ

Contents

Dagger Symbol

Greencloak Letter

Quote Page

Title Page

Map of Erdas

Dedication

1: LENORI

2: ACROSS THE OCEAN

3: THE COUNTRYSIDE

4: THE MARKET

5: REMEMBERING OLD FRIENDS

6: TRAPPER ATTACK

7: TRUNSWICK

8: RACE AGAINST THE MILITIA

9: THE MIGHTY WILCO

10: THE ENCHANTED FOREST

11: THE WATERFALL

12: BOND TOKENS

13: THE BATTLE

14: THE WILDCAT'S ROAR

About the Author

Online Game Code

Sneak Peek

Spirit Animals Game

Copyright

LENORI

LENORI PACED HER CRAMPED QUARTERS—WHICH WERE little more than a small, single holding cell with meager wood furnishings. She hadn't had contact with Olvan, or any other Greencloaks, since being imprisoned. Most of the others had been captured and returned to Greenhaven Castle, where they would be held for trial, but she and Olvan remained in the Council Citadel.

Olvan.

He'd been struck by a stone viper's fangs, and most of his body was turned to stone. Thanks to her rainbow ibis, Myriam, Lenori could sense his presence. He was in pain, but alive, though she didn't know for how long.

She didn't know how long any of them had.

The Second Devourer War had taken a heavy toll on all the nations, and the Wurm's destructive reign of terror only amplified people's fears. The Greencloaks had saved the world, but it had come at a great price. Despite their best efforts, many people had suffered.

Zerif, under the Wurm's control, had used his immense powers to ravage the world. But these battles weren't just fought in far-off lands like Stetriol or Arctica. There was bloodshed in every village. Neighbor against neighbor. Brother against brother. Mother against daughter. Father against son.

The Greencloaks themselves had inflicted some of the worst damage.

Zerif, armed with the Wyrms' parasites, had taken control of most of their order, and had then turned them loose to wreak havoc in every corner of every land. There was no village, no militia, and no army that could prevail against a legion of Greencloaks when they partnered with their spirit animals. With their true, uninhibited powers now unleashed, the Greencloaks had shown the world just how powerful they'd become.

People were afraid of them. They were angry. They were distrustful. And Lenori couldn't fault any of them for feeling that way.

She and Olvan thought that by coming here to meet with the leaders of the nations, they would be able to soothe any doubts and remind the world that the Greencloaks only wanted to preserve peace. They had even brought along the Four Heroes of Erdas—each from a different nation, but united in their oath to serve and protect all lands. But thanks to traitors within their midst, the Emperor of Zhong had fallen, and the real Greencloaks were left to take the blame.

Lenori pressed her ear against the door to make sure that no one was nearby, but heard only a quiet dripping from the Citadel's leaking roof. She released Myriam from passive state. The ibis strutted around, proudly displaying her rainbow feathers and shaking her long, thin legs.

"No time for showing off, Myriam," Lenori said. "We must find our young friends."

She sat down on the stone floor and closed her eyes. She pushed the cold of the room, the fear of her imprisonment, and the worry for her fellow Greencloaks from her mind. Her pulse slowed and her body relaxed. It was just her, Myriam, and Erdas, united as one.

A hazy image floated before her. She concentrated, trying to sharpen its edges. Trying to bring it into focus. It was a ship, cutting across the ocean. Squeezing her eyes tighter, she saw the Four Heroes huddled in a small room. No—not four. There were six of them. They had been tested recently—she could see the weariness of their faces—but they exuded a sense of accomplishment. Her mind centered itself on Rollan. Her gaze fell to the thin leather strap around his neck.

The Heart of the Land. He had revealed it!

She heard something in the distance. Echoes? Footsteps?

Was there danger on the boat? A trap waiting to be sprung?

She shook her head. Those sounds weren't coming from the ship. Someone was approaching her room.

She blinked, and her mind returned to her cell. She looked at the ibis, sitting calmly beside her. "Myriam, back to me. I don't want them to know that you've been loose."

The rainbow ibis disappeared just as the heavy wooden door swung open. Two Oathbound warriors, both dressed in black, entered the room. She recognized the one with the short blond hair. Sure enough, the woman's brown stone viper flashed into view, curling around her large arm. Brunhild the Merry. She was the one who'd poisoned Olvan.

The other warrior was new to Lenori. Like Brunhild, this woman wore a black uniform with brass neck and wrist collars, but the woman also sported shiny, gaudy rings on most of her fingers. Her long brown hair was twisted into an intricate braid that trailed over her shoulder, like an embroidered rope hanging from a curtain.

The unknown woman snapped her fingers, and a servant entered the room, carrying a tray full of breads, dates, and cheeses. Lenori willed her stomach to remain silent. It was the first food she'd seen in two days.

The servant placed the tray before Lenori, then left the room. The woman with the long braid took a step forward. "Don't you want to eat?"

Lenori pretended that the food wasn't there. "No, I want to be set free."

The braided woman shook her head. "Don't ask for the impossible," she said. "Go on, take a bite. Eat it all. Gorge yourself." She grinned. "I promise it isn't laced with stone viper venom."

Lenori instead curled her hands into her lap. "What do you want from me?"

"We know why your young friends were in Amaya," the Oathbound woman said, whipping her braid over her shoulder and behind her back. She began to pace, her boots echoing on the scarred stone bricks. "For such a small amulet, it carries quite a punch. The children were lucky to escape with it." She pulled a red-tinged sword from her side. It sparkled as light hit its blade. "We've heard reports that they're on a ship headed for Eura," she said. "What's there? Another of these so-called gifts?"

Lenori stared ahead, saying nothing.

The woman knelt so that she and Lenori were face-to-face. Her hazel eyes were as cold as the floor. Then she placed her sword on the ground, well within Lenori's reach. It was almost as if the woman were daring Lenori to try to grab it.

"I understand that you don't want to betray your friends," the woman said. "But they're just children. They shouldn't be fighting these battles. Take pity on them. Spare them any further pain and hardship."

"They've saved the world twice," Lenori said. "You should not underestimate them."

The woman inspected her own hands, tracing her fingertips across her numerous rings. The ring on her middle finger was adorned with three small, cone-shaped spikes. She twisted the ring so the spikes pointed from the inside of her hand. Then, with a wry smile creeping across her face, the woman slapped Lenori. Lenori cried out, more from the shock than the pain. Then the woman struck Lenori again, even harder. Lenori's face burned. The woman's ring had left its mark.

"And you should not underestimate me," the woman replied as she twisted her blood-tipped ring back into place.

Lenori let her gaze flicker to the sword lying on the floor. She considered lunging for it, but stopped herself. She was sure that was exactly what the woman wanted. Lenori refused to give her the satisfaction.

Leaving the sword on the floor, the woman picked up a loaf of bread. She tore off a small piece, then popped it into her mouth. "Delicious." Then she held the bread under Lenori's nose. "I know you want a bite. You must be delirious with hunger."

Lenori shook her head.

The woman sighed, then ate a larger piece. "Where are they going, Lenori? What are they searching for? Is there another gift out there? Is it just as powerful as the Heart of the Land?" The woman dropped the remaining bread on the tray, picked up her sword, and returned to her feet. "I promise, if you help me, I will capture them safely and return them unharmed." The woman glanced at Brunhild. "You know what happened to Olvan. I would hate for a similar fate to befall those children.”

“You’ll never find them,” Lenori said.

For the first time since entering the room, the woman stopped smiling. “Perhaps another two days without food will help you change your mind.” She snapped her fingers, and the Oathbound warrior returned. Lenori’s insides seized as he picked up the tray.

The braided woman held up her hand, signaling the warrior to stop. With her sword, she sliced off a minuscule hunk of cheese. Barely enough to fill a thimble.

“On second thought, why don’t you keep a piece,” she said, tossing the food at Lenori. It bounced off her leg and landed on the floor beside her. Specks of dirt covered the once pristine cheese.

“See how kind I am? I could have left you with nothing.” The woman stepped out of the room. “But like that food, my kindness will not last forever. Tell me what I want to know, or prepare yourself for death.”

The door slammed shut, leaving Lenori in silence. She picked up the small slice of cheese. Her mouth watered.... It smelled even better once in her hands.

Then, slowly, she ground the food between her fingers, disintegrating it.

Her faith may be tested, but she would not falter.

She was a Greencloak.

Committed to the end, no matter what.

ACROSS THE OCEAN

CONOR GLANCED OUT OF THE PORTHOLE OF THE SLEEK clipper as it sliced through choppy seas and strong winds. They had boarded the boat in a small coastal town just north of Concorba. Thanks to a small collection of coins from Worthy—and Rollan’s skill with negotiations—they had been able to secure a cabin with four beds, along with two packs of meager provisions. The room wasn’t nearly big enough for all six of them to comfortably sleep at one time, but Conor and his friends weren’t in the position to be choosy.

Stepping closer to the window, Conor squinted at his reflection in the dirty, smudged glass. He reached to his forehead and ran his fingers along his skin, right where the mark of the Wyrms used to be. The black, swirling mark had faded from view, but he could still feel its power. Its weight. It was an invisible burden he feared he would carry for the rest of his life.

“See anything of interest?” a voice asked behind him.

Smiling, he turned around. Abeke was always light on her feet, even with Uraza, her leopard, in passive state on her arm. Conor flexed his own forearm, watching his muscles ripple underneath Briggan’s mark. He hated leaving the Great Wolf in passive state for so long, but their current mission required stealth, not strength.

Conor looked back out the window and stared into the distance. “It could be a mirage, but I think I see land in the distance.”

“I just spoke with the captain,” she said. “We’ll reach port soon.”

Conor grinned. Eura. Green fields. Light-blue skies and a cool breeze on his face. “Do you think I’ll be able to see my family?” Conor asked. Although he had seen them recently, he always loved spending time with his parents and brothers. He didn’t even mind getting up early in the morning to herd and shear the sheep. Seeing his family helped remind Conor that as a Greencloak, he not only fought to protect Erdas, he also fought to protect those closest to him.

“I could show you guys a real Euran meal,” he continued. “Shepherd’s pie and all.”

Abeke frowned, which was more than enough of an answer for him. Rollan had gone to see his mother in Amaya, and as a result, the Oathbound had almost captured them. If it wasn’t for Worthy, they probably wouldn’t have escaped.

Abeke saw something in his face—perhaps worry for his family—because she suddenly smiled and said, “Maybe the bounties put out for us by the Oathbound haven’t yet reached all parts of Erdas. If so, and if time allows, I’m sure you’ll be able to see your family. And it would be nice to have a normal meal for once.” She turned to their friends, still asleep. “We should wake the others.”

“You wake up Rollan,” Conor said, pointing to one of the cots on the other side of the room. “He’s always cranky when he doesn’t get enough sleep.”

Conor went to rouse Worthy and Anka while Abeke crossed their quarters. Worthy was curled into a fetal position on his bed, his red cloak draped over his body. Conor wasn’t sure, but he thought that he might have been purring in his sleep.

“Get up, Worthy,” Conor said, giving him a slight nudge.

The Redcloak yawned and stretched, his golden eyes blinking behind his white, cat-shaped mask. Worthy tried to stand, but became unbalanced with the shifting of the ship. He slowly sank back to the flat mattress. “You should have woken me when we reached land.”

Conor shook his head. In addition to his heightened reflexes and strength, Worthy had also gained his former spirit animal's dislike of water—and a black tail that he preferred no one talk about. Conor wondered what other traits Worthy had inherited when he merged with the wildcat. Hopefully he wouldn't start shedding or hacking up hairballs.

Anka stirred in the bunk beside Worthy. At least Conor assumed it was Anka. Thanks to her chameleon's powers, she had blended in with the threadbare blue blanket covering her, making her almost invisible to the eye. As she sat up, her skin shifted from the muted blue to a warm brown, matching the planks on the cabin walls.

Across the room, Meilin and Rollan yawned. Meilin jumped out of bed, but Rollan remained in the adjacent bunk, pulling his thick brown cloak around him and squeezing his eyes shut. The cloak had seemed too warm for Amaya, but it would serve him well on their journey through Eura. Conor knew how cold the nights could get, and he wondered if they had been too hasty in leaving their trusty green cloaks along the roadside in Amaya.

"I don't always agree with Worthy, but he kind of has a point," Rollan said. "How about you wake us up when we get there?"

Meilin leaned over and thumped Rollan's ear. "Don't you want breakfast?"

Rollan groaned. "Salted flounder and stale biscuits. For the tenth day in a row." He faked a smile. "Yum."

Meilin thumped his ear again. "You've had worse. Remember that meal of seal fat in the Ardu settlement?"

"Don't remind me," he said, rubbing his ear. "I'll take the fish."

"First things first," Anka said, rising from the bed, her skin a transparent blur. "Worthy, now would be a good time for you to fill us in on everything you know about the next gift."

Worthy leaned back against the wall with his hands behind his head. He had seemed to enjoy withholding this information from them, probably because he wanted to make himself feel more important. For Worthy's sake, Conor hoped that he really knew where the next gift was. If not, Meilin was liable to toss him overboard.

Worthy's gaze settled on Conor. "Do you remember the stories about the great Euran warrior and his black wildcat?" he asked him.

Conor nodded. "A little. The rumors were that the wildcat was as large as Tellun."

"No, even larger," Worthy said. "The beast's booming roar was as loud as a thousand erupting volcanoes. Its fur was as dark as midnight during a lunar eclipse, and its diamond-forged claws and teeth could shred the densest of rock."

"I bet it couldn't slice the armor of the famous Amayan gila monster," Rollan mumbled.

Meilin, who was now sitting on the bed beside Rollan, jutted her elbow into his side. "Hush," she warned.

"There was also a rumor about the warrior wielding a powerful sword," Worthy continued. "Its hilt contained a yellow gem that matched the beast's eyes. And its blade was supposedly as sharp as the black wildcat's claws." Worthy paused. "That's what they called it: the Wildcat's Claw."

"Do you know where this sword is?" Abeke asked.

He shook his head. "We used to have a replica of the sword at Trunswick Manor. I used it during the war—that is, until it broke. So much for it being forged from the finest Trunswick iron. Anyway, while it wasn't the real thing, my father kept all sorts of journals and histories about our local legends at the manor. It was sort of an obsession of his. His library would be the best place to research the location of the real Wildcat's Claw."

Conor had remembered seeing the replica of this sword, but only once, when he was working as a servant to Worthy. Worthy had just been the spoiled Devin Trunswick back then, and Conor had been a simple shepherd's son. How times had changed.

"Without any other leads, it seems like our best course of action is to travel to Trunswick," Meilin said. She had risen from the bed, and was now spinning a quarterstaff around herself. "Hopefully we can find the records that will lead us to the real sword."

Conor knew he was beaming, and he didn't even try to hide it. Trunswick! Perhaps he would be able to see his family after all. They lived close to the city, easily within a day's travel.

"We'll need more supplies," Abeke said. "The weather will not be as forgiving as Amaya."

"There are plenty of trading posts on the way to Trunswick," Worthy said. "I think I have enough money to get us what we need."

"Yes, thank you for that," Anka said. "After so many days on the road, it was nice to sleep in a real bed."

"Don't thank me," he said. "Thank the Redcloaks. Shane left us a small fortune when he ... you know ..."

Conor was glad that Worthy didn't finish his statement. Abeke had turned toward the wall, away from them. Shane, the former leader of the Redcloaks, had died while fighting against the Wurm. Abeke didn't speak of him much, but she'd cared greatly for him, even if those feelings were complicated.

"We'll need a lot more than clothing," Anka said. "We need food, weapons, supplies." She leaned against the door, blending in with the splintered wood. "Instead of traveling directly to Trunswick, we should first gather supplies at the Redcloak headquarters. You said they're close, correct?"

Worthy tugged at his collar. "I don't think that's a good idea," he said.

"I agree," Abeke said. "We need to find the next gift as quickly as we can. The longer we wait, the more dangerous it becomes for us and the rest of the Greencloaks."

Rollan cleared his throat. "Look, I'm not a big fan of the Redcloaks—no offense, Worthy—but maybe Anka has a point. It would be nice to get some decent food—something better than flounder, anyway. And maybe some more arrows for Abeke." He glanced at Meilin as she continued to spin her quarterstaff. "And maybe something with a blade for Meilin."

Rollan had been forced to throw in Meilin's sword as part of the deal when he booked the team's passage. She had swiped the sword off an Oathbound in Amaya, and had boasted about using the blade on Wikam the Just whenever they faced off again. Even though Meilin was perfectly capable of besting most warriors without any weapons, Conor and the others always breathed a little easier when Meilin was well-armed—especially when they were facing an army as large as the Oathbound.

Meilin stopped spinning her quarterstaff. “The Redcloaks are formidable warriors,” she said, almost begrudgingly. “And there are a lot of Oathbound out there, and only six of us.”

Worthy stood and moved to the center of the room. “They didn’t hold off all those Oathbound in Amaya for us to just show up at their front door,” he said. “We all know we’re being tracked. The last thing I want to do is lead the Oathbound to the Redcloaks. If we fail, the Redcloaks will need to be ready to protect Erdas in our place.”

“Whoa! Hold on there, buddy,” Rollan said. “I just want the Redcloaks’ help temporarily. Erdas doesn’t need their protection full time. That’s why there are Greencloaks.”

“You mean the Greencloaks currently locked up in Greenhaven Castle?” Worthy asked. “The Greencloaks jailed at the Citadel?”

“Enough,” Abeke said. “We’re supposed to be the glue, remember? We need to stick together, not fight.” She turned to Conor. “You’ve been quiet. What do you think? Should Worthy take us to the Redcloak base?”

It took Conor a moment to realize that Abeke was talking to him. He was still caught up in the conversation, in hearing his friends argue with one another. If they weren’t successful in saving the Greencloaks, it could soon be them fighting against one another, split among their home nations’ armies. Conor against Abeke. Eura against Nilo. Nation against nation. There was no way that Erdas would survive that.

“How far away is the Redcloak headquarters?” he asked.

“At least a week’s journey,” Worthy said. “And that’s if we can travel during the day. It would be much longer if we have to sneak around at night.”

Conor rubbed his arm. He wished Briggan were at his side. He was always more at peace with the wolf beside him. Just running his hands through Briggan’s luxurious gray-white fur calmed him. “We can’t afford to lose that much time,” he said. “I think we should head directly to Trunswick. But if we can’t find anything, Worthy takes us to Redcloak headquarters to regroup and come up with a new plan.”

Everyone slowly nodded in agreement. The glue holding them together was still there, at least for now.

“Enough talk,” Rollan said, clapping his hands. “Who’s up for some stale biscuits?”

After breakfast, which unfortunately was more fish scales than meat, Conor took to the deck of the ship, dodging deckhands as they prepared for landing. A fog had descended over the sea, surrounding the boat and slowing its progress. Conor could no longer see land, but he knew it was there.

He heard the boat’s floorboards creak behind him. Turning, he saw Worthy slowly making his way toward him.

“For being part cat, you’re not very quiet,” Conor said. “You should take lessons from Abeke.”

Worthy snorted at a few sailors as they sped by, their eyes on the ground the entire time. The crew had been leery of him ever since they’d left port—the eyes and the mask made him stand out more than the others. Worthy put on a good show, but Conor knew that the whispers and judging looks bothered him. He’d spent enough time with Worthy—and Devin—to recognize when things got under his skin.

Worthy leaned against the railing, then clutched it as the boat lurched again, his claws lodging themselves into the cracked wood. “We’re close,” he said. “I can smell land, even over all this salt water.” He glanced at Conor. “Look, I just wanted to thank you for taking my side back in our cabin.”

Technically, Conor hadn’t taken anyone’s side. He just wanted to get to Trunswick as quickly as possible.

“During our meal, Abeke mentioned that you’d spent time with your family before joining the Greencloaks at the Citadel,” Worthy said. “Did you, um, make it into town?”

Conor shook his head. “No, I mostly stayed close to home. It didn’t seem smart to travel into Trunswick.” Even though the Wyrms had been defeated, people were still distrustful of men in uniform, especially Greencloaks. For many Eurans, the Greencloaks were just like the Conquerors, only more powerful.

“There’s probably something you should know,” Worthy began. “I ... well ... I kind of don’t know where the records are that will lead us to the Wildcat’s Claw.”

“What?”

“You see, there was a fire at the manor. It was the only way to protect Dawson.” Worthy shook his head. “It’s hard to explain. I was having a really bad day.”

Conor couldn’t believe what he was hearing. “So where are we supposed to look?” he asked.

“My father probably saved his library before he was run out of town. I hope. The fire wasn’t that bad. The last I saw, it had only consumed the top of the castle. And maybe the west wing. And the servants’ quarters.”

“The more you talk, the worse this sounds.” Conor started to walk off. “I need to tell the others—”

“No! Wait.” Worthy jumped in front of him. He blinked his catlike eyes at Conor. “Please don’t tell them. I want them to trust me.”

“You don’t gain people’s trust by lying to them.”

“I know, it’s just ...” He shook his head. “I just want to be important. I want to be ...”

“Worthy?”

He nodded. “I want to be a hero, like you all.” He sighed. “The records are there somewhere. I’m sure.”

Conor stared at Worthy for a long moment. He wished he could see the boy’s face. His mask hid too much, making it hard for Conor to read him. Finally, Conor nodded. “Fine. We’ll keep this between us for now.” He looked back into the fog. “I just hope you’re right about those records. All of Erdas is depending on it.”

THE COUNTRYSIDE

THE FULL MOON ILLUMINATED THE OTHERWISE DARK sky as Meilin and the others departed the ship. Once they were a safe distance away from the pier, Abeke and Conor released their spirit animals. Briggan rolled in the tall grass, still damp from fog, then yelped like a pup playing with a bone. Conor scolded him at first, but then dropped down and tackled him, wrapping his arms around the wolf as if he were a toy instead of a Great Beast.

Uraza pawed the grass cautiously, then sniffed the air. Her ears perked up, her purple irises narrowed, and the fur rose on the scruff of her neck.

“I smell it, too,” Abeke said, pulling an arrow from her quiver. “We’ll be back in a second,” she whispered to the others. “We’re off to catch our next meal.”

As they slipped away, Rollan looked toward the sky and watched as Essix looped through the air. Finally, she flew to his shoulder, settling on the heavy brown cloak. Unlike the other animals, Essix had chosen to remain free, only returning to the ship when she needed a rest. Rollan pulled out a piece of dried fish and offered it to the bird. The gyrfalcon picked at the food, then squawked. Splaying her brownish-gold wings wide, she took to the air again, leaving the limp piece of meat in Rollan’s fingers.

“See, even Essix is tired of fish,” he mumbled. He took a bite of it, frowned, then spit it out.

“Are you going to release Jhi?” Anka asked Meilin. Anka was hidden, just a ripple beside her. She had taken on the characteristics of her surroundings, and was now just as dark as the nighttime sky.

“We should get moving,” Meilin said. “I’ll release her once we set up camp.”

Anka placed her hand on Meilin’s shoulder. “It’s okay. I think we can spare a few minutes if you want to see her.”

Meilin smiled. It would be good to see Jhi, even if only for a few moments. A flash struck the sky, and then there was Jhi, a mountain of black and white standing before her. Meilin placed her hands on the panda’s plush fur. Jhi was warm—Meilin could have curled up against her right then. Jhi gave the girl a playful lick, making Meilin laugh.

“Yes, I’ve missed you as well.” She hugged the animal. “We have a long way to travel. But don’t worry. I won’t make you walk the entire way.”

That earned Meilin another lick from the Great Panda.

“We’ll only have a few hours of travel before we have to stop,” Meilin said to Anka. “Do you think there’s any way we could travel during the day?”

“I don’t think we can chance it,” she said. “My powers can conceal us, but not when we’re constantly moving. And certainly not over landscapes as open as this.”

“Then we’d better get moving,” Meilin said. “Everyone ready?”

Conor sat up from the ground. A few blades of grass poked from his blond hair. “Where’s Abeke? Didn’t she run off to get—?”

“Already back,” Abeke said, holding up a rabbit. Uraza followed with another white rabbit between her jaws. “Hopefully we’ll be able to hunt more along the way,” she said. “It would be good to avoid any big settlements for as long as possible.”

“We’ll have to stop eventually,” Conor said. “The closer we get to Trunswick, the colder the days will become.” He nodded toward Rollan. “That is, unless Rollan shares his cloak with us.”

Rollan seemed to blush as he pulled the thick brown cloak tightly around him. “Hey, get your own, wolf-boy.”

Meilin rolled her eyes. “Let’s get moving.” She gave Jhi one last pat, then called her back into passive state. “Worthy, this is your territory,” she said to the Redcloak. “Lead the way.”

They spent the next few nights traveling down dusty, rutted dirt roads and twisting paths while sleeping during daylight. Abeke and Conor were able to find food for them, but as Conor had suggested, food wasn’t their major problem. It was cold during the day, and even more frigid at night. Rollan, now carrying the larger of the group’s two packs, had eventually given up his brown cloak to others as they took turns sleeping. The first snow flurries had already begun to dust the landscape. They would need to stop soon for warmer clothes.

But it wasn’t just snow that they encountered on their trek. Meilin also saw country cottages in shambles, dilapidated wooden fences along many of the roads, and the skeletons of burned bridges over small, winding streams. Sheep and pigs, once clearly domesticated, now ran wild, without a shepherd or farmer in sight to watch over them.

“What do you think happened here?” Anka asked a couple of days later as they paused by another abandoned, crumbling home. “Is all this destruction from the Second Devourer War? I thought they would have had a chance to rebuild by now.”

“I’m going to scout on ahead,” Conor said. “Maybe I can find some food. Or somewhere to bed down.” Briggan nuzzled his partner’s hand, then took off up the road. Conor, his ax tight in his hands, ran behind him.

Meilin placed her staff against the crumbling stone wall separating the house from the road. “This isn’t the work of the Conquerors,” she told Anka. “It was Greencloaks, when they were under the power of Zerif and the Wyrms.”

“I only heard about the battles in Nilo and Stetriol,” Anka said.

“They were everywhere,” Meilin said. “The Wyrms wanted to control everything and everyone. And once it had the Greencloaks under its power, it had the perfect army. Mindless, powerful, trained warriors. And we were the heroes of the Second Devourer War. Every gate was already open to us.”

“This wasn’t the Greencloaks’ fault,” Abeke added, her voice huffy. “None of this would have happened if not for Zerif and the Wym. They alone are to blame for all this destruction.” She cast her eyes at Conor up ahead.

“I know,” Meilin said, keeping her voice calm. “I’m not accusing him.”

Abeke sighed, and the tension released from her body. “I’m sorry. I know that you understand the truth.” She looked up the road again. “I’m going to find Conor. You all catch up when you can.”

“Should we follow them?” Rollan asked, once Abeke and Uraza had disappeared over a hill.

“No, give them a moment,” Meilin said. She nodded toward Worthy, who was stretched out in the grass. “I don’t think Worthy would mind a few extra minutes of rest.”

Meilin took a sip of water from a canteen, then handed it to Anka. As soon as she took it, it turned a gray color to match the stones they sat against. “But as I understand it, Conor wasn’t even in Greenhaven when Zerif attacked,” Anka said.

Meilin nodded. She and Conor had been deep underground, in Sadre, when he finally succumbed to the Wym. She had seen it firsthand, how evil and destructive he’d become. “It doesn’t matter where he was,” Meilin said. “He still feels guilty about it. It wasn’t his fault. He’ll come to realize that, in time.”

“How can you be so sure?” Anka asked.

Meilin didn’t know how to answer Anka, so instead she began reorganizing her bag. According to Worthy, they were nearing a town. They needed supplies, so it would be a rare chance to indulge in some civilization. They could get some clothes. Food. And maybe a weapon or two.

Meilin stood, slipping her pack over her shoulders. “Rollan, want to wake Worthy?”

“More like Sleepy,” Rollan said. “Seriously, how can he nap at a time like this?”

As Rollan walked to the Redcloak, who was now snoring, Meilin picked up a loose stone from the ground and returned it to the rock wall. Jhi could heal a lot of things, but unfortunately her powers couldn't fix this. “The people of Eura will eventually rebuild,” she said. “Perhaps that's something we Greencloaks can help with, once we've found the three other gifts.”

“You want to build houses and fences?” Anka asked. “That seems so unlike you. So ... beneath you.”

“Why? Because I'm a warrior?” Meilin shrugged. “I spent time helping to rebuild Zhong after the war. It's important work. Maybe even more important than always looking for a fight.” She glanced at her quarterstaff. “Just because I'm good at battle doesn't mean I want to do it all the time. And if you hadn't noticed, I'm partnered with Jhi—a healer, not a fighter. Jhi helped me realize there's more to life than taking up arms every time there's a new threat.” Meilin watched as Rollan tried to rouse Worthy, to little avail. The boy began sleepily pawing at Rollan's hands.

“So what will you do next, once this is over?” It took Meilin a second to realize that Anka was now standing beside her, instead of sitting down. “Retire your green cloak?”

“No way,” she said. “I'll always be a Greencloak.” She watched as Rollan tried to pull Worthy to his feet by his cloak. “Plus, I couldn't quit. Rollan would be lost without me.”

“Yes, it's clear that you care for him very much,” Anka replied.

“Yeah, he's okay.” Meilin would have preferred to have Anka's chameleon powers right then. She hoped that it was too dark for the elder Greencloak to see how Meilin's skin was reddening.

“Not every Greencloak is best served on the battlefield,” Anka said. “I wouldn't last five minutes in a real battle.”

“Even the best warriors don't always return from battle,” Meilin said. “That's just the way war works.”

Meilin became quiet again as she envisioned the death of the Emperor of Zhong. She could still see the snarl of the hyena as it leaped past her.

She could still see the emperor staggering, clutching his neck, and collapsing. Then the image morphed, and she was now watching her own father, General Teng, as he died on the battleground during the Second Devourer War. He and the emperor, both felled in similar ways. Both had died in silence, like true Zhongese warriors.

“Meilin? Are you okay?” Anka asked. “You became quiet all of a sudden.”

“It’s nothing....” She looked at Anka, wishing she could see her face. She valued her friends, but she also enjoyed traveling with another person from Zhong. And a woman, no less.

“If you don’t mind me asking,” Meilin began. “What did your father say when you decided to join the Greencloaks?”

“He didn’t know,” Anka said. “He died in battle during the war, like General Teng.”

Meilin hoped that her face didn’t reveal how shocked she was. She hadn’t told Anka who her father was. It still felt strange to talk about him out loud. In the past tense.

“I took up the cloak a few months afterward,” Anka continued. “After everything the Greencloaks had done for Erdas—for Zhong—it seemed like the best way to help.” She gave Meilin a wry smile. “Plus, it wasn’t as if I could join the Zhongese army, could I?”

“I’ll teach you some more fighting techniques when we make camp,” Meilin said.

“That would be good, although I don’t know how much help Toey will be in battle.”

“I used to think the same about Jhi,” Meilin said. “You’d be surprised by the different types of strength we draw from our partners when we fight.” Then, a few moments later, she added. “How long have you known that General Teng was my father?”

“I’ve always known. You’re a hero in Zhong, just like General Teng.” Anka paused, and a few seconds later a small flash came before Meilin’s eyes. Slowly, Anka’s full form trickled into view, like spilled ink spreading across a blank page. Meilin realized the flash had been Anka calling Toey, her chameleon, into passive state.

“Just so you know, everyone in my village wept when we learned of General Teng’s fate.” Anka offered up a small, sympathetic smile. “The entire nation mourned. He was a true protector of Zhong.”

Meilin turned from Anka then, so she wouldn’t see her face. Yep, she thought, I’d kill to have those chameleon powers right now.

THE MARKET

“WHY CAN’T I GO?” WORTHY DEMANDED, CROSSING his arms and planting himself in front of Rollan and Anka. As he spoke, white tufts of cold air spilled from his mouth. His red cloak billowed behind him, making him look more ferocious than Rollan knew he really was.

“Really? You don’t think that white mask will draw any attention?” Rollan asked. “We’re supposed to be keeping a low profile. Blending in.” According to Worthy and Conor, they were about five days away from Trunswick. Although unlikely, it was still possible that people from the village would recognize Conor and Worthy, which would jeopardize their mission.

“Don’t you remember the last time you and Conor tried sneaking into a city?” Worthy said, still adamant. His words had as much bite as the frosty morning air. “If it wasn’t for me, you would have been captured.”

“Worthy, heroes aren’t supposed to boast,” Meilin said. “And don’t worry—I’ll be there to keep Rollan in line.”

“Um, thanks for the vote of confidence,” Rollan said as Meilin smirked at him. Then he nodded toward Conor. “Why can’t you be more like Conor, Worthy? You don’t see him complaining about staying at camp.” A few feet away, Conor stomped out the remaining embers from their fire. They had used it to cook a snake that he and Briggan had caught last night. Worthy only took one bite before spitting out the tough, lean meat ... which had just meant that there was more for Rollan to eat. Sure, Rollan liked to joke about how bad the food was when he was traveling, but it was almost always better than the food he'd had to forage from garbage bins while he was living on the streets in Concorba.

What will happen if the Greencloaks disband? he wondered. He knew he wouldn't have to go back to his old life as an orphan, but he was still worried. Would the Prime Minister force him to fight for Amaya? Force him to fight against his friends?

Force him to fight against Meilin?

He thought about his cloak, hidden in one of the packs now beside Conor. He had snuck it in there a few nights ago while the others were sleeping. Rollan had been the last of the four to take the Greencloak oath. Now he couldn't imagine being anything except a Greencloak. And he couldn't imagine giving up Tarik's cloak.

"What about Anka?" Worthy asked as she and Abeke approached them. He was still rambling on about accompanying them into the village. "She could turn me invisible."

Anka was shaking her head before Worthy even finished. "It's too hard for me to hide everyone when we're moving, especially in a crowded market," she said. Anka looked so different with her chameleon in passive state. Her hair was as black as Meilin's bangs, but much shorter. The jade bracelet on her wrist covered the mark of her spirit animal. "The second someone bumps into you, our cover will be blown," she continued. "How much attention do you think that will draw, once people realize there are invisible kids walking around the square?"

"Think of it this way," Rollan said, "you can catch up on your beauty sleep."

Worthy looked back toward their makeshift campsite. "Perhaps a small nap wouldn't be so bad. Have to be ready whenever the Oathbound show up. Just try to find some decent food. Something not so ... slithery."

"We'll see what we can do," Abeke said. She knelt and petted Uraza. "Sorry, girl. I know you want to run free, but Rollan's right. We've got to blend in, and that's hard to do with a purple-eyed leopard walking around." With a growl, Uraza disappeared onto her arm. Abeke stood and looked at Rollan. “I won’t lie. I’m pretty jealous of you and Essix right now.”

Essix sat on a nearby branch, surveying the group. She hadn’t liked their snake dinner, either, but Rollan was sure she was finding plenty to eat around the countryside. Essix had always been more of a free spirit, preferring to roam the skies instead of remaining hidden on Rollan’s body. But even with him on the ground and her in the air, their bond was unshakable.

“Remember, we aren’t supposed to know one another,” Anka said to Rollan and Meilin, as she and Abeke started down the road. “Don’t talk to us unless you absolutely have to.”

“See you there,” Rollan said. “Or I guess, maybe not.” They’d decided to split up that morning, in order to draw even less attention to themselves. Rollan and Meilin would approach the village from the west, while Abeke and Anka took a southern, circular route. Abeke and Anka were responsible for gathering clothes and food. Rollan had wanted to buy the food, but of course, Meilin wanted to be in charge of purchasing the weapons. Anka had offered to switch places with him, but he politely declined, turning bright red in the process.

“Worthy is right about one thing,” Meilin said as Anka and Abeke disappeared around a bend. “We need to be ready whenever the Oathbound show up. I’m surprised we haven’t seen any trace of them yet.”

“Maybe they don’t know we’re here,” Rollan said.

“Well, they weren’t supposed to know we were in Amaya, and they were able to track us anyway,” Meilin said. “I almost wish they’d show up already. Anything is better than all this sneaking around. If I have to fight, I prefer to face my enemies head-on.”

“Patience, Your Highness,” Rollan said. He knew how much it got underneath Meilin’s skin when he called her things like that, which just made him tease her more. “What do you think, Essix? Want to take another look to see if you can spot those goons in black?”

Essix and Rollan held each other’s gaze for a few seconds, then the Great Falcon took flight, her talons sharp and pointed, her feathers rustling in the breeze.

“Thanks,” Meilin said. “Let’s get moving.”

They didn’t speak for a while. Meilin may have liked all the silence, but Rollan thought the rolling countryside was too quiet. He missed the busy streets of Concorba. The crowded hallways in Greenhaven Castle. His mind tended to wander when he was surrounded by silence, and he often found himself thinking about things that he’d rather not. His mother. The Wyrms. Shane. Tarik.

Rollan knew he was acting childish—like a toddler refusing to give up his baby blanket. He was a Greencloak in spirit and heart—and he didn’t need Tarik’s cloak to remind him of his oath. Worse, as a kid growing up on the streets, he knew the dangers of getting too sentimental about material things. But even with all that—even with all the risks of getting caught—he just couldn’t part with the cloak. Not yet. It was old, tattered, and faded, but it was all that he had to remind him of their former mentor. Rollan had been clutching that very cloak in his hands when Tarik was killed in battle. Part of Rollan feared that once it was gone, then Tarik would be truly gone as well.

“Are you okay?” Meilin asked. “You’re frowning.”

“Oh.” Rollan shook his head, trying to clear those thoughts away. He plastered a smile on his face. “Was just thinking about all the yummy foods I’m going to try when we get to the market.”

Meilin arched an eyebrow. She knew him too well. She wasn’t buying it. “Tell me what you’re really thinking about,” she said. “Maybe it’ll help to talk.”

The sun had just broken the tree line, helping to drive the chill from the air. He noticed how the yellow-orange rays seemed to make Meilin’s face glow.

Rollan shook his head. “I’ll be okay, but thanks for asking.”

They didn’t speak for a few more moments. Rollan could sense Meilin looking at him, but he was too nervous to look back. Then he felt something tugging at his arm.

It was her hand, sliding into his.

Rollan was so surprised, he almost tripped over a rock. He caught himself before falling, then gave Meilin’s hand a slight squeeze. “Did you see that big boulder?” he asked. “It was huge. Colossal. Mountain-sized.” He stood a little taller. “You’d better stick close to me, just in case we see any other dangerous obstacles in our way.”

She rolled her eyes, but she didn’t let go of his hand.

Green fields stretched as far as Rollan could see. Without sheep and goats to graze the land, many of the fields were overgrown with long, flowing blades of grass. In others, thorny wildflowers and weeds threatened to overtake the lush meadows. Ahead on a hill, a few sheep wandered in a pasture, the fence weathered but holding. A young boy stood with a crook and a small dog at his side. Rollan was glad to see the boy. It proved that not everything had been destroyed. Farther away, plumes of black smoke rose to the sky. It was probably from the bakers and cooks in the village, preparing their wares for the day’s shoppers. A warm loaf of bread would be nice, he thought to himself. He was sure that Essix would enjoy it as well.

“So what do you think about Worthy?” Meilin asked after a few more moments. “Do you trust him yet?”

Rollan wanted to keep the imaginary taste of warm rolls and honey in his head for a little bit longer, but it was already fading away. “What makes you ask that?”

She tugged on Rollan’s arm. “You can be a little mean to him sometimes.”

Meilin was way too perceptive. He sighed. “I’m trying to like him,” Rollan said. “But I don’t know if I’ll ever really trust a Redcloak.”

“But they helped us defeat the Wyrms. And we wouldn’t have gotten away from the Oathbound in Amaya if not for them.”

“Yeah, but they were Conquerors before they were Redcloaks,” Rollan said. “Remember Shane—before he turned into a Redcloak? How he betrayed us at Greenhaven Castle? Remember how he and the other Conquerors tricked my mom into taking the Bile so they could control her? How they forced her to attack me? Remember what happened to your father? To Tarik?” His voice caught when mentioning his former mentor’s name. “They have a lot to prove before they’re ready to be the ‘next protectors of Erdas.’ For all we know, they might be planning to stab us in the back and steal the gifts as soon as we collect them all.” As Rollan said this, he realized that he had left the Heart of the Land, the gift from Amaya, at the campsite for safekeeping. Now he wondered if that had been a good idea.

Meilin stared ahead; she seemed to be considering Rollan's argument. The Meilin of old would have been arguing back before Rollan had even finished talking, but she'd changed a lot since he'd first met her. She was calmer now. More thoughtful. More considerate. A lot like Jhi.

Of course, they all had changed a bunch since they'd first become a team. That's what happened when you risked your life to save the world from total destruction. Twice.

"Okay, I understand where you're coming from," she said slowly. "Really, I do. But what if you try to separate Worthy from all the other Redcloaks. He's not so bad, right?"

Rollan shrugged. "I know he's been a big help here of late, but that still doesn't erase all the bad things he did when he was plain old Devin Trunswick. Don't forget, he and I didn't exactly hit it off the first time we met."

Meilin smirked. "Are you still mad about him jailing you in the Howling House? Didn't he apologize to you on the boat on the way here?"

"You'd still be mad, too, if you'd seen the size of those rats in that little cell. And the smell—it was worse than a pigsty." He ran his thumb across the back of her hand, tickling her. "There were spiders, too. Thousands of them, all with red eyes and hairy legs and—"

"Okay, I get your point," Meilin said, shuddering. With her free hand, she loosened the scarf covering her neck. "But that was a long time ago. Essix seems to like Worthy."

"She just likes to hang around him because he always has leftover food," Rollan said. "What do you think about him?"

"I want to trust him," she said. "He's different now, and I'm not just talking about his wildcat powers. He really wants to do good."

"Good is relative," he said. "Think about it—I'm sure that the Emperor of Zhong and the Prime Minister of Amaya thought they were acting in their lands' best interests when they told the Greencloaks to disband. They were doing what was good for their people."

"But not what was good for Erdas."

Rollan shrugged. “Again, it’s all in the eye of the beholder.” The dark plumes of smoke from the village market were getting larger. They would reach the town soon. Rollan almost wished it were farther away. That wouldn’t have been so bad ... as long as he got to hold Meilin’s hand for the rest of the walk. That would have made the extra distance totally worthwhile.

“What about Anka?” Rollan asked. “I saw you training her yesterday in camp.”

“I like her. It’s nice to have someone from Zhong around,” she said. “We have a lot in common.”

“You mean you’re both afraid of spiders?” Rollan teased.

“I’m not afraid of spiders,” Meilin said. “I’m—what is it?”

Rollan had stopped walking. He let go of Meilin’s hand and turned his face to the sky. “It’s Essix. She’s calling me.” He looked around to make sure they were alone on the path. “Watch my back.”

She nodded, rolling up her sleeves. When Rollan saw through Essix’s eyes, it was almost like he was in a trance; in a slumber from which he sometimes couldn’t easily wake himself. He wouldn’t be able to defend himself if someone attacked while he was floating around in the falcon’s head. That was a benefit of having Meilin around. Even without weapons, her fists and feet were just as deadly as swords and staves.

Rollan closed his eyes. His world fell away—his fingers and toes, the chill from the morning air, the warmth he’d just experienced by holding Meilin’s hand—and he suddenly felt a whoosh as he connected with Essix. Clouds floated ahead. For a second, Rollan wondered if the bird was just trying to show off her fancy flying skills. Then Essix dove, and the market square rushed up to him. Rollan knew he was probably staggering; he always got a little motion sickness when she flew too fast. Essix eventually leveled out and soared to the top of a lush evergreen tree. Rollan used her eyes to search the already-bustling crowd. For a small village market, it was filled to capacity with merchants and shoppers. Burlap tents sat in a grid, with merchants shouting out their deals to anyone within earshot. Each baker boasted of having the best sweets in the village; each tailor promised that he sold the finest clothes and warmest coats. Woman wearing plain, long skirts and scarves over their heads walked through the square, using their slender fingers to judge the craftsmanship of the wool quilts and thick winter hats. Their small children lagged behind, asking for coins to buy a piece of hard candy or a muffin or a scone. A few steps away, less well-to-do kids stood on the outskirts of the market, hoping on strangers' kindness for their next meals. Rollan focused on the smallest child, a boy with a dirt-streaked face and a faded blue blanket draped around his bony shoulders. Rollan tried to memorize the boy's face. If Rollan could find them again, he'd buy something for the kids when he reached the village. That had been him, before becoming a Greencloak.

He kept searching the grounds. Essix had obviously seen something, but he didn't know what. Finally, he saw it. Or rather, them. Three men and a woman in black uniforms, with brass wrist protectors and neck collars, stepped out of a tent.

The Oathbound were in Eura.

Rollan watched as the men followed the woman to another tent. The woman was tall, with broad shoulders and a long brown braid. The merchant stepped toward them, no doubt trying to sell his latest, overpriced goods. The woman held up a parchment, cutting him off mid-sales pitch. She jutted her finger at the document while the merchant shook his head. Then the woman leaned in and whispered something else. The man's eyes widened, and his mouth became slack-jawed. The woman, now smirking, patted the man on the cheek—not at all an affectionate touch—then moved on to the next tent. The merchant remained in place, rubbing his face. Rollan wasn't sure, but it looked like the woman had drawn blood.

After the Oathbound disappeared into another tent, Essix took off from her perch. Rollan understood exactly where the falcon was off to. She would find Anka and Abeke, while Rollan and Meilin rushed to the market.

The bird's view of the sky faded away. Rollan blinked. He was back on the roadside with Meilin. "What's wrong?" she asked.

"Oathbound." He took her hand again. "Come on. We need to find the others."

Rollan and Meilin had to stop running once they drew closer to the market. Their narrow path had merged with a larger road bustling with travelers on foot and horseback. Rollan wished Conor was here to see all the people heading to the village. It was another sign that Eura was rebuilding. Things were getting better.

Rollan and Meilin slipped into the stream of travelers and entered the village. A horse carrying a large, lopsided pack on its back huffed in his direction, blowing stale air across his face. Rollan shook his fist at the animal. He still didn't like horses. The feeling was seemingly mutual.

Nearing the market at the center of the village, Rollan heard a squawk. Essix! She sat in another tree, almost hidden by its thick, knobby branches. She and Rollan stared at each other, and she quickly made a flapping motion with her brown wings.

"She wants us to follow her," Rollan said. "I think she found them."

The bird took flight. Meilin and Rollan followed a few steps behind, both glancing in opposite directions, trying to keep an eye out for the Oathbound. Rollan had seen only four of them in the market—a number that didn't pose too much of a threat—but they may have been Marked, making a potential battle even more of a challenge. Others were likely camped nearby. They'd faced off against a full garrison in Amaya. He didn't expect anything different here.

As he passed a wooden cart, a familiar flash of faded blue cloth caught Rollan's eye. He paused, then turned away from the market.

"Rollan," Meilin whispered. "Where are you going?"

Rollan kept walking toward the boy. He and a few other kids stood between two carts, either using them to hide or perhaps to protect themselves from the biting wind. Rollan checked his pockets. He could only spare a few coins. It wasn't much, but it would have to do.

"Don't spend them all in one place," he said, tossing two coins to the boy. "And share with your friends."

The boy gave Rollan a smile warm enough to melt the coldest of hearts. Rollan returned to Meilin. She was grinning as well.

"You're such a softie," she said. "It's one of my favorite things about you." Then her smile faded. "But we should hurry. For all we know, the Oathbound have already found Anka and Abeke."

Rollan looked at the sky. Essix circled over a large white-and-brown tent. A woman in a stained apron stood in front, showing off slabs of dried meats.

Rollan's stomach grumbled. That looked so much better than snake stew.

They picked up the pace, weaving through villagers. They entered the tent to find Abeke and Anka quarreling with a merchant. It seemed to be over the price of a bag of grain.

Abeke was always astute about her surroundings, even when Uraza was in passive state. She stopped arguing with the man, turned, and caught sight of Rollan and Meilin. She whispered something to Anka. Not looking in their direction, Anka slowly nodded, then continued her talk with the merchant.

Abeke walked toward them, under the pretense of looking at other provisions on the makeshift shelves.

"What are you doing here?" Abeke didn't look at Rollan as she whispered. "Anka said—"

"We caught sight of the Oathbound," Rollan replied. "They're here, in the village."

Abeke drew a long breath, then nodded. "I was afraid you'd say that. I've been uneasy ever since we reached the village." She picked up a jar of spiced peaches, then frowned at them. "We picked up some warm clothes and are almost finished with the food. You two should head back to the camp. We'll meet you there as soon as we can."

"I don't think that's a good idea," Rollan said. "If there are Oathbound here, we'll have a better chance of defeating them together."

"Yes, but I'd rather not see them at all," Abeke said. She chanced a glance at Meilin. "What do you think?"

"I think if they're here, in Eura, then we'll have to fight them sooner or later," Meilin said. "And I think it would be easier if we faced them with better weapons."

"You want to buy a sword, don't you?" Rollan said. "How many arrows do you have left, Abeke?"

"Not nearly enough." Abeke had been collecting rocks to shape into arrowheads during their trek through Eura, but it was difficult to see them at night. “There’s a trading post on the west side of the market—the tent with the maroon flag. It’s probably the best place for you to find weapons. Anka and I will finish up here and meet you back at camp.”

They nodded, then slipped back out of the tent. The trading post wasn’t hard to find. In addition to the maroon flag waving overhead, it was surrounded by trappers and hunters. They stood outside, laughing and singing.

Meilin frowned as she passed the men. “You said your cell at the Howling House smelled like a pigsty. Was it as wretched as these men smell?” she asked, almost gagging.

Rollan had put his hand over his nose. “These guys are way worse. Maybe that’s how they attract their prey—by imitating the scent of dead animals.”

Once in the tent, they quickly made their way toward the weapons. The selection was meager—swords made from rusted steel and bows from flimsy wood—but they were able to find a couple quivers of arrows for Abeke.

“What can I help you kids with?” a woman asked, approaching them. Her apron matched the flag flying over the tent. The wart on the end of her nose was large enough to be its own body part.

“Just these,” Meilin said, holding up the arrows. “That is, unless you have any decent swords.”

“Something just came in.” She patted her graying hair, rolled up tightly into a bun. “Come. Take a look. I’ll give you a good price.”

They followed the woman to the center of the tent. Behind them, about twenty hunters entered. They were loud, their drinks sloshing from their mugs as they lumbered through the post.

The woman took a sword from behind the counter. She slowly removed it from the black leather scabbard. It was a beautiful, single-edged blade, clearly cared for. There didn’t seem to be a single nick in the metal. The hilt also looked new, with intricate symbols carved into the steel.

“It’s a falchion,” the merchant said. “One of the trappers just brought it in for a trade.”

“I’m familiar,” Meilin said. “It’s similar to the Zhongese dao.” She picked up the sword, then considered its weight. She took a few steps away, quickly spinning the weapon in her hands. The blade almost buzzed as it sliced the air.

“It’s a good weapon,” Meilin finally said. “It’s well-balanced.”

The merchant studied Meilin. “You’re pretty good with a sword. Most of the hunters swing it like an ax, but you ... you’ve been trained in proper swordplay technique.” She scratched her nose. “What did you say your name was again? And what brings you to this little village?”

Meilin stiffened ever so slightly. Rollan realized that she might have been too good with the weapon.

“My father used to be a warrior. He trained me.” She quickly returned the sword back to the counter. “But I gave that up. Too messy. Now I just sing and dance.” She looped her arm into Rollan’s and smiled broadly. “We’re traveling performers.”

“Did someone say performers?”

Rollan turned. The group of trappers must have overheard their conversation. Each carried a long, two-sided ax, similar to Conor’s. Their fur boots were caked with mud.

At least Rollan hoped it was mud.

The largest of them, a bearded man with a belly shaped like a big black cauldron, stumbled forward. “How about you all put on a little performance? After weeks in the wilds, my mates and I could use a good show.”

Rollan quickly sized up the men. About half of them had encircled Rollan and Meilin. That meant at least ten more were roaming around inside the tent, and no telling how many remained outside. He was sure that he and Meilin could get away, but a dramatic escape would draw too much attention. The Oathbound soldiers were probably still in the market.

“Well?” the trapper asked, scratching at his red-and-gray beard. Flakes of dandruff fell to the ground. “You going to perform for us or not? Or are you not any good?”

Meilin let go of Rollan’s arm. “If you insist,” she said. “I just hope you all tip well.”

Meilin unwrapped her scarf from her neck as she moved to the center of the group. Rollan slowly moved his hand toward his dagger. He wanted to be ready whenever she gave the signal.

But Meilin didn't take a fighting stance. Instead, she closed her eyes and placed her hands in front of her like she was meditating. Slowly she balanced on one foot. And then she tipped to her toes and began to spin like a top. Exiting her spin, she leaped through the air, her arms wide, the scarf twirling around her like a silk ribbon. She followed that up with three backflips.

Rollan couldn't believe it. She was actually dancing.

The trappers began to clap and cheer. Meilin began to move faster, performing more spins, and flipping even higher. Her scarf was like an extension of her, twisting whenever she twisted, spinning whenever she spun.

Something hit Rollan against the back of his head. He turned, ready to fight ... and then he saw the gold coin on the ground.

Cupping his hands, he began collecting money from the men. They were generous—both of Rollan's pockets were weighted down with gold and silver pieces once Meilin had finished her routine. As she took her last bows, Rollan realized that she hadn't even broken a sweat.

"Let's get those arrows and get out of here," he said, dumping the money into her hands. More trappers had entered the shop. They seemed friendly enough, but he didn't want to press his luck.

Her eyes widened as she counted the money. "I think there's enough here to buy both quivers and the sword."

"Meilin, you already have a weapon. Or do you not remember the quarterstaff that you swindled from that pirate on the boat?"

"I didn't swindle him," Meilin said. "I won that arm-wrestling contest fair and square. The rules didn't specify that we couldn't use a spirit animal." She glanced at the merchant. She had laid the sword out on the counter, along with two quivers of arrows. "Maybe she'll negotiate," she said.

"Just hurry up and—"

"Jolly good show, mates," the large trapper said, interrupting them. He had particularly seemed to enjoy the dance, clapping and doing a jig during Meilin's performance. His belly had looked like it was moving in slow motion. "So what do you do?" he asked, slapping Rollan on the back.

"I'm a dancer in training," Rollan said, rubbing his shoulder blade. Then he smiled. "Actually, more like the company jester."

Rollan had been in enough situations to know that when lying, it was best to tell the truth as much as possible.

"So where are you kids off to next?" he asked. "I'll be back in the wild with my mates soon, and it would be nice to see a proper performance."

"Um ... why don't you go ahead and finish getting those supplies," Rollan said to Meilin. He couldn't tell if the trapper was really interested in their show, or if he was trying to out-bluff Rollan. Either way, Rollan knew they needed to make a quick exit.

Meilin nodded and headed to the counter.

"Yeah, you should totally check out one of our shows," Rollan said to the man. "I'm not sure where we're off to next. Like I said, I'm new to the group. They don't tell me anything—just where to sleep and when to rise. The real brains of our troupe is still in camp, off the road to the west of town."

They had actually bedded down to the east of town. Just in case his ploy didn't work, he hoped the trapper would search there instead of their real location.

"Well, where have you been to?" he asked.

"We passed through Betarvius a few days ago," Rollan said. Other than Trunswick, it was the only name of a town that he remembered. They hadn't stopped there, but he had seen signs for it along the trail.

"Oh, is that so?" The trapper's eyes creased, and Rollan's mouth went dry. Did the trapper know that Rollan was lying? Had Rollan said something to tip him off? That was the problem with bluffing too much. Lie enough times and you're eventually going to get caught.

"Did you try the pickled hog toes?" the trapper continued, scratching his thick beard. He took a lumbering step toward Rollan. "The town is famous for them."

“No, um, I’m more of a vegetarian,” Rollan said. “I’d better get my friend. Nice talking to you.”

Rollan rushed to the counter. “Look, I’m trying to be reasonable,” Meilin was saying to the merchant. “But there is no way I’m paying that much for that sword. Perhaps you could—”

“We’re good with just the arrows,” Rollan said, picking up the quivers. “Thanks.” He grabbed Meilin’s hand and pulled her out of the tent.

“I just needed a few more minutes,” she said. “I almost had her talked down.”

“We didn’t have a few more minutes,” Rollan said. He pulled Meilin into a narrow space between two tents and waited. Sure enough, the large trapper stormed by, with two other men following him.

“Trouble?” she asked.

“Maybe. The trapper was asking too many questions. I tried to throw him off our trail. We’ll see if it worked.” Then he smiled. “You were awesome back there, by the way. Why don’t you dance like that more often?”

She shrugged. “Dancing and fighting aren’t all that different.” She looked over her shoulder, back at the tent, and sighed.

“Don’t worry,” Rollan said. “I’m sure we’ll be able to make it out of the village without being caught.”

“Oh, it’s not that,” she said. “I was just thinking—that was a really nice sword.”

REMEMBERING OLD FRIENDS

ABEKE RELEASED URAZA AS SOON AS THEY WERE within view of their campsite. She had told Anka that she wanted Uraza alert and ready, just in case any Oathbound soldiers were nearby. But if she was being honest, she also wanted Uraza by her side because she hated the idea of not seeing—and not sensing—her animal partner.

Abeke's stomach twisted into a knot and her mouth went coppery every time she relived the memory when Uraza had been stolen from her. How she'd gone from sharing her every thought with the leopard to suddenly feeling nothing. It was like falling endlessly down a dark, deep, cold pit. She hadn't known what loneliness truly felt like until their bond was ripped apart.

But that sense of loneliness paled in comparison to how Abeke had felt when she'd actually fought Uraza. The leopard, while under Zerif's control, had tried to attack her. Abeke was sure that her spirit animal would have killed her, if not for Shane. He'd put himself between Abeke and the Great Beast, screaming in pain as the golden leopard sank her teeth into him and shook him like an empty burlap sack. Abeke had been forced to fire on Uraza, shooting her in the leg in order to get her to release Shane, but it had been too late. Shane was gone.

Abeke often found herself looking at Uraza's hind right leg when she thought the animal was asleep. She couldn't see the results of the wound from her arrow—Uraza's golden fur had covered any resulting scar. But still, she knew it was there, hidden out of sight. A wound dealt by her own hand.

Uraza, perhaps sensing what was going through Abeke's mind, lovingly rubbed against her leg. Abeke knelt and scratched the leopard behind the ears. Abeke had been surprised, and even comforted, by the amount of affection that they'd shown each other since rebonding.

She often wondered how Uraza had felt when their bond had been snapped. Did she feel the pain as well? The emptiness? And how had the leopard felt under Zerif's control? Did she know what she was doing when she attacked Shane? When she tried to attack Abeke?

Perhaps they both needed comfort.

As they waited for the sun to set, Anka suggested they all rest, but that seemed impossible with the threat of the Oathbound looming over them. Meilin had told the others how she and Rollan tried to throw the villagers off their trail. No one really trusted that it would work.

Finally, after the sun dipped below the tree line, they packed up and continued their journey toward Trunswick. Worthy and Abeke took the lead, taking the group through an overgrown, lush forest. Large pine trees reached to the sky, blocking what little light they received from the moon. Abeke winced as pinecones and needles crunched underfoot—they were sure to draw the attention of the Oathbound.

Worthy eventually directed them to a small, barely noticeable trail snaking through the trees. In some places, the path was so narrow that they couldn't walk side by side. In other places, tree branches and exposed roots had overtaken the trail, slowing their travel considerably. However, this route was safer than taking one of the roads, now that they knew the Oathbound had reached Eura.

Even with Uraza boosting her senses, it was hard for Abeke to see in the forest. Every snap of a twig, every howl of an animal, every caw of a bird put Abeke on edge. It was like the forest itself were looking down on them, watching and waiting to pounce.

"Look sharp," Abeke said to Uraza. "They could be anywhere."

“No way they’ll find us here,” Worthy said, ducking underneath a low branch. “No one knows about this path.” He glanced at Abeke, his slitted eyes stark beneath his white mask. “You move like Uraza, you know. Delicately. Softly. All catlike.”

“So do you.”

Worthy leaped and did a flip, just to show off. He landed in a crouch, on top of a stump. “Yep. It’s one of the only benefits of merging with my spirit animal.”

Abeke could have shown off as well, and probably could have leaped even higher than Worthy had, but that didn’t seem like such a good idea. “Maybe you should save your energy for our enemy,” Abeke offered.

Worthy just nodded. They continued on in silence for a few more paces, now walking shoulder to shoulder. Behind her, Abeke heard Rollan and Meilin arguing over her dance moves. Apparently, Rollan was challenging her to a dance-off once they saved the world—again. Farther behind them were Conor and Briggan, guarding the rear. Like Abeke, Conor seemed to be so much more at peace with his spirit animal at his side, not stuck in passive state. Anka was somewhere in the group as well, but it was hard for Abeke to sense her, especially when she was using her chameleon powers.

They reached a small river cutting through the forest. The bubbling of the water was nice. Calming. Abeke could imagine living in a place like this. Disappearing from the world.

They stopped to take a sip of water. She cupped her hands into the cool river, then brought the water to her mouth.

Uraza knelt beside Abeke and stuck her snout close to the water, doing her best to reach the river without getting her paws muddy. She quickly lapped it up with her tongue, causing small waves of water to ripple away from her. Uraza paused, and her eyes narrowed.

“What is it?” Abeke asked. “Do you hear something?”

Uraza nodded toward the water. There, below the surface, swam three large fish.

“Not today,” Abeke said, running her hands along the animal’s black-and-gold fur. Water from Abeke’s hands beaded on her coat. Then, before the cat could respond, Abeke cupped her hand in the water and splashed Uraza. The leopard jumped and yowled. Then she playfully tackled Abeke, nipping at her ears and fingers.

“I’m sorry!” Abeke laughed, hugging Uraza around the neck. “I know you don’t like the water. I just couldn’t help myself.”

She turned around. Worthy sat on a log behind her. She wondered if he’d been watching her the entire time.

“I could never understand what he saw in you,” Worthy said. “I thought you all were just self-righteous brats. But now that I’ve spent some time with you, I can see why he liked you so much.”

Abeke didn’t need to ask who he was. She rose from the river, wiping her hands on her clothes. “What is this river called?” she asked, trying to change the subject.

“I believe this is a small tributary of the Adunder, one of the widest and longest rivers in Eura,” Worthy said. “It starts at the Petral Mountains and continues all the way to the coast.” He hopped from his log and took a drink of water as well. Abeke noticed that he drank it like Uraza, on all fours with his face close to the water.

He stood and wiped his face. “Want me to knock down a tree for us to use as a bridge?”

Abeke smiled. “No, I have a better idea. Come on, Uraza.” Abeke and the Great Leopard backed up from the river, then exploded down the trail. Abeke felt the leopard’s power flowing between them. Her legs felt stronger, her steps surer. She resisted the urge to roar as she planted her foot and took off in a leap across the water, her limbs spinning in the air. Uraza was right beside her, the leopard’s body long and sleek in the nighttime sky. They landed together, their feet clearing the muddy banks. They turned to see Worthy on the other side. Slowly, he clapped his hands.

“Do you want us to cut down a tree for you?” Abeke asked.

He shook his head. “I’ll find my own way across.” Dropping into a squat, he lunged for the nearest tree. His claws sank into the dark wood as he moved higher into the air. He then leaped onto a nearby branch. Thin and wiry, it looked too small to hold his weight. But Abeke quickly realized what Worthy was doing. Using the branch like a rope, he swung from tree to tree, his cloak billowing behind him as he crossed the river.

He performed a triple somersault before landing beside Abeke. She rolled her eyes, but still clapped for him.

“Shane also mentioned you were a great acrobat,” he said.

Abeke sighed. Maybe it would be good to talk about him, she told herself. She often wanted to, but always felt uncomfortable when bringing him up around the other Greencloaks. She had forgiven him for betraying them, but the others had not. And in Rollan’s case, she didn’t know if he would ever forgive Shane.

“Did Shane really talk about me?” she asked. Even though they were alone, she found herself whispering.

“Sometimes,” Worthy said. “You know, since we’re being honest and all, most of us Redcloaks didn’t really like you guys at first. Nobody likes being beat, even if they eventually realize they’re fighting on the wrong side.” They started walking again, but more slowly. “Shane would let us joke around about the Greencloaks, even letting us say some not-so-nice things about Conor and Rollan. Especially Rollan. But you were always off-limits.”

Abeke didn’t know how to respond. There was so little that she knew about Shane once he’d become the leader of the Redcloaks. He had become this whole new person—someone capable of redeeming himself for his past actions. But now he was gone.

“Shane—or King, as we called him—was a good leader,” Worthy continued. “Without him, there’s no telling what any of us Redcloaks would be doing right now. I’d probably be locked in a cage in someone’s sideshow carnival.”

Abeke laughed. “Somehow, I don’t see you staying locked up for very long. You’re a very good fighter.”

Abeke could see Worthy stand straighter at that remark. “Thanks. I wish I could say it was all my natural and self-taught abilities, but King also trained us. Better than Zerif ever did. He turned us into a real fighting force. A team. He showed us how to work together.”

Abeke narrowed her eyes and really considered Worthy for a few moments. In the dark, with the red cloak billowing around his shoulders, he almost looked like Shane.

Worthy coughed and looked away. “What? Do I have something stuck to my mask?”

“You miss him, don’t you?” she said. “You miss Shane.”

He nodded after a few seconds of silence. “Yeah. I guess I do.”

She placed her hand on his shoulder. “You know you can talk to me about him anytime.” She shrugged. “I miss him, too. It might be good for me as well.”

“You were there when he ...” Worthy glanced at Uraza, then back at Abeke. “You were there at the end, right? Was he in a lot of pain?”

“He didn’t suffer long,” Abeke said.

“Look, I know you and he were ... close,” he said. “And I know how he died. Uraza—”

“She didn’t kill him,” Abeke said, a tremble in her voice. Her hands had instinctively balled into fists. “It wasn’t Uraza’s fault.”

“Yeah. I know,” Worthy said. “It was really Zerif and the Wyrms that were forcing her to do it, but still, and the end, it was her teeth pressed into his flesh.” He pulled at his collar. “I guess what I’m asking is—given how you felt about him—are you ever angry at Uraza?”

“Of course not,” Abeke said as she stopped walking. She reminded herself to calm down. Worthy wasn’t the enemy. None of them were. “Remember how, because of the Bile, you were forced to do a lot of things against your will?” After he nodded, she said, “Uraza was the same way. So was Conor. So were all the Greencloaks.” They began walking again. “However, that doesn’t mean I’m not sad about what happened between us. I wish Zerif had never stolen her. I wish I didn’t have to shoot her in the leg. But those things happened whether she or I like them or not. And now we just have to figure out a way to live with our actions.”

But as Abeke spoke, she realized she didn’t know if Uraza had forgiven her for shooting her with an arrow. Uraza hadn’t had a choice in the matter when attacking Shane. Abeke had. Abeke had willingly chosen to harm her partner.

“You know, I’ve never admitted this,” Worthy began, “but I talk to Elda like she’s still here.”

“Elda?”

“My wildcat.” He looked around, like he was making sure that no one was close enough to hear them. “I talk to her sometimes. In my head. I apologize for how I treated her. I made her do things against her will—kind of like what Gerathon did to me and the others that took the Bile.”

Abeke remembered Worthy’s wildcat. She was large and ferocious, with fur as black as squid ink. Her eyes had been golden, like Worthy’s were now. She wasn’t a natural spirit animal. She had been enslaved by the Bile. When drunk by a human, the liquid could force a spirit animal bond, making the chosen animals smarter and more deadly—but also completely obedient. And when animals had drunk the Bile, well ... Abeke didn’t wish that fate on the worst of her enemies.

“I did a lot of bad things, but now I finally have the chance to make things right,” Worthy said. “Even if it takes the rest of my life, I’m going to make it up to the world. I’m going to redeem myself.”

Abeke knew that Shane had felt the same way. And he had eventually redeemed himself.

At the cost of his life.

They continued on through the night. Worthy was actually a half-decent traveling companion when he wasn’t complaining or whining.

Eventually they stopped for a longer break. “How much farther?” Worthy asked. “My legs are as soft as noodles.”

Seeing the exhausted stoop of Worthy’s posture made Abeke realize how tired she was as well. “Just a couple more hours,” she said. “Then we’ll look for somewhere to bed down. Take a rest until nightfall.” She sat down on an overturned, partially buried log and took a sip of water. After a long drink, she offered the canteen to Worthy. As he finished off the water, Uraza nudged at the log, perhaps looking for some small vermin for a late-night snack.

“Knowing Meilin, she’ll want to keep moving,” Worthy said. He looked up at the canopy of tree branches, still blocking most of the moonlight from entering the forest. “She’ll say this forest is dense enough that we can keep moving without being seen.”

Abeke took the empty canteen from him. “You’re probably right. But let’s discuss it when the others catch up.” Abeke could just see them approaching. It was hard to tell, but it almost looked like Rollan and Meilin were holding hands.

Worthy pulled a stick of jerky from his pocket. Breaking it into three pieces, he offered some to Uraza and Abeke. “I’m excited about going home,” he said between bites. “A soft bed. Clean sheets. Maybe a warm meal or two—something other than snake and rabbit.” He popped the last of the jerky into his mouth. “But I also really want to see my brother. I miss him.” Worthy cleared his throat and gave Abeke a wayward glance. “But, um, don’t tell Dawson I said that. I have a reputation to protect, after all.”

“Don’t worry,” she said. “Your secret is safe with me.”

He seemed to hesitate, then sat down beside Abeke. “Speaking of secrets, there’s something I need to tell you. Something about the Wildcat’s Claw.” He took a deep breath. “I don’t exactly know—”

“Wait.” She placed her hand on his shoulder, quieting him. “Do you hear that?” she whispered.

“What is it?” Worthy asked, spinning around. “I don’t hear anything.”

“Yes. And that’s the problem.” The forest had suddenly grown too quiet. It was as if something had driven all the wildlife away.

Abeke slipped her bow from her shoulder and motioned for Worthy to follow her. They crept behind a large trunk and sank to the ground. Uraza crouched beside her.

“Uraza, go warn the others,” Abeke said, staring into the leopard’s purple eyes. “Lead them back to us. But quietly. Try to stay hidden as much as you can.”

Uraza’s tail flicked behind her and she sank even lower, then she took off through the forest. Her padded paws hardly made a sound as she scurried around the trees.

Abeke pulled an arrow from the new set of quivers Rollan and Meilin had purchased from the market. She was appreciative of the arrows, but she almost wished she’d just made more herself. Many of the new arrowheads were chipped and unbalanced, which could throw them off their mark when released.

She spun as she heard crunching leaves to her left. Nocking an arrow and pulling back on the string, she searched the darkness, looking for her target. Beside her, Worthy flexed his claws, uttering a low, guttural growl.

“Whoa! It’s us,” Anka whispered. A few seconds later, she and the others appeared in front of them. “Sorry.”

“That was close,” Abeke said, releasing the tension in her bow.

“Briggan and I sensed something, too,” Conor said. He shrugged off the smaller of their two packs, then dropped down beside Abeke. “It feels like a trap.”

“Do you think it could be the Oathbound?” Abeke asked.

“If so, they must have been following us,” Worthy said. “This is one of the most hidden, most secret—what’s that sound?”

Abeke heard it, too. A low whistling sound pierced the air. Suddenly recognizing it, she yelled, “Get down!”

They all dropped to the ground as an arrow flew overhead and lodged into a tree trunk. Two more arrows followed, each striking to the left and right of the group.

They scurried behind a log as more arrows sliced the night sky. “Look alive, Greencloaks,” Abeke said, reloading her bow. “We’re under attack.”

TRAPPER ATTACK

MEILIN USUALLY LIKED THE THRILL OF HAND-TO-HAND combat over the use of projectile weapons, but when an unseen enemy was firing arrows at her, she really wished she was a better archer.

“Can anyone see them?” Abeke asked, once the first flurry had ended. She quickly peeked over the log and fired in the direction of their attackers, but nothing seemed to connect. “I don’t want to waste my arrows.”

“We need to keep moving,” Worthy said, his claws bared, ready to strike once given the opportunity. “We’re sitting ducks out here.”

“What do you think, Anka?” Conor said. “Can you hide us all with your chameleon’s powers?”

It took Meilin a moment to realize the woman was shaking her head. “It would be possible ... but we would have to move very slowly. It doesn’t work if we’re zigzagging around the forest, trying to take cover.”

“Let’s just slow down for a moment.” Meilin braced herself against her quarterstaff. “It would be good to know what we’re up against before we make our next move.”

“You know, I would usually agree with you,” Rollan said. “But not when people are shooting at us.”

“We’re fine for the time being,” Meilin said as she considered their surroundings. They seemed to have pretty good cover thanks to the large overturned log and the dense trees surrounding them, but they were also pinned down, making it impossible for them to escape. The arrows seemed to be coming from directly ahead. She tried spying through the foliage, hoping to catch sight of the black uniforms or metallic neck and wrist braces of the Oathbound, but all she saw was green leaves and brown trees.

Meilin ducked as another arrow landed high above them. She closed her eyes and counted as others fired all around them. “There are at least eight archers.”

“Eight Oathbound? That’s not so bad,” Conor said. “Better than that whole army we faced in Amaya.” Briggan sat by his side, growling toward their unseen attackers. The wolf, like Meilin, preferred more direct combat as well.

“I don’t think we’re up against the Oathbound,” Meilin said. She glanced at the arrow stuck in a tree above them. “Doesn’t that look familiar?”

They all looked up, then at the matching arrow nocked in Abeke’s bow. “It’s the same arrows from the village!” Rollan said. “Do you think it’s the trappers?”

Worthy nodded. “You know, that makes sense. They’re the only people around here that would know this forest well. They’d know exactly where to hide in order to ambush us.”

“I was afraid this would happen,” Rollan said with a sigh. “One of the trappers started questioning me. Asking me about where we’d traveled. I finally told him that we passed through Betarvius—”

Conor and Worthy groaned. Meilin wasn’t sure, but it even looked like Briggan rolled his eyes.

“Yep, that was a mistake,” Worthy finally said. “That place is a ghost town. Completely empty.” He elbowed Rollan. “See, none of this would have happened if you’d taken me.”

“Enough, Worthy,” Conor snapped. “It was an honest mistake. How was he supposed to know ...”

Conor stopped talking, shifting his body so he was turned away from the others. Meilin looked from Conor to Worthy. There was something else they knew—something more about the village—but neither seemed to want to continue talking.

“Look on the bright side,” Rollan finally said. “At least it’s not the Oathbound out there trying to kill us.” They watched as another arrow soared overhead, settling in the brush far behind them. “These guys aren’t even coming close to hitting us.”

“While this is all interesting, I’m beginning to run out of arrows,” Abeke said, firing another one in the general direction of their attackers. “So maybe there should be less talk about how we got into this mess, and more discussion about how we’re going to escape.”

“Perhaps now is a good time to use the Heart of the Land,” Anka said. As she pointed a translucent finger toward Rollan, it turned brown to match his cloak. “You still have it, correct?”

Rollan nodded. After returning from the market, he had tied the amulet back around his neck with a leather strap, close to his heart. It fell right where his tattoo of Essix usually resided—whenever the falcon decided to go into passive state.

Once a large, scaly black rock, the Heart of the Land was now an amber amulet carved into the shape of a gila monster, one of the most feared and famous spirit animals of ancient Amaya. The amulet possessed great powers, but it could also be dangerous if it fell into the wrong hands.

Rollan pulled the stone amulet from under his shirt. “Any thoughts on what power I should use? Maybe I can create a tunnel like last time.”

“The tree roots are probably too deep,” Abeke said. “Worthy said these trees are hundreds of years old.”

“If not older,” Conor said. “Maybe you can try an earthquake again?”

“Yeah, I’m thinking that starting an earthquake in the middle of a forest isn’t such a good idea,” Rollan quipped. “Unless you want tree branches to rain down from the sky.”

“I wish we could see where those archers are shooting from,” Meilin said. “It’s hard to fight an enemy when you can’t even see them.”

“What about the armor power?” Anka asked. “If we make a run for it, Rollan can take up the rear and block any arrows coming our way.”

Rollan shrugged. “Seems like a good idea to me.”

Meilin shook her head. Something still didn't feel right about this. But she had delayed them for long enough. "Okay, let's go for it."

"Ready, Briggan?" Conor asked. He slid his ax back into his belt, then scratched the large shaggy wolf on the neck. "Stay close to me."

Meilin noticed Abeke whispering something similar to Uraza. Still uneasy about their decision to retreat, Meilin briefly considered calling forth Jhi. In addition to being a healer, the Great Panda also helped Meilin clear her mind—becoming so calm she could see all sides of a problem, and even slowing down the outside world. Meilin was sure that meditating with Jhi would help illuminate what was troubling her. But they didn't have time for that—and the large, lumbering Jhi and her pristine snow-white fur would be a prime target for the archers.

"We'll go during the next wave," Rollan said. Clutching the Heart of the Land tightly in his right hand, he reached out to Meilin and gave her arm a faint squeeze.

"You should leave your pack behind, Rollan," she said. "You'll move faster without it."

He shook his head. "I'll be fine. Plus, we'll need the supplies later."

"But, Rollan ..." She stopped as she heard the buzz of arrows in the air. Rollan must have as well. As he scrambled to his feet, the amulet glowed in his hand, his fingers hardly able to contain the amber light leaking through. He thrust his hand in the air as if he was blocking the volley. The arrows froze, hovering for a second, then silently fell to the ground.

Rollan turned and stared at his friends. "What are you waiting for?" he yelled. "Run!"

Conor, Worthy, and Briggan took off, with Abeke close behind. Meilin couldn't see Anka, but she could hear her running ahead, her boots crunching through the forest foliage. She turned to see Rollan behind her, the amulet still glowing in his hands. He paused as another volley approached, then blocked them again.

"Yikes!" Worthy yelled.

Meilin turned to see the Redcloak leaping out of the way of an arrow. It had barely missed him, instead piercing his cloak. Two more arrows sunk into the ground at his feet.

“More archers!” Conor said, pivoting to the left. “Where did they come from?”

Meilin wondered the same thing. From what it seemed, this new set of archers had been sitting in the trees behind them. But if that were the case, they would have had a clear shot at the group. Why hadn’t they attacked?

“Keep running!” Rollan yelled, blocking more arrows. But this volley, like so many of the others, hadn’t come close to hitting them. Still, the group pivoted again, turning down a small path.

Something about running was helping clear Meilin’s mind. These archers were either the worst shots in all of Erdas ... or they were missing them on purpose! They weren’t trying to kill them. They were trying to flush them out. They were funneling them a certain way....

They were running into a trap!

“Guys! We have to stop running! We have to—”

Suddenly, up ahead, Worthy, Conor, and Briggan yelled as a net sprung up from the ground, surrounding them. They flew into the air, crashing into each other as the net spun on the end of a wobbly evergreen tree.

A few feet away, Uraza yowled as another net ensnared her. The leopard tried to find her footing, but there were too many holes in the net for her to gain her balance. The more she struggled, the more tangled she became.

Abeke skidded to a halt. “Don’t worry, Uraza! I’ll get you out!” She reached for her knife, but then something—Anka, Meilin eventually realized—bumped into Abeke, pushing them both forward. Another net materialized around them, whipping them into the air.

Meilin turned to see Rollan barreling toward her in a full-out sprint. Essix flew above him, her wings spread wide. “Slow down!” Meilin yelled. “It’s a—”

But before she could finish her sentence, a tall, wooden cage, sharpened to pinpoint spikes at the top, sprung up around him. Rollan tried to jump over it, but it was too high, even with his spirit animal’s help.

“Drop your weapon, Greencloak,” a voice said from above. “That is, unless you want a belly full of arrows.”

Meilin dropped her quarterstaff as a group of men slithered out of the trees. They were dressed in brown furs, with green and brown paint over their faces. No wonder Meilin hadn't seen them. They were dressed to blend in perfectly with the forest.

She counted them as they exited the trees. There were at least twenty of them, with more still in the forest. One of the men started walking toward them. She recognized him immediately. He was the large, bearded trapper from the trading post, the one that had been doing the most clapping while she danced.

“Check that one first,” the man said, pointing to Rollan. “It looked like he was holding something. See what it is.”

Rollan held his hands open as two men approached him. They were empty.

“He's clean, Merch,” one of the trappers said to the large, bearded man. “Want us to tie him up anyway?”

“Yep.” Merch was clearly the one in charge. “And use lots of rope.”

“You heard the man,” one of the other trappers said, uncoiling a brown rope from around his shoulder. “Stick out your hands.”

“Come on, guys,” Rollan said, extending his hands through the cage's long vertical bars. “I'm already in a cage. Isn't this a bit overkill.” Rollan winced as they tightened their knots. “I think you're cutting off the blood flow to my fingers.”

“I'll sure the Oathbound will take you, with or without fingers,” Merch replied. “My buddy Cal is already heading back to their camp to let them know that we found you.” Picking up a stick, he walked to the net with Conor, Worthy, and Briggan. “And look what we have here,” he said, poking at them with the stick. “The mighty Briggan, caught in a net. Guess you aren't such a Great Beast after all.”

The wolf snapped at the man. Catching the stick in his strong jaws, Briggan broke off a piece, then hurled it back at him.

“Careful there,” Merch taunted. “The Oathbound woman said she wanted the Greencloaks alive. She didn't mention anything about their spirit animals.” The man spun the net, stopping it once Worthy was in front of him. “And what exactly are you?” he asked. “Why do your eyes look so funny? And what happened to your hands?”

“Let me out and I’ll give you an up-close demonstration,” Worthy said, holding up his claws. He tried to reach out and swipe the man, but he was too caught up in the net.

Merch smiled. “Why don’t you all put away those precious animals of yours before someone gets hurt?” He poked Briggan again. “Go ahead.”

In a flash, Briggan and Uraza disappeared, while Anka slowly came back into view. Although Meilin didn’t see Essix, she was sure that the bird was there, hidden out of sight. They were probably going to need her help if they hoped to escape.

“And what about you?” the trapper asked, now pointing his stick at Meilin. “Where’s your animal?”

“Already in passive state,” Meilin said, showing off Jhi’s mark on the back of her hand. “Please don’t do this,” she continued. “Whatever reward the Oathbound are offering, we’ll double it.”

He stroked his beard. “Like I could ever trust the word of a Greencloak, especially after the way you all laid waste to Eura.” His lips curled into a snarl as he talked.

Rollan shook his hands, vibrating the walls of his cage. “The Oathbound are nothing but big bullies,” he said. “We Greencloaks have kept the peace for centuries. If they capture us, they’ll split us up and use us as weapons. They’ll have each land fighting against one another.”

“You have the nerve to talk about Greencloaks keeping the peace?” Merch sneered at Rollan. “Were you keeping the peace a few months ago, when the Greencloaks destroyed my village? When Betarvius fell? Or were you off rampaging some other part of the world?” He neared the cage. “Perhaps you were the one controlling the elk that destroyed the mill. Or maybe it was one of your animals that stampeded through the center of town, destroying all our homes. Or maybe you helped demolish our dam, flooding what little remained of our town.” Merch leveled the stick at Rollan. “It was bad enough when the Conquerors came. They stole our animals, seized our supplies. And then, right when we’re trying to rebuild, you Greencloaks came along to finish us off. Betarvius was founded by my great-great-grandfather. It stood for hundreds of years. And the Greencloaks destroyed it within a matter of hours.”

Meilin glanced at Conor and Worthy. Both their faces were turned to the ground. So that was why they didn’t want to talk about Betarvius. It must have fallen after the Greencloaks were taken by the Wyrms. She knew firsthand of the horrors that could be inflicted by a group of people controlled by the Wyrms—she’d seen how the Many had destroyed everything in their path while she was underground in Sadre. There was no village in all of Erdas that could have withstood the might of a horde controlled by the Wyrms, especially if that horde was made up of warriors like the Greencloaks. The village would have been doomed from the start.

Rollan didn’t speak for a few moments; he must have understood the gravity of what happened in Betarvius as well. Finally, he said, “I’m sorry about that. Really, I am. But the Greencloaks were under the power of something called the Wyrms—”

“Just more Greencloak lies,” Merch said. “We’ve heard rumors that the queen wants the Greencloaks to disband. We stand with her. It is what’s best for Eura.”

Rollan opened his mouth again, but Meilin shook her head, warning him to remain quiet. There was nothing Rollan could say that would soothe the man’s anger. He had lost too much.

“Since you want to do all this talking, why don’t you tell me how you stopped those arrows of ours?” Merch continued. “How did they fall out of the sky like that? It was like they hit an invisible wall or something.” Merch jabbed his stick into Rollan’s side. A flash of pain came across Rollan’s face, but he didn’t yell out. The man poked him again, this time harder. “Come on. Spill it.”

Finally, Rollan spat out, “I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“Yeah, you do,” he said. “The woman in black told us specifically to watch out for you. Said you had some type of amulet. Some gift.”

“You must be imagining things,” Rollan said. “Maybe you all just have bad aim.”

That drew an even sharper poke from Merch. “Fine, don’t tell me. The Oathbound will pry it out of you, one way or another. The way I understand it, the woman leading them, Cordelia the Kind, has a real knack for getting information out of people.” He grinned. “She takes the phrase ‘kill them with kindness’ to a whole new level.”

Now Rollan looked worried. “Okay, how about this. If I tell you where it is, will you let us go?”

The man stroked his beard again. “Maybe.”

“Don’t listen to him, Merch,” one of the other trappers said. “You heard what Cordelia said—”

“We’d be long gone by the time she figured it out,” Merch said. “Think of what we could do with that amulet. We’d be unstoppable. Forget rebuilding Betarvius. We could rule all of Eura!” Merch turned back to Rollan. “So, are you going to tell me or not?”

Rollan opened his mouth, and hesitated.

“Rollan, you can’t!” Meilin yelled. He actually looked like he was considering his offer.

“Why not?” Rollan said. “It’s better in their hands than the Oathbounds’.” Then Rollan smiled and rolled his eyes at her.

It was a signal. Meilin wasn’t sure, but she thought it meant that Rollan wanted her to play along.

“Come on, Meilin, what do you say?” Rollan continued. “We give him the amulet, and he lets us go? Just us two. He can still turn the others over to the Oathbound.”

“Hey!” Worthy yelled from behind her. She turned to see Conor clamping his hand over the spot on Worthy’s mask where his mouth would be. Whatever was happening, Conor wanted it to play out, too.

Meilin took a deep breath. She hoped she was doing what Rollan wanted her to do. “Don’t be ridiculous. Look at this guy,” she said, nodding toward Merch. “You think he stands a chance against the Oathbound? He could hardly fight his way out of a puddle of water.”

Rollan smiled and offered her the slightest of nods. “Meilin, don’t fight me on this. It’s the only way to save us.”

“Us?”

“Yeah. Us,” he said. “I’m not leaving without you.”

She turned away from him and jutted her chin in the air. “Then I guess we’re not leaving.”

Rollan sighed. “Merch, buddy, do you mind bringing her over here? Let me talk to her.”

Merch cast his eyes upon Meilin, like he was studying her. Like he was trying to figure out if she was really serious.

“Just let me talk to her,” Rollan repeated. “Once I get her to change her mind, I’ll tell you where the amulet is.”

Merch let out a deep grunt, then pointed to two nearby trappers. “Take her over there,” he said. “Tie her up to the cage. But watch out for her. She’s a fighter. I can see it in her eyes.”

Meilin tried to hold her hands apart to keep the rope loose, but this trapper was an expert at knots. He triple-tied the cords, squeezing her hands uncomfortably tight together.

The two trappers then dragged Meilin to the cage. Meilin pulled against them, but they were too strong. They tied her to the side, face-to-face with Rollan.

“Um, how about a little privacy,” Rollan said, shooing the men away.

Merch sighed. “Step away, boys. But you two better make it quick.”

Rollan shifted forward. They were probably close enough to kiss, although Meilin wasn’t trying to think about that.

“If I had known we’d be this close, I would have brushed my teeth,” Rollan whispered.

“You can’t help yourself, can you? You just can’t let the opportunity for a joke to pass you by.” Then she smiled. “So what’s the plan?”

“Not sure. I’m making this up as I go along.”

“Were you at least able to get the amulet to Essix before you were caught?”

“Yeah ... not quite,” he whispered.

“Rollan!” she hissed. “Really?”

“I was hoping to, but Essix was too far away when the cage trapped me. But I was able to slip it into my boot. It’s wedged against my ankle. I originally wanted Essix to create a diversion so I could reach it ...”

“But then you had to mouth off and get yourself tied to the cage.”

“Yeah, sorry about that.”

“I don’t have forever,” Merch called out. “You going to tell us where the amulet is or not?”

“Give me another minute,” Rollan said. “I’ve almost got her convinced.” Rollan slid even closer to Meilin. “If I was able to get the men away from here, and if Essix created enough of a distraction, do you think you and that big panda of yours can break us out of here?”

“Given our current predicament, I don’t see many other options.” She shook her head. “But remind me to talk to you about escape strategies.”

Rollan smiled, then turned to Merch. “Okay, I’ll tell you where it is,” he said. “I dropped it in the forest.”

Merch threw his stick to the ground. “Boy, is that all you have to say?” Merch pulled a sword from his belt and advanced toward them. It was the falchion, the very sword that Meilin had been drooling over at the trading post. “You tell me where the amulet is, or I start slicing fingers off.” He pointed the sword at Meilin. “And I’ll start with Twinkle Toes.”

“Seriously, it’s in the forest,” Rollan said “About one hundred paces back. By the oak tree with the large knot in the center. You’ll find it if you look hard enough.”

Merch glared at both of them. “You’d better not be lying to me. You and your friends’ lives depend on it.” Merch turned to a small group of nearby men. “You all stay here and keep watch. You others come with me. We need to find that amulet before the Oathbound get here.”

Meilin waited until most of the men had disappeared into the forest. Only seven remained, although they were all armed. She looked at Rollan. “Is Essix ready?” she whispered.

“Just give her a signal, and she’ll swoop in.”

Meilin closed her eyes. In a flash, Jhi appeared beside her. The panda yawned as she took in her surroundings.

“Whoa!” one of the trappers yelled. “Is that a panda?”

“Get it!” another said.

“Don’t worry about me,” Meilin said to Jhi as the panda began to chew on her rope bonds. “Stop them first.”

The panda nodded, turned, and reared up on her hind legs. She roared loud enough to make the birds in the trees take flight. Then she dropped to all fours and charged the men.

The three trappers nearest to them paused for a moment, seemingly frozen by her size, then continued running toward her. They brandished axes and daggers, swinging them wildly in the air as they approached the panda. Meilin knew Jhi could hold her own against the men, but she still worried for her partner. Jhi wasn't the fighting type, though thankfully these men didn't know that.

But just as the men reached Jhi, Essix soared down from a nearby tree. She dove toward the man with a dagger, raking her talons across his face. With streaks of blood across his cheek, he dropped his blade and blindly waved his arms around his head, trying to keep the gyrfalcon away.

"Go, Essix! Get him!" Rollan yelled. "That's what happens when you mess with a Greencloak!"

Meanwhile, Jhi swiped her paws at one of the other trappers, batting him to the ground. She roared again, her bellow loud enough to make the last man drop his weapon and cower before her. But Jhi and Essix didn't have time to waste on those men. Other trappers were already rushing toward the animals. But unlike the first group, these carried crossbows and bolts. Before they could ready their weapons, however, Uraza and Briggan joined the fray, clawing and biting at the men, ripping the crossbows from their hands.

"Hurry up," Rollan said. "I hear the others coming back."

Meilin closed her eyes. She allowed herself to connect to Jhi—to have their thoughts and strengths and souls intertwined. She felt Jhi's strength surge through her. Then she lowered her shoulder, squeezed her eyes shut even tighter, and rammed into the cage. It began to splinter. She rammed it again, this time breaking the wooden bars.

Although her hands were still tied, she could move more freely. She reached through the cage and grabbed Rollan's boot. "Hold on," she said, ripping it from his leg.

"Ouch!" he yelled. "You could be a little gentler, you know."

"Pain—it's an occupational hazard." She turned over the boot, and the Heart of the Land fell to the ground. She picked it up, and tried to hand it to Rollan.

"I can't take it," he said. "My hands are bound too tightly. You use it."

Meilin looked at the small stone. She curled her fingers around the amulet, then thrust it into the sky. It began to give off its bright amber glow.

“Um, Meilin,” Rollan began. “What exactly are you about to do?”

“What do you think?”

“Remember what we were talking about a little while ago,” he said, his words faster. “About how earthquakes weren’t so good when surrounded by huge trees and thick branches and—”

“Brace yourself!” she yelled. She struck her hand hard against the ground.

Thunder boomed, and a shock wave radiated from Meilin on out. The trappers bobbed, trying to keep their balance as the earth rolled underneath them. All around them, branches and tree trunks creaked and snapped upon being hit by vibration after vibration.

Meilin leaped out of the way right before a tree limb crashed to the ground, barely missing her. Likewise, the branches holding the others came crashing down.

“Ouch,” Conor yelled.

“Oomp,” said Worthy.

“Sorry,” Meilin muttered. She took in the scene. While the trappers wobbled to their feet, Abeke and Conor began cutting through their thick ropes. But they were slow, and the trappers were already lurching forward.

“Hit them again!” Rollan yelled, bracing himself against the cage.

Meilin struck her fist back into the ground. More trees fell, and the trappers once again stumbled off their feet. Abeke grabbed Anka and rolled to her left as a huge tree limb came thundering down. Across from them, Worthy and Conor had worked their way out of their net, and were now getting to their feet.

Worthy ran toward a group of men. “You guys like to shoot arrows from afar. Let’s see how you do up close.” He leaped at the men, landing on one of their backs and flipping him over. “I’ll take care of these men,” Worthy said. “Free Abeke and Anka!”

Conor nodded, then rushed to help the others. Meilin started to run toward them as well, but stopped as she heard footsteps approaching.

“Meilin, behind you!” Rollan yelled.

She turned to see the rest of the hunters rushing toward her. Merch was in the front, waving his sword high in the air.

“Jhi, help me!” Meilin called out as she charged the men. Feeling Jhi’s power coursing through her body once again, she leaped into the air and landed a roundhouse kick squarely on one of the trapper’s jaws. Then she spun around, kicking two more to the ground.

Essix appeared beside her, taking out another trapper before he could fire his arrow at her. Then there was Jhi, back on her hind paws, swatting down the men as soon as they drew near. Her coat was wet with blood—Meilin hoped that it belonged to one of the attackers, not the panda.

“Yikes,” Rollan yelled. “A little help here?”

Meilin turned to see Merch and two trappers running toward Rollan. The boy, still tied to the cage, was defenseless.

Meilin took off, channeling Jhi’s massive power into her legs. Using a fallen tree, she catapulted herself over the men, landing between them and Rollan.

Merch seemed surprised for a moment, then his mouth curled into a snarl. “Doesn’t seem fair, does it?” Merch said, waving the sword at her. “Us with the weapons and you with nothing but your hands tied together.”

“Yeah, it’s not fair. For you!” Jumping into the air, she kneed the first trapper in the nose, then kicked him in the chest, hurling him backward. She flipped back to her feet and charged toward the second man. But before she could reach him, an arrow whizzed past Meilin and sunk into his shoulder. A second later Uraza was at the man’s side, clamping her sharp teeth into his leg.

Meilin turned quickly to thank Abeke, then focused on Merch. “That’s a nice sword,” she said. “Do you mind if I take it?”

“Sure, you can have it as soon as I run you through with it.” Merch lurched forward, and Meilin expertly dodged his thrust. Meilin grabbed his arm, spun around, and flipped him over her shoulder.

When he opened his eyes, he was lying upside down against what remained of the wooden cage. And Meilin was holding the falchion between her still-tied hands.

“What were you saying about this sword?” she asked, a large smile on her face.

Around her, most of the other trappers had either given up or had fled into the forest. She waved at Jhi as the Great Panda sat on top of one of the trappers, stopping him from trying to escape.

“Now that’s the kind of fighting I like,” Rollan said. “The type where I don’t have to lift a finger.” He jutted his hands toward Meilin. “But if you don’t mind, I would really appreciate it if you got me out of here.”

She opened her hand, revealing the Heart of the Land. “Want me to use the earthquake powers one last—”

“No!” Rollan, Conor, and Abeke yelled at the same time.

She laughed. “Come on, guys. Can’t you take a joke?”

Rollan rolled his eyes as Conor began to cut him free. “You stick to fighting. I’ll handle the jokes.”

TRUNSWICK

AFTER TALKING IT OVER, THEY DECIDED TO TIE UP the remaining trappers. Conor didn't like this idea—really, no one did—but they didn't have any other options. Using the wood and nets from their own traps, Conor and the others created a large cage to hold them all. The men were cramped, but it would keep them safe from any dangerous beasts wandering through the forest. Based on what the trappers had told them, it would take their companion, Cal, a full day to reach the Oathbound campsite. Adding another day for the return trip, and Conor figured that they only had a two-day head start. It would be risky, but they decided to travel during the daytime—which meant traveling with their spirit animals in passive state. Conor knew Briggan enjoyed roaming the countryside, but they had to make it to Trunswick before the Oathbound found them.

Just before they were about to leave, Conor walked over to Merch, the leader of the trappers.

“You can't leave us out here like this,” Merch said. “We'll starve.”

“We left you plenty of food and water,” Conor said. “Your friend will be back soon.”

“But what if he's delayed? What if he's lost?”

“Don't worry. Someone will come for you.” Conor knelt in front of the man. “Also, I just wanted to say, I'm sorry for your loss,” he added quietly. “How many people survived?”

Merch's eyes softened, if only for an instant. "Just the handful of us trappers who were out in the forest." Then just as quickly, his gaze turned cold. "Tell me the truth. Were you there?"

"I was not there," Conor said. But he may as well have been. He, like all the other infected people, had done terrible things. Sure, he could argue that it wasn't his fault, but that didn't undo the pain he and the other Greencloaks had inflicted on innocent people.

"I know you don't trust us," Conor said. "But I promise, the Greencloaks will make this right. We won't rest until we've helped rebuild all of Erdas, including Betarvius."

"I've seen your help," Merch said. He spat onto the ground, then wiped his mouth with the back of his hand. "I'll take my chances with the Oathbound."

"Merch, just listen to me—"

"Conor," Abeke said. Like usual, he hadn't heard her approach. "We need to go." She placed her hand gently on his shoulder. "Come."

"I'm sorry," Conor said one last time as Merch turned away from him. He stood and picked up his ax. It felt much too heavy in his hands.

"Conor, I know you feel sorry for these men, but we have to keep focused on our mission," Abeke said as they went to join the others.

"Yeah," Conor said. "It's just that, ever since I was a little kid, I've always wanted people to like me. I hated disappointing anyone—even Worthy, when I was his servant. I wish there was something I could say to Merch to make him feel better."

"Hopefully his heart will soften. But it will take time. Years, perhaps. But just because his heart is made of stone doesn't mean yours needs to carry the same weight."

"Thanks, Abeke. You really are a true friend."

"And I'll always be your friend," she said. "Now come. We have to move quickly."

They started off toward Trunswick, now taking the main roads. They knew they'd encounter more people, but it would cut their travel time by a full day. At night, they stopped long enough for a few hours of sleep, then kept moving, using the moon to illuminate their way. Instead of cooking their meals, they ate cold roots and plants that they dug up along the roadside.

Conor's heart swelled the closer they got to town. He found himself marveling at childhood landmarks—the creek his father tossed him into when he was first learning to swim. The hill he often took his sheep to for grazing. The fence he mended for the Widow Tomball for a few coins—which he promptly returned to her after feeling guilty for taking her money.

Worthy wouldn't admit it, but he was clearly growing nervous about returning home. Instead of becoming excited and speeding their journey homeward along, Worthy kept slowing down. He complained about entering the town at night—said he didn't want to get into a skirmish with the gate sentries. Then he protested about their dinner of wild mushrooms, demanding that they stop and cook a proper meal.

Finally, after he stalled the group because he thought he'd sprained his ankle on a tree root, Conor pulled Worthy to the side, trailing behind the others. "What's wrong? Aren't you excited to go home?"

"Of course I am," Worthy hissed back. "But as soon as we reach Trunswick, they'll find out that I don't exactly know where the records are."

Conor snapped his fingers. He'd forgotten about his conversation with Worthy on the ship. "You have to tell them," Conor said. "Now. And if you don't, I will."

"But they'll hate me," Worthy said.

"Trust me, they'll dislike you even more the longer you deceive them."

"I'll tell them. I promise. As soon as we're safely inside the city." Worthy pressed his hands together and fell to his knees. "Please, Conor. Let me just have a little bit longer."

Conor stared at Worthy, then slowly shook his head. He really was too nice sometimes. "Fine," he said. "But you have to tell them as soon as we reach the manor."

"Deal!" Worthy said. He sprung to his feet, and they joined up with the others.

“What should we expect when we’re there?” Meilin asked. “Did the Greencloaks attack your town as well?”

Conor shook his head. “According to my parents, the fighting stopped just south of Trunswick. That’s when Zerif called all the Greencloaks back for the final battle.”

“Anything else we need to know about Trunswick?” Rollan asked. “After my last slipup about towns in the area, I want to be prepared.”

Worthy shrugged. “Um, no ... I don’t think there’s anything else you need to know. Everything’s just fine. Nothing strange happened. Nothing burned down or anything like that.”

“Huh?” Anka asked. “Worthy, what are you talking about?”

“He’s just nervous about seeing his brother,” Conor said, stepping in for Worthy. “He’s always a bit of a mess when he’s excited.”

Rollan snorted. “Then he must always be excited.” He turned to Conor. “Are you going to take us in by the secret back entrance? It’s pretty close to the castle, right?” Conor hadn’t realized that Rollan had remembered that. They’d traveled to Trunswick while on a mission to find Rumfuss the Boar; it had been Conor’s first time back in the town since becoming a Greencloak. He’d wanted to impress Rollan, but had ended up being embarrassed in front of him, thanks to Devin and his father. Then, to make matters worse, the Earl of Trunswick threw them in jail.

He hoped this visit ended on a better note.

“Worthy may have a better way for us to enter,” Conor eventually said. “He knows the town better than I do. He’ll take the lead once we’re there.”

Worthy jumped in the air, waving his fists. “Don’t worry, guys. You can depend on me!”

Meilin pointed her new sword at Worthy’s feet. “I thought you sprained your ankle,” she said. “Did it magically heal up?”

“Oops,” Worthy said as he immediately began limping again. “It comes and goes. Joints are tricky like that.”

Rollan shook his head. “Worthy, you’re favoring the wrong foot.”

It was well past midnight when they first caught sight of the town. Trunswick sat on a large hill, its sandy-colored walls reaching high to the sky.

“That’s funny,” Rollan said. “I would have thought that we’d be able to see the castle from here.”

“Ah, it must be too cloudy,” Worthy mumbled.

Conor winced as Rollan looked up. A bright moon hung overhead. There wasn’t a cloud in sight.

“Now follow me,” Worthy continued, stepping off the path. “I know another way past the town gates.”

Worthy led them through an abandoned field until they reached a small drainage pipe at the base of the wall. After a few tugs, he and Conor were able to pry the small iron gate from the pipe opening. They crept into the city, single file. A few torchlights illuminated the streets, but otherwise the town was silent.

“No guards?” Rollan asked. “That’s unusual.”

Conor had to agree. Usually, there was always a sentry or guard roaming the streets or keeping watch at one of the walled towers. But now, everything seemed silent.

“We lost a lot of our guards right after the war,” Worthy said. “Father wasn’t always the best at paying people fairly.”

They turned a corner, then froze, staring speechlessly at the shell of a building standing before them. Finally, Meilin said, “Um, Worthy, what happened to your castle?”

Trunswick Manor—once five stories high with massive sandstone towers that pierced the sky—was now a lump of charred bricks, crumbling walls, and splintered wood. One tower remained, half burned and leaning heavily against the manor’s interior walls. A tattered, soot-coated blue flag flew from the tower, one of the only reminders that this had once been the mighty structure. Miraculously, the giant double-doored entrance and archway remained standing, though the walls surrounding it had long fallen. The manor grounds, once immaculate, were now overrun with vines and thorny bushes.

Worthy let out a long, deep breath. “There was a little accident.”

“That doesn’t look little,” Meilin said.

“So where exactly are we going?” Anka asked. “Worthy, if you’re just leading us on some wild-goose chase—”

“I’m not! I promise.” He started off toward the outskirts of the walled town. “Follow me. We’ll be at Dawson’s, um, estate soon.”

Worthy led them through the town’s empty dirt streets, eventually stopping at a small wooden cottage.

“This is the new Trunswick Manor?” Conor asked. He knew that Dawson was no longer living in the castle, but he hadn’t expected him to be living in a cottage. It wasn’t much bigger than his family’s home out in the countryside.

Worthy softly knocked on the door using a long, intricate rhythm. When no one answered, he repeated the knock.

Conor could see what looked like a candle illuminating the window beside the door. “Who is it?” someone from inside called.

“Tellun the Elk,” Worthy said. “Who else do you think would use our secret knock?”

The door flung open. Dawson stood in a long wool nightgown, holding a candle. Rumfuss the Boar stood beside him, his tusks white and pointed.

“Devin!” Dawson placed the candle on an end table, then leaped forward, embracing his brother in a long hug. “I can’t believe you’re here!” He pulled back to get a good look at Worthy, then hugged him again.

Unlike everyone else that they had encountered, Dawson didn’t seem frightened or shocked by his brother’s new look. He loved his brother, no matter what.

“I’m all for family reunions,” Rollan said. “But can we take this inside? We do have a bounty out for our heads, after all.”

“Yes, of course,” Dawson said, leading them in. Once inside, he double-bolted the door. Conor and Abeke released their spirit animals. Briggan and Uraza immediately went to Rumfuss, sniffing him and nudging him with their noses. Meilin then released Jhi, but instead of walking toward the others, she sat down and began to eat Dawson’s spruce plant.

“Sorry about that,” Meilin said. “It’s been a while since she’s eaten.”

Dawson shrugged. “No problem. It was my father’s plant anyway.” He turned as something moved behind him. “There’s another old friend here that wants to say hello.”

A small black cat leaped onto a low bookshelf behind Dawson.

“Kunaya!” Abeke said. The cat sprinted nimbly along the edge of the shelf then jumped into Abeke’s outstretched arms. Uraza looked at the cat and let off a low growl.

“Don’t be jealous,” Abeke said as she stroked the cat. “Kunaya’s an old friend of ours.”

Worthy walked over to take a peek at the cat, when she suddenly meowed and jumped into his arms. “It looks like you two have a history as well,” Abeke said.

“A little,” Worthy said. Cradling the cat, he sat down in one of the few chairs in the room. “I like what you’ve done with the place, Dawson.” He nodded toward a blue tapestry hanging on the wall. “You were able to save the family crest.”

“It was about the only thing that didn’t burn down,” Dawson said. “Though it took me three hours to scrub all the soot and smoke out of the fabric.”

“Speaking of that,” Meilin began. “Maybe now would be a good time to explain what’s been happening around here.” She cut her eyes to Worthy. “Apparently, someone’s been keeping a few secrets from us.”

“So, where to begin ...” Dawson said. “As I’m sure you realized, Trunswick Castle is gone. Devin burned it down the last time he was here.”

“It wasn’t my fault.” He paused as he placed the black cat on the floor. “Well, it wasn’t completely my fault. I was having a bad day.”

“This was after he started a riot, of course,” Dawson said.

Worthy hesitated. “Okay, that one really was all my fault. But I did it for a good reason.”

Meilin leaned forward. “Why didn’t you tell us any of this?”

He shrugged. “I wanted you to like me. And I didn’t keep it from everyone,” he said. “I told Conor.”

Conor’s friends all leveled their gazes on him. “Thanks, Worthy,” Conor mumbled. It was just like Worthy to pull Conor into his web of lies. “I’m sorry, guys. I probably should have made Worthy tell you all. But I still think coming to Trunswick was the right call.”

“Perhaps,” Meilin said. “But you should have trusted us to make that decision together. With all the information.”

Conor wished he could disappear. He was no longer a servant to the Trunswicks, but he was still getting into trouble because of them.

“We have to remember, we’re all fighting for the same thing,” Abeke said. “So from now on, no more secrets. Agreed? Unified until the end.”

They all nodded. Conor expected Rollan to crack a joke or two, but he remained silent, instead rubbing his brown cloak between his fingers.

“Dawson, were you able to save anything else from the castle?” Worthy asked. “Down in the lower levels, there were some records on old parchment. I looked through them once, when father was away. I thought I saw something about a powerful sword there. The Wildcat’s Claw. Our family sword was modeled after it.”

“A lot of those records were damaged by the water used to put out the fire,” Dawson said. “We took everything we could salvage and moved it to the Howling House. That’s probably where you should start.”

“The Howling House!” Rollan yelled. “I have to go back to that place?”

“What’s the Howling House?” Anka asked. Conor looked around until he noticed the blurry shape leaning against the door.

“It’s a prison where they keep innocent people,” Rollan said. “Cat-boy over there threw me and Conor into it the first time I visited this place.”

“Sorry about that,” Worthy said. “To be fair, I really did hate Greencloaks at the time. You guys were just so ... smug. It wasn’t fair.”

“The Howling House was where we kept people affected by bonding sickness,” Dawson said. “But we don’t use it that way anymore. We have no need for it, since there’s no more bonding sickness. Plus, we don’t exactly have the funds for its upkeep.” He turned to his brother. “Have you heard about father?”

The air seemed to escape from the room. “What’s wrong?” Worthy asked quietly. “Is he ... dead?”

Dawson shook his head. “No, but after you hear this, you might wish he was. He abandoned the town—and our family—taking every coin, gem, and valuable he could find with him. The town is broke, but we are rebuilding ... slowly. Our military is gone, now replaced by a militia made up of farmers and other townsfolk. Mother and Daphne have decided not to return, and with you off helping the Redcloaks, the citizens chose me as the new Earl of Trunswick.” Dawson sighed, looking older and wearier than Conor had ever believed he could. “At this point I’m mostly a figurehead, but I’ll do everything in my power to help our people.”

Dawson had always been the kindest member of his family. He had treated Conor with respect, even when Conor was just a lowly servant boy. Dawson was young, but of all the Trunswicks, he was the right person to lead the town.

“Why you?” Worthy asked. “With the way father disgraced our family and fled the town, why would they pick any Trunswick to serve as earl? I mean, I’m sure you’ll do the best you can, but you don’t know the first thing about running a city. You’re just a kid.”

Dawson stood taller as he crossed his arms. “You’re a kid, too. You all are. But that doesn’t stop you from doing your duty, does it?” He relaxed a little as Rumfuss hoofed over to him. “And to be honest, I think it has more to do with Rumfuss than my amazing leadership skills. His name carries way more weight than ours right now.”

Beside Dawson, the Great Boar snuffled proudly.

“But there’s one other problem,” Dawson said, sinking into the other chair in the room. “You’re all wanted criminals. According to the rumors, you assassinated the Emperor of Zhong.”

“We didn’t kill him,” Conor said. “He was murdered by people pretending to be Greencloaks.”

“I’m sure I don’t have to tell you what the public perception of Greencloaks is right now.” Dawson’s gaze became sharp. In a moment, he looked as shrewd as his father. “There’s word that the queen wants to dismantle your order. She says the Marked would be of better use in service to their respective lands.”

“And what do you think?” Conor asked.

Dawson leaned over and patted Rumfuss on the back. The boar grunted, then rolled over on his back so the boy could reach his stomach. “I’ve seen firsthand what the Wyrms did. I also saw how you Greencloaks fought against it. I stand with you. You have my full support.”

Worthy pulled his cloak around him. “Don’t forget, me and the Redcloaks were there, too.”

Dawson laughed. “Of course. The Wyrms wouldn’t have been defeated without the Redcloaks.”

Worthy sat up in his chair. “Do the townsfolk know that I’m a Redcloak?” There was an air of hope in his voice. “Do they know what I did to help save the world?”

Dawson rubbed the back of his head as he sighed. “Devin, I’ll always see you as a hero. But I can’t speak for the rest of the town. You were cruel to a lot of people. You became even more of a bully when you obtained that fake spirit animal. And then, when you finally returned home with your tail between your legs—no pun intended—you started a riot right in the middle of the square.”

“I had a good reason,” Worthy said. “I was trying to save a defenseless woman.”

Abeke had picked up Kunaya and was now stroking the cat again. “You don’t have to lie to us anymore, Worthy,” she said. “You’ve proven yourself. You don’t have to boast about your deeds.”

“Yeah,” Rollan said. “Everyone makes mistakes. Even me, every once in a while.”

“I’m not lying!” Worthy yelled. “I really was trying to save a woman! She was in the stocks in the square.” He turned to his brother. “Tell them, Dawson.”

His brother shrugged. “The way I heard it, the people began to riot because you were boasting about father’s wealth.”

“No, it wasn’t like that,” Worthy said. “I mean, yes, it was, but I was saying all that on purpose. I was trying to free the woman—”

“As interesting as this sounds, we should probably head to the Howling House,” Meilin said. “We’ve already wasted enough time.”

“It’s too late to go now,” Dawson said. “The sun will be rising in less than an hour. The militia will start their first patrol soon.” He rose and opened the closer of two doors. A cramped bedroom waited within. “You all can stay here for now. It’ll be a tight fit, but it should serve you well enough. Tomorrow night, you can sneak to the Howling House to find what you need.”

Conor looked out of the window. The darkness was fading away. In another hour, his parents would be awake, tending to their animals.

“Hey, Worthy, can I talk to you for a second?” Rollan asked, walking toward the bedroom. He was carrying his large pack. “I want to get your, um, opinion on something really quick.”

Meilin and Abeke looked at each other as the two boys disappeared into the room. “I don’t even want to know what that’s about,” Meilin said.

Conor crossed the room then knelt beside Dawson. Rumfuss huffed as Conor entered their space. “Do you think it’s safe enough for me to visit my family?” Conor asked.

Dawson shook his head. “Sorry, Conor. That would be too risky. But I just saw them last week. They’re doing well. Your brothers are good shepherds.” Dawson tilted his head. “You favor your oldest brother quite a bit. His face is a little rounder, though.” Dawson looked at the ground for a moment, then back up. “I try to look out for your family as much as I can. It’s the least I can do.” He suddenly grabbed Conor’s hand. “Conor, can you ever forgive me for deceiving you like that?”

Conor frowned. “What are you talking about?”

“The letter,” he said softly. “Remember the letter about your mother? And the Iron Boar?”

As soon as Dawson mentioned the Iron Boar, Conor knew exactly what he meant. Conor and his friends had successfully located Rumfuss’s Iron Boar talisman, a mystic item that granted the wearer an almost impenetrable armor-like skin. It was a power similar to the gila monster’s amulet, Conor thought. But then the Earl of Trunswick threatened Conor’s mother, forcing him to turn over the Iron Boar for her safety. Dawson had been the one to deliver his father’s demands.

Conor had never been more ashamed of himself as he turned over the talisman for his mother’s safety. He’d betrayed his friends, and the green cloak he was so proud to wear.

“There isn’t a day that’s passed where I didn’t wish I could go back and change things,” Dawson said. “I should have tried to help you. I should have pushed back against my father.”

“We’ve both made mistakes,” Conor said. “But now’s our chance for us to redeem ourselves.”

Dawson seemed comforted by this. Surprisingly, so was Conor.

RACE AGAINST THE MILITIA

ABEKE AND THE OTHERS SPENT MOST OF THE DAY trying to rest. Conor, Worthy, and Rollan had bunked in the room with Dawson, leaving Abeke, Meilin, and Anka to share the other small room. They had allowed Anka to take the bed and had used Dawson's extra quilts to cushion the wooden floor. It wasn't the most comfortable of sleeping arrangements, but it was much better than the cold, unforgiving ground along Eura's country roads.

The sun had set an hour ago. Now they were just waiting for the last of the shops to close in the market. They wanted the streets as empty as possible before they started the trek to the Howling House.

Abeke counted and organized the arrows in her remaining quiver while Meilin finished her training lesson with Anka. They had been working on punching techniques. Meilin was trying to get Anka to step forward while delivering her punch, as a way to maximize her power. Anka kept doing the opposite, however, punching while rocking backward on her heels. As they trained, Abeke realized this was one of the few times she'd had a chance to study Anka—she was always so hard to see with her chameleon powers. She wasn't the best warrior by a long shot, but Meilin seemed determined to train her. However, what Anka lacked in fighting skills she more than made up for with stealth. Even with the help of Uraza's heightened senses, it often took Abeke a few moments to locate Anka when she was invisible.

There was a soft knock on the door, and a moment later, Rollan pushed it open. "You all should come out and hear this for yourselves," he said. "It's important."

Anka and Meilin bowed toward each other, finishing their sparring. In a flash, Anka's chameleon appeared on her shoulder. The green animal blinked his wide, bulging eyes a few times as he took in his surroundings. Then, as he scampered along Anka's collarbone, the animal slowly faded to green and brown, matching the wall behind them. A few seconds later, Anka faded away into a similar wavy haze.

They entered the main room to see Dawson and the others standing around the table. A brown parchment stretched out across the tabletop.

"We've got trouble," Dawson said. "According to some of the shopkeepers, soldiers in black uniforms were in the city, looking for five renegade Greencloaks and a mysterious warrior in red."

"The Oathbound caught up with us sooner than I thought," Worthy said. He read the parchment again and stroked his chin. "At least they called me a warrior."

"The woman in charge was offering a hefty reward," Dawson continued. "Enough to feed some families for half a year, if not longer."

"Did they leave?" Meilin asked.

"About an hour ago," Dawson said. "They were heading west, along the river. But I'd bet all the bristles on Rumfuss's back that they'll return tomorrow. Probably with more soldiers." Rumfuss burrowed between Dawson's legs and settled underneath the table. "Understandably, the captain of the militia is worried. She's requested more militiamen to patrol the streets tonight. I could try to talk her out of it, but that would cause more suspicion."

Abeke ran her finger along the edge of her bow. "So either we remain in hiding for a few days until things calm down, or we take our chances and go now."

"I think we should go," Meilin said. "We can't afford to wait. The risk for failure is too great."

The others nodded in agreement.

“It’ll be difficult to hide all six of us,” Anka said. “Especially if we’re moving.”

“Then we should split up,” Abeke said. “Anka will hide as many as she can, and the rest of us will follow.”

“But what about all that talk about being united?” Worthy asked.

“United in our duty to one another and to the Greencloaks.” Abeke paused as she noticed Worthy’s arms were crossed peevishly. “I mean, Greencloaks and Redcloaks.” Seeing him relax, she continued. “United in our mission ... but not necessarily in how we execute that mission.”

“Conor and Worthy, you should go with Anka,” Meilin said. “We can’t risk anyone recognizing you.”

Conor rolled up his sleeve and stretched out his bare arm. “Come on, Briggan. Best go into passive.” The wolf glanced at Conor and gave a soft whimper. “Oh, don’t look at me like that. I’ll let you back out as soon as we get to the Howling House.” The wolf stood up, shaking fur across everyone. The room flashed, and Briggan disappeared onto Conor’s arm.

Uraza paused from cleaning her paws with her tongue to look at Abeke. She blinked her purple eyes at her inquisitively. “Don’t worry; you don’t have to go into passive state. At least, not yet,” Abeke said.

Conor slipped on the coat he’d borrowed from Dawson. It was a little snug, but would have to do. “Rollan, you’d better come with us, too, just to be on the safe side. People may remember you from the last time that you were here with me.”

Rollan’s shoulders sagged, but he nodded. Everyone knew he’d rather travel with Meilin. He picked up his brown cloak—now covered with Briggan’s excess fur—and fastened it around his neck. “You don’t ever hear anyone complaining about a falcon shedding,” he mumbled.

“We’ll meet you as soon as we can,” Meilin said. She picked up her quarterstaff and offered it to Anka. “You should carry a weapon. Just remember our training and you’ll be fine.”

“Thank you.” As Anka took it, the wooden staff turned invisible. “You guys ready?” she asked.

Rollan, Conor, and Worthy nodded. A few seconds later, they disappeared before Abeke's eyes.

"Whoa!" Dawson looked at Rumfuss. "We've got to get some cool tricks like that."

"You'll discover even more powers, in time," Abeke said. "If you joined the Greencloaks, we could help you with your training."

Dawson hesitated, then said, "Thank you for the offer, but my place is here in Trunswick."

"Yeah, and if he joins anything, it'll be the Redcloaks!" Worthy said.

"Okay, enough talking," Anka said. The door slowly opened. "See you soon."

They listened as four sets of footsteps exited the house. Then the door closed shut.

Dawson stood in the middle of the room shaking his head. "How do you guys get used to that? That was awesome."

"Believe me, we've seen stranger." Meilin slid the falchion out of its scabbard and inspected the blade. "What's the best way to get to the Howling House?"

"The most direct way is straight through town. It's right past the castle. Or what's left of the castle." Dawson opened the door again and peeked out. "Okay, the coast is clear. You can go."

"We should take the rooftops," Meilin said. "It'll be easier to avoid the militia."

Abeke and Meilin quickly slipped out of the cottage and stepped into an empty alleyway. Meilin looked up and measured the distance. "I could make it up there on my own, but a little help never hurt." Moments later, Jhi appeared by Meilin's side. She nuzzled the animal's snout. "How about it, Jhi? Care to give me a little power boost?"

Both Meilin and Jhi closed their eyes, almost as if they were in a trance. Seconds later, Meilin exploded into a run. She leaped against the wall of the first building, letting her foot hit the side of the fading brick, then pivoted and launched herself toward the other building. She went like this back and forth until she reached the top.

She leaned over the edge, then curtsied for Abeke.

Abeke walked over to the Great Panda as she sat there, looking up at Meilin. “Are you jumping up there as well, Jhi?”

Meilin laughed as she stretched out her arms. “She would much rather take the easy way up,” she said, calling back Jhi.

Abeke let her fingers run along the back of Uraza’s lush fur. “Come on, Uraza. We can do better than that, right?” And then, as the leopard’s power coursed between them, they took off up the wall.

Abeke loved running across the rooftops with Uraza on her heels. It wasn’t the plains of the savannah outside of her village in Nilo, but she was still having a blast. The wind stirred around them, making it almost feel like they were in an empty field instead of a walled city. After so much fighting and seriousness, it was good to just let loose and run.

Even without her spirit animal aiding her, Meilin was doing an excellent job of keeping up. The girl even did a couple of flips as she jumped across some alleyways—probably just to show off, like Worthy had done in the forest. Abeke hadn’t minded then, and she didn’t mind now. After so much fighting, they could all use a little fun.

Eventually, Abeke and Meilin traveled as far as they could above the city. In the distance, past the charred, crumbling remains of Trunswick Castle, stood the Howling House.

“We won’t have any cover until we get to the castle,” Abeke said.

Meilin nodded as she surveyed the area around them. “I don’t see any militia. I think we should chance it.”

They shinnied down the side of the building, then took off across the open street. They had almost reached the castle grounds when Abeke heard footsteps behind them.

“Hey! Stop there!” a man yelled. He held a lantern in one hand and a sword in the other. Two other men chased behind him. Their blue tunics matched the colors of the city crest.

“Almost made it,” Meilin said. “Now what?”

“Maybe we could lose him in the castle,” Abeke offered.

The girls sprinted across the overgrown lawn, leaping over blackened stone boulders and charred wood. They scurried over a fallen column, past the stone archway, and raced inside the castle walls. A long, winding staircase stood before them. The staircase looked like it was made of brass, but there was too much ash coating it to know for sure.

“That way,” Meilin said, rushing up the stairs to what remained of the second floor. “They’d be fools to follow us up here.”

The steps creaked and groaned underneath them as they neared the top landing. Abeke was sure they would buckle any second. “Um, now who exactly are the fools again?” Abeke asked. Taking the last three steps in one bound, she landed heavily on the second floor, which sagged beneath her. Uraza landed beside her, stirring up a cloud of ash. “Maybe this wasn’t such a good idea.”

“If it was a bad idea for us, then it’s a horrible idea for them,” Meilin said, pointing to the militiamen following them up the stairs. “Do you see how they’re handling their weapons? They aren’t soldiers. They should be holding shepherds crooks, not swords.”

“My village doesn’t have any dedicated soldiers, either,” Abeke said as they took cover behind an overturned bust of a man. Abeke couldn’t be sure, but she assumed that it was a statue of Dawson and Worthy’s father. “If and when the time comes for battle, all able-bodied men are expected to fight, whether they’re teachers or hunters.”

“Even if they aren’t trained?” Meilin asked.

She nodded. “Of course, it was always frowned upon if a woman ever wanted to—” Abeke stopped as a light shone above them.

“Hey, I see you!” one of the men yelled. “Stop. You’re trespassing.”

“Save that thought,” Meilin said, taking off down the grand hallway. “Come on!”

Abeke took off after her, turning as the hallway split and intersected with other smaller hallways.

Abeke slowed as she sidestepped a cracked chandelier. Shards of glass had exploded across the entire swath of carpet. The glass fragments shone from the moonlight pouring through the collapsed ceiling. “Watch your step,” Abeke warned Uraza. “You don’t want to get glass in between your paws.”

Meilin screeched to a halt, almost causing Abeke to run into her. The entire hallway floor in front of them was cracked and splintered, with large holes gaping through the floorboards. Below, Abeke saw what looked like a grand parlor.

“There’s no way that floor will hold us, especially running at full speed.” Meilin called forth Jhi. “But I bet we can jump it.”

Nodding, Abeke backed up a few paces. Then, just as the militiamen turned into the hallway, Meilin, Abeke, and Uraza raced and leaped across the aging wood, easily clearing it.

The men stood, their weapons hanging at their sides, as Jhi disappeared.

“You’re the Greencloaks the Oathbound are looking for!” one man yelled. He accusingly thrust his sword toward them. “Stop! Turn yourselves in!”

Meilin shook her head. “Not going to happen.”

“You don’t know the entire truth,” Abeke said. “The Oathbound are not what they seem!”

“They said you killed the Emperor of Zhong and that you tried to kill the Queen of Eura.”

“Lies!” Abeke said.

“We’re not going to change their minds, and we’re running out of time,” Meilin said. “Just shoot them and let’s get this over with.”

Abeke gasped. “Meilin!”

Meilin shrugged. “What? I didn’t say kill them. Just shoot them in the shoulder or leg or something so they’ll stop chasing us.”

“By order of the Queen of Eura, we hereby place you under arrest,” one of the other militiamen yelled, his voice quavering. He looked young, barely older than them. He held a rapier in his shaking hand.

Meilin sighed as she unsheathed her sword. “Guys, seriously. Do you not see that she has a leopard? And I have a giant panda. And you all ... you can barely hold your weapons.”

“Meilin, you’re not helping,” Abeke whispered.

“Trust me,” Meilin whispered back. Then, looking back at the men, she said, “Come on! Or are you too scared to fight two girls?”

The men held their weapons higher. “For Trunswick!” the leader roared. “Charge!”

“No!” Abeke yelled. “Wait!”

But it was too late. As soon as the men surged forward, the floor underneath them opened up. As the floorboards cracked, the men fell to the lower story.

Meilin sheathed her sword and dusted off her hands. “Well, that’s done. Let’s go.”

“We can’t just leave them,” Abeke said.

“We don’t have time—”

“They were just doing their duty,” Abeke said. She listened for a few seconds. Thanks to Uraza, she could make out three district groans. “At least they’re still alive.”

Meilin sighed. “All right, fine. Let’s help them.” They slowly walked to the edge of the large hole and peered down. The men lay in a heap on the floor. “Do you yield?” Meilin asked.

“Never,” one of the men said. Then he passed out.

Abeke and Meilin leaped to the bottom floor. Abeke drew her bow and aimed an arrow at them, although she quickly realized this was pointless. The men were in no condition to fight.

Returning her arrow to the quiver, Abeke collected the men’s weapons. “I’m sorry for the pain we caused you,” she said. “We mean you no harm.”

Meilin knelt in front of the youngest of the men as he cradled his arm. “Don’t move,” she said. He winced as she touched his wrist. “I don’t think it’s broken. Merely sprained. Hold on for a second.”

She called forth Jhi, and the man shrank away. “Don’t hurt me!” he yelled.

“We’re not going to attack you,” Meilin said. “Jhi is a healer. She’ll help.” The large panda lumbered to the man, then began licking his hand and arm. Slowly, he slumped to the ground and sighed in relief.

“These two seem fine,” Abeke said. The other man had regained consciousness. She helped both of them to their feet. “Are you hurt? Any broken bones? Jhi can help you, too.”

“Nothing hurt but my pride,” the leader said. “You’re really not going to kill us?”

“Of course not,” Abeke said. “But we will have to tie you up for a while,” she added sheepishly. “But don’t worry—we’ll send someone back for you.”

The leader of the men shook his head. “But the Oathbound ... they said you were murderers. They said you would destroy us all.”

“We’re Greencloaks,” Meilin said. “We are protectors. The Oathbound are the dangerous ones.”

The leader looked at the other man, then nodded. “Their leader, Cordelia the Kind, said she’d destroy the town if she discovered you were here,” he said. “I’m sorry. We were just trying to protect ourselves.”

“We know,” Meilin said. “You three were very brave. You can tell your friends all about your adventures and embellish as much as you want ... tomorrow.” She placed her hand on her sword. “But for right now, we’re going to need to tie you up. And quickly. We have someplace to be.”

THE MIGHTY WILCO

ROLLAN'S MUSCLES INVOLUNTARILY FLEXED AS HE heard footsteps creaking above them. He wasn't sure if the others heard it—they were farther back in the basement, away from the stairs. Pausing from reading the large journal in front of him, he grabbed a torch from the wall sconce and glanced at Essix. The falcon sat at a small arch window high in the basement, looking too dignified to fly farther into the room.

Still holding the torch, Rollan moved to the base of the stairs. With his free hand, he removed his dagger from his belt. “Mind taking a look?” he asked Essix. “It’s probably Meilin and Abeke, but we’d better check just to be sure.”

The bird screeched, then took flight through the room and up the winding metal staircase. Although now empty, the Howling House was still a scary place to be. Every time the wind blew outside, the windows rattled, making Rollan flinch. The four walls surrounding them were covered with scratches and splatters of red. Rollan didn't care to speculate on the source of the stains.

Rollan watched Essix as she soared back into the basement. She perched on the wooden chandelier in the middle of the space and began pecking at something—probably an insect snack.

“She flew down here,” Rollan heard Meilin say. A few moments later, she and Abeke descended the stairs into the basement.

“What happened to you all?” Rollan asked, holding the torch so he could get a better view of them. “How did you get covered with all that ash?”

Meilin brushed the soot from her shoulder. “We ran into a little trouble, but we were able to handle it. Any luck with finding anything on the Wildcat’s Claw?”

“Not yet, but we haven’t been searching long.” He pointed them toward an untouched stack of books covered in dust and cobwebs. “You can start with those. The others are farther back, looking through, like, a thousand scrolls.”

Meilin cautiously approached the books. “Are you sure there aren’t any spiders in there?”

Rollan smiled. “If you see one, just pretend it’s a big, hairy mouse.”

She huffed in reply, but picked up one of the scrolls. Abeke took a large book beside it.

Rollan removed his cloak and returned to his book. It was cold outside, but all the torches were making the basement stuffy. The brown cloak was heavy and rough, nothing like his green cloak. He hadn’t wanted to part with it, but after Abeke’s speech last night about secrets, Rollan knew he couldn’t continue traveling with the cloak and hiding it from his friends. He and Worthy had decided to store it in Dawson’s cottage for now, underneath one of the loose floorboards. Hopefully, once they’d found all the gifts and rescued the Greencloaks, Rollan could return for it.

He wondered if Tarik would have done the same thing, had he still been with them.

Rollan finished paging through the book, then picked up an equally large and equally boring journal. He had to keep shaking his head in order to stay awake.

But then his eyes flashed open.

“I think I found something!” Rollan said. He’d discovered a full-page illustration of a large, bearded warrior and a black wildcat. The warrior’s arms were thick as tree trunks. The fur of a wild stag covered his shoulders, torso, and legs, and his metal helmet was adorned with two sharp, ivory tusks. In his hands, he carried a large sword, poised and ready to strike.

As intimidating as the warrior was, the wildcat was even more ferocious. It stood in a crouch, claws bared and mouth curled into a snarl, waiting to pounce. Somehow, the ink in the drawing made it seem as though the wildcat's muscles rippled underneath its fur, right there on the page. Its yellow eyes peered at Rollan, as if it were trying to stare him down.

Rollan finally peeled his eyes away from the drawing, as the others surrounded him. "That's it!" Worthy said. "That's the picture I remember seeing."

Worthy took the journal from him. Rollan didn't try to stop him. "The warrior is named Gransfen the Giant," Worthy said. "The wildcat's name is Wilco."

"Like the enchanted forest?" Conor asked. "Wilcoskov?"

Worthy nodded. "Yes, I believe so." He flipped the page and continued reading, his finger tracing along each word. "This looks like a brief retelling of the history of Gransfen and Wilco. They lived a long time ago, back before there were even Greencloaks." Worthy looked up from the journal. "Hey, maybe the Trunswicks are somehow related to him. I think I had a cousin named Grant ... maybe he was named after him. I should ask Dawson about—"

"Let me see that," Conor said, taking the book from Worthy. "You can come back later to research your family history—after we find the Wildcat's Claw."

Conor began reading the book—slowly. He'd hardly been able to read when Rollan had first met him, but he had worked hard at it—even studying during their travels—and had improved greatly.

"According to this, Gransfen was from the far north. Somewhere close to the shores of Arctica." Conor kept reading. "A band of warriors called the Crimson Raiders attacked his village, taking most of the food the villagers had harvested for the long winter. The leader of the Crimson Raiders demanded that the village swear loyalty to them and hand over their firstborn sons to their order—if not, they would destroy everything. Gransfen, the first and only son of the local blacksmith, was weak, scrawny, and sickly. In order to prove they were serious, the Crimson Raiders pulled Gransfen from his home, stripped him of all his furs, and cast him into the wilderness to starve and freeze to death. He returned three weeks later, alive and well, riding on the back of the largest wildcat anyone had ever seen. The wildcat roared so loudly that the village gates disintegrated, like a charred log turning to ash. Then the wildcat fought the raiders, snapping their swords in her jaws like they were twigs in a steel trap.”

“That’s amazing,” Rollan said. He had to admit, Wilco sounded pretty awesome—maybe even more powerful than the gila monster.

Conor turned the page. “After freeing the village, Gransfen and Wilco spent the rest of their lives fighting against the Crimson Raiders and any other threats to ancient Eura. The book compares the black wildcat to other legendary animals from across Erdas, especially in Amaya, Nilo, and Zhong. Their strength only paled in comparison to the Great Beasts themselves. Like Wilco, some of these spirit animals and their human partners had powerful items that they used to defend their homes. The book names four: the Wildcat’s Claw, the Heart of the Land, Stormspeaker, and the Dragon’s Eye. All four were gifted to the Greencloaks after the fall of the Devourer.”

“Those are the other two gifts!” Abeke said. “Stormspeaker and the Dragon’s Eye.”

“Jump ahead,” Anka said. “Does it say what happened to them?”

Conor flipped to the end of the entry and began reading again. “No, but it does say that after years of glorious battle, Gransfen and Wilco were buried at the base of a waterfall in the very forest where Gransfen first summoned the wildcat.” Conor perked up, his eyes gleaming. “Even the famous Greencloaks revered the pair,” he read haltingly. “Shortly after the war, a traveling Greencloak visited the tomb to honor the wildcat and the hero.” Conor flipped to the next page, but it was blank. “That’s it,” he said.

“I’m guessing that Greencloak was doing more than just paying respects,” Rollan said. “They must have been hiding the sword.”

“But why?” Meilin asked. “This has been bothering me for a while now. If these gifts are so powerful, why didn’t the Greencloaks keep them and use them to defend Erdas? The Heart of the Land has saved us twice now. We could have used that power against the Conquerors, but Olvan held back.”

Rollan frowned. “It is a little strange. Especially since they’re supposed to be these big symbols of togetherness. Why spread them all out and keep them hidden?”

Anka’s color shifted slightly. Rollan caught a glimpse of a thoughtful expression before she disappeared again. “The Greencloaks have always been tight-lipped about forbidden knowledge,” she said. “Perhaps there’s more to the gifts than it seems, and they wanted to keep those secrets from getting out.”

“Until now,” Conor said. “Whatever his reasons, Olvan needs us to retrieve the gifts.”

“Great,” Worthy moaned. “Are we really going to Wilcoskov?”

“What’s wrong with that?” Abeke asked. “Is it dangerous?”

“Worse,” Worthy said. “It’s enchanted. Full of old magic. No one enters that place anymore, not even hunters.”

Meilin shrugged. “Gransfen did.”

“Gransfen was the most noble warrior that Eura has ever known,” Worthy said. “No offense, but even you aren’t in his league, Meilin. None of us are.”

“The book says that a Greencloak entered the forest,” Abeke offered.

“But it doesn’t say that he left, does it?” Worthy said.

Rollan arched his eyebrow. “Worthy, are you really that scared?”

Behind his mask, Worthy’s eyes were solemn as he looked at Rollan. “I am. And if you knew any better, you’d be scared, too.”

Conor closed the book. “I’m scared, too. I grew up hearing all the horror stories about Wilcoskov. But if the Wildcat’s Claw is there, then that’s where we have to go.” He looked at Worthy. “Are you with us?”

Worthy scowled, but eventually nodded. “Fine, I’m in. But don’t say I didn’t warn you.”

Rollan decided to tag along with Meilin and Abeke on the way back to Dawson’s cottage. After being cooped up in the basement, he wanted to run along the rooftops, feeling the breeze in his hair. On the way, they filled him in on the trouble they'd run into at Trunswick Castle.

"We'll have Dawson go back to release them as soon as we leave," Meilin said once they neared the cottage. Rollan noticed a few candles burning by the window. He hoped that Dawson hadn't stayed up waiting for them. Running a town like Trunswick couldn't be easy. The kid needed all the rest he could get.

"People will eventually figure out that Dawson was the one helping us," Abeke said. "I hope he doesn't get into too much trouble."

"He's a smart kid," Rollan said, his hand on the door. "I'm sure he'll find a way to talk himself out of it."

He opened it, and froze.

"Or maybe not," Rollan mumbled.

Three members of the militia stood in front of him, their crossbows aimed right at his chest. Another woman stood a few feet away, a saber in her hand.

"Don't even think about calling your spirit animals," the woman said. "Just come in, nice and quiet."

Rollan, Meilin, and Abeke slowly entered the room.

"Close the door," the woman said.

Rollan shook his head. "It gets really warm in here, with so many people," he said. "But I'd be happy to close the door once you all leave." He didn't know how far away Anka and the others were, but he hoped that with the door open, they would see the trouble that they were in before walking into the same trap.

"I'm sorry that I couldn't warn you," Dawson said. "The captain got here a few minutes ago."

"The young earl almost had us fooled," the woman said. "But then my men found the strangest item in his bedroom, hidden underneath the floorboards." She held the tattered green cloak up high, then let it unravel to the ground.

Rollan didn't miss a beat. "Dawson, you're a Greencloak! You should have told us—"

"Save it," the woman snapped. She walked over to the three men holding crossbows. They looked pretty banged up, with ripped clothes and ash in their hair. One could barely hold his weapon—the wrist of his non-firing hand was wrapped in a thick bandage. “Are these the kids you saw running through the streets?”

“Yes, Captain,” the oldest one said. “The two girls. The boy wasn’t with them.”

Rollan realized these must have been the men who chased Meilin and Abeke. Either they had escaped their bonds, or someone had found them and released them.

Meilin shook her head. “I told you that you should have shot them,” she whispered to Abeke.

“Why are you here?” the captain asked. “We’ve had enough of your kind in our town. Conquerors, Greencloaks, Oathbound, and everyone else. We just want to live our lives in peace.” The woman almost sounded like she was pleading. “Why can’t you just leave us alone?”

“Just put the weapons down, and we’ll be gone before morning,” Abeke said. She glanced at the three men with the crossbows.

The captain shook her head. “The Oathbound will be back by then with more men. I don’t know how, but they could tell you were here. Their leader, Cordelia the Kind, threatened to ransack only half the town if we turned you over upon their return.”

“She calls that kind?” Rollan shook his head. “And I thought Wikam the Just was misnamed.”

“Please consider what you’re proposing,” Dawson said to the woman. “You’d be a fool to trust the Oathbound over the Greencloaks. Surely you’ve heard the rumors about these bounty hunters dressed in black. They don’t care who or what they destroy. They don’t care about anything in their path. They only care about catching their target, no matter what stands in their way.”

“Yes, I’m a fool,” the captain said, turning her gaze to Dawson. “I’m a fool for thinking you were better than your father. You’re a liar, just like him. Do you plan to steal from us, too?”

“I am not my father,” Dawson said, his jaw taut. Beside him, Rumfuss snorted and tapped on the floor with his hooved feet. “Shylene, I asked you to organize the militia because you are brave and fair. You were one of the only people to speak out against my father. You always know the difference between right and wrong.” He took a step toward her. “Trust your instincts,” he said. “You know I’m telling the truth.”

“Look at your men,” Rollan added. “Can’t you tell from their faces? They know we don’t mean them any harm.”

The captain glanced at her men. Their expressions were much more conflicted than hers. “It’s true, Captain,” the bearded one finally said. “They could have killed us, but didn’t. And they fixed up Sully’s arm and everything.”

The captain shook her head. “How can you trust them?” she asked. “How can you trust any of them? These outsiders care nothing for your lives or your families.”

“Then don’t trust them,” a voice said. “Trust me.”

Rollan turned. Slowly, Worthy faded into view, like a fog taking human shape. The men gasped.

“What type of trickery is this?” the oldest man asked, his arms shaking as he pointed his crossbow at Worthy. “Stay back, monster!”

Worthy flinched. Rollan wasn’t sure if the man had called him a monster because of the way Worthy had materialized in front of them, or because of how the Redcloak looked. Either way, it wasn’t a compliment.

“I’m not a monster,” Worthy said. “I’m one of you. At least, I used to be.” He took a cautious step inside the cottage.

“Stay where you are,” the captain warned, swinging her weapon toward him. Unlike her men, she didn’t seem the least bit intimidated. “Who are you?”

“I’m called Worthy,” he said. He reached behind his head and unfastened his mask. “But before, I was known by another name.”

The woman’s eyes narrowed as she took in Worthy’s unmasked face. She blinked a few times. “Devin Trunswick?” she asked, her voice softer. “Is that you? What happened?”

“That isn’t important.” He took another step forward. “So you do remember me. Do you also remember the last time we saw each other?”

She nodded, still taking Worthy in. “At the center of the square,” she said. “I’d been locked in the stocks for three days with barely any water. I didn’t know how much longer I could last. But you ... you stirred the crowd and started a riot. The townsfolk overtook the guards, then freed me. We marched to the castle after that and burned it down. I would be dead if not for you. The earl would probably still be in power as well.” She pointed her sword at Rollan and the others. “You’re working with these Greencloaks?”

“I am,” Worthy said. “I trust them with my life.”

The woman took a deep breath. “Then I trust them as well,” she said. “Lower your weapons,” she said to her men. “These Greencloaks mean us no harm.” She sheathed her sword then turned to Dawson. “I’m sorry about what I said.”

He was already waving her off. “Don’t worry about it. You were only doing your duty. No one is above question in Trunswick, including me.”

“I should apologize as well,” Rollan said to Abeke and Meilin. “I’m sorry for bringing the cloak with me. I just couldn’t part with it yet.”

Meilin patted his shoulder. “I know,” she said. “But no more secrets, okay?”

Rollan nodded. “No more. Complete honesty from now on.”

Meilin raised an eyebrow. “About everything?”

Rollan could feel the heat rising to his neck. “Well, almost everything. I do have a reputation to protect and all.” He looked at Worthy. “And speaking of truths—who would have guessed that Worthy was actually telling the truth about saving that woman? Maybe he’s not so bad after all.”

THE ENCHANTED FOREST

MEILIN'S HORSE NEIGHED AND STOMPED AT THE STIFF ground. She rubbed on its neck, trying to calm it. The animal didn't like carrying her, that was for certain. He was a field animal, more suited for pulling a plow than racing into battle, but riding was better than walking.

Meilin readjusted the sword at her side so it wouldn't interfere with her new, royal blue uniform. In addition to providing horses, Shylene, the captain of the militia, had issued each of them a Trunswick militia tunic. The journey to Wilcoskov would have taken weeks if they'd been forced to travel by foot under the cover of night. But by pretending to be part of the militia, they hoped to be able to travel during the day without attracting too much attention.

Meilin squeezed her knees around the horse, motioning him forward. She trotted over to the three militiamen—the same men who had chased her and Abeke the night before. Even with the tumble they'd taken through the floor, they seemed to be in good shape, thanks to Jhi's healing powers.

“Thank you for the horse and the clothes,” she said. “But you don't have to travel with us. It could be dangerous.”

“Captain’s orders,” the bearded one said. Meilin had learned that his name was Albert and that he was a pig farmer. “The villagers to the north know our faces. You’ll be questioned less if you’re seen traveling with us.”

“Thank you,” Meilin said again. It seemed too much of a risk—these simple townsfolk risking their lives to help them. But Meilin reminded herself that the people of Trunswick had much to lose as well if the Greencloaks weren’t successful.

The others slowly climbed onto their horses. Anka looked the strangest of them all, wearing her blue tunic, plainly in sight. She still carried Meilin’s old quarterstaff.

Rollan was the last to mount his horse. He almost fell off a few times, but he eventually made it onto the saddle. “Are you guys sure that you don’t want to walk? It’s probably safer.”

Meilin rolled her eyes. Even after all this time, Rollan still wasn’t comfortable on horseback.

They passed the city walls just as the sun peeked over the horizon. Now that it was easier to see, Meilin noticed that the flags flying above the city walls displayed the image of Rumfuss the Boar. The last time she’d visited, the flags glorified Elda, the black wildcat with whom Worthy had been unnaturally bonded.

Meilin slowed down and joined Worthy at the rear of the group. “Did you enjoy being home?”

“It’s always good to see my brother,” Worthy said. “But this isn’t really home anymore.” He nodded toward the men at the front of the group. They were talking with Conor, laughing about some shared story between them. “Did you see how they looked at me? Did you hear what they said? They’ve made a point of steering clear of me.”

“It’s just because they aren’t used to the way you look,” Meilin said. “Give it time.”

He gave a weak laugh. “That would be fine, if it were only that. But my face and claws aren’t the only reasons why they keep avoiding me. Dawson was right—the old Devin Trunswick was a real bully. Take Sully, for instance,” he said, nodding toward the youngest of the militiamen. “His sister was jailed in the Howling House for a week, all because my father and I didn't like the way she looked at us when we passed by one day. And Albert and his hog farm? I used to take my dogs hunting on his land once a fortnight, and wouldn't even pay Albert when my hounds slaughtered one of his pigs."

"Have you tried apologizing?" Meilin asked.

He seemed hopeful. "Do you think that would really work?"

Meilin shrugged. "I don't know. But it doesn't hurt to try."

They continued riding all day, not stopping until it was almost dark. While Conor, Rollan, and Abeke prepared their meal, Meilin took Anka and the other militiamen to a clearing to work on some fighting techniques.

"The key to good fighting is good footwork," Meilin said, standing before them. Four arm-length strips of cloth were draped over her shoulder. "If you stand with your feet too close together, you run the risk of losing your balance and falling in a fight. If your feet are too apart, you won't be able to move fast enough to counter your opponent's attacks." She tossed each of them one of the strips. "Tie these between your ankles, and let's get started."

She spent the next hour working on their footwork, having each of them attack and parry. Then she had them pair up and face off against each other. Meilin was worried that Anka would struggle against the older Albert, but she held her own, even causing Albert to trip and fall a few times.

Once dinner was ready, the three men untied their cloths from their ankles and rushed to the campfire. Anka stayed behind.

"You're not hungry?" Meilin asked, picking up the discarded strips from the ground.

"I'll eat in a little bit," Anka said, twirling her quarterstaff like Meilin had taught her. "I want to practice a little more first."

Meilin pulled out her sword. "I'm ready whenever you are."

As Anka and Meilin began to circle each other, Toey, Anka's chameleon, scampered down her leg and hid in her boot. "You're getting pretty good with that quarterstaff," Meilin said, before lunging.

Anka blocked her blade, then swung the other end of the staff at Meilin. Meilin ducked and then rolled out of the way. "Very good,"

Meilin continued, getting to her feet.

“Thanks. I’ve been studying how you move,” Anka said. Now she became the aggressor, swinging and lunging at Meilin. Meilin blocked each strike, then leaped onto a tree branch, out of reach of Anka’s staff.

“Let’s try again,” Meilin said, peering down at Anka from the safety of her tree. “But this time, use your spirit animal.”

Anka leaned against the quarterstaff and wiped her brow. “Are you sure? That doesn’t seem fair.”

“In a real battle for life and death, you shouldn’t worry about what is and isn’t fair,” Meilin replied, swinging out of the tree. “We’re partnered with our spirit animals for a reason. Use Toey’s strengths to help you.”

Anka nodded, then began to fade from view. Meilin spun in a circle, waiting for Anka to strike. Finally, Meilin heard the familiar swoosh of the quarterstaff swinging through the air, and stepped to the side just as it hit the ground. She stomped down, pinning the staff between her boot and the dirt, then performed a spinning roundhouse kick, knocking it loose from Anka’s grip. Slowly, it came into view.

Meilin grinned. “Come on, Anka. You can show yourself. The fight is over.”

“Not yet,” Anka said. “Would you stop fighting just because you didn’t have a weapon?”

Meilin faced the direction that she thought the voice was coming from. “I don’t want to hurt you,” she said. “Seriously, you should—”

With an oomph, Meilin found herself on the ground, the wind momentarily knocked out of her chest. She flipped back into a fighting stance and scanned the area. She still couldn’t see Anka. Smirking, she began to run in a circle, dragging her boot heels into the dry ground. She was creating a small dust storm.

Finally, she saw something waver before her. Then Anka coughed. “There you are,” Meilin said, running after her.

Anka took off toward the same tree that Meilin had leaped into moments before. She reached the trunk, then quickly scampered up the bark before disappearing into the leaves. Meilin stopped and placed her hands on her hips. She’d never seen Anka move that quickly before. She wondered if her sudden increase in speed was thanks to her spirit animal.

“Let’s call this one a draw,” Meilin said, still searching the tree. “I’m tired, and our dinner is getting cold. The only thing worse than hot grub stew is cold grub stew.”

“Deal,” a voice said behind her.

Meilin spun around to find Anka standing there with the quarterstaff in her hand. Its end hovered underneath Meilin’s chin, ready to strike. A sly smile sat on the now visible Anka’s face.

“Remind me not to spar with you again without Jhi’s help,” Meilin said, pushing the staff away from her. “How did you get out of the tree and around me without me seeing or hearing you?”

Anka shrugged. “You’ve been good at fighting your whole life. I’ve been good at hiding.” They began walking toward the campsite. “I can teach you if you’d like. Show you how to move better without being seen.”

Meilin shook Anka’s hand. “It’s a deal.”

Anka smiled at her once more. “I’m glad fate brought us together, Meilin. You’re almost like the sister I never had.”

Meilin grinned as well. Sister. That had a nice ring to it.

Meilin continued to train Anka and the militia whenever they camped for the night. Worthy even helped out with their training a couple times. The men were still wary of him, but they didn’t keep their distance like they had at the beginning of the trip. Meilin hoped that they were making progress toward becoming friends. Or if not friends, she at least hoped that the men could understand that the past was the past, and that Worthy was now a different person.

The days had grown colder the farther north they traveled. The winds strengthened as well, bringing freezing rain, then sleet and snow. She was glad that they’d come equipped with wool packs. That would help keep their clothes and food dry.

The weather was indeed brutal, almost as bad as when they’d trekked through Arctica in search of Suka the Polar Bear. If they were lucky, the conditions would also slow the Oathbound. Using Essix’s powers, Rollan had caught sight of them two days prior. They, too, were headed north.

The group paused at the edge of a large river. Fog hugged the ground, covering the frozen soil and rocky banks. Across from them stood the enchanted forest, Wilcoskov.

“Why do they call it enchanted?” Abeke asked, sliding off her horse.

“I’m not really sure,” Worthy said. “There used to be rumors that an ancient order lived in the forest. They practiced dark magic, using the bones of children in their potions.” He shrugged. “At least, that’s what my tutors used to tell me when I misbehaved.”

“According to my brothers, the forest is filled with the ghosts of the Crimson Raiders,” Conor added. “As punishment for their crimes against Eura, the royal family banished the warriors to the forest. They supposedly froze to death within hours, but their tortured spirits remained tied to the forest for all eternity.”

“Knowing the Greencloaks, they could have started the rumor about the forest being enchanted,” Meilin said. “They probably assumed it would be a good way for people to stay out and away from Gransfen’s grave.”

“There’s only one way to find out for sure,” Abeke said, leading her horse to the militiamen. “This is as far as you all go,” Abeke said to Albert. “And you can take these horses with you. It’ll be easier for us to travel without them.”

“That’s the first good news I’ve heard all week,” Rollan said, sliding off his own mount. He landed on the ground with a thud and the horse nickered. It sounded as if it was laughing at him.

Worthy slipped off his tunic and handed it to Albert. “Do me a favor,” he said. “Keep an eye out for my brother, will you? He can be a little hardheaded.”

“Sure thing.” Albert took the tunic. “Good luck, my lor—uh, Devin—I mean, Worthy.” He extended his hand to Worthy, and the boy eagerly took it for a handshake. “And stop by my home the next time you’re in town. My kids would love to hear more about your adventures.”

Worthy smiled at the man. As Meilin watched him, she realized that, for the first time on their journey, he wasn’t wearing his mask.

After the militiamen rode off, Conor began cutting some fallen logs in order to make a raft. With all of them working together, it only took a few minutes to collect the logs and lace them together.

Using a thick branch, Conor navigated them across the water. “This’ll probably be frozen solid in a few weeks,” Conor said, pushing the branch into the river bottom. “Good thing we didn’t try to swim across. We’d probably freeze to death.”

Once on the other side, they quickly scampered up the bank. “This isn’t a forest,” Rollan said. “It’s more like a graveyard. A place where trees go to die.”

Meilin didn’t want to agree with Rollan, but he was right. Wilcoskov was very creepy. The fog covering the ground was so thick it looked like they were stepping through rain clouds. Ahead of them, the naked trees stretched to the sky, with snow capping each of the bare branches. The wind blew through the skeletal trees, making a howling, almost unnatural sound.

Before entering the forest, they called forth their spirit animals, including Jhi. Meilin knew they’d need as much help as possible to get through the tangled maze. Essix flew ahead in search of the waterfall, while the others followed Briggan, Uraza, and Jhi.

They traveled for what seemed like hours. Meilin was sure that they were just walking in circles—each tree looked the same—though the animals never appeared to be confused. Dead, stiff moss covered all the trees, creating silver curtains cascading from the sky. Gnarled roots and thick, twisted branches blocked them from all sides, making the journey that much slower. They couldn’t make it ten paces without someone tripping on something, or being sideswiped by thorns or huge burrs. Somehow, the wind seemed to blow from all sides all at the same time, never giving them a break from the frigid chill.

Finally, Essix returned, landing on a tree in front of the other animals. After squawking a few times, she took flight again. The other animals continued moving forward.

“I think that means we’re going in the right direction,” Rollan said, his teeth chattering.

They kept moving, walking through lunchtime. The wet, cold air had somehow made it through Meilin’s leather boots and wool socks, the chill digging deeper with every step. She walked beside Jhi, in the hopes that the animal would keep her warm. Rollan had mocked her at first ... before finally huddling against the giant panda as well.

Sometime later, Meilin jolted to a stop as a foul stench hit her nose.

“That is dis-gust-ing,” Rollan said, covering his mouth. “And I thought this place couldn’t get any worse.”

“Over here,” Conor said. Using his ax blade, he juttied toward an animal carcass. “I think this is what’s causing the smell.” He turned it over, and a new wave of foulness hit them. “Yep, this is it.”

“What type of animal is that?” Meilin asked, stepping closer. The huge creature had been ripped open, with half its flank already devoured. She could still see the claw and teeth marks in its skin. As she circled it, trying to get a better look, she noticed another gaping hole in the animal. It looked as if it had been ripped apart. Two broken tusks protruded from its snout. What remained of its gray, coarse fur was matted with dried blood.

“There are two more carcasses over here,” Worthy said. “They smell like Rollan’s feet.”

“Ha-ha,” Rollan said dryly.

“Is it native to Eura?” Anka asked Conor.

He shrugged. “I’ve never seen it before.”

“Me neither,” Worthy said. “It looks like some type of huge hog. Or perhaps a boar.”

“I think we should leave,” Abeke said. She had drawn her bow and nocked an arrow, and was cautiously spinning around in place. Uraza stood beside her, crouched low to the ground, almost hidden by the fog. “Those carcasses were killed recently.”

Meilin took a step backward, and stumbled. Waving the fog away, she saw a line of deep, massive paw tracks.

“We’re in some animal’s lair,” Abeke continued. “We need to leave before it returns.”

Then Briggan growled. “Too late,” Conor said, his gloved hands tightly gripping the handle of his ax. “Briggan senses something. I do, too.”

Then they heard a branch snap. And then another after that.

“This way,” Anka said, moving toward a group of trees. “I’ll hide us.”

As quietly as they could, they made their way to Anka. After a second, they turned silver and brown, blending into the dying trees and moss behind them.

All the while, the sounds of crunching leaves and tree limbs grew closer. Something howled. Something close.

“Don’t even breathe,” Abeke whispered.

Slowly, five brown bears appeared out of the fog. As they growled at one another, Meilin could feel Rollan flinch beside her. The bears were gigantic—at least as large as Jhi—with thick coarse fur covering their hulking bodies.

The bears lumbered farther into their lair. The largest of them sniffed at one of the carcasses, then let out a wailing roar. Frothy drool dripped from its jaw and onto the ground. On the other side of her, Meilin could hear Worthy’s ragged breaths, and she knew it wasn’t from the cold.

A second, smaller bear approached the largest one, sniffing the air. The animals turned toward Meilin and the others. They growled, spewing more drool across the frozen ground.

“I think they can see us,” Worthy whispered.

The three other bears joined the first two. They all began to paw at the ground, letting off a succession of grunts.

“Maybe they’re just pawing at the ground to stay warm,” Rollan offered.

Then, letting off a deafening roar, the bears charged toward the trees. Their trees.

“Run!” Abeke screamed.

They took off, thrashing through the woods. The bears followed close behind. The entire forest seemed to shake thanks to the bears thundering paws. At first, Meilin had been worried that Jhi would be too slow, but the great panda was easily outpacing her, only pausing to make sure she was keeping up.

“We can’t run like this forever,” Rollan said. “Let’s take to the trees.”

“The branches are too low,” Conor said. “They might be able to climb after us.”

“No, over there!” Worthy said, pointing to a large tall evergreen to their right. Its lower branches had already been stripped by something, leaving nothing but exposed, clawed bark until halfway up the tree.

“Aren’t you worried about what made those marks on that tree?” Rollan asked.

“I’ll worry about that later,” Worthy replied as he extracted his claws and began climbing the tree. Anka quickly climbed up behind him.

“Jhi, can you help the rest of them up?” Meilin asked. She glanced behind her. The bears were still charging, their wails ringing through the forest. “Abeke first. Then she can give us cover.”

Jhi lumbered to the base of the tree, then held out her paws. Abeke nodded, called Uraza back in passive, then took off toward the panda. She leaped into the panda’s outstretched paws. Jhi flung her high into the air, past Worthy and Anka. Abeke grabbed on to a branch and pulled herself up. As soon as she was sitting, she whipped an arrow from her quiver and began firing at the bears. The arrows found their mark but did not puncture the bears’ thick hides. However, they at least slowed down.

Meilin was the last into the tree. As soon as she grabbed a branch, she called Jhi back to her. The black-and-white mark appeared on the back of her hand just as the bears reached the base of the tree.

The animals raked their claws over the tree trunk, but were too large to climb it. Then they rammed the tree, over and over, causing snow and small branches to rain down from above. Abeke almost fell after one attack, but Conor was able to catch her and pull her back onto the branch at the last second.

“Thanks,” Abeke said. She slipped her bow back over her shoulder. “No point in wasting any more arrows.”

“So now what are we supposed to do?” Anka asked.

Meilin shrugged. “We wait. And hope that the tree outlasts the bears.”

THE WATERFALL

THE BEARS RAMMED THE TREE FOR ALMOST AN HOUR. The trunk bent and sighed with each attack, but didn't break. Eventually, the bears tired of this, and their attacks slowly dwindled. But instead of leaving, they curled up around the tree, content to wait the humans out. It seemed the bears knew Conor and the others couldn't remain in there forever.

Conor wasn't sure how long they ultimately stayed in the tree. Day had turned to night before the bears finally disappeared back into the fog. But even then, they waited a full two hours before venturing down, just to be safe.

Conor decided to go down first. Once he reached the ground, he released Briggan. The wolf stepped forward and sniffed the air. After a few seconds, he seemed satisfied that the threat had disappeared and returned to Conor's side.

"Come on down," Conor said. "I think it's safe."

"Hopefully the Oathbound will run into those bears as well," Rollan said, sliding down the tree.

"Has Essix seen them?" Conor asked.

Rollan shook his head. "That's what worries me. They're no longer on the road to the forest. So either they turned around, or they're already here and hidden from Essix's view."

“Keep your eyes open, Uraza,” Abeke said. “We need to be on the lookout for both animals and Oathbound.”

“And ghosts,” Worthy mumbled.

Following their spirit animals, they continued on in what they hoped was the direction of the waterfall. They didn’t dare light a torch—they didn’t want to draw any unwelcome attention. Using Briggan’s senses, Conor took the lead, trying to help navigate them past any unseen obstacles. Worthy only tripped twice. Conor took this as a positive.

“We should stop for the night,” Anka finally said. “It’s getting too difficult to see. Plus, I don’t want to stumble into another den of those wild bears by accident.”

They all agreed. Finding a large outcropping of boulders, the team hastily made camp. Conor offered to keep first watch. He knew he wouldn’t be able to sleep anyway.

Conor had heard stories about the great Euran wildcat all his life. She was second only to Briggan in fame. Many towns and villages had flown her likeness on their official banners and flags, in the hopes that she would bring good luck—such as protection from wild animals or a good harvest. Conor couldn’t believe he was actually close to seeing the grave of the real beast. He didn’t like all the fighting and politics associated with being a Greencloak, but he loved the adventure and the thrill of discovering new things. Even with everything that had happened, he didn’t want to go back to his old life as a shepherd and servant boy.

Once morning came, the group packed up and continued through the forest. As the day wore on, the roar of falling water grew louder. The sound seemed to propel them forward, encouraging them to scamper through the forest at a quicker pace.

Finally, the forest opened up, revealing that they were standing at the top of a huge valley. They gasped at the sight. Sunlight reflected brilliantly off the water below, forcing them to shield their eyes. To their left, a large thundering waterfall cascaded down a fragmented cliff face, creating a thick, white mist where it joined with a swirling pool. The rushing waters churned within the cove; Conor could make out huge, jagged rocks and massive boulders poking through the surface. The water seemed to thrash around the small bay before continuing downstream along a twisting path to deeper parts of the forest.

Conor cupped his hands over his eyes to get a better look at the valley. There, at the banks of the river, were blooming red and yellow flowers. He rubbed his eyes, just to be sure they were working properly, then looked again. There even appeared to be fruit trees down at the bottom of the falls, lush with green leaves. How could that be? How could anything grow in this environment, with all that snow and ice?

Then he realized that the valley had no snow and ice. The landscape of ice and dead trees faded away about a quarter of the way from the base of the valley, replaced with wide trees and other wildlife.

“Guys, it’s not snowing down there,” he said. “See the plants and flowers?”

They all leaned forward to take a closer look. “That’s impossible,” Abeke said. She shook a small, ice-covered branch beside her, dumping freshly fallen snow to the ground. “How can it be freezing up here, and a paradise down below?”

“Some rumors say that the black wildcat breathed fire when she was really mad,” Worthy said. “When she hissed and spat, she’d be liable start forest fires. Maybe some of that heat is still around.”

Meilin rolled her eyes. “Or more than likely, we’re close to a geyser or fault line that keeps that area warm.”

“Maybe that’s why they called it an enchanted forest,” Anka said. “It would have certainly appeared magical to people not used to sights such as this.”

“I don’t care what they called it, and I don’t care why it’s warm,” Rollan said. “I just want to get down there so I can feel my fingers and toes again.”

They slowly made their way down into the valley, traversing roots and outcroppings of boulders. As they continued down, Conor began removing layers of his warm clothes. By the time they reached the bottom, they had all shed their heavy fur coats. The rumble of the waterfall was so loud that they had to yell in order to hear one another.

“I’m betting there’s a cave somewhere behind the falls!” Meilin bellowed. “But what’s the best way to get to it?”

Abeke picked up a small piece of wood and tossed it into the water. It bobbed up and down in a frenzy as it was quickly swept downstream. “We won’t be able to swim to it. There’s no way we could fight against that current.”

Conor was relieved to hear her say that. While he could make do in the water, he wasn’t the best swimmer. Worthy seemed to be just as relieved by Abeke’s observation.

“Maybe there’s another way around,” Rollan said. “Here comes Essix now, to save the day.” Then Rollan grew still, and Conor knew he was slipping into the falcon’s mind.

Conor looked up to see Essix’s brown wings stretched wide. She slowly spiraled down into the valley, soaring over the team’s heads. Tucking her wings into herself, she dove into the waterfall. For a moment, Conor was worried that the strong, pummeling water would send her crashing into the rocks below. But then Essix emerged from the other side, not a feather out of place.

“Yeah, it looks like there’s an entrance back there,” Rollan said, shaking his head. “There’s a small ledge that leads to a cave behind the waterfall. It’s narrow, but I think we can make it.” He pointed to a rocky land ramp leading to the cliff wall. “That’s the way up.”

They followed Rollan as he shrugged off his pack. “Be careful,” he said, reaching the face of the cliff a few moments later. “The ledge is covered with moss and lichen, and slick from all the water.”

The rest of them removed their packs, only taking what was essential. Meilin hesitated after removing her pack, almost as if she was going to pull something from it, but left it on the ground with the others. Conor offered Briggan a leftover piece of jerky from that morning’s breakfast, then called the wolf into passive state. He didn’t want to take the chance of Briggan losing his footing and falling into the river. Briggan was strong, but that current would have been too much for even him to swim against.

One by one, they climbed onto the narrow ledge, their backs pressed against the rough, uneven cliff face. Conor’s toes hung over the edge. Now was not a great time to have large feet.

“I wish we had some rope to tie ourselves together with,” Meilin said. “Maybe we could use some of the vines from the forest.”

“We’ll be fine,” Rollan said, slowly edging along. “Just don’t look down.”

Of course, Conor chose right then to glance below him. His stomach twisted and churned just as much as the river beneath them.

Conor was halfway across when they heard a rumbling sound.

“What is that?” Anka asked. “More bears?”

“No, it’s much closer,” Meilin said. “It almost sounds like it’s coming from the—duck!”

Conor covered his face as a wave of bats streamed from behind the waterfall. They were small, but loud—their shrieks even blocked out the roaring water.

“Keep moving forward,” Abeke yelled, shielding her face with her arm. “We have to make it to the cave.”

Just then, another sharp scream pierced the sky. But this wasn’t an animal. It was a distinctly human voice.

“Rollan!” Meilin yelled.

Conor opened his eyes to see Rollan flailing below them, his arms outstretched as he plummeted toward the bubbling water. Rollan was heading right for one of the largest—and sharpest—of the boulders.

Maybe Rollan sensed what was ahead. Ceasing his flailing, he pulled himself into a ball. Then, when the time was right, he kicked out against the cliff and dove cleanly into the water. By pushing himself away from the wall, he was able to avoid the largest of the rocks.

“Yay!” Conor cheered. “I thought he was a goner.”

“It’s not over yet,” Anka yelled. “Look!”

To their horror, Rollan was thrashing around the water, fighting against the current, but he was losing steam.

“Hold on to something, Rollan!” Abeke yelled.

Rollan turned, trying to grab a boulder, but he slipped past it and continued down the river. He pivoted again, trying to grasp another rock, but instead smashed into it. Rollan was visibly shaken by the impact, his head rolling around on his neck.

“I’m going in,” Meilin said. She pressed her hands against the rock wall, preparing to launch herself off.

“No, you can’t,” Abeke said. “You’re not strong enough!”

Meilin was furiously shaking her head. “He’ll drown if I don’t go.”

“No, you’ll both drown,” Worthy said. “But I won’t.” And with that, Worthy let off a ferocious howl and leaped off the cliff. With his red cloak billowing behind him, he almost looked like he was flying as he dove into the water.

Worthy disappeared into the frothy haze, and for a second, no one saw him. Then he emerged, spitting water as he did.

“Hold on, Rollan!” Conor yelled. “Keep fighting! Worthy’s coming for you!”

Worthy paused for long enough to get his bearings, then sped toward Rollan, his arms and legs propelling him through the water. He caught the boy just before he was about to get pulled into the twisting current and dragged farther into the forest. Worthy handed Rollan something. It looked like a black vine. And then, very slowly, Worthy turned his body and powered through the white-capped current. Conor realized he was holding his breath as he watched his friends battle back to dry land.

Finally, Worthy and Rollan reached the bank. Conor and the others crawled off the ledge and rushed to them.

Jhi appeared with a flash by Rollan’s side before Meilin had even reached him. The panda licked him a few times, but he waved her away. “I’m fine,” he said. “Just need ... to catch ... my breath.” He pointed a shaky finger at Worthy. “Help him.”

Worthy lay sprawled out on his back, his mask slightly askew. “I. Hate. Water,” he said as the panda licked his face. “But I think I hate panda spit more.”

“Worthy, that was amazing!” Conor said, kneeling beside his friend. Worthy had a few scratches, but otherwise seemed okay. “I can’t believe you did that!”

“It was also very brave,” Meilin said, much more quietly. She placed her hand on the Redcloak’s shoulder. “Thank you.”

“Yeah, Worthy, thanks for giving me a hand back there,” Rollan said, still lying on his back. He paused, his lips twisting into a smile, then added, "Or I guess I should say, thanks for giving me a tail."

Worthy finally stood up. "Not another word," he warned, straightening his mask. "Or I'll throw you back in myself." But then he placed his hands on his hips in a heroic pose. "And you're welcome."

"Do you want to change clothes?" Abeke asked, nodding toward their discarded packs. "Are you cold?"

"I'll be fine," Worthy said. "Plus, there's no way I'm taking off this cloak."

They all fell silent for a second. Conor was sure that they were all thinking about their abandoned green cloaks.

Meilin helped Rollan to sit up. "Your cloak is ripped," she said, fingering the brown fabric. "You should change into something dry."

"I'll be fine," Rollan said. "It's not even that cold down here."

"No, seriously." Meilin walked to her pack, then carried it over to Rollan. She slowly rummaged through it. "I think I have something you'd be more comfortable in."

She pulled out his green cloak.

For a moment, Rollan seemed speechless. He took the cloak from her, running his hands along it. Then he brought it to his nose, smelling it to confirm it was his. "But I thought it was too dangerous to keep this," he finally said.

"I know," Meilin replied. "But we're Greencloaks. We shouldn't be ashamed of who we are." She helped unfasten the brown cloak from around his neck, then tossed it aside. "I think we'd all feel a little better with a reminder of Tarik on this journey. We all miss him, too."

BOND TOKENS

WORTHY HAD NO IDEA WHY HE LEAPED OFF THE CLIFF to save Rollan. Worthy hated water. And now his beautiful red cloak was drenched, making it twice as heavy.

As he wrung out the fabric, he told himself that he'd jumped to save the Heart of the Land tied around Rollan's neck, but he knew he was lying to himself. As much as he didn't want to admit it, these Greencloaks were growing on him. He actually liked Rollan, bad jokes and all.

Prior to joining the Redcloaks, he'd always had trouble making friends. When he was younger, other kids had played with him only because they were forced to by their parents in order to gain favor with his father. Similarly, when he was a Conqueror, the only reason that Zerif put up with him was because of his father's importance and hefty monetary donations.

But these four—Conor, Abeke, Meilin, and Rollan—they genuinely cared for one another. They liked spending time together. And now, he liked spending time with them, too. He even liked Anka, when he remembered she was there.

Once he and Rollan had rested from their dip in the water, they tried to scale the cliff again. This time, they tied themselves to one another using black vines found in the valley forest. Rollan looked as if he was going to make another joke about Worthy's tail, but one look from him made Rollan reconsider.

Worthy took the lead this time. With his claws, he had a better chance of holding on to the cliff if someone fell and tried to drag them all down.

"How much farther?" Anka yelled as they passed behind the waterfall.

"Almost there," Worthy called back. Once behind the waterfall, the ledge widened, making it big enough for him to walk without hugging the wall. Very little sunlight was able to stream through the falls. The ledge was dark, so he waited for a moment to let his eyes adjust. Eventually, he noticed that the overhang grew even wider as it approached what looked like the cave entrance.

He froze once he was at the opening. "Whoa," he murmured.

Before Worthy stood the largest statue he'd ever seen—and being the son of the former Earl of Trunswick, he'd seen plenty. The sculpture was similar to the illustration of Gransfen and the mighty Wilco from the journal they'd read at the Howling House. Carved from what looked like pure black obsidian, Gransfen held the famed Wildcat's Claw in his hands, pointing it at an unknown enemy. Wilco, nearly as large as the man, stood on her hind legs, her claws ready to maul their unseen foe.

At first, Worthy thought the statue had been built all the way to the top of the cave. But after noting the small boulders and crushed rocks lying at the base, he looked again. The entrance had begun to cave in. It was only the statue—literally, Gransfen's broad shoulders—that kept the cave mouth open.

"Don't touch it," Anka said as the others joined them at the statue. "We don't want to accidentally cause a collapse. There's no telling how long we'd be trapped in here."

They slowly stepped past the statue. Conor released Briggan. The wolf scratched at the rocky ground then stepped farther into the cave, following Conor. The others released their animals as well, and a splash announced that Essix had soared through the waterfall. She landed on Rollan's shoulder and shook her feathers out, dousing him with water.

With her beak, she lifted up a small edge of Rollan's green cloak.

"Like it?" he asked.

The gyrfalcon squawked a reply. Rollan nodded. “Yeah, me too,” he said, following the others into the cave.

As the cavern narrowed, Conor pulled a torch from his waistband, and he and Briggan took the lead at the front. Worthy covered the rear, turning around every few minutes to make sure that they weren’t being followed. Now that his eyes were fully adjusted to the dark, he didn’t need as much light to see. But with the falls still roaring in their ears, he was afraid he wouldn’t hear someone sneaking up on them until it was too late.

The cave was a series of long, narrow tunnels, each connected end on end, and each growing smaller as they moved farther into the cliffside. Briggan and Uraza growled as their feet slipped on loose pebbles. Glancing above, Worthy noticed more bats. Thankfully, this bunch didn’t seem interested in waking up and attacking them.

“Yuck,” Conor said from up ahead. “I walked right into a spiderweb.” Then a second later, he added, “Sorry Meilin. I meant to say a mouse web.”

“Thanks,” she replied, with a little tremble in her voice. She placed her hand on Jhi, who barely fit through the narrowing spaces. Jhi rubbed her muzzle against Meilin, then gave her a friendly lick on the arm. Worthy couldn’t help but smile. Meilin was the finest warrior he’d ever met. How could someone so ferocious be afraid of spiders?

The long, dark cave dead-ended into a huge expanse. But it wasn’t a natural cavern—it looked like it had been hand-carved. Worthy ran his hands along the smooth wall. Something caught his attention. Someone—or something—had etched small intersecting ridges into the wall.

“Ouch!” Rollan yelled, falling over as Essix took flight from his arm. “There’s something in the middle of the room. It looks like a big, rectangular rock. Conor, can you bring the torch over here so I can get a better look?”

“Wait, try to light this first,” Abeke said, pulling a dusty, half-burned torch off the wall. “I think it will still catch.”

“There’s another torch over there,” Meilin called out.

Conor quickly lit the torches with a flint and some oil, illuminating the room.

Worthy stepped back to get a better view of the wall. It wasn't just random ridges. It was a drawing. No, a language. It looked like etchings of runes—ancient letters used by long-gone Euran civilizations.

“Can you read it?” Meilin asked him.

He shook his head. “I don't think so.” Worthy had been forced to learn a lot of languages, but he didn't remember any of his tutors showing him writing like this. The more he stared at it, however, the more he realized that some of the symbols were familiar.

“Guys, come take a look at this,” Rollan said.

Worthy and Meilin joined the others. Two matching, equally large slabs of rock sat in the middle of the room. They looked to be made of solid stone, but they didn't match the rocky makeup of the cavern walls.

“I think it's the same type of stone the statue was chiseled from,” Worthy said, kneeling to get a closer look. He placed his hands on the tablet, then pulled it back. The room was warm, but the slabs were as cold as the forest above them. “They're freezing,” he said. “How is that possible?”

“And how did they even get them through the cave?” Rollan asked. “Those things are massive. They're way too large to fit through all those winding tunnels and way too heavy to carry.”

Meilin took her torch and circled the slate. “I think there are hinges on this side,” she said.

“I see some, too,” Anka said from the other side. “It kind of looks like a door.”

“But how do you open it?” Rollan asked. “There aren't any handles.”

“Look around,” Abeke said, “There must be a switch or lever somewhere that will trigger it open.”

While the others started inspecting the cavern walls, pressing into the rock in the hope that they'd find a secret button, Worthy returned to the runes.

“I think this might be a message,” he said. “But it's old. I'm going to try to decipher it.”

The others searched the entire room while Worthy sat cross-legged in front of the wall. Using his claws, he wrote out possible translations into the rocky ground, but nothing seemed to make sense.

“Making any progress?” Anka asked, appearing beside him. Worthy jumped and let out a small scream.

“Sorry, didn’t mean to sneak up on you.” She pointed to the wall. “Any luck?”

He shrugged, then looked back at the words he’d drawn on the ground. “The closest I’ve come is: Each day must end, but the mighty shall rise again under a volcano’s roar.”

“That makes no sense,” Rollan said, pausing beside them.

Worthy snorted. “You want to give it a try?”

Abeke aimed an arrow toward a natural hollow in the ceiling. She released it, hitting the hole spot-on, but nothing happened. “Essix, do you mind retrieving my arrow?” she asked the falcon. She returned her bow to her shoulder. “Keep working on the translation, Worthy,” she said. “I have faith in you. It could be the instructions on how to open the doors.”

“Or it could be a warning that we should leave them shut.” But even as he said it, Worthy was sitting back down to study the markings.

The rest of the Greencloaks searched the entire room again. Rollan even tried jumping on the doors, but all he accomplished was slipping and hurting his other foot.

He sighed as Jhi slowly licked his ankle. “This is pointless,” he said. “Maybe there’s another cave we missed. Or a switch outside of the room.”

“Worthy, can you repeat the message?” Abeke asked, shooting another arrow at the ceiling. “Maybe we’ll have better luck if we work together.”

Worthy sighed, then repeated the message: “Each day must end, but the mighty shall rise again under a volcano’s roar.”

Abeke walked over to read Worthy’s translation. “The first part reminds me of an old saying from my village. When someone dies, the elders sometimes say that the deceased’s ‘sun has set.’ Their day has ended. It’s a poetic way of talking about death.” She glanced at the door. “I think the message is saying that Gransfen and Wilco are behind those doors. They’re waiting to rise again.”

Meilin snapped up, suddenly alert. “And on the boat, on the way from Amaya, Worthy said the wildcat’s roar was as loud as an erupting volcano.”

“One thousand erupting volcanoes,” Worthy corrected.

“Yes, yes,” she said. “My point is, you learned that as a kid, right? That can’t be a coincidence. It must mean something important.”

“I was thinking the same,” Rollan said. “When volcanoes blow up, they’re like earthquakes, right?” He slipped his hand inside his shirt and pulled out the Heart of the Land. “Maybe I can try using the gila monster’s earthquake power.”

“Are you daft?” Worthy asked. “You’d cause a cave-in. Did you bash your head in when you fell into the water?”

“I said maybe,” Rollan stressed, returning the amulet to the safety of his shirt. “I’m just throwing out options. We have to do something.”

“Volcanoes also spew lava when they erupt,” Meilin said. “Fire. Heat.” She held up the torch in her hands, inspecting its flame. “Maybe we should heat up the doors. You said those slabs were cold, right? Maybe warmth will trigger the doors to open.”

“So ... if we set the doors on fire, they’ll open up, and Gransfen and Wilco will rise again?” Conor asked.

“Just to be clear, I’m not exactly sure that my translation is correct,” Worthy said. “For all we know, an actual volcano could be waiting for us on the other side.”

Meilin stepped forward. Her torch illuminated her face as she walked to the center of the room. Her hair was damp from sweat, and her skin was covered in grime from the cavern walls. “Only one way to find out.”

Meilin tossed the torch onto the slabs. It bounced twice before coming to a stop. Conor and Abeke followed her lead, pitching their torches on the black slates as well.

At first nothing happened.

Then thick gray smoke began to seep out through the seams between the doors.

“It’s the volcano!” Worthy yelled.

“Enough about the volcano,” Meilin said. “Look, something’s happening.”

The doors in the floor had begun to change color, quickly shifting from their dark ink-black color to a fiery orange-red hue. There was a large hiss and then a pop. The doors slowly began to creak open.

More smoke spilled out as the doors opened up. Worthy could see what looked like long stone columns rising up from below, pushing the doors open from the inside. With a thud, they slammed against the floor, shaking the room. Small rocks fell from above, but the room didn't collapse.

Something was rising out of the hole in the floor.

Worthy watched as a large, gleaming box slowly emerged up into the cavern. It was the same deep black color as the slabs, chiseled with careful precision. All across the edges, scenes of a great cat performing heroic acts glittered, carved in relief into the stone. Once completely out of the ground, the black box creaked to a halt. The smoke thinned out, and the red doors returned to their dark color.

"It's a coffin," Anka said. "It must be the final resting place of Gransfen and the wildcat."

Now that it was all the way out, they could see dull yellow and red jewels covering the rectangular container on all sides. Conor picked up one of the still-lit torches and held it over the coffin. The jewels lit up like stars in the midnight sky.

Worthy noticed something else gleaming on top of the box. Whatever it was, it was covered with soot and dirt. Worthy blew across the top, revealing a silver blade. A thick leather-wrapped hilt shone through the soot, and a large yellow stone, cut into an oval shape, was embedded in the center of the hilt.

The Wildcat's Claw.

Anka started to step toward it, but Rollan stopped her. "I think Conor or Worthy should pick it up," he said. "It's a Euran gift. Someone from this land should activate it."

Conor looked at Worthy. "You deciphered the code," he said. "You should take it."

Worthy shook his head. "Are you sure?"

Abeke placed her hand on his shoulder. "Don't be afraid," she said.

It wasn't that Worthy was afraid. It was more like, he didn't know if he was actually worthy enough to hold the sword. Gransfen and Wilco had been the protectors of an entire land. He was just a kid in a white mask and red cloak trying to make up for his past mistakes.

"Do it, Worthy," Conor said. "I believe in you. We all do."

Worthy nodded, his eyes stinging behind his mask. Then he reached out and grabbed the hilt. The leather hadn't been used in aeons, but it was supple, like it had just been oiled. He lifted the sword and was surprised by how light it was, given its size. It was easily the largest, longest sword he'd ever wielded, but it felt as weightless as a training foil.

He adjusted his grip on the sword and took a few swipes. The metal almost sang as it sliced through the dusty, smoky air.

"Look here," Conor said, pointing. "There's a small incision at the base of the tomb. I think you're supposed to place the sword here."

Worthy began sliding the sword into the opening. The sword sang again as its steel blade scraped against the black stone. Worthy felt it lock in place, and slowly let go.

The room began to rumble, and more rocks and debris fell from the ceiling. The hilt of the sword began to glow. Worthy took a closer look. He realized it wasn't the metal underneath the leather that was glowing. It was the yellow jewel at the center of the sword. If the gems on the tomb were stars, then the jewel on the sword was the shining sun, beaming brightly enough to blind them all.

Smoke began to surround them, this time seemingly coming from all sides of the room, as the jewel shone brighter and brighter. Then the jewel flashed, causing Worthy to cover his eyes.

When he opened them, he saw the image of a man beginning to form from the smoke. Well, not a man. More like a giant. Worthy had to look up to see his face. The man's beard hung to his belt buckle. His face was rough and weathered, similar to the cliff they had traversed, but there was a lightness in his eyes.

"Gransfen," Worthy whispered. He stole a glance at the others. They all stood at attention, with their backs straight and arms taut. Worthy adjusted his body so he looked the same.

“Is he talking yet?” Meilin whispered. “We can’t hear him if he is.”

“No,” Worthy said. “Nothing—”

Who is mighty enough to raise the Wildcat’s Claw? Who is brave enough to wake me from my eternal slumber? Who is—

Gransfen’s eyes became pinholes in the smoke. Is this the Great Briggan? And Uraza and Jhi? He looked up at the nook in the ceiling where Essix rested. This is most unexpected.

The man’s words felt like they were pounding in Worthy’s head—like a thousand erupting volcanoes. He looked back at the others, waiting for one of them to respond, but only Conor’s expression had changed, his mouth now hanging open.

No matter. Again, who raised my sword? Was it you? Gransfen had leveled a smoky finger at Worthy, who stood closest to the blade.

Worthy gulped, then nodded. “Yes, I raised the sword.” He puffed his chest out and placed his hands on his hips. Hopefully that made him look more commanding. “I am Worthy, of the Redcloaks.”

Gransfen peered at him, a puzzled look coming to his face. What are you? You do not look Euran. Those eyes ... I would recognize the gaze of a wildcat anywhere.

“I am of Euran blood,” Worthy said. Slowly, he removed his mask, setting it on the cavern floor at his feet. “But I am also more. I’m part human ... and part wildcat.”

That seemed to please the giant man. The wildcat is a noble beast. Ferocious. Loyal. Lowering his hand, Gransfen placed his palm against the stone coffin. Wilco died protecting me. She died protecting Eura. I was never the same without her. My heart shattered like ice against rock. He shook his head. I hoped that death would ease my pain. It has not.

“What’s he saying?” Rollan asked.

“He’s talking about Wilco,” Conor said.

I sense a strange presence. He leveled his gaze on Rollan. A bond token is here, one that’s different from ours.

“Rollan, show him the amulet,” Worthy said. “I think he wants to see the Heart of the Land.”

Rollan quickly pulled the amulet from off his neck. As he held it up, the amber stone began to glow. It pulsed in tandem with the yellow jewel of the Wildcat's Claw.

Gransfen let off a loud, booming sigh. Who is its owner?

"A legendary warrior, like you," Conor said. "These were gifted to our ... our army, but they were hidden away for a reason before we could use them. Do you know why?"

Perhaps because of their strength. Bond tokens are powerful, but also deadly when placed in the wrong hands. Gransfen ran his hand over his long, flowing beard. Long ago, Wilco and I protected Eura from the greatest of dangers. But there were some threats so treacherous that even we could not defeat them alone. There were men who used distrust and division to turn leaders into sheep. To transform the just into the wicked, the sure-footed into timid fools. These men would use fear and hatred to create entire armies. They would channel rage and anger into weapons of destruction and death.

Harmony, and only harmony, could defeat a danger like this.

The ultimate harmony between human and animal. The ultimate trust.

It was Wilco who led me to Suka the Great Polar Bear. There in the frozen wasteland of Arctica, towering above me, Suka showed me the crystal talisman hanging from her claw. Holding it in her massive paws, she displayed its might, leveling a snowcapped mountain one hundred paces away with the slightest wave of her arms. I held out my arms, waiting to receive the gift of such power.

But she refused to turn over her talisman. Instead, she instructed me to create one of my own. My bond token, like her crystal bear talisman, would amplify Wilco's powers. It would be a weapon capable of defeating the largest of armies. If used properly, Wilco and I would be unstoppable.

But it would take true trust, Suka cautioned. One shred of doubt between either Wilco or myself would rip the mystic bonds holding us together. We would be lost to each other forever, both consumed by a cloud of despair that would only be soothed by death itself. Others had tried, she warned. Others stronger and braver than us. Many had failed and had been henceforth doomed to eternal madness.

And even if we were successful, the Great Polar Bear warned, we would have to guard our token for the rest of our lives. The token's power could be tapped by anyone, not just me. Not just another of the Marked. It could be harnessed whether Wilco was in passive state or not. It could be used by anyone, anywhere, at any time. Its power would live on forever, even after we had departed this world. But if it were destroyed during our lifetimes, we would immediately perish as well, as it was an extension of our bond.

I remember looking at Wilco, my partner. My friend. Her yellow eyes gleamed. She roared into the white, frozen abyss. She was ready. So was I.

I drew my sword, forged with my own two hands, and performed the ritual. I could feel the power flowing between us, rolling like a mist over a swampy land, and I watched as it folded itself into my blade. The yellow stone, a gift from my mother, began to shine like it harnessed the fervor of an everlasting sun.

And then, it was done. The mighty Wildcat's Claw had been forged anew. And with it, we cut down our enemies and feasted on their burned, charred corpses.

Worthy cringed as he said this. That part didn't seem too appealing at all.

Gransfen looked down at the team. Those that stand before me, are you unified?

"Say yes," Conor said to the others.

"Yes," they all mumbled.

Are you worthy of these gifts?

"Yes," they said again, watching Conor for the clues.

And are you willing to die to protect one another, and these gifts, even if it leads to your deaths?

"Yes," they said.

Then take the Wildcat's Claw, and fight for all of Erdas. Use its power, and let the mighty wildcat roar once more.

Worthy nodded. "We will," he said as Gransfen's image began to fade away. "I promise." He wrapped his fingers around the sword and pulled it back out of the cleft.

"Yikes!" Rollan said as the ground began to shake. The stone coffin was receding back underground, the air alive with a soft hiss as steam and smoke once again surrounded them. Then the large slate doors turned fire-red again and began to creak shut, seemingly without anything acting on them to cause them to move.

Once the doors slammed closed, they returned to their black color. The room fell silent. Save for the sword in Worthy's hands, there was no clue that anything magical had happened at all.

"Did you guys hear any of what he said?" Worthy asked.

Rollan shook his head. "It was the same way in Amaya. Only people from the land of the gift can hear the hero's echo."

"The gifts are called bond tokens," Worthy said. "At least, I think that's what he said. He was kind of loud and boomy. My ears are still ringing a little."

"Bond tokens?" Abeke frowned. "I've never heard of that before."

"Actually, you have," Conor said. "They're kind of like the talismans from the Great Beasts." He quickly explained what Gransfen had told him and Worthy about the power of the bond tokens. "And they can be used by anyone, whether you're Marked or not."

"You said we could make these ourselves, right?" Meilin asked. "If that's the case, then why haven't the Greencloaks ever created them? They would be helpful in battle, especially when our spirit animals were still in passive state."

"The Greencloaks have always been secretive about information they consider dangerous," Anka reminded them. "Like the source of the bonding Nectar and the location of Stetriol." She ran a small finger along her chameleon's bumpy back. "Perhaps that's why the nations lost their faith in them."

"They were only doing what was right for Erdas," Abeke said.

"Tell that to all the people in Stetriol and everywhere else that got the bonding sickness, just because the Greencloaks weren't around to personally administer the Nectar," Rollan said. His words were hard and bitter. "Think of all the people who drank the Bile because it was the only way to cure their bonding sickness."

Worthy knew that Rollan was talking about his own mother. Unlike Worthy, Rollan's mother had taken the Bile for noble reasons. To try to cure herself, so she could find the son she'd been forced to abandon in Amaya.

"There are other reasons to not share that information," Conor said. "If a bond token is destroyed, both the human and the animal partner die. Think what would have happened if the Conquerors had known that during the war."

"Maybe that's why the Great Beasts were so protective about their talismans," Rollan said. "I would be, too, if I knew someone could come along and smash it, wiping me from existence."

"Yes, and that's if the technique to create one even worked in the first place," Worthy added. He had sat down and was using his cloak to shine the sword. "Gransfen said it required absolute trust between partners. All it would take was one thread of self-doubt to doom both the human and the animal. The bond would break between them. Shattered. Forever." He looked up. "Isn't that right, Conor?"

Conor was looking down at his own spirit animal, as were Meilin and Abeke. Even Rollan seemed to have a faraway look.

"I've had my bond broken before," Abeke finally said. "It isn't something that I'd hope for again."

"Yes," Worthy said. The blade was sharp, and he'd accidentally sliced a hole in his cloak. "But as long as there's complete trust between you and the animal—"

"We should move out," Meilin said, rising. "It will be dark soon."

Worthy looked as his friends, clearly troubled. Perhaps their bonds weren't as strong as he thought they were.

Briggan growled. A second later, so did Uraza.

Worthy stood up. He'd heard it, too. The crunch of pebbles against boot heels. The scrape of metal against rocky walls.

"Get ready, Greencloaks," Worthy whispered. "We're about to have company."

"It must be the Oathbound," Meilin said. "Any clue how many?"

Worthy tried to count all the different footsteps but quickly lost count. "A lot," he finally said. He looked at the others as their faces became stern. "So now what are we supposed to do?"

Abeke slipped her bow off and pulled an arrow from a quiver. “Now we fight.”

THE BATTLE

ABEKE INSTRUCTED CONOR AND MEILIN TO BLOW OUT the torches. Thanks to Briggan's powers, Conor's eyes immediately adjusted to the dark. Abeke had crouched at the opening of the cavern, her body low to the ground. "I'll take out as many as I can. But they'll break through eventually."

Conor pulled out his ax and bounced on his toes. Briggan seemed frisky as well, ready for action. "Try to be patient," he said to the Great Wolf. "Our time will come soon enough."

"Out of all the places to face off, it had to be deep down in an underground cave," Rollan said, patting the amulet underneath his shirt. "That means no earthquake powers for us."

Meilin turned to Worthy. "You seem to know all about the wildcat," she said. "Maybe you can figure out how to activate the Claw's powers."

"It would be great if it could magically transport people to safety." Rollan pulled a dagger from his belt, then another from his boot. "That would be really helpful right about now."

"Quiet," scolded Abeke. "They're almost here."

"Perhaps I should take the gifts," Anka whispered to Conor and Rollan. "If you all can lure enough of the Oathbound out of the passage and here into this room, I may be able to use my powers to slip by undetected."

Conor and Rollan looked at each other. “That’s probably a good idea,” Conor finally said. “Our first priority has to be protecting the bond tokens.”

“Yeah, but a very close second priority should be getting out of this alive,” Rollan added.

Worthy seemed to hesitate as he handed the sword to Anka. Conor had to admit, he looked at ease carrying it. It had made him seem more imposing. More inspiring.

“Do you want me to take the Heart of the Land as well?” Anka asked Rollan as the Wildcat’s Claw disappeared from sight. “I can smuggle it out, too.”

Rollan paused as well before shaking his head. “We should split them up, just in case.” He held up his arm, signaling Essix. “You’d better take this,” he said to the falcon, sliding the leather strap holding the amulet from around his neck. He tied it around one of the bird’s talons. “Now don’t get any fancy, heroic ideas,” he said to Essix. “If this turns ugly, you fly that amulet to safety as fast as you can.”

“If this turns ugly?” Meilin said. “We’re talking about an army of soldiers against six. It’s going to get ugly.”

“Meilin, honesty is a currency that doesn’t have to be spent all in one place,” Rollan said.

“I can see them,” Abeke whispered. “Be ready. They’re going to charge as soon as I start firing.”

Abeke closed one eye as she brought the bowstring to her cheek. She waited and waited ... and then released the arrow. A second later, an Oathbound soldier screamed in agony.

“Charge!” someone yelled from the tunnel. The footsteps turned into a thunderous roar.

That must have woken up the bats, because all of a sudden Conor heard them shrieking. Moments later, they spilled into the room in an enormous cloud, their black wings filling all the available space in the cavern.

Conor swiped at the bats with his ax, knocking two to the ground. Briggan snatched another out of the air, shaking it with his massive jaws before flinging it against the wall.

“I can’t see!” Abeke said. “They’re blocking my aim.” She quickly fired off three more arrows, then ducked as the Oathbound returned fire.

“Look alive, Greencloaks,” she said, retreating from the opening. “Here they come!”

The first wave of Oathbound stormed into the cavern. Many had arrows stuck in their arms and shoulders. Spirit animals rushed in with them.

Worthy yowled as he leaped toward a group of three. He quickly knocked two of them against the wall, but the other pierced Worthy’s side, cutting him through his thick red cloak. Worthy yelled, clawing the Oathbound across the arm. The man released a boa constructor, which quickly wrapped itself around Worthy’s neck.

“Hold on, Worthy! We’re coming!” Tapping into Briggan’s strength, Conor flew across the room, his boots barely touching the ground as he ran. He sliced one of the Oathbound with his ax as he passed by, then crashed into the group of soldiers surrounding Worthy, knocking them to the cavern floor. Rolling to his feet, Conor quickly sidestepped a swinging broadsword, then blocked a billy club aimed at his face.

“Ouch!” he yelled, looking down. A lynx had grabbed hold of his leg, right above his boot, sinking its teeth deep into Conor’s flesh.

Before he could shout for help, Briggan appeared, grabbing the animal by the neck. With a loud growl, it ripped the lynx away from Conor.

“Are you okay?” Conor asked, pulling Worthy to his feet. “Did the snake bite you?”

“No, more like I bit it,” Worthy said as he spat out a few yellow-green scales. “And I don’t care what anyone says. It doesn’t taste like chicken.”

More Oathbound rushed toward them. “Back to back,” he said to Worthy. “You take the eight on your side. I’ll take these six.”

“And how exactly is that fair?” Worthy asked, swiping at the men.

Across the room, Meilin and Rollan fought off another group of Oathbound. Meilin’s sword kept four of them at bay while Jhi reared up on her hind legs and swatted the men down. Rollan used both his daggers to simultaneously block and attack the Oathbound. Rollan had a cut against his cheek, but it didn’t look deep enough to slow him.

Conor didn't see Essix in the fray. He hoped that meant the falcon had gotten to safety.

"Oh, no!" Worthy yelled. "Anka's down!"

Conor looked in the direction that Worthy had pointed. Anka, no longer invisible, was slumped against the cavern wall, a stream of blood trickling down her face. The Wildcat's Claw had fallen from her grasp and lay untouched on the floor.

A woman with a ruby-red sword rushed toward Anka. The woman's brown braided hair flopped behind her as she ran.

"She's going for Anka," Conor said. "Come on!"

Conor and Worthy took off, pushing their way through the Oathbound warriors to try to reach Anka and the Wildcat's Claw first. A man with a longsword lunged at Worthy, but Conor jumped in the way, blocking the blade with his ax hilt before it reached Worthy. The warrior then smiled as a meerkat leaped from his back onto Conor's face.

Conor spun around, trying to keep the animal away from his eyes. The meerkat was small, but its claws were sharp. Conor screamed as it raked its paw across his forehead.

"Conor!" Worthy yelled.

"Forget about me," he yelled, dropping to the ground. "Protect Anka and the sword!" Conor rolled around, trying to dislodge the animal from his face. Although his eyes were closed, he could hear Briggan nearby, squaring off with the man with the longsword.

Finally, Conor slammed his head against the ground. It was like being hit in the face with a brick, but the maneuver successfully dislodged the animal. Rising to his feet, Conor kicked the meerkat across the room. Just before it was going to land, Uraza leaped into the air, snagging the beast.

"Bomilo!" the warrior shrieked, running after Uraza.

Conor turned to see that Worthy had made it to the Wildcat's Claw. He knelt before it, but hadn't yet picked it up.

A few paces away, the tall woman warrior stood with a garrison of soldiers behind her. The woman had placed the tip of her ruby-red sword right underneath the unconscious Anka's chin.

She snapped her fingers, and one of the men behind her raised a concave horn to his lips. A low wail echoed through the room. The Oathbound immediately stopped fighting.

“Put down your weapons,” the woman said, moving her blade closer to Anka’s throat. “This battle is over.”

THE WILDCAT'S ROAR

ABEKE WAS JUST ABOUT TO RELEASE ANOTHER ARROW when a loud horn reverberated throughout the room. The Oathbound warriors advancing toward her immediately stopped and began to pull back.

Why are they retreating? she wondered. Have we won? She looked at Uraza. The Great Leopard's purple irises showed the same confusion that must have been present on Abeke's face.

Her bow still in her hand, Abeke searched the cave for the others. Meilin and Rollan stood side by side, their weapons lowering slowly. Conor was in the process of setting his ax down on the ground.

Then she saw the woman. Tall and regal, she towered over Anka, a long red sword pointed at the Greencloak's throat. Abeke worried that the woman had killed her, but then she noticed Anka stirring a little.

"Perhaps you didn't hear me," the woman said, keeping her blade at Anka's neck while meeting Abeke's gaze. "Either lower your bow, or your friend loses her life."

Abeke stared at the woman, looking for any signs of bluffing or weakness. Gaudy rings circled each of the Oathbound's fingers, serving as a stark contrast to her otherwise drab uniform. The woman sneered, then moved the blade closer to Anka. The tip pierced Anka's skin, drawing a single drop of blood.

Abeke slowly released the tension in her bow. As she placed it on the ground, she noticed Worthy unbuttoning his cloak.

“Just proving that I’m unarmed,” he said as the cloak floated to the ground. She wasn’t sure, but she thought she saw the glint of a silver blade right before the red cloak fell over it.

Worthy then spun in a circle, just to prove his point. His black tail waved behind him.

“My, aren’t you a peculiar one?” the woman said. “Perhaps I’ll spare you after all. I could add you to my collection. Or perhaps I’ll make you my pet.”

“My name is Worthy,” he said defiantly. “Who are you?”

“I am Cordelia the Kind,” she said. “Haven’t you heard of me?”

Rollan snorted. “The trappers told us about you. You don’t sound very kind to me.”

One of the men pushed Rollan in the back, almost causing him to trip.

“Kindness, like beauty and power, is all a measure of perspective.” Removing the sword from Anka’s throat, she walked over to Worthy. “I could use this blade to sever your friend’s tail from his body,” she said. She smiled, then raised her foot and jammed it onto his black tail, grinding it into the rocky ground. Worthy howled, baring his teeth, but didn’t move to strike the woman.

“But wasn’t that a kinder gesture?” Cordelia said, batting her eyelashes.

“Leave him alone,” Abeke said. Beside her, Uraza growled.

Cordelia turned her attention back to Abeke. “Greencloaks, put your spirit animals away. Now.” Once they’d all complied—and Briggan, Jhi, and Uraza disappeared into flashes of color—the woman turned to a group of warriors to her right. “Bring them here,” the woman said. “But be careful. None of them are to be underestimated. If they’re bold enough to kill the emperor, think what they will do to you.”

Abeke jerked away from one of the warriors as he tried to grab her elbow. Holding her head high, she marched to join the others beside Worthy. “We didn’t kill the emperor.”

“Then why did you run?” Cordelia asked. “Why not remain at the Citadel and face trial?”

“The Greencloaks do not answer to bounty hunters like you,” Abeke said. “We heard about how you threatened all the towns in Eura during your search for us.” She shook her head. “Why did you terrorize those people? They’ve done nothing wrong.”

“Harboring fugitives and withholding information is a crime,” she said. “I was merely giving them incentive to cooperate.” She returned her sword to her belt. “And don’t worry, I only burned the homes of half those trappers. I’d threatened to destroy all their belongings if they failed me. Again, my kindness has no bounds.”

“The Oathbound aren’t a sovereign military,” Conor said. “You’re mercenaries. You don’t have the right to arrest people.”

“People are afraid. Scared of the Greencloak army that has already destroyed much of this land. They want us here to protect them. Who else is mighty enough to stand against the evil Greencloaks?” She twisted a ring around her finger. “The queen herself has welcomed our assistance in any way, especially when we deliver you to her in six wooden coffins.”

Abeke thought about what Gransfen had said. People, when afraid, would follow anyone. Even a group as twisted as the Oathbound were proving to be. And worse, people would do it willingly.

“But because I am so kind, here’s what I propose,” Cordelia continued. “If you turn over the two gifts you’ve located, I’ll allow three of you to live. You can spend the rest of your lives rotting in a cell.”

“We don’t have them,” Worthy said. “Essix took them both and escaped.”

“And you’ll never catch her,” Rollan added. “Both the gifts are long gone by now.”

Cordelia paused to consider this. Abeke realized that the woman didn’t know what the Wildcat’s Claw looked like. It was the only thing working to their advantage.

Cordelia spun on her heels, then marched to Anka. She knelt in front of her, her lips snarling. “If that is true, why were you trying to escape?” she asked Anka. “Do you have the gifts? Or are you just a coward that hides and runs instead of fighting?”

It only lasted for a moment, but Anka's eyes flashed to the ground, toward Worthy's feet.

"Silly Greencloak," Cordelia said. "Your eyes have already betrayed you." Cordelia rose, then started to move toward Worthy.

Just as she reached him, Worthy thrust his fist into the sky. The Oathbound drew their weapons, but Cordelia held up her hand.

"I have the Heart of the Land," Worthy said, his fist clamped shut. "Move another step, and I'll start an earthquake and bring this entire cave down."

"I don't believe you," she said. "You would kill everyone in here."

"That's better than letting you have the gifts," Worthy said.

Cordelia spun another of the gold rings around her finger. "Nothing is in your hand," she said. "You're lying."

"I guess there's only one way to find out," Worthy replied. His yellow eyes stared back at Cordelia, unblinking.

"Actually, there are two ways," she said. She nodded toward one of the Oathbound who was standing beside her. "Shoot him. Let's see what falls from his hand when his warm body hits the ground."

Worthy's eyes widened as the soldier raised his crossbow. "Fine. You want it? Take it!" He reached back and hurled his hand forward.

Cordelia and every other Oathbound spun and stared, searching for the invisible amulet as it tumbled through the air.

"Liar," she said after a moment, turning back around. "I knew—"

She stopped. Worthy's red cloak was draped across his arm. He held the Wildcat's Claw in his other hand.

"My, my, you really are full of surprises, aren't you?" She shook her head. "That's a nice sword. But how long do you think you'll last with it?" She took the crossbow from the Oathbound holding it and aimed it at Worthy's chest. "My kindness has run its course. Now, where are the gifts? I won't ask again."

Worthy tightened his grip on the sword and took a step forward, placing himself between the Greencloaks and the Oathbound. "Cordelia, let me introduce you to the Wildcat's Claw." As he said the name, the jeweled hilt began to glow, driving all the darkness from the cavern. "Not every gift is as small as an amulet."

She didn't lower her weapon. "Hand it over and I'll let you live." Then she paused. "From what I remember of Euran history, the famed black wildcat didn't have special armor powers like the Amayan gila monster. It couldn't stop arrows in midair."

"That's right," he said. "But haven't you heard of the wildcat's ROAR?"

As he said the words, the yellow jewel began to smoke. The sword vibrated in Worthy's hands as it gave off a low, deep rumble. There was a loud boom, and then fire spewed from the jewel like a geyser turned on its side, the orange flames leaping horizontally across the room. The Oathbound nearest to Worthy were immediately set ablaze. Cordelia dropped her crossbow and rolled out of the way before getting singed herself.

Worthy waved the sword at the Oathbound, pushing them back, then looked behind him at Abeke and the others. "Don't just stand there and stare. Attack!"

Abeke rolled, plucking one of her arrows off the ground, and stabbed it in the nearest Oathbound's thigh. As another rushed toward her, she released Uraza in a flash. The leopard raced across the space between her and the attacker, flinging herself at the man. The warrior tried to hit the animal with a quarterstaff, but Uraza easily dodged, and grabbed the end of the weapon as it bobbed in the air. She yanked it from him, then swiped at the man again, slicing his arm.

The Oathbound soldier retreated, but two more arrived in his place. Abeke picked up Cordelia's abandoned crossbow. Not as good as a bow, but it would do. She quickly fired a bolt into one of the men attacking Uraza, then turned and smashed the weapon into another Oathbound's head.

"Head for the mouth of the cave!" Worthy yelled, the Wildcat's Claw still breathing out fire. "I'll hold them off!"

"I've got Anka," Conor said, helping her to her feet. "Let's go."

Rollan and Meilin took the lead, punching and stabbing any soldier that got in their way. Meilin's attacks were almost poetic, the girl spinning and kicking in a way that exuded grace and control. Rollan was more rough around the edges, slicing and thrusting like a madman, but it was just as effective.

After using the last of her bolts, Abeke flung the crossbow to the side and grabbed a bow and quiver of arrows from an unconscious soldier. As they slowly fought their way forward, she continued to collect and fire arrows at approaching soldiers. Once out of the cave, they rushed toward the waterfall.

“Great,” Rollan said. “Don’t look now, but there are more Oathbound waiting for us.”

Indeed, another set of soldiers had trickled in. Abeke fired an arrow at one of them. He fell as it struck his leg, but there were just too many to stop them all.

“Hold on,” Worthy said. He moved to the front and held the sword steadily before him. Again, fire sprung from the hilt, causing the men to scatter backward.

“Keep moving,” Meilin said. “They’re catching up behind us.”

Abeke turned to look. Sure enough, Cordelia and her men were quickly rushing through the tunnel, swords drawn and crossbows level.

They reached the mouth of the cave. The tall black-carved statue stood just as they’d left it, its shoulders still bearing the crumbling ceiling. Oathbound now stood on two sides of them. The waterfall rushed just behind the forward group.

“We’re flanked on both sides!” Worthy said, turning the fire back toward Cordelia’s group. She and the approaching Oathbound retreated farther down the tunnel, but the others were now freed to attack.

“We should fight our way through and jump,” Rollan said. “It’s our only chance.”

Conor held up Anka with one shoulder and blocked an Oathbound with his free hand, sword meeting ax in a metallic clash. Briggan was a few steps ahead, fighting with a mountain lion. “Didn’t you almost die in that same waterfall?”

Rollan jumped backward as an enemy blade sliced his arm. He would definitely need Jhi’s help once they made it out of here—if they made it out. “There’s a big difference between almost dying and actually dying,” he said. He kicked the soldier in the shin, dropping him, then buried his dagger in the man. "I'd rather take my chance with the rapids."

"They'll just follow us!" Meilin shouted. She now wielded two swords, and was swinging them both to keep the attackers at bay.

Worthy gritted his fanged teeth, still focusing the sword's flames on Cordelia's group. He began to back up and butted against the statue, his back pressed against the black obsidian. Abeke watched as Worthy's face rose to meet the Euran hero's. As his chest swelled, she saw a change in his expression.

"Jump," he said. "I'll hold them off for as long as I can. Try to buy you some time."

Conor shook his head, his eyes wide. "Worthy—"

"Go!" he yelled. "You're wasting precious time."

Conor nodded, then he, Anka, and Briggan leaped through the waterfall. They screamed all the way down. The Oathbound nearest to them hesitated, then jumped after them.

Abeke tried not to dwell on wondering if her friends had made it. She yanked an arrow from a fallen Oathbound and rushed to Worthy's side.

"Rollan and Meilin, you go next," Abeke said. She fired another arrow into one of the Oathbound to their right. "I'll help Worthy hold them off."

Meilin hurled both her swords at the Oathbound she was holding at bay. The blades found their mark, slicing through the men's black uniforms. Then she back-flipped off the ledge into the water.

"Show-off," Rollan muttered, before leaping off after her.

Holding the sword with one hand, Worthy wiped his damp brow. The heat must have been brutal, but he hadn't let up yet. "So how many arrows do you have left?" he asked Abeke. "Maybe a hundred?"

She quickly counted the arrows lying at her feet. "More like three."

"I figured you'd say something like that." Looking up at the statue again, he said, "You and Uraza should make a break for it. I'm right behind you."

Abeke grabbed the last of the arrows and rushed to the edge of the cliff. When she turned around, she saw that Worthy had stopped using the sword's fire powers. Instead he faced the statue, the sword raised high above his head.

"What are you doing?" Abeke fired her last arrows at the Oathbound. They would reach the mouth of the cave in seconds.

"Remember what you said? United in our mission, but not necessarily in how we execute that mission?" He swung the sword over his head, gaining momentum. "Finish the mission. Find the other gifts."

"Worthy, wait!" she yelled. She knew what he was trying to do. "There's no way you can cut through that statue. It's made of solid stone."

"The wildcat had a ferocious roar, but she also had nails and teeth as sharp as diamonds." This time the entire sword glowed. The steel blade had turned shiny blue. "Tell Dawson I was a hero!"

Worthy brought the sword down on the statue. The blade sliced through the black stone with surprising ease, lopping off a chunk of Gransfen's leg. He swung again, completely severing one stone leg. The statue shifted and began to tilt. There was a loud rumble as boulders dropped from the ceiling.

"You fool!" Cordelia yelled, dodging falling debris. "What are you doing?"

"Being a hero!" Worthy shouted back as he sliced the statue one last time. The carving collapsed, as did the roof of the cave it was holding up. Worthy disappeared in an avalanche of boulders, debris, and dust.

Cracks splintered underneath Abeke's feet as the rest of the cave began to fall apart. Turning, she took a flying leap through the waterfall. She looked to her left to see Uraza jump as well, her body arching in the air.

They slammed into the water. Abeke felt like she'd been hit in the stomach with a hammer. Kicking as hard as she could, she reached for the sky while the rapids pulled her along. Surfacing, she caught sight of Uraza and quickly took in a breath before the swirling currents pulled her under again. Abeke crashed into a large submerged boulder, then ricocheted off another.

There was no navigating this river. She was at the mercy of the currents.

She surfaced again, and quickly took in another gulp of air. This time, she couldn't see the leopard. Was Uraza behind her? Ahead of her? Was she—?

Abeke's thoughts were interrupted by a feeling of weightlessness. She hung in the air, almost like she was floating, before her body crashed into the water below.

She had fallen over another waterfall.

Her vision became blurred and pain radiated throughout her limbs. She knew she was bleeding, but she didn't know how badly.

Her body was heavy, as was her mind. She felt herself sinking. Slipping. She tried kicking her legs, but they refused to work.

The water became darker. Her lungs screamed out in pain.

She almost gave up.

But then, something caught her eye. Below her. A flash of gold fur.

Uraza! And she was in trouble.

Ignoring the pain in her lungs, Abeke stretched out to the beast. A second later, the leopard disappeared onto Abeke's arm.

Abeke shook her head, trying to push away the blackness, and kicked toward the surface. She kicked harder than she'd ever kicked before. She pulled at the water, trying to grab it like handfuls of straw, using it to pull herself up toward the light. Toward air. Toward life.

She exploded past the surface. Opening her mouth, she swallowed gulp after gulp of air, her chest heaving with each breath.

She heard splashing around her, and opened her eyes. "We've got you," Conor said as he and Briggan swam to her. "You're safe."

The Great Wolf reached her first, his gray fur wet and slick. She wrapped her arms around him once he was near. "Thank you," she said, rubbing her face into the wolf's coat. Then she quickly looked up. "Where are the others?" she gasped at Conor. "Are they—?"

"They're on shore. Jhi is taking care of Meilin. She's got a bad gash on her leg." Swimming on the one side of Briggan while Conor held fast to the other, Abeke headed to shore. "What about Worthy?" Conor asked. "Is he right behind you?"

Abeke looked at her friend, then shook her head. "He's not coming."

Only a handful of Oathbound had made it out of the cave and over the waterfall. Conor and Meilin had been ready for a fight, but without their numbers or their leader behind them, the mercenaries had retreated into the trees.

Which was probably for the best. The battle had taken a wretched toll on their entire team. Everyone was covered in cuts and bruises, some worse than others. But their physical scars paled in comparison to the loss of Worthy.

Before they left, the Greencloaks chanced a trip back to the waterfall, hoping to find some way back into the cave, but it was completely sealed off. Abeke suggested using the Heart of the Land to dig through, but Meilin slowly shook her head.

“It’s too powerful and imprecise. With a collapse like this, we’d probably end up causing even more cave-ins farther inside.”

Finally, they collected their packs, bid farewell to their friend, and found a safe place to bed down for the night.

They started a fire. A roasted fish sat on the flames, but no one seemed particularly interested in eating. Or in talking. They just sat there, stewing in their own thoughts.

Finally, after hours of staring at the flames, Rollan cleared his throat. “I’ve been thinking ... you know, once the cave started collapsing, I bet there were a bunch of other cave openings that popped up,” he said. “He’s a small guy. He could have found a fissure to squeeze through.”

Meilin reached out and took Rollan’s hand. “Rollan, don’t torture yourself....”

“I know it sounds crazy, but hear me out,” he continued. “All he had to do was get back to the big cavern, right? If he got there, then he had a chance to survive.” Rollan looked around, waiting for someone to buy into his theory. “Right?” he asked, his voice softer.

“And the Wildcat’s Claw is pretty powerful,” Conor said. “He could probably cut his way out.” Conor hugged Briggan as he spoke. “If that blade can cut through a solid stone statue, it can easily carve through a few fallen boulders.”

Meilin sat up, being careful not to uncover the bandage on her leg. “Knowing Worthy, he’s probably already out, hiding in the trees. Just waiting for the perfect opportunity to reveal himself.”

“That’s Worthy for you,” Abeke added. “Always wanting to be the hero.” Her voice caught as she spoke the words.

No one spoke again for a few minutes. The tears flowed freely down her friends’ faces now, as well as her own. Abeke couldn’t see Anka, but she was sure that she was crying, too.

“We have to find the next gift,” Abeke said.

“What’s the point?” Rollan asked. “We lost the sword. We were supposed to collect all the gifts, remember?”

Anka shook her head, the movement revealing the older Greencloak’s position. “There’s more to the gifts than we realized. They aren’t just symbols; the bond tokens have real power. Olvan sent you after them for a reason. We’ve got no choice but to continue.”

Meilin nodded. “We have to finish the mission. For Erdas. For Worthy.”

“But where do we start?” Abeke asked. “Nilo and Zhong are huge regions. The gifts could be anywhere.”

“Yes, I was thinking about that,” Anka said. “We know the names of the other two items: Stormspeaker and the Dragon’s Eye. So we need a library. Somewhere with a recorded history of the legends of Erdas,” she said. “Any clues where that would be?”

“Greenhaven Castle comes to mind,” Meilin said. “But since that’s off-limits, the only other library I can think of is at the emperor’s palace in Zhong. Which obviously is out of the question, too.”

“I know of a place in Nilo that’s filled with ancient books and records,” Conor said. “As well as someone who’s as old as the spirit animal bond itself.”

Meilin groaned. “Don’t say it,” she warned. “Don’t say it!”

As Conor smiled, Abeke realized that he looked a little like Worthy. “I think we need to see Takoda at the monastery,” Conor continued. “He and the monks have an extensive library. Plus, there’s someone ancient and clever we could also try talking to.”

“And who is that?” Anka asked.

“Kovo,” Meilin muttered, staring into the flames. “Kovo, the Great Betrayer.”

Varian Johnson is the author of eight novels for children and young adults, including the middle-grade capers The Great Greene Heist and To Catch a Cheat. A former structural engineer, he now lives outside of Austin, Texas, with his family.

You've read the book—now join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Have your ebook ready and enter the code to unlock huge
rewards!

NRR42GWX4W

BOOK SEVEN

STORMSPEAKER

Now fugitives, the young heroes must clear their names while evading the ruthless Oathbound. They head for a hidden refuge of learning in Nilo, hoping to discover the locations of the other two gifts. Guarding this knowledge are their old friends Takoda and Xanthe, along with Kovo the Ape.

With the Oathbound following close behind, can the heroes risk branding their friends as traitors?

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

A sneak peek of the next

Book Seven

Stormspeaker

By Christina Diaz Gonzalez

WARRIOR'S PATH

ABEKE TOOK A DEEP BREATH AND HELD IT FOR AN EXTRA second before slowly exhaling. From the deck of the ship, in the minutes before daybreak, she could already sense a change in the air. It felt familiar. Even though they were still far away from the savannahs where she'd been raised, the breeze carried the scent, the warmth, the feel of her homeland. Nilo was on the horizon and it couldn't come soon enough.

The five Greencloaks—Abeke, Conor, Meilin, Rollan, and Anka—had been aboard the small ship for several days, and they still had a ways to travel before reaching their final destination in southern Nilo. Abeke was beginning to believe that Uraza's aversion to water was rubbing off on her. All she wanted to do was step foot on solid land ... but they had to press on. Their priority was to hopefully find a clue about the bond tokens in the library of Takoda's former monastery.

But that hope carried an unwanted partner ... someone Abeke and the rest of the team despised. Someone who had also returned to the monastery and who might have a few answers for them.

Kovo.

Even the thought of the Great Ape made Abeke's stomach turn. The gorilla had masterminded both the First and Second Devourer Wars, killing thousands, including Meilin's father. That was something that couldn't simply be forgotten, even if the new version of Kovo had recently helped them defeat the Wyrms.

The rising sun now streaked the sky with pink and purple rays of light, adding to the beauty of the horizon. Soon Abeke would be seeing Kovo, and she'd have to put aside all her feelings about him.

Abeke stared down into the deep blue water.

Was her anger toward Kovo similar to how people felt about the Greencloaks?

No. She shook away the comparison. It was a different situation. The Greencloaks hadn't acted willingly with the Wyrms ... they'd been infected by its parasites. And the Greencloaks had been framed for the assassination of the Emperor of Zhong. Kovo, on the other hand, had done all those terrible things himself. He had taken the world to the brink of human extinction.

Twice.

The thought of Kovo and his conniving ways sent a cold shiver down Abeke's back, causing her to shudder. She had to keep her guard up around that Great Beast.

"Couldn't sleep?" Rollan asked, joining Abeke on the deck. "Or just enjoying the sunrise?"

"Neither." Abeke sighed. "Just thinking."

"Yeah, me too." Rollan leaned his back on the rail. "This rickety old ship hasn't been treating us too bad. Then again, it still has another week to go."

Abeke smiled. The Greencloaks had been lucky that Dawson, after hearing about his brother, had insisted on helping them get out of Eura. Thanks to him they had supplies, weapons, a ship, and a two-man crew of old fishermen, Milo and Keane.

"I was actually thinking about Kovo," Abeke admitted. "Not looking forward to seeing him again."

"Can you imagine how Conor feels? Last time he was in the waters around Takoda's monastery was when he became infected with the Wyrms' parasite. This really can't be easy for him."

"You're right. I hadn't even ..." Abeke sighed. She'd been so wrapped up in returning to Nilo that she hadn't stopped to think about Conor. “Have you talked to him? Is he okay?”

“He’ll be fine,” Meilin said, walking toward them from the bow of the ship. “He’s a Hero of Erdas. He’s a survivor.”

“I was thinking ...” Anka suddenly appeared next to them. Her chameleon-like abilities still made Abeke uneasy. Abeke had always prided herself in her hunting skills, but this diminutive Greencloak seemed to confound her senses. “If the library doesn’t have any information on the bond tokens, will Kovo tell us if he knows anything? I mean, he helped you with the Wyrms, but that was because the whole world was in peril. He’s not a fan of humans ... or Greencloaks.”

“Maybe being bonded to Takoda has changed him,” Rollan said. “Given him a different perspective.” He glanced up at Essix circling above the ship. “Our spirit animals have changed us. And I’d like to think we’ve changed them, too.”

Just as Rollan finished, Essix screeched and dove past the port side, buzzing right over the top of Rollan’s head as if in protest. Essix was stubborn and headstrong, but there was no denying she had a soft spot for Rollan. They worked well together, each one fiercely independent yet always loyal.

Meilin snickered. “You’ve really changed her.”

“Very funny, Essix!” Rollan shouted. “Way to support my point.”

Essix flew around the ship one more time before coming to rest at the top of the mast.

“Maybe Essix saw something.” Conor emerged from belowdecks, a concerned look on his face. He stepped closer to the railing and looked out at the horizon. “In fact, I was coming up to tell you that maybe we shouldn’t go to the monastery at all.”

Meilin placed a hand on Conor’s shoulder. “Conor, it might be difficult for you, after what happened with the Wyrms—”

“That’s not it,” he interrupted. Conor took a step back and looked at the rest of the group. “I had a vision. It was brief, not a full one like I’ve had before with the big wave, but I think we have to go somewhere else.”

“Where?” Abeke asked, quietly pleased at the thought of avoiding Kovo. “What did you see?”

“It was an enormous hole, or maybe a deep crater, and it had three land bridges ... one on top of the other.” Conor closed his eyes for a moment. “It also had a waterfall flowing from the top, past the three bridges, and into a pool at the bottom.”

“And a token was there?” Anka inquired. “Like with the Wildcat’s Claw, where it was hidden behind the waterfall?”

Conor shook his head. “I don’t think so, but it’s the first step in finding them. I’m certain of that. And it felt like we weren’t too far away.”

“Sounds like you’re describing the sinkhole of the Taabara Chasm,” Abeke said. “It’s not too far from here in the northern part of Nilo.”

“Northern Nilo ... I like the sound of that!” Rollan grinned broadly. “Less time being seasick always sounds good to me.”

“Well, at least you’ve been with your spirit animal,” Meilin pointed out. “None of us have had ours during the voyage. It’ll be good to bring them out.”

“Maybe we should split up,” Conor said, just as Essix shrieked and took flight again. “A few of us go to the sinkhole while the rest continue on to see Takoda.” Conor frowned. “Just in case my vision is wrong.”

“I don’t know,” Anka replied. “I think staying together is a better idea.”

“Me too.” Abeke reached over and gave Conor’s forearm a squeeze. They had been through so much together, and she trusted his instincts. “I believe in your visions.... They haven’t been wrong yet.”

“Plus, sticking together might prevent a repeat of what happened with ...” Rollan didn’t finish the sentence. He had almost broken their unspoken rule.

A hush fell over the group. The experience of having lost Worthy in the cave-in was still raw for everyone. It was all they’d discussed during the first days, but then one morning, without anyone saying a word on the matter, they had stopped talking about it. It wasn’t that they weren’t thinking of him; they just had to place their full attention on the task at hand. Their survival depended on it.

From that point forward there was no more wondering if they had done the right thing in leaving, no more worrying whether Worthy had made it out alive, no more fearing that the Wildcat's Claw had been found by the Oathbound. The focus was on their mission. They had to find the two remaining bond tokens, Stormspeaker and the Dragon's Eye.

Anka broke the silence. "Abeke, do you know how long it'll take to get to the Taabara Chasm?"

Abeke shrugged. "Not long, but I'd have to check the map. Hold on."

Abeke sprinted belowdecks, grabbed the map of Nilo, and hurried back to her friends.

"Look." She opened it up and pointed to a spot in the ocean near the northern coast of the continent. "We're somewhere in this area. We can tell Milo and Keane to change course and go toward this river." She ran her fingers down the coastline to the mouth of a river, traced its path inland, and stopped at a place close to some mountains. "Once we dock we can make our way across the savannah, past this hilly area, and the Taabara Chasm should be right there. We might even make it there by tonight or tomorrow morning." She paused for a moment. "Maybe. I think."

"Then it's set." Rollan thrust his finger toward the sea and grinned. "Onward! To Taabara Chasm!"

"Um, yeah ..." Meilin rolled her eyes at Rollan's over-the-top rally call, but she couldn't help smiling. "How about I simply go tell Milo and Keane that we've had a change of plans?"

"Just remember ..." Conor hesitated, rubbing the faint mark the Wyrms had left on his forehead. "Taabara may only be the beginning, and not the end. I have a feeling that the bond tokens won't be easy to find."

"Well, since when have things been easy for us?" Abeke gave Conor a wink. "We like a challenge."

"Yeah, I guess." Conor turned to face the coastline, lost in his own thoughts.

The sun was directly overhead when they climbed into the small rowboat. There were no ports in the area, so Milo had anchored the ship in the middle of the river and Keane would now row with them to shore.

“So, how long should we wait for you to return?” Keane asked as they approached the riverbank lined with papyrus reeds.

Abeke bit her lip. She wanted to have access to the ship, but it didn’t seem fair to leave the two old men stuck in the middle of nowhere. “The thing is ... we aren’t sure how long we’ll be away.”

“Well, Dawson paid us for two weeks of travel,” Keane replied. “And we’ve got about a week’s worth of food left, so it’s your call.”

“Could you wait here for a couple of days and then head somewhere back along the coast?” Rollan suggested as the boat drifted closer to the river’s edge.

“Sure.” Keane nodded. “I have a sister in Badir; it’s a small port town not too far away. We could meet up there. I’ll give you two more weeks, as Dawson paid us ... That’s about all I can take of my sister anyway.”

“Badir sounds good.” Meilin threw a backpack filled with supplies over her shoulder as the rowboat hit the first of the papyrus reeds. “We’ll meet you there if we don’t make it back here in time.”

“Good luck!” Keane called out. The five Greencloaks jumped out of the boat and into water that was about two feet deep.

Abeke slogged through the river, pushing aside reeds while her feet sank in the sand and silt with every step she took. Finally the ground became firmer and she climbed up on dry land. Once she was out of the reeds and onto the grass of the savannah, Abeke took a deep breath, relishing the hot sun that beat down on her.

She was home.

And only one thing was missing from the scene.

Abeke pushed aside her cloak and held out her arm. “Join me, Uraza.”

The leopard appeared in a flash of light and raised her head to face the sun. The large cat’s nostrils twitched as she took in the Niloan air and softly let out a contented purr.

“I know.” Abeke stroked Uraza’s arched back as they took in their surroundings. “I did the same thing. It’s good to be home.” The tall golden grass of the savannah rippled with the soft breeze. The rocky hills they’d have to cross loomed not too far in the distance.

Uraza stretched her legs. Abeke knew what the leopard wanted. “Go,” she whispered.

Uraza immediately jumped through the tall grass, then raced across the savannah toward the hills at full speed. Abeke knew the joy Uraza felt at being free. How fun it would be to race along with her, to hunt for their next meal and savor the midday sun that was baking her shoulders. But now was not the time. They had a mission.

“Uraza’s as happy as I am not to be on that ship anymore,” Rollan observed. The tall grass moved with the leopard, rustling as she sprinted back and forth. “Aren’t you bringing out Briggan, Conor?”

Conor wiped the back of his neck and looked up at the cloudless blue sky. “Think I’ll wait until the day isn’t quite so hot.”

“This is Nilo,” Abeke warned. “If it’s daytime, it’s going to be hot.”

Essix circled the group, screeched to establish her presence in the sky, then flew away once more.

“Yeah, yeah, we’re moving,” Rollan responded to the falcon’s cry. He adjusted his green cloak, backpack, and canteen. “Everyone have their stuff?” Rollan asked.

“Since when are you the responsible one?” Meilin teased.

Rollan smiled. “Since I realized that I’d have to share my water if someone forgot theirs.”

“Really?” Conor could barely hide his smile. “You mean to say you wouldn’t share with Meilin?”

Abeke heard Anka giggle, even though she could no longer be seen.

They were all aware of the feelings between Rollan and Meilin, but no one usually said anything. It was only confirmed by the occasional reddening of Meilin’s cheeks and Rollan’s quick interest in changing the topic of conversation.

“We’re wasting time.... Let’s go.” Meilin marched ahead, leaving the group behind before Abeke could check to see if her face had turned pink once again.

As the team trekked toward the Taabara Chasm, a few puffy white clouds began to gather, providing occasional relief from the heat. The terrain also changed from the grasses of the savannah to rocky hills dotted with trees. In the distance, what had at first looked like hills quietly morphed into amber colored mountains, with scattered patches of green.

Stopping for a quick break under the shade of a wide-branched cypress tree, Conor released Briggan. The wolf burst onto the scene and, with his tail wagging, pounced on Conor, knocking him to the ground.

“Whoa,” Conor laughed as Briggan placed his two front paws on Conor’s chest and raised his snout to sniff the air. Conor ran his hand through the Great Wolf’s gray-white fur while the wolf’s cobalt-blue eyes analyzed everything. “Sense anything?”

Briggan glanced down at Conor before giving him a quick lick on his forehead. The wolf jumped off to further inspect their surroundings.

“Ha, I would take that as an all clear,” Anka said, her body blending with the tree trunk she was leaning against.

Abeke opened up the map and checked their location. From the look of things, it seemed like the sinkhole that formed the Taabara Chasm should be close by.

“Are we headed in the right direction?” Meilin asked.

“Think so,” Abeke answered, shielding her eyes from the glare of the sun. She scanned the land for a small stream that might feed into the waterfall of the chasm.

Briggan let out a long howl from somewhere in the distance.

Rollan stretched out his hand to help Conor up. “Sounds like your partner may have found something of interest.”

Conor grinned. “Leave it to Briggan to be here five minutes and already track something down.”

As they all headed toward the sound of Briggan’s howl, Rollan shook his canteen. “I really hope he’s found some fresh water, because I’m almost out.”

Abeke shook her head. “Hm, who was talking about having enough supplies so we wouldn’t have to share water later? Oh yeah, that was you.”

“Hey ...” Rollan shrugged, a mischievous smile on his face. “These muscles need the extra hydration.”

At that remark everyone laughed out loud.

“It wasn’t that funny,” Rollan mumbled.

Soon, the group came upon a small stream where Briggan and Uraza had both decided to lounge by its edge.

“Look at those two.” Meilin pointed. “They’re like—”

“Shhh.” Abeke touched her ear. “Listen.”

Besides the gurgling sound of the water bouncing off of several rocks in the stream, there was a louder, crashing sound of rushing water cascading down somewhere.

“The waterfall has to be nearby,” Abeke said as Rollan filled his canteen with water. “It’s got to be downstream.”

Abeke and the group followed the stream until the ground dropped, disappearing into a giant sinkhole. From where they stood, at the very edge of the deep crater, they could see the stream cascade down past three land bridges, each of which seemed to bisect the hole at different depths.

“Now what?” Rollan asked, looking down. “Do we go down into that giant rabbit hole, cross one of the bridges, or stay up here?”

“In my vision, I could see the gorge’s opening high overhead. The water seemed to be falling from above.” Conor patted Briggan, who had now rejoined them. The wolf nuzzled his hand. “So, I think we have to go to the bottom.”

“Yeah,” Rollan sighed. “I was afraid you’d say that.”

Abeke looked at the western sky, where the sun was already hanging low. They had made good time, but it would be much darker in the gorge. Any remaining light would soon disappear. She could already hear a nightingale chirping in the distance. If they were going to go, they needed to be quick about it.

“What do you think, Uraza?” Abeke asked the leopard, who was peering over the edge right next to her. “Should we head down and see if there’s anything down there? Or wait until morning?”

Uraza responded by leaping off the rocky ledge onto the path toward the bottom.

“Guess that’s your answer,” Meilin said, following Uraza with a jump of her own. She looked back up at the rest of the group. “Come on!”

Once at the bottom of the crater, Meilin released Jhi. The Great Panda lumbered over to Meilin, and their foreheads touched. The genuine affection between the two was obvious to Abeke. Then Jhi waddled over to where Briggan and Uraza were lapping up water from the edge of the small pond. The entire team spread out, hunting for a clue as to why Conor's vision had brought them here.

Abeke first searched behind the waterfall, hoping that there might be a cave like in Eura, but there was nothing there.

"Maybe it's like the Heart of the Land." Rollan touched the token that hung under his shirt. "Hidden within a rock somewhere."

"There are a million rocks here, though," Anka said.

"How about hidden along a path?" Conor pointed to a narrow chasm through the mountain walls.

Abeke walked over to him. "Are you saying we should go through there?" The opening would require them to enter single file. If it got much narrower, their spirit animals would certainly not fit. As it was, Jhi already couldn't enter.

"See how the ground is worn down in spots?" He pointed to the rock floor. "I think this is a path that's been used before. Used a lot."

Meilin and Rollan joined them, each peering into the long, narrow chasm.

"We should explore in there before it gets much darker," Meilin said. "Don't you think, Rollan?"

Rollan didn't answer. He only stared into it.

"Rollan?" Conor repeated his name.

Meilin placed a hand on Rollan's shoulder. "You're thinking of Tarik, aren't you?" she said. "The last battle you fought with him."

"It looked a lot like this place," he muttered. "Same type of chasm. A warrior's last path."

"But it's not that place, and we aren't battling the Devourer or the Conquerors," Meilin replied in a gentle voice.

Suddenly a sense of unease filled Abeke. This would be a good place for an ambush. She glanced around, her hunter instincts on full alert.

It was too quiet.

Even the nightingale had stopped singing. Something was off.

"I think we should get out of here," Abeke said in a hushed voice. "Maybe have Essix see if—"

Before Abeke could finish her sentence, a hooded figure jumped down and twirled a quarterstaff in front of them.

“Now!” came a shout from above, and suddenly warriors wearing gray cloaks rained down all around them.

First, one dropped behind Abeke. Then another in front. Then two more blocked the path forward through the chasm.

Abeke pulled an arrow from her quiver and nocked it to her bow, just as Meilin drew out her sword.

In a split second, more than two dozen cloaked figures had jumped down from the cliffs ... all pointing their weapons at the five Greencloaks or at their spirit animals over by the pond. High above all of them, balanced on the natural bridge, another dozen attackers stood with arrows trained on Abeke and her friends.

There was no escape.... They were trapped!

GIANT HAIRBALL

FIGHTING A LOSING BATTLE WAS NEVER ROLLAN'S FIRST choice. He had learned on the streets of Concorba that diplomacy could work wonders. Words often yielded better results than any sword. Disarm them with a smile whenever possible.

Rollan quickly assessed the situation. Jhi, Briggan, and Uraza were surrounded, but they would be able to take care of themselves. The four Greencloaks had taken defensive stances against the hooded warriors, but Rollan wasn't sure where Anka had gone. She'd camouflaged herself so well that he couldn't see her at all. What Rollan could see was that these people weren't dressed in all black like the Oathbound.

Perhaps he could convince them that they weren't enemies.

"Friends, friends." Rollan lowered his dagger and took a step toward one of the figures. "We mean you no harm." He acted calm, as if the Greencloaks had the upper hand, instead of the other way around.

"Rollan ..." Meilin's voice carried a warning that this approach might not be the best idea.

Rollan ignored her. She was a warrior at heart. Her instinct was always to fight. But he had to use his gut. He took another step. "We aren't here for a battle. We're only in search of something. Perhaps you could help."

The response came quick and swift. The hooded figure in front of him spun his quarterstaff in the air, then swung it low at Rollan's knees, trying to knock his legs out from under him.

Rollan jumped over the end and quickly grabbed the pole, yanking it out of the hooded figure's hand and turning it on him.

So much for diplomacy.

"STOP!" a voice called from above. A hooded warrior appeared from an opening near one of the land bridges. The figure ran along a path to the bottom, leaping down the last few feet to skid to a halt right in front of Rollan. "Don't harm these people. These are our friends."

Rollan couldn't believe it.... His plan had worked.

The cloaked figure pulled back his gray hood.

"TAKODA!" Meilin exclaimed.

Takoda smiled and rushed over to be embraced by Meilin, Abeke, Conor, and Rollan. "I'm so glad that you're all safe!" he exclaimed, but then lowered his voice to a whisper. "I heard what happened with the Emperor of Zhong. How could the Greencloaks do something like that? What's going on?"

"It was a setup by people impersonating us," Meilin answered. "We're trying to make things right again."

Takoda didn't hesitate. "How can I help?" he asked. "Do you want me to go with you somewhere? Maybe give you a place to hide with the monks?"

Rollan stared at Takoda. The boy had grown about four inches since he'd last seen him. He'd also become more muscular.

But along with Takoda came Kovo, who was bonded to the young monk. Rollan didn't love the idea of traveling with the once subjugator of Erdas. "Have you heard of something called Stormspeaker ... or the Dragon's Eye?"

Takoda shook his head. "What are they?"

"Important items we need in order to clear our names and unite Erdas," Conor explained. "We believe at least one of them is found in Nilo."

Murmuring had risen from the cloaked figures. The monks still had their weapons trained on the group and their spirit animals.

“Takoda, what’s going on?” someone shouted.

Takoda turned around. “Everyone, please ... lower your weapons.” He pushed down the spear of one of the nearby monks. “These are my friends, the ones I’ve told you about. The ones who helped defeat the Wyrms. The Heroes of Erdas. We should be welcoming them, not threatening them.”

Briggan growled at one of the hooded monks and Rollan could see Uraza’s muscles tense and tauten. Even Jhi was staring down the person in front of her.

“Place your spirit animals in passive state,” Takoda whispered. “The monks won’t relax if they’re out.”

Meilin, Abeke, and Conor glanced at each other. They each quietly nodded and called back their animals.

Rollan could see the hesitation among the monks, but they slowly put away their weapons and pulled back their hoods in an apparent symbol of acceptance.

Takoda had risen to become a leader in his community. This was definitely not the same boy Rollan had first encountered moping in Greenhaven. The battles underground against the Wyrms had clearly changed him ... or was it Kovo’s influence? Had the bond between him and the Great Beast caused him to grow in his command of others? Was it just a sign of growing up? Rollan wasn’t sure. Perhaps Kovo had changed, too. Doubtful, but anything was possible.

“Do you know someone who might help us?” Meilin asked.

Rollan feared that the answer would be Kovo, but Takoda surprised them. “I don’t know someone with answers, but I know someplace that might have them. Come with me.” Takoda motioned for the group to follow him into the chasm.

“No!” The monk who had attacked Rollan leaped forward, blocking the entrance. “You can’t take them into Mabtaka. You’d be placing everyone and everything at risk.”

“Step aside, Sodu.” Takoda stared him down. “I think I’ve earned the right to bring four guests, four friends, into our community.”

Sodu didn’t back off. “They’re wanted by the Oathbound! I’ve heard the rumors of what happens to those who help Greencloaks. We can’t allow them entrance. The library has never been seized, because strangers are not permitted inside.”

“These four aren’t strangers,” Takoda argued. “They’re known to everyone.”

“Ahem,” Anka cleared her throat. She took two steps forward, away from the mountain wall where she had been camouflaging herself, and allowed herself to be seen. “There’s five of us, actually.”

Takoda spun around. He hadn’t noticed her, even though she’d been standing so close to him.

“Anka’s with us,” Meilin quickly explained. “Her spirit animal is a chameleon. We can vouch for her, though.”

“You see!” Sodu mocked Takoda. “You can’t even recognize danger when it’s right next to you.” He turned to the monks as Anka blended back into the colors of the mountain. “My brothers, we cannot let them enter. There’s no telling what will happen if they do. We would be putting everything at risk.”

“What I see”—Takoda spoke to Sodu through clenched teeth—“is someone who pretends to be strong, but is afraid of his own shadow.”

“Look who’s talking!” Sodu exclaimed. “The boy who couldn’t be trusted to travel alone, but who required the guidance of a superior student to accompany him to Mabtaka.”

Takoda eyes narrowed. “And when none could be found, they told me to bring you.”

“Ha! Nice try, but we all know the truth,” Sodu scoffed. “You are still only a boy.”

“We’ll see about that.” Takoda sneered and took a few steps forward. He lifted his arms and addressed the other monks in a loud, booming voice. “Brothers and sisters, you all know me and trust my judgment. These are my friends, the ones who defeated the Devourer and then helped destroy the Wyrms. They are the Heroes of Erdas who have selflessly risked everything for Nilo ... for the entire world. They come to us seeking answers and rest ... something only we can offer. Isn’t it our duty to share our knowledge with the righteous and stand against the Oathbound? Will you not rise up, stiffen your resolve, and aid them?”

There were whispers among the monks. A sense of purpose was filling the cavern.

“We are being called to be part of history,” Takoda continued, “instead of just preserving the historical accounts. We cannot turn our backs on those who defended us. We have a duty, so I ask you ...” He paused for a moment, capturing everyone’s attention. “Who will join me in leading these heroes to find the answers they seek? Who stands with me and with the Heroes of Erdas?”

“I do!” shouted one monk.

“As do I!” yelled another.

“I DO!” hollered the remaining monks in unison. All except Sodu, who stayed silent with his arms crossed.

“To the Heroes of Erdas!” Takoda shouted, raising a fist in the air.

“THE HEROES OF ERDAS!” the monks roared back.

“Glad he’s on our side,” Rollan whispered to Conor as he followed Takoda into the chasm.

As the Greencloaks walked through the narrow passage, it continued closing in on either side. Soon it was impossibly tight, like a fissure running up the mountain. As night fell and the light waned, Takoda lit a small lantern. Rollan glanced up the steep rock walls at the sliver of dark sky above them. He knew Essix was flying above them somewhere, giving them protection from the air.

“So what’s the deal with your friend Sodu?” Rollan asked Takoda. “Not the friendliest monk I’ve seen ... not that I’ve actually seen any before today. Except for you, of course.”

“Yeah, we have some history,” Takoda explained. “We were together at the other monastery before I bonded with Kovo. After everything that happened with the Wyrms, we were both sent here. He’s not my biggest fan.”

Rollan chuckled at the understatement. “You think?”

“Almost there!” Takoda called back to the others as the path opened up to a ledge high up on a mountain.

“Finally. I was wondering when we’d get ... whoa!” Rollan waved his arms, trying to maintain his balance as Takoda yanked him back. In the darkness, he had misjudged where the ledge ended and almost stepped off.

“We’re about two hundred feet up and it’s a straight drop,” Takoda warned.

“A little more notice next time,” Rollan muttered over the pounding of his heart.

“Wow,” Conor said as he stepped onto the ledge. “I didn’t even realize the incline was taking us so high.”

“The monastery is up there.” Takoda pointed to a few twinkling lights in the distance. The moonlight revealed enough of the monastery that Rollan could tell it had been built into the mountainside, about two thirds of the way to the top.

“Guess we have to take one of these rope ladders the rest of the way up?” Rollan tugged on a pair of old ropes with wooden rungs fastened between them. None of it looked very sturdy. “It’s about another two hundred feet?”

“Two fifty,” Takoda corrected.

“This could explain why you don’t get many visitors,” Meilin added. “Though it does remind me of parts of Zhong.” She grabbed the first ladder’s wooden rung and hoisted herself up.

“Before we all get there, I, um ...” Takoda suddenly seemed unsure of himself.

“Spit it out,” Meilin said.

“Yeah, so, I was going to ask that you not bring out Uraza, Briggan, or Jhi when we get up there. Maktaba is well, a sort of particular place, if you haven’t noticed. Not that I don’t want them around, but I’m not sure what the reaction would be.”

“From who?” Abeke asked. “The monks or Kovo?”

Takoda sighed. “Both, I guess.”

They all knew there was no love lost between their spirit animals. Kovo had killed the Four Great Beasts during the First Devourer War and had in turn been killed by them during the second. They had reluctantly worked together to defeat a common enemy, but no one truly knew what would happen if they were thrust together again. Still, Rollan didn’t like the idea of having to accommodate Kovo.

“I think Kovo will just have to figure it out,” Abeke said in a cool, unforgiving voice. “We’ve all had to deal with him.”

“But we’re guests,” Conor reasoned. “Let’s not stir up any trouble.”

“Kovo is different now,” Takoda said as they each began climbing the ladders. “You’ll see.”

Rollan was about to make a joke when he glanced down at the steep drop to the bottom and felt his head spin. Devastating quips would have to wait, since he needed all his concentration not to fall. As they continued up the mountain, the glow of the moon rising over the adjacent mountain peak cast a dim light over their surroundings. It was nighttime, but Rollan wasn’t looking anywhere except at the rung right above him. It seemed like everyone was focused on the climb, because no one spoke. In fact, all Rollan could hear were the occasional grunts and sighs as someone paused to catch their breath before pressing on.

Once they arrived at the monastery, Rollan turned to look back at the view. An enormous sense of peace washed over him. It was a combination of the beauty of the thousand stars above him and the moon rising silently in the sky. Wind whispered past the oil lanterns lighting the entrance to Maktaba. For the first time in weeks he felt safe, a security provided by the remote location.

“Nice, huh?” Takoda smiled, taking it all in as if for the first time. “Just be careful with the thorns that line the bushes near the entrance.” He waited for the remaining Greencloaks and then motioned for them all to follow him. “Come on, I think someone may want to see you.”

“I doubt it,” Abeke muttered as she walked past Rollan.

Rollan nodded in agreement. Kovo couldn’t have changed that much.

The group passed several monks in the wide corridors who silently stared as they walked by.... It seemed that word of their arrival was spreading throughout the monastery.

“This is the Great Hall,” Takoda said, entering a large room where oil lamps hung from the many rafters that crisscrossed the vaulted ceiling. There were a few monks eating at one of the long dining tables on the right side of the room, and a fire burned in the massive fireplace on the opposite end. “Figured you might want to stop and get something to eat before—”

“MEILIN! CONOR!” someone shouted while running down a darkened staircase in the corner. “ROLLAN! ABEKE!”

Takoda smiled. “Told you someone would want to see you.”

A girl with white hair and almost translucent skin rushed into the light.

It was Xanthe, the Sadrean warrior Meilin and Conor had met while battling the Wyrms underground. “I can’t believe you’re all here!” She hurried over and pulled Meilin close to her. “Takoda and I heard about what happened to your surface elder—er, emperor. How could—”

“It wasn’t us,” Meilin explained. “They were imposters.”

Xanthe tapped Takoda in the chest with the back of her hand. “What did I tell you? I knew it couldn’t be real Greencloaks.”

“And since when are you a monk, Xanthe?” Conor teased. “Or are you here for another reason?”

Takoda blushed at the insinuation, but Xanthe simply rolled her eyes. “I’m here to give a record of my people’s history. Preserve the Sadrean stories for future generations.”

“How are things in Sadre now?” Meilin asked.

“Still recovering. Phos Astos will never be the same, but it’s being rebuilt ... slowly.”

“Sounds like several places we’ve seen,” Anka said.

Xanthe scanned the room. “Who said that?”

“Oh,” Meilin spun around. “That’s Anka. I forgot to introduce the two of you. Anka, Anka, where are you?”

“Right here.” Anka stepped away from a purple curtain in a dark corner of the room, her skin and clothing changing from purple to their natural coloring. “Don’t mind me. Nobody does. Pleasure to meet you, Xanthe.”

“Uh, yes, nice to meet you, too,” Xanthe replied as Anka moved into the shadows and blended back into her surroundings.

That was when the group noticed him: a large looming figure who sat in the darkest corner of the space, draped in shadow and staring out the window. His massive back was turned to the group, but there was no mistaking him.

Kovo.

“Guess we don’t merit even a glance from him,” Abeke speculated.

“That’s not it,” Takoda explained. “Ever since we stopped the Wurm, Kovo’s gone almost completely silent. He rarely communicates with me, and he refuses to go into passive form.”

Rollan cautiously drew closer to the Great Ape. “Is something wrong? Did someone take his banana away?”

Takoda shook his head. “It’s part of his healing journey. Being here has given him the peace to deal with the things he’s done in the past. He wants, no, he needs time for himself.”

“Hmpf.” Meilin didn’t seem to be buying it.

“So he won’t be able to give us information on Stormspeaker or the Dragon’s Eye?” Conor asked.

“Afraid not,” Takoda said. “He won’t react to anyone.” He looked to one of the corridors, where some of the monks were carrying trays of food. “I’ll get you some dinner. Sit and rest for a moment.”

Xanthe escorted them to one of the tables. “So those things you mentioned ... what are they?”

“Important gifts we have to find for the Greencloaks,” Abeke said, being purposefully vague.

“It’s too bad Kovo can’t help,” Xanthe said.

“We’ll see about that.” Rollan got up from the table and walked over to Kovo. He stood directly in front of the gorilla, looking up at him.

“Rollan ...” Meilin didn’t sound pleased. “What are you doing?”

“I want to see if he’s really as unaware as he’d have us believe.” Rollan clapped his hands loudly in front of Kovo’s red eyes, but the giant gorilla didn’t even blink.

“Rollan!” Abeke raced over and pulled Rollan away just as he began waving his hands in front of Kovo’s face.

“Are you crazy?” Abeke shook her head in disbelief. “Kovo could toss you out that window!”

“We need answers, right?” Rollan broke away from Abeke’s grip and returned to stand in front of Kovo. “Listen, you giant hairball, we need to find Stormspeaker and the Dragon’s Eye. If you’re as smart as you pretend to be, prove it by telling us where they are.”

Silence.

Rollan stood on his toes to get eye-to-eye with Kovo. “You really are one ugly, selfish—”

“Rollan!” Takoda had returned, carrying a tray with several plates of food.

Rollan continued. “Foul-smelling, mangy, good-for-nothing, waste of —”

Takoda slammed the tray down on the table and began marching toward Rollan.

“An unwise move, brave Amayan warrior,” an unfamiliar voice called out from the hall’s entryway, stopping Takoda in his tracks. “Best not to taunt someone who can later exact revenge. Kovo can hear you, he only chooses not to react ... yet.”

Rollan’s mouth twitched and he swallowed the lump that had formed in the back of his throat. He peered around Kovo’s massive chest and saw an old man, his back bent down with the weight of the years, leaning on a gnarled, wooden cane for support. “Yes, well, I was only trying to provoke a reaction, so he’d snap out of it and help us.”

“Reacting out of anger or fear is rarely a good decision. A lesson for Kovo ... and perhaps for you.”

Rollan was about to respond when Takoda interjected.

“Everyone, I want to introduce you to the Honorable Naveb of Maktaba.” He paused as the old man gave the group a slight nod. “He’s one of our esteemed elders and our greatest librarian. He knows where to find all sorts of secrets.”

Meilin bowed in acknowledgement of the elder. “Sir, we’re looking for information about—”

“Yes, yes.” The old man raised a hand. “I may be old, but I could still hear the instigator over there while he was tormenting Kovo.”

“That’s not exactly what ...” Rollan stopped speaking as Abeke gave him a gentle nudge. Silence was a virtue that often escaped Rollan.

“I see you’re from this land.” Naveb motioned to Abeke. “I hope you are brighter than your friend there.”

“Sir,” Abeke responded with respect. “We each have our unique strengths, which—”

“Blah, blah, blah.” Naveb turned around. “Well, come on. Grab your food and let’s go. I’m not getting any younger.” He headed down a dimly lit hallway. “We have work to do ... if you can pass the test.”

Enter your code to
unlock huge rewards:
NRR42GWX4W

Design your own spirit
animal!

Join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!
Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one
of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Get the FREE Spirit Animals app
for tablet or phone.

SPIRIT ANIMALS

SPECIAL EDITIONS

Discover the Hidden Tales of Erdas!

There's more to explore in the Spirit Animals world! These Special Editions reveal the secrets of Erdas in ways you never saw coming...

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SCHOLASTIC and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

Copyright © 2017 by Scholastic Inc.

All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920. SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

The publisher does not have any control over and does not assume any responsibility for author or third-party websites or their content.

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2017941615

ISBN 978-1-338-11667-0

First edition, October 2017

Cover illustration by Angelo Rinaldi

Cover design by Charice Silverman & Rocco Melillo

Art direction by Keirsten Geise

Metal frame: © caesart/Shutterstock

Wood texture: © CG Textures

e-ISBN 978-1-338-11668-7

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereafter invented, without the express written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

THE NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING SERIES

FALL of the BEASTS

A SPIRIT ANIMALS

BOOK 7

STORMSPEAKER

READ
THE BOOK.
UNLOCK
THE GAME.

CHRISTINA DIAZ GONZALEZ

An ancient evil is rising from beneath
Erdas, and we need YOU to help stop it.

Claim your spirit animal and join the
adventure now:

1. Go to scholastic.com/spiritanimals.
2. Log in to create your character and choose your own spirit animal.
3. Have your book ready and enter the code below to unlock the adventure.

Your code: NJT66KW64T

By the Four Fallen,
The Greencloaks

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

“Your prey is not always in front of you,
but sometimes behind.”

FALL of the BEASTS
SPIRIT
ANIMAS™
STORMSPEAKER

Christina Diaz Gonzalez

SCHOLASTIC INC.

For Max: a true animal lover—CDG

CONTENTS

Crown Symbol

Greencloak Letter

Quote Page

Title Page

Map of Erdas

Dedication

1: WARRIOR'S PATH

2: GIANT HAIRBALL

3: NEFRINI'S CROWN

4: LETTERS

5: SAND SCROLL

6: BIRD THIEF

7: BATTLEGROUND

8: UNDERGROUND TOUR

9: VALLEY OF DEATH

10: SLINGSHOT

11: THE HUNT

12: INTRUDERS

13: STORM'S WRATH

14: NEFRINI

15: CAVE DWELLER

16: THE RETURN

17: SID THE GENEROUS

18: CAPTAIN

19: HONEST FIGHT

20: EXPENDABLE

About the Author

Online Game Code

Sneak Peek

Spirit Animals Game

Copyright

WARRIOR'S PATH

ABEKE TOOK A DEEP BREATH AND HELD IT FOR AN EXTRA second before slowly exhaling. From the deck of the ship, in the minutes before daybreak, she could already sense a change in the air. It felt familiar. Even though they were still far away from the savannahs where she'd been raised, the breeze carried the scent, the warmth, the feel of her homeland. Nilo was on the horizon and it couldn't come soon enough.

The five Greencloaks—Abeke, Conor, Meilin, Rollan, and Anka—had been aboard the small ship for several days, and they still had a ways to travel before reaching their final destination in southern Nilo. Abeke was beginning to believe that Uraza's aversion to water was rubbing off on her. All she wanted to do was step foot on solid land ... but they had to press on. Their priority was to hopefully find a clue about the bond tokens in the library of Takoda's former monastery.

But that hope carried an unwanted partner ... someone Abeke and the rest of the team despised. Someone who had also returned to the monastery and who might have a few answers for them.

Kovo.

Even the thought of the Great Ape made Abeke's stomach turn. The gorilla had masterminded both the First and Second Devourer Wars, killing thousands, including Meilin's father. That was something that couldn't simply be forgotten, even if the new version of Kovo had recently helped them defeat the Wym.

The rising sun now streaked the sky with pink and purple rays of light, adding to the beauty of the horizon. Soon Abeke would be seeing Kovo, and she'd have to put aside all her feelings about him.

Abeke stared down into the deep blue water.

Was her anger toward Kovo similar to how people felt about the Greencloaks?

No. She shook away the comparison. It was a different situation. The Greencloaks hadn't acted willingly with the Wyrms—they'd been infected by its parasites. And the Greencloaks had been framed for the assassination of the Emperor of Zhong. Kovo, on the other hand, had done all those terrible things himself. He had taken the world to the brink of human extinction.

Twice.

The thought of Kovo and his conniving ways sent a cold shiver down Abeke's back, causing her to shudder. She had to keep her guard up around that Great Beast.

"Couldn't sleep?" Rollan asked, joining Abeke on the deck. "Or just enjoying the sunrise?"

"Neither." Abeke sighed. "Just thinking."

"Yeah, me too." Rollan leaned his back on the rail. "This rickety old ship hasn't been treating us too bad. Then again, it still has another week to go."

Abeke smiled. The Greencloaks had been lucky that Dawson, after hearing about his brother, had insisted on helping them get out of Eura. Thanks to him, they had supplies, weapons, a ship, and a two-man crew of old fishermen, Milo and Keane.

"I was actually thinking about Kovo," Abeke admitted. "Not looking forward to seeing him again."

"Can you imagine how Conor feels? Last time he was in the waters around Takoda's monastery was when he became infected with the Wyrms' parasite. This really can't be easy for him."

"You're right. I hadn't even ..." Abeke sighed again. She'd been so wrapped up in returning to Nilo that she hadn't stopped to think about Conor. "Have you talked to him? Is he okay?"

"He'll be fine," Meilin said, walking toward them from the bow of the ship. "He's a Hero of Erdas. He's a survivor."

"I was thinking ..." Anka suddenly appeared next to them. Her chameleon-like abilities still made Abeke uneasy. Abeke had always prided herself on her hunting skills, but this diminutive Greencloak seemed to confound her senses. “If the library doesn’t have any information on the bond tokens, will Kovo tell us if he knows anything? I mean, he helped you with the Wyrms, but that was because the whole world was in peril. He’s not a fan of humans ... or Greencloaks.”

“Maybe being bonded to Takoda has changed him,” Rollan said. “Given him a different perspective.” He glanced up at Essix circling above the ship. “Our spirit animals have changed us. And I’d like to think we’ve changed them, too.”

Just as Rollan finished, Essix screeched and dove past the port side, buzzing right over the top of Rollan’s head as if in protest. Essix was stubborn and headstrong, but there was no denying she had a soft spot for Rollan. They worked well together, each one fiercely independent yet always loyal.

Meilin snickered. “You’ve really changed her.”

“Very funny, Essix!” Rollan shouted. “Way to support my point.”

Essix flew around the ship one more time before coming to rest at the top of the mast.

“Maybe Essix saw something.” Conor emerged from belowdecks, a concerned look on his face. He stepped closer to the railing and looked out at the horizon. “In fact, I was coming up to tell you that maybe we shouldn’t go to the monastery at all.”

Meilin placed a hand on Conor’s shoulder. “Conor, it might be difficult for you, after what happened with the Wyrms—”

“That’s not it,” he interrupted. Conor took a step back and looked at the rest of the group. “I had a vision. It was brief, not a full one like I’ve had before with the big wave, but I think we have to go somewhere else.”

“Where?” Abeke asked, quietly pleased at the thought of avoiding Kovo. “What did you see?”

“It was an enormous hole, or maybe a deep crater, and it had three land bridges ... one on top of the other.” Conor closed his eyes for a moment. “It also had a waterfall flowing from the top, past the three bridges, and into a pool at the bottom.”

“And a token was there?” Anka inquired. “Like with the Wildcat’s Claw, where it was hidden behind the waterfall?”

Conor shook his head. “I don’t think so, but it’s the first step in finding them. I’m certain of that. And it felt like we weren’t too far away.”

“Sounds like you’re describing the sinkhole of the Taabara Chasm,” Abeke said. “It’s not too far from here in the northern part of Nilo.”

“Northern Nilo ... I like the sound of that!” Rollan grinned broadly. “Less time being seasick always sounds good to me.”

“Well, at least you’ve been with your spirit animal,” Meilin pointed out. “None of us have had ours during the voyage. It’ll be good to bring them out.”

“Maybe we should split up,” Conor said, just as Essix shrieked and took flight again. “A few of us go to the sinkhole while the rest continue on to see Takoda.” Conor frowned. “Just in case my vision is wrong.”

“I don’t know,” Anka replied. “I think staying together is a better idea.”

“Me too.” Abeke reached over and gave Conor’s forearm a squeeze. They had been through so much together, and she trusted his instincts. “I believe in your visions.... They haven’t been wrong yet.”

“Plus, sticking together might prevent a repeat of what happened with ...” Rollan didn’t finish the sentence. He had almost broken their unspoken rule.

A hush fell over the group. The experience of having lost Worthy in the cave-in was still raw for everyone. It was all they’d discussed during the first days, but then one morning, without anyone saying a word on the matter, they had stopped talking about it. It wasn’t that they weren’t thinking of him; they just had to place their full attention on the task at hand. Their survival depended on it.

From that point forward there was no more wondering if they had done the right thing in leaving, no more worrying whether Worthy had made it out alive, no more fearing that the Wildcat’s Claw had been found by the Oathbound. The focus was on their mission. They had to find the two remaining bond tokens, Stormspeaker and the Dragon’s Eye.

Anka broke the silence. “Abeke, do you know how long it’ll take to get to the Taabara Chasm?”

Abeke shrugged. “Not long, but I’d have to check the map. Hold on.”

Abeke sprinted belowdecks, grabbed the map of Nilo, and hurried back to her friends.

“Look.” She opened it up and pointed to a spot in the ocean near the northern coast of the continent. “We’re somewhere in this area. We can tell Milo and Keane to change course and go toward this river.” She ran her fingers down the coastline to the mouth of a river, traced its path inland, and stopped at a place close to some mountains. “Once we dock we can make our way across the savannah, past this hilly area, and the Taabara Chasm should be right there. We might even make it there by tonight or tomorrow morning.” She paused for a moment. “Maybe. I think.”

“Then it’s set.” Rollan thrust his finger toward the sea and grinned. “Onward! To Taabara Chasm!”

“Um, yeah ... ” Meilin rolled her eyes at Rollan’s over-the-top rally cry, but she couldn’t help smiling. “How about I simply go tell Milo and Keane that we’ve had a change of plans?”

“Just remember ... ” Conor hesitated, rubbing the faint mark the Wyrn had left on his forehead. “Taabara may only be the beginning, and not the end. I have a feeling that the bond tokens won’t be easy to find.”

“Well, since when have things been easy for us?” Abeke gave Conor a wink. “We like a challenge.”

“Yeah, I guess.” Conor turned to face the coastline, lost in his own thoughts.

The sun was directly overhead when they climbed into the small rowboat. There were no ports in the area, so Milo had anchored the ship in the middle of the river and Keane would now row with them to shore.

“So, how long should we wait for you to return?” Keane asked as they approached the riverbank lined with papyrus reeds.

Abeke bit her lip. She wanted to have access to the ship, but it didn’t seem fair to leave the two old men stuck in the middle of nowhere. “The thing is ... we aren’t sure how long we’ll be away.”

“Well, Dawson paid us for two weeks of travel,” Keane replied. “And we’ve got about a week’s worth of food left, so it’s your call.”

“Could you wait here for a couple of days and then head somewhere back along the coast?” Rollan suggested as the boat drifted closer to the river’s edge.

“Sure.” Keane nodded. “I have a sister in Badir; it’s a small port town not too far away. We could meet up there. I’ll give you two more weeks, as Dawson paid us.... That’s about all I can take of my sister anyway.”

“Badir sounds good.” Meilin threw a backpack filled with supplies over her shoulder as the rowboat hit the first of the papyrus reeds. “We’ll meet you there if we don’t make it back here in time.”

“Good luck!” Keane called out. The five Greencloaks jumped out of the boat and into water that was about two feet deep.

Abeke slogged through the river, pushing aside reeds while her feet sank into the sand and silt with every step she took. Finally the ground became firmer and she climbed up on dry land. Once she was out of the reeds and onto the grass of the savannah, Abeke took a deep breath, relishing the hot sun that beat down on her.

She was home.

And only one thing was missing from the scene.

Abeke pushed aside her cloak and held out her arm. “Join me, Uraza.”

The leopard appeared in a flash of light and raised her head to face the sun. The large cat’s nostrils twitched as she took in the Niloan air and softly let out a contented purr.

“I know.” Abeke stroked Uraza’s arched back as they took in their surroundings. “I did the same thing. It’s good to be home.” The tall golden grass of the savannah rippled with the soft breeze. The rocky hills they’d have to cross loomed not too far in the distance.

Uraza stretched her legs. Abeke knew what the leopard wanted. “Go,” she whispered.

Uraza immediately jumped through the tall grass, then raced across the savannah toward the hills at full speed. Abeke knew the joy Uraza felt at being free. How fun it would be to race along with her, to hunt for their next meal and savor the midday sun that was baking her shoulders. But now was not the time. They had a mission.

“Uraza’s as happy as I am not to be on that ship anymore,” Rollan observed. The tall grass moved with the leopard, rustling as she sprinted back and forth. “Aren’t you bringing out Briggan, Conor?”

Conor wiped the back of his neck and looked up at the cloudless blue sky. “Think I’ll wait until the day isn’t quite so hot.”

“This is Nilo,” Abeke warned. “If it’s daytime, it’s going to be hot.”

Essix circled the group, screeched to establish her presence in the sky, then flew away once more.

“Yeah, yeah, we’re moving,” Rollan responded to the falcon’s cry. He adjusted his green cloak, backpack, and canteen. “Everyone have their stuff?” Rollan asked.

“Since when are you the responsible one?” Meilin teased.

Rollan smiled. “Since I realized that I’d have to share my water if someone forgot theirs.”

“Really?” Conor could barely hide his smile. “You mean to say you wouldn’t share with Meilin?”

Abeke heard Anka giggle, even though she could no longer be seen.

They were all aware of the feelings between Rollan and Meilin, but no one usually said anything. It was only confirmed by the occasional reddening of Meilin’s cheeks and Rollan’s quick interest in changing the topic of conversation.

“We’re wasting time.... Let’s go.” Meilin marched ahead, leaving the group behind before Abeke could check to see if her face had turned pink once again.

As the team trekked toward the Taabara Chasm, a few puffy white clouds began to gather, providing occasional relief from the heat. The terrain also changed from the grasses of the savannah to rocky hills dotted with trees. In the distance, what had at first looked like hills quietly morphed into amber-colored mountains, with scattered patches of green.

Stopping for a quick break under the shade of a wide-branched cypress tree, Conor released Briggan. The wolf burst onto the scene and, with his tail wagging, pounced on Conor, knocking him to the ground.

“Whoa,” Conor laughed as Briggan placed his two front paws on Conor’s chest and raised his snout to sniff the air. Conor ran his hand through the Great Wolf’s gray-white fur while the wolf’s cobalt-blue eyes analyzed everything. “Sense anything?”

Briggan glanced down at Conor before giving him a quick lick on his forehead. The wolf jumped off to further inspect their surroundings.

“Ha, I would take that as an all clear,” Anka said, her body blending with the tree trunk she was leaning against.

Abeke opened up the map and checked their location. From the look of things, it seemed like the sinkhole that formed the Taabara Chasm should be close by.

“Are we headed in the right direction?” Meilin asked.

“Think so,” Abeke answered, shielding her eyes from the glare of the sun. She scanned the land for a small stream that might feed into the waterfall of the chasm.

Briggan let out a long howl from somewhere in the distance.

Rollan stretched out his hand to help Conor up. “Sounds like your partner may have found something of interest.”

Conor grinned. “Leave it to Briggan to be here five minutes and already track something down.”

As they all headed toward the sound of Briggan’s howl, Rollan shook his canteen. “I really hope he’s found some fresh water, because I’m almost out.”

Abeke shook her head. “Hm, who was talking about having enough supplies so we wouldn’t have to share water later? Oh yeah, that was you.”

“Hey ... ” Rollan shrugged, a mischievous smile on his face. “These muscles need the extra hydration.”

At that remark, everyone laughed out loud.

“It wasn’t that funny,” Rollan mumbled.

Soon, the group came upon a small stream where Briggan and Uraza had both decided to lounge by its edge.

“Look at those two.” Meilin pointed. “They’re like—”

“Shhh.” Abeke touched her ear. “Listen.”

Besides the gurgling sound of the water bouncing off of several rocks in the stream, there was a louder, crashing sound of rushing water cascading down somewhere.

“The waterfall has to be nearby,” Abeke said as Rollan filled his canteen with water. “It’s got to be downstream.”

Abeke and the group followed the stream until the ground dropped, disappearing into a giant sinkhole. From where they stood, at the very edge of the deep crater, they could see the stream cascade down past three land bridges, each of which seemed to bisect the hole at different depths.

“Now what?” Rollan asked, looking down. “Do we go down into that giant rabbit hole, cross one of the bridges, or stay up here?”

“In my vision, I could see the gorge’s opening high overhead. The water seemed to be falling from above.” Conor patted Briggan, who had now rejoined them. The wolf nuzzled his hand. “So, I think we have to go to the bottom.”

“Yeah,” Rollan sighed. “I was afraid you’d say that.”

Abeke looked at the western sky, where the sun was already hanging low. They had made good time, but it would be much darker in the gorge. Any remaining light would soon disappear. She could already hear a nightingale chirping in the distance. If they were going to go, they needed to be quick about it.

“What do you think, Uraza?” Abeke asked the leopard, who was peering over the edge right next to her. “Should we head down and see if there’s anything there? Or wait until morning?”

Uraza responded by leaping off the rocky ledge onto the path toward the bottom.

“Guess that’s your answer,” Meilin said, following Uraza with a jump of her own. She looked back up at the rest of the group. “Come on!”

Once at the bottom of the crater, Meilin released Jhi. The Great Panda lumbered over to Meilin, and their foreheads touched. The genuine affection between the two was obvious to Abeke. Then Jhi waddled over to where Briggan and Uraza were lapping up water from the edge of the small pond. The entire team spread out, hunting for a clue as to why Conor’s vision had brought them here.

Abeke first searched behind the waterfall, hoping that there might be a cave like in Eura, but there was nothing there.

“Maybe it’s like the Heart of the Land.” Rollan touched the token that hung under his shirt. “Hidden within a rock somewhere.”

“There are a million rocks here, though,” Anka said.

“How about hidden along a path?” Conor pointed to a narrow chasm through the mountain walls.

Abeke walked over to him. “Are you saying we should go through there?” The opening would require them to enter single file. If it got much narrower, their spirit animals would certainly not fit. As it was, Jhi already couldn’t enter.

“See how the ground is worn down in spots?” Conor pointed to the rock floor. “I think this is a path that’s been used before. Used a lot.”

Meilin and Rollan joined them, each peering into the long, narrow chasm.

“We should explore in there before it gets much darker,” Meilin said. “Don’t you think, Rollan?”

Rollan didn’t answer. He only stared into it.

“Rollan?” Conor repeated his name.

Meilin placed a hand on Rollan’s shoulder. “You’re thinking of Tarik, aren’t you?” she said. “The last battle you fought with him.”

“It looked a lot like this place,” he muttered. “Same type of chasm. A warrior’s last path.”

“But it’s not that place, and we aren’t battling the Devourer or the Conquerors,” Meilin replied in a gentle voice.

Suddenly a sense of unease filled Abeke. This would be a good place for an ambush. She glanced around, her hunter instincts on full alert.

It was too quiet.

Even the nightingale had stopped singing. Something was off.

“I think we should get out of here,” Abeke said in a hushed voice. “Maybe have Essix see if—”

Before Abeke could finish her sentence, a hooded figure jumped down and twirled a quarterstaff in front of them.

“Now!” came a shout from above, and suddenly warriors wearing gray cloaks rained down all around them.

First, one dropped behind Abeke. Then another in front. Then two more blocked the path forward through the chasm.

Abeke pulled an arrow from her quiver and nocked it to her bow, just as Meilin drew out her sword.

In a split second, more than two dozen cloaked figures had jumped down from the cliffs ... all pointing their weapons at the five Greencloaks or at their spirit animals over by the pond. High above all of them, balanced on the natural bridge, another dozen attackers stood with arrows trained on Abeke and her friends.

There was no escape.... They were trapped!

GIANT HAIRBALL

FIGHTING A LOSING BATTLE WAS NEVER ROLLAN'S FIRST choice. He had learned on the streets of Concorba that diplomacy could work wonders. Words often yielded better results than any sword. Disarm them with a smile whenever possible.

Rollan quickly assessed the situation. Jhi, Briggan, and Uraza were surrounded, but they would be able to take care of themselves. The four Greencloaks had taken defensive stances against the hooded warriors, but Rollan wasn't sure where Anka had gone. She'd camouflaged herself so well that he couldn't see her at all. What Rollan could see was that these people weren't dressed in all black like the Oathbound.

Perhaps he could convince them that they weren't enemies.

"Friends, friends." Rollan lowered his dagger and took a step toward one of the figures. "We mean you no harm." He acted calm, as if the Greencloaks had the upper hand, instead of the other way around.

"Rollan ... " Meilin's voice carried a warning that this approach might not be the best idea.

Rollan ignored her. She was a warrior at heart. Her instinct was always to fight. But he had to use his gut. He took another step. "We aren't here for a battle. We're only in search of something. Perhaps you could help."

The response came swiftly. The hooded figure in front of him spun his quarterstaff in the air, then swung it low at Rollan's knees, trying to knock his legs out from under him.

Rollan jumped over the end and quickly grabbed the pole, yanking it out of the hooded figure's hand and turning it on him.

So much for diplomacy.

"STOP!" a voice called from above. Another hooded warrior appeared from an opening near one of the land bridges. The figure ran along a path to the bottom, leaping down the last few feet to skid to a halt right in front of Rollan. "Don't harm these people. These are our friends."

Rollan couldn't believe it.... His plan had worked.

The cloaked figure pulled back his gray hood.

"TAKODA!" Meilin exclaimed.

Takoda smiled and rushed over to be embraced by Meilin, Abeke, Conor, and Rollan. "I'm so glad that you're all safe!" he exclaimed, but then lowered his voice to a whisper. "I heard what happened with the Emperor of Zhong. How could the Greencloaks do something like that? What's going on?"

"It was a setup by people impersonating us," Meilin answered. "We're trying to make things right again."

Takoda didn't hesitate. "How can I help?" he asked. "Do you want me to go with you somewhere? Maybe give you a place to hide with the monks?"

Rollan stared at Takoda. The boy had grown about four inches since he'd last seen him. He'd also become more muscular.

But along with Takoda came Kovo, who was bonded to the young monk. Rollan didn't love the idea of traveling with the once subjugator of Erdas. "Have you heard of something called Stormspeaker ... or the Dragon's Eye?"

Takoda shook his head. "What are they?"

"Important items we need in order to clear our names and unite Erdas," Conor explained. "We believe at least one of them is found in Nilo."

Murmuring had risen from the cloaked figures. The monks still had their weapons trained on the group and their spirit animals.

"Takoda, what's going on?" someone shouted.

Takoda turned around. "Everyone, please ... lower your weapons." He pushed down the spear of one of the nearby monks. "These are my friends, the ones I've told you about. The ones who helped defeat the Wyrms. The Heroes of Erdas. We should be welcoming them, not threatening them.”

Briggan growled at one of the hooded monks and Rollan could see Uraza’s muscles tense and tauten. Even Jhi was staring down the person in front of her.

“Place your spirit animals in passive state,” Takoda whispered. “The monks won’t relax if they’re out.”

Meilin, Abeke, and Conor glanced at each other. They each quietly nodded and called back their animals.

Rollan could see the hesitation among the monks, but they slowly put away their weapons and pulled back their hoods in an apparent symbol of acceptance.

Takoda had risen to become a leader in his community. This was definitely not the same boy Rollan had first encountered moping in Greenhaven. The battles underground against the Wyrms had clearly changed him ... or was it Kovo’s influence? Had the bond between him and the Great Beast caused him to grow in his command of others? Was it just a sign of growing up? Rollan wasn’t sure. Perhaps Kovo had changed, too. Doubtful, but anything was possible.

“Do you know someone who might help us?” Meilin asked.

Rollan feared that the answer would be Kovo, but Takoda surprised them. “I don’t know someone with answers, but I know someplace that might have them. Come with me.” Takoda motioned for the group to follow him into the chasm.

“No!” The monk who had attacked Rollan leaped forward, blocking the entrance. “You can’t take them into Maktaba. You’d be placing everyone and everything at risk.”

“Step aside, Sodu.” Takoda stared him down. “I think I’ve earned the right to bring four guests—four friends—into our community.”

Sodu didn’t back off. “They’re wanted by the Oathbound! I’ve heard the rumors of what happens to those who help Greencloaks. We can’t allow them entrance. The library has never been seized, because strangers are not permitted inside.”

“These four aren’t strangers,” Takoda argued. “They’re known to everyone.”

“Ahem.” Anka cleared her throat. She took two steps forward, away from the mountain wall where she had been camouflaging herself, and allowed herself to be seen. “There’s five of us, actually.”

Takoda spun around. He hadn't noticed her, even though she'd been standing so close to him.

"Anka's with us," Meilin quickly explained. "Her spirit animal is a chameleon. We can vouch for her, though."

"You see!" Sodu mocked Takoda. "You can't even recognize danger when it's right next to you." He turned to the monks as Anka blended back into the colors of the mountain. "My brothers, we cannot let them enter. There's no telling what will happen if they do. We would be putting everything at risk."

"What I see"—Takoda spoke to Sodu through clenched teeth—"is someone who pretends to be strong, but is afraid of his own shadow."

"Look who's talking!" Sodu exclaimed. "The boy who couldn't be trusted to travel alone, but who required the guidance of a superior student to accompany him to Maktaba."

Takoda's eyes narrowed. "And when none could be found, they told me to bring you."

"Ha! Nice try, but we all know the truth," Sodu scoffed. "You are still only a boy."

"We'll see about that." Takoda sneered and took a few steps forward. He lifted his arms and addressed the other monks in a loud, booming voice. "Brothers and sisters, you all know me and trust my judgment. These are my friends, the ones who defeated the Devourer and then helped destroy the Wurm. They are the Heroes of Erdas, who have selflessly risked everything for Nilo ... for the entire world. They come to us seeking answers and rest ... something only we can offer. Isn't it our duty to share our knowledge with the righteous and stand against the Oathbound? Will you not rise up, stiffen your resolve, and aid them?"

There were whispers among the monks. A sense of purpose was filling the cavern.

"We are being called to be part of history," Takoda continued, "instead of just preserving the historical accounts. We cannot turn our backs on those who defended us. We have a duty, so I ask you ... " He paused for a moment, capturing everyone's attention. "Who will join me in leading these heroes to find the answers they seek? Who stands with me and with the Heroes of Erdas?"

"I do!" shouted one monk.

"As do I!" yelled another.

“I DO!” hollered the remaining monks in unison. All except Sodu, who stayed silent with his arms crossed.

“To the Heroes of Erdas!” Takoda shouted, raising a fist in the air.

“THE HEROES OF ERDAS!” the monks roared back.

“Glad he’s on our side,” Rollan whispered to Conor as he followed Takoda into the chasm.

As the Greencloaks walked through the narrow passage, it continued closing in on either side. Soon it was impossibly tight, like a fissure running up the mountain. As night fell and the light waned, Takoda lit a small lantern. Rollan glanced up the steep rock walls at the sliver of dark sky above them. He knew Essix was flying above them somewhere, giving them protection from the air.

“So what’s the deal with your friend Sodu?” Rollan asked Takoda. “Not the friendliest monk I’ve seen ... not that I’ve actually seen any before today. Except for you, of course.”

“Yeah, we have some history,” Takoda explained. “We were together at the other monastery before I bonded with Kovo. After everything that happened with the Wyrms, we were both sent here. He’s not my biggest fan.”

Rollan chuckled at the understatement. “You think?”

“Almost there!” Takoda called back to the others as the path opened up to a ledge high up on a mountain.

“Finally. I was wondering when we’d get ... whoa!” Rollan waved his arms, trying to maintain his balance as Takoda yanked him back. In the darkness, he had misjudged where the ledge ended and almost stepped off.

“We’re about two hundred feet up and it’s a straight drop,” Takoda warned.

“A little more notice next time,” Rollan muttered over the pounding of his heart.

“Wow,” Conor said as he stepped onto the ledge. “I didn’t even realize the incline was taking us so high.”

“The monastery is up there.” Takoda pointed to a few twinkling lights in the distance. The moonlight revealed enough of the monastery that Rollan could tell it had been built into the mountainside, about two-thirds of the way to the top.

“Guess we have to take one of these rope ladders the rest of the way up?” Rollan tugged on a pair of old ropes with wooden rungs fastened between them. None of it looked very sturdy. “It’s about another two hundred feet?”

“Two fifty,” Takoda corrected.

“This could explain why you don’t get many visitors,” Meilin added. “Though it does remind me of parts of Zhong.” She grabbed the first ladder’s wooden rung and hoisted herself up.

“Before we all get there, I, um ... ” Takoda suddenly seemed unsure of himself.

“Spit it out,” Meilin said.

“Yeah, so, I was going to ask that you not bring out Uraza, Briggan, or Jhi when we get up there. Maktaba is, well, a sort of particular place, if you haven’t noticed. Not that I don’t want them around, but I’m not sure what the reaction would be.”

“From who?” Abeke asked. “The monks or Kovo?”

Takoda sighed. “Both, I guess.”

They all knew there was no love lost between their spirit animals. Kovo had killed the Four Great Beasts during the First Devourer War and had in turn been killed by them during the second. They had reluctantly worked together to defeat a common enemy, but no one truly knew what would happen if they were thrust together again. Still, Rollan didn’t like the idea of having to accommodate Kovo.

“I think Kovo will just have to figure it out,” Abeke said in a cool, unforgiving voice. “We’ve all had to deal with him.”

“But we’re guests,” Conor reasoned. “Let’s not stir up any trouble.”

“Kovo is different now,” Takoda said as they each began climbing the ladders. “You’ll see.”

Rollan was about to make a joke when he glanced down at the steep drop to the bottom and felt his head spin. Devastating quips would have to wait, since he needed all his concentration to not fall. As they continued up the mountain, the glow of the moon rising over the adjacent mountain peak cast a dim light over their surroundings. It was nighttime, but Rollan wasn’t looking anywhere except at the rung right above him. It seemed as if everyone was focused on the climb, because no one spoke. In fact, all Rollan could hear were the occasional grunts and sighs as someone paused to catch their breath before pressing on.

Once they arrived at the monastery, Rollan turned to look back at the view. An enormous sense of peace washed over him. It was a combination of the beauty of the thousand stars above him and the moon rising silently in the sky. Wind whispered past the oil lanterns lighting the entrance to Maktaba. For the first time in weeks he felt safe, a security provided by the remote location.

“Nice, huh?” Takoda smiled, taking it all in as if for the first time. “Just be careful with the thorns that line the bushes near the entrance.” He waited for the remaining Greencloaks and then motioned for them all to follow him. “Come on, I think someone may want to see you.”

“I doubt it,” Abeke muttered as she walked past Rollan.

Rollan nodded in agreement. Kovo couldn’t have changed that much.

The group passed several monks in the wide corridors who silently stared as they walked by... It seemed that word of their arrival was spreading throughout the monastery.

“This is the Great Hall,” Takoda said, entering a large room where oil lamps hung from the many rafters that crisscrossed the vaulted ceiling. There were a few monks eating at one of the long dining tables on the right side of the room, and a fire burned in the massive fireplace on the opposite end. “Figured you might want to stop and get something to eat before—”

“MEILIN! CONOR!” someone shouted while running down a darkened staircase in the corner. “ROLLAN! ABEKE!”

Takoda smiled. “Told you someone would want to see you.”

A girl with white hair and almost translucent skin rushed into the light.

It was Xanthe, the Sadrean warrior Meilin and Conor had met while battling the Wyrms underground. “I can’t believe you’re all here!” She hurried over and pulled Meilin close to her. “Takoda and I heard about what happened to your surface elder—er, emperor. How could—”

“It wasn’t us,” Meilin explained. “They were imposters.”

Xanthe tapped Takoda in the chest with the back of her hand. “What did I tell you? I knew it couldn’t be real Greencloaks.”

“And since when are you a monk, Xanthe?” Conor teased. “Or are you here for another reason?”

Takoda blushed at the insinuation, but Xanthe simply rolled her eyes. “I’m here to give a record of my people’s history. Preserve the Sadrean stories for future generations.”

“How are things in Sadre now?” Meilin asked.

“Still recovering. Phos Astos will never be the same, but it’s being rebuilt ... slowly.”

“Sounds like several places we’ve seen,” Anka said.

Xanthe scanned the room. “Who said that?”

“Oh.” Meilin spun around. “That’s Anka. I forgot to introduce the two of you. Anka, Anka, where are you?”

“Right here.” Anka stepped away from a purple curtain in a dark corner of the room, her skin and clothing changing from purple to their natural coloring. “Don’t mind me. Nobody does. Pleasure to meet you, Xanthe.”

“Uh, yes, nice to meet you, too,” Xanthe replied as Anka moved into the shadows and blended back into her surroundings.

That was when the group noticed him: a large looming figure who sat in the darkest corner of the space, draped in shadow and staring out the window. His massive back was turned to the group, but there was no mistaking him.

Kovo.

“Guess we don’t merit even a glance from him,” Abeke speculated.

“That’s not it,” Takoda explained. “Ever since we stopped the Wurm, Kovo’s gone almost completely silent. He rarely communicates with me, and he refuses to go into passive form.”

Rollan cautiously drew closer to the Great Ape. “Is something wrong? Did someone take his banana away?”

Takoda shook his head. “It’s part of his healing journey. Being here has given him the peace to deal with the things he’s done in the past. He wants, no, he needs time for himself.”

“Hmpf.” Meilin didn’t seem to be buying it.

“So he won’t be able to give us information on Stormspeaker or the Dragon’s Eye?” Conor asked.

“Afraid not,” Takoda said. “He won’t react to anyone.” He looked to one of the corridors, where some of the monks were carrying trays of food. “I’ll get you some dinner. Sit and rest for a moment.”

Xanthe escorted them to one of the tables. “So those things you mentioned ... what are they?”

“Important gifts we have to find for the Greencloaks,” Abeke said, being purposefully vague.

“It’s too bad Kovo can’t help,” Xanthe said.

“We’ll see about that.” Rollan got up from the table and walked over to Kovo. He stood directly in front of the gorilla, looking up at him.

“Rollan ... ” Meilin didn’t sound pleased. “What are you doing?”

“I want to see if he’s really as unaware as he’d have us believe.” Rollan clapped his hands loudly in front of Kovo’s red eyes, but the giant gorilla didn’t even blink.

“Rollan!” Abeke raced over and pulled Rollan away just as he began waving his hands in front of Kovo’s face.

“Are you crazy?” Abeke shook her head in disbelief. “Kovo could toss you out that window!”

“We need answers, right?” Rollan broke away from Abeke’s grip and returned to stand in front of Kovo. “Listen, you giant hairball, we need to find Stormspeaker and the Dragon’s Eye. If you’re as smart as you pretend to be, prove it by telling us where they are.”

Silence.

Rollan stood on his toes to get eye-to-eye with Kovo. “You really are one ugly, selfish—”

“Rollan!” Takoda had returned, carrying a tray with several plates of food.

Rollan continued. “Foul-smelling, mangy, good-for-nothing waste of —”

Takoda slammed the tray down on the table and began marching toward Rollan.

“An unwise move, brave Amayan warrior,” an unfamiliar voice called out from the hall’s entryway, stopping Takoda in his tracks. “Best not to taunt someone who can later exact revenge. Kovo can hear you; he only chooses not to react ... yet.”

Rollan’s mouth twitched and he swallowed the lump that had formed in the back of his throat. He peered around Kovo’s massive chest and saw an old man, his back bent down with the weight of the years, leaning on a gnarled, wooden cane for support. “Yes, well, I was only trying to provoke a reaction, so he’d snap out of it and help us.”

“Reacting out of anger or fear is rarely a good decision. A lesson for Kovo ... and perhaps for you.”

Rollan was about to respond when Takoda interjected.

“Everyone, I want to introduce you to the Honorable Naveb of Maktaba.” He paused as the old man gave the group a slight nod. “He’s one of our esteemed elders and our greatest librarian. He knows where to find all sorts of secrets.”

Meilin bowed in acknowledgment of the elder. “Sir, we’re looking for information about—”

“Yes, yes.” The old man raised a hand. “I may be old, but I could still hear the instigator over there while he was tormenting Kovo.”

“That’s not exactly what—” Rollan stopped speaking as Abeke gave him a gentle nudge. Silence was a virtue that often escaped Rollan.

“I see you’re from this land.” Naveb motioned to Abeke. “I hope you are brighter than your friend there.”

“Sir,” Abeke responded with respect, “we each have our unique strengths, which—”

“Blah, blah, blah.” Naveb turned around. “Well, come on. Grab your food and let’s go. I’m not getting any younger.” He headed down a dimly lit hallway. “We have work to do ... if you can pass the test.”

NEFRINI'S CROWN

MEILIN EYED THE OLD MONK. HE WAS BALD, WITH A short white beard that stood out against his dark skin. His cane tapped the stone floors with a deliberate, rhythmic pattern as he led the group down the maze of corridors. At first glance, the old man appeared frail and unsteady, but to Meilin there was something in the way he had held her gaze that made her think he was much more.... She just didn't know what.

“Where are we going?” Meilin whispered to Xanthe.

“One of the libraries, I think,” she answered. “There are several of them here.”

They entered a large circular room filled with thousands of books, piled all the way to the rafters. Meilin could only marvel at the size of the place. She'd seen many libraries in her lifetime, but this one room rivaled the largest of them.

Naveb waited for them in the center of the room. He stood motionless, his eyes closed and both of his hands resting on his cane.

One minute passed, then another.

Meilin glanced at Takoda, hoping he'd reveal a clue about what was happening. He merely shrugged. The silence had become uncomfortable. They were wasting time ... time that could be spent looking for the bond tokens. Was this part of the test he'd mentioned? Meilin considered bringing Jhi out of passive state so she could give Meilin the serenity to see things clearly, perhaps pick up on some cues they were overlooking.

“Um, Master Naveb, are we waiting for something?” Conor asked.

Naveb did not answer, but instead approached Conor. He stared at the faint mark of the Wyrms on his forehead, then narrowed his eyes in recognition of the symbol. "Ah, so you are the one. The Greencloak who took Takoda from the monastery. The one who succumbed to the Wyrms in Sadre, and eventually turned on him and all his allies."

"Yes, but what happened there ... I didn't have a choice," Conor explained hastily.

"There's always a choice," Naveb responded sharply. "And you made yours."

"No, no. You don't understand. I had no control." Conor rubbed the mark, as if he could wipe away its stain.

Meilin's blood began to boil. She could not allow this man to insult Conor for being infected by the Wyrms, even if he was an elder. She knew how hard Conor had battled against it, what he had sacrificed, and how some of his actions while under the Wyrms' influence still tore at his heart. It wasn't fair to him and it wasn't fair to what they'd all endured.

"Regardless of what you say, you are not like the others. Not even the instigator." Naveb pointed to the door. "You will have to leave before we can continue."

"Excuse me, sir ... " Meilin summoned up every lesson in self-control that she'd learned while growing up in the palaces of Zhong. "But you have no right to say that to Conor. I don't know what Xanthe or Takoda told you, but Conor is no less than a hero." Meilin glanced over at Conor. "He is, and always will be, one of us. If he goes, we all go."

"And do you all feel the same way?" Naveb looked toward Rollan and Abeke.

"Absolutely," Rollan said, walking to stand next to Conor. "We can always find answers somewhere else."

Abeke took Conor's hand, linking her fingers with his, and lifted their intertwined hands. "We're a team. Now and forever."

"I see." Naveb took a step back. "But you won't find answers anywhere else." He was barely able to hide a smirk beneath his beard. "You will stay and find your answers here, because you have passed my test." He walked over to a black ladder with wheels on the bottom. "It is said that those who pursue the bond tokens must be united in mind and spirit. I would never help a fractured group seeking such powerful items." He rolled the ladder along a metal railing that ran around the room. “Despite being young, you have endured much, and yet you’re still united. That is why I will help.”

Meilin’s mouth dropped open. “So you only said those things to see if you could split us up? You didn’t really mean it.”

“No, I meant what I said. I always do.” He stopped and climbed the first two steps. “That boy is an instigator, and the other one’s choices have set him apart from his friends.”

They were back to where they’d started ... being disrespected.

“Most Honored Naveb,” Takoda began, “these are the Heroes of—”

“Here it is!” Naveb pulled out a book from the shelf. He turned to look down at Takoda’s concerned face. “My dear boy, I am not insulting your friends. I am merely speaking the truth.” He took a cautious step down, then another. “Is the one from Amaya not an instigator? Every group needs someone to get things moving, and to lighten the mood when our burdens become too heavy.”

Naveb took his cane in one hand and tucked the book beneath his other arm. “And the Euran boy, was it not his choice to stand and fight on behalf of Kovo—his once enemy—at great risk to himself? His actions have shown him to be kind and selfless. He is forgiving of others’ mistakes ... but he has yet to extend that forgiveness to himself.”

The old monk hobbled over to a small desk, set down the book, and looked at Meilin. “Am I not right about your friends?”

Meilin didn’t say anything, but he did have a point about Rollan and Conor.

“You know I am, warrior girl.” Naveb struck a match and lit an oil lamp on the desk. He opened the book, then looked back at Meilin and chuckled.

“What’s so funny?” Meilin asked.

“You,” Naveb replied. Then he returned to the book, flipping through the first few pages. “A fighter who must battle herself to achieve what she truly wants.”

“I don’t even know what that means,” Meilin scoffed, but she caught Rollan and Abeke exchanging a smirk.

Naveb shook his head and sighed. “I was once like you. Pretending to be tough in spirit. You will learn.” He pointed to a page in the book. “Now, Niloan girl, come and look at this. It tells of Stormspeaker.”

Abeke rushed forward and Meilin followed, peering over her shoulder at the book. In the middle of one of the pages was a drawing of a slender, dark-skinned woman with a tall, elegant bird standing by her side.

“Isn’t that Nefrini, the High Chieftess of Nilo, with her spirit animal, Nazir?” Abeke asked.

The old monk nodded. “I see you know your Niloan history, but here is something you won’t find in any other book or library.” He turned the page to a listing of property owned by Nefrini. At the very top was the word Stormspeaker.

“Whoa,” Abeke muttered. “Stormspeaker was hers and Nazir’s.”

“What does it say about the bond token?” Conor asked.

“It describes Stormspeaker as being made of gold, with a brilliant green stone in its center,” Meilin said.

Abeke ran her finger down the page, looking for another clue. “But not what it is or where to find it.”

“As you are a hunter, I thought you’d be more observant,” Naveb chided. “Your prey is not always in front of you, but sometimes behind you.”

Abeke glanced at Conor standing in the back, then realized what Naveb meant. “The earlier page. The one with the drawing.”

“Perhaps there is hope for you yet,” Naveb said, flipping back to the image of Nefrini.

“Stormspeaker is her crown!” Abeke exclaimed.

Anka appeared next to Abeke, squeezing past Conor, Rollan, and Meilin. “You’re right. It’s made of gold and the front has a bird grasping a green stone in its beak.”

“Not just any bird,” Naveb corrected, unfazed by Anka’s sudden appearance.

“A hammerkop, also known as a lightning bird.” Abeke smiled. “Like Nazir.”

“But where do we find this crown?” Rollan asked.

“Ah ... for that we will have to look in one of our other books.” Naveb scanned the room. “I believe the only reference we have is in a journal left behind by a Greencloak who visited long ago.” He stroked his beard. “Now, where would that book be?” He hobbled over to one of the shelves and began running his hand over the spines of several books.

“Did you meet this Greencloak?” Abeke asked.

“Oh, no.” Naveb kept searching. “He visited before I was even born.”

“Then it’s really ancient history,” Rollan said with a smirk.

Naveb either didn’t hear him or chose to ignore the comment. “Here it is,” he said, pulling out a thin, leather-covered journal with the name Tembo engraved in gold letters on the front, and passed it to Takoda.

“Stop!” Sodu burst in and yanked the book from Takoda’s hands. “Master Naveb, you cannot trust these killers. They should never have been allowed entry. Anything they discover might be traced to us. We could be judged as conspirators. Don’t you understand? We’ll be labeled traitors!”

“Sodu,” Master Naveb sighed. “I understand things completely.”

Takoda lunged for the book just as Sodu spun around the desk, keeping out of reach.

“Give it back,” Meilin demanded, stalking Sodu around the desk, while Conor slowly approached from behind. She was waiting for the right moment to attack. “If you know what’s good for you.”

Sodu met Meilin’s gaze, then a slight smile crept across his face. “Guess this book is pretty important, huh?”

Before Meilin could react, Sodu grabbed the oil lamp and smashed the glass on the corner of the desk.

“What are you doing?” Abeke yelled.

Sodu’s eyes narrowed as he held the thin book over the open flame, the bottoms of the pages curling with the heat. “Leave now,” he snarled, “or this book burns.”

LETTERS

CONOR AND THE OTHER GREENCLOAKS BACKED AWAY from Sodu, raising their hands in surrender, knowing that the book he held over the flame might be their only lead to finding Stormspeaker. In return, Sodu's lips tipped up to form a victorious sneer. But his delight in having the upper hand lasted only for a moment.

Whack!

Sodu's eyes bulged as all the air left his lungs.

Master Naveb's cane had come flying across Sodu's back with resounding speed. Before anyone could react, Master Naveb spun his cane and slapped the book high into the air. He then twisted into a roundhouse kick, striking Sodu in the chest. As Sodu tumbled to his knees, Master Naveb slid across the room and caught the book before it could hit the floor. Slowly, he pulled himself up with his cane and dusted off the cover of the journal.

"Hold on to it a little tighter this time," he said, handing the book back to Takoda.

Conor couldn't believe what he had just witnessed. The old monk was an incredible fighter. He was equal parts grace, strength, instinct, and speed. They could all learn so much from him.

"Master Naveb ... " Sodu staggered up.

"Leave this library," Master Naveb ordered. "We will discuss your punishment later."

Sodu kept his gaze on the floor. “I truly meant no harm or disrespect.”

“Yet you committed both,” Naveb said dryly. “Your lack of trust in my decision confirms what I told Ananda when she sent you here with Takoda. I cannot teach someone who only sees with eyes of fear.”

Sodu lifted his head. “No, Master.” His voice had an edge to it. “I fear only one thing. I fear what your recklessness will bring down upon this place.” He turned on his heel and stormed out of the library before anything else could be said.

No one moved. Sodu had left, but traces of the turmoil he’d brought seemed to linger.

Rollan broke the silence. “I think he may now have a fear of canes, too,” he said with a grin.

Master Naveb shot Rollan a stern look and the boy’s grin disappeared.

“Master Naveb, those moves ...” Meilin said with barely restrained awe. “It was as if you were flying.”

This comment seemed to please the old monk. His face softened and his shoulders relaxed. “Yes, well, once a warrior, always a warrior.” He pointed to Takoda. “Go ahead and open the Greencloak’s journal. If there’s any information about where to find Stormspeaker, it’ll be there.”

Takoda gently placed the book on the desk and opened it. He glanced sheepishly at Conor. “You should probably do this and not me,” he said, stepping aside. “I’m no Greencloak.”

Conor hesitated. “You might not be wearing the cloak, but you’re just as much a hero as any of us. We owe you a lot, Takoda. And we wouldn’t even have the book if you hadn’t gotten us in here.” He placed a hand on the boy’s shoulder. “Go on, you should be the one to read it.”

Takoda shook his head. “But you are—”

“Oh, for the love of—” Meilin gently pushed Conor and Takoda aside. “Why don’t I just read it?”

“Well, someone should read the book, considering everything that just happened.” Master Naveb hobbled toward the door. “Speaking of which, I should go see about that foolish Sodu. He’s had enough time to contemplate his actions.”

“Thank you for pointing us in the right direction, Master Naveb,” Conor said as he accompanied the old monk to the door.

“Yes, thank you!” Rollan shouted in agreement.

“Meh!” Master Naveb waved them both off without turning around. “Such noise! A library is supposed to be a place of quiet contemplation,” he complained, but as he turned the corner, Conor caught the slightest smile on the old monk’s face.

“Come here, Conor,” Abeke urged as they all gathered around the desk where Meilin was hunched over the journal, her face close to the pages.

“The lettering is faded in some parts,” Meilin muttered. “And he writes in this ornate calligraphy-like style.”

She scanned the first pages. “This beginning part is all about Tembo’s travels ... where he eats and sleeps.” She read a little further into the journal. “Oh, and here he is talking about some earlier battles and the formation of the Greencloaks.” She gasped. “He was there when Briggan and the other Four Fallen united the Greencloaks against the first Devourer! And he claims that he once rode on Uraza’s back?”

“That ... doesn’t sound like Uraza,” Rollan said doubtfully.

“What does it say about Stormspeaker and the Dragon’s Eye?” Anka asked from an unseen location, the shadows of the library giving her even more camouflage than usual.

“Nothing yet ... ” Meilin continued reading. “But I’m beginning to think we’ve been walking in this Tembo’s footsteps all along. According to his journal, he’s the mysterious Greencloak who hid the Wildcat’s Claw in Wilcoskov. And it says here that ... ” Meilin looked up, her eyes wide. “He was the one who started the tradition of Greencloak leaders passing down the Heart of the Land. Tembo was the first leader of the Greencloaks.” She glanced down again, her finger stopping halfway on the page. “Oh, here’s something even more interesting ... ”

“What?” Xanthe leaned over the desk from the opposite side.

“He’s describing his approach to the monastery. Climbing a rope ladder and being greeted by several monks. They welcomed him and gave him a place to stay.” Meilin turned the page. “It says that the monks grew suspicious of him when they discovered that he was carrying two dangerous and powerful items.”

“That was probably them!” Rollan interjected.

Meilin paused and raised a single eyebrow. “Are you going to let me finish?”

Rollan gave her a quick bow in mock deference. “By all means, my lady. Continue.”

Meilin took a deep breath and slowly exhaled. “Yes, it says that the two objects were the crown of Nefrini, known as Stormspeaker, and an orb called the Dragon’s Eye. That night a group of monks confronted Tembo. There was some type of argument. The monks tried to convince Tembo to give up the objects.” Meilin flipped the page. “This can’t be,” she muttered, turning back to the prior page.

“What’s wrong?” Rollan peered over her shoulder.

“It seems like Tembo took off and left behind this journal with a note for the monks.” She turned the page again and pointed to the words written in square, blocky letters. They were different from the rest of the journal. “It says, and I quote ... ” Meilin read the words carefully. “I depart as you wish, but in light of what is written, the orb carries on to no one, and the key to finding Stormspeaker is nowhere to be found.”

“He’d rather destroy them than have the monks guard them?” Takoda took a step back. “Why?”

“No.” Conor shook his head. “A Greencloak wouldn’t do that with something so important. There has to be a mistake,” Conor insisted. “Read it again.” His vision had led them to this place for a reason. Even though something made him wary, he knew they were on the right track. They were close, he was sure of it.

Rollan read over Meilin’s shoulder. “That’s what it says. I don’t think it means that he destroyed it, but he probably hid it in such a way that he thought no one would ever find it.”

The bookshelves appeared to shift under the light of the oil lamp as Anka moved away from the far corner. “Well, we have to go look for the hiding place,” Anka said. “We didn’t come all this way for nothing.”

Xanthe sighed. “But where do you start? Do you have any other leads?”

Conor thought about the vision that had brought them here. Perhaps they weren’t supposed to be searching for the bond tokens in Nilo. Maybe that was what they needed to discover. That the answers were somewhere else. “Maybe we should move on to Zhong. Try to find answers there.”

“No. We can’t simply move on because this didn’t pan out,” Anka countered. “Since when do Greencloaks give up?” She paused, allowing her words to sink in. “Stormspeaker could still be here, and Kovo might have some answers. We can ask him again,” she suggested. “He probably knows about Tembo.”

“You’re right, but this time you can do the asking,” Rollan replied. “I think I may have pushed my luck with that gorilla. Maybe he’ll like that now-you-see-me, now-you-don’t trick.”

“No, Kovo is off-limits,” Takoda stated. “I won’t put him at risk. He may not look it, but he’s very fragile right now.”

Rollan opened his mouth to say something, but seemed to think better of it.

“Anka’s right, though... We have to try other options. Why don’t we look through more records?” Meilin walked around the room. “There are different libraries in this monastery, right? So there must be other books and scrolls. Maybe we can find a clue somewhere else.”

“I’ll go find Master Naveb,” Takoda suggested, heading toward the door. “He may have an idea of where we should start. I’ll be right back.” Then he disappeared into the shadow of the hallway.

“So what do we do while we wait? Just start going through all these books?” Xanthe pulled a random book from the shelf and flipped to a page in the center. “Looking for what?”

“Anything. Something.” Abeke opened a book on ancient Niloan homes. “Maybe someone else wrote about Tembo’s visit and where he went. We can’t give up.”

“No one is quitting,” Rollan reiterated from the other side of the room. “There’s an answer here ... somewhere.”

Conor meandered around the room. “I never said anything about quitting,” he muttered. “It was only a suggestion.”

Meilin held out her hand, and with a flash of light, Jhi appeared next to her. The large panda glanced around, noticed that there was no danger in the room, and plopped down on her hind legs.

“Meilin!” Abeke exclaimed in a hushed voice. “We told Takoda we wouldn’t bring out our spirit animals. Don’t you think I want Uraza with me?”

“Uraza doesn’t help you see all sides of a problem like Jhi does,” Meilin countered, stroking the side of the panda’s large neck where the white fur met the black. “Plus, we’re the only ones in here.” Meilin leaned closer and whispered something to Jhi.

Jhi nodded and closed her eyes as Meilin did the same.

Conor thought of Briggan. He wanted to run his hand over the wolf’s silver back and feel the energy that always seemed to fill him up when they were together. Briggan understood him like no one else. Sometimes it felt as if the two of them shared a more personal bond than any of the other Greencloaks did with their spirit animals. It was as if they were both cut from the same cloth. Twin souls.

But now wasn't the time to have him there. It was time for Conor to focus on what he could for the mission. If only he had some control over his visions. He stared at Tembo's journal, still open on the desk, willing himself into a trance. No vision came to him, but from where he stood he did notice that some of the letters in the journal seemed to be off-center.

Conor approached the desk slowly, cocked his head to the side, and squinted his eyes. He studied the words carefully. The W was definitely written differently than the other block letters. It was in the calligraphy-like style found in the rest of the journal.

"Um, everyone. I think you need to come over here." His eyes stayed on the page, as if shifting them away might make it all disappear.

"Do we have to?" Rollan had sat down in a corner with a stack of books on either side of him. "Can't you just tell us what you're thinking?"

"It's about Tembo and what he wrote." Conor held up the book. He may not have been the strongest reader in the group, but he knew that the words he saw weren't the same ones Meilin had read. A smile crept over Conor's face. The poor shepherd boy had figured it out all on his own. "I think I found our next clue ... and it was right here all along. Written in plain sight."

SAND SCROLL

“WHAT DO YOU MEAN IT WAS RIGHT THERE?” ROLLAN asked, slowly getting up from the floor. It was late and he didn’t want to play games. “We all saw what was in the book. Tembo said he hid it somewhere that no one could find.”

“Not quite.” Conor set the book back down on the desk and put his fingertip on one of the last words written at the bottom of the page. “Look carefully at the letters.”

Rollan and the others gathered around Conor and stared at the book. Rollan didn’t understand what was supposed to be happening. The words hadn’t changed.

the key to finding Stormspeaker is nowhere to be found.

“Conor, we’re all tired.” Rollan rubbed his right eye. “Can you just tell us what you’re thinking?”

“The w in nowhere. Look. Don’t you see it?” Conor pointed to the letter as Abeke stared at the book. “The way it’s written, it could be part of the word or there could be a little space after it.”

“So?” Xanthe tucked a lock of her white hair behind her ear as she squeezed by Jhi to get a better look. “How does that—”

“That changes everything!” Abeke exclaimed, throwing her arms around Conor in a big bear hug. “You’re a genius!”

Rollan shook his head. Maybe he was too tired after a long day of trekking through Nilo and climbing up to the monastery, but he still didn't understand what they were talking about. Usually by this point he could rely on Meilin to say something that would bring it all into focus, but she'd become quiet and pensive. Rollan knew this was Jhi's influence, allowing her to study a situation from different perspectives, but it was still unnerving to him. He liked Meilin's normal take-no-prisoners attitude.

"Look." Conor motioned for Rollan to get closer. "If you read nowhere as two separate words"—he placed his finger under the word—"it says that the key to finding Stormspeaker is now here to be found." He let out a little sigh. "But 'here' is a pretty big place, and we still don't know where to start looking."

Meilin stood still, biting her bottom lip while staring at the journal. She had one hand buried in Jhi's fur and the other just hung by her side.

"Meilin." Xanthe said her name softly. "Are you okay?"

"Mm-hm," Meilin muttered absentmindedly. Then she blinked, her mouth twitched, and the edges of her lips curled up.

Rollan could sense that the Meilin he knew was coming back. "Oh, she's got something." He felt the energy in the room shift. He loved that Meilin had that effect on people and situations.

"I knew it!" Takoda barged into the library. "I said not to bring out any of the Great Beasts and you did it anyway. Kovo is restless, and it's because Jhi's here."

Abeke's face hardened. "His being bothered by having such a kind and peaceful soul as Jhi in the monastery says more about Kovo and his lack of growth than anything else could." She rolled back her shoulders. "We needed answers, and Jhi is the only Great Beast who could, or would, help."

Meilin rubbed Jhi's back. "Thank you, my friend," she whispered as she held out her arm. "I'll bring you out again soon." Jhi glanced at Takoda and dipped her head. In a flash of light she disappeared, once again becoming a tattoo on Meilin's hand.

"I don't mean to be rude.... It's just the way things have to be." Takoda seemed embarrassed. "I couldn't find Master Naveb and then Kovo started to—"

"Doesn't matter," Rollan interrupted. "Conor figured out that the clue is here, and I think Meilin knows something more." He held back a mischievous smile. "If her highness is ready to share it with the rest of us."

Meilin rolled her eyes. “All right ... ” She walked in front of the desk, then glanced back at Rollan. “You think you can keep up?” she teased.

Rollan laughed. “Oh, I can more than keep up. Just try me!”

In the light of the broken oil lamp, Rollan could see Meilin’s cheeks turning pink with their little banter.

“So what is it?” Anka asked from somewhere in the room.

Meilin pointed to the page numbers on the bottom corner of each page. “Tembo wasn’t only clever about using the words now and here.... He also put another clue for everyone to see.” She pointed to the page number written on the last page. “This page should be 147, since the one before is 146, but it’s numbered 159.”

“So there are pages missing,” Conor reasoned. “Someone tore them out.”

Meilin shook her head. “No, nothing seems to be missing, and the five in 159 isn’t how Tembo wrote his other number fives. It actually looks more like an S.”

“One-S-nine?” Rollan was puzzled. “What does that mean?”

Meilin bit her lip. “That’s what I don’t know.”

“One-S-nine,” Takoda repeated. “One Scroll nine. That’s how we catalog all our ancient scrolls. Library One, scroll number nine!”

“Tembo could have listed the location of Stormspeaker there!” Rollan put his hands on Takoda’s shoulders and turned him around to face the door. “What are we waiting for? Let’s go find it.”

Takoda wiggled away. “Library One is our original library, where our most ancient records are kept. No one goes in there without permission from Master Naveb. No one.”

“Seriously?” Meilin put her hands on her hips. “You’re not going to help us get it?”

“I don’t think that’s what he meant.” Xanthe stepped in. “Takoda has permission to go inside. He can get it and bring it back here for us.” She glanced at Takoda and widened her eyes. “Right? Isn’t that what you meant?”

Takoda didn’t say anything, and Rollan certainly didn’t like the idea. “But what if there are other clues over there? Something Takoda might overlook. Stormspeaker itself might be hidden inside.”

“I wouldn’t miss anything,” Takoda corrected. “If it’s there, I’d see it.”

“Exactly.” Xanthe nodded. “So Takoda will take care of it. Isn’t that so, Takoda?”

“It’s not the way things are supposed to work, but ... ”

Xanthe placed her hand on Takoda’s arm and he grew quiet. “Then it’s settled!” Xanthe said brightly.

Takoda looked down at Xanthe’s hand still on his arm. He smiled and nodded.

“The window!” Xanthe abruptly shouted, pointing to the far side of the room.

Everyone turned to look as Xanthe darted toward it.

“What is it?” Anka asked, already by the window.

“A pair of eyes,” Xanthe muttered, staring into the dark night. “I think it was a bird peering in, because it took off when I pointed.”

Xanthe thrust open the window and looked out. The night breeze slipped into the room, causing the flame of the oil lamp to flicker.

“At this time of night, maybe it was an owl?” Takoda suggested. “Though I’ve never seen one up here.”

A shriek in the distance echoed through the room.

Rollan knew exactly who made that noise.

Essix.

“I think I know who that was.” Rollan smiled. “My faithful companion didn’t want to come in. She’s just letting us know she’s nearby.”

“But isn’t Essix really big?” Xanthe leaned a little farther out the window, still scanning the sky. “I don’t think this bird was that large.”

“It’s really dark and you were pretty far away.... How could you tell?” Anka asked.

“Being from Sadre, where there’s no sunlight, I can usually see better at night. But maybe I was wrong.” Xanthe let out a deep sigh. “My eyesight has changed since I’ve been aboveground ... one of the negatives of being here, I guess.”

Takoda walked over to Xanthe. “You still have the best nighttime vision of anyone I know,” he said softly. “We’ll visit Phos Astos soon, and then I’ll be the one who can’t see too well.” He leaned over the windowsill and pulled the window closed. “So let’s keep this closed, in case Essix changes her mind.” Takoda smiled and glanced over at the Greencloaks. “At least while I go to Library One and get the scroll for all of us to read.”

Rollan wasn't sure where Library One was located, but it couldn't have been too far, because Takoda returned within minutes, a little out of breath. In one hand he held a large rolled-up scroll, and in the other was an oil lantern.

"Here it is," Takoda said, hanging up the lantern. "I don't think anyone has read this in a very long time." He blew off a large layer of dust as Rollan helped unfurl the scroll over the desk.

"It's an academic study of the desert sands," Xanthe said, standing on the other side of Takoda. "Different types of minerals, how they shift with the wind, what plants grow best in each sand. Does this help you at all?"

Rollan didn't respond. He had made sure to stand next to Takoda so he wouldn't be the last one to figure out the clue this time. He wanted to prove to everyone, especially Meilin, that he had more than just street smarts.

They spent close to an hour reading through the scroll. Rollan's eyes felt as if they were beginning to cross, and the words were swimming around on the paper. He wasn't any closer to finding Stormspeaker.

"I've lived around deserts all my life—" Abeke yawned, interrupting herself. "And I never thought someone could write this much about ... sand."

"Why not?" Rollan touched the Heart of the Land, the amber stone hanging on a chain under his shirt. He knew that sand, like dirt, could shape a continent. "It's a powerful part of the earth."

Abeke rolled her eyes. "You think I don't know that?" She shook her head. "Don't forget, I'm the one from Nilo. I've seen sand carried in a windstorm causing the sun to be blocked out and turning the day into night. It's overtaken whole villages, covering everything. You probably haven't seen anything like that in Amaya."

Conor raised both his hands to put a stop to the bickering. "Listen, we're all tired and there doesn't seem to be anything here. Maybe if we go to sleep and look at it again in the morning light, we'll figure something out."

Rollan thought back to Tembo's note. There was something written about a light. "Where's the journal?" Rollan lifted up the scroll and placed the book on top. He went to where the final note was written. He read over it again.

In light of what is written, the orb carries on to no one, and the key to finding Stormspeaker is nowhere to be found.

“Could it be?” Rollan muttered, picking up the scroll and carrying it over to where the lantern hung on the wall.

“What are you doing?” Meilin asked, following him.

“I have an idea.” Rollan raised the parchment paper up to the light. “Tembo said ‘in light of what is written.’ Maybe he meant you needed light in order to see the key to finding Stormspeaker and the orb.” He slowly moved the scroll across the glass of the lantern, letting the light shine through.

“There!” Anka exclaimed, showing herself to be standing next to Meilin. “There’s something written on the edge!”

Rollan moved the corner of the parchment paper in front of the lantern’s glass. The light from the flame revealed a previously invisible message written in the same calligraphy style as Tembo’s journal. It said:

To unify all, a valiant soul must seek the face in the mountain by passing through the valley of death where skulls fill the fields in the shadow of winter, then drain the demon’s blood and walk through the clouds to arrive at the edge of the land. For when this is done the queen’s glory shall be revealed.

“Valley of death? Demon’s blood? Edge of the land?” Rollan grimaced. He didn’t like any of it. “That doesn’t sound good.”

“But the face in the mountain ...” Takoda smiled. “I think I can help you with that part.” He looked at Xanthe. “Remember how Sodu kept talking about seeing a face in the mountain when he came back from the spiritual journey Naveb sent him on? He thought that it was a sign of his manhood.”

“He saw a mountain spirit?” Meilin asked.

Xanthe chuckled. “No, not a spirit ... just a rock formation in one of the mountains that’s a few days east of here.”

“But no one’s mentioned a place called the valley of death,” Takoda said. “Or a field full of skulls. Then again, this was written a long time ago. Things could have changed.”

“We can go to that mountain and maybe find the valley along the way.” Abeke yawned again, causing a ripple effect with everyone in the room. “We’ll head out in the morning. Let our brains work on it while we sleep.”

Takoda nodded as a faint tapping sound reverberated in the distance. “I’ll find you some soft beds for the night.”

“That’s perfect.” Meilin stretched her arms. “We haven’t had a comfortable night’s sleep in a while.”

The tap-tap-tap noise was getting closer. Through his sluggishness, Rollan recognized what it was. “I think Master Naveb is about to pay us another visit.” He rolled up the scroll and handed it back to Takoda. “Think it’s better if you’re holding this when he gets here. I don’t need to be scolded again.”

Conor walked to the door and opened it for the old monk. The now rapid beat of the cane hitting the stone floor echoed through the hallway. “We can ask him about the—”

Conor was cut off by the old monk storming into the library. Master Naveb’s brows were furrowed and his cheeks were flushed from walking so quickly.

“You must all leave at once!” Master Naveb announced. “The Oathbound are on their way!”

BIRD THIEF

ALL TRACE OF THE EXHAUSTION THAT HAD BEEN tugging at Conor's limbs evaporated with the announcement that the Oathbound had found them once again. It seemed that no matter what they did or where they went, the Oathbound somehow anticipated their every move. The Greencloaks were placing everyone they encountered in jeopardy.

"Are you sure they're coming here?" Rollan asked. "No one knew where we were going. We didn't even know that we'd end up here!"

Master Naveb nodded. "They may not have known before, but Sodu is making sure they know now."

"He betrayed us?" Conor couldn't believe it. There were traitors around every corner.

"Sodu?" Takoda repeated, his face still registering the shock of it. "It can't be." He shook his head in denial. "No, he might not have agreed with having the Greencloaks here, but I can't believe he would betray this place. He truly believes in it."

"Perhaps I was too rough with him. Backed him into a corner." Master Naveb sighed. "Regardless of the reason, he tried to enlist a few in the monastery to go with him into town. He thinks he can strike a deal with the Oathbound. The five of you in exchange for an assurance that the monastery will be left intact."

"The Oathbound will never honor any agreement." Rollan began pacing around the room. "We need to leave right away."

"How much time do we have?" Meilin asked.

“Five, maybe six hours.” Master Naveb motioned for two young monks to come into the library. They each held several bags and placed them on the floor by the window. “One of the sentries said they left about two hours ago.” Master Naveb pointed to the bags. “I brought you some supplies, along with a map to help you on your journey. Don’t tell any of us where you are headed. Just go ... and be careful.”

“We’ll help guide them.” Xanthe knelt down and opened one of the bags. “Thank you, Master Naveb ... for everything.”

Takoda grabbed Xanthe by the arm. “We can’t go,” he whispered. “I can’t leave Kovo here in his condition, and he won’t go into passive state.”

“Then you stay,” she answered. “I’m helping our friends. I’m a Sadrean warrior, not a librarian. I’ll be more helpful outside. I know this area, and you said it yourself: No one sees better at night than me.”

“Xanthe, please ... ” Takoda’s eyes pleaded with her. He was caught choosing between his spirit animal and someone who was obviously special to him.

“We can go on our own,” Abeke said, already slinging one of the bags over her shoulder. “We’ve done it before. Nilo is home for me. We don’t need the extra help.”

Xanthe ignored both Abeke and Takoda. “Master Naveb, did you bring my special cloak, the one I use during daylight?”

The old monk nodded. “It’s over there.” He pointed to a bag closest to the window. “I suspected you might want to go with them.”

Xanthe hustled over to the bag, her pale skin reflecting the moonlight that streamed through the window. She slipped on a sand-colored cloak and looked at the Greencloaks. “Ready?”

“Xanthe, you don’t have to do this.” Conor knew how much she’d given up during the battle with the Wyrms. She was once again abandoning her home and the people she cared about. “Abeke is an amazing tracker and guide.”

“No disrespect is meant by this.” Xanthe’s eyes met Abeke’s. “But I’m your best bet to get out of here. You don’t know this area like I do.” She picked up one of the bags and tossed it to Meilin. “We can each contribute something to the mission.”

“She has a point.” Meilin flipped the bag over her shoulder. “We could definitely use her help. She’s a strong fighter, too.”

Xanthe looked back at Takoda. “I understand why you need to stay, but you can still help them by finding more information on the Dragon’s Eye. There has to be another clue in the message.” Xanthe leaned closer to Takoda and, in front of everyone, she gave him a quick kiss on the cheek. “I’ll come back. Promise.”

Takoda didn’t say anything else. Conor wasn’t sure if his silence was from the kiss or from knowing that there wasn’t any point in discussing it further. The matter had been settled. Xanthe was going with them.

The group left the monastery the same way they’d arrived: down the rope ladders and through the fissure, until they came to the Taabara Chasm. Once there, they called out Briggan and Uraza to help guard against any Oathbound attack.

For the next few hours, Xanthe led them over several rocky hills until the ground evened out and became flat. By the light of the small lanterns they carried, Conor could tell that they had entered a large savannah. According to Naveb’s map, they were now just west of the mountains where Sodu had his spiritual journey and where he had described seeing the face in the mountain. If they continued at their current pace, they’d probably be there in two or three days’ time.

As the group approached a small acacia tree, Anka stopped walking and leaned against its trunk. “I don’t know about all of you, but I’m exhausted. I think we should make camp for a few hours. Try to get some rest.”

Conor reached down and stroked Briggan, who was leaning against his leg. “I agree. It’ll be daybreak in a few hours, and the sun will drain us even more. We need to be alert.”

Xanthe looked around, her pink eyes searching the surroundings. “I don’t see any other trees in the distance, so this is probably as good a place as any.”

“Agreed.” Abeke dropped her bag and sat on the savannah’s grass. Uraza circled her twice before deciding on a spot next to Abeke. The leopard let her long tail curl around Abeke’s ankle, but the tension in her muscles showed she was not there to relax. Her ears twitched and her eyes scanned the tall grass that surrounded them. Uraza was in full hunting mode, ready to protect the group.

Conor plopped exhaustedly to the ground. His eyes were heavy and he had a hard time keeping them open. He rested his head against Briggan, knowing that the wolf would stay vigilant with Uraza.

“Maybe Xanthe should keep watch while we sleep,” Anka suggested, her voice penetrating the darkness even if her form didn’t. “She can see better than the rest of us.”

“Of course.” Xanthe nodded, sitting cross-legged in the middle of the group. “I’ll make sure to wake you if I notice anything.”

Meilin held out her hand and, in a brief flash, Jhi appeared. The large panda promptly curled up on the ground, squashing the tall grass around her. Meilin settled in next to her. “I won’t need much time to get reenergized,” she said, stifling a yawn. “Jhi helps me relax more than I could ever imagine. I’ll be ready for a full day with just a couple of hours. I can switch with Xanthe at that point.”

Rollan took out a piece of fruit that Naveb had packed and sat down, leaning against the tree trunk. A bird called out from somewhere in the tree.

“That sounded like a macaw,” Rollan said, lifting his head to search the limbs for the bright blue feathers and yellow beak.

“Caw!” The bird repeated its call.

Rollan put the piece of fruit on top of his bag and stood up, peering into the moonlight.

A flutter of wings beat past him and snagged the piece of fruit before flying back to its perch in the tree. The thief was a fork-tailed, glossy black bird.

“Hey!” Rollan shook the tree. “That was mine!”

The bird responded by pooping right on Rollan’s bag.

Everyone—except Rollan—burst into laughter.

“You just got fooled by a drongo,” Abeke said, still laughing. “They’re notorious for mimicking other birds in order to steal food. But it’s a good thing it’s here. They’re also great at warning when a predator approaches.”

“Yeah, well ... ” Rollan moved his bag from beneath the drongo’s reach and cleaned off the top with a small rock. “Helpful or not, I’m going to have drongo stew if it drops any other presents on my stuff during the night.”

“Why don’t you curl up over there with Jhi?” Conor suggested. “I don’t think Essix is much of a cuddler, and we all need some rest.”

Rollan glanced over at Jhi's black-and-white form next to Meilin. "Think Jhi would be okay if I used her as a big pillow?" Rollan asked Meilin.

"Hrrgmmfani," Meilin muttered, already half-asleep.

"I'll take that as a yes." Rollan curled up against the panda and she gave him a big lick on the head. "Panda slobber isn't necessary, Jhi. I'm tired, not hurt."

Through half-closed eyes, Conor watched as Jhi gave Rollan another lick ... just for good measure.

It was dawn when a shrill, metallic shriek sounded from the tree.

Briggan growled, low and guttural, and Conor immediately sat up, his sleepiness falling away like a heavy cloak.

A few feet away, Abeke was already kneeling and pulling out her bow. Uraza crouched, somewhat hidden in the tall grass, looking ready to pounce.

"Something's out there," Xanthe whispered, staring at the savannah. "But it's hidden in the grass."

Meilin was squatting, her sword in one hand, as she called Jhi back into passive state. The disappearance of the panda caused Rollan to fall back with a start.

"Hey! What's the big ... " He glanced at everyone and quickly pulled out his dagger, taking a defensive posture. "Is it the Oathbound? Are they out there?"

"Not sure," Abeke answered. The group stayed low, putting their backs together in a tight circle formation, with an eye out in every direction. Uraza and Briggan both had their hackles raised.

Conor slowly pulled out his ax. He glanced over at Briggan, who stood stiff-legged, eyes focused on something in the distance.

Someone was definitely out there.

The drongo gave another shrill cry and flew away.

"Anka, are you up for this?" Meilin slowly moved her sword around in the air as Abeke nocked an arrow onto her bowstring.

"Seriously?" Anka said, clearly annoyed at the insinuation. "I'm a pretty decent fighter, Meilin.... You should know that." Anka's cloak and dark hair flickered into view as she revealed her position next to Xanthe. She was holding her quarterstaff as Toey, her spirit animal, scampered into her boot. Then just as quickly, she blended back into her surroundings. “You’ve been training me, and by now I may even know all your tricks.”

“Yeah, yeah, let’s not get too cocky.” Meilin continued staring out into the savannah, her expression focused.

Laughter rang out across the savannah. It was coming from somewhere to the east of them.

Then more laughter.

A chorus from all sides.

Whoever was out there seemed to find the entire situation very funny.

“Seriously? The Oathbound think this is a joke?” Rollan rolled back his shoulders, getting ready for the fight. “I’ll show them something that’s not too funny.”

“No.” Abeke’s fingers twitched as she steadied her bow. “I recognize that sound. It’s not the Oathbound.”

“Who is it, then?” Conor asked, tightening his grip on his ax. “Are they dangerous?”

“Hyenas.” Abeke’s eyes narrowed as Uraza snarled at something in the tall grass in front of her. “And when they’re in a pack, they’re more than dangerous ... they’re absolutely deadly.”

BATTLEGROUND

ABEKE COULD SENSE THE HYENAS CREEPING CLOSER through the savannah. She opened her stance, raised her right elbow, and pulled the bow's string as far back as possible to get maximum power. In that instant, Abeke became one with her surroundings. Her friends' restlessness fell away as she focused on her own breathing and heartbeat. Uraza was augmenting her hunting instincts. Abeke could smell the predators' scent in the air, feel the wind glide by her cheek, and see the slight shifts in the blades of tall grass. Her fingertips relaxed, putting enough pressure on the arrow to keep it in place until the moment demanded its release.

She waited patiently. She was no longer the hunted, but the hunter.

Thwack!

Abeke released the arrow as she caught sight of a hyena lunging toward them. "Here they come!" she yelled to her friends, knowing she'd just hit her first mark.

Uraza leaped forward, claws out and teeth bared. She grabbed one of the hyenas by the neck and flipped it over, just as two more jumped on top of her. Abeke aimed at one of the hyenas, but couldn't shoot for fear of hitting Uraza.

The leopard rolled on the ground, shaking off the doglike creatures, but not before one of them sank its teeth into her hide. Uraza roared, infuriated at being bitten, and gave chase to her attacker through the grassland.

Abeke turned her attention to Rollan and Xanthe, who had teamed up to battle against a group of smaller but persistent hyenas. They were pushing that group back toward the east. On the other side, Briggan was already in pursuit of a pack that had charged all at once. He chased them through the tall grass, losing sight of one for a moment before catching a glimpse of another and taking off in its direction.

Meanwhile, several hundred yards away, Meilin and Conor were fighting at close range against two of the larger animals. They had been forced away from the campsite, but Meilin had the upper hand, using her sword to jab and slash at the persistent hyena. Conor had taken a defensive stance behind her, wielding his ax in one hand and a knife in the other.

“Keep it up!” Meilin shouted. “We’ve got them on the run.”

The hyenas were spreading out and seemed to be disbanding, but Abeke sensed that something was wrong. Why would these highly intelligent hunters attack a group of humans and large predators? And though the hyenas had worked together, the Greencloaks had pushed most of them back relatively easily. Abeke spun around.

That’s when she saw it ... the real plan.

These animals were doing what they always did. A coordinated attack to get what they truly wanted ... an easy target. Separate what they viewed as the weakest member of the herd. The large-scale attack had been a distraction to split the group into different corners, leaving the campsite with only Anka protecting their bags and food.

Anka.

Even though she was older than all of them, she would be seen as the slightest in the group. If the hyenas had spotted her at some point while the Greencloaks were sleeping, she could have become the hyenas’ target.

“It’s Anka!” Abeke yelled. “They’re after her!” Abeke rushed back toward the tree with the other Greencloaks.

As if on cue, six snarling hyenas jumped out from the tall grass, and in the moonlight Abeke could see them surrounding Anka. Anka spun around to face each one. The colors of her clothes and skin rippled as she blended into her surroundings and disappeared from view. The hyenas paused, confused because they could still smell her. The grass shifted and Anka reappeared a few feet away. One of the hyenas was done playing cat and mouse and lunged forward.

Abeke shot an arrow straight into its neck, dropping it on the spot.

“Having a hard time believing your eyes?” Anka taunted the remaining five animals. She twirled her quarterstaff and kicked up some dust, her cloak rippling and changing colors as she faded out of sight. The hyenas drew closer. Then one yelped as she hit it hard enough that it went flying through the air. “How’d you like that?” Anka shouted, already standing somewhere else, while another hyena whimpered in agony.

The Greencloaks watched in amazement. Anka was anything but the weakest of the group.

“Don’t stand there staring!” Anka called out. “Get the rest of them!”

Meilin ran forward with her sword held high above her head while Abeke unleashed an arrow that grazed the side of a hyena. Conor, Rollan, and Xanthe charged in to help, but there was already a whooping call in the distance. The hyenas turned and retreated back into the grasslands.

“That was amazing,” Conor remarked as they all regrouped at the campsite. “I didn’t know you could fight like that.”

“You handled them like a pro,” Abeke added while pulling out her arrow from the dead hyena.

“Meilin is a good teacher,” Anka said, calling Toey into passive state on her arm. Instantly her features looked crisper. Once the natural camouflage tendencies that Toey imparted were removed, Abeke could see the glimmer in Anka’s eyes as she smiled. Abeke could sense that Anka was proud of herself. “Not sure how I would’ve done against the Oathbound, but hyenas were good for my first real one-on-one challenge.”

“You’ve definitely come a long way.” Meilin picked up her bag and slung it over her shoulder. Uraza and Briggan were nearby, each resting next to a fallen hyena that they’d brought over. “Guess we can all eat hyena meat for our next meal.”

Rollan rubbed his belly. “Yum. Well, it beats them eating some Greencloak meat for their next meal.” He smiled. “Don’t think they’d like it anyway. We’re way too tough to chew.”

Abeke chuckled. Rollan always had a way of lightening the mood.

Suddenly, Essix screeched and circled high above them.

“Look who finally shows up ... after the fight is over,” Rollan said, lifting up his arm in case the gyrfalcon wanted to perch there.

Essix dove straight toward Rollan, twisting only at the last moment to avoid colliding with him. Abeke had to duck to escape getting pummeled.

“Hey!” Abeke glanced up at the falcon, who was swooping down once more. “He was only kidding.”

Rollan frowned, his eyes trained on the majestic bird. He looked worried.

“Something’s wrong.” Rollan sat down on the lush grass. “Essix needs to show me something.” He closed his eyes and took several deep breaths before settling into a quiet rhythm.

Xanthe pulled the map out from under her cloak. “We have to go that way ... toward those mountains.” She pointed east. “But did you see who else headed that way?”

“The hyenas,” Meilin and Conor answered in unison.

Abeke nodded. “They’ll be tracking us. Waiting for us to drop our guard.”

Rollan swayed a bit and mumbled something.

Meilin bent down next to him. “What do you see?”

Rollan didn’t answer at first, but then he popped his eyes open. “Oathbound. Still pretty far, but headed this way.” He stood up and pointed to the west. “Coming from that direction. I counted seven of them on camels.”

“So let’s go.” Xanthe buttoned her hooded cloak, making sure she was fully covered from head to toe.

“And one of them has a grizzly bear as a spirit animal,” Rollan added. “It was helping them track us.”

“Ugh, that’s really not good news.” Conor grimaced. “Grizzlies have one of the best senses of smell. We have to do something to shake them off our scent.”

Abeke turned to look at the remnants of their campsite. Squashed grass, dead hyenas, blood on the ground ... anyone would know they’d been there. “Hold on,” Abeke said. “Let’s not go too fast.”

“You sense something?” Conor asked as he gazed at Briggan. The wolf looked content to bathe in the warm sun that was rising in the east. “Briggan and Uraza seem okay.”

Abeke thought about what Master Naveb had told her. A good hunter doesn’t always lunge forward, but takes in what is around and behind them. They could turn this into an advantage to throw off the trackers.

“What if the hyenas had won?” Abeke mused out loud. “If they had killed us while we slept?”

“What are you saying?” Xanthe shifted her weight from one foot to another. “Are you worried that the hyenas will get us next time? Because they won’t.”

“No, I’m wondering if we can get the Oathbound to think that, though.”

“Oh ...” Meilin gave a slow nod. “Fake our deaths.”

“Or have them think at least a couple of us died here.” Conor walked around to one of the dead hyenas. “We can bloody up a couple of our cloaks and leave them here. Make it seem like the hyenas carried some of us off. Maybe they’ll think we separated and there was only a small group here. Then they might go back to report what they found and start a new search.”

“But won’t the bear just pick up our trail when we continue across the savannah toward the mountains?” Xanthe watched as Conor ripped his bag with the corner of his ax and tossed it aside.

“Not necessarily.” Abeke glanced at Rollan. “Especially if we aren’t going over the savannah.”

Rollan nodded with a smile. “That’s where I come in.” He pulled out the chain around his neck where the Heart of the Land hung. “We won’t leave a trail over the savannah because we’ll be going under it.” He gave Xanthe a wink. “It’ll be like going home for you.”

“What? I don’t understand.” Xanthe watched as Rollan walked to a patch of barren, sandy dirt next to Abeke. He clutched the gila monster amulet in his fist and punched the ground.

Abeke jumped aside. She felt a small tremor, then a more powerful one, as the earth opened up right next to her, forming a sinkhole. Down at the bottom there was an opening to what looked to be a tunnel.

“How?” Xanthe had a mixed expression of fear and amazement. “What ... what is that thing?” She pointed to the amulet in Rollan’s hand.

“A bond token,” Rollan said, as if that were enough of an explanation. “It has a legendary gila monster’s power to move the earth.”

“You’re getting pretty good at using it,” Meilin whispered. “Impressive.”

Abeke expected Rollan to dismiss the praise with a smart-mouthed comment, but he simply smiled and stayed quiet. Meilin definitely had a positive effect on him.

“Now that we have our way out ... ” Conor pointed to his ripped cloak lying on the ground. “Who else wants to give up their cloak and pretend to have been eaten alive?”

Abeke knew that there was no way Rollan would relinquish Tarik’s green cloak. It meant too much to him. The rest of them were wearing the nondescript cloaks they’d picked up in Eura, so it made sense for one of them to leave theirs behind.

“I’ll do it.” Abeke began untying the cord around her neck. “This slows me down anyway.”

“No.” Xanthe put a hand on Abeke’s arm. “For the plan to work, it has to be me. There’s no other choice.”

“That’s ridiculous!” Meilin exclaimed. “You’re the only one who can’t give up her cloak. You need to have a special covering to protect you from the sun.”

Xanthe shook her head. “If the trackers came from the monastery, Sodu could have given them something from my room to track my scent. It has to be my cloak.”

Essix squawked as he flew in circles above them once again.

“We don’t have much time.” Rollan gave Essix a signal, letting her know that he understood the message. “What Xanthe said makes sense. Plus, we’ll stay underground for most of the day. She should be fine.”

“I’ll give her my cloak when we move aboveground,” Abeke said. “That’ll help a little.”

“Scatter whatever’s in my bag around the campsite and let’s go!” Xanthe tossed her cloak to Conor and jumped into the sinkhole, disappearing into the tunnel opening.

“I think it’s a good plan,” Abeke said, pulling Uraza back into passive state. “Then again, it’s our only plan, so ... ”

“Um, this tunnel ends after a few feet,” Xanthe shouted from down below.

Rollan peered into the sinkhole. “Yeah, I can’t move that much earth at once. When we’re all down there, I’ll keep pushing the dirt out of the way and close it in behind us.”

“Bring my lantern!” Xanthe reminded him. “You’ll need it down here.”

“Already got it.” Rollan tapped the small lantern he’d secured to the outside of his bag. “I’ll toss our bags down first.”

“And I’ll catch them,” Anka replied from the bottom of the pit. Her skin had already shifted to mimic the coloring of the shadowy hole ... which meant Toey was back.

“When ... how did you ... ?” Rollan shrugged off his own question. “Careful, this one is heavy,” he said to Anka as he tossed the first of the bags.

“What do you think?” Conor held up Xanthe’s blood-spattered cloak to Abeke and Meilin. It had a large rip from where Briggan had torn into it. Conor had already staged the campsite as if there had been an epic battle, with two of the hyenas left behind as casualties, and a few items from their bags thrown around.

Meilin surveyed the area. “Looks pretty convincing,” she said. She’d covered up most of their footprints in the dirt. Now it really seemed as if only two people had been at the campsite.

“Yeah, I think so too.” Conor held out his arm. “Briggan, you’ll probably appreciate not being in that cramped tunnel for hours.” The gray wolf leaped toward Conor, disappearing in a flash and reappearing as the tattoo below his elbow.

Essix had flown back and perched herself on Rollan’s shoulder. “How about it, Essix? You won’t be able to track us while we’re underground. Going into passive state would be—” A flash of light indicated that the gyrfalcon didn’t need any more convincing.

“Guess she agreed with you,” Conor said, walking to the edge of the sinkhole. “Now, let’s go find that valley.”

“Um, yeah, I was going to say something about that.” Abeke surveyed the mountains in the distance one last time as she stood next to Rollan and Conor. “We’re supposed to go to a valley of death and find a field filled with skulls ... but have we stopped to think that those skulls might be from people entering the valley of death?”

“Oh, I’ve thought about it.” Rollan sighed. “Just don’t like thinking about it too much, if you know what I mean.”

Conor shrugged. “It’s not like we have much of a choice. We have to go wherever Tembo took Stormspeaker.”

“True, but ... ” Meilin tossed her bag into the sinkhole and looked at the three other Greencloaks. “We have to be careful. Hyenas and the Oathbound may be the least of our troubles.”

For a moment none of the Greencloaks said a word, breathing in the last bit of fresh air they’d have for a while. Then the four of them leaped into the shadowy pit.

UNDERGROUND TOUR

THE GLOW FROM THE LANTERN BOUNCED OFF THE earthen walls as Rollan continued pushing aside the ground, creating a tunnel ahead of the group and allowing it to collapse once the last person was through. They'd been crawling on their hands and knees in single file, to minimize the amount of earth Rollan had to move, but it still took considerable effort and concentration. At one point, they considered taking turns using the bond token, but though it could be used by anyone, no one knew how to use it as well as Rollan. The risk of having the tunnel collapse on top of them was too great.

It had been about six or seven hours since they'd left the campsite, or at least that's what Meilin figured, based on the growling of her stomach. Xanthe had been able to keep them headed east, using her strange ability to navigate while underground by sensing Erdas's magnetic fields.

"I think I need a break," Rollan announced, wiping his brow and rolling onto his back. "And I'm pretty sure I've heard everyone's stomach rumble in the last few minutes."

"Should we go up and eat?" Conor asked from the rear spot in the line. "The air is becoming stagnant."

"I don't think we've gone far enough to take a chance," Abeke answered from just ahead of him. "Plus, the sun will be high in the sky, which won't help Xanthe."

"I can always stay while you go up," Xanthe offered. She'd been crawling behind Rollan while directing him where to go. "But if we're all taking a break down here, then I have an idea.” She reached up and touched the hard dirt above her head. “This doesn’t feel as sandy as where we were. Maybe Rollan can create an airhole. In Sadre we had them in our tunnels to help the air circulate.”

Meilin peered around Xanthe to get a better look at Rollan. “What do you think? Can you do that?”

Rollan propped himself up on his elbows. “Yeah, and if we’re going to be here for more than just a couple of minutes, then I think I can make this area bigger. Just give me a little space.”

Meilin almost laughed at his request. Space was not something they could give. But she scooted back, bumping into Anka.

Rollan clasped the amber stone in his right hand and closed his eyes. He grimaced, as if lifting a heavy object. Tiny rocks started to rain down as the ground above them buckled and lifted. It wasn’t much, maybe a few feet, but it was enough.

“You did it!” Meilin sat up, happy to be vertical once again.

Rollan took a deep breath and grunted as a crack above his head widened and burst at the surface. A ray of sunlight streamed in, highlighting the dirt floor next to Rollan.

“Whew!” He collapsed onto his back with a smile on his face. “That wasn’t as easy as I thought it’d be, but you guys can call me Mr. Superstrong from now on.”

“How about we not?” Abeke said, rummaging through her bag. “And instead we offer you some water, dried fruit, and jerky?”

Rollan scooted against the side of the small cavern he had created. “Fair enough. Although you have to admit, I did a pretty good job of making this place.”

“Yes, you and the Heart of the Land,” Conor said as Abeke passed around the food.

“But more the Heart of the Land than you,” Meilin corrected. “Don’t go getting a big head.”

“Who, me?” Rollan acted shocked. “Never!”

They were all sitting in a circle. The cavern seemed to glow with the light from the lantern and the beam of sunlight streaming down from above. Meilin felt calm. She was with people she trusted, friends who had her back. She realized that she was relaxed because she felt safe, even as they headed toward a so-called valley of death. Everyone here would fight to the death for the others.

Xanthe stretched her arms out in front of her. “So this crown you’re looking for, Stormspeaker, does it do stuff like the Heart of the Land?” she asked.

Meilin bit her lip. After everything they’d been through in Sadre, battling against the Wyrms, she trusted Xanthe. But the girl wasn’t a Greencloak. She was the only one in their group who wasn’t, and it didn’t seem right to discuss their mission with her. Doubt crept into Meilin’s thoughts. Perhaps she shouldn’t be so quick to feel safe. There had been betrayals before.

The quiet lasted too long. No one had answered Xanthe, and their silence spoke volumes.

“Guess I’m not worthy of knowing those secrets,” Xanthe mumbled.

Worthy.

Meilin thought back to Worthy, and how even though he had been a Redcloak and a one-time enemy, he’d sacrificed himself for their mission. She exchanged glances with Conor, Abeke, and Rollan, but couldn’t seem to find Anka in the cavern. They were all thinking the same thing. Conor nodded, as did Abeke. Rollan shrugged noncommittally.

“It does have some type of power,” Meilin explained. “We just don’t know what it is exactly. There are four bond tokens: the Heart of the Land, which we found in Amaya. You’ve seen what it does.... ”

“The Wildcat’s Claw,” Abeke continued. “A sword that can cut through anything and shoots out fire. But we lost it during a cave-in while we were in Eura.”

“We didn’t just lose it,” Conor said. “We also lost our friend Worthy, who sacrificed himself to help us escape.”

“Oh, that’s why ... ” Xanthe nodded with new understanding. “I get it. When I mentioned not being worthy ... that’s why you all looked at each other.”

“Yes,” Meilin said. “But the truth is we don’t know what to expect from the remaining two bond tokens. Stormspeaker and the Dragon’s Eye are still mysteries to us. We know they’re probably very powerful; a bond token in the wrong hands would be a disaster. And even creating them is dangerous, as it can rip apart a spirit animal bond. The Greencloaks hid them for a reason.”

“All right, but something still puzzles me,” Xanthe said. “You think finding these bond tokens will somehow clear the Greencloaks’ name, but how? Won't people fear that you've become even more powerful? Isn't that what got the Greencloaks into trouble in the first place?"

"There are some things that only a Greencloak would understand, Xanthe." Anka's voice was soft but strong. "No offense, but we can't share everything with you."

The conversation ended on that point, but Meilin couldn't help wonder if what Xanthe had said was true. Olvan had sent them on this mission believing that it was the only way to save the Greencloaks, but what if he was wrong? What if this made matters worse?

After a few minutes of eating in silence, Rollan spoke up. "So how much more ground shifting do you guys think I need to do before we get to the valley?"

Abeke looked at the map. "We're probably somewhere in this area," she said, running her finger over a wide swath of what looked like empty space. "Which means we have a few more hours to go before we reach the mountain range."

"It'll probably be dark once we're there." Conor leaned over to peer up at the small ray of sunlight coming in through the airhole. "We could start hiking over the mountains with less chance of being spotted."

"I can help guide you without even using the lantern," Xanthe said. "So I like the idea. But why not simply go under the mountains like we're doing now? Or is that something you think I shouldn't know either?"

Meilin didn't like Xanthe's tone. Sure, she had helped them before and was risking a lot now, but if it came at the price of causing division among the Greencloaks, then they would have to continue on without her. "Xanthe, if you can't accept not knowing a few things, then maybe —"

"Moving solid rock is much harder than shifting dirt and sand," Rollan said, cutting Meilin off. "Plus, in the middle of a mountain, it's not like we can go up thirty feet or so and be aboveground." He glanced at Xanthe and widened his eyes. "And having you guide us in the dark again will be very helpful ... especially since we have to go to that valley of death place."

"That reminds me of something I once heard ... " Abeke stared at the ground, where she was mindlessly making small swirls in the loose dirt with her forefinger. "What was it?"

“Something about the valley of death?” Conor rolled his head from side to side, trying to crack his neck. “Maybe you heard about it in your village?”

“Maybe,” Abeke said, but she was lost in her own memories.

“Well, if Rollan’s feeling rested”—Meilin put her canteen back in her bag—“then I think we should start moving again. We still have a ways to go.”

“Better enter ... valley of death ... who can see,” Abeke mumbled. She paused, then slapped her leg. “That’s it!”

“Huh?” Rollan glanced over at her. “What did you say?”

“It’s something the Rain Dancer in my village once said,” Abeke explained. “It’s an old Niloan proverb ... Better to enter the valley of death with someone who can see, than blindly run through life never knowing who surrounds you.”

“You think it has something to do with where we’re going?” Meilin asked.

Abeke shrugged. “No idea.”

Rollan pulled out the Heart of the Land, which hung under his shirt. “Sounds like it’s a warning about not being alone.”

“Really?” Conor took Rollan’s bag and slipped it over his shoulder. “How do you figure?”

“Well, I think it’s just saying that it’s better to die with someone who knows the real you than go through life never letting anyone get close.” Rollan paused. Everyone was staring at him with slightly surprised looks.

“What? I can’t be deep? I’ve read poetry before, if that surprises you.” Rollan gave a sheepish smile. “Or I could be completely wrong about the whole thing.”

“What you said does make sense.” Meilin was already on her hands and knees, ready to start crawling again. “Goes along with our belief that united Greencloaks are the best for Erdas.”

“Xanthe, which way do we go?” Anka asked from behind Meilin.

“Open the tunnel that way.” She pointed to a spot behind Rollan. “It’ll keep us headed east.”

The group continued crawling through Rollan’s tunnel for several more hours, taking small breaks every once in a while, until they bumped into a dead end where the compacted dirt changed to solid rock. At that point, Rollan took a deep breath and used the amulet to create a crack in the hard dirt above them, widening it to form a gaping hole.

Meilin, standing with the others, bent her head back and took in the starry sky. They were still about twenty feet down. “So, any suggestions on how to get up there?”

“Only one way,” Abeke said. “Together. The lightest person climbs on top of the others and then drops a rope. Normally, that would be me, but now I think it’s Anka.” Abeke turned around, searching for the camouflaged Greencloak. “Don’t you think, Anka? Anka? Anka, where are you?”

“I’m right here,” she answered. “And yes, make a pyramid and I’ll climb on top.”

“Before we do anything, let me have Essix check the area,” Rollan said as he released the gyrfalcon, who promptly took to the sky.

Meilin stared at Rollan. He had decided to squat down and was rubbing his temples. Under the layer of dirt that they all had covering them, his face looked flushed, and there was something about how his shoulders were drooping. “You’re looking a little ... off.”

Rollan shook out his arms. “I’m fine. It just feels like that one time when I binged on a bag of sugar candies and my body crashed afterward. Maybe wielding all that power for hours without stopping does something similar.”

From high above, Essix squawked, giving the all clear to continue.

“That’s our cue.” Rollan took a deep breath and slowly let it out. “Let’s do this. Conor and I can form the base.” Rollan motioned for Conor to get closer. “Meilin and Xanthe can climb on top and Anka can scale all of us to get to the top.”

“You sure you’re okay?” Abeke asked.

“I’m a little tired ... but when has that stopped any of us?” Rollan replied with a grin.

“All right, then, if you’re sure.” Conor pulled out a rope from one of the bags and handed it to Anka. “Here you go.”

Anka took the rope, looping it over her head and right shoulder. As soon as the rope touched her, it began to blend into the shadows thrown by the lantern. “I’m ready.”

A few minutes later each of them had made their way out of the pit and were standing under the expansive night sky and full moon. They all stretched and filled their lungs with the cool air that drifted down the mountainside.

Loosening her long braid, Meilin shook out some of the dirt and pebbles stuck in her hair. It felt good after being confined underground all day, but what she really longed for was a bath. That was a luxury she rarely got to enjoy anymore. Not that she would ever trade her life as a Greencloak for her prior life in the palace. That lifestyle was best suited for other girls ... like Princess Song.

Meilin felt a slight pain in her chest. She hadn't thought of the princess in a while, but the two girls had much in common. Besides having grown up in Zhongese palaces, they'd both seen their fathers die violently. It was something Meilin could never forget, and she wouldn't wish it on anyone. And not only had she and Princess Song witnessed those horrendous deaths, they'd both been forced to take charge of circumstances not of their own choosing. Meilin wondered if, after everything was over and the Greencloaks cleared their name, she and Princess Song would become friends. It felt like a distinct possibility.

"Why don't we make camp here? Give Rollan a break for a while," Anka said. "We could use the pit as a trap if any animals try to attack again."

"I just need five minutes and I'll be good to go," Rollan said, having sat down and rested his head on his knees. "We have a lot of ground to cover."

Conor and Abeke took the opportunity of finally being aboveground to release their spirit animals. Briggan and Uraza quickly took in their surroundings. Uraza first scratched the ground, then her nostrils flared. She stood motionless, having picked up the scent of something. Briggan, on the other hand, took one look around, decided that there was nothing of interest for him, and sat down to watch Uraza.

The leopard took two slow steps forward, paused, perked her ears, and then darted toward the mountain. She was on the hunt.

Conor laughed as Briggan jumped up and gave chase. "Looks like Briggan doesn't want to be left out of whatever Uraza is up to."

"Rrrr ... " Rollan let out a quiet snore. He had passed out while sitting on the ground.

"Poor guy," Anka muttered. "He's really tired."

"He looks uncomfortable." Meilin sat across from him and began rebraiding her hair. "This should help." She called out Jhi, who, upon seeing how exhausted Rollan was, snuggled up against him and pulled him to her chest. Rollan didn't protest and simply sank into the bear.

Rollan's five minutes turned into twenty, then thirty.

Essix had returned and was perched on a nearby acacia tree, waiting for the group to continue.

"Why don't we split up for a while?" Abeke suggested. "Conor, Xanthe, and I can head up the mountain and find a place to make camp during daylight hours. A cave or something. That way Xanthe won't have to deal with the sun. Essix can show you where we are whenever Rollan recovers."

Meilin nodded, not wanting to risk waking Rollan up. She didn't like seeing him like this. It reminded her of when he became ill with the Sunset Death when they were fighting the Devourer. So much had happened since that time ... in the world and between her and Rollan.

"I think that's a good idea," Anka whispered. "We'll meet up with you in a few hours. Just make sure you don't go too far without us."

Conor nodded. He and the others picked up their bags to begin the hike up the mountain. Meilin watched them leave for as long as she was able to, until the darkness of the savannah swallowed her friends from sight.

She pulled the sides of her cloak tighter across her chest. There was a chill in the air. She felt fidgety not having anything to do, so she decided to take an inventory of everything in her bag. Suddenly, she felt Jhi's eyes on her.

"What?" she asked. The panda still had Rollan's head resting on top of her belly.

Jhi blinked but didn't move.

"I just don't like sitting around doing nothing," Meilin explained, repacking the medical supplies, fruit, jerky, and a small tin pot for cooking. "Don't worry, I'm not going anywhere without him. I know he needs to rest."

She sighed, leaning back on her elbows. They all needed to be at full strength if they were going to survive whatever waited for them in the valley of death.

"Anka?" Meilin listened carefully, trying to pinpoint her location. "Anka, you want to train a little more?"

"I think I'm done for the day," Anka replied, her voice coming from a few feet away. "It's too dark and I'm tired from all the crawling."

Meilin strained her eyes to see Anka, but the elder Greencloak completely blended into the night.

“You know that I have no idea where you are right now. Between the clouds covering the moon and your camouflage ability ... it’s like I’m talking into a void.”

There was a brief flash of light, then Meilin could see Anka’s silhouette leaning against her bag. Anka had returned Toey to his passive state as a tattoo on her wrist.

“Better?” she asked.

“Yes, it’s nice to somewhat see who I’m talking to.” Meilin wasn’t usually one to share her feelings, but over the course of their journey, she’d grown closer to Anka. It felt good to have someone a little older around, especially someone from Zhong. It felt as if she’d gained a big sister.

“Have you thought about what you’re going to do after all this is over?” Meilin asked her.

“You mean, when we complete the mission?” Anka paused, thinking about her answer. “I guess I’ll return to Zhong. Help in the recovery. Unless the Greencloaks need me elsewhere. What about you?”

“I’d like to go home to Jano Rion, even if only for a little while. Rollan and I were on the way there when Olvan called for us, and then all this happened.”

“You deserve the chance to go home,” Anka said. “You’re a legend over there.”

“I don’t know about the legend stuff.... I just want to see everyone.” Meilin sighed at the thought of the people who wouldn’t be there anymore. People like her father. “Speaking of seeing people,” Meilin said, hoping to change the subject. “Why do you keep yourself hidden most of the time?”

“I don’t know,” Anka answered. “Toey likes to be out and I don’t even think about it. It’s like if I’m breathing, my body automatically blends into the background. In fact, I have to concentrate if I want to be seen.”

“But doesn’t it bother you that people forget you’re around?”

Anka shrugged. “Not really. You’d be surprised at how much I get to see when people don’t remember I’m there. But the truth is that everybody conceals themselves, at least partly. Even from our friends. I’ll bet you do it, too, without really thinking about it. We skip details that are unflattering or scary, or cloak ourselves in the customs of the region we're in. There are lots of ways to hide.... Mine is just the most noticeable.”

Meilin didn't have anything else to say. Perhaps Anka was right and she was being the most honest of them all. Meilin did keep some things hidden. Feelings and fears that she didn't even like admitting to herself. And not just silly things like being afraid of spiders: also the real worries, like being afraid to get hurt. She'd believed that a true warrior wouldn't allow herself to be vulnerable, and that's why she always kept her emotions in check.

But was love really a weakness, or was it a strength?

Meilin wasn't always sure.

VALLEY OF DEATH

CONOR STUMBLED ON THE UNEVEN GROUND AND FELL onto his right knee. He quickly popped back up as if nothing had happened, grateful that the night shrouded his clumsiness. For the last few hours, he'd been trying to keep up with Xanthe, but these mountains were more like the ones in western Amaya, where they'd first encountered Arax, than the rolling hills near his home in Eura.

"Uraza, over there!" Abeke pointed to something a few yards away.

Briggan hurdled over a rock to beat the leopard to whatever animal they'd both been chasing.

"Looks like Briggan may have won," Conor said, getting close enough to see the wolf sticking his snout into a small, rocky opening.

"Careful ... hyraxes are tricky," Abeke warned as Briggan tried pawing his way into the hole.

"Hyrax?" Conor repeated. "I thought it was a rabbit."

"It sort of looks like a rabbit," Abeke explained. "Except it has no tail and round ears. People call them rock rabbits because—"

"Look out, Briggan!" Xanthe called out, just as the hyrax darted between Briggan's legs and right by Uraza's snapping jaws.

The chase was on again, with Uraza and Briggan taking off after their small prey.

"Glad someone's having fun out here," Conor remarked, rubbing his knee. "Hope you're about to tell us that the path gets a whole lot smoother up ahead."

“Um, not quite,” Xanthe said. “We’re going to have to double back. It’s narrow and steep, and it looks like the path itself has fallen away. We’re going to have to find another way around.”

“But going around the base of these mountains might add an extra day or two.” Conor knew they’d taken the only visible path over the mountain. “We’ve bought some time with the hyena thing, but the Oathbound will keep looking for us. We can’t waste so much time out in the open.”

Abeke placed a hand on Uraza, who was now holding the dead hyrax in her mouth. “It’s not like we have a choice.”

“Well, we actually do. Follow me.” Xanthe backtracked down the path, stopped next to a large pile of rocks, and tried pushing a large boulder out of the way. “Conor, help me with this.”

Conor put his shoulder into it and the boulder shifted a few feet to reveal the opening to a dark cave. “You want to make camp in there?” He peered over some large rocks that still blocked the bottom of the entrance. He couldn’t see a thing inside.

“Yes.” Xanthe climbed over the rocks and went inside. “But more importantly, I’m thinking we can go through the mountain instead of going around it.”

“How far back do you think this thing goes?” Abeke motioned for Uraza to stay outside while she joined Xanthe.

“Pretty far, from the vibrations I get.” Xanthe’s voice echoed against the walls. “But we can always have Rollan open it up whenever it dead-ends.”

Conor entered and quickly lit a match. In the flickering light he could see that the cave extended into tunnels. Abeke was still close to the entrance, but he could see Xanthe’s white hair as she explored the far side.

“Ow!” Conor flicked the match to the ground as the flame burned his fingertips. The cave immediately went black again, except for the fading red glow of the matchstick that now lay at Conor’s feet.

“I don’t think moving mountains is a good idea.” Conor headed back outside where it wasn’t quite as dark. “The Heart of the Land could cause a cave-in. We’d be trapped.”

“But we might face a bigger risk out there with the hyenas and the Oathbound,” Xanthe countered. “And this cave could stretch deep into the mountain. We can make camp in here while I go check it out.”

Uraza jumped inside, followed by Briggan. They both seemed to have made their own decisions to stay inside for the remainder of the night.

“Traitor,” Conor grumbled.

“Well, if there really is a field of skulls up ahead,” Abeke mused, “then hopefully whatever separated the skulls from their bodies won’t expect us to come through the mountain.” Abeke leaned over the group of rocks that formed a barrier to the cave entrance. She stared at the sky. “Any sort of trap would be set for those who come over or around it.”

“I guess, but let’s see what the others think before we decide,” Conor suggested. He took a seat near the cave entrance, where he could still feel the night air.

A bird screeched somewhere outside.

Conor sat a little straighter, his hearing amplified because of Briggan. “That sounds like Essix.”

Abeke pointed to something in the night sky. “It is! She knows we’re here.”

Briggan stretched out next to Conor. “Well, I’m guessing she’ll bring the others here in the morning.” Conor rubbed the wolf’s belly.

Abeke took out a small blanket from her bag and laid it flat on the ground. Uraza quickly curled up at the bottom of it. “Ahem, I was going to lie there.” Abeke smiled. “Guess we’ll share.”

As Conor drifted off to sleep, he heard the leopard purr in agreement.

Dawn was already breaking when a voice pierced through Conor’s dream of running down the hillside toward his home in Eura.

“Wake up, sleepyheads!” Rollan commanded. His hands were on the rocks at the entrance of the cave as he climbed inside. Daylight streamed in from behind him. “Don’t you want to see that field full of skulls and drain the demon’s blood? Mwahaha!”

“Rollan, give them a minute.” Meilin swung her legs over the small barrier wall and walked into the cave.

Conor opened one eye, wishing he could have five more minutes of sleep. It had been a long time since he’d seen his family, and he liked having them pop up in his dreams.

“Someone has a ton of energy,” Xanthe remarked from deeper in the cave.

“You aren’t kidding,” Anka grumbled, clearly visible to everyone. Conor assumed she’d placed Toey in passive state. Perhaps even Anka liked to be seen once in a while.

“I think Jhi’s influence made Rollan a little too well rested,” Meilin said. “He’s been chirping like this the whole walk here.” Meilin pulled out her canteen and took a small sip of water. “Mental note for next time.”

“Funny.” Rollan stayed outside the cave and looked up at the mountain. “Did you notice that the path ends up ahead? Looks like we’ll have to find a different way to get to the face in the mountain.”

“Yeah, about that.” Conor rubbed the back of his stiff neck. “Xanthe had an idea, but I’m not sure if—”

“Why don’t we just tell them and let them decide for themselves.” Xanthe drew closer, wearing Abeke’s cloak to shield her from the soft morning sun.

“What’s the idea?” Meilin glanced from Abeke to Conor, then back to Abeke.

“We were thinking that going around will probably take a couple of days,” Abeke explained. “And if there are some sort of traps that gave the valley of death its name, they’d probably be on the typical paths around or over the mountains.”

“So Xanthe found a different way?” Meilin looked over at Xanthe for more information.

“Well, last night I explored the cave a bit.” She motioned behind her where one of the tunnels grew dark. “And that one extends deep into the center of the mountain.”

“Uh-huh.” Meilin waited for more, but Xanthe didn’t say anything else. “But it ends, right? So we can’t go through.”

“Oh, wait. I get it.” Rollan’s expression changed. He snapped his fingers. “You want me to get us through the rest of it.”

“I already explained that we’ve faced a similar situation before,” Conor stated. “And we decided we couldn’t use it because it was too risky. And nothing has changed.”

“But it has changed. It was different with Worthy.” Abeke stroked Uraza, who remained curled up on the blanket. “The cave was completely unstable back then. Any movement could’ve caused the whole thing to collapse. That’s not the case here. And Rollan’s gotten much better at using the bond token, too.”

“I am pretty good at using it.” Rollan ran his hand along the inside wall of the cave. “But I wouldn’t be able to make a tunnel like I did when we were underground. There I only had to shift the dirt and sand.” He knocked on the stone. “This is too solid.”

“So that’s that.” Abeke stood up, pushed Uraza off, and shook out the blanket. “We go around and brace ourselves for whatever’s out there.”

Rollan pulled out a loose stone from the wall. “But maybe I can make enough cracks where we can take out the rocks and make our own tunnel.”

“Rollan.” Meilin pulled him aside. “Do you even know how to do that? This would probably be a lot harder than moving dirt, and if you mess up—”

“I won’t mess up.” He sidestepped Meilin to speak directly to Xanthe. “Do you know how far we’d have to go?”

“I tried to get a feel of the cave’s vibrations like in Sadre. It’s not the same because this is aboveground, but I think I could direct you to where there’s another cave that comes in from the other side of the mountain. There’s about ten feet or so of solid rock between them, though.”

“So I’d have to make enough cracks where we can create a tunnel between the two caves.” Rollan pursed his lips and nodded. “Yeah, I think I can do that ... but I should practice first.” He pulled out the Heart of the Land from under his shirt and lifted the chain over his head. He clutched the amulet in his hand and pushed against the cave wall. A rumbling and creaking noise filled the air.

“Whoa!” Meilin shouted. “Stop!”

Rollan yanked his fist away from the wall. Cracks resembling a spiderweb had already formed, boring into the stone. He dug his fingertips around one of the larger splintered pieces of rock and jostled it back and forth. Then he pulled it out, leaving behind a hole several inches deep.

“Hey, this might actually work!” Conor exclaimed.

“You doubted me?” Rollan smirked.

“Didn’t doubt you,” Conor explained. “I doubted the mountain.”

“Uraza,” Abeke called to the leopard. “I think it’ll be easier if you make the journey in passive state.”

Conor glanced over at Briggan. “You too, boy.”

Both animals stepped forward and disappeared, emerging as tattoos on their respective partners.

“I’m not even going to bother asking Essix,” Rollan said. “She’ll either fly around and find us, or she’ll follow us through the tunnel.”

“So let’s get started,” Xanthe said, ready to lead the way. “You’ll have to light the lantern. It gets very dark in there.”

The group gathered their things and walked into the center of the mountain, following Xanthe through several twists and turns. Eventually, they reached the dead end Xanthe had mentioned.

“All right, then.... Here we go.” Rollan struck the cave wall with the side of his fist while clutching the Heart of the Land.

The mountain rumbled and groaned with every hit as cracks splintered the wall. Piece by piece, bit by bit, the group took chunks out of the mountain. It was slow and tedious work that, after several hours, left many of their fingers bleeding.

“We’re through!” Abeke yelled when a piece of cave wall fell back into the opening on the other side.

Conor and Meilin pushed the remaining rocks and boulders until they could all crawl through the hole. A long, winding tunnel led them to an opening where daylight streamed in. The five Greencloaks and Xanthe stood side by side, looking out at a mountain on the opposite side of the green valley down below.

“There it is.” Xanthe pointed to a part of the mountain that looked like a man’s profile. “The face in the mountain that Sodu described seeing and that Tembo wrote about.”

It was unmistakable. The wind had chiseled out the curve of his forehead, the sunken area of his eyes, the steep angle of his nose, and a very prominent chin.

Conor gazed at the valley below, filled with bushes and a few acacia trees. There was a small stream running down the center of it. It was all very peaceful. Nothing like the barren wasteland he had imagined. “And is that supposed to be the valley of death?” he muttered.

“Doesn’t quite live up to its name, huh?” Abeke replied.

“Meh, you never know.” Rollan grabbed a small rock and threw it as far as he could. “It could be a trap to lull you into thinking nothing is wrong and then ... Whack! Your head is chopped off.”

“I can’t see much right now.” Xanthe was shielding her eyes, the hood of Abeke’s cloak pulled low so it nearly covered her nose. “Do any of you see skulls?”

“No,” Meilin answered. “But maybe it’s been so long that they’re all buried by now.”

Conor looked back at Xanthe. She had stepped farther inside the cave to avoid the direct midday sun. Even with Abeke’s cloak as protection, she wouldn’t be able to hike in the daytime for too long. “Maybe we should wait until it gets dark. Head out then.”

“No, you can’t waste any time,” Xanthe answered without hesitation. “I’ll only be slowing you down from this point on. You have to go without me.”

“But we can’t leave you here.” Abeke’s voice was full of concern. “Nilo can be a dangerous place, especially if you’re alone. You have the hyenas and other animals out here. Never mind the Oathbound.”

“I’m a warrior... I can take care of myself,” Xanthe answered, taking another step back. “And I really should go back to see Takoda. Let him know that I’m safe.” She retreated even farther into the dark cave. “I’ll travel at night and I’ll be fine. But you need to go finish your mission. My job was to get you to this point.”

Meilin gave Xanthe a small nod of gratitude. “Thank you for helping us.”

Abeke wasn’t convinced. “But maybe Xanthe can wait and—”

“Good luck, my friends.” Xanthe waved to them. “I hope our paths cross again soon.” She turned and ran back into the cave.

“Guess she didn’t want to discuss it anymore,” Anka said, calling out Toey, who scampered up her cloak. Within seconds Anka’s form faded from view as her skin and clothes blended against the side of the mountain.

“Xanthe understands that this is important.” Meilin pointed to a way down toward the valley. “Now, let’s stay alert for any traps.”

Rollan and Anka followed Meilin, while Conor stayed behind with Abeke for a moment.

“I had the vision again,” he whispered. “Last night.”

“The one with the big tidal wave?”

Conor nodded. “I’m watching from somewhere up high, and I can see the ocean pull away just before the wave comes barreling toward me. I just wish I knew more about what it means or the circumstances around it.”

“You can’t force that kind of thing.” Abeke touched his arm. “You have to be patient.”

Conor gave her a smile. “You sound like Master Naveb.”

“He definitely had some insight into each of us.” Abeke paused. “Well, most of us. He didn’t have much to say about Anka.”

“He may not have remembered that she was there. She’s pretty good at making people forget about her.”

“ABEKE! CONOR!” Meilin shouted. She had reached the valley floor and was holding her sword high above her head.

Conor and Abeke sprinted down the mountain, calling out Briggan and Uraza as they ran. As both animals appeared, neither one hesitated. Each took a fraction of a second to assess the situation and race to whatever had confronted the others down below.

In his mind, Conor braced himself for what he might find. He imagined the ground covered with half-rotten skulls and something that might put his own head in jeopardy. A trap, a ferocious animal, a vicious attacker, or something completely indescribable. But he was not prepared for what he saw as he drew closer to the valley.

It was Rollan. He was sitting in the middle of the field ... laughing hysterically.

Uraza and Briggan were pacing around all the bushes, looking as confused as Conor felt.

“What are you doing?” Abeke spun around, trying to understand what was so funny.

“The field of skulls.” Rollan cupped his hand under the stem of one of the large plants. “Look!”

Conor drew closer and noticed the dried seedpods that clung to the stem. Each one looked like a small brown skull. The entire valley was full of them.

Meilin swung her sword against another plant, knocking several of the seedpods into the air. “This is what we were so worried about.” She spun around, taking a swipe at another bush. “A bunch of dried-up plant parts.”

“Snapdragons,” Abeke confirmed. “It didn’t even occur to me. When the flowers die and fall away, what’s left behind are the seedpods that look like skulls.”

“And here I was thinking that there would be traps trying to chop our heads off.” Rollan stood and shook the dirt off his pants. “Makes me think that there may not be a demon to kill, either.”

Uraza and Briggan had relaxed and were now simply inspecting the area.

Conor looked around for something that might resemble a demon. All he could see were more of the snapdragon plants and, on the other side of the valley, the small mountain with the face jutting out.

“Those trees.” Abeke trekked through the snapdragon plants, mesmerized by something. Conor, Meilin, Rollan, and Anka all followed as she crossed the valley and got to the foot of the opposite mountain. “Up there. There’s a cluster of them on that ridge.”

“You think it has something to do with demons?” Conor tilted his head as if trying to see them from a different angle.

“They are the demons.” Abeke smiled. “Demon trees that bleed red sap.”

“So that’s the blood we have to drain?” Rollan looked relieved. “Plain old tree sap? I’m really liking this part of the mission. Tembo had a good sense of humor.”

“Although it looks like we might have to do some rock climbing to get up there.” Abeke stared at the sheer cliff.

“Rollan and I will do it,” Meilin said. She slipped off her bag and dug around inside it.

“Um, it might be nice if you asked before volunteering me.” Rollan pointed to Conor’s bag. “And if you’re looking for the ropes, they’re over there.”

“I can go with you, Meilin,” Abeke offered. “It shouldn’t be hard to get the sap.... Just nick the tree and attach one of our canteens to collect it. It might take a while, though. We’ll probably have to stay up there until tomorrow, because the sap can drip pretty slowly.”

“I didn’t say I wouldn’t go,” Rollan clarified. “Just that I’d like to be asked, not told. And it does make more sense for me and Meilin to go up.”

Conor and Abeke exchanged a quick glance and smiled. They both knew that Rollan liked the idea of spending some time alone with Meilin.

“What?” Rollan protested. “It’s better if the two people going up are tied together, and a counterbalance works best if both people are similar in weight ... in case either one falls, the other will be able to support them. Remember what happened when we were scaling the walls to get the Wildcat's Claw? That's why I'm saying it. Meilin and I are closer in size."

"Riiight," Conor said in mock deference. "It's just science."

Rollan had a broad smile on his face as he glanced at Meilin. "Exactly."

SLINGSHOT

SCALING MOUNTAINS WAS NOT ONE OF ROLLAN'S FAVORITE things to do, but it wasn't the worst, either. It ranked somewhere between eating seal fat and swimming in the ocean at night. But he did like spending time with Meilin. That made the climb worthwhile.

"Watch your step over here." Rollan inched his way along a long, narrow foothold where only the tips of his toes fit. "Putting another anchor in." He lodged the metal anchor into a crack in the mountain and slipped the rope that connected the two of them through it. This was much safer than when they had used vines to get to the Wildcat's Claw.

"All right!" Meilin called out. She was taking out the anchors every time she got to one so they could reuse them later on. Eventually she would collect all seven and either take over the lead or hand them back to Rollan.

They were about halfway to the ridge and making decent time. Up above them, Rollan could see plenty of handholds and a couple of narrow ledges where they'd be able to stop, rest, and catch their breaths before continuing to climb.

"How about I go up through here?" Rollan turned to look over his shoulder at Meilin. "Meilin?"

He followed the rope and saw Meilin was already higher than he was, scaling up the mountain. "This way is better," she shouted down. "There are more crevices for the anchors over here. Shift back."

Rollan was about to argue that he was supposed to be leading, but it was pointless. Meilin was already putting in the second anchor. It would be more dangerous to have her come back down.

He took a careful step sideways along the tiny ledge.

No, he was definitely going to say something. They were a team. Decisions needed to be made together. Meilin had a habit of forgetting that.

“Hey, Meilin, you can’t just take off and expect me to follow. We’re supposed to be a unit.” A rock bounced off the mountain from above, narrowly missing him as it came tumbling down.

“Yeah, but this way up was better,” she insisted.

Rollan plucked off an anchor and continued along the ledge, his frustration rising with every backtracking step he took. “Doesn’t matter. It’s not only you up here. You aren’t back in Zhong giving orders like some sort of Imperial Guard.”

Meilin stopped climbing and looked back at Rollan. “That’s not fair. You know I’m not like that.” Another rock tumbled from above. “Plus, I’ve been trying—”

A flurry of rocks the size of Rollan’s fist smashed against the mountainside, interrupting Meilin. But this wasn’t a rockslide from above. No, these rocks were being aimed at them from below.

Rollan looked down and saw several people jumping out from beneath the snapdragon bushes ... slingshots in their hands. They weren’t wearing the black that the Oathbound normally wore, but that didn’t make them any less dangerous.

Farther back, Abeke, Conor, and their spirit animals charged across the field to do battle with the slingshot-wielding menaces. He and Meilin needed to get down there to help.

“ROLLAN!” Meilin yelled as the rocks stopped. She was pointing to a ledge high above them.

A flurry of arrows whizzed by Rollan’s head, headed toward the valley.

Rollan looked up at the ridge. Several people dressed in loose-fitting, sand-colored clothing stood on the edge, with bows aimed at the valley below. Rollan followed the arrows’ path and saw them land right in front of his friends. Conor and Abeke split apart, scrambling to find cover.

Essix swooped down from the sky and attacked one of the men. The archer swung wildly with his bow, using it like a bludgeon to fight her off. Rollan could hear the man scream as Essix raked her sharp talons across his face.

“SURRENDER!” a voice shouted down at them. “Do not move or we won’t miss next time.”

“Rollan, we have to do something!” Meilin started to climb faster, ignoring the warning. “They have the advantage up there.”

“Hold on tight!” Rollan took out the Heart of the Land. He thought if he could focus all his energy on hitting the mountain, he could cause a tremor. Enough to shake the trees and maybe knock a few of the archers off the ledge. “Here it goes.”

Just then another hail of stones flew at them. The slingers were back, and this time they were hitting their marks. Rollan’s calf burned, and he hissed as a rock struck the back of his leg.

Another rock pegged him in the back, knocking the air from his lungs.

He glanced up at Meilin just in time to see a large rock hit the back of her head.

“MEILIN!” Rollan’s voice echoed through the valley down below, but he couldn’t do anything as her hands dropped to her sides, letting go of the handholds. Rollan saw her dark hair drape down her back as her body arched and peeled away from the mountain. She tumbled backward, knocking out two of the anchors as she sailed past Rollan on her way down.

Rollan braced himself. Only his counterweight would save Meilin from crashing against the rocks below. The rope’s slack disappeared as it snapped tight against his chest and thrust him against the mountain, pulling him up higher as Meilin dropped several more feet. Then everything stopped. The third and fourth anchors held tight and Rollan regained his footing ... but on the other end of the rope Meilin’s limp body dangled in midair.

An arrow flew overhead, this time headed toward the ridge, striking one of the attackers. Abeke was trying to give them cover, but there was no place for them to hide ... nowhere to go. All Rollan knew was that he had to help Meilin. She couldn’t hang like that for long.

Rollan grasped the Heart of the Land as tightly as he could and pushed against the mountain with all his might. He tried focusing all his thoughts and energy into moving the mountain. If he could create a ledge just below Meilin, he could then lower her onto it by giving the rope some slack. But he didn't even know if it was possible to force a piece of the mountain to jut out.

He had to try. Meilin's life depended on it.

Rollan concentrated, ignoring everything else in the world.

The mountain began to shake. He could hear shouting from their attackers, mixed in with the thundering rumble of rocks cascading from different areas.

He didn't care. He was going to save Meilin.

"ARGHH!" he grunted as all his energy poured out of himself and into the amulet.

Rollan didn't even realize that the fighting had stopped. He didn't know that there were no more rocks being hurled at them, no more arrows flying back and forth. His adrenaline was flowing and he was solely focused on Meilin. He could feel the weight of her body pulling on the rope.

The mountain rumbled and groaned as if in pain. Still, Rollan forced it to shift. He had never tapped into so much of the amulet's energy. Inch by inch, a narrow ledge unfolded, forming a few feet beneath Meilin.

Once it was about three feet wide, he stopped to catch his breath.

"What kind of power do you have over our mountain?" a gruff voice called out.

Rollan ignored it. He slowly climbed up, allowing the rope to slide through the remaining anchors, which in turn allowed Meilin to gently fall onto the newly formed ledge.

"Answer us!" the voice demanded, but there was no show of force to back up the words. The arrows and rocks had ceased.

"I have to check on my friend!" Rollan shouted. He untied the rope around his chest and quickly scaled down to where Meilin lay.

"Meilin," he whispered, crouching down beside her. He lifted her head and his fingers came away bloody. "Come on, Meilin. Open your eyes," he said. "We need Jhi. She can help you. You have to call her out."

Meilin's body remained limp in his arms.

"Your falcon!" a much deeper voice shouted from above. "Call it back into passive state or we will finish what we started."

For the first time since Meilin had been hit, Rollan took a good look at his surroundings.

The sun was beginning to set over the western mountains. He could hear Essix squawking. Above Rollan were warriors with arrows pointed directly at him and Meilin. Down below in the valley, Abeke and Conor were sitting among the snapdragon bushes with their hands over their heads, another group of warriors surrounding them. Uraza and Briggan were nowhere in sight. Rollan assumed that they must have been forced back into their passive states as well.

“Call off the falcon!” the voice yelled again, sounding a little more desperate.

Rollan imagined that Essix was fighting some of the warriors ... and likely winning.

An arrow hit the ground, narrowly missing Meilin by a few inches. “Get the falcon out of here or the next one won’t miss!”

“Essix! ESSIX!” Rollan wobbled as he stood up, a sudden wave of exhaustion hitting him. “Please,” Rollan begged, pulling open his shirt, hoping the falcon realized that he had to do this to help Meilin. “Come!”

Essix flew away from the ridge and swooped past Rollan. Their eyes connected, and Rollan knew that the falcon understood the gravity of the situation.

A brief flash and the falcon tattoo appeared over Rollan’s heart.

“She’s gone,” Rollan shouted. “What do you want from us?”

There was silence. Rollan gazed over at Meilin again. He had never thought of her as fragile, but that’s exactly how she looked. He would do anything to protect her.

“I am Jehan, leader of the Dasat,” a strong, feminine voice called down. “We saw what you did. How do you hold such power over this mountain?”

There was no way Rollan was going to tell her about the Heart of the Land. “It doesn’t matter, but I can do much worse if you don’t leave us alone.” Rollan hoped this might be enough to frighten their attackers because, truth be told, he was far too weak to use the bond token again.

“Your friend is hurt... We can help her,” Jehan offered.

“You are the ones who hurt her!” Rollan countered.

Three long ropes tumbled down the mountainside toward the ledge. Rollan knew there was nowhere for them to go. And even if there were, neither he nor Meilin were in any shape to move.

“Climb up!” Jehan commanded. “That’s an order.”

Rollan was sitting next to Meilin once again, cradling her head. His own body was spent. Moving the mountain had drained him of all his energy. "I can't. I'm too weak." His voice shook as he spoke. "And I'm not leaving her here."

"Tie the rope around your waist and we will pull you up," Jehan offered. "Once we talk, if I'm satisfied by your answers, then I'll send a rescue team for your friend. It's the only way to save her."

Rollan didn't like the idea, but he knew there was no other way. Meilin needed to get off this mountain. She needed help. Her head had stopped bleeding, but she wasn't waking up.

He bent over and gave Meilin a kiss on the forehead. "I'm sorry," he said softly in her ear. "I hope I'm doing the right thing." He placed her head gently on the ground, tied the rope around his waist, and gave it a tug. "All right!" Rollan yelled. "Pull me up. Just get her rescue ready."

THE HUNT

ABEKE COULDN'T BELIEVE THAT AFTER EVERYTHING they'd been through, including epic wars with the Devourer and the Wurm, the Dasat tribe had caught them completely unaware. Even Uraza hadn't spotted them until it was too late.

"Look! Here come your friends." Khai, one of the guards, pointed toward a group carrying torches down the mountain. Even though it was dark, the light from the torches revealed an exhausted Rollan using two people as support as he walked with his head hung low. Behind him, several of the Dasat carried a wooden stretcher with Meilin strapped on top. "We'll see what they have to say."

"They'll tell you the truth, just as I have." Abeke tried wiggling the ropes that held her hands behind her back. After being captured, they had all been brought to the small Dasat camp on the other side of the mountain. "We only needed to get a bit of sap from the tree, and then we would have been on our way."

Khai shook his head. "Greencloaks never want one thing. They always demand more."

"But there was no reason to attack us," Conor argued, sitting on one of the many colorful rugs strewn around the camp. He was tied together with Anka, back to back. "We could have explained what we were doing. We meant no harm."

"A Dasat hunter captures their prey first, then decides what to do with it," Khai replied, bending down to get closer to Conor. "That's why

I cornered you and your wolf in the valley. But in this case, I won't be the one to decide what to do with you ... that'll be Jehan's decision."

"Who's Jehan?" Abeke asked.

"I am." A girl not much older than the Greencloaks motioned for the others to take Meilin to one of the tents. She wore a long, golden-brown scarf over her head and had sun-kissed skin and dark hair that peeked out from the edge of the scarf. "I'm the leader of the Dasat. This is our territory. No one enters without our permission. Your friend's injuries are the unfortunate consequence of her refusal to follow instructions."

"Jehan, we meant no harm," Abeke insisted. "We were simply—"

"Searching for the edge of the land, once you'd stolen the sap of the demon blood tree, correct?" Jehan smiled as Abeke's eyebrows scrunched together. "Don't be so surprised. Your friend Rollan was most informative ... once he was given the right incentive."

A honey badger scurried between the guards, causing them to jump aside and give it a wide berth. Abeke knew that these animals were among the most fearless hunters in Nilo, taking on even lions many times their size. The honey badger wasn't big. In fact it looked similar to a skunk, with a white stripe down its weasel-like body. But its sharp claws and bad attitude made it a ferocious fighter. No one wanted to mess with one of these animals.

The honey badger circled Anka and Conor, pausing briefly to give a guttural hiss and bare its teeth at them.

"Livora," Jehan reprimanded the animal. The honey badger glanced back, thought better of trying to pick a fight, and trotted over to stand next to Jehan.

Abeke realized that Jehan was Marked, and that the honey badger was her spirit animal. It made sense. Abeke could see that Jehan had the respect of much older and stronger members of her group. She was probably as smart and ferocious as Livora.

"You said you would help her." Rollan glanced back at the tent where Meilin had been carried. "You'll keep your word, right?"

"Of course." Jehan unsheathed a long, sharp knife that she carried at her waist. "But you still haven't truly explained how that ledge on the mountain moved." She strolled over to Abeke and stood behind her.

"I did." Rollan gave Abeke a quick glance. "It's from my spirit animal bond. A power that comes from within me.... Only I can tap into it ... no one else."

So Rollan wasn't giving away all their secrets. Only what was necessary to help Meilin. He hadn't told them about the Heart of the Land or the fact that anyone could use it.

"So you say." Jehan raised the knife above Abeke's head.

"NO!" Conor yelled as Jehan sliced the air with the knife, bringing it down with whiplike speed.

Abeke didn't see the blade sailing down. She only felt the parting of the air behind her back, and then her hands were free. Jehan hadn't hurt her. Instead, she'd cut the ropes around her wrists.

"No reason to have a fellow Niloan tied up." Jehan put the knife back in the leather holster. "The Dasat are an honorable people."

Abeke rubbed her wrists. "What about the others?" She pointed to Anka and Conor.

Jehan chuckled. "We're honorable ... not stupid." She waved over one of the warriors who had shot at them with the slingshots. "Take the Niloan Greencloak to the injured girl in my tent. Once she gets better, we will escort them all back across the mountains from where they came."

"Wait." Rollan took a step forward. "I want to go with Meilin."

Jehan shook her head. "I'm sure you do, but it's not your decision."

"I know of the Dasat," Abeke said. "Your skills are legendary throughout Nilo. Growing up I would hear stories of your hunting abilities ... but no one in my village knew if you still existed."

"We most certainly exist," Khai scoffed. "Otherwise you wouldn't be our prisoners."

"Guests," Jehan corrected him. "They don't have to be prisoners, if they agree to leave the same way they came."

"But I wonder if all the stories are true," Abeke mused. She watched as the honey badger used her large claws to dig a burrow a few feet away. "The incredible hunts and contests that the Dasat were said to hold. Rumor had it that they never turned away from a challenge."

Conor seemed to guess what Abeke was thinking. "We've met plenty of exceptional hunters and warriors in our travels," he said. "Like the Tergesh in Zhong and the Ardu in Arctica."

"Ha!" Khai rolled his eyes. "As if they could hold a candle to any of the Dasat."

Abeke had hoped that Rollan would chime in—he was usually good at this sort of thing—but the boy kept his eyes on the tent where Meilin was being treated. He wasn't paying attention to anything that was being said.

"Perhaps we should have a contest," Abeke suggested. "Some of the stories I heard claimed the Dasat were always eager to prove their skills."

"What do you have in mind?" Khai asked, his eyes sparkling at the thought of a challenge.

"Your best against our best," Conor said.

"No." Jehan quashed the idea. "We've already proven our skills in capturing you. Soon you'll leave and be grateful that we let you live to tell the tale. We're not here for games."

Livora popped her head up from the burrow, as if something had piqued her interest. The honey badger scampered over to a barrel and, rising up on her hind legs, clawed her way to the top.

"There's nothing to eat there," Jehan said to her spirit animal.

Livora jumped down and ran between Rollan's legs. The boy blinked, as if coming to. He turned his attention away from the tent and back to the group.

"What if there's an incentive for the winner?" Rollan asked.

Abeke smiled. Rollan had been listening after all.

"Go on." Jehan's shrewd eyes watched him.

"If your challenger wins"—Rollan paused to consider his words—"I'll show you how I moved the mountain."

"I thought you said it was your spirit animal bond?" Jehan questioned, her arms folded across her chest.

"Yes, but I can show you how to work together with your spirit animal." Rollan pointed to the honey badger, who was busily gnawing on a rock. "That's what Greencloaks do, after all. Perhaps you could discover your own power."

Jehan seemed to entertain the idea. "And if you win ... what is it that you want?"

"If we win ... " Abeke spoke slowly, carefully considering what she was going to say. "You simply let us cross to get the sap."

"And you tell no one that we were ever here," Anka added.

"Ah, yes." Jehan nodded. "Rollan spoke of these Oathbound who are chasing you." The girl paced back and forth. "We're not involved in your dealings with the Oathbound. We'll take no side in your battle, as neither is a proven friend of the Dasat."

“Jehan.” Khai slowly walked around Conor, evaluating him. “I know I can beat these Greencloaks. This one and his wolf tried to attack me earlier. I would enjoy battling him again.”

“And you swear that you’ll show me how you moved the mountain?” Jehan asked Rollan.

He nodded as several of the Dasat gathered around. Word had already spread that a challenge had been issued.

“Then I see no harm in having a hunting contest,” Jehan declared, turning to look at everyone. “Just as our old Dasat traditions dictate,” she announced. “We shall give this matter over to the twin sisters of Fate and Skill, who guide every hunter’s path. The first hunter to return with a significant kill will be declared the victor.” She spun back around. “Our most resourceful hunter, Khai, shall be our representative.”

The crowd cheered.

Jehan then looked at Rollan. “And who is your representative?”

“She is.” Rollan pointed to Abeke, who stepped forward to stand next to Khai. Abeke could sense it was a stark contrast; the hunter dwarfed her in height and width.

The Dasat began laughing, and she heard murmuring rise throughout the crowd.

Khai was not pleased. “This is who you choose?” He grabbed Abeke under her arms and lifted her as if she were a small child. “This isn’t a challenge ... it is an insult. And I will not—”

Abeke swung her leg, catching him unaware. As he lost his balance, the hunter dropped her, and she landed lightly on her hands and feet. She turned and gave Khai a strong kick in the stomach that sent him flying onto his back, then quickly pressed her foot against the base of his neck.

“You’re correct,” Abeke hissed, bending over to get close to his face. “It doesn’t seem like much of a challenge ... does it?”

Khai glared at her and batted away her leg.

“You going to let her do that to you, Khai?” someone called out.

“Khai, how’s the view from down there?” another voice laughed.

“Enough!” Jehan raised her hands and the crowd quickly grew silent. “We would all do well to remember that a hunter is not measured by his ... or her ... size.” She faced Abeke. “You will not use your spirit animal during the hunt. This is a test of your skill alone. Is that clear?”

Abeke wasn’t worried. She knew she could hold her own with the very best hunters. “Understood, but I will need my bow and arrows.”

“Of course.” Jehan motioned for one of the Dasat guards to get her things.

“What about Meilin?” Rollan asked, his voice laced with worry. “Someone needs to help her.”

“Agreed.” Jehan’s face seemed to soften as she studied Rollan. “Since the Niloan Greencloak will be gone, I think it’s best if you go to my tent and stay with your friend. The others will stay elsewhere.”

“Thank you,” Rollan said as the Dasat guard handed Abeke her bow and a quiver full of arrows, which she immediately inspected.

“And when does the hunt begin?” Anka asked.

Jehan lifted a single eyebrow and smiled. “It already has.”

“What?” Abeke spun around and noticed that Khai had disappeared into the crowd. He not only had the advantage of knowing the terrain, but now he had a head start.

“But that’s not fair,” Conor protested. “There was no warning.”

Jehan shrugged. “You can waste time arguing or you can begin the hunt.”

Rollan’s eyes met Abeke’s. She gave him a slow nod. She would do this for them. And for Meilin. Failure was not an option.

Crossing the valley, Abeke kept her eyes peeled for any type of movement. She hadn’t spotted any large game during the day, but there would certainly be nocturnal animals wandering the valley floor at night. She remembered seeing a watering hole as they were being brought to camp. That would be a good place to seek out game. The only problem would be if a predator turned the tables on her. This hunter had no interest in becoming the hunted.

The moonlit sky cast enough light for Abeke to see by. Every once in a while, she would hear a noise and pause, but she had yet to detect anything large enough to waste an arrow on. She contemplated shooting a very small warthog she spied hiding near a snapdragon bush, but feared that wouldn’t be enough. It didn’t seem like something the Dasat would consider significant.

She was approaching a clearing not far from the watering hole when she saw it. A lone gazelle stood placidly, foraging for its own bit of food. Abeke silently pulled out an arrow from her quiver and nocked it on her bow. She took aim and waited for the perfect shot.

The gazelle froze, sensing something was amiss.

Abeke held the arrow, watching the gazelle sniff the air.

The way the animal took in its surroundings reminded her of Uraza. Abeke's fingers trembled. It was like when she had been forced to shoot her beloved spirit animal. Abeke blinked, trying to cast out those thoughts and focus on the task at hand.

A perfectly aimed arrow flew through the night and struck the gazelle in the neck, killing it instantly.

For a moment, Abeke thought she had shot the animal, but then she noticed that her fingertips still held her own arrow.

"YES!" Khai ran past Abeke, toward the dead gazelle. "Your hesitation is my victory!" he called out.

Abeke couldn't believe it. He'd taken the kill from right under her nose. She wasn't used to being bested by anyone during a hunt. Now the Greencloaks were in serious trouble. Rollan would have to show Jehan how to use the Heart of the Land, and they would be no closer to finding Stormspeaker.

"Ha-ha!" Khai whooped it up as he tossed the gazelle over his shoulders. "And you didn't even sense me come up behind you! I'm still the king of the hunters!"

A chorus of laughter followed Khai's celebration. His eyes widened and he jolted to a stop, his body still.

Abeke knew all too well what was making that sound.

Hyenas.

Khai spun around, realizing too late that he was surrounded. Abeke thought he would toss the gazelle aside and make a run for it, but instead he pulled out his long knife. He was going to try to leave with his kill.

The hyenas pounced, attacking him from all sides. He slashed at the air, knocking a couple of them away before another one jumped on his back, snapping its jaws on the dead animal.

"Khai!" Abeke called out. "Let them have the gazelle! It's not worth it."

"Never!" he answered. A hyena bit down on Khai's leg and he cried out in pain. Khai grabbed the animal by the head and wrestled it off. "Go! This is not your fight!"

"It is now!" Abeke took aim and shot the hyena as Khai stabbed it along its flank. She called out Uraza with a burst of radiance, and the Great Leopard immediately gave chase to several hyenas. “There are too many of them for one person!” she said, firing off two more arrows.

Khai spun around. He faced one particularly determined hyena that didn’t want to give up on its gazelle meal. “This is mine!” he shouted. “I will bring victory to my people or die trying!”

Abeke wasn’t sure if he was speaking to her or the hyena, but it didn’t matter. They were now both in the fight together.

Then, from somewhere behind her, Abeke heard a rustling sound as another hyena raced through the tall grass at full speed toward her. She nocked another arrow but didn’t have enough time to aim. Just as the hyena lunged at her, Uraza leaped through the air, grasping the animal with her powerful jaws. The two fell to the ground, rolling over each other, while Uraza quickly tore at its body. It wasn’t even a close match.

Abeke kept her bow and arrow ready, searching the area for any more attacks, but the night had grown still again.

All the hyenas had disappeared ... and so had Khai with his gazelle. Abeke had failed her friends.

INTRUDERS

MEILIN SLOWLY OPENED HER EYES. SHE ROLLED HER head to the side and saw Rollan sleeping next to her, his hand holding on to hers. They were both lying on soft mattresses placed on colorful rugs. There was a hint of daylight coming through the fabric of the large tent they were sleeping in.

“Rollan.” Her voice didn’t sound like her own. It was raspy and weak. She cleared her throat and tried again. “Rollan.”

Rollan sat up with a start, pulling at a shackle that chained their ankles together. “You’re awake! You’re awake!” He hugged her, then pulled back to double-check that she was indeed alert. “I’m sorry for arguing with you. I didn’t mean any of it.”

Meilin touched the bandage that was wrapped around her head. She was confused. The last thing she remembered was climbing the mountain with Rollan and arguing about whether she was too bossy. “What happened?”

“You were knocked out for a while, but you will heal,” a voice declared from the opposite side of the tent. “Based on what Rollan’s told me, your spirit animal should help you far better than our herbs.”

Meilin watched as a very pretty girl walked confidently over to the tent’s opening. She pulled aside the fabric and called to someone outside. “Our guests are awake. Bring them some food and fresh water.”

Meilin was confused. Who was this person? How did she know Rollan? And if they were her guests, then why had she shackled Meilin’s leg to Rollan's? Nothing made sense. "What's going on?" Meilin asked.

"Her name is Jehan," Rollan explained. "She's the leader of the Dasat. They protect these mountains ... as we have painfully discovered." He gave Jehan a sheepish grin and Jehan returned the smile.

Meilin pursed her lips. She wasn't sure what had happened while she was out, but she already knew that she didn't like this girl.

Jehan studied Meilin. "Rollan told me some very impressive stories about the Heroes of Erdas last night. Seems you are a formidable warrior." A honey badger scampered around the tent, climbing on top of several stacked rugs and then curling into a ball to sleep. "That's why we had to take certain precautions. We couldn't take the chance that you'd wake up during the night and try to escape."

Meilin tried to sit up, but everything seemed to spin and she fell back on her elbows. "So we're your prisoners." She didn't understand how things could have changed so much. "How long was I out?"

"About twelve hours," Jehan answered. "We tried making you as comfortable as possible ... under the circumstances." A guard poked his head into the tent, motioning for Jehan to come outside. "I'll be right back," she said.

"You got hit on the head pretty hard," Rollan said as soon as Jehan left. "You should have Jhi take a look at you. She'll help you feel better."

Meilin nodded, but glanced around the room. No one else was with them. "Where are the others?" she whispered, already trying to think of a means to escape.

"Conor and Anka are being guarded in another tent," Rollan answered. "You were brought here because you were in bad shape last night. I talked Jehan into letting me stay here, too."

"I'm sure it took a lot of convincing," Meilin muttered.

"Huh?" Rollan scrunched his eyebrows together. "What do you mean?"

"Nothing." Meilin wasn't sure what she meant, or what she was feeling exactly. "How about Abeke? Is she free?"

"Sort of," he replied. "We challenged the Dasat to a hunting contest. If Abeke wins, then ... " Rollan stopped talking as Jehan whipped open the fabric covering the tent's entrance and stepped inside.

"You both need to stay here," she ordered, her face very stern.

"What's happened?" Rollan asked. "Something's changed."

Jehan didn't answer him. "Just do as I say and I'll be back soon. My guards will be here with your breakfast in a few minutes." She looked at the honey badger. "Livora, we need to go." She held out her hand and the honey badger darted toward her, disappearing and then reappearing as a tattoo on her wrist.

"Something's happening," Rollan observed. "You need to have Jhi get you back to full strength. We may need to move quick."

Within the hour, Jhi had Meilin feeling better. Rollan apprised her of everything that had happened since her injury. The panda was still licking Meilin's head when a flurry of activity outside made Jhi stop. Meilin sat up, ready for action.

Outside, loud cheers erupted as the tent panels were thrust open and a guard entered carrying a basket of vines and grasses. "These are for the Great Panda," he said, placing the basket in the corner. He watched curiously as Jhi ambled over.

"What's going on outside?" Meilin asked.

The guard smiled. "We've received the signal that one of the hunters is returning. Come." He walked over to the tent panel and pulled it open. "I don't think there's any harm for you to see who won." He glanced at Jhi chewing on a vine. "But your spirit animal should stay here."

"I don't think you can tear her away from her breakfast," Rollan said, offering his arm to Meilin as she stood up.

"I got it," Meilin said, waving him off.

"I have a bad feeling about this," he whispered.

Shuffling their feet because their ankles were still chained together, Meilin and Rollan went outside. A short distance away, Meilin spotted Conor and Anka standing in front of a tent.

"Meilin!" Anka shouted and lurched forward before stumbling to a halt. Her ankle was chained to one of the tent posts. "You're fine?"

"I am!" Meilin answered.

Anka's face was awash with relief. Meilin could tell how concerned she'd been about her. It was good to have friends who cared so deeply.

"Nice to have you back!" Conor shouted.

"Look." Rollan pointed to a large man carrying a gazelle over his shoulder. The man was being congratulated by several people. "It's Khai, the hunter I told you about."

“Abeke lost?” Meilin was shocked. Abeke was the best hunter she knew.

Khai dropped the gazelle on a wooden pallet as Jehan rushed out from one of the tents. She had a serious look on her face.

“Jehan, I have brought victory once again, but I must tell you—”

“Later. I need to talk to you inside,” Jehan declared, apparently uninterested in the details of Khai’s hunt.

Khai’s expression quickly changed. He scanned the camp, his eyes locking on Meilin. Something was wrong, but it seemed only Jehan knew what it was.

“Khai, tell us the story of your victory!” one of the guards shouted.

Khai gave him a slight smile and waved. “Not now,” he said as others began to sense the unease that permeated the air. The time for hunting challenges was apparently over.

“We need to escape,” Meilin whispered. “They’re planning something.”

Rollan nodded in agreement.

Just then the sound of a ram’s horn being blown in the distance made everyone in the camp stop what they were doing. A second bellowing sound quickly followed.

“Intruders! Take your positions!” a guard yelled, and everyone rushed to grab a weapon.

“Now’s our chance!” Meilin looked back at Jhi, who was chomping away at a bushel of leaves.

But Jehan was already running toward them. “We’re setting you free,” she announced. “You must leave the camp at once and not return.” She pulled out a key and unlocked the shackle around each of their ankles.

“Why? What’s happening?” Rollan asked. Across the camp, Khai was releasing Conor and Anka as well.

“The people you call the Oathbound ... they’re approaching from the mountains on the other side of the valley.” She turned to one of the guards. “Bring them their bags,” she instructed, then hustled to grab her own sword and a quiver full of arrows.

“This doesn’t make sense,” Meilin whispered as the camp emptied out and Conor and Anka rushed over. “Why wouldn’t she turn us over to the Oathbound?”

Rollan shrugged; he seemed as perplexed as Meilin.

“What’s going on around here?” a familiar voice shouted.

Abeke entered the nearly desolate camp, her face and clothes covered in dust. Meilin noticed that she was carrying a dead hyena over her shoulder, but they had bigger problems now.

“The Oathbound are coming,” Conor replied. He pulled on his cloak and tightened the holster that once again carried his ax.

“And for some reason the Dasat have decided to let us go,” Anka added.

“If you’d rather we turn you over to the Oathbound, that can still be arranged.” Jehan had returned, holding a small vial in her hand. “Although Khai argued against it.” She looked at Abeke. “He told me what you and your spirit animal did. You’ve proven yourself a worthy friend to the Dasat, and so the challenge is considered a tie. We are granting you passage through our land.”

“Jehan!” Khai called out from a mountain ridge. “We await your orders.”

“Here.” Jehan handed Abeke the glass tube, filled with a scarlet substance. “This is the demon tree sap. Take it and go quickly. We will delay the Oathbound.”

“I’m not sure what to say, except thank you.” Abeke glanced up at Khai, who raised his hand in recognition.

Anka had already faded from sight and Conor had called out Briggan, who stood proudly next to him. His silver fur glistened in the morning sun.

“Hopefully the Oathbound won’t be interested in the Dasat. If pressed, you can say we escaped,” Conor suggested.

Jehan laughed. “That is something no one would believe.” She turned to Rollan. “Last night, you mentioned that you were seeking the edge of the land. I think I know what that is. Follow me.” Jehan took a few steps with Rollan while Livora scuttered behind them. Jehan pointed to a plateau in the distance. “The flat top of that mountain has an overlook. When viewed from a certain angle, it gives the impression that the world beneath you ends. It can feel like you’re at the edge of the land. That might be where you need to go.”

Rollan nodded. “Thank you,” he said. “That’s a big help.”

“All right.” Meilin joined them. She was feeling antsy. They were spending too much time with all this chitchat. “We need to get moving before the Oathbound arrive.”

Livora opened her mouth, revealing her sharp teeth, and hissed at Meilin.

Meilin glared at the honey badger. The dislike was mutual.

Jehan placed her hand on Rollan's arm and drew closer. "I believe you're a friend of the Dasat, and I hope you choose to return one day. You'll be welcomed here."

"I'd like that," Rollan said as Meilin tugged on his sleeve.

"We have to hurry," Meilin urged. They couldn't afford to waste any more time. Jhi had already gone into passive state, and Uraza had rejoined the group. They needed to get away from the approaching Oathbound. Plus, if Meilin was honest with herself, she simply didn't like the way Jehan was speaking to Rollan.

"Of course. I, too, have to go." Jehan sprinted off to join Khai and the others, who were headed in the opposite direction. "Good luck!" she shouted back. "May Fate and Skill be with you."

Meilin scowled. This Dasat girl was annoying. But what she'd said was true enough. They would need fate, skill, and a lot of luck to complete their mission of regaining the Greencloaks' good name.

STORM'S WRATH

CONOR AND THE OTHER GREENCLOAKS HURRIED TO reach the plateau that Jehan had shown Rollan. Even if the Dasat slowed down the Oathbound, there was no time to spare. The Greencloaks hiked for most of the day over grueling, uneven terrain and crossed fast, slippery streams, while the blazing sun of Nilo beat down on them. By the time the group reached their final climb, the day had grown cloudy and a heavy fog rolled over everything except the tops of the mountain range. Visibility soon dropped to the point where Conor could only see Briggan if he was right next to him; otherwise the wolf simply disappeared into the mist.

“You think these are the clouds we’re supposed to walk through?” Conor asked. He knew his friends were nearby, but he couldn’t see anything except the gray haze.

“What?” Abeke called out from somewhere in the mist.

“The ones in Tembo’s message,” Conor said. “Didn’t it say that after we passed the valley of death and got the demon’s blood, we’d have to go through some clouds to arrive at the edge of the land?”

“It did,” Meilin answered. “And Tembo said the queen’s glory would then be revealed. I can’t imagine he’d make us come all the way out here if he wasn’t referring to Stormspeaker as the queen’s glory.”

From high above them, Conor heard Essix screech.

“Keep going,” Rollan called out. “We’re almost out of all this fog. It gets clearer as we near the top.”

Rollan was right. As Conor hiked higher up the mountain, the fog began to thin out. A few minutes later, he pulled himself over the top of a ridge and saw the flat vastness of the plateau. Stretching out in every direction was an almost barren landscape, punctuated with a few trees that seemed to rise out of the rocks. Conor tilted his head skyward to admire the streaks of purples, pinks, and oranges that the setting sun was creating.

“Look at this!” Anka called out, standing near the eastern edge of the plateau. “I think we’re definitely in the right place!”

Conor and the others raced over and saw what she meant. There was a sharp drop-off that disappeared into the blanket of clouds, which covered everything up to the horizon. Without mountains to obstruct the view, it seemed as if they were floating above the world.

“It’s like Tembo said,” Conor whispered. “We’re standing on the edge of the land, above the clouds.” The beauty of the scene awed hm.

“Want to spread out while we still have a little bit of light?” Meilin asked, breaking the mood. “We can cover more area that way, and see if the ‘queen’s glory’ is somehow revealed.”

“Wait ... look.” Abeke pointed to Uraza and Briggan, who were both headed in the same direction. In the distance, Essix was flying in tight circles over one spot.

“There must be something over there,” Rollan said. “Let’s go.”

The five Greencloaks took off running. Up ahead, Uraza and Briggan were now in a full sprint. They were in a race against time. The sun had already dipped below the horizon, and a cloud-filled night meant there would be little moonlight to help them find the crown.

Abeke had dashed ahead when she suddenly stopped, whirled around, and motioned for them all to get down. Conor crouched close to the ground, squinting into the distance at what looked like a small stone building near the far edge of the plateau.

“What do you think that is?” Anka asked.

“Some sort of lookout maybe ... ” Meilin took a few steps forward, keeping low to the ground.

High above, Essix squawked. She then swooped down, disappearing through one of the building’s broken windows.

Conor held his breath until the falcon popped out of another window, going back to circling the building.

“Looks like it’s empty,” Rollan said. “Essix would have warned us if someone was there.”

Abeke straightened up. “Then let’s go quickly, before we lose the last bits of daylight.”

Leaving Uraza and Briggan outside as guards, the Greencloaks entered the small stone building. Inside, Conor noticed several half-spent candles littering the floor. A wooden table had been flipped over and chairs were tossed against a far wall. A thick layer of dust and dirt covered everything.

“Who has the matches?” Rollan asked, picking up one of the candles.

“Here.” Conor had already lit a candle and carried it over.

“This place looks like it was ransacked ages ago,” Meilin remarked, while she and Abeke righted the table. “I doubt anything like a crown was left behind.”

“If it was hidden like the Heart of the Land and the Wildcat’s Claw were, then ... ” Rollan ran his fingers along the wall, searching for a lever or notch that might reveal a secret compartment. “Maybe whoever was here before couldn’t find it.”

“Well, we’re definitely in the right place.” Abeke took one of the lit candles and walked to a corner alcove. She illuminated a statue carved into one of the stone walls, of a woman with her hands cupped in front of her. “I’m pretty sure this is supposed to be Nefrini.” Abeke looked around at the sparseness of the building. “I think this might be more of a shrine than a lookout post.”

Conor brought his own candle and added to the light in the alcove. He blew some of the dust off the wall beneath the statue, where something had been etched into the stone. “There’s writing here.”

Meilin and Rollan walked over and the alcove flickered with the lights of the candles. The shadows cast by the Greencloaks danced across the stones. Conor used the bottom of his shirt to wipe more of the dust off the carving.

Anka read it out loud. “The storm’s wrath has no mercy until hands drip with the blood of demons and ancestors.”

“Whoa,” Rollan muttered, stepping back. “Hands dripping with the blood of demons and ancestors ... Even knowing it means tree sap, that really does not sound good. If you ask me, I think Tembo had a little too much flair for the dramatic.”

Abeke reached up and wiped the dust off the statue. “Maybe it has nothing to do with Stormspeaker.”

“Right.” Conor rolled his eyes. “It’s just a warm and fuzzy bedtime story.” Everyone turned and stared at him. “Sorry ... guess I’m just a little tired.” He walked to the window and gazed into the pitch-black night. There was no glass in the window frame and a soft breeze swept over his head, rustling his hair into his face. He brushed it away, his fingers lingering over the mark on his forehead. He couldn’t help thinking about what Naveb had said ... that the Wyrms had changed him ... set him apart from the others, making him see things differently than they did.

Perhaps he should be thinking about their mission in a different way. Would devoting himself to fixing the things in Eura that the Greencloaks had destroyed while under the Wyrms’ control be such a bad thing?

Conor glanced behind him at the others, still scanning the stone building for clues. He shook his head, dispensing with his own question. No, he loved his homeland, but the Greencloaks served everyone equally. And he couldn’t imagine fighting against any of his friends.

Abeke, Meilin, and Rollan ... each of them was so different from Conor, and from each other. They were from far-flung corners of Erdas, but the Greencloaks had brought them together to help. They had to regain the Greencloaks’ good name, to show the world that it was possible for every nation to unite under a common banner.

He placed his hands on the windowsill, leaned forward, and took a deep breath.

CLICK!

The frame dropped about an inch and Conor jumped back. He heard a rumbling from outside and the building began to shake. Something had been triggered.

“What did you do?” Meilin’s eyes darted around the room as the candles on the table began to wobble.

“Nothing!” Conor rushed over and picked up a candle before it toppled over. “I leaned against the windowsill and something clicked.”

The soft breeze blew stronger. With every passing second it picked up more dust, sand, and dirt. Suddenly, a burst of air shot through the building, blowing out all the candles.

“I think it’s a sandstorm!” Abeke shouted over the high, whistling wind that was now engulfing them.

“Or a tornado!” Rollan bellowed as the chairs tumbled against the far wall. “Get away from the windows.”

Conor flung the door open and stepped outside. “BRIGGAN!” he yelled, holding out his arm as a driving rain—a downpour that hadn’t been there seconds before—battered his skin. The storm was fiercer than any he had ever seen. He leaned into the wind to keep his balance and yelled again. “BRIGGAN!”

Lightning flashed overhead, and in that instant he saw both Briggan and Uraza trying to make their way toward him. Uraza was crouched low to the ground, crawling toward the building, but Briggan was stumbling and losing his footing. A storm that could stop the Great Beasts was not an ordinary storm.

“URAZA!” Abeke shouted, bracing herself in the doorway only a few feet behind Conor.

“HERE!” Conor shouted. It was a struggle just to be heard over the deafening roar that surrounded them. Another thunderbolt rocked the sky above as Briggan disappeared in a flash of his own and joined Conor as a tattoo on the back of his forearm.

A sudden gust of wind pulled the front door off its hinges, yanking Abeke from her feet and sending her tumbling to the ground. The door sailed into the night sky like a child’s kite freed of its string.

“I’m fine!” Abeke called out. She braced against the storm as she stood and checked under her elbow for Uraza’s tattoo.

Another lightning strike lit up the sky. Conor could see blood pouring out of a large gash over Abeke’s right eye.

“You’re bleeding!” Conor shouted as Abeke wiped her face.

“Get inside!” Rollan yelled, standing just inside the doorway. “None of this is normal!”

More lightning flashes followed as Conor and Abeke ran into the building, where Meilin had created a sort of barricade with the table backed into a corner.

“What do you mean by not normal?” Conor shouted over the fury of the wind and the hail that was now pelting the roof.

“All of this!” Anka yelled as they all huddled under the table. “It’s like every storm’s wrath put together!”

“No mercy from the storm’s wrath.... ” Abeke crawled out from the barricade. “It’s the statue!” she proclaimed. “The key to stopping the storm is there!” From her pocket she pulled out the vial of demon tree sap that Jehan had given her. “It wants this ... and my blood!”

NEFRINI

THE HOWLING WIND WHIPPED AROUND THE ROOM AS the roof began to buckle and lift. Abeke's idea had to work. They wouldn't be able to survive the storm's onslaught much longer ... especially if they became fully exposed to the elements outside.

Abeke faced the statue of Nefrini, the wind slapping her braids against her cheeks as she opened the glass vial. She tipped it over and let a few drops of the demon tree sap fall into the statue's cupped hands.

A ripping and cracking sound echoed as the roof began to break apart, creating a gaping hole in the ceiling. Fist-sized hail rained down into the room and lightning crackled in the dark sky above.

Abeke touched the cut over her eye, smearing her fingertips until they were wet. "My blood is the blood of Nilo!" she shouted into the wind. "The blood of our ancestors!" She smeared her hands against those of the statue, letting the demon tree sap mix with her own blood.

The battering hailstorm suddenly stopped and the wind reduced its intensity, becoming little more than a strong breeze. There was one more flash of lightning, but with it the driving rain turned into a shower, then a trickle, until it stopped completely. The building rattled a few more times as the roof and walls adjusted to the sudden calm. A thick fog like the one they'd climbed through to reach the top of the plateau filtered in through the windows and torn roof.

"You did it!" Conor exclaimed. He pushed the table out of the way and picked up a battered candle from the floor.

“Do you think a spirit is going to speak to us again?” Meilin rolled her hand through the air, creating rivulets within the mist.

Rollan raised a candle he had lit and brought it over to Conor. “I think we’re about to find out.” He pointed to the concentration of fog swirling around Abeke.

Abeke spun around as the cloud of mist surrounding her slithered away and took the shape of a woman.

“Is that who we think it is?” Conor asked.

Abeke said nothing. If this was Nefrini, then she deserved reverence. Speaking out of turn would not be wise. Plus, if their prior experiences with the bond tokens were any indication, then only those born on the continent would be able to communicate with the spirit. That meant only she would be able to hear Nefrini’s words.

“Is she saying anything?” Rollan asked.

Abeke put a finger to her lips.

“Maybe you should introduce yourself,” Meilin suggested.

Abeke shook her head. Instead, she took a seat on the floor. A hunter had to be patient sometimes.

A minute passed, then two.

As the others lit more candles, creating a warm glow within the room, the fog congealed even more, revealing the woman’s regal stature and kind face. There was no doubt this was Nefrini, and she was gazing down at Abeke.

Daughter of Nilo. Nefrini had a soft, gentle voice that bounced around inside Abeke’s head. You have stirred my slumber. What is it that you seek?

Abeke glanced over at her friends, who were oblivious to what was being said. Nefrini was speaking only to her.

“High Chieftess Nefrini, we are here for Stormspeaker.”

Of course you are. But why should it be entrusted to you? You are children. What have you done to deserve it?

“My friends and I, we are Greencloaks and have saved Erdas twice. But our existence as a group is being threatened. We must show that through our unity we can best serve everyone. Long ago, your bond token was given to us as a symbol of this unity, along with three others from across Erdas. The Greencloaks hid the tokens, wary of their power being misused, but present circumstances require us to retrieve all four.”

I see. Nefrini floated past Abeke and paused in front of the other Greencloaks before returning to Abeke. Bond tokens reflect the epitome of trust. Do you believe that these allies of yours are honest and true?

“I do,” Abeke answered without hesitation.

And do they feel the same about you? Nefrini asked.

Abeke turned to her friends. “She wants to know if you trust me to be honest and true.”

“Yes!” they all proclaimed in unison.

Nefrini nodded in approval. Then a curl of mist flowed out from the spirit, wrapping itself around Abeke’s wrist. Not of her own volition, Abeke felt herself flipping over her arm to reveal the leopard tattoo.

Your spirit animal is Uraza, Nefrini observed, letting go of Abeke’s arm. The Great Beast chose you as her human partner.... That is very telling.

Abeke remained quiet.

I, too, had an incredible bond with my spirit animal, she mused. Nazir, my hammerkop, was with me when I lost my mother and when my son was born. She gave me a perspective on life like no one else. We were inseparable.

Abeke glanced at her tattoo. She wanted to think that way about her bond with Uraza, but Zerif had separated them for a while and pitted the two against each other. The pain of that time was still a thorn in Abeke’s heart.

Nefrini bent down to get a closer look at Abeke. I can tell that you are a hunter by nature, but I also sense the power of the Rain Dancer flowing through your bond. The Rain Dancer tradition was our gift to Nilo. I’m pleased to see it survives.

“You were a Rain Dancer?” Abeke asked.

Nefrini nodded. The first. Though truly it was Nazir’s craft. And when we created our token, we gave a bit of that power to the land of Nilo itself. Bonds formed here are special. Some are touched by my old friend’s gift. In that way, she lives forever.

Nefrini paused, studying Abeke for a moment. In life, as with a hunt, you must always perceive what surrounds you. In front, beside, and behind.

Abeke nodded in agreement. It was similar to what Naveb had told her.

Prepare for the future by observing the present and understanding the past. She turned without warning and pointed both fog-filled arms toward the statue. Her fingertips emanated a brilliant blue light.

“What is she—?” Abeke heard Conor begin to ask, when a single lightning bolt shot out from Nefrini’s hands, hitting the statue and shattering it into dozens of pieces that went flying across the room.

“Whoa!” Meilin exclaimed as the Greencloaks all jumped against the wall.

Go to where the statue was, Nefrini instructed. My crown is yours to use.

Abeke quickly stepped over the broken pieces of stone strewn along the floor. Pressed against the wall was a simple gold headdress with wings on either side. A bird holding a green gem. Abeke chiseled the crown out with her fingertips.

“Stormspeaker,” Abeke whispered, the crown glimmering in the candlelight. “Thank you.”

“She’s disappearing!” Rollan called out.

Abeke turned back to Nefrini. The chieftess had begun to fade, the fog dispersing into the atmosphere.

“Your Highness ... please wait!” Abeke called out. “I have questions.”

I’m sure you do, daughter of Nilo. Questions are good, and you should always seek answers. But I’m afraid my time here is over, Nefrini explained.

“But the crown ... what does it do?” Abeke said, holding the golden diadem in her hand. “How do I use it?”

You have already witnessed its power. Use it wisely. But you must be careful, there is—

“Ask her where the Dragon’s Eye is!” Anka said, interrupting Nefrini. “She has to tell us before she goes!”

Abeke noticed the last traces of fog shift to look at Anka. Although there wasn’t much definition of Nefrini left in the mist, Abeke thought she saw the woman scowl.

Then she was gone. A gentle breeze once again reclaimed the air, and everything was silent for a few seconds.

“So?” Rollan asked. “What did she say? Did she tell you how to use it? How about where the Dragon’s Eye is hidden?”

“There wasn’t time,” Abeke said with a sigh. “We’ll have to go back to the monastery and just hope that Tembo left another clue there.” Abeke inspected the gold crown in her hand, turning it slowly to see every side. “I think it controls the weather.... That’s why it’s called Stormspeaker.”

“You’re still bleeding,” Meilin said, drawing closer to Abeke and looking at the gash over her eye. “I can ask Jhi to help you.”

Abeke sat down. Her head was beginning to throb, although she wasn’t sure if it was from the blow or from having Nefrini speak through her thoughts.

Jhi appeared in the room and immediately approached Abeke. The large panda pulled Abeke into a cradling embrace and gave her two quick licks over her eye.

“Panda spit works every time,” Rollan said with a smile.

“We should stay the night here and get some rest.” Conor unpacked his bag and laid out several items on the table. “In the morning, we can head back to the monastery.”

“What if the Oathbound are still there?” Abeke asked, keeping the cut eye closed as Jhi stroked her head with her soft, furry paw.

“They’ve likely moved on by now,” Anka said. “The Oathbound probably left and formed search parties to look for us.”

Abeke glanced at Anka. Her clothes and skin had blended into the floor, but Abeke could see her shadow curled up like a cat in the corner of the room. Her thoughts went to Uraza.

She released the Great Beast. Uraza quickly evaluated her injured partner and purred with concern, rubbing her nose against Abeke’s leg. “I’m fine,” Abeke whispered into the leopard’s ear. She then rolled away from Jhi to prove her point.

“Anka’s right.” Rollan stretched out his arms and cracked his knuckles before lying down on the stone floor. “The Oathbound will be on patrol, but Essix can help us scout the area. We just have to travel quick. We’ll leave at first light.”

“Look who’s giving orders now,” Meilin muttered under her breath.

“And once we get the Dragon’s Eye we can head back to Eura and retrieve the Wildcat’s Claw,” Conor added, curling up against Briggan. “We just have to be careful.”

Be careful.

The words reverberated in Abeke's head. It was what Nefrini had said before disappearing, but she hadn't had a chance to finish her warning.

"All in all, getting Stormspeaker wasn't too bad." Rollan leaned against the corner wall. "Jehan really did point us in the right direction, and we haven't seen any Oathbound the whole way."

"Hmpf ..." Meilin scoffed at his statement and lay next to Jhi. "Only if you consider being attacked by wild hyenas, captured by the Dasat, fleeing from the Oathbound, and surviving a supernatural storm to be not too bad."

Rollan shrugged. "Compared to what we've gone through in the past ... it certainly wasn't the worst. We're all still here, together."

Abeke smiled. Rollan was right. This hadn't been so bad. It seemed they'd figured out how to give the Oathbound the slip.

Perhaps the worst was truly over.

CAVE DWELLER

ROLLAN COULDN'T BELIEVE HOW FORTUNATE THEY were. The Greencloaks had been traveling back to the monastery for two days, only stopping for a few hours at night to rest, and they hadn't encountered any Oathbound, hyenas, or other troublemakers. They'd made good time with Essix flying overhead, scouting the mountains for potential problems and directing them along the shortest possible route.

"Essix is taking a lot longer than usual, isn't she?" Meilin scanned the sky. "It's been at least an hour since we've seen her."

Rollan grimaced. The open expanse of the savannah stretched before them. With only a couple of hours of daylight left, he didn't like the idea of being out in the open without Essix giving them the all clear. "I think we should wait to cross. She'll be back soon enough. Plus, crossing the savannah at night is probably safer."

"Actually, night is when most predators are active," Abeke reminded him, taking a seat on a nearby rock. "Hyenas and lions and all sorts of beasts. We'll still have to be careful."

"Let me see if I can connect with Essix," Rollan suggested. He closed his eyes and let his mind drift. Soon he sensed the falcon's keen vision within his mind and he could see through her eyes. However, the usual sensation of flying, of gliding through the air, was missing. Rollan quickly noticed that Essix was perched in an acacia tree, close to the base of the mountain.

The falcon turned her head, focused on a nearby cave opening, and took off toward it. Flying through the narrow entrance, Essix beat back her wings, landing gingerly on the gravel-covered ground. Taking several steps deeper into the cave, Essix stared at a figure sitting in a corner wearing a hooded cloak.

Slowly, the person lifted off the hood and smiled.

“It’s Xanthe!” Rollan told the others. “Essix found her. She’s not too far from here.”

“Is she alone?” Anka asked.

“Or hurt?” Abeke followed up.

“No one else is there, and she seems fine.” Rollan concentrated on his connection with Essix. Xanthe was saying something, but Rollan couldn’t tell what it was. He felt Essix turn her head and fly out of the cave. Once again, the freedom of being in the air, the land rushing along beneath her wings, filled Rollan’s spirit. He was one with Essix, but the connection couldn’t last much longer. Already he felt light-headed.

He opened his eyes and regained his bearings.

“Well, what happened?” Meilin asked as Rollan took a deep breath and sat on the ground.

“I think Xanthe is waiting for night before she crosses the savannah,” he said. “She was saying something to Essix, but I don’t know what it was.”

“So let’s go find her.” Abeke shook the dust off her cloak. “We can all travel together.”

Essix screeched, circling overhead.

“She got here fast.” Rollan pulled out a piece of jerky from his bag and lifted it in the air. Essix dove down and snatched it from his hand. “Means we don’t have to go too far. Xanthe is probably hiding nearby.”

Briggan led the group around the base of the mountain, following Essix’s flight path high above. Uraza had disappeared once again, out scouring the area for Oathbound, hyenas, or another meal. It didn’t take long before Rollan recognized the acacia tree where Essix had been perched.

“We’re close,” Rollan announced.

“I’m going up there.” Meilin pointed to a small ridge above the cave. “I’ll be a lookout in case the Oathbound decide to come our way.”

“Want some company?” Rollan offered, sensing that something had been bothering Meilin ever since they’d left the Dasat camp. He just didn't know what it was.

"Sure," Meilin replied, then turned away from him. "Anka ... why don't you come with me?"

Rollan felt a wave of disappointment. He was certain he hadn't done anything wrong, but it felt as if there were a wedge growing between the two of them.

"Already climbing," Anka said, her barely visible form blending against the rocks.

"Briggan found something." Conor pointed to the wolf standing at the mouth of the cave.

"We'll switch in a little while," Abeke offered Meilin. "So you can rest up before we cross the savannah tonight."

"Sure," Meilin called down.

Conor, Abeke, and Rollan approached the cave cautiously, but Briggan seemed at ease and lay down at the entrance. Rollan stepped around the wolf and, as his eyes adjusted to the dim light, he saw Xanthe sitting on the floor with the hood of her cloak pulled back. Her white hair shone with the bit of sunlight that reflected inside the cave.

"Hi, strangers," she greeted them all with a smile. "Had a feeling you might show up after Essix's visit. I got this far and then started to worry about you guys. Figured I'd stick around to see that you all made it back safe." She peered around the three of them. "Where's Meilin and Anka?"

"They're right above us." Rollan pointed up. "Keeping watch from the ridge."

"And Uraza's out there enjoying Nilo," Abeke added. "Hopefully, keeping an eye out for any trouble until we get back to the monastery."

Xanthe's face lit up. "Does that mean you found Stormspeaker? Is that why you're heading back?"

"Yep. We sure did." Conor dropped the bag he'd been carrying and sat next to Xanthe.

"Can I see it?" Xanthe looked over at his bag.

"It's in Meilin's bag," Abeke said quickly.

Rollan glanced at Abeke, who didn't return his gaze. He knew that Abeke had the crown, but for some reason she didn't want to show it to Xanthe. Maybe she was right, and they should keep it as hidden as possible for now.

"Um ... yeah." Conor fidgeted a little with the strap of his own bag. "So we're going back to the monastery in case Takoda's discovered something about the Dragon's Eye."

"But what if he hasn't?" Xanthe asked. "What's the plan then?"

Abeke's lie about the location of the crown was causing Rollan to rethink what was discussed with Xanthe. It wasn't anything against her personally, but Rollan knew it was dangerous to divulge too much information, for Xanthe and them. "We're not sure," Rollan said. "We'll have to cross that bridge once we get to it."

"But you have to start thinking of where else to look," Xanthe continued. "I mean, Tembo may have only left clues to Stormspeaker. You should try to see if there's a pattern to where the other tokens were found."

"We're looking into it." Abeke took a seat on the gravel floor. "So tell us about the last few days. Have you run into any problems? Seen any Oathbound?"

"Not really," Xanthe replied. "I've been moving at night and it's been pretty quiet." She studied the three Greencloaks. "But back to the last token ... do you think it's still in Nilo?"

Rollan knew that they had to be honest with Xanthe. She deserved nothing less. "Xanthe, I think it's best if certain things are kept between Greencloaks. You understand, right?"

"Oh, that again. Sure." Xanthe nodded, but her mouth tightened. "Guess I keep forgetting that I'm not one of you, so I can't be trusted," she mumbled.

"It's not that," Conor replied. "We've all just been through a lot, so we're a little ... cautious."

"Uh-huh." Xanthe eyed him carefully, lingering on the faded mark on his forehead. It was a reminder that she'd seen him at his worst and still trusted him. "Don't forget that I've been through a lot, too. In fact ... you were there when it happened."

"We know," Abeke said softly. "And we appreciate everything you've done and are doing. But ... " She sighed. "The less you know, the better. We don't want to put you in any more harm."

Xanthe rolled her eyes. "Riiiiight. You're being secretive for my benefit. It's like what everyone warned me about."

Rollan didn't like the way that sounded. "What do you mean?"

Xanthe leaned against the wall. "People talk about how the Greencloaks think they're superior, how you think you know what's best for everyone. I've heard the stories about what happened with the Nectar and all the problems that brought. I just hope you aren't repeating the same mistakes."

The silence inside the cave was deafening, but no one had a good response. Rollan wanted to say that he too hoped they weren't making a mistake, but admitting that didn't seem like a good idea. So the four of them just sat quietly until one by one they each drifted off to sleep. A late-afternoon nap was a luxury they normally didn't enjoy.

"Fire! In the distance!" Meilin's words startled everyone.

"What?" Xanthe rushed to the cave entrance, where Briggan was sniffing the air. The sun was still out, but it was hovering over the horizon. "Where?"

"A little bit to the west," Meilin answered. "And it has to be pretty big, based on the amount of smoke."

Xanthe pulled up her hood and marched outside. Even with the sun so low in the sky, she had to squint. But Rollan could see the horror in her expression.

"It's the monastery," she said in quiet disbelief.

"No." Conor shook his head, not wanting to believe what he was seeing.

"It's got to be the Oathbound's doing." Rollan stared at the plume of dark black smoke rising in the distance. "They're burning the place down!"

Xanthe turned to the others, her pale face grave. "Takoda is there. We have to help him ... all of them."

"Hold on." Abeke opened her bag. "I have an idea." She pulled out the gold crown and flipped it over gently in her hands.

"Is that ... wait, I thought Meilin had it in her—" Xanthe stopped herself and crossed her arms across her chest. "Oh, right. Never mind."

"Xanthe, please understand. I think I can help Takoda and the monastery," Abeke said, placing Nefrini's crown on her head. "This is what the Greencloaks do ... help others."

Meilin looked at Xanthe and then Abeke. "What's going on?"

"Nothing," they both answered in unison.

Rollan moved closer to Abeke. "You sure about this?" he asked. "We aren't totally certain what this can do. Remember how that storm nearly pried the roof off?"

Abeke nodded. "I have to try. Now stand back." She closed her eyes, then opened one. "Better yet, go back in the cave."

Rollan and the others moved just inside the cave's entrance, watching as Abeke stood still. She closed her eyes again and tilted her head slightly back, facing the sky.

At first there was only quiet. Then, the small rustling of wind as menacing clouds formed suddenly overhead. Darkness shrouded the area, and the air grew cool, then cold. Rollan poked his head out as a strong gust of wind whipped by the cave and a dust storm swirled around Abeke. Thunder rumbled overhead. A few fat raindrops hit a nearby boulder, leaving tracks along the side of the dusty rock.

Abeke squeezed her eyes tighter.

The raindrops increased and fell to the earth in drumlike beats, yet Abeke remained dry. The rain and wind seemed to purposefully avoid her.

"You have to send the clouds across the savannah. It does no good here!" Xanthe exclaimed. "The fire is over there."

Abeke silently nodded, but the storm clouds didn't budge.

The rain slowed to a light trickle and then to an almost invisible misting of water.

The wind fluttered to a stop and the clouds parted, once again revealing the setting sun.

Abeke frowned into the sky as her shoulders drooped. "It won't move," she said.

Xanthe burst out from the cave entrance, pointing toward the smoke. "You have to try again. You have to!"

"I can't," Abeke rasped. "Nothing happens. It only stays overhead."

"Then we'll have to take the storm there ourselves." Xanthe pulled up the hood of her cloak. "Let's go!"

THE RETURN

MEILIN ENTERED THE TAABARA CHASM WITH HER sword drawn, ready to battle any Oathbound guards who might be lurking in the shadows. They had crossed the savannah under a cloud-filled night sky. The darkness shrouded them from any sentries keeping watch, but this place would be different. The deep crater was striped with land bridges and crevices where the Oathbound could be lying in wait for them.

“Keep alert,” Xanthe whispered, leading the group to the bottom of the chasm. “Our luck may not hold much longer.”

But everything was quiet.

“I don’t think anyone’s here.” Abeke spun around, her arrow nocked and ready to fly. “Isn’t that a bit strange?”

“It’s very strange.” Rollan looked up at Essix, who had given them the all clear. “You’d think someone would be guarding this place. At the very least guarding the fissure that leads to the monastery.”

“The Oathbound may have everyone at the monastery,” Anka said, approaching the entrance to the fissure. “Perhaps they didn’t expect us to come back. If we hear or see anything, get close to me. I’ll camouflage us.”

“I think I should go first,” Xanthe suggested. “I’ll be the best at spotting someone in the dark, especially if they’re on the other side where the rope ladders are.”

“Sounds like a good plan,” Meilin concurred. “I’ll bring up the rear, in case we get a surprise attack from behind.”

“Then let’s go.” Rollan waved his arm at Essix and pointed to the crevasse. The falcon would be waiting for them on the other side.

As quickly as possible, the group made their way through the narrowing passageway. Before long, they were forced to shuffle through it sideways. Meilin reluctantly sheathed her sword. There was no room to fight at this point.

“Do you smell it?” Rollan whispered. He’d slowed down to get closer to Meilin.

“The smoke?” she answered, taking a long sniff of the air. “Yes, it’s getting stronger.”

“No,” Rollan said. “The smell of victory. The Oathbound have no idea what we have in store for them.”

Meilin rolled her eyes. She couldn’t see him in the darkness, but she knew Rollan was smiling. He was always trying to lighten the mood and be the funny man. This time it bothered her.

“You don’t always have to make jokes,” she said. “It’s okay to be serious once in a while.”

“I can be serious,” Rollan replied. “Not my fault if I’m just naturally likable.”

“Yeah, apparently you are very likable.” Meilin hadn’t meant to sound caustic, but her feelings betrayed her.

“What are you talking about?” Rollan stopped shuffling through the crevasse. “You’ve been acting strange ever since we left the Dasat camp. What’s going on?”

“Nothing.” Meilin nudged him to keep moving, but he stayed still. They weren’t going anywhere until they finished this conversation. Meilin sighed. “I just find it weird that Jehan was so friendly to you and invited you to come back after only knowing you for a day.”

“Is that it?” Rollan chuckled. “You’re jealous?”

“What? No.” Meilin scoffed at the suggestion. “It just seems unusual.”

“Well, like I said, I am a very likable guy.”

Meilin could hear the snicker in his voice.

“Forget it.” Meilin pushed him again, but he stood firm.

“Meilin.” His voice took a softer tone. “I think Jehan was just impressed because I was able to shift the whole mountain for you. That’s all.”

“Wait, what?” Meilin couldn’t quite believe what she was hearing. Rollan had moved an entire mountain for her?

“Yeah, well, I just knew I had to help you no matter what, so I used the Heart of the Land to create a ledge for you to land on. I guess I should’ve mentioned that before, but ... I don’t know ... I just didn’t.”

Meilin didn’t know what to say. She’d always believed that feelings and emotions weren’t supposed to come into play when on a mission, but everything with Rollan was different. She was experiencing feelings that she normally kept under control. Even little bits of jealousy.

After a moment of uncomfortable silence, Rollan broke the ice. “Yeah, well, you took care of me when I had the Sunset Death ... couldn’t let you continue to hold that over me. Had to do something to get us on equal footing.”

Meilin tried to see Rollan’s features in the darkness of the crevasse, but she could only see his silhouette. She reached over and gave him a kiss on the cheek. “Thanks,” she whispered.

Rollan was about to say something when Conor interrupted with a loud “PSSSST!”

“Come on.” Rollan gave Meilin a tug. “We’ll talk more later.”

They hurried over and caught up to the others.

“Xanthe says the ledge is up ahead,” Anka whispered, relaying the message. “And there are two Oathbound on it.”

“Let’s do this,” Rollan said.

“We’re ready,” Meilin confirmed.

Abeke put on the crown and sat down. It had been decided that Anka would stay with her, in case she needed to be camouflaged while the others fought the guards.

Everyone held their breaths as Abeke concentrated on bringing about a storm. The idea was to have it rain hard enough to put out the fire in the monastery. Then, with the first crack of lightning, the others would launch an attack on the guards, with the thunder masking the sounds of the fight. Timing would be critical.

The air stirred as a cool breeze filtered into the crevasse.

A few raindrops hit Meilin on the head. She pulled up her hood and unsheathed her sword. The downpour was about to begin.

A sudden storm deluged the area. The rain fell hard as the clouds rumbled above them.

Lightning flashed suddenly between the clouds overhead, illuminating the sky into shades of black, blue, and dark purple. This was it.

Xanthe, Conor, Meilin, and Rollan ran out from the crevasse, barreling into the guards as thunder boomed around them.

A swift kick to the knee. An elbow to the jaw. The pommel of Meilin's sword sideswiping a guard's head.

And silence.

It was over as quickly as it had begun.

In less than a moment, two Oathbound guards were knocked out and Conor was tying them up.

"Go, quickly," Xanthe whispered, grabbing one of the rope ladders that led up to monastery. "We don't have much time."

The group climbed up to the higher level, swiftly and silently. Once they'd scaled the overhang, they hid behind a row of thorny bushes that lined the edge of the cliff. Peering out between the leaves, they could assess what was going on in the monastery. There were Oathbound soldiers moving past the upper windows, but only one guard patrolled the raised iron gate at the front.

"Over there," Conor whispered, pointing to a smoldering part of the building. "Looks like that's what they were burning."

"It's part of the library," Xanthe explained. "Takoda would never allow that to be destroyed without putting up a fight." Her voice faltered. "I—I should never have left. My place was with him...."

Meilin put a hand on Xanthe's shoulder. She knew Xanthe had seen her people overrun by the Many during their battle with Wyrn, and had fought hard for them. "I'm sure he's all right. Takoda is smart and brave. We'll find him and beat the Oathbound."

"Is the main door the only way in?" Abeke asked, slipping on the gold headdress. "Because I can create a diversion—distract the guard with a windstorm or something."

Xanthe nodded. "Other than those upper windows, it's the—"

"Shh." Meilin pointed to the monastery's entrance. A broad-shouldered, bald man dressed all in black was talking to the guard.

"I know who that is," Anka whispered. "He was at the Citadel when the emperor was killed. They called him Sid the Generous, so I'm guessing that means he'd steal the crumbs from a street urchin's plate. No offense, Rollan."

Rollan snorted. “As if we had anything as fancy as plates.”

“You are all idiots!” Sid yelled to a group of warriors who had joined him by the iron gate. “Something is going on. Or am I the only one who can sense it?”

Meilin and the others froze.

“Everyone, hold hands,” Anka whispered. “I’ll hide us.” She interlocked her fingers with Conor, causing his arms to blend into the variegated colors of the bushes.

“All of us?” Meilin asked, knowing that Anka’s abilities had their limit.

“I can do it ... trust me,” she replied as everyone joined hands.

But the progression was worryingly sluggish. First Conor slowly disappeared, and then Xanthe’s skin blistered into leafy green rashes. Meilin could no longer see Anka, but she heard the elder Greencloak whimper with effort.

Suddenly, Sid turned on his heel and scowled. He marched toward the edge of the cliff, right to where the Greencloaks were hiding. His eyes widened with fury.

Meilin sucked in a breath. It’s too late! He’s seen us!

But then she turned to Rollan and found that he’d already vanished. Meilin glanced down to where their fingers were interlaced and saw ... nothing. Thorns and roots and shrubby leaves.

An animal that looked like a small bear or very large weasel trailed right behind Sid. Meilin recognized it as a wolverine—one of the most ferocious predators in the animal kingdom. Shane had once pretended his uncle’s wolverine was his own spirit animal. Meilin had seen how vicious and territorial it was. It figured that would be Sid the Generous’s animal partner.

Meilin’s free hand reached for the pommel of her sword. She glanced back at the sheer cliff behind them. They were in the worst possible spot for a fight, but it didn’t make a difference.

Any moment the battlefield could be declared, and they’d have to be ready to attack. She gripped the sword’s handle.

It was now or never.

SID THE GENEROUS

THE WOLVERINE REARED UP ON ITS HIND LEGS, ITS NOSTRILS flaring as it moved its head from side to side. Even though they were hidden from view, it wasn't going to be enough. Conor could see that the animal was picking up their scent.

“Change the direction of the wind,” Conor whispered to Abeke. “If we're downwind, it'll only be able to smell the ashes from the fire.” A few seconds later the air stirred above them. Although Conor couldn't see Abeke, he assumed she was using the crown. A strong smell of smoke floated over them and down the mountain.

The wolverine fell back on its four legs and turned to face the building, where a few fires were still smoldering. The smoke was confusing it.

“Nothing?” Sid asked his spirit animal, who had apparently lost the scent.

Conor and the others stayed still, barely breathing.

Sid the Generous was not convinced. He took a few more steps toward the bushes and stared out into the night. Waiting for a sound or a movement.

Conor considered jumping him, but they'd be giving up their most valuable weapon ... the element of surprise. His prudence proved to be right; just a moment later, another small group of Oathbound emerged from the monastery.

“Sir ... ” A young-looking Oathbound warrior, probably not much older than fifteen, cautiously approached Sid from behind. “Um ... one of the guards sent me to tell you that we haven’t found any gold. Do you want us to keep—?”

Sid spun around and struck the boy squarely across the face with an open hand. The force from the slap knocked the young warrior to his knees. “KEEP LOOKING!” Sid bellowed. “I want results, not excuses! Now, stand up!”

The boy got up, clutching the side of his face.

Sid grabbed the young Oathbound’s shirt, twisting it in one hand and hoisting him up so they were face-to-face. “Tell the guards to scour the libraries ... every single crevice. I want some gold in my bag before the captain arrives, is that understood?”

“Y-y-yes, sir,” the boy stammered.

“Good!” Sid dropped the boy, who quickly turned and ran back inside the monastery. He scanned the area one more time, then motioned for the wolverine to follow him in.

Once Sid disappeared into the building, Xanthe snuck around the bush, pulling Anka along. “Stay close,” she whispered.

There was no discussion. They were all going in together. But as long as they held hands and moved slowly along the stone walls, they were virtually invisible.

As they passed several rooms and corridors, Conor noticed that there were virtually no guards inside. It seemed that they were all searching for Sid’s gold, and few were searching for the Greencloaks. If only they could find Takoda and the other monks, then maybe they could outnumber these Oathbound and regain control of the monastery.

“I’m done being patient!” Sid’s voice roared from the Great Hall.

Staying flush against the wall and using any shadows available, the group moved as one unit until they entered the hall. In the center of the chamber, beneath the wooden trusses that crisscrossed the ceiling, stood Sid the Generous. In front of him were the monks, lined up in a row with their hands and feet tied. Sid was staring down at Master Naveb.

Conor and the others slowly inched into the room, making sure they weren’t seen as they moved along the gray stone wall.

“Foolish old man,” Sid sneered. “Tell me what you know.”

“Untie me and see how old and foolish I am,” Master Naveb said defiantly.

“Ha! Don’t make me laugh!” Sid leaned closer to Master Naveb, placing both hands on the old monk’s shoulders. “Don’t you care that your precious Niloan history is being lost?” he asked. “Tell me where the gold is and we’ll stop destroying your libraries.”

“Even if I had some, I wouldn’t tell a degenerate like you,” Naveb said, his voice flat. His face betrayed not a hint of emotion.

Sid’s eyes blazed with fury as he lashed out at Naveb, kneeing him in the stomach and knocking the old man to the floor. “This is what happens when you don’t respect me.” He pulled back his leg and kicked the old man with all his might.

“STOP!” several of the monks shouted.

“Leave him alone!” Takoda fought against the ropes that bound him.

“This wasn’t part of the deal!” Sodu shouted from the end of the line. The young monk was also tied up, his face screwed into a scowl. “You gave me your word!”

“Deal? The deal was for the Greencloaks,” Sid sneered. “No Greencloaks, no deal.” Sid looked around the room. “And a place this vast must have its share of gold and valuable secrets.”

“Secrets? I know about a secret. What if we strike a new deal?” Sodu asked, his eyes darting over to Takoda. “How about something that’s valuable to the Greencloaks? Something called the Dragon’s Eye.”

Anka’s grip tightened around Conor’s hand. He felt his stomach turn, and a lump formed in his throat. How does Sodu know about the final bond token? Did he stumble on the clue himself in the monastery?

“Sodu ...” Master Naveb moaned while still on the floor. “Don’t.”

“Go on,” Sid replied.

“Takoda knows where it is,” Sodu continued, staring at the young monk. “I overheard him tell Master Naveb that he had to find a way to get word to the Greencloaks.”

“I see.” Sid raised a single eyebrow and strolled to stand in front of Takoda. “This is an interesting turn of events.” He stared in silence for several seconds, apparently weighing his options. “Seems like we might be able to help each other. I’d make it worth your while ... possibly share some of the gold with you. They don’t call me Sid the Generous for nothing.”

Takoda spat in his face.

Sid’s eyes burned. He responded with an uppercut punch to the chin that caught Takoda by surprise, dropping him to his knees.

Conor felt Xanthe flinch, but she stayed put. Any movement away from Anka would reveal her. They had to stay together and wait for the right moment.

Kovo, on the other hand, had awoken from his trance and was making his presence known. The Great Ape roared, fighting against the heavy chains that pinned him to the wall, baring his teeth at the Oathbound who had been guarding him.

“Idiot!” Sid wiped his face with his sleeve. “I’ll simply continue destroying the treasures of Nilo until you tell us where to find the Dragon’s Eye and your gold.” He walked around Takoda, standing behind the line of monks. “I don’t understand this silence. I’ve shown you proof that the Sadrean girl and one of the Greencloaks have already met their deaths. Why insist on protecting their secrets?”

“Takoda, just tell him!” Sodu urged. “This will be over if you say what you know!”

Kovo suddenly stopped struggling against his chains and sniffed the air. The large gorilla’s red eyes darted around the room. He quickly signed something to Takoda, who sat up and glanced curiously around.

Kovo’s actions weren’t lost on Sid. The Oathbound grabbed Takoda by the arm and dragged him to the center of the room. “Guards!” Sid yelled, calling out his spirit animal at the same time. “The Greencloaks are here!”

Before the Greencloaks or Xanthe could react, Sid pulled out a knife and held it to Takoda’s neck. “We’ve been waiting for your return, Greencloaks. Reveal yourselves ... or he dies!” His eyes nervously searched the room. Standing beside Sid, the wolverine looked at the wall where Conor and the others were hidden and growled. “I give you to the count of three. One ... two ... ”

Kovo roared and resumed his struggle against his chains. It was a momentary distraction, but it was all Xanthe needed. She broke away from the group, leaping out of the shadows toward Sid.

In the same instant Sid pulled another knife out from his belt and hurled it at Xanthe. The Sadrean warrior ducked but was tackled by another guard several feet before reaching Sid or Takoda.

But the knife Sid threw didn’t fall to the floor.

It hung in midair for a long moment, and then the whole team’s camouflage vanished, revealing their position near the back wall.

Conor turned and saw Anka, her short dark hair and cloak coming through in vibrant colors. She was completely visible, and she was clutching the knife's handle in front of her chest. A few drops of bright red blood were speckled across her shirt. Toey ran around her in a panic.

No one moved.

Not a Greencloak nor an Oathbound.

Even Sid seemed to be shocked by the apparition of the young Zhongese woman he'd just impaled.

Anka slowly pulled the knife away, revealing a growing red stain on her shirt. Her eyes dropped down to look at what the others were seeing. Stumbling, she tried to reach a table in the corner, but then her eyes locked with Meilin's.

"I'm sorry," she muttered before collapsing to the floor.

"ANKA!" Meilin cried out, but before she could run to her, Oathbound soldiers blocked her path.

"NO!" Sid yelled, pushing away the tied-up Takoda and grabbing Xanthe from the Oathbound guard. "No one move!" he yelled. "Or she also dies!"

Conor gripped the handle of his ax. One quick throw and he could lodge it into an Oathbound guard ... but then what? Sid held the ultimate card. He was holding Xanthe in a headlock, positioning her in front of him like a shield. He had the tip of his knife pressed against the pale skin of her neck, where a tiny bit of blood was already trickling out.

"Let her go!" Takoda pleaded, struggling against his ropes. "PLEASE! I'll tell you everything! Just let her go."

Kovo's chains clanged against the floor as he continued trying to get loose.

Sid took a step back, dragging Xanthe with him. "So you wouldn't do it for yourself or your fellow monks, but you'll do it for her?" He glared at Takoda as he pressed down on the knife. "Speak quickly, because I have already lost my patience."

"Don't ... " Xanthe's voice came out a hoarse whisper. She couldn't flinch or else her throat would be cut.

"The Dragon's Eye is in the catacombs underneath Xin Kao Dai." Takoda's words tumbled out. "Beneath the Summer Palace. That's all Tembo wrote. I don't know anything else."

"See?" Sid smiled and pulled the knife away from Xanthe's throat, but tightened his grip on her. "Wasn't that easy?"

Takoda's shoulders slumped in defeat.

"Now, where's the gold?" Sid asked.

"There isn't any," Takoda muttered. "I told you before. The monks never had use for it."

"I don't believe you.... " Sid's eyes narrowed, trying to gauge Takoda's reaction. "But if that's true ... " He paused for a moment, smiling. "Then sadly, we have no use for her either."

With that Sid the Generous plunged the knife into Xanthe's stomach and pushed her to the ground.

"NOOOOOO!" Takoda's painful scream echoed throughout the Great Hall.

Xanthe gasped, trying to catch her breath. Her eyes were fixed on Takoda as she struggled to breathe.

Takoda wiggled his way across the floor to get closer to her, but there was nothing he could do as her eyes lost focus, closed. She stopped moving.

Takoda moaned, the noise echoing hopelessly in the expansive chamber. Hearing Takoda's raw grief, Conor felt his throat close.

"Xanthe!" Abeke cried out.

A chill ran down Conor's back.

They all feared the same thing.

Was Xanthe gone, too?

CAPTAIN

ROLLAN WAS IN SHOCK. HE COULDN'T BELIEVE HIS EYES. Takoda, his feet bound and his hands still tied behind his back, was kneeling next to Xanthe, whispering something to her as she lay motionless. Sid had killed Anka and possibly Xanthe with barely a second thought. In fact, he seemed to enjoy it.

This was not the way things were supposed to go.

"Surrender or face the consequences," Sid snarled. "Because there's no way out."

"We'll see about that," Rollan replied. He'd learned on the streets of Concorba that there was usually at least one means of escape. He noticed Kovo still jerking against his chains, the ape's red eyes shining with anger. If Rollan could make it over to him, he could release the lock and unleash five hundred pounds of gorilla fury upon the Oathbound.

Sid threw back his head and laughed. "The monastery is surrounded," he said. "The four of you are completely outnumbered. And you still think there's a way out?" He laughed again.

"Greencloaks, get ready!" Meilin called out, taking a defensive stance. Her sword gleamed in her hand.

"Uraza!" Abeke yelled, calling out to the Great Leopard.

"Briggan!" Conor held out his arm as the silver-gray wolf joined him.

The Greencloaks stood together in a semicircle, facing a dozen Oathbound, many with spirit animals of their own. Sid's wolverine was already snarling, ready to face off against Briggan. A white tiger growled at Uraza.

“Jhi!” Meilin said, but her eyes were fixed on Xanthe lying on the floor. The girl was still breathing, but she was unconscious and bleeding out fast.

The large panda flashed onto the scene. Rollan knew Jhi would be a fierce fighter and improve Meilin’s own battle skills, but perhaps that wasn’t what the girl had in mind.

Still ... she’d need a distraction.

Rollan scanned the room, taking in the placement of every Oathbound, every monk, and every object in the room. Behind the anguished Takoda there were spears, shields, and swords hanging on the wall. If Rollan could free the monks and get them those weapons, their numbers would increase dramatically. Between them and Kovo, the Greencloaks might have a real chance.

Xanthe might have a chance.

Across the chamber, Master Naveb coughed. Rollan locked eyes with the old man just as Naveb quickly lifted the edge of his robe and revealed a key tied to his ankle. He gave Rollan a quick nod and motioned to Kovo. Naveb had the key to unlock Kovo’s chains!

“Fine.” Sid grinned cruelly. “You want to fight? We’ll fight.”

Rollan readied himself to sprint.

A screech from somewhere in the room caught everyone’s attention ... especially Rollan’s. It sounded like Essix. Rollan’s eyes flicked over to the closed window. How had the falcon gotten in, and where was she now?

Another screech, but something was off. Rollan glanced upward, where he saw a tiny black bird perched in the rafters. It was the same bird that had stolen his food out on the savannah! The drongo flew onto the shoulder of a girl with curly red hair. The Oathbound fished a snack from her pocket and gave it to her spirit animal, sneering at Rollan the whole time.

That little sneak. It had imitated Essix’s call.

Sid rolled his shoulders confidently and continued talking. “If you choose to fight us, all you’ll accomplish is more bloodshed ... your own. Surrender is your only option.”

Meilin scoffed. “Never.”

“You’ll just kill us anyway,” Conor added.

Abeke narrowed her eyes. "Once we're of no use to you."

"Now, now, friends," Rollan said, taking a small sideways step. If he could just get to Kovo, then Master Naveb would toss him the key. "Sid here seems like a smart guy. I mean, he obviously knew we were coming. I'm guessing a little bird told you."

Sid looked over at the drongo and chuckled. "Yes, Kasmira can be very useful."

This time the bird chirped like a nightingale in response.

Rollan took another step. "So you must also know that the Greencloaks have vast resources. We can make a person very wealthy."

"If it's more gold you want," Abeke said, catching on that Rollan had a plan of sorts, "we can always come to some type of arrangement." She began slowly moving away from the group in the opposite direction.

The Oathbound soldiers shifted, cautiously spreading out in order to remain in front of each Greencloak.

"Such as?" Sid asked as Conor took a couple steps forward.

"Gold, of course," Conor said. "And we know many influential people."

Rollan could see that Sid was interested. They just needed a little more time.

"I can't believe that you would offer him anything!" Takoda cried out from beside Xanthe. "Look what he did!"

"Hush, boy," Master Naveb scolded.

Rollan ignored Takoda's anguish and took another step closer to the window. "It would seem that you hold all the cards, so why don't you set the terms?"

Meilin lowered her sword, as if willing to entertain the idea as well. "Just tell us what you want."

Sid's expression changed as he stared at Meilin. The eager gleam was replaced by a rigid grimace. "There is nothing I want," he stated, his back straightening. It almost looked as if he were about to salute her. "My captain ... we await your orders."

Rollan was confused, but when he turned to look at Meilin, it was the person who was standing behind her who surprised him.

Anka.

Meilin spun around and came face-to-face with the Greencloak. Anka now had a knife pointed directly at Meilin. The same knife that had stabbed her. Her shirt was no longer stained with blood.

The truth dawned slowly on Rollan. The whole thing had been an illusion. Anka had actually caught the knife and used her chameleon ability to make it seem as if she'd been mortally wounded.

"Anka?" Meilin took a half step back. "What's going on?"

"Captain, I ... I'm glad you're not hurt." Sid's voice quavered. "I truly did not realize that—"

"Enough!" Anka stopped Sid's prattling with a wave of her hand. "Yes, Sid, your blindness has become painfully obvious. You didn't even realize that the old man has Kovo's key in his hand."

"I knew I didn't like you from the moment I couldn't see you," Master Naveb said.

"Oathbound," Anka called, "arrest them all!"

Each Greencloak took a defensive stance. They wouldn't go down without a fight. Rollan knew that the battle for their lives was about to begin.

Anka stared at Meilin. "Except for her. This one ... this one is mine."

HONEST FIGHT

MEILIN'S HEAD WAS SPINNING. SHE COULDN'T BELIEVE Anka had betrayed them ... that she'd apparently been working with the Oathbound all along. None of them had suspected her of being a spy.

"You seem so surprised," Anka said as she and Meilin circled each other. All around them, fighting had broken out between Greencloaks and Oathbound. Distantly, Meilin heard Abeke scream, but she didn't dare look away from the enemy facing her. "Did you think you were the only Zhongese girl to want more?"

"More what? More treachery?" Meilin turned the sword in her hand. "How could you, Anka? We were friends."

"It's nothing personal," the young woman said with a shrug. "Fate put us on different sides of this conflict. You win your battles through combat. I win in my own way. Plus, you're the one who told me: 'In a real battle for life and death, you shouldn't worry about what is and isn't fair.' "

Jhi barked urgently, a low, plaintive sound that cut through the noise of the hall. Meilin spared her spirit animal a quick glance and saw that Jhi was watching Xanthe with anxious eyes.

"She's lost a lot of blood," Anka said. "Probably just on the verge of death. So what will you do? Will you sacrifice your spirit animal's help? The last time we sparred without her, I nearly beat you."

Meilin glared. "Go, Jhi. I can handle the likes of Anka, myself."

The panda exploded into action, loping across the chamber toward Xanthe and Takoda.

Anka smirked. “Wrong call,” she crooned.

Meilin lunged at her with her sword, but Anka spun away, landing a kick against Meilin’s hip at the same time. “And since you bring it up ... my name isn’t really Anka. It’s Kana. Kana the Honest.”

Kana disappeared, her cloak dissolving into the background like mist burning away in the sun.

Meilin jabbed at the empty air around her, unsure of where Anka ... or Kana ... had gone.

Then she felt her legs being swept out from under her. Meilin fell back and slammed her skull against the hard floor.

Now her head truly spun. Meilin forced herself up, bracing her unsteady feet. She glanced nervously around her. In a fight where she couldn’t see her enemy, she had to trust her other senses.

A slight rustling sound told her what she needed to know. Meilin did a backward handspring and sliced through the air with her leg, making hard contact with the unseen Kana.

“Ugh!” Kana grunted.

Meilin struck again, landing a second kick. As she went for a third, she felt a sharp pain in her upper leg. She screamed, stumbling back and leaving a trail of blood in her wake.

Retreating to a corner of the room, Meilin held her sword in front of her. Her wound wasn’t serious, but it was too difficult to fight an invisible opponent. Kana could have cut an artery if she’d struck her in a different place.

“That was a warning,” Kana said, as if reading Meilin’s mind.

Meilin couldn’t believe Kana’s skill. She was a much better fighter than she’d pretended to be. Meilin could not underestimate her.

“You’ve learned a lot,” Meilin said, trying to find Kana’s location through her voice.

“Ha!” Kana’s laugh came from Meilin’s left. “You thought I was learning how to fight.... I was only learning how you fight.”

Meilin spun her sword in front of her like a protective barrier. Out of the corner of her eye she saw Conor fighting off three Oathbound warriors with his ax and a sword he’d picked up from somewhere.

“Things don’t have to be this way, Meilin.” Kana’s voice had switched sides, now coming from the right side of the room. “You could join us. Work for me. I know how much you love Zhong. So did your father.”

“Leave my father out of this!” Meilin shouted, her eyes straining to see where the voice was coming from. But the only thing she saw were her friends, battling the Oathbound. Rollan defended against two attackers, giving Abeke cover as she shot arrows at some archers who were perched on the rafters. Uraza and Briggan were each tangled up under weighted nets that had been thrown over them.

Things weren’t looking good. Meilin needed to level the playing field. She had to defeat Kana.

“Think about it, Meilin,” Kana said. “Zhong needs more women like you. Strong and brave and unafraid to fight for what they believe in. It’s why I started the Oathbound. The military wouldn’t have me, so I formed my own company. The time of the Greencloaks is over, but you can still serve your nation.”

“You’re nothing but mercenaries,” Meilin snarled. “Without the Greencloaks, the nations will be at each other’s throats, and then who will you serve? The highest bidder? Being a Greencloak means recognizing that we’re all in this together. We all bleed the same. Helping others, wherever they are, is the right thing to do.”

Meilin caught sight of the large fireplace. An idea began to form. The ash could reveal Kana’s location. Make it easier to fight her.

“You still don’t understand,” Kana answered with a sigh. She was standing somewhere to Meilin’s right side.

Meilin didn’t waste any more time responding. She sprinted toward the fireplace, jumping over knocked-down chairs and beating down any Oathbound who dared to get in her way.

She grabbed a handful of ash and flung it in the air.

Kana coughed as the clouds of soot hit her. Meilin could see portions of the Oathbound spy outlined in the ash. Before Kana had a chance to camouflage herself again, Meilin tackled her, the two rolling onto the floor. Kana swiped at Meilin with her fists, but Meilin swiftly countered every one of Kana’s moves, then she hopped lightly to her feet.

Spinning in the air, Meilin swung her leg, leading with a strong roundhouse kick. But Kana was ready. She grabbed Meilin’s ankle, turned her leg, and slammed her down with a resounding thud. Before Meilin could roll away, Kana had the knife at her throat.

“So predictable,” Kana lamented. “I thought you’d be more creative.” She paused to glance over at the other Greencloaks, who were each being taken down. “But this is over. It all ends now.”

EXPENDABLE

ABEKE WAS DEVASTATED. THE GREENCLOAKS HAD PUT up a good fight, but they were outnumbered by a group that had been waiting for them for days. The Oathbound had exploited their every weakness, and now their fate was in Kana's hands.

All the monks had been taken away, including the heartbroken Takoda, who had to be carried out kicking and screaming when the Oathbound dragged Xanthe out of the hall. The Sadrean was alive, thanks to Jhi, but she hadn't woken up since being stabbed. When Abeke last glimpsed the girl, her already pale skin was nearly blue.

The only ones left in the Great Hall were Sid, Kana, and the four Greencloaks, who were sitting on the ground with their hands and legs tied.

"We're ready, Captain," Sid announced. He held a small blue bottle in his hand. "Do I knock them out?"

"I'm reconsidering sending them to Greenhaven to be tried with the other Greencloaks." Kana paced back and forth across the Great Hall. She was clearly visible to everyone.

Abeke noticed that now that Kana had shown her true colors, she no longer camouflaged herself as much.

"What? Why?" Sid glanced at Meilin before looking at Kana again. "Were you able to convince her to join us?"

"I'd never join you." Meilin spat out the words.

"None of us would," Rollan added.

Kana chuckled. "As if I'd accept any of you at this point." She walked over to Rollan and bent down in front of him. "Before we forget." She reached under his shirt and pulled out the Heart of the Land. She smiled as she slipped the chain over his head and put it around her own neck, tucking it under her collar.

Abeke could see the anger in Rollan's eyes. She'd felt the same way when her bag with Stormspeaker was taken away. They'd risked so much, lost so much, to get those two bond tokens, and now the Oathbound had them.

"So what are we doing with them?" Sid asked as Kana gazed out the window. "Cordelia will be waiting for them."

"Cordelia will just have to wait, then," Kana replied, watching the sunrise.

"Cordelia the Kind?" Abeke didn't want to get her hopes up too much, but if Cordelia had survived the cave-in, then maybe Worthy had, too. The Redcloaks might be able to help them somehow.

"Yes, but what's it to you?" Sid asked.

"They're worried about that heinous half-breed you captured," Kana explained, turning to face the group again. "The former Trunswick kid."

"So he's alive?" Conor asked.

"Yeah, yeah ... he's fine," Sid said. "Well, as fine as a mash-up of animal and human can ever be." Sid shuddered for dramatic effect.

"Go ahead and knock them out with the potion," Kana ordered. "That way we don't have to worry about any feeble attempts at escaping."

"I won't swallow that," Meilin declared, struggling with her ropes.

Kana cocked her head to the side. "Please, as if you have a say in the matter. Plus, this doesn't even involve you drinking it. We're much more sophisticated."

Sid opened up the bottle and poured a little on a handkerchief. "So they are going to Greenhaven?" He flashed a sinister smile as he stalked toward Conor. "This should be fun."

"No, they're not," Kana said. "You'll put them on our boat."

"To Xin Kao Dai?" Sid looked confused as he covered Conor's nose and mouth with the wet cloth.

"The catacombs there are riddled with deadly traps," Kana said. She watched impassively while Conor struggled against Sid's hands. "Better to have expendables like these four go in first, don't you think?"

Sid grinned as Conor stopped moving. The boy slumped to the side, unconscious.

“Who’s next?” he asked, eyeing Meilin.

“Leave her for last,” Kana said. “I want her to watch each one of her friends go down.”

Sid let out a big, strong laugh. He was enjoying this. He approached Abeke and poured a little more of the liquid from the blue bottle onto the cloth before covering her face with it.

Abeke held her breath, not wanting to breathe in whatever was on the handkerchief.

“Kana, stop this,” Meilin pleaded, trying with all her might to free herself. “The Greencloaks are innocent. You know we didn’t kill the emperor.”

“Oh, Meilin,” Kana said as Abeke tried in vain to move her face away from Sid’s powerful hands. “You really don’t know anything at all.”

And with those words, Abeke gasped for air and her entire world went dark.

Christina Diaz Gonzalez is the award-winning author of Moving Target, Return Fire, The Red Umbrella, and A Thunderous Whisper. Her books have received numerous honors and recognitions, including the Florida Book Award and the Nebraska Book Award, and have been named the American Library Association's Best Fiction for Young Adults, a Notable Social Studies Trade Book for Young People, and the International Reading Association's Teachers' Choice. More information can be found at www.christinagonzalez.com.

You've read the book—now join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Have your ebook ready and enter the code to unlock huge
rewards!

NJT66KW64T

BOOK EIGHT

THE DRAGON'S EYE

Conor, Abeke, Meilin, and Rollan are four young heroes who have dedicated their lives to fighting evil. They are Greencloaks, called from every corner of the world to defend Erdas. But now the Greencloaks lie broken. The order is imprisoned, and their legendary relics have been stolen.

Something huge and terrible is coming, and it plans to swallow the Greencloaks whole. If the four friends and their spirit animals are going to stop it, then they'll have to trust in their bonds.

They'll need to become more than just heroes:
They must become legends.

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

A sneak peek of the next

Book Eight

The Dragon's Eye

By Sarwat Chadda

AT SEA

ROLLAN SHIFTED IN HIS HAMMOCK, VAINLY SEARCHING for sleep. The coarse sackcloth reeked, but it was better than being on the floor, where a film of seawater layered the wood and a company of rats nibbled at bare toes or exposed ears.

The ship's cramped brig had only one porthole—closed and on the far side of the corridor—so there was little ventilation. The air tasted stale and stifling, laden with the stink of too many days at sea.

The old wooden hull of the Oathbound schooner groaned against the weight of the waves. Then there were more sounds: a hiss, a crack, a scream.

“She’s at it again,” declared Conor.

Reluctantly, Rollan opened his eyes. He squinted until they adjusted to the permanent gloom of the cell, and then he saw his friends.

Conor slouched up against the bars, his arms hanging through the rusty iron, head tilted to the noise above.

He winced at the next scream.

Rollan rolled out of the hammock and past Abeke, who’d been woken by the cries echoing from above. She gritted her teeth. “It’s Cordelia ...” she said. “Cordelia the Kind.”

Meilin joined Conor by the bars, and flinched at the third cry, louder and sharper than before. “That poor man.”

“There’ll be no one to sail this ship if she carries on like this.”

“What do you think he did?” asked Abeke.

Rollan shrugged. “He doesn’t need to have done anything.”

He thought back to their capture at the Niloan library, Maktaba. They’d been searching for the legendary bond token, Stormspeaker. They’d teamed up with Takoda and Xanthe, only to be betrayed—and captured—once they’d succeeded in gaining the token.

Takoda and Xanthe were chained and bundled on a ship to Greenhaven, while Rollan and his friends were headed to Zhong.

Conor glanced over at the scratches he’d been making on the wall. There were fifteen.

There was another hiss and cry, but now reduced to a pitiful whimper.

Fifteen days trapped down here. Fifteen days of hearing the cruel hiss of the whip and the cries of whatever poor unfortunate Cordelia had picked to torment, if for no other reason than that she could.

Why not them? She hated Rollan and his companions, yet Cordelia never chose to vent her cruelty on any of them. But sooner or later she’d grow bored of whipping sailors ...

Then she’d come down here and start on the prisoners.

Maybe she wouldn’t begin with them.

The weary weeks at sea hadn’t been spent totally alone. The Oathbound were bounty hunters, and clearly business was good.

Hunting Greencloaks seemed to pay well. The cell next to theirs held three more. They’d been brought on board a few days ago, and the news was grim.

Rollan knocked on the wall between them. “You awake, Kofe?”

There was a grunt and a return knock. Then a cough. “Of course. How can anyone sleep with what’s going on up there?”

“Where were we?” asked Rollan.

Kofe laughed. It was a generous belly-rumble and Rollan felt it through the wood. “Best meal you’ve ever had. Mine was a squirrel. Cooked on a spit, out in the woods west of Greenhaven.”

“Doesn’t sound so special.”

“I was real hungry, boy. Sitting out under the moon, quiet as you like. Nothing in the world but me and Sniffler.”

Sniffler made his presence known with a squeak. Unlike everyone else here, the rat was quite at home in the hull.

Alongside Kofe was Lady Cranston, a distant relative to the Trunswicks, and Salaman, from northern Nilo. The three Greencloaks knew of Rollan and his friends, of course, and it was reassuring to have them on board, even if they were prisoners.

“You think they’ve caught everyone?” asked Rollan.

“Looking to get rescued?” Kofe replied. He sighed. “Who knows? The Oathbound have been planning this for a long time. The only reason we weren’t caught sooner was because we were on a mission, far from Greenhaven. We won’t be the only ones. There’ll be Greencloaks hiding out, but with Olvan and Lenori captured, it’s not looking good. We’re on our own, boy.”

On our own. Rollan was used to that.

Wasn’t it supposed to be different? He was a Greencloak. The ancient order had allies everywhere, yet it had been taken down in a matter of months.

But some things rot from within.

Imposters had gotten themselves recruited into the Greencloaks. They’d learned its secrets, dug out its weaknesses. They’d publicly murdered the Emperor of Zhong while wearing the uniform, right as the Greencloaks were at their most vulnerable. When the blow came, the Greencloaks were swiftly blamed and imprisoned.

Imprisoned, like now.

There was one escape, however.

Rollan closed his eyes. It was getting easier and easier, connecting to Essix. She hadn’t been captured with the other Greencloaks in Nilo, and was tailing the boat to see where they went.

Rollan closed his eyes and he was there with her, following their ship. His heart jumped as he soared amongst the clouds. The wind roared in his ears, buffeting Essix’s sleek body. Or was it his? Now they were one and the same.

Essix cried out as she spun downward, piercing through a flock of panicked seagulls. Rollan laughed to see them break formation as they squawked in outrage. Essix merely flicked her wing tips and darted off.

This was pure freedom. His mind knew it was a fiction—he was trapped in the smelly belly of a ship—but his heart was filled with such joy that his chest swelled to bursting.

And pride. What animal could compare to Essix? Greatest of the Great Beasts!

He’d struggled, back when she’d first come into his life. He’d watched with jealousy at the way Meilin commanded Jhi, and the close, instinctive bond between Conor and Briggan.

As a street orphan he'd never owned anything valuable. Then he'd been given a Great Beast, one of the Four Fallen. Was it any wonder he'd struggled to understand such a gift?

He'd known people back in Concorba who'd been like him and struck it lucky. Most had squandered their good fortune and ended up back where they'd started sooner than they imagined.

Sure, he'd come close. Planning to run away from Greenhaven the first chance he'd gotten. Refusing to join until Tarik's death.

Sticking to his friends had taken a lot of courage, more than he'd imagined.

He could picture Greenhaven now. The towers and the surrounding sea of grass. The woods and the stables and the banners fluttering from the battlements.

He'd seen it through Essix's eyes, too. Many times, as they honed their bond together. Rollan had glided through the treetops as she accelerated toward the castle. The trees crowded around her, him, them, but she was too swift, too cunning to be trapped amongst the branches and boughs.

"Fly, boy, fly! Fly away if you can!"

Rollan snapped his eyes open.

"Wheeee!"

He ran to the cell door. "Will you shut up?"

"Ignore him," suggested Abeke.

"Wheee! Flap, flap, flap in the sky!"

The Greencloaks weren't the only prisoners down here. There was one other.

The mad old man.

As he was Zhongese, Meilin had tried talking to him at the beginning. The man ignored her, staring and mumbling and occasionally laughing wildly. The sailors found him amusing but Rollan just wondered why he was here.

Even now he was peering through the bars, whispering to himself. He caught Rollan's gaze and then beat his arms in the air, laughing as he flapped around the small cell of his.

"I'll be like that if I don't get out of here soon," complained Conor.

The hatch at the far end of the narrow corridor opened.

A column of light lit the ladder and a small diameter at the foot of it. Rollan's eyes watered; it was the first true sunlight he'd seen in days. Voices spoke and a couple of shadows passed at the hatch opening. One of them a woman.

Rollan clenched his fists. Maybe today was the day Cordelia came for him. He wouldn't go without a fight. A quick glance at his companions and he saw the same defiance.

But it wasn't Cordelia the Kind who descended into the semidarkness of the ship's hold.

It was Kana.

Once, they'd called her Anka. Rollan and the others had thought she was a Greencloak. A friend. But that had all been lie, right from the very beginning. In reality, she was the captain of the Oathbound, the mercenaries who had relentlessly pursued them. And like all high-ranking Oathbound, she carried a title that belied her true nature: Kana the Honest.

Unlike the others, however, Kana wore only a simple black uniform, dispensing with the usual brass collar and wrist guards.

All the better to hide in, Rollan thought despondently.

The traitor wrinkled her nose at the dank odors that hung in the uttermost depths of the hull. Almost daintily, she kicked aside a rat that had dared to come sniffing at her boot. Using the tip of her staff, she pushed open the porthole, and Rollan felt the sudden gust of fresh air.

Someone from above passed a lantern down to Kana and she raised it ahead of her. When its glow fell on them, all gathered at the cell bars. She smiled with cold satisfaction. "You've made yourselves at home, I see."

"There's room enough for you," said Conor. "Why don't you come in?"

Kana stepped closer, using her lantern to inspect their cell, but well out of reach of any sudden lunges. "Your journey is almost over. We're near the coast of Zhong and will be coming into dock by sunset." Kana smiled. "You have a friend who's eager to see you."

Rollan frowned. "A friend like Cordelia?"

"Cordelia can be unruly, I admit that," the woman said with a frown. "You should appreciate how hard it's been to stop her from coming down here and expressing her ... enthusiasm upon any of you."

"You didn't stop her from torturing the sailors," Rollan said.

Kana's response was a shrug. Apparently the pain of a few nameless sailors meant nothing to her.

How had they gotten themselves into this mess?

Rollan met Kana's gaze. "What about Worthy? Cordelia got out. So what did you do with him?"

Kana's eyebrows raised a hair, though her face remained otherwise still. "You won't be seeing him again."

Rollan didn't want to believe that. He glanced over at Conor. The two boys had grown up together. Conor was once Worthy's servant, back when the Redcloak went by Devin Trunswick. Worthy had come a long way from the obnoxious noble he was to become their ally, and friend. Together they'd found an ancient artifact in Eura, a sword named the Wildcat's Claw. Worthy had tried his best to prevent it from falling into the hands of Cordelia and the Oathbound, by bringing down the tomb where the sword had been hidden.

But the Oathbound had managed to retrieve the blade out of the collapsed wreckage.

It was now in Cordelia's hands. Rollan couldn't think of anything worse.

Who was he kidding? Of course he could. Easily.

Most of the ancient Greencloak gifts were now in the possession of Kana's mercenaries. They had the Claw, the Heart of the Land amulet, and the legendary Stormspeaker crown.

Only the Dragon's Eye remained ...

And there was no one left to stop them. With Rollan and his friends locked up here and the Greencloaks imprisoned in Greenhaven, the Oathbound were unstoppable.

Rollan and the others glanced up as they heard a heavy thump from the deck. The screaming abruptly stopped.

"Sounds like Cordelia's had her fun." Kana turned back toward the ladder. "The adventure is almost over, children."

The hatch slammed shut once she left, and Rollan heard the rattle of a bolt being shoved in place.

Conor shook the bars. "We've got to do something!"

Abeke put her hand on Conor's shoulder. "Save your strength. We may get our chance yet."

"But what if we don't?"

The breeze from the opened porthole was feeble, but Rollan appreciated it nevertheless. Seagulls squawked somewhere outside. Rollan knew that meant they were nearing land.

Who was waiting for them in Zhong? The Oathbound were mercenaries, but they'd long been in the employ of the various governments of Erdas. Rollan had a sinking feeling.

The only person he could think of was Princess Song, daughter to the emperor. The last time they'd seen her was following her father's death, shocked and heartbroken. Though once a supporter of the Greencloaks, it was ultimately Song who'd ordered their arrest.

Rollan peered closer at the small circle of light ahead. "She left the porthole open."

Meilin looked up. "It's too small, even if we could reach it."

Rollan smiled. "Too small for us. But not Essix. She's been following us since Nilo."

"But what can Essix do for us now?" asked Conor.

"Warn Greenhaven. The Greencloaks may be prisoners, but they're the only allies we've got. Maybe she can lead someone back to us."

Rollan whistled, just hoping the hatch was thick enough to muffle the sound. After a long, tense moment, no Oathbound goons had come to check on them ... but a shadow darkened the porthole.

A large gyrfalcon peered inside. The falcon shook out her wings and began preening herself.

"We don't have time for this, Essix." Rollan held his hand through the bars, toward the open porthole. Clutched between his fingers was a note, scratched on a scrap of leather he'd torn from his boot. "D'you think you can reach that?"

Essix let out a small cry, then shot into cabin. She'd snatched up the scrap of leather in a blink, landing on the floorboards just outside the cage.

Abeke grinned. "I think that's a yes."

Rollan smiled, kneeling and taking the scrap back. "Probably easier if you don't have to carry it in your mouth while you fly."

He rolled the cutting around Essix's leg, then tied it tightly with a second thin strip of leather. Rollan looked into the falcon's bright eyes. "This will tell whoever you can find that we're back in Zhong, and that the Oathbound have three of the relics."

Essix bobbed her head a few times then sprang into the air. It took a single beat and she darted through the narrow opening.

The image rushed unbidden and uncontrolled through Rollan's mind.

He felt himself darting over the waves. Looking through Essix's own eyes, he was startled to see her looking at him, a small face craning at the light shining through the open porthole.

He marvelled at the sharpness of her vision, the clarity with which she saw the world. The colors were brighter, everything more defined, sharper. The dimming sunlight catching the sea spray as waves were thrown up against the glistening hull. The water droplets shone like rubies, momentarily frozen between rising and falling, then merged again with the sea.

Rollan stumbled and Conor caught him, setting himself back onto his feet. The boy looked at him quizzically. "You all right?"

Rollan glimpsed her swooping over the waves. Then Essix tilted vertically upward and was gone.

He turned back and was met by three expectant faces. "It'll take a day or two to reach Greenhaven and, even if help is coming, it'll be a while before it arrives."

Meilin sighed. "So we're on our own?"

Rollan shrugged, trying to project some confidence. "What's new?"

Sudden shouts drew their attention back to the ship, rather than the fleeing bird.

Rollan's heart quickened with dread. "You think Cordelia's starting on another one?"

Bare feet scurried upon the wooden boards above. The shouts weren't cries of pain, but commands. The ship creaked as the rudder turned against the direction of the waves.

"No," replied Meilin. "We're coming into port."

The sailors knew their business. They were clearly hurrying around the main deck, despite the presence of the terrifying Cordelia, or perhaps because of it.

It was only minutes later that the chains of the anchors rattled free. Rollan could hear them splashing loudly into the water. Ropes hissed through the air and the ship buffeted again and again as the pilot worked to bring it against the quayside.

The hatch opened up. This time it was Cordelia.

The toes of her boots were sprinkled with blood.

Three sailors came in with her, one with manacles and the rest with swords drawn. Cordelia herself held the Wildcat's Claw, her gloved hand constantly clenching and unclenching around its hilt.

Rollan met her gaze. "I hope you're taking good care of that sword. We'll be wanting it back soon."

Cordelia drew it out by a few inches, just enough for the torchlight to catch its bright silvery edge. "Feel free to try and take it off me."

She wants an excuse to use it.

He wasn't going to give her the satisfaction. For now. But sooner or later, a chance might come up ...

One by one, the sailors manacled the Greencloaks. Cordelia glanced impatiently over her shoulder the whole time.

Climbing out of the hull wasn't easy with his hands bound, but Rollan managed. He blinked as the sunlight assailed him.

It took a few moments for his eyes to get used to it. They'd been held in the gloom for weeks and the sky was dazzling, even at evening time.

The others were equally stunned. But eventually sight returned.

They were in a natural crescent bay with high cliffs on three sides and the sea at their backs. The docks were lined with Zhongese soldiers. Apart from their vessel, there were only two other ships, much smaller, and a cluster of rowboats bobbing in the waves. Steps, cut into the natural rock, zigzagged their way up.

An elegant palace dominated the top of the cliffs. It was long and sinewy in design, with a suspended platform at the very tip of the crescent.

"It's ... beautiful," breathed Rollan.

"Xin Kao Dai," said Meilin, with a note of sadness. "The emperor's Summer Palace."

Enter your code to
unlock huge rewards:
NJT66KW64T

Design your own spirit
animal!

Join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!
Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one
of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Get the FREE Spirit Animals app
for tablet or phone.

SPIRIT ANIMALS

SPECIAL EDITIONS

Discover the Hidden Tales of Erdas!

There's more to explore in the Spirit Animals world! These Special Editions reveal the secrets of Erdas in ways you never saw coming...

 SCHOLASTIC

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SCHOLASTIC and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

Copyright © 2018 by Scholastic Inc.

All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920. SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

The publisher does not have any control over and does not assume any responsibility for author or third-party websites or their content.

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2017956186

ISBN 978-1-338-11669-4

First edition, February 2018

Cover illustration by Angelo Rinaldi

Cover design by Charice Silverman & Rocco Melillo

Art direction by Keirsten Geise

Metal frame: © caesart/Shutterstock

Wood texture: © CG Textures

e-ISBN 978-1-338-11670-0

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereafter invented, without the express written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

THE NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING SERIES

FALL of the BEASTS

A SPIRIT ANIMALS

BOOK 8

THE DRAGON'S EYE

READ
THE BOOK.
UNLOCK
THE GAME.

SARWAT CHADDA

The world is in peril.

An ancient evil is rising from beneath Erdas, and we need YOU to help stop it.

Claim your spirit animal and join the adventure now:

1. Go to scholastic.com/spiritanimals.
2. Log in to create your character and choose your own spirit animal.
3. Have your book ready and enter the code below to unlock the adventure.

Your code: NH3FHHRD4R

By the Four Fallen,
The Greencloaks

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

"It's all of us together.
Always has been,
always will be."

FALL of the BEASTS
SPIRIT
ANIMAS™
THE DRAGON'S EYE

Sarwat Chadda

SCHOLASTIC INC.

To my girls—SC

CONTENTS

Eye Symbol

Greencloak Letter

Quote Page

Title Page

Map of Erdas

Dedication

1. AT SEA

2. THE SUMMER PALACE

3. EMPRESS SONG

4. CHIEF UGO

5. ONE HOUR

6. FIRE

7. SWARM

8. FALLS

9. THE DRAGON'S EYE

10. SEASPRAY

11. OLD FRIENDS

12. ESCAPE

13. TO THE BOAT

14. SONG'S QUARTERS

15. SONG'S DESCENT

16. THE WOLF

17. THE FALCON

18. THE PANDA

19. THE LEOPARD

20. SID

21. KANA AND CORDELIA

22. SONG AND MEILIN

23. PEACE

Letter to the Fans

About the Author

Online Game Code

Horizon Sneak Peek
Spirit Animals Game
Copyright

AT SEA

ROLLAN SHIFTED IN HIS HAMMOCK, VAINLY SEARCHING for sleep. The coarse sackcloth reeked, but it was better than being on the floor, where a film of seawater layered the wood and a company of rats nibbled at bare toes or exposed ears.

The ship's cramped brig had only one porthole—closed and on the far side of the corridor—so there was little ventilation. The air tasted stale and stifling, laden with the stink of too many days at sea.

The old wooden hull of the Oathbound schooner groaned against the weight of the waves. Then there were more sounds: a hiss, a crack, a scream.

“She’s at it again,” declared Conor.

Reluctantly, Rollan opened his eyes. He squinted until they adjusted to the permanent gloom of the cell, and then he saw his friends.

Conor slouched up against the bars, his arms hanging through the rusty iron, head tilted to the noise above.

He winced at the next scream.

Rollan rolled out of the hammock and past Abeke, who’d been woken by the cries echoing from above. She gritted her teeth. “It’s Cordelia ...” she said. “Cordelia the Kind.”

Meilin joined Conor by the bars and flinched at the third cry, louder and sharper than before. “That poor man.”

“There’ll be no one to sail this ship if she carries on like this,” said Rollan.

“What do you think he did?” asked Abeke.

Rollan shrugged. “He doesn’t need to have done anything.”

He thought back to their capture at the Niloan library, Maktaba. They’d been searching for the legendary bond token, Stormspeaker. They’d teamed up with Takoda and Xanthe, only to be betrayed—and captured—once they’d succeeded in gaining the token.

Takoda and Xanthe were chained and bundled on a ship to Greenhaven, while Rollan and his friends were headed to Zhong.

Conor glanced over at the scratches he’d been making on the wall. There were fifteen.

There was another hiss and cry, but now reduced to a pitiful whimper.

Fifteen days trapped down here. Fifteen days of hearing the cruel hiss of the whip and the cries of whatever poor unfortunate Cordelia had picked to torment, if no other reason than that she could.

Why not them? She hated Rollan and his companions, yet Cordelia never chose to vent her cruelty on any of them. But sooner or later she’d grow bored of whipping sailors....

Then she’d come down here and start on the prisoners.

Maybe she wouldn’t begin with them.

The weary weeks at sea hadn’t been spent totally alone. The Oathbound were bounty hunters, and clearly business was good.

Hunting Greencloaks seemed to pay well. The cell next to theirs held three more. They’d been brought on board a few days ago, and the news was grim.

Rollan knocked on the wall between them. “You awake, Kofe?”

There was a grunt and a return knock. Then a cough. “Of course. How can anyone sleep with what’s going on up there?”

“Where were we?” asked Rollan.

Kofe laughed. It was a generous belly rumble and Rollan felt it through the wood. “Best meal you’ve ever had. Mine was a squirrel. Cooked on a spit, out in the woods west of Greenhaven.”

“Doesn’t sound so special.”

“I was real hungry, boy. Sitting out under the moon, quiet as you like. Nothing in the world but me and Sniffler.”

Sniffler made his presence known with a squeak. Unlike everyone else here, the rat was quite at home in the hull.

Alongside Kofe was Lady Cranston, a distant relative to the Trunswicks, and Salaman, from northern Nilo. The three Greencloaks knew of Rollan and his friends, of course, and it was reassuring to have them on board, even if they were prisoners.

“You think they’ve caught everyone?” asked Rollan.

“Looking to get rescued?” Kofe replied. He sighed. “Who knows? The Oathbound have been planning this for a long time. The only reason we weren’t caught sooner was because we were on a mission, far from Greenhaven. We won’t be the only ones. There’ll be Greencloaks hiding out, but with Olvan and Lenori captured, it’s not looking good. We’re on our own, boy.”

On our own. Rollan was used to that.

Wasn’t it supposed to be different? He was a Greencloak. The ancient order had allies everywhere, yet it had been taken down in a matter of months.

But some things rot from within.

Impostors had gotten themselves recruited into the Greencloaks. They’d learned its secrets, dug out its weaknesses. They’d publicly murdered the Emperor of Zhong while wearing the uniform, right as the Greencloaks were at their most vulnerable. When the blow came, the Greencloaks were swiftly blamed and imprisoned.

Imprisoned, like now.

There was one escape, however.

Rollan closed his eyes. It was getting easier and easier, connecting to Essix. She hadn’t been captured with the other Greencloaks in Nilo, and was tailing the boat to see where they went.

Soon he was there with her, following their ship. His heart jumped as he soared among the clouds. The wind roared in his ears, buffeting Essix’s sleek body. Or was it his? Now they were one and the same.

Essix cried out as she spun downward, piercing through a flock of panicked seagulls. Rollan laughed to see them break formation as they squawked in outrage. Essix merely flicked her wing tips and darted off.

This was pure freedom. His mind knew it was a fiction—he was trapped in the smelly belly of a ship—but his heart was filled with such joy that his chest swelled to bursting.

And pride. What animal could compare to Essix? Greatest of the Great Beasts!

He’d struggled, back when she’d first come into his life. He’d watched with jealousy at the way Meilin commanded Jhi, and the close, instinctive bond between Conor and Briggan.

As a street orphan he'd never owned anything valuable. Then he'd been given a Great Beast, one of the Four Fallen. Was it any wonder he'd struggled to understand such a gift?

He'd known people back in Concorba who'd been like him and struck it lucky. Most had squandered their good fortune and ended up back where they'd started sooner than they imagined.

Sure, he'd come close. Planning to run away from Greenhaven the first chance he'd gotten. Refusing to join until Tarik's death.

Sticking to his friends had taken a lot of courage, more than he'd imagined.

He could picture Greenhaven now. The towers and the surrounding sea of grass. The woods and the stables, and the banners fluttering from the battlements.

He'd seen it through Essix's eyes, too. Many times, as they honed their bond together. Rollan had glided through the treetops as she accelerated toward the castle. The trees crowded around her, him, them, but she was too swift, too cunning to be trapped among the branches and boughs.

"Fly, boy, fly! Fly away if you can!"

Rollan snapped his eyes open.

"Wheeee!"

He ran to the cell door. "Will you shut up?"

"Ignore him," suggested Abeke.

"Wheee! Flap, flap, flap in the sky!"

The Greencloaks weren't the only prisoners down here. There was one other.

The mad old man.

As he was Zhongese, Meilin had tried talking to him at the beginning. The man ignored her, staring and mumbling and occasionally laughing wildly. The sailors found him amusing, but Rollan just wondered why he was here.

Even now he was peering through the bars, whispering to himself. He caught Rollan's gaze and then beat his arms in the air, laughing as he flapped around his small cell.

"I'll be like that if I don't get out of here soon," complained Conor.

The hatch at the far end of the narrow corridor opened.

A column of light lit the ladder and a small diameter at the foot of it. Rollan's eyes watered; it was the first true sunlight he'd seen in days.

Voices spoke and a couple of shadows passed at the hatch opening. One of them was a woman's.

Rollan clenched his fists. Maybe today was the day Cordelia came for him. He wouldn't go without a fight. A quick glance at his companions and he saw the same defiance.

But it wasn't Cordelia the Kind who descended into the semidarkness of the ship's hold.

It was Kana.

Once, they'd called her Anka. Rollan and the others had thought she was a Greencloak. A friend. But that had all been a lie, right from the very beginning. In reality, she was the captain of the Oathbound, the mercenaries who had relentlessly pursued them. And like all high-ranking Oathbound, she carried a title that belied her true nature: Kana the Honest.

Unlike the others, however, Kana wore only a simple black uniform, dispensing with the usual brass collar and wrist guards.

All the better to hide in, Rollan thought despondently.

The traitor wrinkled her nose at the dank odors that hung in the uttermost depths of the hull. Almost daintily, she kicked aside a rat that had dared to come sniffing at her boot. Using the tip of her staff, she pushed open the porthole, and Rollan felt the sudden gust of fresh air.

Someone from above passed a lantern down to Kana, and she raised it ahead of her. When its glow fell on them, all gathered at the cell bars. She smiled with cold satisfaction. "You've made yourselves at home, I see."

"There's room enough for you," said Conor. "Why don't you come in?"

Kana stepped closer, using her lantern to inspect their cell, but well out of reach of any sudden lunges. "Your journey is almost over. We're near the coast of Zhong and will be coming into dock by sunset." Kana smiled. "You have a friend who's eager to see you."

Rollan frowned. "A friend like Cordelia?"

"Cordelia can be unruly, I admit that," the woman said with a sigh. "You should appreciate how hard it's been to stop her from coming down here and expressing her ... enthusiasm upon any of you."

"You didn't stop her from torturing the sailors," Rollan said.

Kana's response was a shrug. Apparently the pain of a few nameless sailors meant nothing to her.

How had they gotten themselves into this mess?

Rollan met Kana's gaze. "What about Worthy? Cordelia got out. So what did you do with him?"

Kana's eyebrows raised a hair, though her face remained otherwise still. "You won't be seeing him again."

Rollan didn't want to believe that. He glanced over at Conor. The two boys had grown up together. Conor was once Worthy's servant, back when the Redcloak went by Devin Trunswick. Worthy had come a long way from the obnoxious noble to become their ally and friend. Together they'd found an ancient artifact in Eura, a sword named the Wildcat's Claw. Worthy had tried his best to prevent it from falling into the hands of Cordelia and the Oathbound by bringing down the tomb where the sword had been hidden.

But the Oathbound had managed to retrieve the blade out of the collapsed wreckage.

It was now in Cordelia's hands. Rollan couldn't think of anything worse.

Who was he kidding? Of course he could. Easily.

Most of the ancient Greencloak gifts were now in the possession of Kana's mercenaries. They had the Claw, the Heart of the Land amulet, and the legendary Stormspeaker crown.

Only the Dragon's Eye remained ...

And there was no one left to stop them. With Rollan and his friends locked up here and the Greencloaks imprisoned in Greenhaven, the Oathbound were unstoppable.

Rollan and the others glanced up as they heard a heavy thump from the deck. The screaming abruptly stopped.

"Sounds like Cordelia's had her fun." Kana turned back toward the ladder. "The adventure is almost over, children."

The hatch slammed shut once she left, and Rollan heard the rattle of a bolt being shoved in place.

Conor shook the bars. "We've got to do something!"

Abeke put her hand on Conor's shoulder. "Save your strength. We may get our chance yet."

"But what if we don't?"

The breeze from the opened porthole was feeble, but Rollan appreciated it nevertheless. Seagulls squawked somewhere outside. Rollan knew that meant they were nearing land.

Who was waiting for them in Zhong? The Oathbound were mercenaries, but they'd long been in the employ of the various governments of Erdas. Rollan had a sinking feeling.

The only person he could think of was Princess Song, daughter to the emperor. The last time they'd seen her was following her father's death, shocked and heartbroken. Though once a supporter of the Greencloaks, it was ultimately Song who'd ordered their arrest.

Rollan peered closer at the small circle of light ahead. "She left the porthole open."

Meilin looked up. "It's too small, even if we could reach it."

Rollan smiled. "Too small for us. But not Essix. She's been following us since Nilo."

"But what can Essix do for us now?" asked Conor.

"Warn Greenhaven. The Greencloaks may be prisoners, but they're the only allies we've got. Maybe she can lead someone back to us."

Rollan whistled, just hoping the hatch was thick enough to muffle the sound. After a long, tense moment, no Oathbound goons had come to check on them ... but a shadow darkened the porthole.

A large gyrfalcon peered inside. The falcon shook out her wings and began preening herself.

"We don't have time for this, Essix." Rollan held his hand through the bars, toward the open porthole. Clutched between his fingers was a note, scratched on a scrap of leather he'd torn from his boot. "D'you think you can reach that?"

Essix let out a small cry, then shot into the cabin. She'd snatched up the scrap of leather in a blink, landing on the floorboards just outside the cage.

Abeke grinned. "I think that's a yes."

Rollan smiled, kneeling and taking the scrap back. "Probably easier if you don't have to carry it in your mouth while you fly."

He rolled the cutting around Essix's leg, then tied it tightly with a second thin strip of leather. Rollan looked into the falcon's bright eyes. "This will tell whoever you can find that we're back in Zhong, and that the Oathbound have three of the relics."

Essix bobbed her head a few times then sprang into the air. It took a single beat, and she darted through the narrow opening.

The image rushed unbidden and uncontrolled through Rollan's mind.

He felt himself soaring over the waves. Looking through Essix's own eyes, he was startled to see her looking at him, a small face craning at the light shining through the open porthole.

He marveled at the sharpness of her vision, the clarity with which she saw the world. The colors were brighter, everything more defined, sharper. The dimming sunlight catching the sea spray as waves were thrown up against the glistening hull. The water droplets shone like rubies, momentarily frozen between rising and falling, then merged again with the sea.

Rollan stumbled and Conor caught him, setting him back onto his feet. The boy looked at him quizzically. "You all right?"

Rollan glimpsed her swooping over the waves. Then Essix tilted vertically upward and was gone.

He turned back and was met by three expectant faces. "It'll take a day or two to reach Greenhaven and, even if help is coming, it'll be a while before it arrives."

Meilin sighed. "So we're on our own?"

Rollan shrugged, trying to project some confidence. "What's new?"

Sudden shouts drew their attention back to the ship, rather than the fleeing bird.

Rollan's heart quickened with dread. "You think Cordelia's starting on another one?"

Bare feet scurried upon the wooden boards above. The shouts weren't cries of pain, but commands. The ship creaked as the rudder turned against the direction of the waves.

"No," replied Meilin. "We're coming into port."

The sailors knew their business. They were clearly hurrying around the main deck, despite the presence of the terrifying Cordelia, or perhaps because of it.

It was only minutes later that the chains of the anchors rattled free. Rollan could hear them splashing loudly into the water. Ropes hissed through the air and the ship buffeted again and again as the pilot worked to bring it against the quayside.

The hatch opened up. This time it was Cordelia.

Her boots were sprinkled with blood.

Three sailors came in with her, one in manacles and the rest with swords drawn. Cordelia herself held the Wildcat's Claw, her gloved hand constantly clenching and unclenching around its hilt.

Rollan met her gaze. “I hope you’re taking good care of that sword. We’ll be wanting it back soon.”

Cordelia drew it out by a few inches, just enough for the torchlight to catch its bright silvery edge. “Feel free to try and take it off me.”

She wants an excuse to use it.

He wasn’t going to give her the satisfaction. For now. But sooner or later, a chance might come up....

One by one, the sailors manacled the Greencloaks. Cordelia glanced impatiently over her shoulder the whole time.

Climbing out of the hull wasn’t easy with his hands bound, but Rollan managed. He blinked as the sunlight assailed him.

It took a few moments for his eyes to get used to it. They’d been held in the gloom for weeks and the sky was dazzling, even at evening time.

The others were equally stunned. But eventually sight returned.

They were in a natural crescent bay with high cliffs on three sides and the sea at their backs. The docks were lined with Zhongese soldiers. Apart from their vessel, there were only two other ships, much smaller, and a cluster of rowboats bobbing in the waves. Steps, cut into the natural rock, zigzagged their way up.

An elegant palace dominated the top of the cliffs. It was long and sinewy in design, with a suspended platform at the very tip of the crescent.

“It’s ... beautiful,” breathed Rollan.

“Xin Kao Dai,” said Meilin, with a note of sadness. “The emperor’s Summer Palace.”

THE SUMMER PALACE

CORDELIA SHOVED CONOR ALONG THE GANGPLANK. “Get a move on.”
Conor spun to her, a snarl on his lips. “I go at my own pace.”

Cordelia bristled. She wore more armor than the usual brass cuffs and collars of the Oathbound uniform. Her boots had brass shin guards, and plates were strapped to her thighs. A heavy mail covered her from shoulders to below her waist.

There was a nervous, unstable twitch in the way she gripped Wildcat’s Claw, but Conor had spent too long cooped up in a cell. He’d grown up a shepherd, used to the free sky overhead and grass underfoot. He’d taken his imprisonment even worse than the rest of his friends.

If Cordelia wanted a fight, he was happy to give it to her, chains or no chains.

Kana stepped between them. She narrowed her eyes at Conor. “We have a problem here?”

Meilin touched her hand to Conor’s arm. “Now’s not the time,” she whispered.

So the four of them marched off the ship and onto the docks.

The three adult Greencloaks were behind them, then came the crazy old man. He hobbled bowlegged down the gangplank, his scrawny limbs wrapped in chains. It was almost comical how weighed down he was, considering he appeared to be the feeblest of any of them. The man bit his beard and winced as he trod over the pebbles, then looked pitifully over at Conor. “My feet hurt.”

“Should have worn some sandals, then.”

The man looked up at the palace. “How about a piggyback?”

“All the way up? I might drop you.”

Kofe shrugged. “I’ll carry you, old man. Just don’t wriggle.”

Conor hadn’t gotten a good look at his fellow Greencloaks, not until now. Kofe was just like he sounded, big. The man’s beard was threaded with gray, but he was muscular, a born survivor judging by the scars. Conor knew the type, old shepherds who’d slept outdoors through sun and snow, their skin wrinkled like old leather and just as tough.

Lady Cranston was not how he’d expected. Her voice had been soft, cultured, and full of clever words. He’d had an image of a tall, delicate noblewoman wearing furs and silks. Instead he saw a middle-aged woman in a heavy tunic with well-worn boots and a face as hard as flint. Those blue eyes of her shone with swift thoughts. She hooked her fingers in her belt, despite the chains, and Conor got the firm impression those chains wouldn’t handicap her much if it came to a fight.

The third of their trio, Salaman, made him think of Tarik. Conor shot Rollan a glance. By the look in Rollan’s eyes, Conor suspected he was thinking the same thing.

Salaman was dusky and lean. He looked years older than the rest, and the others weren’t young. His beard was pure white, though short and neat. The old man didn’t appear withered by his years, rather the opposite. It seemed age had merely shorn him of any weakness.

If Tarik had had an older brother, Conor reckoned he would have looked a lot like Salaman.

The three elder Greencloaks had an ease around each other. They didn’t need to talk, but there were glances and nods and other silent communication between them.

What were they planning? Escape?

Judging by the way the Oathbound handled these three—cautious, even a little fearful—maybe they did have a chance.

The old man scabbled up on Kofe’s back. The Greencloak took the extra weight without effort.

Conor glanced down at his mark. Briggan lay across the back of his forearm. Conor was tempted to summon the big wolf here and now. After weeks in the hull he wanted to run and run, Briggan at his heels.

He grinned to himself. Run and maybe cause a bit of trouble ...

Rollan caught his look, but shook his head.

The grin dropped to a frown. Rollan was right. How far would they get in these chains? Yet Conor was tired of biding his time. His patience had been used up. Every muscle burned, desperate to break into action. To run. To fight. To show the Oathbound what he and his companions were truly capable of.

Kana stepped up to him. “Don’t get any bright ideas, Conor.”

Conor smiled and took a deep breath. “What ideas? I’m just enjoying the fresh air.”

“I want you to keep that beast safe and sleeping right where he is. Got it?”

“Or what?”

She tilted her head to a group of sailors lining the decks. Each held a loaded crossbow.

“They’ve got a good range,” said Kana, “and would make a mess of your spirit animal.”

Conor scowled. “You sure they’d shoot Briggan? Maybe one might decide to send a quarrel at Cordelia? She hasn’t exactly made many friends, has she?”

Kana scowled and moved on down the line, personally checking the manacles on each and every one of them.

Meilin leaned over. “You aren’t exactly making friends, either.”

“Tried that already, and look how it turned out.” Conor grimaced. “It’s just a bit of backchat, Meilin. She deserves it.”

“She does, but we need her to relax her guard. You prodding her only keeps her attentive, wary. If we act more ... docile, then maybe they’ll make a mistake. One we can exploit.”

“Docile?” He laughed. “That’s almost funny coming from you.”

Meilin nodded. “It’s something I’ve learned from Jhi. To cultivate a quiet strength.”

“Might be a bit late for that. You’ve got a bit of a reputation, remember?”

“What’s that mean?” If Meilin’s arms had been free, Conor suspected she’d be crossing them right about now.

“Hey, I’m not the one who can break rocks with spinning high kicks,” he said. “Which you are going to have to teach me one day.”

“You know how to handle yourself, Conor. It’s not graceful, the way you fight, but it is effective.”

“And I fight even better with Briggan at my side.” He looked around. “If Abeke released Uraza then maybe—”

“And that’s exactly what Kana would expect. She’s waiting for us to do something stupid.”

“Then what options do we have?” he asked, kicking at pebbles as they moved.

“We wait until they do something stupid.”

He wished he had Meilin’s confidence, but the Oathbound had been one step ahead all the way. They weren’t going to leave anything to chance now, not when they had three of the ancient relics.

Others had freed their spirit animals. A big wolverine with dark brown fur and a jet-black muzzle sniffed around them. Sid the Generous—another Oathbound lieutenant—scratched the beast between the ears and the wolverine responded with a friendly growl. Then it cast its gaze at Conor and the growl became a threatening snarl. There was dense muscle under the fur. Conor knew these creatures would take on, and defeat, opponents much bigger.

How had such an animal bonded with Sid?

He shook his head. Some things didn’t make much sense.

“So this is where the emperor spends his summers? Very nice,” said Conor. Who would have thought there was so much marble in all Erdas? “Still, it’s no rickety shepherd’s hut up in the mountains.”

“Drafty and stinking of damp sheep?”

Conor took a deep breath, as though those sheep were around him now. “There’s no sweeter smell.”

Meilin smiled, despite it all. “You miss the old life?”

Conor shook his chains. “At moments like these, yeah, I do.”

“Tell me about it.” Meilin gazed across the docks and the pebble beach beyond. “Looks like we’ve got another visitor.”

Something was swimming through the gentle waves toward the beach. Sunlight shone upon slick greenish-blue scales and a strong, thick tail that propelled the creature swiftly through the water. Then, among the froth breaking upon the shingle, out crawled a large lizard.

Meilin’s eyes narrowed. “A Zhongese water dragon. I didn’t know they swam so close to the city.”

The lizard flicked droplets of seawater off its tail, then plodded up to an exposed slab of rock, a piece of granite cliff that must have cracked free. The water dragon turned around in a circle, then settled itself down on a sunny spot to bask. It didn't close its eyes to sleep. Instead it kept them slitted and wary.

It was about four feet long and well fed. Curiously, the animal wore a collar. The leather strap was unfussy, but subtly decorated with branded patterns.

Conor's foot was kicked from under him. Hands manacled, he fell flat onto the pebbles.

"Oops," said Cordelia.

Blind fury filled Conor's heart. He rolled to his feet in one swift movement and charged in, taking Cordelia unawares. He rammed his head into her stomach and swung both hands up as she stumbled back. The heavy chains hanging from his wrist caught her across the jaw and she cried out, collapsing.

"Enough!" Kana gripped the chains and pulled him off.

Cordelia crawled to her feet. Her mouth was bloody and her gaze filled with dark rage. "You've made a stupid mistake, boy ..."

She drew the Wildcat's Claw.

The steel shimmered with amber and golden light as flames caressed the blade. Cordelia gripped it with both hands and pointed it at Conor.

She's insane.

He could see madness in Cordelia's eyes, and maybe the Wildcat's Claw was feeding that madness. Cordelia gritted her teeth. "Come on."

Even Kana looked wary. She didn't put herself between them. Perhaps she was afraid Cordelia would cut her down, too.

Conor backed away. "Unlock these chains and I'll fight you."

Cordelia laughed. "You'll fight me one way or another."

"Conor, move!" Meilin screamed as Cordelia charged him. Conor leaped aside, rolling over the stones as he felt the heat of the blade pass inches from his back. He sprang up and threw a stone at Cordelia.

Conor had spent more than enough summers protecting sheep from hungry predators. Every young shepherd had to learn to throw hard and straight.

The rock smacked Cordelia hard in the forehead, and she screamed with fury and pain. She braced herself, thrusting the sword ahead of her blindly as she stumbled under the impact.

The flames grew fiercer, fueled by her rage.

Conor couldn't win this fight by throwing stones. Chained, unarmed, and facing a fiery sword, he needed to use his wits.

He backed farther down the beach. The sailors and guards watched, but didn't intervene.

Water lapped around his ankles.

Cordelia spat. She turned the Wildcat's Claw in long, slow circles, drawing fiery hoops through the air. She grinned. "Where are you going to run to, boy?"

Conor waded farther in. The water was around his thighs. "Come and get me, Cordelia."

"Cordelia, don't do it," said Sid. "Let him come to you."

"Shut your mouth, Sid. The boy's going to be taught a lesson, and that can't wait."

Both hands tight around the hilt, Cordelia waded in after Conor.

Cordelia ... and all her heavy armor.

The pebbles underfoot were slippery with seaweed. The sword hissed as droplets steamed upon the fiery metal.

But if Cordelia noticed these things, she didn't care. All she wanted was to inflict pain.

Conor concentrated on keeping his balance.

The stones beneath the water had been worn smooth and flat. They balanced unevenly on each other. The lapping waves, while not high, carried with them an irresistible force. Each one was moved by countless tons of water.

Conor felt with his boots as he entered waist-deep into the brine. The flat rock, already slick, was wobbly.

He stepped off it and receded another foot.

Cordelia laughed. "You want to drown? Is that your plan?"

Conor stepped back. He yelled as he stumbled, throwing up his arms to try and keep his balance.

Seeing her chance, Cordelia yelled and surged forward.

Conor suddenly straightened up. The stumble had been fake. He swung his chain through the air.

Cordelia dodged, right onto the wobbly rock. Her right foot slipped away from her and down she went. The Wildcat's Claw steamed and went out.

Conor rushed forward.

Cordelia floundered under the water. The mail shirt itself weighed almost twenty pounds and her arms, too, were encased in shiny brass. Each time she tried to rise, Conor knocked her back down.

The fury in her eyes transformed to fear. It was only a few feet of water, but there were plenty of folk stories of knights drowning in puddles because of the weight of their armor.

“Get her up!” yelled Kana. She and a group of sailors were wading forward.

One of them grabbed Conor and hauled him back to the beach as the others raised up Cordelia. She screamed incoherently, fighting them even as they tried to save her. One let go and down she splashed again.

Rollan laughed, then embraced Conor. “Didn’t know you had it in you, Conor.”

Abeke and Meilin looked on proudly.

In the end, it took four sailors to drag Cordelia out of the sea. They dropped her onto the beach, and not gently, either. Kana waded out last of all, the Wildcat’s Claw now in her hands. She looked down as Cordelia coughed up seawater. Kana dropped the sword beside the half-drowned woman. “We’ve wasted enough time already.”

Cordelia snatched the sword and glared at Conor. Then, teeth gritted, she shoved it back into its scabbard.

Kana led the way up the path to the Summer Palace. The climb was steep and narrow. The cliffs that surrounded them were formed from black granite and patched with green tufts of moss. Water seeped out through cracks, and rivulets streamed over the jagged surface.

At the cliff top, the path transformed into a wide flagstone road leading straight to the palace gates. The entrance was guarded by Zhongese soldiers in bright armor and plumed helmets. Each man was a giant, and the halberds they carried looked as if they could slice an ox in half.

They glanced at the arriving party. Conor saw the captain of the Zhongese guards sneer as his gaze fell upon the Oathbound. Then he barked an order and the gates creaked slowly open.

The guards and sailors remained outside. Before passing through the gate, Kana turned and handed the wiry first mate a jangling bag of coins. “Our business is concluded.” She glanced at Conor as the sailors trekked back to their ship. “It would be in your best interests to behave.”

“Where are you taking us?” asked Abeke.

A brief smile flickered across Kana’s lips. “To see an old friend of mine, and my employer.”

Marble statues lined the courtyard path: magnificent beasts sculpted by masters. Proud lions, elegant herons. There were snakes and antelopes and eagles, all manner of beasts. But Conor's attention fell on a water dragon.

Meilin must have caught his look. "That belonged to an ancient hero of Zhong. His animal bond was so powerful that he could supposedly control the sea."

"No talking," commanded Kana.

The group passed through great halls with mosaics covering the floors, and along corridors lined with portraits of past emperors. Conor was surprised to find that there weren't any members of the official Zhongese guard inside the palace grounds. Just a few timid servants and many black-cloaked Oathbound.

The party stopped outside a pair of huge bronze doors. A servant struck the panel with a hammer, and the doors slowly parted.

The audience chamber was surrounded by windows so it could look out over the sea. In the center was a throne carved from gold and silver, studded with a medley of colorful gems. Intricately dressed servants waited on either side of the throne, and sitting upon it was ...

"Princess Song?" said Meilin, stupefied.

The girl laughed and raced across the hall. She hugged Meilin. "My friend! You're here!"

Conor frowned. "What's going on?"

Song gestured to Kana. "Chains? Really, Kana? Please free Meilin and her friends."

Kana bowed and drew out a key. A minute later Conor was rubbing his wrists as the manacles were unlocked.

Song snapped her fingers. Servants appeared from the edges of the room, carrying plates piled with food. "You all look starved," she said. Song picked a spiced bun from one of the trays and handed it delicately to Meilin. "As I remember, you seemed to like these quite a bit! I had them specially prepared."

Beside Conor, Rollan grabbed up a chicken leg. "Ship food does leave a lot to be desired."

Meilin didn't seem to have an appetite. She placed the bun back on a nearby tray. "Princess Song ... what's going on?"

The girl turned suddenly. "Empress Song, don't you mean?"

Meilin nodded, taken by surprise. Slowly, she bowed to the girl. “My apologies, Your Majesty.”

Song picked up a grape. “Anyway, I’d think it was obvious what’s happening. The Oathbound are retrieving the four Greencloak relics. And funny enough, it seems that the last one has been right under my nose.” She bit delicately into the grape, smiling at its sweetness.

Meilin grimaced. Her eyes flicked to Kana. “I don’t understand. The relics are symbols of the Greencloaks. Now that you have us, why aren’t we on trial? Why chase the gifts?”

Song laughed indulgently. “Because I want them.”

Conor stepped forward. “Your Majesty, the Greencloaks didn’t murder the emperor. We’re innocent. Those people who rushed the Citadel were impostors!”

“Fakecloaks killed your father!” Rollan chimed in.

Empress Song nodded, her eyes bright with understanding. “Of course they did.” She popped another grape into her mouth, then smiled. “I hired them to kill him.”

EMPRESS SONG

MEILIN STARED AT SONG. HAD SHE HEARD HER correctly?
Song had ordered her own father's death?

"That ... that can't be," she said. Song was a sweet-natured, quiet girl. She'd been devastated by the emperor's death. No, Song couldn't do anything like that. She was a sensible, obedient daughter, even in the face of the emperor's sternness.

Wasn't she?

Yet as Meilin watched Song, there was a hardness to her expression, a ruthlessness even. Meilin recognized it easily; she saw the same rebellious light in her own eyes whenever she gazed into a mirror.

Meilin had also been brought up to be a sensible, obedient daughter, and look where she was now. Look at the friends she had. The shepherd, the huntress, and the scoundrel. Hardly the right sort of company for a noble lady of Zhong.

The Oathbound gathered around Song. Kana whispered while Song looked curiously toward Cordelia, who still dripped with seaweed.

So these were the people Song had put her trust in.

Meilin stepped forward. "You planned this from the very beginning?"

Song patted Kana's shoulder. "Longer than you imagine. Kana and I have been friends since childhood. She understands me." The empress paused as she looked back at Meilin. "Just as you and I understand each other."

"What do you mean?"

“We’re the same, Meilin. My father was cruel and uncompromising. He held me back, just because I was a girl. Can you honestly say it was different for you?”

“I ... I don’t know what you mean.”

Song glowered. “Don’t lie, Meilin. Not to me. We’re so alike. We’ve both had to tread strange, sometimes painful paths to reach our goals. I didn’t have the Greencloaks to carry me away from all this, to train and encourage me. I had only Kana ... and my father.”

Meilin blushed with shame. “I’m sorry. I didn’t know.”

Song nodded. “I was good at hiding my true self. We both were. Remember the day your father brought you to the palace when we were younger? We were both so stiff and demure, weren’t we? Who could have guessed at the ferocity concealed by our makeup and silks? We hid even from each other.”

There was a scuffle behind them. For a moment Meilin worried Conor had gotten into another fight with Cordelia, but he was beside her, looking just as stunned.

Instead, Oathbound soldiers dragged in three more prisoners.

The three elder Greencloaks.

Kofe shook off one of the guards as Lady Cranston and Salaman were pushed forward. Even in chains, even after the days of rough travel and rougher treatment, they stood tall and unafraid, dominating the room.

But where was the crazy old man? Last time she’d looked he’d been on Kofe’s back.

Pride swelled in Meilin’s chest, and she raised her head. She hardly knew the three, but their defiance filled her with hope.

“I am sorry that the Greencloaks are casualties in all this,” Song said. “Your order has done much good. But perhaps for Zhong to move forward, it’s best that we escape your shadow.”

“Is that why you framed us?” Abeke asked. “You could have just spoken against us at the Citadel.”

The empress shook her head sadly. She turned, drifting back to the end of the hall. “It’s nothing so grand or complicated. You just had something I wanted. Something your order would never part with peacefully. Thanks to you, Meilin, and your friends, I now have three of the Greencloaks’ relics.” Song settled back onto her throne. “But what I’ve always sought is the Dragon’s Eye.”

“To do what?” Meilin asked.

Song glanced to the open window overlooking the beach. Then she turned back toward the others. Slowly, she pulled back on the collar of her dress. A pale tattoo was curled at the base of her shoulder. There was a flash of brilliance, and then a long, green shape stretched out before the throne, wearing a simple leather collar. “I believe you’ve met my water dragon, Seaspray.”

Meilin and the others gaped.

“You—you have a spirit animal!” Meilin stammered. “How was this kept secret? And why?”

Song frowned down at the creature. “Father insisted. Ambassador Ying, the Greencloak who administered my Nectar, was sworn to secrecy on pain of death. Perhaps Father worried I’d be tempted to join the order. You must know the stories of the ancient water dragon. It’s second only to Jhi in our legends. I think Father wanted to announce such an auspicious pairing on his own terms: to claim I was the nameless hero reborn. Until, that is, he discovered the truth about my animal partner.”

Song scowled. The water dragon at her feet slowly lifted his head, blinked, and then drooped again, curling lazily into a ball. “Pathetic, isn’t he?”

“No spirit animal is pathetic,” Meilin replied hotly. “You’re lucky to have one and should remember that.”

Song wasn’t listening. “No matter what I did, our bond never produced the power or majesty of the ancient hero’s. Father always told me the daughter of an emperor should have a greater creature. Something worthy of her status. Not an overgrown lizard who cares about nothing but basking in the sun.”

Song took a deep breath, only just maintaining her composure. “But with the Dragon’s Eye, I can make Seaspray better. The ancient water dragon could command the sea. Now that would be power worthy of an empress, don’t you think?”

Rollan spoke. “Control the sea? Why? To catch bigger fish?”

Song’s eyes sparkled. “Of a sort.”

Meilin racked her memory for legends of the mythic warrior and his water dragon. They were little more than fairy tales, but she’d been told them all when she was little. There were great adventures, the warrior riding on the back of his beast. They dined under the sea and towed ships through storms and ...

... raised tsunamis to destroy their enemies.

One had wiped out an army of evil giants, covering the battlefield with waves over a hundred feet tall. Meilin's nanny had laughed at such a ridiculous tale—there were no such things as giants. Yet all legends grew from a kernel of truth.

But creating a tsunami? Was that even possible?

Was the Dragon's Eye that powerful?

"I must thank you for getting me three of the relics," said Song, bringing her attention back to them. "The crown, the jewel, and the sword will all help consolidate my rule. And once I have the Dragon's Eye, my position as empress will be unassailable."

Rollan folded his arms. "If you think we're going to help you get it, then you're insane."

"Not you." Song pointed at the three other prisoners. "They'll get it for me. Won't you?"

Kofe grunted. "We don't make deals with usurpers."

Song flinched. Then she forced a crooked smile onto her lips. She gestured to one of her Oathbound soldiers. "Throw the scrawny one out the window."

"Hey!" yelled Rollan as the soldier grabbed him around the waist.

Meilin tried to jump forward, but her legs were knocked from under her by another Oathbound. He stood over her, a spear pointed over her heart.

Rollan fought hard. He kicked and bit and pulled at his captor, but the soldier shrugged off his attacks with little effort. The window was full height, and wide open. They were a hundred feet above the sea and the jagged rocks that lay at the foot of the cliffs.

The soldier lifted Rollan high over his head.

"Your spirit animal is Essix, isn't she?" Song said. "It's a shame she never taught you to fly."

She nodded at the Oathbound.

"We'll do it!" shouted Kofe. "Put the boy down."

Meilin held her breath. She'd never imagine Song could be so evil. This girl before her was a stranger, nothing like the princess Meilin thought she'd know.

The soldier still had Rollan overhead. A draft pulled hungrily from the window, as if trying to tempt the guard.

Song gestured to the floor. "Put the boy down."

The Oathbound dropped Rollan heavily to the marble floor.

Meilin was beside him in an instant. She took hold of him and brought him to his feet.

He gave her that smirk that she knew too well. His dark brown hair had grown long the last few weeks and hung over the side of one eye. She brushed it aside. “Are you all right?”

His eyes glistened as they met hers. “I am now.”

Song gave a mocking snort. “How very touching. The noble and the peasant. Honestly, Meilin, I thought you had taste.”

Face pale, Rollan gazed at Song with pure hatred. Meilin feared he would attack her, despite the plentiful guards. But then he looked over at Kofe. “I’m sorry.”

The big man merely shrugged. “Greencloaks look after one another. No need to be sorry about that.”

Meilin frowned at Song. “If the Dragon’s Eye is here, why don’t you send the Oathbound to get it? They’re your allies, after all.”

Meilin saw Sid go pale. Even Cordelia looked hesitant. Kana and Song exchanged a look that seemed to communicate something, though Meilin couldn’t interpret what it was. Kana gave a small shake of her head.

It dawned on Meilin then. The princess knew the whereabouts of the Eye, so why didn’t she already have it?

Meilin snorted with contempt. “I see. Your allies are afraid. That’s what happens when you have to buy loyalty, Song, rather than earn it.”

Song rolled her eyes. “Let me stop you there, before you embarrass yourself by prattling on about things you don’t understand. The Oathbound may be mercenaries, but Kana and I have been friends since we were young children. We dreamed and planned for this day together. Why waste any more of my own forces on this? Especially when victory is so close.”

Song’s expression was smug, but by the way she’d said “any more,” Meilin suspected the empress wasn’t being truthful.

Then it struck her. Song had tried the Oathbound, but they’d failed.

That was why she was using the Greencloaks. Kofe, Lady Cranston, and Salaman were exceptional. After all, they were senior Greencloaks. If anyone could retrieve the Dragon’s Eye—hidden by the very first Greencloak himself—it would be them.

Meilin just hoped the three could buy enough time doing it. Every moment the Eye remained out of Song’s hands was another moment for Essix to summon aid. It seemed to be the only hope they had.

Fly fast, Essix.

“It seems you’ve planned everything,” said Abeke. “Yet you won’t succeed.”

Song laughed. “Oh, and tell me why. Please, I’m fascinated.”

Abeke looked to the three Oathbound. “One is measured by the company she keeps. And you, Song, keep very poor company.”

Song’s jaw tensed. Meilin wondered if Abeke’s words had pushed the usurper too far.

But the empress forced herself to relax. “Yet here I sit upon the throne. And there you are.”

The Oathbound gathered around Meilin and her friends. She took hold of Rollan’s hand.

Song nodded to Kana. “Lock them up somewhere deep and dark.”

CHIEF UGO

“BRING ME MY ROBE,” SONG ORDERED. “THEN TELL THE Niloan delegation to enter.”

Two servants helped her put on the yellow imperial cloak. They draped the long sleeves to hang down to the floor and carefully fastened its golden clasps up to her neck.

The collar choked her, but Song couldn't, wouldn't alter it. This was what the ruler of Zhong wore.

The robe was heavy, cumbersome, and hot. How had her father been able to wear it all day long? She felt as if it would crush her.

“The crown. Quickly.”

The servants lowered it very carefully onto her brow. Song made sure she kept her head still and her neck straight. The first time she'd put the crown on, it had fallen off with a spectacular clamor. The looks of horror on the nobles who'd been present had been crushing.

An ill-omened start to her rule.

Song settled herself onto the throne.

Her father's throne.

She shifted, trying to get comfortable. This didn't suit her, either.

He'd made it look so easy.

Her heart fluttered. It wasn't pain, not quite, but it hurt. Her father had been so accomplished at everything, it seemed to her. But she'd struggled at it all. At all the courtly arts. She'd seen the looks of disappointment, brief at first, but longer as she grew older, the shakes of his head when she'd not measured up to his impossible ideal. She'd hid her tears from him, knowing they'd only confirm his belief that she was a failure. Only Kana had witnessed those.

She'd wanted him to be proud of her, just once.

Song pressed her hand upon the carved armrest of the throne. Her throne.

"Are you proud now, Father?"

Kana turned to her. "Did you say something?"

Song didn't dare shake her head; the crown would fall off. Instead she smiled at her friend. Her only friend. "I don't know what I'd do without you, Kana."

Kana touched her hand. "We're in this together, Song. As always."

The Niloan delegation was unexpected. Their ship had arrived last night. Song had tried to delay seeing them until she could get her hands on the Dragon's Eye, but the delegation was growing impatient.

Once she had the Eye, Song would have it added to the front of the crown. Then everyone would immediately see how powerful a ruler she was.

Greater than her father.

Brunhild the Merry, Song's Oathbound attendant, leaned close to her side. The woman was as dour as her ironically chipper title might suggest, but Kana had assigned her especially before enacting their plan to frame the Greencloaks. Whatever Brunhild lacked in personality, she was watchful and competent. "Chief Ugo is a cousin to the High Chieftain," Brunhild whispered. "He is here to demand—"

"Demand? No one demands anything of me," snapped Song. "I am the Empress of Zhong."

"Of course you are." Brunhild cleared her throat. "He's here to request leniency for the Greencloaks. It appears he and Olvan were friends in their youth. Old loyalties are hardest to break."

"Impossible. The Greencloaks are criminals. Olvan the worst of all."

Song met the Oathbound woman's gaze unflinchingly. Brunhild had played her part in the lie regarding the emperor's death, and had even worked behind the scenes to create Kana's false history, transforming her into "Anka" and allowing her to infiltrate the Greencloaks.

If the true story of their plotting ever emerged, it wouldn't just be Song whose life was destroyed. The Oathbound would go down with her.

The doors opened and the Niloan diplomats entered.

Chief Ugo was a giant. He stood a head taller than even Brunhild. He wore flowing robes of blue and yellow, and his massive arms were encircled with gold bands. A necklace of lapis lazuli wrapped his immensely thick neck.

Song could see how he'd been friends with Olvan. They had the same presence, a mixture of physical power and charisma.

She sat a little straighter.

Behind the chief were three others, his advisers. One she recognized: a trade minister who'd regularly visited her father. The other two—a tall man and an elegantly dressed woman—she knew nothing about.

None looked happy.

Chief Ugo stopped a few feet in front of the throne and gave a curt, shallow nod. Hardly the bow that was customary when greeting the empress of a major nation.

Song bit her tongue, even as she glanced at Brunhild. She could order Ugo to his knees, if she wanted.

"We are not used to being kept waiting," snapped Ugo.

"Kingdoms do not run themselves," replied Song. "I was busy. What do you want, Chief Ugo?"

He didn't answer immediately. Instead he cast his gaze across the assembled throng of Oathbound guards, a mild sneer of contempt on his lips. "I see you keep a very different court than your father's."

"My father's court was old and useless. Zhong needs new ideas."

"Perhaps ..." His eyes locked on Kana, watching blankly from the far corner of the space. "But the Oathbound were never meant to serve as a government. Nilo is grateful for their help in protecting the High Chieftain, but they're soldiers. We are now in peacetime."

"These are my most loyal allies," said Song.

"These mercenaries?" said Ugo. "I see you have Cordelia the Kind among your court."

Cordelia bowed with a mocking smile. "I'm honored you know of me."

"Don't be. I've heard much of your kindness as you tracked the Heroes of Erdas across Eura. Villages burned. Lives ruined."

Song gritted her teeth. "You traveled a long way just to deliver insults, Chief Ugo."

"I did not expect to have to address murderers when I arrived at the palace."

Cordelia unsheathed Wildcat's Claw in a flash. "What did you say?"

Ugo's gaze went cold. "You heard me."

He pulled back his sleeve, and a beast thundered into existence with a crack of light. A rhinoceros snorted, standing between him and the deadly Oathbound warrior.

Song's heart hammered as she clutched the throne's armrest.

The beast beat its hoof on the marble floor and the room shook. Its horn was over two feet in length, and the tip appeared as sharp as any dagger. Song imagined the horrific injuries it could inflict.

Sid shuffled away from Cordelia, as did Wikam the Just, giving a little whimper. Beside Song, Brunhild placed her hand on the hilt of her sword.

Song took a deep breath and stood. "Please, my friends. We seem to have gotten off on the wrong foot. Ugo is right. We are finally a world at peace. We're all allies here. Cordelia, put the sword away."

Cordelia's eyes blazed as fiercely as the flames on her blade, but she sheathed it.

Chief Ugo walked to the rhino. The animal's tiny ears twitched as he patted its forehead. He whispered something and the rhino struck the floor hard, cracking it. Then it disappeared with a second flash. Ugo brushed his hand over the image of the beast, now transplanted onto his forearm. He swept around to face Song. "I came to speak on behalf of the Greencloaks—to argue for clemency. I know Olvan to be a good man, and I don't believe he was involved in the assassination of your father. The High Chieftain allowed me to come to you and plead my case." The man narrowed his eyes. "That was what I came to do, until I discovered you were holding Greencloaks here—including the young Heroes of Erdas! Why haven't you mentioned this to the other nations? The Heroes should be with their own in Greenhaven."

"The Greencloaks murdered my father." Song's face turned red with anger. "How dare you—"

"They are entitled to a fair and open trial before all the nations. I'll be returning to my home tomorrow to tell the High Chieftain of what I've learned here. I will expect word that the Greencloaks have been released to Greenhaven by the time I arrive."

"Or what?" snapped Song.

Chief Ugo didn't answer. With one last, contemptuous glance at the Oathbound he swept around and left, his companions following. Two Oathbound guards closed the doors behind them.

Song hurled her crown at the door, where it shattered into several shimmering, delicate pieces. “How dare he? Doesn’t he know who I am?”

All around the room, the Oathbound looked nervous. They refused to meet her gaze. This only made Song angrier. They all owed her everything!

She turned her attention to Kana, motioning her toward the throne. Song could count on Kana, at least. The young woman strode forward. Her chameleon must have been in its passive form, because the leader of the Oathbound was fully visible.

“Please, my friend,” Song whispered as she arrived. “Deal with this troublesome chieftain.”

“How, Empress?”

Song paused. “You know how,” she said finally. “Make my problem disappear. Make it look like Greencloaks if you have to.”

Kana glanced around the court, then leaned forward, right up to Song. “That would be unwise, Song. Few Greencloaks remain at large. People may grow suspicious ... and they might turn their gaze to us.”

Song’s own gaze darkened. “I see. Perhaps you are right.”

So even Kana defies me.

“Then I will deal with Chief Ugo myself,” said Song. “Once I have the Dragon’s Eye.”

“What do you mean?”

Song didn’t answer her. Instead she strode across the long chamber to pick up the pieces of her crown. The thing was well beyond repair. “The Dragon’s Eye gives command over the sea,” she called back across the room. “It would be a shame if the chief’s ship sank on its journey home, wouldn’t it?”

Cordelia laughed. “I don’t think rhinos swim very well.”

Standing at the throne, Kana didn’t look so happy. “Be careful, Song. Nilo is powerful. You need to be more cautious about which enemies you make.”

“Cautious? If I’d been cautious we wouldn’t be here. I’d be in my chambers, playing with dolls, and you’d be on the beach, guarding it from seagulls.” Song took a deep breath, then bounced across the room, back to her throne. She took Kana’s hand. “I’m sorry, my friend. I spoke in haste. Your prudence is right, of course. Just as it’s always been.

Arrange for more food and drink for our Niloan guests. Make them comfortable.”

“And what about Chief Ugo’s request?”

Song tossed the pieces of crown aside. “It’s a long journey back to Nilo,” she said. “Much can happen in that time.”

ONE HOUR

“THIS IS EVEN WORSE THAN THE SHIP,” SAID ABEKE. “I didn’t think that was possible.” She squatted by the small grille at the back of the cell, watching the sun set over the sea.

They’d been down here all day.

Conor sighed. “Some heroes we turned out to be.”

Abeke continued to gaze out west. Seagulls circled over the surf, but she was searching for a falcon. When would Essix return? And what aid would she bring?

Far across that expanse was Greenhaven. Abeke feared what Song was planning for it, if she got her hands on the Dragon’s Eye. Meilin had told them about the ancient hero and his bonded water dragon—the stories of what they’d been capable of. If Song achieved only half the feats mentioned in the legends, then they were in deep trouble.

A small boat drifted along the bottom of the cliffs. Abeke could just make out a single rower—a fisherman, she supposed—struggling to keep his boat off the rocks. He was fighting hard and was clearly no sailor. She winced as one wave almost tilted the vessel over. Seagulls swooped over him, hoping to steal some of his catch.

What was he doing this late in the evening? He didn’t have a lantern. He was too clumsy to be a smuggler. Abeke shook her head as he disappeared into the dark shadows of the cliffs.

She hoped he was a good swimmer.

“Someone’s coming,” warned Rollan.

Armored footsteps stopped at the iron-bound cell door. Keys rattled and the hinges groaned.

Brunhild glowered at them. She gestured with her sword. “Out. All of you.”

Abeke narrowed her eyes. “Why?”

The woman pressed her lips together.

Conor shrugged and went to the door. “She did ask nicely, Abeke.”

More Oathbound soldiers waited outside the cell. Abeke and the others were pushed along, and down. And down ... and down. The narrow, spiraling stairs seemed to go on forever. The deeper they got, the more Abeke was overwhelmed by the smell of fetid, damp air. Sickly green moss matted the dripping walls.

Eventually the stairs ended, and they passed through a roughly hewn tunnel and entered a large, irregular cave.

Song stood nearby, with more Oathbound beside her. To her right, Wikam the Just sneered as the Greencloaks entered. He was holding some kind of small box, covered in thick burlap. His vulture spirit animal was perched heavily on his shoulder, though the Oathbound didn't seem to even notice the weight.

“You took your time,” Song said.

“We were busy,” answered Rollan. “These games of ‘I Spy’ can get pretty intense.”

How deep were they? Abeke wondered. Water dripped from above and pooled on the uneven floor.

The cavern appeared to be naturally formed. Abeke could just about hear the sound of the surf somewhere on the other side of the rock. Seawater seeped through the cracks, and large puddles lay over the uneven stone. Apart from the stairs there was one other exit, a large, circular door almost twenty feet in diameter.

She'd never seen a door like it. Hundreds of animals covered it, all inlaid in precious metals and mother-of-pearl. Their eyes were gemstones, and their teeth and claws ivory.

It looked as if the entire wildlife of Erdas had been trapped upon the door. Tigers, elephants, swallows, and sharks—and every creature that flew, swam, crawled, or walked. They overlapped, merging together and then breaking apart. The wavering lantern light added to the sense of movement, as if the menagerie would burst to life any moment.

“What do you want?” asked Abeke suspiciously.

Song walked up to the door. “What do you think? The Dragon’s Eye.”
“You sent Kofe and the others to get it.”

Song hesitated. A worried look flashed across her face. “They’re not back.”

Rollan laughed. “Maybe they found it and escaped. They could be a hundred miles from here by now.”

Abeke doubted that was true, despite her fervent hopes. She looked back at the ornate door. It radiated danger.

A few of the soldiers carried in extra weapons and deposited them in a pile. Abeke glanced at Meilin, who seemed to understand where this was going.

Abeke folded her arms. “We’re not going to get it for you.”

Song met her gaze. “Shouldn’t you discuss it with your friends first?”

“I don’t need to.”

“I could offer you anything you want.”

“What we want is for you to go to prison for your crimes. For a long, long time.”

“Or forever,” added Conor. “Forever also works.”

Song scowled. “What about your freedom? You get me the Eye, and I’ll put you on a ship home. I promise.”

“How can we trust the word of someone who kills her own family?” asked Abeke. “And where would we be safe, knowing what we know?”

“You’re making things difficult, Abeke.”

“Good.”

Song shook her head. “I suspected as much. But this might motivate you. A little present from Wikam’s vulture.”

“No!” Rollan gasped from behind Abeke as Wikam pulled back on the burlap covering to reveal an iron cage.

Essix shrieked from within. The cage was so small that she couldn’t open her wings. The gyrfalcon knocked at the bars in fury.

Rollan jumped forward, pulling down on his collar. “Essix, go into passive sta—!” Before he could finish, Brunhild knocked him to the ground with a hard slap.

Song nodded to Wikam, who scurried quickly out of the cavern.

Rollan pushed himself back up, his eyes burning with hatred. “Let Essix go!” he yelled.

A cruel smile twitched on Song’s lips. “Oh, I will. If you do as I say.”

Abeke glared at her. “How do we know you’ll keep your word?”

“You don’t. But if you refuse me, I’ll have Essix’s cage weighted down and thrown from the cliff top into the sea. I’ll even let you watch. If she isn’t smashed into a pile of bloody feathers upon the rocks, then ... well, let’s hope she can hold her breath for a long, long time.” The empress’s pretty gaze flashed to Conor. “Or forever.”

Rollan groaned in despair.

What could they do? Abeke looked at Rollan, at his pure misery. Her heart broke to see his pain. She would feel the same if they had Uraza in a cage.

Abeke turned to her friends.

They knew each other so well by now; there was no need to speak. Each would sacrifice their life for the other.

If Essix died, they might as well rip out Rollan’s heart. Abeke couldn’t let that happen.

She glanced back to the cavern door, where she saw the air begin to shimmer. Kana, Abeke realized, just as the Oathbound leader bled into view. Kana watched the team impassively, leaning beside the enormous door. Toey, her chameleon, crawled slowly across her shoulder.

“You won’t get away with this,” said Abeke.

Abeke had been looking at Kana when she spoke, but it was Song who answered. The empress looked surprised. “Oh? I think I just have. Gather your weapons.”

Rollan stared at the empress. “If anything happens to Essix, I’ll make you—”

“Please, no more melodrama,” interrupted Song. “Just get on with it.”

It took four soldiers to pull open the door. Immediately Abeke was struck by a hot, scorching wind.

Kana held up a tall candle, carved with even lines to mark the time. “You have an hour. I wouldn’t try to escape. If you’re not back with the Dragon’s Eye, Essix goes for a swim.” She winked. “Good luck.”

Rollan gritted his teeth, trapping his rage.

Abeke gathered a bow and a quiver of arrows. She walked through the door. Her three friends, now also armed, followed just behind.

The tunnel ahead was dark.

“Remember—one hour,” warned Song.

Then the door was pushed closed behind them.

FIRE

CONOR TOOK A FEW MOMENTS TO GET USED TO THE darkness. The tunnel glowed faintly, with a greenish hue. He inspected the walls and picked off a handful of moss. It radiated a weak light, much like the glow of the sea at night.

“It’s like being in Sadre again,” Conor murmured. “How fun,” he added with a sigh.

The others were all crowded around him. Abeke carried a bow, Meilin a sword, and Rollan had a spear. Conor had taken a staff. It wasn’t a warrior’s weapon like his usual ax, but the weight reminded him of a shepherd’s crook. Conor felt reassured just gripping the smooth wood.

“Only one way we can go,” he said. “Forward.”

The hairs on his nape prickled.

He could see a stronger light ahead of them, and with it rose a strange, putrid smell.

“Come on, Briggan. I need some help.”

Conor ran his fingers over the mark on his forearm and his skin stung with brief heat as Briggan emerged.

The wolf shook himself vigorously, spittle flying from his black lips. He yawned, then padded up next to Conor.

Abeke joined him. “Shall I call Uraza?”

“Maybe later. I need Briggan to sniff around a bit.”

Briggan wrinkled his snout and growled.

“I know it smells bad,” Conor said, “but is it dangerous?”

“You can get poisonous gases down in mines,” suggested Meilin. “You’re worried it’s something similar?”

“That’s what I want to find out,” said Conor. “Kofe and the others came this way, and it didn’t seem like much could take them down.”

“Maybe Rollan was right,” Meilin said hopefully. “Maybe they found another way out and escaped.”

Conor looked over at her. “Is that what you think?”

“No,” she replied in a small voice.

They marched on for a hundred yards or so. It wasn’t easy to judge distance in the dark. The tunnel was naturally eroded, so it was crooked and fractured in places, leaving deep cracks within the walls and broken rocks underfoot. Stalactites large and small hung down from the curved roof. Small rivulets of seawater dribbled between the cracks. The putrid smell grew stronger as the tunnel opened up.

And there was something else, the smell of burning.

Was it mine gas? Back in Eura, miners took canaries down with them when they descended below the earth. The little birds would be the first to perish if poisonous gas leaked into the mines. Many deadly gases were undetectable to humans, but if the canary died, then the miners knew to evacuate to safety.

As a boy, Conor had always felt sad for the little birds. Without them, however, the humans had no way of surviving. But Briggan’s nose was more sensitive than any human’s—and so was Conor’s when he had his wolf with him.

The air stung his nostrils and made his eyes water, but otherwise it didn’t seem to hurt him.

They reached the mouth of a chamber. This space, too, had formed naturally, but craftsmen had worked it into something roughly cubic. On the far end, forty or so feet away, was an opening leading farther in.

Above the entrance to the chamber was a steel plaque, bearing a symbol of a flame.

“Strange,” said Meilin.

Conor sniffed. The putrid smell swamped the air.

Briggan barked, and then the breath left Conor’s lungs in a rush.

There was a body lying within the cavern.

Rollan gasped. “It’s Salaman.”

The Greencloak’s body was burned. His cloak, or what was left of it, was black with soot. A strong smell of smoke lingered within the chamber.

“We’ve got to get him,” said Rollan. He took a step forward.

“Wait,” said Conor. “Did you see the marks on him? He’s been badly scorched.”

There were no fires that Conor could make out, but the walls themselves were sooty.

“There’s a trap in here,” he said. “But I can’t see it.”

What had killed the Greencloak?

Conor was sure the smell was part of the danger. The odor irritated his nostrils and the back of his throat. Its rottenness reminded him of ... what?

A swamp. It was the same earthy, decaying odor. Swamps trapped things: fallen trees, wayward sheep. There’d been that one time, way back, when he and his father had tracked down a lamb missing from the herd. They’d found it struggling in the mud, and the air had the same smell. His father had waded in to get it, then showed him a trick with the tinderbox. He’d lit a bit of char cloth with their flint and fire steel, and then ...

“The air catches fire,” said Conor, remembering the burst of gas as his father had thrown the char cloth over the patch. It had popped loudly and created a ball of fire, lasting only a second or two, but enough to singe his eyebrows.

Conor ran his fingers through Briggan’s thick fur. “I think it would be safer if you rested on my arm.”

The wolf sniffed the air one more time, then licked Conor’s palm. A second later he was gone, and the mark was back on Conor’s forearm.

“Look at the floor,” said Meilin.

Metal tiles covered the floor. Most were rusty and badly arranged, corners jammed in at awkward angles and wedged tightly against each other.

Rollan snorted. “Whoever fitted those must have been breathing too many cave fumes.”

Conor wasn’t so sure. “Get behind me.”

He took a step back, then, using his staff, pressed down on the nearest tile.

It depressed, the edges scraping together.

He drew the staff back. “The tiles are on springs. You step on them and they’ll move.”

“So?” asked Abeke.

Conor rubbed the edges of his hands together. “Steel on steel, Abeke. It makes sparks.”

Meilin gasped. “Igniting the gas.”

“We could climb around the edge,” suggested Rollan, squinting at the room’s borders.

“See those soot marks?” Conor had wondered the same thing. “That’s what previous people have tried. If you slip, you hit the tiles hard, guaranteeing a spark.”

Meilin put her hands on her hips. “Rope would be useful.”

Conor had to agree. But they didn’t have any.

The cavern was too wide to jump. The walls were too treacherous to climb. Conor reckoned there were about fifty paces across, fifty tiles. Running wouldn’t work—the impact would strike sparks—and even moving slowly was dangerous. The rusty edges of the old tiles might light up with even a small amount of weight.

“Where does the gas come from?” asked Abeke, getting down on her knees to look under the misaligned tiles. “I think I can see vents in the rock.”

Conor nodded. “It’s like a bog. Organic matter rots in some cavern below; the gas seeps upward and gets trapped here, waiting to be set off.”

Abeke looked at the walls. “The cave is covered in that moss. Salaman must have climbed around, but lost his grip.”

Meilin threw up her hands. “Then we’re stuck!”

“No, we’re not,” said Conor.

“Then how do we get across without igniting the gas?”

“We don’t.” Conor grinned. “We set off the explosion.”

“That’s insane” was Meilin’s reply.

“Maybe, but think about it. The gas isn’t endless. It’s made from rotting material. That takes time. If we set off one big explosion, then we can easily cross before the gas refills the chamber.”

Conor thought it must have worked for the previous group of Greencloaks. They’d tried climbing around, but Salaman had fallen, setting off a burst. Then, as the gas had begun to pour back into the chamber, Kofe and Lady Cranston must have sprinted the rest of the way across.

Meilin didn’t look convinced. “How long?”

Conor shook his head. “No idea. But that’s what makes it exciting?”
“That’s not the word I’d use.”

Conor searched around the entrance until he found a large rock crammed between fissures in the cave. “Give me a hand with this.”

Together, the Greencloaks were able to pry the stone free from the cave wall. With all four holding a corner, they carried it to the edge of the chamber and dropped it down.

The tunnel itself was irregular, with many nooks where the rock jutted out crookedly. Conor pointed at a particularly large stone outcrop. “Once we toss the rock, let’s take cover behind that, okay? When the first explosion has passed, we need to be quick. No hanging around—just over to the other tunnel as quickly as possible.”

Meilin still didn’t look convinced, but they were running out of time. How much of the hour candle had already diminished while they’d been chatting here?

Conor and the others lifted the rock up and shuffled to the edge of the opening. “On the count of three,” said Conor. They swung it back. “One ...”

The second swing was wider than the first. Conor felt as if his arms were being pulled out of their sockets. “Two ...”

The final swing was the widest yet. “Three!”

With four great cries, they hurled the rock as far as they could.

It crashed upon a circle of tiles and instantly the sparks flew. The explosion was quicker than Conor had expected. The area around the rock burst into flame and the chamber itself rumbled as the surrounding gas ignited.

“Take cover!” Conor yelled. The Greencloaks turned and fled back down the tunnel as the whole chamber filled with heat and flame.

Conor came last, and the final burst tore him off his feet. He tumbled over the stony floor as a sheet of flame passed over him, caressing the top of his shoulders with pain.

The air hissed and stank as the flames died down.

Before he even had a chance to get his bearings, Abeke pulled him up. “Now, Conor!”

Conor shook away the confusion and pain. He’d have time to suffer later. They needed to cross the chamber now.

The putrid smell was gone, proof the gas had been used up. Meilin and Rollan were already a few paces ahead, racing across the tiles. The metal squares creaked and sparked, but did nothing more. There were a few pockets of flame in the chamber's uneven corners, however, where the gas still lingered. The air scorched and the tiles simmered with heat that Conor felt through his boots.

He reached the room's midway point. Meilin and Rollan dove through the far exit. They then turned and shouted encouragement. Abeke was ahead of him, leaping so lightly that the tiles hardly moved.

Conor stepped hard on a particularly rusty tile. The spring beneath the tile snapped, and he plummeted about six inches, tearing the skin off his shins before hitting the stone ground beneath.

The thick, stinking odor was returning. Conor tried to get up, but one step and he cried out in pain. He'd sprained his ankle badly.

"Come on, Conor!" yelled Abeke, now beside their friends at the chamber's exit.

Conor hopped forward. With his whole weight on one foot, the tile he landed on dipped and cracked out a shower of sparks. Small flames flicked between the metal sheets.

The explosive gas was refilling the chamber far quicker than he'd thought.

He hopped from tile to tile, dragging his sprained foot along. Each landing generated more sparks, and the flames grew thicker and lasted longer. His trouser cuffs caught alight.

"Run, Conor!" shouted Rollan.

Conor focused on his friends, all shouting and waving at him. He jumped along, ignoring the fires now rising all around him. The air began to hiss and pop. He was only a few yards away!

He dove, throwing himself the final distance into his friends' arms. The impact knocked all four of them backward with a thump.

Conor lay there, gasping. He felt a dull ache in his ankle and knew it would soon intensify into pure pain. But right now he was alive and that was what mattered. He sighed with great, great relief.

Conor rolled over onto his back. When he opened his eyes there was Meilin, grinning at him.

"Well, you were right!" she said. "That was exciting!"

SWARM

ROLLAN COULDN'T GET ESSIX OUT OF HIS MIND. THE image of his falcon trapped in that hideous cage was like a knife through his chest.

How could Song—how could anyone with a spirit animal themselves—do that?

Anger threatened to overwhelm him. It had taken all his willpower to stop himself from charging the guards the moment Essix had been revealed.

It would have been suicide, but at least it would have been something. Instead they'd agreed to this ordeal, which seemed just as suicidal.

Rollan's clothes stank of smoke, and he was sure half his eyebrows were gone from that first explosion. So what was next?

He didn't care. He'd get through it, get through all the dangers. He would save Essix.

Jhi was tending Conor's bleeding leg. The panda had licked it clean and the tear was now closed. Using Meilin as support, Conor tested his weight on the twisted ankle. The grimace of pain wasn't exactly encouraging.

Meilin took out her sword and sliced up her cloak. "We need to knot it up tightly. By locking it rigid, you'll at least be able to walk."

Conor frowned. "The first test and we're already handicapped."

"Hey, we're still all here," said Rollan. "I bet the rest will be easy."

"Really?" Meilin arched an eyebrow.

"No. Probably perilous to the extreme, but you have to keep being positive, don't you?"

“You are truly impossible, Rollan.”

He grinned at her. “And that’s why you like me.”

He laughed as she blushed, and Conor rolled his eyes. “I’m in quite a lot of pain, so can we save the romantic banter for later? If there is a later.”

Rollan saluted. “Yes, sir.”

A mournful wind blew down the tunnel. Air whistled through narrow cracks, and the farther they went, the stronger the gusts became.

Abeke was up ahead and she raised her hand. “Our next deadly danger is here.”

Rollan stepped beside her. “Well. That’s quite a drop.”

The cavern opened into a shaft, a wide one. Above them hung hundreds of stalactites of all shapes and sizes. Far below were their stalagmite siblings, looking unpleasantly spear-sharp.

The gap between this side and the tunnel opening on the next had to be more than a hundred feet. The wind roared up through this strange, natural chimney. There was only one way across, and it made Rollan’s heart sink.

Suspended above the spikes were a series of chains, arranged in pairs, with short wooden handles.

Five trapezes. The only way across was to swing from one to the other, five times.

The chains creaked in the wind. The nearest was a good ten feet away from them.

“Are those ... bones down there?” asked Conor.

He was right. Even from this high up, Rollan saw the rotten clothes and shattered skeletons of those who’d tried crossing before them.

He shook his head. “Even the best acrobat in the world couldn’t do it.”

“We have to try,” insisted Conor.

“We try and we’ll fail.” Rollan sat down on the ledge. “Wouldn’t it be easier if we just got down there and walked across? Then climbed up the other side?”

Conor leaned over. “Now that you mention it, it would.”

Rollan stood up. “Let’s do it.”

Meilin looked over at Jhi. The panda peered over the edge, then sat down.

Meilin smiled. “Yes, I know what you mean.”

She brushed Jhi's cheek and a moment later the panda was gone

Rollan paused at the ledge. "I hate to say it, but Kovo would be handy right now. He could carry us on his back all the way across, no problem."

"If he were in a good mood." Abeke was next to him, wiping her hands on her trousers. "And have you ever seen him in a good mood?"

"Fair point. More likely he'd tear us limb from limb."

Abeke rubbed her hands together. "Who goes first?"

"It was my idea." Rollan sighed. "So I suppose I'd better."

Slowly, Rollan dropped down to a lower ledge. Even before the Greencloaks, he'd been climbing for years—buildings mainly—but in the end it was simply a case of making sure you relaxed. People got scared and tired themselves out by gripping so hard their hands ached. Rollan was careful to use his legs to support his weight, rather than his arms, in order to conserve his strength.

He moved from ledge to ledge, constantly checking back to make sure the others were following him. Meilin and Conor moved carefully downward, following the same route as him, but Abeke took another path, using her flexibility and nimbleness to stretch and read the most minute holds. Soon she passed him, winking as she swung from one hold to another. The wind pulled at him, as if trying to tear him away from the stone. It hummed across the rough, rocky surface, tugging at his clothes. The air was cold and damp, and the rocks themselves were blemished with moss. Rollan avoided those—vegetation could come away—and kept his grip on the rock itself.

His toes reached the tip of a stalagmite. Rollan carefully pushed away from the wall, leaping toward the column of stone. He grabbed onto the slippery stone and slid to a nearby foothold.

"You took your time," said Abeke, squatting on a rock with her chin on both fists.

"I just wanted to enjoy the view," he replied.

She grimaced. "Some view."

The floor of the cavern was uneven, dense with the limestone spikes and wavy razor-edges of stone. Nasty.

"Look there," said Abeke. "On the ledge."

It was Lady Cranston.

Rollan shinnied sideways across a jutting stalagmite and dropped down lightly.

He leaned over. "Lady Cranston? Are you—"

Her face was swollen, covered in large red lumps. Her fingers, too, were thick and puffy. No breath emerged.

“It wasn’t the fall that killed her,” said Abeke, joining him with a single springing step.

As Rollan’s eyes got used to the gloom, he noticed something moving.

In fact, a lot of things were moving.

The others clambered onto the remains of a shattered rock nearby. Abeke scowled as she gazed below her. “What is that? The floor seems to be alive.”

It was. The ground seethed with ants. Among the stalagmites were huge mounds, homes to these creatures. They covered the floor of the cavern in their billions.

Rollan brushed some inquisitive insects off the end of his boot, but one latched on. He felt its bite even through the leather before flicking it off.

Suddenly he knew what had happened to Lady Cranston.

Rollan drew the cloak back over her face.

How many had come down here, over the many centuries? There were plenty of bones littering the bottom of the cavern. Who had these people been, once?

All for the Dragon’s Eye. He was beginning to hate the relic. Was it worth the risk?

It is, for Essix.

Conor huffed loudly. “I thought it was too easy.”

“We should have tried the chains,” said Meilin. “Better than getting eaten by these things.”

“With Uraza I might have been able to jump it,” Abeke said. “But that wouldn’t have helped the rest of you much. We’re down here now, and we need to find a way across.”

Rollan stared at Abeke. “What did you just say?”

“We need to find a way across?” she replied, puzzled.

“No, before that. About Uraza ...” Rollan glanced upward. “How far is it to the ledge? Far enough that you could release Uraza there?”

Abeke squinted. “It’s farther than I’ve ever sent her...” she said. “But I think I could make it. Why?”

Rollan held out his spear. “I have this. Conor’s got a staff. With Uraza’s help, Abeke could walk across, using these as stilts. It’s not far.”

“Stilts?” Conor didn’t look convinced. “It’s far enough.”

Rollan undid his belt and measured about three feet of spear. That would be enough to keep away from the ants. “It doesn’t matter. Give me your stick, Conor.”

If Conor wasn’t convinced, then neither was Meilin. “And what are the rest of us meant to do?”

“Ride on my back, of course!” said Abeke, brightening to the idea. “I’ll carry you over one at a time. Once I get you to the far wall, start climbing.”

Abeke stretched out over the lip of the rock she was standing on, extending her arm as far as she dared. “Here goes ...” There was a flash of brightness that illuminated the cave, revealing even more teeming ants than Rollan had realized were on the cavern floor.

Uraza appeared on the far ledge. The leopard searched the rock around her, momentarily confused to find herself alone. Then she glanced down at Abeke and the others, far below in the pit. Uraza keened nervously, stalking back and forth across the ledge.

“We’ll be there in a moment!” Abeke called up. “But I need your help, girl. Every bit of grace you can give me!”

Uraza sank to her stomach, staring hard at Abeke with her violet eyes.

“There is no way this is going to work,” said Conor. But he handed over his staff and helped Rollan tie it to Abeke’s leg. The girls lent scarves, and after a few minutes Abeke had the spear and the staff strapped to her legs. Both were tied on at two places, once at the foot and the other just below the knee.

“Knot them as tightly as you can,” Abeke instructed. “They’ve got to take the weight of two of us without me sliding down.”

“Got it,” said Conor, adding an extra knot.

Rollan double-checked with a pull. It all looked good. “Lift her up.”

The ants rippled around the base of the stilts as Abeke was tilted into the air. She swung her arms around in circles as she steadied herself.

She swayed wildly for a moment, the sticks clattering as she tried to keep standing. Rollan worried she wouldn’t be able to walk the whole distance in one go, but then with a deep breath, her footing grew steadier.

“Lightest first,” she said, still clinging to Rollan’s fingers.

Meilin shuffled closer. “I might as well get this over and done with.”

“Up onto my shoulders,” Abeke said.

“Do you think you can carry me?”

“Only one way to find out,” she replied cheerfully. Rollan didn’t need Essix’s help to see that she was trying to hide her fear.

“Nice and easy, Abeke,” said Conor. “Just get your balance first.”

Meilin settled herself, with the help of Conor.

The knots slid an inch, but held.

If he hadn’t been so terrified, Rollan would have laughed. He helped Abeke to turn around, so she was at least facing the right way. With any luck she’d stumble just far enough to drop Meilin to the ledge.

Ants crunched under each step. Rollan could see a few latch on, digging their mandibles into the hard wood.

Abeke looked as if she was sweating already, but she took a few more steps. “This must be how the rest of you feel all the time,” she joked. “I’ll never laugh at you for tripping ever again.”

“This is the stupidest thing I’ve ever done,” said Meilin, perched on her shoulders.

Rollan couldn’t disagree.

Step, stumble, trip. The stilts clacked and crunched across the floor. By moving slowly, Abeke could make it to one rock, rest against it a few moments, then push herself toward the next, zigzagging her way across.

It was working.

A cheer from Meilin announced that they’d made it. She wriggled off, accidentally kicking Uraza’s head in her scramble to get up onto the narrow ledge.

Abeke turned around.

“I might just be getting the hang of this!” Freed of the weight of another person, she crossed back to the boys in half the time. “You next, Rollan.”

Rollan nodded, took a deep breath, and climbed up. “Hope all these muscles don’t weigh you down too much.”

Trip, trip, slip, and stumble, but now that Abeke knew the route, she made quicker time. Rollan tried not to be offended that his weight didn’t seem to bother her. Sooner than last time, they were by the opposite wall. Abeke had even managed to bypass one of the stopping points.

Rollan attempted a bit more grace than Meilin had mustered while climbing the ledge. He failed. By the time he was seated beside Uraza, Abeke had already made it back to Conor.

“Come on,” she said.

Conor paused. Rollan realized that the Euran boy was probably the heaviest of all of them. With a shrug, Conor slowly climbed up.

Abeke almost collapsed. “Empty those rocks from your pockets first!”

“I haven’t got any!”

The knots slipped another inch or two.

“Then how can you be that heavy?”

Conor sniffed. “Muscle mass. Now giddy-up.”

Off they went, but with each step the knots loosened some more. Even worse, Rollan could see that the scarf on Abeke’s left foot was unraveling faster, tilting the two perilously to one side. Conor tried to compensate by clambering more onto Abeke’s right shoulder.

The weight on her neck must have been agonizing. Breath hissed between her clenched teeth, but she was going to make it.

Then Abeke screamed.

Beside Rollan, Uraza leaped to her feet, her yowl echoing throughout the cave. Abeke winced, glancing down at her shin.

“The ants!” she shouted.

They’d climbed the stilts, and the boldest were making their way up her boot. Abeke stomped down hard to try and shake them off. A few fell, but more hung tenaciously on.

Rollan’s heart leaped as he watched his friends teetering so close, but so far. Too many Greencloaks had died for him already. He couldn’t bear to see Abeke and Conor swallowed by ants for him and Essix. “Abeke, come on!” Rollan hollered, straining his hand out.

But it was too much to handle. The weakened knots, the weight of Conor, the ants. Abeke missed her next rock and the right stilt pitched hard. Suddenly both she and Conor were tilting. Conor tried to grab a nearby rock, but only brushed his fingers along it.

A hand shot past Rollan’s face, locking around Abeke’s collar. Rollan saw Meilin straining to hold their friends up as she gripped Uraza by the tail. The cords in Meilin’s neck stood out, and Uraza looked about as unhappy as he’d ever seen her, but it had bought them some time.

Rollan quickly wrapped his arms around Meilin’s waist and pulled. Together, they put every ounce of will into pulling their fellow Greencloaks out of the sea of ants.

With a terrified bellow, Conor jumped off Abeke and clawed his way onto the ledge.

Relieved of his weight, Meilin easily pulled Abeke up, even as the knots on her stilts finally frayed apart.

“The ants!” she shouted, and the three others quickly swatted them off and tossed them away. Abeke’s calves were bright red and bleeding from the small bites, but she was alive. Miraculously, they all were.

Conor grinned at her. “Nice job, pony girl.”

Uraza glared at him, rubbing her face against Abeke’s arm, but the girl merely laughed.

“Neigh!” she said.

FALLS

“WHAT IS THAT NOISE?” ASKED MEILIN. “IT SOUNDS LIKE thunder.”

Rollan paused to listen. “Underground?”

Meilin checked on her companions. Abeke was retying the bandage around Conor’s ankle. Rollan looked anxious. How much time had passed? Was it an hour, or did they still have time to get back and save Essix?

But they couldn’t go back empty-handed. They needed the Dragon’s Eye.

Then what? Meilin hated the idea of Song having her hands on something so powerful, yet she couldn’t allow Essix to be killed. It was bad choices either way.

Conor stood up and tested his weight on his injured foot. “That’s not too bad.”

Abeke agreed. “The swelling’s gone down. And nothing’s broken.”

Meilin gestured along the tunnel. “Shall we move on?”

The noise grew louder, from a thunder to a deafening roar. The tunnel itself filled with mist as they moved cautiously along. The walls and ceiling dripped moisture, collecting in puddles.

Then, foot by foot, the tunnel ended and the source of the cacophony was revealed.

Rollan gasped. “Wow.”

A waterfall roared just before them. Meilin and the others stood in a side exit, winding out from behind the fall. The tumbling wall of water cascaded down, creating the earsplitting din.

Meilin peered up, trying to find the source of all this power. “There must be a crack in the roof of this cavern. There are plenty of rivers draining out into the sea; this one’s just underground.”

Abeke balanced on the lip of the tunnel opening, looking over. “There’s a pool down below.”

That made sense. Meilin nodded. “It collects there, running off through other cracks into the sea.”

Conor hobbled up beside her. “The last challenge?”

“Let’s hope so.”

There was something else down there. Through the ever-changing sheet of water, Meilin could see there was some sort of platform far below, too neat and angular to be natural. And what was on it? A mosaic? But of what? She could just about make out two figures, both with some sort of scaled skin. One was a creature, the other a man. A scaled man?

No, it wasn’t skin but armor, the scale mail worn by Zhongese warriors from centuries past. And the creature was a water dragon—just like the one she’d seen out on the beach—but this creature was immense.

“If the Dragon’s Eye is anywhere, it’ll be here,” she said. “That’s a shrine below. Dedicated to the ancient hero who created the bond token.”

Conor brightened. “Then let’s climb down and grab it.”

“Will you mangle with that leg?”

“It’s not like I have any choice, is it?”

Meilin glanced over the edge. It was a long way down. Water trickled over the rocks, making each one slippery. She worried for Conor. For all of them, really.

Rollan was already dangling over the ledge, looking for somewhere to plant his feet. “We can’t waste time up here.” Purchase found, he started his descent. Abeke followed and then Conor, winking first. Meilin sighed and took a deep breath.

Don’t think about the distance, the drop. Take it one inch at a time.

Water sprayed over her back as she took to the rocks. It ran between her fingers and along her arms until she was soaked through—and she hadn’t even gone ten feet. Meilin didn’t look down to check the others. She needed to concentrate on footholds and handgrips on the route down.

The noise of the water tumbling past, just a few feet away, vibrated all the way through to her bones.

Meilin had always been a talented climber. Heights never really bothered her—until their encounter with the Dasat of Nilo. Now unbidden images assailed Meilin, of archers aiming at her from below. She saw rocks tumbling from above.

And worst of all, she saw herself falling: except this time there was no Heart of the Land to save her.

Meilin's fingers ached.

How much farther?

"Hey! Meilin! You all right?" shouted Conor.

"No. Not really," muttered Meilin, resting her forehead against the cliff face.

"What?"

"I'm fine!"

"It's not much farther, that's all."

She just wanted it to be over. Meilin glanced down.

Her head swam. The others were waiting on the platform, waving up at her, but it looked like miles away!

She felt as if she hadn't moved at all, imagining the ledge was just a foot above her.

But it wasn't. It was just as far above her as the ground was below. She'd frozen in the middle of the climb.

Take a moment, gather yourself, then continue.

But Meilin couldn't force herself to move. Her fingers were numb, both from the effort of gripping and the cold water washing over them. Her soaked-through clothes weighed her down, so each limb moved sluggishly.

Panic set in. Meilin's heart raced. She couldn't still her hands from shaking. It was too far.

"You can do it, Meilin!" yelled Abeke.

She wanted to shout back at them to leave her alone!

Meilin stared at her left hand, forcing it to open. One by one, her fingers unclenched and she moved to a lower hold.

That's it. One ledge at a time.

There were plenty. She stretched out a foot, first balancing on the tips of her toes, then setting down her whole foot.

There. Now—

She cried out as her foot fell away underneath her. Her grip went and suddenly Meilin was hanging on by two fingers.

Abeke screamed.

Meilin stared at her hand. Water poured over her fingers and down her arm, dripping off her soaking sleeve. She saw the cracks along the wall and wondered why she hadn't picked a better place to hold on. She gasped as the water pounded against her.

Then, with awful inevitability, she watched as her fingers slipped from the rock.

Meilin's hold failed, and she was struck by the full power of the falling river as she tumbled into the cold, dark water.

She slammed into the pool hard. The momentum of the water spun her over and over, pushing her down deeper.

Meilin fought back, but it was no use; the churning waters totally dominated her. She forced her mouth closed, so as not to gulp in a mouthful of water. She needed what little breath she had. Meilin didn't know which way was up. She couldn't see anything in the surging mass.

Then a hand grabbed her. She instinctively latched onto the thick wrist as she was pulled.

Who was it? Conor?

But her hair covered her face, and she put all her energy into kicking along.

Meilin's lungs burned. She wasn't sure how much longer she could hold on. What if Conor drowned, too?

Then she broke the surface and gasped. How sweet the air tasted! It cooled her chest as more hands took hold and pulled her fully out of the water.

Coughing and gasping, Meilin lay down on the stone. She'd never been more thankful for solid ground!

As she wiped the water from her eyes she glimpsed a large figure sitting beside her.

"Kofe?" she sputtered. "You're alive!"

"Seems so."

"Thank you," she said. "You saved me."

"Wasn't me. Not with this." He showed her his bandaged leg. Seemed Kofe had also had some trouble on the rocks. "It was him who saved you."

Confused, Meilin got to her feet. She was shivering in the chill of the cavern, but she was alive. “Him? Who?”

“Him.”

She turned around.

The figure wore ancient scaled armor, the metal shimmering brilliant green and gold. He carried a curved sword with a jade handle in an ornate sheath made of black serpent skin. His long, dripping black hair hung over half his face, but he smiled at her.

Enjoy your swim, young lady? The man spoke Zhongese, but in a dialect she didn't recognize.

“Who are you?” Meilin hacked. She was still coughing up water.

I should ask who you are, disturbing my rest.

“Rest?” Meilin asked, dazed. How was there someone living down here? It felt as if her head was full of water. If she tilted sideways, maybe it would all pour out.

“Uh ... Meilin,” Conor interrupted. He and the others were climbing into the cavern from the water, looking about as bedraggled as Meilin felt. “We can't hear anything that guy is saying. I think he's probably ...”

Meilin's mouth fell open as realization dawned.

The man smiled softly. I am Xin Kao Dai, the guardian.

“The guardian?” she asked. “Of what?”

He pulled back his hair, revealing the hidden half of his face. Of this.

Meilin gasped.

The man's left eye was a brilliant emerald.

They'd found the Dragon's Eye.

I called her Dancer Across Moonlit Waves, said the guardian, gesturing to the water dragon image at their feet. Dancer for short.

Meilin shook her head. “She must have been enormous. I've never see a water dragon so large.”

The guardian merely shrugged. We had many great adventures together. I lost my eye in one of them. Truth be told, I thought my adventuring days were over. But then we discovered the secret of bond tokens. A grateful emperor, I forget his name, had given me this jewel for saving his daughter, whose name I've also forgotten. The spirit smiled sheepishly. It seemed a fitting item to become our token. The Dragon's Eye was rather special. It not only made me more powerful, but Dancer, too.

Meilin sat cross-legged, captivated. She'd called out Jhi, and the giant panda was now wrapped around her, warming Meilin. All around her, her friends watched the spirit, while Conor helped tend to Kofe's leg.

"You said your name is Xin Kao Dai," Meilin said. "But that's the name of this city."

They named a whole city after me? How embarrassing. The spirit ducked his head humbly, but Meilin still thought he looked a bit pleased with himself.

"To be honest, your name was lost to time," Meilin said. "But the legends of you and your spirit animal have lived on. You know how to make bond tokens?"

Of course. That's something I haven't forgotten. I recorded the method, though of course it's extremely dangerous. The scroll still sits in a jade tube within my chambers.

Meilin sat up. "Please," she said, "come with us. Help us defeat Song. The Oathbound have other bond tokens, stolen from our order. We can't let her have the Eye."

My time has gone, Meilin, said the guardian sadly. Dancer swims in a distant sea, far beyond this world. I've been waiting to join her. What marvels we'll see there.

Meilin heard the longing in his voice. She knew how powerful a spirit animal bond could be—just the feeling of Jhi pressed against her filled her with reassurance. Yet the guardian talked about it with such ache that she felt tears growing. "Why haven't you joined her?"

I've been waiting. He laughed. For you, apparently. Not quite the heroes I had in mind, but the Great Panda Jhi is with you. I feel entirely happy. You will do well.

"We can't take your eye!" exclaimed Meilin. "It's, well, your eye!"

Xin Kao Dai sighed. The things I wish to see are beyond mortal sight, young lady. He stood up and faced the waterfall. We must not linger, small warrior. You have places to be, as do I.

"Yes," Meilin responded with little enthusiasm. "We've still got to get all the way back."

The guardian smiled. There is a secret route back to the entrance. It would be unfair to force you to go through the trials all over again in reverse.

“Secret route?” asked Meilin, feeling more relieved than she could have imagined. The climb down had almost done her in, and the prospect of having to climb back up had chilled her through. “Where?”

The guardian clapped once.

The sound echoed around the tall underground cavern, multiplying again and again, until it sounded from all directions. It was as if hundreds of hands were clapping, thousands even.

The water parted. It did not stop, nor lessen in power, but separated into two jets, opening up a gap right into the cliff face.

And a large doorway. Lights shone from within.

“You live there?” asked Meilin.

When there was no reply she looked around.

The guardian had vanished.

The others were just as bewildered, but Rollan stepped toward the new opening. “Essix is running out of time.”

The chamber behind the waterfall was immense. Statues lined either side of the doorway. Meilin and the others entered in solemn silence. There was a single light shining from the darkness of the roof, but Meilin couldn’t work out the light source. It shone steadily upon a throne of pure white jade.

Supported by Conor and Rollan, Kofe limped behind. He took a deep breath and let out a low whistle. “Will you look at that?”

Upon the throne sat a dusty skeleton in rusted scale armor. In one hand, the figure held a sword, in the other an ornate scroll tube.

And within the eye socket of the skull rested a glowing green gem.

The Dragon’s Eye.

THE DRAGON'S EYE

“WHERE ARE THEY?” DEMANDED SONG. “THEY’RE UP to something. I know they are.”

She shifted her attention to the hour candle. There wasn’t much of it left.

Had they failed, too?

Song spun around at the Oathbound. “You must go in and find me the Dragon’s Eye. Now. That’s an order!”

Sid shifted awkwardly. He gazed over at Kana.

“Don’t look at her,” Song snapped. “I am in charge. Do as I say.”

Kana approached. “Song, there’s still time on the candle. They may still return with the Dragon’s Eye.”

“They had better,” muttered Song.

Cordelia leaned against the cavern wall, the Wildcat’s Claw unsheathed. The Heart of the Land hung from Kana’s neck, and Sid wore the Stormspeaker crown with a look of smug satisfaction.

Song circled the chamber jealously. This plan had been her idea, and yet she was the one without a bond token. What had the Oathbound done to garner such treasures? Merely followed her orders. They had sacrificed nothing.

A sharp pain cut her heart as she thought of her father.

That had been necessary. He was a weak ruler and a merciless father. Zhong would become great again with her on the throne.

The throne ...

She didn't dare tell the others, but the nightmares were getting worse. They were coming every night now, getting stronger, more vivid, bloodier.

He would be sitting there, on the throne, covered in those awful wounds. He would just sit there, looking at her with cold, accusing eyes.

Song wanted to destroy the throne, to toss it through the window and let it sink to the bottom of the sea. It would be cathartic, but she suspected it wouldn't stop the dreams. Her father would just appear again, elsewhere. She heard his footsteps in the corridors, glimpsed him from the corner of her eye. She'd see him momentarily walking along the gardens, blood dripping on the flowers.

He could be here right now....

"I did what I had to do, don't you understand that?" she muttered.

"Song?" Kana frowned. "Did you say something?"

"Where are they?" snapped Song.

The falcon shrieked from her cage.

"Oh, shut up," Song said exasperatedly. "You're even worse than Seaspray!" Kana put her hand on Song's arm, and she flinched. She cast her gaze over at the candle. "They don't have long."

"Why so impatient? You want the Dragon's Eye, don't you?"

"What sort of question is that?" Song faced Kana. "It's my destiny to have it. I have a water dragon, just like the ancient hero. I've read the old stories of what he did, what the Eye is capable of." She smiled. "Once I have it, no one will be able to stand against me."

Kana frowned. "Don't you mean us? Remember our deal, Song. We've been planning this together. If it wasn't for the Oathbound, your father would still be emperor."

Song had to be careful. She still needed Kana and the Oathbound.

For now.

"Of course," Song said, the tension dropping from her shoulders. "I'm so sorry, Kana. Forgive my impatience. You must think I've lost my mind. It's just that victory is so close. To think the Dragon's Eye was under our noses this whole time."

She placed a hand on the Oathbound captain's shoulder. "You're my best friend. You've always been there for me, and I'll do the same for you. But to make all our dreams come true, we'll need the Dragon's Eye."

Kana's eyes narrowed. "What can it do, exactly?"

“It’ll help us destroy our enemies once and for all. Starting with the wretched Greencloaks.”

Kana shook her head. “I don’t understand. The Greencloaks are already defeated. How will this destroy them?”

“The Dragon’s Eye gives you power over the sea, Kana. Can you imagine? The stories tell us that—”

“They’re just stories, Song. Probably exaggerated a hundredfold over the years. The bond tokens are powerful, but not that powerful.”

“Yours might not be. But the Dragon’s Eye is the most powerful of them all. And it was forged from a bond with a water dragon, just like mine. The ugly lizard might end up being useful for something at last.”

Kana looked at her worriedly. “You’ve won, Song. Once we have all the bond tokens, we need to consolidate your position, not seek out more enemies.”

“I have only ‘won’ when I’ve destroyed all my enemies,” Song replied. Was Kana going soft? Perhaps Cordelia should lead the Oathbound.

Sid coughed loudly. “The candle’s gone out.”

So it had.

“Get the cage, Sid,” Song ordered.

Sid looked over at Kana. Again.

Song gritted her teeth. “Didn’t you hear me?”

Kana gave a slight nod and Sid picked up the cage. Essix flapped her wings against the bars; she knew she was in danger.

A Great Beast? Well, they’d find out how “great” she was when they threw her into the sea.

Perhaps it was for the best that Meilin had failed. Ever since the defeat of the Devourer, Song had followed the successes of the young Heroes of Erdas, marveling at how a group of children could achieve so much in so short a time.

If she was honest, Song had been a little afraid of the young Greencloaks. When she’d first learned of them—how they’d visited the Great Beasts and collected their talismans—she’d thought the stories merely that: stories. Then they’d defeated the Devourer and there was no denying their abilities.

Was that when Song had first thought about her own ambitions? She was the daughter of the Emperor of Zhong. She should be greater than Meilin, yet it was the younger girl whose fame covered Erdas from Amaya to Stetriol. Hers and the others': Abeke, Rollan, and Conor.

How could a mere servant and shepherd be more renowned than Song?

But their story had ended today.

"Take the bird to the cliff top," she ordered. "Then throw her into the sea."

"You will hand her back to me, right now."

Rollan stood in the cavern doorway, arms folded across his chest. Meilin, Abeke, Conor, and even the elder Greencloak Kofe were beside him, all alive!

Conor limped forward and his clothes were singed, but otherwise none of them looked badly injured. Song was almost disappointed. How could they all have survived?

It was obvious.

Song narrowed her eyes. "You've failed."

Meilin held out her fist, then opened it.

Song gasped.

An emerald glowed in her palm. Light radiated from its many cut faces, bathing the cavern in green, shifting pools.

"The Dragon's Eye?" Song whispered, her heart racing. Could it really be?

"Release Essix," demanded Rollan. "Now."

Song couldn't take her eyes off the glowing gemstone. It was smaller than she'd imagined; the drawings had made it so grand-looking, but it was smaller than a pigeon egg.

How could such a small thing have so much power?

"Give it to me."

"Essix first."

Song flicked her hand to Sid. "Open the cage."

The nod from Kana was almost imperceptible, but it was there.

Song's guts twisted. Kana was getting ideas above her station.

Essix flew across the cavern to Rollan, landing on his outstretched arm. The boy stroked the bird's crest. The love they had was unmistakable.

Song didn't feel that way toward her own spirit animal, but Seaspray wasn't a Great Beast.

Suddenly Essix's wings rippled. The gyrfalcon disappeared with a flash, leaving her mark on Rollan's chest.

Jealousy dripped into her heart like black bile. Sometimes it seemed so thick she almost choked. Song often felt as if she had nothing—nothing of value or importance. She was the only child of the emperor, yet it was others who had what she wanted. Her “legendary” spirit animal had always disappointed her father, while these four nobodies had summoned the Great Beasts. Song had a palace, an empire, but the Greencloaks' fame was boundless.

And they had the loyalty of each other. Song had the Oathbound, loyal only to gold. All across Erdas, minstrels sang of the feats of the Heroes of Erdas, of their bravery. No one sang about what she'd achieved.

Did they not understand the courage it had taken to murder her own father?

That would all change. Soon all Erdas would admire Song. Minstrels would write epics of her greatness. Song the Great. She liked the sound of that.

And she needed only one small thing to realize all her ambitions. Song thrust out her hand. “Give me the gem.”

Reluctantly, Meilin passed it over.

“At last,” said Song. “At last.”

She held the stone up and turned it in the light.

Something swirled within the gem, as though there was life within the Eye. It moved in endless, weaving patterns. If she squinted, it could almost be a water dragon, one made of pure light.

“It will do you no good.”

She turned to face the big Greencloak, Kofe.

His leg was bandaged, and blood soaked through the cloth. He looked pale, but the anger in his eyes filled him with strength.

“Oh?” Song asked mockingly. “Tell me why.”

“The bond tokens aren't the treasures you think they are or hope them to be.”

“They will make me powerful beyond all others,” said Song.

“They will corrupt you,” Kofe snarled. “Just as all power corrupts. You are the very proof of it.”

Song tightened her grip on the Eye. “I won't be lectured on the corrupting influence of power by a Greencloak. Your people have kept Erdas under your thumbs for centuries. My father kept me meek and powerless my entire life. No more!”

“I knew your father, Song,” Kofe said. “He was a fool. He belittled those he feared and envied. That includes the Greencloaks and it includes you, his own child.” Kofe’s face softened slightly, the hard lines easing. “You summoned a wondrous partner, but rather than foster your love for each other, your father drove you and your spirit animal apart. You don’t need to covet the greatness of others, Song. Cherish your own bond. See the great things you already have for what they are.”

Song paused, considering the Greencloak’s words. Then she grinned and held up the Dragon’s Eye. “What I have is the most powerful weapon in Erdas. And I intend to use it.”

Kofe’s eyes darkened. “Then you are as much a fool as your father. You must be stopped.”

“Oh? And by who? You?” Song laughed. The man could barely stand. “Do you want to try?”

“There’s no need. You’ll bring ruin upon yourself; it’s only a matter of time. What concerns me is the damage you’ll inflict on innocents before your own doom descends.”

“Careful, old fool. You dare threaten an empress?”

“Your father—”

“Shut up about my father!”

Kofe limped forward. “You must listen. He has poisoned y—”

Song screamed with blind fury.

It happened almost instantly.

Kofe took another stride toward her, and Cordelia flicked out the Wildcat’s Claw. She jumped forward, raising the sword as she moved.

Kofe turned, staring as the flames erupted along the steel, illuminating the wild, terrifying delight in Cordelia’s eyes.

He raised his arms to protect himself, but how could he, against the Claw?

“No!” yelled Rollan.

Song covered her face. She expected a cry. A shout. Instead, it was deathly silent.

She looked.

Kofe stood, transfixed. He was clutching Cordelia, as if about to embrace her or crush her. He trembled. Blood trickled down his lips.

Cordelia faced him, both hands on the hilt.

The blade tip stuck out Kofe's back.

Slowly Cordelia drew the whole length of the sword out of his chest. Only then did Kofe drop to his knees.

Rollan rushed to the man's side. "No ..."

"He—he brought it upon himself," Song stuttered as she stepped back from the pool of blood that was now spreading across the floor. "It was his own fault."

Rollan groaned as he put his head against Kofe's. The big man's eyes fluttered as the last of his life drained away.

Rollan stared up at her, his own eyes wide with sorrow and rage. "He was a good man."

"He was nothing," snapped Song. "And now he is even less."

She watched as the other Greencloaks gathered to Rollan. Meilin put her arm around him and joined him in tears. Conor knelt down on the opposite side of Kofe and softly closed his eyes. Abeke held the man's hands.

Watching the Greencloaks gather to mourn one of their own, Song felt suddenly and strangely alone.

Was there anyone who cared about her in this way?

She saw her reflection in the bloody pool. How twisted she looked, how grotesque: soaked through by crimes she'd committed. The image swam. It distorted into ...

Into the face of the emperor.

"No!"

Kana gripped her arm, suddenly bleeding into existence beside her. "Song. Are you all right?" she whispered. "Pull yourself together."

Song blinked, shaking off the strange vision. What was she doing? Why should she be upset? She had the Dragon's Eye. She'd won.

Won!

She smiled at Kana. "I'm fine. But thank you."

"What should we do with them?" Kana asked. "Back to the cells?"

What indeed? It would take a mere nod of her head to have the Oathbound finish off the four children. No effort at all.

Perhaps she should kill them. They knew too much to ever be set free. And they were powerful, though perhaps they didn't realize how powerful. If they joined her—joined the Oathbound—then maybe the Heroes of Erdas could still be spared.

But Song knew that was impossible. The look of pure hatred in Meilin's eyes made it clear.

More than anything, Song needed to prove she was right. Right to go after the bond tokens, right to use the Oathbound, right to arrange the murder of the emperor. Once she'd proven that—once Meilin saw her precious Greencloaks shattered, saw the true power of the Dragon's Eye—then Song would let Cordelia do what she did best.

Kana still stood beside her. "Let me take them back to the cells," Kana said. "They're no threat to you anymore."

"The cells can wait." Song couldn't take her eyes off the Eye. She finally had the one thing she'd been seeking this whole time. Now she would test it. She wanted the others to see what she was capable of.

"Bring them down to the beach."

ABEKE STOOD ON THE SHINGLE SHORE AND WATCHED Song summon her water dragon. The lizard appeared with a flash, then lay down to snooze on a sunny rock.

“Wake up!” Song kicked the animal. “Wake up!”

Abeke winced at the way Song treated her spirit animal. How could she be so cruel?

But Abeke could still picture the Oathbound guards dragging Kofe’s body away. More and more she was learning that cruelty was a part of Song’s true nature. The empress had hid it well, but now it was revealed and without restraint.

Song kicked poor Seaspray again, and it was too much for Abeke. She pushed past the guard who blocked her. “Stop it, Song!”

The guard thrust a halberd at her, stopping the blade just an inch from her chest.

Song waved him aside. “Let her approach.”

Abeke knocked the halberd away and marched up to the empress and her Oathbound allies.

Kana the Honest stood within arm’s length of Song. She kept her gaze on Abeke, ready for any sudden move. The Heart of the Land hung from her neck. Next to her stood Sid the Generous, wearing the Stormspeaker crown, along with countless other stolen jewels. He looked absurd with so much ornamentation, yet still his eyes gleamed hungrily at the jewel in Song’s hand. Finally there was Cordelia the Kind, grasping the deadly Wildcat’s Claw.

Song held up the Dragon's Eye. The jewel radiated a bright green light. "Magnificent, isn't it?"

"Stop beating your water dragon, Song. Can't you appreciate how lucky you are to have a spirit animal?"

"Lucky? To have this?" Song scoffed and the dragon cringed. Clearly he was used to Song's anger.

Abeke squatted down and brushed her hand over Seaspray's scales. He trembled, expecting another blow, but eventually he realized she wasn't going to hurt him and nuzzled up against her.

"You really are quite lovely." His scales shimmered like oil on water, one moment green, then gold, then orange and purple. The water dragon gurgled with pleasure.

"He's weak and useless," snapped Song. She undid the chain around her waist and latched it to the dragon's collar.

"What are you going to do?"

Song gave the chain a sharp tug. "Make him better."

"Don't hurt him!" Abeke wanted to protect poor Seaspray, but Kana stepped in her way.

"You stay right there," she warned.

The poor water dragon knew something was wrong. He struggled as Song dragged him to the water's edge.

The waves splashed around the empress and her spirit animal. Song didn't seem to care that her elegant silk robes were getting covered in salt water. Instead she hunched down in the waves and held the Dragon's Eye in front of her own spirit animal.

The light from the orb brightened, bathing both girl and dragon in an eerie green radiance. The water dragon stopped struggling and instead stared at the orb, hypnotized. The light from the Eye pulsed. Cold fear crept over Abeke's skin.

The waves seemed to hush and she held her breath.

Even the seagulls stopped their endless squawking. They fled the beach, sensing something disturbing.

"Come on ..." Song snarled. "Come on!"

The sky darkened as Seaspray began at first to twist, then thrash, at the end of the chain.

Song laughed as she held the Eye aloft. "That's it!"

"You're hurting him!" yelled Abeke.

Song didn't hear her. She stared, wide-eyed, at the dragon as he hissed in pain. Then he began to tremble all over, his scales undulating as the muscles and bones beneath began to strain. Seaspray threw back his head and cried out.

How could she do that to any creature, especially her own spirit animal?

Others came to the water's edge to watch Song and her water dragon. The creature thrashed violently in the waves.

Seaspray's cry throbbed as he swelled. His limbs twisted and buckled and grew. His tail splashed among the waves, thickening and lengthening.

Song laughed. "It's working! Can't you see?"

The water dragon rolled down the beach, as if trying to escape the pain racking his body. Song ran after him, still holding the Dragon's Eye ahead of her, its light concentrated on the lizard.

Abeke glanced to her sides.

Conor, Meilin, and Rollan all stood nearby, but the Oathbound were all totally focused on the spectacle.

She nudged Rollan. "Here's our chance."

Rollan peered sideways. "What's your idea?"

She tilted her head to a pocket of caves within the cliffs. "Hide out until dark. Then take one of those boats and try to get help."

"Go," he stated.

"I don't mean just me!" argued Abeke.

"You're the best runner. Go. Now."

"Rollan ..."

The water dragon sank under the water's surface. Song waded in. "Where is he?"

This was the best chance they'd have.

The soldiers entered the sea to help look for the dragon.

"Where is he?" Song screamed again, more forcefully.

A long, scaled spine rippled across the water. Some of the soldiers gasped; others hurried out to dry land.

Waves rose as something big swam toward the beach's edge.

The water dragon roared as he broke the surface and rose ... and rose.

Abeke gasped.

Song let out a triumphant shout. "I did it! I did it!"

The water dragon towered over her. Seaspray shook himself, covering the whole party in seawater.

Rollan glared at Abeke.

She nodded. Abeke slammed an Oathbound soldier aside and ran.

Uraza flashed onto the beach, then sprang forth with a terrifying roar. She swiped her claws along a soldier's leg, tearing off the armor plate as if it were paper. Her claws dug an inch into the flesh, enough to draw blood, a scream, and a tumble.

"Go, Uraza!" Abeke yelled, but the Great Beast was already far ahead of her, sprinting over the pebbles with all the speed and grace she had held in her supple body.

Despite herself, Abeke laughed. If only she could draw on more than a fraction of Uraza's power! Still, seeing her animal surge ahead encouraged Abeke to add more energy to her legs. She drew on their bond and felt her own steps growing long and sure.

There were a series of cave openings along the southern curve of the cliffs. That part of the beach was covered in huge chunks of rock, debris that had been eroded off the cliffs. Abeke could jump them easily and have plenty of places to hide.

Uraza was leaping from rock to rock. Abeke saw her tail disappear between two larger boulders, before the leopard dashed into one of the caves.

A quarrel zipped past. Abeke glanced back and saw Conor barge into the crossbowman as he reloaded. Briggan leaped from one target to another, snapping and clawing wildly at anyone foolish enough to get too near. Even Jhi was causing chaos, knocking a man to his knees with heavy swipes of her paws. Meilin had wrestled a sword from Brunhild the Merry and was doing what she'd spent years training to do, fighting extremely well. Rollan had gathered big pebbles and was hurling them with frightening accuracy. The big stones clanged off helmets and bashed a few noses. Sid yelled at his wolverine to attack, but the big beast hung back, snarling and clawing wildly as Essix swooped overhead, raking her talons across the beast's fur.

They were giving Abeke the chance to escape; she couldn't let them down.

Armored feet crunched the pebbles behind her as Song's warriors gave chase. But they wore heavy brass accessories and carried weapons, and Abeke was fleet-footed and unencumbered. Her heart pounded as she picked up the pace.

Behind her, the dragon roared again but she didn't pause to look. Her entire attention was on the route ahead. Abeke sprang onto a rock just as another quarrel clattered past. Then she jumped from one slab to another, leaving her pursuers farther and farther behind with each leap. Behind her, Oathbound goons slipped and fell, unable to haul themselves onto the rocks. So much of their armor was for show, Abeke couldn't help but find it amusing that their vanity had let her escape.

One final leap took her clear of the beach and into the cave's mouth.

Without pausing to catch her breath, Abeke charged in.

"Uraza? Where are you?"

There was no sign of her leopard. Had Abeke gone into the wrong cave? Or was Uraza farther in?

Glancing back, Abeke caught a glimpse of the Oathbound. She couldn't risk going back out now. Hoping Uraza was indeed ahead, she delved into the cavern.

The cave floor was broken by rock pools and the walls dripped with water and seaweed. Deeper and deeper she went. The cries of the soldiers disappeared.

A soft growl greeted her from the shadows ahead. She saw a glimmer from a pair of bright violet eyes.

Abeke sighed. "There you are. I've been—"

Then she turned a corner and stopped.

A figure emerged from behind a rock. "Hello, Abeke."

Abeke blinked as she recognized the person standing before her. "You!"

OLD FRIENDS

“AT LEAST ABEKE GOT AWAY,” SAID ROLLAN. “GIVES US some more elbow room.”

Meilin glanced over at him. “Is that meant to be a joke?”

Rollan smirked. “Come on, admit it. You were starting to miss this cell. The damp walls, the cold breeze. The rats for company.”

Meilin shook her head but didn’t answer.

“We have got to escape,” said Conor. He was back at his usual spot by the door, searching as if there were some secret latch which, with a twist, would grant them freedom.

He needs to be busy.

Rollan put his hand protectively upon his mark. He had Essix back and right now that felt like a win. It didn’t change their situation, but it gave him some small hope.

Where had Abeke gotten to? After their friend escaped, Song had been furious. She ordered the Oathbound soldiers to scour the caves, but the whole area was riddled with them, dozens of tunnels that had been carved out by underground rivers. There had to be hundreds of miles to search. Rollan felt hopeful that Abeke would keep ahead of the Oathbound.

But Song hadn’t been angry for long. Not now that she had the Dragon’s Eye ...

“Did you see the water dragon?” Meilin asked bleakly.

Conor snorted. “How could I miss him?”

When Song had ordered Seaspray back out of the water he had crawled, exhausted, to collapse in the shingles. But the lizard was now the size of an ox. Something about the ancient bond token had changed him. If Rollan was honest, the whole thing reminded him of the Bile and the way it transformed the animals who were forced to drink it.

As she watched her own spirit animal collapse, Song had stood over Seaspray, scowling in disgust. Then she'd summoned him into passive state—a newly enormous tattoo that stretched from her neck all the way to her ankle.

Meilin sighed, still gazing out the small grille. “I fear what she’ll do with such power.”

“Nothing good,” Rollan concluded. “The girl’s insane.”

They fell silent as they heard armored footsteps approach. A heavy fist beat against the door. “Food!”

The hatch at the bottom of the door slid open and a tray was shoved through.

Rollan picked up one of the three bowls. “What’s this?”

A face appeared at the small door grille. Wikam the Just sneered. “Food. You eat it. Or not. It makes no difference to me.”

“It looks like seagull droppings.”

“Is that not what you ordered?” Wikam frowned. “I must chastise the chef.”

“Great. You think you’re a comedian?”

Wikam tapped the bars. “What I am is on the right side of these. I can be whatever I want. Best eat up before it gets cold.”

He was still laughing as he left and closed the door at the far end of the corridor.

Rollan sniffed the meal; his stomach twisted in revulsion. A few bones floated in the sludge. He didn’t want to guess what animal they’d come from. Lumps of stale bread sat in the congealing mass. Rollan tested a lump. He swallowed it and had to close his eyes while trying not to gag.

When he opened them, he saw Conor had almost finished his bowl. “How can you eat that?”

“What? I’m hungry.” Conor wiped the last of the goo off with his fingers, then licked them clean. “I’m not saying I like it, but food is food.”

Meilin nibbled at hers, though her nose was wrinkled in disgust.

Rollan picked up a large piece of what might be meat and swallowed it whole, trying to get it down without touching any tastebuds on the way.

They ate in silence, each stuck in their own peculiar misery.

Rollan worked his way through his meal, reminding himself with every grueling bite that strength was all that mattered. He needed to keep his up, just in case a chance came along, as it had for Abeke.

But was that likely? The Oathbound would no doubt be watching them even more closely now.

Meilin finished her bowl then put her head in her hands. “That was the most disgusting thing I’ve ever eaten.”

“If Song’s still feeding us, she’s got something planned,” said Conor.

“Fattening us up for her dragon?” Rollan asked.

Conor waved to his empty bowl. “We’re going to need more than this to get fat, Rollan.”

The far door opened up again.

Rollan sighed. “Oh, good. Wikam’s brought us dessert.”

The footsteps paused outside the door. “Hey. Who’s in there?”

The three of them sat up. That wasn’t Wikam.

Rollan went to the door. “Who’s asking?”

“Rollan?”

Keys rattled and then there was the click-clack of the lock opening.

The cell door creaked open. A lantern shone into the cell.

And upon the face of their rescuer.

“So, who wants to get out?” asked Worthy, grinning.

ESCAPE

MEILIN RUSHED OUT AND HUGGED WORTHY. THE BOY was blushing when she stepped back, and she couldn't help but smile at his discomfort. "It's good to see you, Worthy."

"You too, Meilin."

Rollan and Conor greeted him with knocks and friendly slaps, but Meilin saw the stunned disbelief on their faces. They, like her, had never thought to see the young Redcloak ever again.

"What happened to Wikam?" asked Rollan, searching the narrow corridor.

Worthy gestured at the far door. "Abeke's taking care of him."

"Abeke?" Meilin exclaimed. "She's here?"

"Of course. How else did you think I'd find you so quickly? We, er, bumped into each other down in the caves." He started walking, tying on his pristine white cat mask as he moved. "But we can talk later. We need to get out."

The room beyond was Wikam's, and there they found Abeke, Wikam himself, and perhaps the hugest man Meilin had ever seen. He wore the robes of a Niloan chief, and she couldn't miss the large rhino tattoo on his forearm. He smiled as they appeared, while the Oathbound squirmed, trapped as he was under the man's foot. Wikam was gagged and bound, with a fresh bruise swelling on the side of his head. Across the room, his vulture was similarly trussed.

Worthy bowed at the big man. "May I introduce Chief Ugo. He's the reason I'm here."

“So these are the young heroes I’ve been hearing so much about. The tales do not do you justice,” said the chief.

Abeke shook the keys in front of her. “Help me put him in the cell. No one will come down till tomorrow.”

“And we’ll be long gone by then,” said Worthy.

“Let me help,” said Chief Ugo, easily picking up Wikam, who was not a slim man, with one hand through his belt. The Oathbound struggled and made noises, but the gag was thick and well-stuffed in his mouth.

They dropped him, not gently, into the cell, then tossed his vulture spirit animal in after him.

“Bye-bye,” said Abeke, with a wave. Then she locked the door.

They gathered back in Wikam’s quarters, where Ugo sat down on the stout wooden table. He folded his arms across his chest. “I’ll keep this brief. I’ve had my suspicions regarding the death of the emperor from the moment I heard about it. I know the Oathbound are respected for protecting the leaders during the Devourer’s war, but I’ve had my own dealings with them before, and I’ve seen the cruelties they impart when they think no one is watching. Though they’ve never tried anything quite so bold as killing an emperor.” Chief Ugo shook his head. “The idea that it was a Greencloak plot was laughable—especially one orchestrated by Olvan and the Heroes of Erdas. So here I am. I came to find out what’s going on. And, incidentally, to get you all out.”

Worthy pointed to himself. “Which was my idea.”

Meilin stepped forward and bowed. “Chief Ugo, the false Greencloaks who killed the emperor were Oathbound impostors acting on the orders of Empress Song. She wanted her father dead.”

She watched the Niloan chief’s face stiffen with shock. His black eyes narrowed. “Be careful, child. If what you say is true, we could be talking war.”

“War?” Meilin gasped. “But we just ended the one against the Devourer.”

“The other governments wouldn’t stand for such a coup.” The chief rubbed his chin. “But Abeke tells me that Song already has four powerful items of some kind, and that makes her doubly dangerous. Song knew that if her treachery was discovered she’d be challenged. That she did it anyway means something. She’s confident she can defeat the other nations, not to mention the Greencloaks. These ‘bond tokens’ must be incredibly powerful for her to have risked so much.”

“Another war would be disastrous for Erdas,” Meilin muttered. “And especially for Zhong.” Meilin had witnessed the loss of so much of her homeland already. To have it torn apart again was too much to bear. “There has to be another way.”

Chief Ugo stood. “I must take you all back to Nilo. The High Chieftain will want to hear the full story from your own lips. Worthy has told me what he knows on the journey here, but your word will be vital if Song is to face true justice.”

“How?” asked Conor.

“My ship is anchored a mile off the coast. Your red-cloaked friend also has a boat hidden in the caves along the bottom of the cliff. You will go with him and row out to the ship. My crew is expecting you.”

“What about you?”

The chief frowned. “It will look too suspicious for me to depart the palace in the middle of the night. I’ll follow at dawn, before anyone discovers what’s happened down here. With a good wind behind us, we’ll be swiftly out of reach from Song’s navy.”

“And off to start a war?” asked Meilin. “Is that what you want us to do?”

“I want you to tell the truth,” said the chief. “I’m sorry, but some things are greater than the concerns of four children, even ones partnered with the Four Fallen.”

Rollan stepped forward. “Song’s greatest weapons are the bond tokens, right?”

“She’s dangerous already, for who she is and what she’s done, but yes, the fact that she controls such powerful artifacts only amplifies the peril we are all in.”

“Then we can’t leave without them. We steal them tonight.”

Worthy sighed behind his mask. “I saw what was happening down at the beach. But does one big lizard really change anything? We need to get away.”

“No,” Meilin said. “Rollan’s right. We need to stop Song.”

Worthy shook his head. “Meilin ...”

If Meilin was being honest, she wanted to sail away. She knew the rest of them felt the same. It would be such a relief to get far away from here to somewhere safe.

But where was safe? Song and the Oathbound had grown powerful beyond belief. The Greencloaks were still imprisoned, and who knew what Song could truly do with the Dragon's Eye?

Another war was looming on the horizon. Meilin couldn't be a part of that.

Chaos lay ahead of them. More strife and misery for all Erdas.

She met the chief's gaze. "All the gifts are in one place, the Summer Palace. We need to get them back."

The chief sighed and shook his head. "I wish I had time to argue with you over this, but I suspect I wouldn't get very far. I must get back to the main palace, before any of Song's spies know I'm missing." He looked to Worthy. "We sail at dawn. Make sure you're back on board by then. With or without your friends."

And with that the Niloan chief left.

Conor grinned nervously at Meilin and clapped his hands. "So, you've got a plan?"

"No," she replied. "I haven't got a clue."

TO THE BOAT

“WE CAN’T LEAVE THESE PEOPLE HERE,” SAID ABEKE, looking at the corridor of cells. It hadn’t been immediately clear how many others were trapped in Song’s prison. For most of the Greencloaks’ stay, the corridor had been deathly silent. Now Abeke saw why. The prisoners were listless and emaciated. Their eyes were tired and sunken with hunger.

Wikam had been starving them.

“We need to get them out,” Abeke said.

Meilin nodded. “But how?”

All eyes turned to Worthy. “My boat’s big enough for about six, comfortably.”

Abeke did a rough head count. “Apart from us there are ten others. If we get down to the caves, we can hide them. Row the first batch out to Ugo’s ship, then do another journey for the second. It will take some time, but it’s the only way.”

Conor’s eyes darkened. “Then just leave?”

“What do you mean?”

“Song and the Oathbound have the four relics, Abeke. Even if we escape, they still have all the power.”

Abeke shook her head. “It gives us time to plan.”

But it was a chance, wasn’t it? Abeke looked at each of her friends, then she smiled at Rollan. “Getting at least one of the bond tokens back would weaken Song’s power. And the Dragon’s Eye seemed to be the most powerful.”

Rollan clapped his hands. “Great. We grab the gemstone.”

Conor grinned. “I’m in.”

Meilin hesitated, but eventually nodded. “I visited the palace a few years ago with my father. I still remember the layout, more or less.”

Abeke patted Worthy’s shoulder. “You and me saving the prisoners?”

“That works.” Worthy hefted the keys. “Let’s get started.”

They crept along the row of cells, working open the heavy locks. People slowly emerged, though they were more than a little wary of this miraculous rescue.

After a brief explanation from Abeke and the others, they learned that two of the prisoners were soldiers who’d been blamed for conspiring in the emperor’s murder. They’d both been dedicated to Song’s father and expressed suspicion about the attack.

“Song had the Oathbound lay false evidence against us, saying we were in league with the Greencloaks,” muttered Chan. “I served her family for twenty years and this is where I end up.”

“The fight’s not over yet, brother,” replied Li. “The Greencloaks will reveal the truth behind our emperor’s death.”

Chan merely grunted, glancing suspiciously at Meilin.

There were three nobles, also locked up for voicing doubts over Song’s rule. And four of the prisoners were local merchants, robbed by the Oathbound and chained for complaining. Then, in the last cell ...

“Whee! Free! Free!”

Was the crazy old man.

He jumped out and hugged Abeke. “My savior!”

“Um, you’re welcome.” Abeke gently pushed him off. “But will you please be quiet?”

The old man clamped his hand over his mouth.

Abeke rejoined the others, curled in a circle with Worthy as they discussed their plans. “Worthy and I will get them away, but then what?”

Rollan bit his lip. “Give the rest of us an hour. If we aren’t back by then, go without us.”

Abeke didn’t like it, but Rollan was right. If at least she and Worthy could escape, then they’d be able to warn the other nations about Song. She smiled at him. “You’ll make it.”

“Robbing the Empress of Zhong of the most powerful relic in all Erdas? No problem.” Rollan winked. “Though my thieving credentials aren’t what they used to be.”

“Grabbing the Eye isn’t about thieving, it’s about being heroic.”

Rollan grinned. “That’s what I told myself the day I summoned Essix. I was stealing medicine for a friend.” Rollan’s face went pale. “Come to think of it, I got caught that day.”

Abeke wanted to swap places with one of her friends. Any of them. But she and Worthy had already navigated the caves, and time was pressing. She hugged the other three. “Don’t be late.”

It didn’t take long for the plan to go wrong.

Things started out fine. She, Worthy, and the other prisoners left the prison level, with her at the front and Worthy at the back. They reached the courtyard without anyone seeing them, then crept along the rear of the stable to the hay bales that were conveniently stacked up against the sea-facing outer wall.

Less convenient was the squad of Oathbound soldiers camped beside it.

“They weren’t there when we came over,” complained Worthy.

One of the soldiers, Li, smacked his fist into his palm. “We could rush them. Get a few of you over the wall while we keep them busy?”

Chan frowned. “That’s Captain Peng. Not good. The man’s cruel and dedicated to Song. He joined the Oathbound soon after the emperor’s death.”

Abeke drew back into the shadows of the stable roof. “There are almost twenty of them. All armed. We wouldn’t stand a chance.”

“Then we need another way out,” said Worthy.

They needed help.

Someone stealthy, good at sniffing out secret paths at night, someone like ...

With a flash and tingle upon her arm, out stepped Uraza.

The leopard shook from her head to the tip of her tail, then nuzzled against Abeke. She turned around to watch the soldiers at the wall. Uraza growled softly.

“I’d prefer not to fight,” said Abeke. “Too many of us are weak from imprisonment. We need to find another way out.”

Uraza didn’t think much of that. She revealed her claws, but Abeke met the cat’s violet eyes unflinching. “Please, my friend.”

Uraza gave a twitch of her long whiskers, then sniffed around. She then sprang fifteen feet in the air, up onto the stable roof, landing with barely a sound. She looked down at Abeke, and her tail twitched.

“Looks like we’re going up,” said Abeke.

Li patted his brother’s shoulder. “Let me go first, then we’ll help lift.”

Chan braced himself against the wall, and Li used him as a ladder. The younger brother stepped into Chan’s cupped hands, then quickly hopped to his shoulders before hauling himself up next to Uraza. He made it look easy.

Abeke grinned. “You’ve done this before.”

“Sometimes we missed curfew,” said Chan with a wink. “Sneaking back into the barracks is a time-honored tradition.”

Worthy went up next, scaling the wall without Chan’s help, thanks to his catlike abilities. Li looked a little put out, but the pair extended their hands downward. One by one, using Chan as a first step, the other prisoners were lifted onto the sloping roof, even the crazy old man.

Abeke patted Chan’s shoulder. “You go now. I’ll come up last.”

Chan frowned as he judged the height of the wall. “That’s quite a jump.”

“I’ve learned a few tricks from Uraza.”

Chan was heavier than he looked, but Abeke stayed steady as he climbed up on her shoulders and scaled the wall. He was no worse than Conor, really. Then she took a few steps back.

Li and Worthy dangled as low as they could, reaching down.

Abeke shook her head. “You’ve seen me jump, Worthy.”

“This is a lot higher, Abeke. I’m not sure even you could—”

Three quick, springy steps, and Abeke bounced up.

She landed lightly on her feet at the top of the wall, completely ignoring the hands that had been offered her. “You were saying?”

“Keep low,” grumped Worthy. “We’re silhouetted against the sky.”

Crouching low, Abeke made her way to the front of the line with Uraza. The big cat’s eyes shone in the dark. She waited, tail flicking with excitement. Then she headed off, constantly checking over her shoulder like a protective mother, making sure all her kittens were lined up behind her.

The roof creaked and a seagull squawked angrily when they stumbled near its nest. Abeke froze as voices rose from below, holding up her hand. A stable boy stirred in his sleep, Abeke could see him through a crack in the tile. The boy was nestled under a blanket on a pile of straw. One of the horses looked up at her mid-chew. Abeke put her finger to her lips. The horse just stared blankly, then returned to its meal of oats.

The edge of the stable roof came close to the outer wall.

“I can’t jump that,” complained one of the nobles. “We need to find another way.”

“There isn’t time,” said Abeke. “And it’s not that wide. Only five feet.”

“I’m not doing it.” The nobleman folded his arms. “It’s a long drop.”

“Don’t think about the drop. Look, you could almost step over.”

He glared at her. “Do you know who I am?”

“The man who’s heading back to his cell if he doesn’t do what I say.”

“We must find another—yaah!”

The nobleman flew across, grabbing the side of the far wall as he landed.

Abeke stared at the crazy old man. “Did you just kick him in the backside?”

The old man lowered his foot guiltily. Then he took a step back and jumped over himself.

“Hey! What’s going on up there! You! Come down!”

The nobleman’s cry had alerted the Oathbound soldiers below. Now more were rushing toward them with spears.

“Jump!” Abeke shouted.

The rest of them leaped the gap as one of the soldiers hurled a spear. Abeke helped one of the prisoners over the side of the wall, then began looking for handholds.

The outer surface had been beaten by the elements for many years. Facing the sea, it had become pitted, cracked, and scratched. The once flat and seamless marble was now punctured by holes. The wall rested on a narrow cliff, but Abeke knew there was a path only a few yards farther. It led steeply down to Worthy’s hidden boat.

They needed to move.

Abeke and the others shuffled like crabs down the outer wall. Once they reached the bottom, Worthy did a head count before running off along the path. “This way!”

Abeke heard shouts from the other side of the cliff. The gates were on the opposite end of the palace, so the Oathbound soldiers were climbing up onto the stable roof themselves.

They'd be upon them in only a minute.

"Not much of a head start," she muttered to Uraza. Then she turned to the rest of the prisoners. "Go! Follow Worthy!"

A quarrel zipped over her head. Uraza roared angrily.

Two soldiers lined the wall and were reloading their crossbows.

Time to leave.

Uraza sprang along the path. Abeke grabbed the old man. "Hurry up!"

The soldiers were climbing down the wall now. They moved slowly, encumbered as they were.

They were almost there!

The boat bobbed in the water, tied to a rock less than five yards from the cliff face. The tide had come in some; Worthy waded up to his chest before climbing in.

"Got you!"

A hand grabbed Abeke's collar.

She spun and kicked out simultaneously, catching the soldier on the side of his knee. He cried out as he stumbled, but didn't let go. Another soldier was a few feet behind him.

Uraza pounced. She flew overhead, slamming her forepaws into the man's armored collar. The Oathbound cried out as he fell, knocking his head into a hard rock. He groaned as Uraza turned her attention to the line of soldiers descending the slope after them.

Worthy had untied the boat, and everyone piled in except for Li and Chan. They bobbed alongside and were clearly going to swim. Worthy waved frantically at Abeke. "Come on!"

Abeke swiped out both arms, ripping herself free of the soldier's grip. "Uraza!"

The leopard was causing havoc. She clawed and bit and jumped and weaved between the clumsy stabs of the Oathbound. The path was too narrow for more than one at a time, but Uraza pounced from ledge to rock, ducking in and out of the battle. Men and women fell over themselves trying to escape her, and more than one soldier clutched desperately at the cliff face to avoid dropping into the water in their armor.

"Come on, Abeke!" yelled Worthy. "Jump!"

The rowboat was already heading away. The other prisoners were also shouting for her to jump.

“Uraza! We’re leaving!” shouted Abeke. Then she took a deep breath and ...

A sharp blow connected with Abeke’s back, spilling the air from her lungs and sending her over the cliff. She hit the water hard. It was black and cold, and she sank straight down. She heard a dull splash somewhere to her right, then she attacked the water, beating it with her hands and feet to claw back to the surface.

Panic threatened to consume her.

An Oathbound soldier appeared beside her in the water. Abeke recognized the man Chan and Lin had called Captain Peng. His eyes were wild as he seized Abeke, wrapping his fingers around her wrist.

Abeke floundered. The soldier was pulling her lower!

Her cheeks swelled as what was left of her air bubbled out. The weight of the Oathbound drew her farther and farther below. It was black wherever she looked.

Then a second hand locked itself around Abeke’s other wrist. It pulled her upward with shocking strength.

With this new hand guiding her, Abeke could kick more confidently. She knocked Captain Peng in the head with her foot. The Oathbound’s grip loosened, then his weight disappeared completely. Abeke lost sight of Peng almost immediately. His pale hand was swallowed by the darkness.

Abeke concentrated on the pull of the other hand. After an agonizing few seconds, they broke the surface together.

“Worthy?” she gasped, after several long moments of grateful breathing. A wave crashed over her and she was almost pulled into the water again, but the strong hand dragged her up the ledge, beneath an overhanging rock.

Uraza appeared by her side, gently tugging her shirt. Abeke collapsed, relieved to have fresh air back in her lungs.

Blinking the water from her eyes, she saw Worthy’s boat far in the distance. They were way out now and weren’t coming back. Spears fell short as each stroke of the boat’s oars took it farther away.

Abeke sat up. If that was Worthy, then who ... ?

The crazy old man squatted beside her. He grinned. “Splishy, splashy. Abeke’s no fish!”

Abeke hugged him, and he responded with a short yelp of surprise.

“No, I’m not,” she agreed.

SONG'S QUARTERS

“THE PALACE IS A LOT BIGGER THAN I THOUGHT,” SAID Conor.
Meilin nudged him along. “Take this left.”

He did as she told, but Conor felt they’d been down this corridor already. Despite Meilin’s protestations, they were very lost.

They carried on, keeping to the shadows, ducking into doorways and behind columns when they heard footsteps.

A gloomy ambience hung over the palace. The servants talked in hushed, wary tones and no one lingered.

Meilin frowned. “If it’s like this now, imagine what it’s going to be like after Song’s been in charge a year. Or a decade.”

“Where do you think she’s keeping the Dragon’s Eye?” asked Rollan.

Conor had wondered the same thing. “She’ll want it near her, that’s for sure. You saw the way the Oathbound are with the other bond tokens. Cordelia couldn’t stop fidgeting with hers.”

“Song’s personal chambers are that way,” said Meilin. “We could—quick!”

They ducked behind a doorway as armored footsteps clanged on the marble floor.

Conor’s ears twitched. He recognized the voices speaking.

“I’m worried about Song,” said Kana. “The stress is getting to her.”

“Oh, you noticed that too?” replied Sid. “Ranting about her dead father. She’s losing her mind.”

“Careful, Sid. She’s my oldest, best friend.”

There was a chuckle from Kana's companion. "But you know I'm right?"

"I can handle Song, but it's Cordelia I want to discuss," said Kana. "You've seen what she's like with the Wildcat's Claw. I don't trust her."

"No one trusts her," laughed Sid. "But what do you want done about her?"

"What do you think?"

There was a pause, then Sid replied more thoughtfully. "It won't be easy, but we could do it."

"Then sort it out. There are others who could use the Wildcat's Claw. Brunhild isn't likely to go on any rampages. Cordelia's been useful, but now she's a liability. We need to ..."

The rest was lost as they disappeared around the next corridor.

Conor shook his head. "I almost feel sorry for Cordelia. Almost."

But not surprised. Once in a while a rabid dog would wander into Trunswick. A pet might get infected, go savage, and attack anyone who crossed its path. There was only one sad way to take care of such animals.

Had the Wildcat's Claw made things worse for Cordelia? It was a bond token, so who really knew what it was capable of?

Maybe these gifts were more dangerous than they'd even realized.

If he was honest, Conor would prefer to have nothing to do with them. Tembo, the first Greencloak, had hidden the gifts for a reason, and this was it. The tokens were dangerous in the wrong hands.

"This way," said Meilin.

This part of the palace wasn't as grand as the entrance hall. They passed by a small kitchen area, and Conor salivated at the sweet flavors drifting through the partially opened doorway. There was laughter coming from the servants' quarters as they relaxed out of sight from their masters. Conor felt a pang of kinship. When the master was rotten, it was always the servants who suffered most.

They hurried up a flight of stairs, into what were the sleeping quarters. Lamps hung from the ceiling. Most were now extinguished or sizzling softly on low wicks.

Meilin stopped at a corner and put a finger to her lips. Creeping up next to her, Conor peeked around.

Two guards stood before a pair of bronze-clad doors. Strangely, these two weren't in the usual Oathbound garb.

“Those don’t look like Kana’s men,” he whispered. “But they do look like they can handle themselves.”

Meilin nodded. “They would be the last of the old guard that she kept around. Father told me the emperor’s bodyguards are the deadliest warriors in the world. They’ve mastered six forms of unarmed combat and all are experts in sword, spear, bow, and halberd.”

Rollan tapped his head. “But nothing up here, right?”

“Wrong. Each has memorized the philosophy of Tang in its entirety—in the original ancient Zhongese. Six volumes, excluding appendices.”

“So they’re good,” said Rollan. “But they’re not Greencloaks.”

“Each has perfect command over his body. They can stand without moving for twelve hours.”

“Shh, one’s coming.” Conor pulled Meilin and Rollan behind a large vase.

One of the two guards rushed past. He looked uncomfortable, and moved in haste.

Conor raised his eyebrow. “Perfect command of everything but his bladder apparently.”

“But there’s still—”

Briggan sprang from his tattoo and bounded down the corridor. His claws clattered on the marble as he leaped at the guard.

There was a sharp cry, a thump, and then it was all over.

They ran down the corridor and there was Briggan, standing over the guard, his bared teeth an inch from the man’s throat. He let out a menacing growl. A very menacing growl.

“I wouldn’t move if I were you,” suggested Conor. “Briggan’s always hungry when he comes out of passive state. And grouchy when he’s not outdoors.”

“Br—Briggan?” The guard’s eyes widened. “The Great Beast Briggan?”

Conor scratched the wolf’s furry neck. “The one and only.”

Rollan put his palm on the door handle. “You ready?”

The guard spluttered. “You can’t go in there!”

Briggan snarled and licked the man’s neck, brushing his teeth along the bare skin.

The guard shut up.

They needed to be quick before the other one returned. Quietly and slowly, Rollan opened the door to Empress Song’s private quarters.

Even though it was dark, it took Conor only a few moments to realize the room was empty. He went in, Meilin and Rollan right behind him. There were another two rooms leading off this one. Conor looked in one, while Rollan checked the other. Meilin stayed behind to search the antechamber.

Conor entered Song's bedroom. The large bed was empty of linens, the blankets tossed on the floor.

A full-height window led out into the open air. Its curtains billowed in the rising wind. Conor spotted something lying at the threshold: an ornate wooden box with silk padding.

Perfect in size for the Dragon's Eye.

He joined the others and handed the box to Rollan. "We're too late. She's gone off with it."

Meilin wasn't listening. She read through a set of scrolls abandoned on the table. "This is bad. Song's written out all these instructions to her generals. She's planning war."

"Not exactly surprising," said Conor.

Meilin waved to one of the scrolls. "If the other rulers knew about this ..."

Conor glanced at the open window in Song's room.

Was that a trick of the light, or was someone moving through the foliage beyond?

He gestured the others to be silent, then crept back in place, hiding himself to the side of the window.

Was it Song creeping back from wherever she'd gone? A secret spy who guarded the room from the trees?

A shadow stretched across the floor.

It was a girl, that much he could tell.

She stepped in, and Conor grabbed her.

"Hey!"

He blocked the fist the girl threw at his face, then sent her spinning across the room. She crashed against the bed in a tangle of sheets.

Conor leaped forward. "Don't move."

The girl pulled bedding off her and looked up at him. "Is that how you treat your friends?"

Then Abeke got to her feet and laughed.

SONG'S DESCENT

“FATHER! YOU CANNOT HIDE FROM ME!” SONG RAN ALONG the garden path. Where was he?
“Father ...”

What did he want from her?

She'd been asleep, but heard him tapping at the window. The guard had come in and explained it was just the branch against the glass, but Song had seen him.

A shadow watched from the other side. As soon as the guard left, he started again, tapping and tapping.

Song had thrown open the window, but he wasn't there.

But was there someone out in the garden? She thought she'd seen a figure moving behind the trees.

Putting the Dragon's Eye in her pocket, Song had climbed over the low balcony and run barefoot after the apparition.

She held up the glowing emerald. “Look! I have it! I have done what you could never do!”

But all she heard was a pitying cry in the rising wind.

“I am greater than you could ever hope to be!” She cried out at the shadows around her. One of them had to be the old emperor.

Song winced. Suddenly the Dragon's Eye seemed so heavy. It weighed down her hand. She stared at it; the weird shifting light from within felt as if it was piercing her eyes.

“I will control you,” she told the token. “You will make me ruler.”

The wind had picked up and the trees rocked side to side, adding their groaning to her own voice.

“Song!”

Kana ran through the bushes, with her two Oathbound allies Sid and Cordelia close behind her.

Song trembled. Why were they here?

Had they come to kill her?

That was it! They wanted the Dragon’s Eye for themselves!

“Get away from me!” Song turned and ran.

She had trusted Kana, trusted her to infiltrate the Greencloaks and arrange the murder of her father.

Song stumbled through the bushes. Thorns pulled at her clothes and stabbed into her soles, but she clutched the Eye tightly against her chest. They would not get it.

“Song! Wait!”

“Get away from me! You can’t have it!”

They were coming in from either side, Cordelia from the left, Sid from the right. She had nowhere to run.

Kana grabbed her as she reached the cliff’s edge.

“Stop running! You’ll fall!”

Song slowly stopped her struggling. “You don’t want the Eye?”

“No!” Kana said, her eyes worried. “You are the Empress of Zhong. It’s rightly yours.”

Song slumped. “I . . . I don’t know what’s happening to me, Kana.”

It began to rain—soft, tiny drops. Judging by the darkness of the clouds, however, this was a mere prelude. Perhaps a storm was coming.

Kana began leading her gently back to the palace. “We should get you inside, where it’s safe.”

“It’s not safe anywhere, Kana. He’s after me.”

“Who?”

Song bit her lip. Her heart raced as she spoke. “My father.”

“He’s dead,” said Kana plainly. “He can’t hurt you anymore.”

“He’s out there,” Song insisted. “Watching me, judging me. He was a cruel man and a useless father. He . . . he had to go. You know that, don’t you?”

“Of course,” said Kana. “We did what we had to do, Song. But that’s the past now.” Kana tightened her hold on Song’s arm. “Please, let’s go inside.”

“No,” said Song. She felt better now. Stronger. Something in the rain had set her right. “I need to show my father what I can do.”

Song had to tap into the full power of the Dragon’s Eye. Awaken its potential, rather than just experiment with it as she’d done earlier.

Kana and her two companions waited at the foot of the cliffs, while Song stood knee-deep in the waves. The wind threw a cold spray at her, but she ignored it.

The Eye shone brighter now that she was in the sea. It pulsed, and powerful waves of energy traveled through her, firing her blood and bringing an electric tingle to her skin.

Her water dragon was out there, swimming offshore. She watched him ripple through the dark water.

Seaspray was big, but Song knew if she could harness the power of the Eye, she could make the dragon even greater.

She remembered the look of disappointment on her father’s face when she’d summoned Seaspray. She’d been so proud of having a spirit animal. Song could still remember how her heart had swelled with joy, seeing the small lizard swimming through the water toward her, then climbing up this very pebble beach.

The moment they first touched had been ... everything.

She’d turned around, hopeful, expecting to see the same joy in her father. But the moment their eyes had met, she was stunned by his cold gaze.

“It’s small,” her father had said. He frowned. “Call it into passive state.”

“He’s a boy lizard,” Song had called back.

The emperor’s eyes narrowed. “Call. It. To. You.”

Song turned, nodding to her new spirit animal. “Come on, Seaspray. Go into passive form. We’re partners now!”

The tiny water dragon just curled into a ball and fell asleep.

Song remembered the Greencloak who’d administered her Nectar trying to argue on her behalf.

“Bonds take time,” he’d implored, his lovely white crane standing in the sand beside him. “Perhaps the princess could join me in Greenhaven for a while, to foster hers?”

Her father had ordered the guards to escort the Greencloak away.

Song was humiliated. Her father made no attempt to hide his disgust, and that made it even worse. He didn't even stay to chastise her; instead he'd swept away and marched straight back to the palace. His ministers hurried after him.

Neither he, nor half the nobles, bothered attending the evening feast to celebrate her Nectar Ceremony.

Kana had been there, watching from the side, like a dutiful servant. As the room cleared she had dared to approach the table, sitting beside Song and helping her finish the lavish cake.

They'd been closer than sisters from that point on.

"Nothing I ever did was good enough for you, Father." Song gazed out at the sea. "But what did you ever do? Nothing. You were content to just sit on your little throne. No ambition at all. An emperor should have ambition. Otherwise what's the point?"

She took another step deeper into the sea, then another. The waves rocked her, but she'd grown up swimming here. She knew its currents. The only freedom Song could remember was when she'd swam, Seaspray playfully darting from this side to that. The dragon had been her companion, her friend.

And her failure.

She was up to her neck now. The water was cold, but Song didn't feel it. The Eye, now slipped over her neck, pulsed harder. It illuminated the pebbles in the water. A few small fish came close, to investigate the source of this strange green light.

Song took a deep breath and swam.

Down and down she swam, each stroke drawing her deeper under the water into that strange, mute world of shifting light and current.

She could see clearly, and her lungs held the air with little strain.

I could stay down here forever.

The Dragon's Eye gave her these underwater gifts. She understood that it would allow her to be with her water dragon, above and below.

She was alone, and free. Song had forgotten what it felt like to escape the palace and all its people. The servants, the soldiers, and the Oathbound.

How deep was she now? She could hardly see the sky, but did catch glimpses of distant lightning.

The Dragon's Eye glowed upon her chest; Song paused to look around.

What a world.

Coral hills spread out in all directions, tinted in wonderful colors. Red and orange, green and blue. Silver-scaled fish darted past. An immense stingray glided over her, and Song reached up and brushed her fingers against it.

The water surged around her. Scales glistened and a pair of bright yellow eyes shone out of the darkness. With a beat of its wings, the stingray fled.

Her water dragon swam around her, and Song gazed in wonder. He was easily twenty feet long now.

Seaspray drew closer, then floated before her.

You and I will rule the world.

She saw the misshapen spine, the deformed legs, and the crooked tail. The changes had been uneven.

She sensed Seaspray's pain, but there was nothing she could do but continue. Didn't he understand how important this was? He'd always been useless; the Dragon's Eye would make him great, at last.

It'll make him a monster.

It'll make him feared.

An empress should be feared.

Song tugged off the Eye and held it before her. The gem began to brighten....

THE WOLF

GETTING OUT OF THE PALACE WAS HARDER THAN CONOR had expected. The place was in lockdown, now that the prison escape had been discovered.

Conor and Abeke led the way, but they couldn't get past the guards. Instead they used the tree to climb down and ducked into a nearby doorway. The team was back underground, in the armory.

Rollan scowled as he looked around the dingy room. "We might as well just lock ourselves back in the cells, for all the progress we're making."

Conor nodded. "It would be the last place they'd look."

Meilin inspected one of the swords and gave it a casual swing. "We could fight our way out?"

Rollan picked up a short sword and tried to mimic Meilin's skillful strokes. He gave up. "Not sure how far I'd get."

But weapons weren't the only items down here. Conor spotted a pile of gear by the door. It looked familiar ...

He picked up the first item, a cloak. "Hey, this is Tarik's."

Rollan snatched it off him. His eyes widened. "It is! I thought I'd lost it."

The Oathbound had confiscated their gear after they'd been captured. Conor picked up his old ax and set it in his belt. Then his eye caught a familiar shape, leaning against the wall. It was a shepherd's crook, in the Euran style. Conor wondered how such an item had found its way into Song's armory. It had made quite a journey ... just like Conor himself. He ran his hands over the smooth, old wood.

Abeke checked her bow, adjusting the bowstring and giving it a testing draw. She then collected a quiver of arrows and slung them over her shoulder. "If it's going to be a fight, I'm ready."

Conor pointed over to the corner. "What about him?"

Abeke had gotten all the prisoners away, everyone but the crazy old man. He was by the axes, trying and failing to lift a double-headed monstrosity.

"He's our secret weapon," said Abeke. "The guards will be laughing so hard we'll just walk out."

Meilin strapped on a sword belt and picked out a falchion. It slid soundlessly into its scabbard. "That doesn't solve our biggest problem: the impending war."

"It might not happen," said Conor, but even he knew it was a weak excuse.

Meilin sighed. "We need to get to that boat before the sun comes up. To warn the other nations."

"We need to get the bond tokens back," Conor said. "I've just got this feeling that if we leave Song with the Dragon's Eye, something terrible is going to happen."

Rollan frowned. "I've learned by now to trust your feelings," he said. "But how? We're outnumbered, and the Oathbound have all four tokens. As much as I respect Abeke's archery skills, there's no way we'd survive a fight on those terms."

"We could make our own bond tokens," Meilin said softly. She took out the scroll case that Xin Kao Dai had revealed to her.

The group was silent for a long moment.

"We don't even know if it would work," said Rollan.

"So what's new?" said Conor.

"What's new is the danger!" Rollan replied. "Think about what we've learned so far. The bond tokens are created from our spirit animal bonds. If those bonds aren't strong enough, they're broken. Forever! And even if we do succeed, a token that's destroyed while its creators are still alive kills them both."

"We can't take on Song and the Oathbound as we are," said Conor. "We'll die that way, too."

“But if we get this wrong,” Meilin said in a small voice, “it could tear our bonds apart.” Her hand holding the scroll was trembling. “For us, and for our spirit animals. Are you sure we have the right to ask this of them?”

Even this far underground, with yards of rock protecting them in all directions, Conor heard the pounding of the waves beyond.

His friends were right. It was a huge risk. But if they didn't ... ?

“Do you remember my dream about the great wave?” Conor said. “The one that wipes out everything it touches? I think that wave is Song. The Dragon's Eye is dangerous in her hands. If we leave without it, Erdas won't survive. If we fight without the power to match the Oathbound, then Erdas still won't survive.”

Rollan looked uncomfortable. He'd just saved Essix, and now they were talking about putting her in even more danger. But he nodded. “Fine. But I only promise to ask her. Essix makes her own decisions.”

Abeke frowned. “Perhaps we can try this ... bonding whatever later, when we're away from here.”

“We can't,” said Conor, wishing it could be otherwise. “It's got to be now or never.”

Conor looked around at the others. No one looked happy with this plan, but one by one they all nodded. They all knew it was the best chance they had of stopping Song. He met Meilin's gaze. “All right. What's the process?”

They gathered around her as she opened the tube and took out the scroll.

The paper was old and delicate. Meilin unrolled it carefully. It cracked under the gentle effort, but held.

“What do you think?” Conor asked.

Meilin's brow furrowed as she concentrated on the minute text. “The ink has faded over the centuries, but I can just about read it. It's a very ancient style.” She glanced to Rollan. “Good thing I had tutors for that.”

Rollan grinned. “Beat me to it.”

“It's more like poetry than straight instruction. There are a lot of weird double meanings. Triple meanings, too.” She pointed to a small pattern. “This could mean ‘a waking dream’ or it could mean ‘buying three eggs.’ ”

Abeke peered over her shoulder. “Please tell me you're joking?”

“Zhongese logograms can have multiple meanings, and the older forms even more so. Plus the symbols have evolved over the years. They may not represent the same things they did, back when this was first written.”

“That does not fill me with hope, Meilin,” said Abeke.

“No one said it would be easy. The scroll is full of warnings of the dangers of getting the process wrong, rather than helping get it right.”

Meilin went pale. “Oh.”

Conor didn’t like the sound of that. “What?”

“It’s ... just a description of what would happen if there was an imbalance between the bonded beings.”

Sailing off to find Worthy suddenly felt like a good idea.

“Well?” asked Rollan.

Meilin grimaced. “It says here that if you don’t open your mind, it will be crushed under the pressure of the process, leaving you a drooling idiot.”

“Oh.”

“And this section explains that if you hesitate at the zenith of the exchange, the incorrect transfer of power will leave you a gibbering idiot.”

Rollan pointed at a row written in faded red ink. “And that?”

“Oh, that’s just describing how your brains will pour out of your nose.”

Rollan gulped loudly.

Meilin finished reading the scroll. “There’s not much to it.” She looked inside the tube, searching for an extra sheet. “Hmm.”

Conor stared at her. “Hmm? Don’t give us hmm! Tell us!”

Meilin put her finger in and drew out some mulch. “This hmm. Water must have gotten in at some point and destroyed the bottom of the scroll. It’s incomplete.”

Conor groaned. “But can you tell how much?”

“Judging by the small amount of paper, only a few lines. If they’d been more warnings, then it doesn’t matter. But if they’re guidance on how to form the bond, we could be in deep trouble.”

“I call gibbering idiot,” said Rollan. “Drool grosses me out.”

Meilin took a deep breath. “We’ll each need a token. Something representational.”

Conor held out the shepherd’s crook.

“Don’t you want something more ... useful?” asked Meilin. “Like your ax—”

“No. This is me.” Conor tapped it on the stone floor. “It can’t be anything else.”

Rollan swung Tarik’s cloak over his shoulders. “And this is mine.”

Abeke merely plucked her bowstring.

“What about you, Meilin?” Conor asked. “The sword? It suits you.”

Meilin drew it. “It doesn’t feel right,” she said with a sigh. “The tokens should represent both us and our animals, and Jhi isn’t a warrior at heart.”

“What, then?”

Meilin looked down at the scroll. Her hair fell over her face and she pulled it aside, automatically turning it around her finger into a rope. Then she looked thoughtful. She picked up a hairpin she’d found in her belongings.

Meilin held it out. “My father gave this to me, on some birthday or another.” She drew her nail over the design. “These are the symbols of knowledge and strength. My father didn’t believe in things like luck or hope. He believed in studying and applying one’s self. Taking what you knew and going out there and using it, to help the nation, the community, your friends.”

Conor smiled. “Sounds like a bond token to me.”

She gripped it and nodded. “Let’s summon our friends.”

Essix shrieked as she broke free of the tattoo. She spread out her gray and golden wings, shifting from one foot to the other and settling down on the top of the open door. Her brilliant, bright eyes reflected the amber light of the torches, as if shining with a fire of their own.

The deep growl from Uraza made the hairs on the back of Conor’s neck stand on end. The leopard sniffed warily, unused to the cramped underground quarters. But she settled as Abeke put her arm over her neck. The cat rested her head on the girl’s lap and purred.

Conor’s own partner, Briggan, yawned as he awoke from Conor’s mark. He ran his red tongue over his black lips, then went to the table and snatched the jailer’s leg of beef. He sat down beside Conor and started gnawing. “Your turn, Meilin.”

“I ... I don’t know. This might be a mistake. For me.”

“Why?”

“The scroll assumed the process of creating a bond token would be carried out with true spirit animals. I used ... Bile, remember? Will Jhi trust me fully?”

Conor took Meilin’s hand. He felt it shaking and he steadied it. “That was then, Meilin. Call Jhi.”

Meilin closed her eyes. A moment later, she juddered and when she looked again, there stood Jhi. The panda’s fur rippled as it ambled beside her.

Jhi pushed her cheek against Meilin’s, and Meilin pushed her fingers through the thick fur, obviously thankful for the bear’s gentle strength.

“Jhi, I need your help,” Meilin said. She glanced around to the other Four Fallen. “We all do. If we’re going to defeat Song and her Oathbound, then we have to be a match for them.”

“We need bond tokens,” Abeke said, running her hands through Uraza’s fur. “Just like the ancient heroes. But the process ...”

“You know how dangerous the process is,” Rollan muttered. He glanced up at Essix on the doorframe. “Because you’ve done it already. Your talismans were tokens, weren’t they? Different, but the same. Gransfen told us.”

“What we’re asking you is to trust us with something just as precious,” Conor said. He pulled his hand from Briggan’s coat, suddenly hesitant to touch him. “Something just as dangerous.”

The Four Fallen glanced between each other. Briggan, Uraza, Jhi, and Essix. It was a strange sort of communion—wordless—but Conor had little doubt that they were communicating somehow. Even as spirit animals, the Great Beasts were still connected.

Then Briggan licked his face. The wolf hopped eagerly to his feet, panting. Essix shrieked from the door, and Uraza purred beside Abeke. Jhi glanced toward Meilin, her silver eyes resolute.

“Looks like we’re ready,” said Meilin.

Conor tightened his grip around the shepherd’s crook. The wood was smooth and dark; someone had carried it for a long, long time.

Who? Had it been a boy like him, once upon a time? Tending sheep day in, day out. Looking after them as the seasons came and went. Had the boy grown up, become a man, an elder? Had he taken this crook out before dawn, as one year melded into the next?

That might have been Conor’s life, too, if it hadn’t been for Briggan.

All those days with nothing more to worry about than counting the sheep out in the morning, and counting the same number back in the evening.

For better or for worse, he wasn't going to have that sort of life.

It still held an appeal. The simplicity of it. But if he'd gone down that path, then Conor would have never met Abeke, Rollan, and Meilin. His life would have been limited to a few fields, a patch of grass on a slope. The same view for every day of his life.

His life before Briggan seemed to belong to another Conor.

He remembered the morning of the Nectar Ceremony, all that time ago, when he'd been the servant of Devin, the young noble of Trunswick. It seemed ridiculous now that his ambition had been to have a sheepdog as a spirit animal.

What if he had summoned one? Big and fluffy, with a calm temperament and a quick mind.

How would his life have turned out?

Well, certainly not hiding in the Summer Palace of the Empress of Zhong, that's for sure.

Now he was attempting something far deeper than just a spirit animal bond.

Briggan growled, a few feet from him. Conor gazed into those blue eyes and took a deep breath. "I'm ready."

Meilin read down the scroll. "It says to close your eyes and see the animal in your mind and heart."

"How do you do that?"

"Sorry. It doesn't really explain. There's something about being the animal. Whatever that means."

Conor scowled. "Should I run around on all fours and bark a bit?"

Rollan laughed. "No harm in trying."

Conor sat back on his heels and closed his eyes. He concentrated on their bond.

He smelled Briggan's damp fur. The wolf's pelt had a unique odor. It changed with the seasons and the location. Here on the coast, Briggan absorbed the wild sea and the salty air, catching particles within his long hairs.

Conor's skin prickled. His own hair stood on end. He felt the breeze upon him, ever so slightly to begin with, but growing as his sensitivity increased. Minute currents slipped through his fingers, cold shifts that rippled over his bare face.

Was this what it was like, being a wolf?

His breath deepened and slowed. Conor saw Briggan in the center of his mind.

The large wolf stood in long grass. The trees were thick all around, and the sunlight formed a dappled pattern across his gray shoulders as it fell through the lattice of leaves. Birds called from the branches, and there was the distant laughter of water running over rocks.

It was warm here in this forest. Not the true warmth of summer, but the temptation of it. It was a springtime warmth, so he felt the sun, but also the cold dark, as if the shadows had trapped the last of the winter's chill.

Deeper he breathed. The forest became more than a feeling, a figment of his imagination.

It became ...

He became ...

He sniffs the grass, seeking out a scent of something to chase. Something to hunt. Something to eat.

His stomach is tight, but he has learned to live with hunger. How long since his last meal, that rabbit he snatched in his jaws as it fled to its hole?

He doesn't count the passing of time the same way as his human partner does.

Paws dig at the soft earth, moist from the morning dew. He pauses to lick water from the tip of a low leaf.

The brambles brush against him as he glides through.

His ears twitch as he hears movement. A hoof catches lightly on a rock and there is the fearful breath of a creature that smells him, just as he smells it.

A heart trembles, not far away.

He lowers himself into the grass and waits.

His thigh muscles quiver in anticipation. He forces himself to be still, not easy when the scent of prey floods his nostrils.

His fur ripples with the change in the wind. His prey approaches, ignorant and unaware.

He has fangs. He has claws and speed and the muscles of a true predator. There is nothing extra in him that might cause him to falter, unlike sweet Conor.

The boy doubts. The boy worries. The boy looks to his friends and looks back at himself, unsure of what he is.

A wolf has no doubts about what he is.

He is wildness incarnate, though he walks in the steps of his human partner. He was born when the world was new, before the beasts understood that there were those that hunted and those that fled. He taught them such things. He may not have been as powerful as the lion or as stealthy as the leopard. He did not have the grace of the eagle or the swiftness of the falcon, yet there was not a beast in all Erdas who more possessed the spirit of the hunter as he.

His human partner doubted, but he did not. He knew what he was.

Briggan.

The deer stepped into view.

Conor snapped his eyes open. "Oh ... wow."

The others stared at him. "What happened?" Abeke asked.

What indeed? Conor held out his hands, half expecting to see claws. He touched his face. A normal nose, rather than a snout. His teeth were as before, not long fangs. He didn't appear to have grown a tail.

He was human, still.

But his heart pumped with such strength he could barely hold it in. His muscles burned with feverish desire. And his head swam with a spinning kaleidoscope of scents.

He'd never understood what pure joy could really be until he'd stepped in Briggan's skin. The wolf had pounced and taken the deer with a single bite. Conor licked his lips, still savoring the sweetness of the perfect kill.

Briggan's emotions, his desires, his needs, were simple and unencumbered. He knew what he needed, and that was that. He was a wolf.

Conor felt himself rise.

Things fell away from him. His worries about the past, mistakes he'd made, things he wished he'd done or said better.

Briggan didn't worry about these things.

And what did tomorrow mean? There would always be another tomorrow. Briggan did not care for tomorrow. A wolf had today and savored every second of it.

Conor held the crook tightly, still feeling the electric thrill of what he'd tasted.

His gaze fell on Rollan. Conor grinned. "Your turn."

ESSIX SETTLED ON ROLLAN'S SHOULDER. HER TALONS dug in through the material, squeezing, but not quite piercing, the flesh beneath.

He brushed down the feathers covering her chest. Essix churred in approval.

It seemed to him that they'd been together forever. He could hardly remember his life before she'd entered it.

And what an inauspicious entrance! Deep in a cell in Concorba. He'd been caught trying to rob an apothecary of willow extract for a sick friend. Digger, that had been the boy's name. Another street urchin, just like Rollan.

So much that followed had been wild, exciting, bewildering. He'd grown up in a semi-derelict orphanage until he'd run off at nine, tired of the foul food and endless, backbreaking work.

Then it had been the dark alleyways and crowded streets of Concorba. Rifling through the bins at the end of the day for leftovers. Sleeping in doorways or in hastily erected shelters that dripped during the wet days and overheated on the sunny ones. Their homes would last only as long as it took the militia to find and tear them down.

Those streets had been his whole world. Now the whole world was his whole world.

Essix sensed his mood and spread out her wings. She shook them, as if ready for flight.

"One day, Essix," he promised. "We'll travel the world together without a crisis. We'll go everywhere."

“Rollan?”

He turned his attention to Meilin. The girl gestured to a spot on the floor beside her. “Maybe if you sit down?”

He did. Essix hopped off and, with a merest flick of her wingtips, rose to perch on an armrest facing Rollan.

He settled down and looked into Essix’s eyes as deeply as he could. He matched his breathing to the rise and fall of the bird’s chest. It felt awkward at first, but the pattern established itself, so he knew they would stay in time as he closed his eyes.

With his lids shut Rollan expanded his other senses.

He felt the air move around him.

Even here underground there were currents.

They ruffled Rollan’s hair. They caressed his cheeks, the bare skin of his arms. They were subtle, slight, yet grew stronger every passing second. How was that possible?

Rollan’s heartbeat quickened, half in fear, half in excitement.

He could no longer feel the floor underneath him. The air surrounded him, drifting, rushing, and roaring all around.

Rollan panicked. He was losing control. Suddenly he was tumbling.

But he was in an underground cell!

No! He was high in the sky!

The wind rushed past him, and he knew if he didn’t do something he would be crushed when he hit the ground.

But what could he do? He didn’t have wings!

Over and over, Rollan fell. He cried out, but those cries were ripped away by the wind.

Then his cry transformed. He called out, but it was with the shriek of the falcon.

Joyous, free, wind riding.

He stopped spinning. He flattened his body against the rushing air and instead of fighting it, became a part of it. He spread out his wings so the cold air rushed through his feathers.

He turned and swooped. The air to one side became more intense, more resistant, as he pushed in that direction. With a flick of his feathers, he turned the other way. He skimmed across the treetops, his shadow a blur across the undulating ground.

Rollan rose up. Up and up he went, the sun warming his wings, blessing him with its glow as he passed above the clouds and—

Erda. He gazed down upon it. The seas glistening in the daylight. Green expanses spread out before him, dappled in the tawny shades that marked Amaya. Farther west—for the falcon's sight seemed to have no limits—the horizon bent away into dusky darkness. Rollan could see the outline of faraway Stetriol and the long shadows of the Hundred Isles, all asleep.

What a world it was. Rollan's heart filled almost to bursting. What visions came from being up high. There were no boundaries. He spread out his feathers, as if he might touch one end of the world and the other. He might even cup it in his palms.

But the clouds darkened. They stirred with malevolent anger. They rumbled, angry voices that protested his presence. They crackled with lightning.

Rollan knew he needed to leave, fast.

And there are few things faster than a falcon. He dove through the rain-swollen clouds, breaking free of their cold embrace to soar above the sea, above the land and above the Summer Palace. He spun between its tall towers and then ...

Opened his eyes.

Essix sat opposite, still on her perch, but her gaze intense upon his. She fluttered her wings, the way she did after a long flight.

Rollan drew a long, deep breath. His heart calmed, and he noticed the sweat dripping from his nose. His skin burned, yet he could still feel the rain and cold winds.

Meilin arched an eyebrow. "Well?"

Rollan wiped his forehead. "That. Was. Amazing."

"How? Tell us."

He looked at his arms, half expecting them to be covered in feathers. "I flew. Really flew. Not like a dream or a wish, but like a bird flies. Riding the wind, seeing the world from up high." He laughed. "I still feel as if I could take off at any moment."

Conor grinned. "Best stay away from rooftops for a while."

He joked, but Rollan felt a kernel of truth in it. The temptation to soar was almost overwhelming. He felt trapped, cooped up in here. He wanted to get out and ... well.

Essix cried softly, and Rollan ran his palm gently over her feathers. How could Essix, having such freedom, bear to be in a place like this?

How did she ever come down? The idea of Song putting her in a cage made his blood run cold.

He, too, had tasted freedom. Once when he'd run from the orphanage. Then when he'd been released from jail to the Greencloaks. Each time had felt like walking through a door into a bigger, wider world. But nothing like this.

Nothing like this at all.

THE PANDA

“TWO DOWN, TWO TO GO,” SAID ABEKE. “YOUR TURN, Meilin.”
Meilin hesitated, then shook her head. “You’d better go next.”

“What’s wrong?”

“What do you think?” she snapped. “The creation of the bond token takes total trust, total openness between the human and the spirit animal. I don’t have that. I forced my will on Jhi.”

“Meilin, you and Jhi have come so far since then.”

Meilin stared at her friend. “That doesn’t change the fact that the Bile formed my bond. We don’t know how that will influence the process. If I try and create a bond token, at best it could merely fail. At worst ...” She put her hand on Jhi’s soft fur. “It could destroy us both.”

Conor sat down beside her. “We can’t beat Song and the Oathbound without you, Meilin. It’s that simple.”

“I’ll help, but without the bond token.”

“You’re scared?” he asked.

“Of course I am!” Meilin looked at them. They were trying to help, but they couldn’t do the ritual for her. Dread weighed her down like a black rock in her chest.

Jhi snuggled up to her, nuzzling her nose into Meilin’s chest. But instead of making Meilin feel better, it made her feel worse. Meilin had no right to bring any harm to the panda.

She gazed into those silver eyes and saw herself reflected.

Did she really look so terrified?

She turned away. “I’ll help you, Abeke, but I can’t—I won’t—go through with this.”

“We managed okay,” said Conor. “There’s no reason to be afraid. I’m sure—”

“You all bonded through Nectar. My relationship with Jhi was poisonous since the very beginning.”

“We need you, Meilin.” Rollan took her hand, and Meilin felt her cheeks flushing.

Stupid cheeks, she thought.

“You and Jhi came this far together. You’ve ridden all those waves and storms. Without the two of you, Song and the Oathbound will win. They’ll spread misery to every corner of Erdas. Stopping them isn’t down to just you, me, Conor, or Abeke. It’s not down to the Four Fallen. It’s all of us together. Always has been, always will be.”

They watched her, even the crazy old man, sitting silently with his chin resting on a bony fist. Meilin dearly wished for the ground to rise up and swallow her in that moment. But Jhi sat beside her—unworried, peaceful. That was the panda’s strength. She didn’t have the leopard’s fury or the falcon’s speed, but her quietness mattered. Jhi was a rock in the stormy sea. Meilin had to anchor herself to her patient power.

“All right,” she said eventually. “I’ll do it.”

Meilin read through the scroll again, swiftly but intently. Then she knelt in front of the panda, who sat facing her with her legs splayed out.

Meilin took the hairpin in her left hand and reached out with her right.

Jhi twitched her nose. She reached out with her left paw.

They touched.

Jhi’s pad was warm and leathery. And bigger than Meilin had expected. Jhi was big, something easily forgotten or ignored. Their eyes met, and this time Meilin didn’t look away from her reflection. She focused on it. She saw her brow smooth out and her lips relax. She felt Jhi’s heartbeat mimic her own ever-so-slight trembles that passed through their palms.

Meilin took a deep breath, as the scroll had instructed.

Her eyelids drooped.

She felt her head lower, until her chin rested on her chest.

Still, they kept contact through their palms.

Something tickled her throat. Meilin coughed. The chamber was dusty.

But the cough didn't clear it. Something slick and foul coated the back of her throat. She coughed again, more forcefully.

Her heartbeat quickened.

Liquid filled her mouth, and she gagged under the oily stench of it. She tried to spit it out, but as she opened her mouth, more poured in.

Opening her eyes, she could see only black liquid pouring down over her face.

Bile!

She tried to twist away, but some invisible power locked her motionless, head tilted back and jaw wide open.

Animals screamed all around her, though she couldn't see them. The Bile covered her face. It ran down her throat, up her nostrils, over her eyes, and into her ears.

No! Let me breathe!

Their cries were horrific. Birds screamed and beasts howled. They cried and roared in agony as they were tortured by the Bile.

Her mind reeled at the torments, not just her drowning, but the suffering all around her. The true, evil nature of the Bile was exposed to her, and she couldn't bear it, thinking that she had subjected Jhi to even a fraction of this pain.

Meilin realized it then. In this moment she was Jhi.

Meilin had used her spirit animal. She'd looked down on the noble panda, dismissed her, and held her in contempt. Jhi hadn't been her ally or friend, she was a servant, or even worse, a slave.

Song was right. She and I are the same.

There was no hiding it. She'd opened herself to the truth, and it was too terrible to take.

The cries grew louder, but then Meilin realized they were not beasts in torment, but her friends, calling her!

She clenched her teeth together. They needed her.

Jhi needed her.

Suddenly, Meilin could feel the panda's calming spirit as her own. She sensed her resolve. Orbs of light began to glow around Meilin, constellations that shone against the darkness. Wherever they appeared, the Bile receded. Though her breath was all spent, Meilin forced her chest under control.

Everything would be all right. For perhaps the first time in her life, Meilin believed it.

“Meilin!”

She opened her eyes.

She breathed. No air had tasted sweeter.

Jhi lay her head on her shoulder and hugged Meilin. The panda’s fur smelled of salt and warm damp, but Meilin buried her face into it. She hugged the big bear with all her might, letting the fur absorb her tears.

Then, one after the other, her friends joined them. First Abeke, then Conor, and finally Rollan. They united in the hug until Meilin was surrounded by the best things in her life.

“Are you all right?” asked Abeke.

Meilin drank some more water. The taste of the Bile was still stuck to her throat, but she nodded. “Thanks to you.”

Uraza sat on the table, peering down at the two girls. Jhi was curled up in the corner, not quite asleep. Meilin saw the glint of the beast’s silvery eyes, keeping watch on her.

Essix fidgeted. She wanted to be out and soaring. The falcon had already ripped the wooden armrest of the chair she was perched on. Briggan sniffed the corners of the room, searching for more food.

“Do you feel any different?” asked Abeke.

“Honestly? No. Just ... relieved.” She looked at the hairpin still clenched in her hand. It hadn’t changed. There was no surge of power radiating from it, and it wasn’t glowing. She slipped it back through her hair. “Well?”

Abeke laughed. “It suits you. But then, everything does.”

“Do you two still want to go through with this?” asked Meilin.

Abeke took Uraza’s furry cheeks in her hands and gave the leopard a good shake. The beast growled, revealing fangs capable of killing an antelope—and a Niloan girl—with a single bite. Instead, the leopard licked her.

Meilin smirked. “I guess that’s a yes.”

Abeke rested her arm across the big cat’s shoulders. “She’s a pussycat really.”

Meilin shook her head, amazed at how casually Abeke treated her spirit animal. Not many would dare refer to one of the Great Beasts as a pussycat.

Uraza cast a sidelong glance at Abeke and slowly revealed her claws, a subtle reminder of what she was capable of. Abeke saw it and scoffed. “What are you planning to do? Peel me an apple?”

Uraza’s whiskers twitched with mock annoyance, then she folded her paws under her chin and settled down.

Abeke held up her bow, tapping it gently on the leopard’s head. The beast closed her eyes, trying hard to ignore her.

Meilin finished the jug of water. The sticky coating was gone from her throat. All trace of the Bile washed away.

The boys gathered around. Their spirit animals stopped their activities and also turned to watch.

Abeke sat down cross-legged and gave a short whistle.

Uraza jumped off the table to land with the barest sound. She padded around in a circle before settling down opposite her bonded human.

Meilin met Abeke’s gaze. “Ready?”

Abeke winked. “Ready.”

THE LEOPARD

I'M NOT READY.
I Abeke had seen the others go through the rituals. How easily they'd mastered their doubts! She'd tried to appear strong, at ease, but as she looked at Uraza, worry gripped her chest.

Have we truly forgiven each other?

The image of Zerif sprang unbidden to her mind. He'd taken control of Uraza and made the big leopard attack her.

Abeke would have died if it hadn't been for Shane.

No, she had to put such thoughts out of her head.

That was then. She and Uraza had renewed their bond, and it was stronger than ever.

Meilin watched her. "Are you all right, Abeke?"

"Yes!" she said cheerfully, but it came out sharper than she wanted. "Just ... just let's not waste any more time." Meilin watched her skeptically.

Abeke still couldn't get Shane out of her mind.

He'd been the first friend she'd made after Uraza appeared in her village. They'd spent all those days training together onboard the Conquerors' ship. She'd trusted him.

She sees the fear in his eyes as she attacks.

He fights, but what chance has he got against her claws and fangs?

The blood shines ...

Abeke cried out. That wasn't her! She didn't kill Shane! He was her friend! He was trying to redeem himself!

Abeke gasped as the memories poured uncontrollably through her. She and Uzara merged.

Shane, poor Shane.

Uraza's savagery overwhelmed her. She saw Shane, lying under her paws, teeth gritted together as he struggled to hold on. But there was that dullness in his eyes, the paleness of his skin as his life faded. He beat against her with his fists. It was pitiful that he thought he could defend himself against the leopard, a born predator. What claws did he have? None. Even after absorbing his spirit animal, he was a soft human boy.

He did not lack courage in those last moments. He did it for Abeke, to save her, and that was hardest to bear.

"I'm sorry, Shane."

She tried to resist the bloodlust, but it was too great. Abeke watched helplessly as she finished Shane off. Her sharp ears heard his heartbeat weaken, then stop. His last breath fell against her bloody fur.

Uraza was a killer.

That was the spirit animal Abeke had bonded with.

How could she have been so naive?

And what sort of person did that make her?

Abeke wanted to scream, to throw off her bloody skin, but her cry transformed into a victorious roar. This was what Uraza did. She celebrated in the kill. Such brutal things were her passion.

Abeke licked her lips; the raw, warm smell made her head spin.

No, no, no ...

Was there anything better than this? The power she held, the beauty of her? The muscles and sinews under the fur were sculpted for this one deed, and this one deed alone. Why shouldn't she celebrate it?

Why else have these claws, or possess sharp fangs, if not to tear and rip asunder?

Anything else was a betrayal of her nature.

Shane lay there, the ground darkening with his blood.

And in that moment, Abeke watched herself mourn him.

She saw herself reach out to put her palm against his cheek.

Uraza felt Abeke's sorrow. Abeke knew it as surely as she knew herself. Her violet eyes softened. As Uraza, she licked Shane's hand, trying to stir it to move.

Her body quivered with guilt. Uraza understood more than Abeke had realized. The regret her leopard had been carrying this whole time! The deep, deep shame.

A mighty heart beat within the cage of her ribs, but Uraza was both fierce and soft. Her fur hid the muscles beneath, but there was beauty, too. Uraza was many things. Hunter, killer, courageous, beautiful, and hers.

Zerif had tried to break that bond. Shane had died to protect it.

She knew it and Uraza knew it, too. They'd gone through so much together. It was inevitable that they would have losses as well as victories. The world revolved around seasons of drought and seasons of plenty.

That's what made the rain so precious.

Abeke lifted her head and gazed at the leopard's spots, no one alike. All were unique to her spirit animal. She could gaze at Uraza's patterns forever.

Uraza licked her face and purred.

Abeke laughed as the big cat rested her forepaws upon her shoulders. She nuzzled her nose into Abeke's ear, her whiskers tickling her cheeks.

Shane had died to save their bond. His passing would weigh heavily in her heart forever, but the best way to remember him, to honor him, would be to become closer to Uraza, not more distant.

Uraza sat her head on Abeke's lap. Abeke drew her fingers along the leopard's fur, making her ears twitch.

She felt complete. She and Uraza were one whole, and greater because of it. Abeke tightened her hold on the bow, their bond token, and sighed deeply.

Meilin put her hand on her shoulder; her brows were wrinkled with worry.

"I'm fine," said Abeke, wiping the last of her tears away. "We're fine."

In the back of the room, the crazy old man coughed. "You kids are weird!" he declared cheerfully.

Conor shook Briggan's hairy head. "So, how many times have we saved Erdas?"

Rollan smirked as Essix cried out. “Essix thinks this’ll be her fourth, but they had a head start.”

Meilin was already halfway up the steps. Jhi bounded up behind her somewhat awkwardly. “Let’s not tempt fate. Erdas isn’t saved yet.”

Uraza growled, and Abeke laughed. “Glad you’re so confident.”

The steps went around and around. Essix had to grip onto Rollan’s shoulders; she couldn’t fly in such confines.

Conor raised his hand as they reached the top door. “Shh.”

He leaned against the thick wood and listened. “Four of them. And ... a couple of roast chickens.” He licked his lips. “And a plate of lamb chops. Those are mine.”

Briggan snorted.

“All right. Ours.”

Abeke spoke from the back. “You can tell all that from a sniff?”

Eyes closed, Conor breathed in deeper. “No. I can tell that the cheese is stale, there’s a jug of ale, and that two of the guards haven’t washed in the last week. One’s got a toothache.”

“You can smell a toothache?”

“Upper molar on the left. Rotted all the way through.”

Conor took a step back, his eyes flashing with excitement. “Time to make an entrance.”

He kicked the door open.

Conor’s nose had been right. There were four Oathbound in the guardroom. Two sat around a small table, each caught mid-snack on a piece of roast chicken. The third held a pair of pliers in the wide-open mouth of a fourth, leaning far back on a stool.

Startled by the sudden attack, the soldier with the pliers pulled hard, and the other man screamed as a bloody tooth came out and he fell backward.

Conor grinned. “Is now a bad time?”

They fumbled for their weapons, but it was all too late.

Uraza catapulted across the room, slamming her forepaws onto one of the Oathbound’s chest. He tumbled, his armor clanging loudly like cymbals. He stopped only when he hit the wall, and Uraza stood inches from him, letting him have a good look at her teeth.

Essix shrieked and circled over them, darting in to tear at the face of another guard. He waved his halberd around, too wildly in a room so small and crowded. He knocked his fellow Oathbound across the head and down he went, tossing up the chicken. In came Briggan. The big wolf barked once, then settled his paws on the man's chest.

Jhi did more than that. She lumbered over to the man missing his tooth and sat down on him. At least she licked his face. The guard's look of pain softened a bit.

The last guard merely raised his hand.

Meilin pointed at him. "Drop the chicken."

He did.

Abeke looked around the room. How long had that taken? Mere seconds. She joined Uraza and the terrified guard. "I'm going to ask you a few questions. You're going to answer them truthfully, aren't you?"

He nodded. Which wasn't easy, as he was still upside down.

"Where is Song?"

The man stared at Uraza. "Sh-she's gone back down to the beach with some others. I think."

Uraza growled.

"Please, that's all I know! It's the truth!"

"How many other Oathbound are with them?"

"Just the empress and her inner circle."

Abeke frowned. With the stakes being so high, it would be a bloody battle, but at least it wasn't an army.

The room had plenty of manacles, so Meilin chained the guards. Abeke took the keys and threw them out the small grille.

She turned to the crazy old man, who'd been following their every step. "Keep close. When we tell you to run, run."

He slapped his thighs. "Run like a gazelle!"

"Or just as fast as you can."

They made their way to the outside courtyard.

The sky was unnaturally dark. Morning was still a few hours ahead, but black clouds blocked what moonlight there was. Lightning flashed angrily across the horizon.

Horses neighed in their stables, but otherwise the courtyard was empty. The bad weather had driven everyone to shelter.

Everyone, that is, apart from the soldiers at the gate.

These men weren't Oathbound, but they weren't lounging like the guards earlier. They were in full armor and had their weapons in hand.

Two carried crossbows. They stood safe upon the top platform. Essix could get to them, but Abeke wouldn't want to risk the bird being shot like that.

“We’ll have to charge them,” suggested Rollan.

Meilin shook her head. “We’ll get skewered on their spears. We’re stuck.”

“No, no, you’re not.”

Abeke and the others turned. The old man stepped forward.

He narrowed his eyes. “Leave them to me.”

The crazy old man started across the courtyard, shouting as he went.

Abeke sprinted after him. “Get back here!”

The soldiers turned to face them. One of them wore the golden helmet of a Zhongese captain. “You! Halt!”

Abeke tensed as Uraza growled at her side. Looks as if they were fighting after all.

The old man gazed at the lead soldier. “Captain Chang, isn’t it?”

“Do I know you?”

“Have I changed so much?” said the old man.

Then something strange happened. The old man pulled back his sleeve and a crane burst forth. The great white bird spread its wings, rising to perch on the roof of the gatehouse.

The captain turned from the bird to the old man. “Ambassador Ying?”

The old man scratched his beard. “The same.”

Abeke glanced over to Meilin, who shrugged. What was going on?

The old man beckoned the soldiers. “Tell your men to stand down and let these youngsters pass. They’re here to stop Song.”

“The empress? She gave strict instructions—”

“The empress murdered her own father for the crown,” declared the ambassador. “Let these children pass.”

He spoke with an authority that belied his frail, thin frame. Even the smallest of the soldiers was twice his size, but they all faltered.

Ambassador Ying frowned. “I am not used to repeating myself.”

The captain drew his sword and Abeke nocked an arrow. Uraza tensed, settling back on her haunches so she could catapult herself forward.

The sword clanged on the stony ground. The captain turned to his men. “Drop your weapons and open the gate!”

All around them, spears and halberds dropped; the men set to work on the massive winch that controlled the main gate.

A cold wind blew in off the cliffs. The sound of the crashing waves grew louder.

Ambassador Ying bowed to Abeke and the others. "I'm sorry for the subterfuge, but I needed to be sure."

"Sure of what?" asked Conor.

"That you were worthy of Olvan's trust," said the old man. "I am, or was, the Greencloak ambassador to Zhong's royal court. It was I who oversaw Song's Nectar Ceremony. I saw the delight in the young girl's eyes when her water dragon emerged from the sea, and saw that delight turn bitter, thanks to her father's contempt. I tried to reason with him, only to be exiled." He grimaced at the sad memory. "After his death I hoped to help Song and heal some of the pain she'd suffered over the years; instead I learned she had been behind the emperor's death and the framing of the Greencloaks. But I was imprisoned before I could bring proof to the other lords of Zhong."

Abeke spoke. "Why didn't you trust us earlier?"

Then man sighed. "Child, my empress—a girl who I'd watched grow up—murdered her own father. And yet ... I understood why. The emperor was a tyrant, all the more so to his daughter. If you'd seen what he put her through ..." Ying shook his head. "Even as she had me arrested, I pitied her. But Song's ambitions will destroy us all. Seeing you all truly bond with your spirit animals, I realized the truth. Those relics are too dangerous in her hands. You must get them back."

Abeke frowned. "This conversation is not over, Ambassador."

"But it can wait," he replied. "You have to stop her."

With a heavy clang, the gates locked into position, fully raised.

Briggan howled, and Uraza padded forward. The big leopard looked back at Abeke expectantly.

Abeke tightened her hold on her bow. Was it truly a bond token? How would she know? "I'm coming," she said.

RAIN LASHED DOWN ONTO THEM AS THEY CREPT OUT OF the palace. Abeke shivered under the cold, stinging pellets. Uraza shook herself all the way down to a flick of her tail, throwing off the raindrops. She padded up ahead, growling softly.

The skies heaved with black clouds. Back home this would be cause for celebration; who knew better than her, the Rain Dancer?

Yet these clouds were angry, and they made it known through thunderous clashes and vicious shards of the lightning. Great sheets of light lit the mountainous clouds.

“Song will be down by the beach,” said Meilin. “We need to—”

“Children, shouldn’t you be indoors? And locked up?”

Sid the Generous stood in the middle of the path leading to the cliffs. He wore Stormspeaker and a new suit of brass armor. There were golden rings on his fingers, and his belt was made of silver and golden plates.

“We’ll make this easy for you, Sid,” said Conor. “We’ll count to ten. Just run.”

Sid drew his sword. It was bright, and very sharp. “You expect me to run? Did you not notice this?” He tapped the crown.

“We don’t have time for this,” said Meilin. Her gaze was on the heaving waves beyond. The sea boiled. The choppy water was blacker than the clouds.

“We can’t have him calling for reinforcements,” said Rollan. “We need to deal with him.”

Abeke agreed. “No time like the present.”

Conor pointed to the east. "There's another path down to the beach."

"I'll deal with Sid," said Rollan. "Go."

"After me," said Abeke. She nocked an arrow. "A simple leg wound should do the trick."

At this range, less than a dozen yards, she couldn't miss. Sid didn't move. Maybe he thought he could dodge aside at the last second? But no one was that quick.

Abeke loosed the arrow.

A flash of lightning dazzled her for a moment. When Abeke glanced back, she found Sid was unharmed. "Want to try again?" he said.

Meilin put her hand on Abeke's shoulder. "We'll meet you down by the beach." She nodded to Conor, and off they ran, leaving Rollan and Abeke to deal with Sid the Generous.

Abeke nocked another arrow, creeping closer. Sid waved his sword between them, beckoning her to try again. His crown shimmered. Minute sparks jumped across its spikes.

The air around her crackled. Her hair stood on end....

"Abeke!"

Rollan knocked her over as the air exploded and a lightning bolt struck the ground. The flash blinded her and her head rang from the noise of the strike. Rollan cried out and rolled aside as Sid swiped down with his sword. Sparks jumped from the blade's edge, leaping across a rock.

Sid laughed as the two of them scrambled back to their feet. "That's why it's called Stormspeaker. You never did get much of a chance to use it, did you?"

The air around Sid buzzed. Blue electric bolts jumped along his sword blade, and his skin crackled with energy.

Abeke shot two arrows, barely aiming, but each flew true.

Two whips of lightning erupted from the crown, incinerating the first and slicing the other in half. "That the best you can do?"

Then he attacked.

One moment he was twenty yards away and then he was there, right before her. Uraza roared a warning. Abeke ducked as Sid cut. He stabbed at Rollan, who only barely managed to pull back. Sid laughed as he slashed again, tearing a hole in Rollan's shirt.

Rollan glared. Tarik's cloak billowed behind him, almost like a pair of great wings.

Uraza leaped in to attack. She slammed Sid squarely in the stomach, and the two of them fell. But Sid sprang to his feet with astonishing—lightning—speed. Even Uraza was hard pressed to dodge his blows. The leopard suffered a deep cut along her ribs before retreating.

Puffing for breath, Sid drew back his sleeve and a moment later his wolverine flashed into existence. The beast's fur stood on end as it snarled at them. Sid smiled. "Slasher's been bored sitting on my arm. He wants some blood. He wonders what the blood of the Four Fallen tastes like?"

The bleeding leopard and the wolverine circled one another, snapping their teeth. The wolverine lacked Uraza's speed, but more than made up for it with bulk and wickedly sharp claws. Abeke wanted to shoot him, but didn't dare shift her attention from Sid. They locked eyes, and she knew he was waiting for her to drop her guard, even for a fraction of a second.

Slasher leaped forward, but Uraza sprang aside, her tail twitching away at the last instant. The wolverine snapped his jaws, but Uraza twisted with feline grace, raking her claws along the wolverine's flanks.

The big beast whimpered.

Uraza growled, and Slasher backed away, spitting with rage, and a little fear.

He snapped his big jaws, but Uraza fell silent, and her haunches twitched. Abeke knew the move all too well.

Slasher looked at Sid.

"Go on, finish her!" he yelled at him.

Uraza sprang forward, faster than a blink. She spun in midair, an impossible move for anything but a cat, and clamped her teeth on the back of the wolverine's neck. She bit down and tore off a thick clump of fur.

Slasher screamed and rolled over, kicking and clawing as Uraza snapped at him. She cuffed him across the jaw, and that was enough.

The big wolverine fled.

"Come back here! Come back!" Sid cried out after his spirit animal.

Abeke raised an eyebrow. "You should have spent more time working on your bond, Sid."

Uraza growled, her violet eyes on the Oathbound.

Essix shrieked as she circled above them. Sid bellowed, then thrust his sword skyward. A bolt of lightning tore free from the clouds. Essix wheeled away as sparks smoked her wingtips.

“Leave her alone!” screamed Rollan. He jumped at Sid and—

Abeke gasped. Rollan blurred between them and struck Sid with both fists. Sid tumbled head over heels, but Rollan ...

Rollan flew. His cloak billowed behind him in the storm winds, carrying him upward ten feet, twenty, fifty. Even from here, Abeke saw the boy’s eyes shine with fury. He curled up, bringing his knees to his chest, then dove.

Sid scrambled to his feet, stunned and bewildered. Only at the last second did he see Rollan. He cried out, releasing a blistering wall of lightning bolts.

Rollan spun between them, too fast to be hit.

Slam!

Rollan turned at the last moment and rammed both feet into Sid’s chest. He skimmed over the ground, barely slowing, before winging back into the air.

“How ... how ...?” Sid gasped, clutching his chest. Judging by his wheezing, there were a few cracked ribs under his armor. Sid used his sword to push himself up. Then he turned to Abeke and glared. “You’ll pay, girl! You will pay!”

Abeke sent out two more arrows, but Sid turned both to ash with a flick of his wrist. The power in the crown was building. Stormspeaker hummed, shooting sparks in all directions. Sid’s skin turned a radiant blue. The rain fizzled as it struck him, and his armor ... glowed.

Where was Rollan? Had the storm taken him? Abeke couldn’t search the skies for him, not with Sid about to attack.

The Oathbound shook as the power of the crown filled his body. Even his eyes shimmered with blue light. He cried out and charged.

A wall of supercharged air burst forward. Abeke only just jumped away. But it was a jump that carried her twenty feet through the air, and she landed lightly on her toes. Even when drawing on Uraza’s grace, Abeke had never made a jump that far.

“That’s not possible,” whispered Sid.

“My turn,” said Abeke. She’d seen Uraza do this so often, and it always amazed her how the leopard could cover vast distances with seemingly little effort.

Abeke pounced. Just a slight squeeze and a push from her thighs, and she sailed in a high arc, coming down toward Sid, who just stared with his mouth gaping.

She rammed the tip of her bow into his chest and the discharge of electricity jolted them both in opposite directions.

But as the storm grew, Sid's power multiplied. Already the sparks thickened, forming a flashing shield around him.

He yelled as he slammed his sword down onto her bow. Again and again he struck, yet the seemingly fragile wood held, even as the bolts exploded around them.

"Why ... won't ... it ... break?" he screamed at each blow. He was mad with fury; any skill he had was abandoned in his single-minded rage to smash Abeke to pieces.

But with each thunderbolt, his power decreased. Sid didn't realize what he was doing; he was too filled with blind anger, but Abeke felt it. Each blow was weaker than the last.

She waited until he raised his sword again, then jumped away with a roar. Abeke turned in midair and rammed both heels into his back.

Sid tumbled again, and the Stormspeaker crown rolled off his head.

They both stared at it as it rolled down the path, toward the cliff's edge.

"No!" screamed Sid. All thoughts of the fight were abandoned as he chased after the speeding circlet. "No!"

It rolled faster and faster.

The crown struck a stone and bounced up in the air, spinning and spinning.

"No!" screamed Sid as it went over the edge. "Nooooo!"

Whoosh!

Rollan rose up along the cliff face, grinning. "Lost something?"

He held the crown in the crook of his finger.

Sid turned around. That arrogance was gone, vanished with the swiftness of a lightning bolt. He still held his sword, but the blade looked dull and blunt now. He stared at it, then at Abeke.

Uraza padded up to him and growled. She let Sid get a good close look at those deadly fangs of hers.

Sid threw away the sword and dropped to his knees. "Please, I surrender."

Abeke loaded her last arrow onto her bow. "Rollan? Tie him up."

Rollan landed lightly. His cloak ruffled around his shoulders, then turned limp as plain cloth. He undid Sid's belt and tied his hands behind his back. Then he nudged Sid to lie facedown in the dirt.

“One down,” said Rollan.

But Abeke didn't reply. Instead she walked to the cliff's edge and looked down toward the stony beach. The sea was ... rising.

The battle was far from over.

KANA AND CORDELIA

A FIERCE FEVER COURSED THROUGH CONOR. HE PANTED on the cliff's edge, his skin too hot to feel the biting rain. He was barefoot, his thin shirt shredded and hanging in tatters, but he barely felt the wind howling in from the sea.

Thunderous waves crashed against the black granite rocks, and storm clouds boomed together above him. Lightning flared and crackled.

Every muscle burned. He could barely contain the feral power that threatened to explode his heart.

Conor threw back his head and howled.

Briggan joined him, baying at the sky. Conor had never felt such kinship. The bond they had surpassed anything they'd previously known.

He paused, and sniffed the air. "A scent," he growled.

Meilin looked around. "There's no one here."

He crouched down, almost on all fours. He wrinkled up his nose. "There is."

A cluster of rocks lay ahead of them. The rocks were old and covered in moss, their gray blending to green to match the grass tufts that covered the cliff top.

There was nothing there to see....

"Kana," he growled. "Come out."

The shadows between two of the larger boulders moved. One moment the path ahead was clear, then the next there stood the captain of the Oathbound. Her chameleon was settled on her shoulder.

Kana nodded at Conor. "So much for my ambush."

Meilin's gaze darkened.

Conor didn't need his second sight to know what would have happened. They would have walked straight past Kana, and one of them would have gotten a sword in their backs before they'd even realized the danger.

"It doesn't have to be like this," said Meilin, stepping forward. Jhi stood up beside her, and for a moment Conor wondering if the Great Panda would attack. Instead, Jhi watched the woman with a curious gaze.

"Out of my way, Meilin," Conor said. "I'll deal with her. She can't hide from me while I hold the staff."

But Meilin only stepped closer to Kana. "Please, you know what Song's become. You know what carnage will follow if you let her carry on."

Kana put her hand on the amulet around her neck, the Heart of the Land. "Song's rewarded me well for my loyalty. It is my duty to protect her."

"Song's greatest enemy is herself," Meilin persisted. "She's on the path of destruction and ruin, Kana. And you know it."

All Conor could do was watch. But he saw the doubts fill Kana's eyes.

"I cannot betray my friend."

"I'm not asking you to betray Song." Meilin was only a few feet from Kana. The length of a sword blade. Yet Meilin held out her hand. "I'm asking you to help us save her."

Conor held his breath. Kana still gripped her sword, and he was too far to help.

But Jhi was with Meilin. She padded up to Kana and looked up at her with her silvery eyes.

Meilin gently touched her hairpin, and Conor could almost feel the waves of ... serenity ... of peace radiating from Meilin.

Sometimes it was easy to forget there were other ways to resolve misery and strife. The quiet ways, too often drowned out by the din of battle and the clash of weapons. Looking at Meilin and Jhi together, Conor couldn't help but marvel at the tranquil strength they held.

Hairpin in place, Meilin was the quiet center in the storm. If only more could hear this silence: the tranquility of Jhi the Peacefinder.

Conor saw Kana drop her sword. She had heard that silence.

Kana looked at Meilin. "Please. Help me save my friend."

Smiling, Meilin held out her hand. “I’ll do—”

An arc of flame exploded through the air, striking Kana and sending Meilin and Jhi crashing to the ground.

Conor wiped the rain from his eyes and growled from deep in the back of his throat.

Cordelia stood a distance away, both hands firmly gripping the hilt of the Wildcat’s Claw. Flames licked the bare steel, and the raindrops hissed into steam as they fell upon the metal. She sneered at them. “Kana, you traitor.”

Kana lay on the flame-scorched earth, moaning. The flames had hit her hard. Conor could barely look at the damage they’d done. But Jhi was kneeling beside her, and Conor could feel, even from where he stood, the gentle waves of healing energy radiating from the giant bear.

Meilin leaped beside him, clutching Kana’s discarded sword, but Conor shook his head.

He glanced back at the mortally injured Kana. “Go! Help her! Jhi will need you.”

Then, teeth gritted, he turned to face Cordelia. “She’s mine.”

“Think you can beat me, dog?” sneered Cordelia. Despite the pouring rain, she stood steady. “Come here and I’ll turn your pet into my rug.”

Briggan snarled and circled the Oathbound killer.

Conor’s heart pumped hot, raging blood through him. He smelled the sweat upon Cordelia’s brow, the oil upon her armor, and even the animal fat she’d used on her boots as polish. He could hear Cordelia’s beating heart, her ragged breaths, and even in the firelight of her blade, he saw her hesitation.

Cordelia the Kind was used to lashing helpless sailors, beating down on the weak. Now she was looking at someone who wasn’t afraid to fight her, someone who actually relished facing her.

In spite of himself, Conor grinned, baring his teeth the way he’d seen Briggan bare his own a thousand times. His hand clenched the crook at his side.

His bond with Briggan had opened up the world in so many ways, but that bond didn’t compare to what was happening now—nor the pure joy he felt.

The joy of the hunt.

Conor howled as he charged, startling even Cordelia.

He crashed into her and they tumbled over the rocky ground. Cordelia rammed the hilt of her sword into his back as Conor swiped at her with his shepherd's crook. She kicked him in the chest, and the pair rolled apart. Conor sprang to his feet while Cordelia stumbled, stunned by his ferocity, and weighed down by her armor. "An animal, that's all you are ..."

Conor saw the attacks before they came. It was just so clear what Cordelia would do. He spun and easily dodged her blows.

Cordelia screamed at him, wild incoherent cries of rage and frustration as killing blows missed by inches. Conor responded with heavy blows of his own, kicks and punches, battering her down until she swayed, fanning flames out from the sword to hold him off.

Briggan joined in, snapping and clawing at any slight opening in Cordelia's defenses. The wolf leaped and pounced from all directions. He buried his fangs into Cordelia's leg armor, almost throwing her down. Cordelia swung with her sword, stabbing him, and the wound scored Briggan's shoulder. The wolf's attacks only became more ferocious.

"Filthy animal!" Cordelia screamed. She took a two-handed grip on the sword and bore down on Conor with a series of savage slashes.

Conor tightened his grip upon his crook as each blow fell.

"Nothing but a stick, that's all you have. I'll turn it into kindling!" snarled Cordelia.

Conor gave her a toothy grin. Then, without thought, he threw up his crook.

The Wildcat's Claw bit into the wood, an inch from Conor's skull. If he'd been a moment too slow ... And yet he knew the blow would come. Just as he seemed to know more and more of what was to come. And who would eventually win this fight.

"Break!" screamed Cordelia, heaving her whole weight behind the sword. "Why won't you break?"

Yet Conor's crook held fast, despite the steel edge and the flames. He'd seen that sword slice through stone as if it were nothing, but the old wood held.

They fought on, each landing blows that would have crippled a normal person. Briggan's near limitless endurance kept Conor standing, despite the bleeding cuts across his limbs and torso, and Cordelia's sword gave her the fury and swiftness of the legendary wildcat.

But Conor needed this fight to be over soon. Something terrible was coming. He felt it like a flood rushing over him.

Cordelia's armor protected her from the worst of the blows, but he had no such protection. Cordelia knew it. She was smiling. "Your legs starting to feel a bit wobbly, boy? That's the blood loss. All my little scratches, they add up in the end."

Conor wasn't interested in wasting time on talk. A dark shape was filling his vision. A great and all-consuming wave. He could see it clearly. Too clearly. It was the same wave from his dreams, and it was headed toward ...

Huge waves battered the cliffs. Conor watched a chunk of rock crack. It tumbled away to crash into the sea.

"Song's using the Dragon's Eye," said Cordelia. She chuckled. "She took to it quickly. It's powerful, boy, especially when combined with her water dragon. Soon she'll be sending a tidal wave all the way across the sea. It'll build, mile by mile, and when it hits Greenhaven? Your Greencloak friends won't be getting any trial."

Conor saw it all. How could he have missed it before? The future was laid out to him, as clear as Cordelia's burning eyes.

But no future was totally certain.

"Your mistress isn't the first to try and destroy the Greencloaks," he said. "And she won't be the last."

"Either way, you won't be around to find out."

Cordelia jabbed, then reversed her blow, catching Conor's staff and knocking it out of his hands. It flipped ten feet away.

Unarmed, Conor felt Briggan's strength suddenly drain from him. His second sight cut away abruptly, leaving Conor feeling momentarily blind. He could barely hold Cordelia back. A deep cut across his ribs had him gasping; another along his thigh brought him to one knee.

But the wolf in him wouldn't, couldn't, give up. Even as Cordelia raised her sword to finish him off, he leaped forward, grabbing her wrists.

"Let go!" she yelled.

He couldn't hold on for long. Conor's head swam. Cordelia, seeing his injured side, rammed her knee into the heavily bleeding wound, laughing as she did it again and again.

Conor fought against the pain and weariness threatening to bring him down. He grabbed at the sword in Cordelia's hand.

They struggled and slipped. The rain had made the rocky, bare edge of the cliffs treacherous underfoot. Barefoot, Conor's feet suddenly burned with pain, but he found easy purchase on the stone. Cordelia still wore the heavy, stiff armored boots she'd fallen in the sea with during their last fight.

She twisted the sword from his weakening grip, and Conor stumbled back.

Smiling, Cordelia pulled the sword past her shoulder and swung.

Conor ducked.

Cordelia spun on the spot, carried away by the force of her swing. She screamed as it carried her over the edge.

Conor ran to the side of the cliff.

Cordelia hung a few feet below, her fingers clenched around the section of rock. She still held the Wildcat's Claw in the other hand.

Conor cursed. The temptation of leaving her to fall was powerful. But he flattened himself on the ground and reached out. "Take my hand."

Cordelia glared at him.

"Drop the sword and take my hand," ordered Conor. "It's the only way."

"No! The Claw is mine!"

"Don't be a fool, Cordelia!"

Cordelia screamed as she thrust the sword tip at him in a desperate lunge. But the tip struck against the rock, a jarring blow that shook Cordelia loose.

Their eyes met. The rage in hers faltered as her fingers came away from the rock. She began tilting away from the cliff face.

Her eyes widened, first in shock, then in fear. Still she held on to the precious sword.

Cordelia opened her mouth, but if she screamed Conor didn't hear it over the thunder of the waves. They seemed to reach up for her as she fell. Cordelia was there, and then she was not.

Conor groaned and sank into the ground.

It wasn't the pain from his cuts. Those felt distant and vague. It was the weariness. Conor couldn't move; his entire body lay there, like lifeless stone.

He tingled, suddenly chilly. Then he didn't feel much at all as a strange, peaceful numbness spread over him.

Briggan sat down beside him, pressing his warm furry body against his own. The wolf panted, his eyes bright and concerned. He licked Conor's face. Conor laughed, but his chest ached.

"Conor!" Suddenly, Meilin was beside him. She turned him over and he saw shock spread across her face. "Oh, no. Oh, please ..."

He wanted to tell her he was fine, but moving his lips was too much effort. So was keeping his eyes open.

"No, you don't," she said. Meilin put her hands upon the wide tear across his side.

The feeling of heaviness ... lifted.

The numbness fell away as he warmed. A fresh, pulsing energy ran through him. Conor heard his heart pounding with new strength.

He opened his eyes. "I knew you would save me," Conor said. "I saw it."

Meilin smiled, looking puzzled. "How are you feeling?"

Conor sat up. The wound on his ribs had gone. There wasn't even a scar. "I feel ... like new."

"Good." Meilin helped him to his feet. "Because we now need to stop that."

Waves, fifty feet high at least, pounded the cliffs, sending tremors through the rocks and into Conor's bones. The sky was thick with swirling storm clouds, and lightning blistered the blackness.

Down on the beach, among the crashing waves, Song stood alone. She held the Dragon's Eye aloft and it glowed with power.

Out in the swirling waves, Conor saw her water dragon. He watched him glide, row upon row of spiky scales cutting through the surface. Finally the tail pounded the surface, driving the creature under. It was easily as tall and as broad as an oak trunk.

The Dragon's Eye had transformed the small water dragon into a gargantuan monster.

"How's Kana?" Conor asked, collecting the shepherd's crook from the ground. As soon as it was in his hands he felt stronger. His heart beat again with the blood of the wolf.

"She'll live," Meilin said. She pointed behind him. Conor turned to find Kana sitting up beside Jhi. The burns had been reduced to a faint reddening of her skin. Her arms were wrapped around herself. Toey, her chameleon, was nestled on her shoulder. The Oathbound captain had tears running down her face. She suddenly looked very young.

“Please,” Kana said, her voice cracking. “You have to stop Song.”

SONG AND MEILIN

MEILIN COULD BARELY STAND AS THE WIND REACHED hurricane proportions. Zhong's coast was vulnerable to such winds, but not this time of year, and never so swiftly.

The waves beat against the cliffs with terrifying fury. It was as if the sea had a mind, but one consumed with unquenchable rage.

She stared down at the ships in the docks. One had been ripped free and was even now being pummeled by the rising sea. Another, also torn from its holding, was wrecked against the rocks that embraced the quayside. She saw men floundering in the churning waters.

And the cliffs themselves shook, unable to withstand the onslaught.

Apart from the wreckage now littering the beach down below, there was just one figure. Her loose hair fanned out in the wild winds. Her elegant green robes billowed around her. The Dragon's Eye, held aloft, shone with a brilliant rainbow of colors.

"Song," muttered Conor. He was breathing hard and his torso was splashed with blood, but the fire in his eyes burned with feral intensity. "We need to get down there."

Out in the dark, deep sea, Meilin saw how the waves were building. Each rose a few feet higher than the last. Song stood balanced on a huge boulder, but Meilin didn't think it would be long before the beach was submerged. Didn't she realize that?

Abeke joined them at the cliff's edge. She pointed to the narrow path leading down. "We need to take the Dragon's Eye from her."

Rollan glided down out of the storm, accompanied by Essix. His cloak fluttered around his shoulders, the tips still dancing in the breeze. “I’ll fly down there and distract her.”

A loud rumble turned their attention away from the beach to the palace.

A tower swayed as the ground beneath it cracked. It tilted this way and that, not quite falling, as more and more cracks broke along its marble surface. Then it leaned over the cliff and first the uppermost level broke away, disintegrating into smaller clunks as the pieces shattered upon the granite cliffs. The rest of the tower soon followed, breaking apart into countless white stones. They burst upon the black rocks below and were instantly swallowed by the sea.

“It’s all coming down,” Meilin said with horror. “The whole cliff’s collapsing, and the palace is going with it.”

Even from where they stood, they could see people fleeing—servants, soldiers, and other nobles. Walls ripped apart and roofs caved in. The tall, elegant windows along the palace façade shattered.

Meilin turned to Jhi. “Go to the palace. Help the injured as best you can.”

The big panda hesitated.

Meilin touched the hairpin. “With this, I’ll always have you with me. Go. Let me deal with Song.”

The panda wrapped her paws around Meilin, and Meilin felt a surge of warm, supportive strength pass into her. Then the panda ran, in her own funny way, off to the collapsing palace.

Down on the beach, Song didn’t so much as turn her head toward her crumbling palace. She was focused on the rising tsunami.

And the creature stirring within the battling waves.

Scales rippled just under the surface. A tail, as long and as thick as any column, flicked from side to side.

Conor frowned. “Song’s water dragon has grown a bit since we last saw him.”

Lightning cracked in the tumultuous black clouds. Rain lashed down, sharp and stinging and hard. The raindrops were thrown horizontal by the howling winds.

Meilin looked to her friends, poised on the edge of the cliff top. Conor grinned, then raised his head and howled. It was a challenge, it seemed to her: a cry of defiance at nature itself. He stretched out his arms, eyes closed, relishing the elemental attack. Then he gritted his teeth and bounded along the crumbling cliff path with Briggan beside him.

It was a long way down. Meilin hated the way the pebbles broke off the edge of the path with every tremor. But she needed to stop Song.

How big was Seaspray now? When they'd arrived, Meilin could have carried him in her arms. But now? Even his tail seemed to go on forever.

He turned and turned, churning the sea, creating waves that grew as they spread away from the center. Those crashing against these cliffs were forty or fifty feet high. But the waves being carried toward Greenhaven—how high would they grow?

Enough to drown the island, unless they stopped Song.

Step lightly, and step fast.

Could the path take her weight? Many of the steps had already cracked. Meilin moved on tiptoe, jumping from one ledge to another, never pausing lest the ground beneath her give way.

The cliff shook, and she curled up as rocks tumbled down, showering her with grit and earth.

“Meilin!”

Abeke grabbed her arm and hauled her away as a boulder crashed down the cliff, taking more rock with it.

Any one of those could have turned me to bloody pulp.

Heart in her throat, she could only nod her thanks. Abeke winked. “I’ll see you down there.” Then she squatted down and leaped, clearing a dozen feet and seemingly running over the path without touching it.

Uraza stopped beside her, tail twitching.

Meilin looked down at her. “I’ll be fine. You go.”

The leopard didn’t wait for her to change her mind. She pounced from one boulder to another after Abeke.

A wave struck, throwing Meilin against the cliff. She gulped down a rush of freezing seawater. The weight of it pushed her hard into the stone surface. Meilin panicked, sure that the water would crush her, but then it surged away just as her air ran out. Meilin stood, shivering, bedraggled, and gasping on the uneven path. Looking down, she saw that she was still fifty feet above the beach.

And within the madness there was Song. The empress stepped up onto a higher rock, holding the Dragon’s Eye aloft. She was still raising the sea to greater, more monstrous heights.

“Song!” Meilin yelled, her voice battling against the winds. “You have to stop! You’re going to destroy everything!”

Song turned. Somehow she had heard Meilin over the thunder and the crashing waves. But Song just laughed, scornful of Meilin’s desperate plea.

The Eye was smashing everything around it, but Song didn’t care. She’d been granted unimaginable power, and she wanted to use it. The price didn’t matter.

“Song! Please! You have to stop!”

Another wave crashed against the cliff, but Meilin was ready. Taking a huge breath, she dove into the sea.

The churning black waters tossed her over and over. Meilin covered her head, in case she was smashed back against the cliff.

She couldn’t fight such power. She could only be carried by it. Her father had trained her in martial arts from an early age, so Meilin knew how to deal with opponents bigger and stronger than her.

She relaxed, allowing herself to be rolled, then carried out in the backwash.

Now she beat her arms and legs as hard as she could, finally breaking the surface.

The beach was almost fully submerged. Nothing remained of the ships or docks but shattered splinters and ragged sails. Whole sections of the cliff had sheared away, forming a jagged, uneven range of peaks and plinths. The slanted stone was slick with seawater and clumps of earth.

Meilin gritted her teeth and headed to one of the largest stones, the one where Song stood.

Where were the others?

Abeke leaped from rock to rock, but could not yet reach Song. An enormous whirlpool had formed between them, spinning madly. Uraza prowled along the water’s edge, roaring in frustration.

Rollan rode the winds, but the air was buffeting him back. The churning sea exploded at him with fists of water.

Conor battled against the monstrous water dragon out among the waves. Briggan rode the gigantic lizard’s back, clawing at his scales, looking for an opening. Seaspray lashed out and snapped his jaws, which were big enough to break a ship apart. But Conor seemed to know where the dragon’s chaotic bites would fall before even he did. As Seaspray smashed into a recently abandoned rock, Conor jumped on the lizard’s back, high up between his shoulder blades. Seaspray roared and shook, tossing Briggan into the water, but Conor held on, having found a spot the water dragon couldn't reach.

They couldn't beat the water dragon, but they kept him distracted enough.

Meilin's whole body ached from her swim, but Song's rock was a few yards away. She needed to push just a little bit harder.

The sudden surge slammed her against the rock, winding her. Meilin hooked herself onto the slippery stone as the water receded. She hung there, gasping.

She flicked her hair from her face and stood up. "Song. Stop it. Now."

The princess spun around, startled. Then she smiled and laughed mockingly. "Meilin! Look at you! The pretty general's daughter resembles a drowned rat."

Meilin didn't even have enough strength to stand up straight. She slouched, her legs wobbling from sheer exhaustion. The swim hadn't been far, but it felt as if she'd fought the entire sea to get here.

Song held out the Dragon's Eye. "Here. Take it. If you can."

"This isn't a game. Thousands will die if you go any further."

Song smiled. "Take it."

Meilin shot out her hand, but Song's blow was lightning fast, a heel palm strike that almost knocked Meilin back into the sea. She tottered on the edge, arms flailing, while Song laughed.

"Come now, Meilin. Is that the best you can do? I had heard your father trained you to be a great warrior. Well, I trained, too, you see, far from the eyes of my father. All in preparation for the day I would kill him."

Meilin shook the last of the fuzziness from her head. She planted her feet firmly on the water-slick rock and flexed her fingers.

Song shifted her weight from one foot to another, keeping high on the balls of her feet. She needed to be wary of—

Song's first kick flicked out low. Meilin blocked, but the blow had barely touched her before Song spun and smacked her other heel right into Meilin's jaw.

This time she fell.

"Poor Meilin," muttered Song. "That feint is the oldest trick in the book."

It was, and she'd fallen for it.

Meilin got back up. She glared at the princess.

Song's gaze darkened. "I thought you of all people would understand. You truly are pathetic, Meilin. Happy to stand in the shadows of lesser folk, allowing them to take charge and rule your life. I would pity you if I wasn't so disgusted."

Meilin shook her head. "Well, I do pity you, Song. What have you achieved? Death and destruction. You'll find the throne room a lonely place. Even if all the kingdoms of Erdas bow down before you, it will be an empty victory. No one will trust you. No one will admire you. They'll fear and hate you. Just as you feared and hated your father." She held out her hand. "There's still time to turn back, Song. Kana is waiting for you up at the palace."

Meilin felt a strange, peaceful energy radiating out with her words. The hairpin. Her connection to Jhi, the Peacefinder, had imbued their bond token with an uncanny ability to calm the anguished. This was how Meilin had finally overcome Kana—not with blows, but with words. It was Jhi's greatest gift.

And it wasn't working.

Song screamed and launched forward.

Song's blows rained down, but they were clumsy and unfocused. All skill and tactics vanished in her rage. A twist, a deflection, a side step robbed Song of their power, while Meilin came in close, denying the empress her most powerful kicking attacks.

Meilin needed the Dragon's Eye.

A wrist lock forced Song to her knees. "Drop the Eye, Song," Meilin said. "Drop it!" She added a little more pressure, and Song screamed. "Just drop it and this can all be over!"

"Meilin! Look out!"

She turned toward the cry. Abeke stood, balanced perilously on a shard of rock, pointing to the sea.

Meilin looked.

Song's water dragon rose up out of the water, jaws widening as he bore down on her.

Seaspray had come to save his partner.

The distraction was enough for Song to twist free. She stumbled away. "Kill her! Kill her!"

Meilin leaped off the rock a second before the water dragon slammed down. The stone disintegrated, and Meilin was lost to the churning sea.

Wave after wave pummelled Meilin. She couldn't break out of the water! Her lungs burned as she tried to hold on to her breath, but it was getting harder. She didn't have any strength left. The surface, the air, was just beyond her fingertips, but her legs wouldn't push her up the few feet she needed.

The wake generated by the water dragon twisted her over and over, sending her crashing against one rock and then another; the ragged corners tore at her skin.

Her arms hung limply in the water. She couldn't do any more.

Meilin raised her head, feebly, toward the surface. Lightning flashed across the sky and a huge shadow passed overhead. She tried, one last time, to reach up, but her limbs felt as heavy as lead.

Her friends needed her....

Powerful fingers grabbed hold of her collar and locked tightly around the material. Then she was hauled out of the water with a roar.

Meilin gasped, filled her chest with the salty air, as Rollan flew her gently to the cliff ledge where Abeke was waiting.

Meilin rolled over, coughing out water.

Rollan held her hand as she did. "Interesting technique. Were you hoping to drink the entire sea?"

Despite herself, Meilin laughed. "Thank you."

"Of course," Rollan said, his voice gentle. "Don't scare me like that." Meilin realized his hand was shaking. She squeezed it, and he squeezed back.

"It's not over yet," Abeke said. She and Rollan lifted Meilin back to her feet.

Conor and Briggan continued fighting the water dragon, with Song now riding upon his back.

The two didn't have a chance.

Seaspray lashed out with his tail and knocked Briggan across the water. The wolf spun over the surface like a skipping stone before Conor called him into passive.

Conor tried to climb up after Song, but the dragon buckled, flipping him off. He splashed down, disappearing for a few heart-freezing moments, before breaking the surface. Using his shepherd's crook as a float, he paddled toward cover.

"Watch yourself," said Abeke as she pulled Meilin against the cliff wall.

Rocks fell past them.

“This whole cliff’s coming down,” said Rollan. “And the palace with it. It’s right above us.”

The cliff shook again, and the sound of it drowned out the thunder.

But not the lightning. Song appeared just off the cliff, outlined in the brilliant flashes. Song glared from her high seat on the dragon’s shoulders.

She’s beyond help, Meilin realized bleakly. All she has now is blind anger.

All she has ...

“Song!” Meilin cried. “Come get me, you coward!”

“Meilin ...” warned Rollan. “We’ve got to go. Now.”

Meilin ignored the pebbles falling all around her. The cliff was coming down.

She cupped her hands and shouted. “Your father may have been cruel, but you’ve become everything you hated about him! You seized the throne by treachery! All you have is through lies and betrayal! What kind of empress will you be?”

Abeke grabbed her wrist and glared at her. “Meilin! We need to get off this ledge!”

The cliff began tilting. The palace above cracked, a large chunk of wall missing them by mere inches.

Song screamed with pure, incoherent fury. The water dragon lurched toward them, determined to finish off Meilin once and for all.

That’s it ...

“Meilin!” yelled Rollan. “Take my hand!”

The thunder was deafening, but it wasn’t from the storm. The rocks above them roared angrily.

Massive chunks of marble, granite, and earth came tumbling down. Abeke and Rollan were right beside her, yelling, but Meilin couldn’t hear them over the noise. This was how the world ended.

The water dragon plowed through the waves. Song glared at Meilin, her hatred consuming her.

“Come on ...” muttered Meilin.

Seaspray opened his immense jaws and gave out a deep, dreadful roar.

He rose up. Ten feet, then twenty.

“We’re going!” Rollan locked his arms around Meilin’s waist. Abeke prepared to leap.

The water dragon towered over them. Song’s face was lit by lightning. The wind whipped all around her. She was wild, the Dragon’s Eye burning in her hands with a malevolent light.

Then she glanced up, and Song’s expression twisted from one of rage to terror.

The cliff collapsed.

Abeke leaped from the cliff. Rollan pulled Meilin close and flew.

Song gave a single cry, but it was immediately drowned out by the cataclysmic sound of the entire cliff coming down. The palace tumbled in an avalanche of marble and dirt.

Abeke bounced from one boulder to another, then up onto a ledge wide enough to support her. “Come on!” she ordered as she raced up the broken remains of the path.

Rollan held tightly to Meilin as he followed, the wind whipping his cloak behind them. Meilin looked back, catching glimpses of the destruction behind the billowing cloth.

The water dragon thrashed in blind fury as countless tons of cliff fell down upon him. There was no sign of Song.

No matter how mighty the dragon was, Seaspray couldn’t withstand the onslaught of rock. The dragon vanished as a huge cloud of dust exploded onto the surface of the water.

Meilin’s ears still rang with the sounds of tearing rock for a long time after.

She, Rollan, and Abeke sat on the edge of the cliff, or what remained of it, overlooking the beach. Jhi found them there, and immediately began licking the three, closing the worst of their wounds.

The sea calmed and the storm receded, until all that fell was quiet rain.

Wet, bedraggled, and bruised, Conor came stumbling up the cliff path to collapse down beside them, too exhausted to speak. He released Briggan. The wolf went to the edge of the cliff and howled. Uraza sat down beside Abeke and nuzzled against her.

Essix circled above, her great wings unfurled as she rode the sea wind.

The sun broke through the clouds. A strip of blue sky appeared. Meilin leaned back into the grass, letting the sunlight warm her.

It was over.

PEACE

ESSIX SOARED OVER THE BEACH. THE SUN SHONE brightly in a cloudless sky with a whispering wind. The sea itself was a calm mirror, the waves gently lapping upon the pebbles and ruins.

A grand ship waited a mile out, its wide sails displaying the colors of the Niloan High Chieftain. All other boats and ships were now just driftwood.

Rollan sat on what had been the outer gatehouse of the palace. He followed the flight of the falcon and was more than tempted to take off after her. But the seagulls seemed upset enough with Essix in the sky. No telling how they'd react to him flying among them.

Instead, he patted his cloak, neatly folded beside him. Did you see me, Tarik? he thought. I flew! Just like Essix. Your cloak became my wings. You saved me again.

Soldiers explored the beach, still searching for the remains of Song and Seaspray. They found nothing. Wherever the empress and her spirit animal were, the sea had them now.

But others had been recovered. Not far away were three bodies, covered in green cloaks. A guard sat beside them and someone had already placed flowers upon each.

Rollan's heart was heavy. Kofe, Lady Cranston, and Salaman had all perished trying to save him, a boy they hardly knew.

They were Greencloaks.

He rested his palm on Tarik's cloak. It was a coarse piece of cloth, old and threadbare in places; it had been torn and repaired a dozen times. To look at it, one might think it was little more than rag, but to him it was priceless.

Even more so now.

The life of a Greencloak was not one of peace and comfort. They spent their days on the road, and their nights under the stars. They made mistakes. Occasionally big ones.

But they were always there when it mattered most, trying to help. Sometimes they failed, but they never gave up.

“Come down from there, Rollan.” Meilin beckoned him from below. “The engineers haven’t declared the building safe.”

“I’m fine here,” he said. “Why don’t you come up?”

She folded her arms defiantly. “We can’t all fly, in case you’ve forgotten.”

Sighing, Rollan tucked his cloak under his arm and climbed down. “Satisfied?”

“There’s breakfast cooking at the camp.”

Rollan’s belly rumbled. “Now you’re talking.”

The “camp” was a chaotic cluster of tents—large and small, elegant and tatty. Jhi sat happily in the grass with a fistful of bamboo. Some of the smaller children of the palace staff watched her in rapt awe. Jhi generally ignored them, but any sudden movement had them shrieking.

Abeke and Uraza were on the beach. The big leopard was sniffing around the ruins, the same way Briggan and a few of the hunting dogs were searching what was left of the palace. Not everyone had been accounted for, including Brunhild the Merry and Wikam the Just.

But most of the Oathbound were. Cordelia’s body was under a sheet, and Kana and Sid sat in chains at the edge of camp.

Rollan saw them in the distance. The Zhongese nobles weren’t leaving anything to chance. Three of the biggest warriors the palace could spare were acting as babysitters.

Kana caught his eye. She gave him a weak smile and a little shrug—What can you do?—then glanced down to Toey curled in her lap.

But the longer Rollan watched her, the more he saw the pain beneath. Kana was good at hiding, but Rollan had always been good at seeing people.

The Oathbound captain had lost everything, including her best friend.

“What’s going to happen to her?” he asked.

Meilin glanced to the prisoners. “I don’t know,” she said. “They’ll be in prison for a long time. And the Oathbound will be disbanded, of course.” She sighed. “I’ll speak on her behalf. In the end, Kana surrendered. She was trying to help her friend. That should count for something.”

Rollan shook his head. It hadn’t been so long ago his only concern had been where to get his next meal. Now the fate of kingdoms rested on his shoulders. He paused and sniffed. “Something smells good.”

“What is it?”

He tapped his nose. “Let’s just follow and find out, shall we?”

They came to a small campfire with a large cauldron bubbling over it.

A soldier handed them each a bowl of vegetables and noodles. A few herbs floated in the green liquid; it smelled delicious. Rollan’s stomach growled with approval, and impatience. He took a spoon and scooped a mouthful. The soup burned, but it was good. He savored every morsel.

A shadow fell over Meilin and Rollan as they ate.

Rollan squinted. “Chief Ugo?”

He smiled. “The same.” He sat down beside them. “What an extraordinary night.”

“I’m glad your ship survived.”

The big man nodded as he accepted his own bowl. “It’s a good thing we were anchored offshore. Still, it was a rough night for Worthy and the other prisoners.”

“How is Worthy?”

“Convinced he’ll never be a sailor.”

The chief turned to face them. “What you and your companions did is incredible.”

Meilin spoke. “How’s Greenhaven?”

“Safe. Whatever cataclysm Song was summoning, it died with her. Port cities from here to Greenhaven will have suffered flooding, but the great wave never made it. With Song dead and two bond tokens back in safe hands, the truth of what happened is being carried to the Citadel. The Greencloaks are exonerated.” He finished off the bowl and stood up. “Now my business here is ended, and I’m looking forward to getting sand between my toes. Next time you’re in Nilo, come visit.”

Rollan winked at Meilin. “Always good to have friends in high places.”

“I’ve always had friends in high places,” replied Meilin, smiling.

Rollan laughed. “I was born in the gutter. Let me savor the moment.”

Meilin looked over to a crowd at a nearby tent. “Speaking of high places, we need a word with Ambassador Ying.”

“Ah, leave him to it, Meilin. Today’s too nice a day to talk politics.”

The center of camp was a table salvaged from the kitchens. Ambassador Ying, still dressed in his prison rags, had spent all morning writing letters and instructions. His crane watched, perched up on the top of the adjacent tent. The nobles of Zhong and representatives from the other kingdoms were being summoned to discuss the recent government opening, and how to find a way forward without their empress.

No sooner would he finish one letter than another blank sheet of parchment was put in front of Ying. His fingers were black with ink stains. Riders queued up, their horses saddled and ready.

Rollan refilled his bowl from the simmering cauldron. “There’s going to be a lot of rebuilding.”

“The Summer Palace is beyond saving,” Meilin said. “But there are other—”

Rollan shook his head. “I mean trust. Song assassinated her father. She blamed the Greencloaks. The other rulers will be wary, not just of Zhong, but of each other. And of themselves. Who knows if they have another Song within their own families?”

Meilin looked at him, curiously.

“What?” Rollan wiped his chin. “Have I got something on my face?”

“Right there.” Meilin tapped his forehead. “It looks like wisdom.”

He blushed. “Hey, I keep telling you all how great I am. You just never listen.”

“I know you’re great,” Meilin said, and Rollan felt his cheeks blush even further. Stupid cheeks.

Meilin sighed, glancing back to the sea. “Song framed the Greencloaks. She killed countless people, including her own father. But I can’t help but wonder what would have happened if someone had seen how trapped and desperate she was. If someone had done something to help her.”

“You feel bad for her?”

“It doesn’t make any difference.”

A servant approached, falling into a low bow. “The ambassador wishes to speak with you.”

“About what?”

The servant frowned. "I think he has a request of you."

Rollan groaned. "Can't he get someone else? In case you hadn't noticed, we did nearly have a palace fall on our heads last night."

Meilin laughed and nudged him. "Let's find out what he wants, at least."

Rollan swallowed the last of the soup down, then headed off to the heart of the camp. Abeke and Conor joined them, their spirit animals at their heels.

"Any luck?" Rollan asked.

Abeke shook her head. "Song's gone. They've sent a few boats out, but I doubt they'd find anything now. The storm would have carried her too far out."

Pain flickered across Meilin's face. That was a terrible death, but Song had brought it upon herself.

Rollan put his hand on her arm. "You tried to help her, Meilin. You really did."

Ambassador Ying stood up as they arrived. He stretched out to his full height, which wasn't much. "All this hunching over letters isn't doing me any good."

"You need us for something?" asked Rollan.

Ying arched one white eyebrow. "There will always be work for Greencloaks. There's no escaping it, boy."

Rollan rolled his eyes.

Ying laughed, and Rollan thought he could still hear a bit of the crazy old man in him. "The Dragon's Eye and the Wildcat's Claw are gone. That's half of our order's precious gifts. But the best gift is peace, don't you think? Peace ... and the truth. Which will be hard for some to bear."

"The truth about Song?" asked Meilin.

"I pity the poor girl," the old man said with a sigh. "She was kind, once, Meilin. You could see that, couldn't you?"

Meilin nodded.

"But that kindness will be forever lost. Her name will become a cursed one, as will the memory of her. She was misguided, twisted by ambition and anger. I think perhaps I share some of the blame for that. I didn't do enough to protect her. To help foster her bond. But we cannot hide her crimes, for then innocents suffer." He handed her a scroll. "Take this to Greenhaven."

Meilin took it, but held it gently. "What's it say?"

“Everything. The Greencloaks were framed, and I have the signatures of a whole palace full of witnesses to prove it. That should quash any hint of our order’s misdeeds. Present that letter to Olvan. We’ll need to convene another conference at the Citadel.” He looked darkly at the two chained captives. “There will be a trial. All will be made public soon.”

Rollan looked at the tube of paper. They were going back to Greenhaven. Relief flooded through him.

A soldier approached. He saluted and then whispered to Ying. The old man smiled. “That’s wonderful news!” he cried.

“What is it?” asked Conor.

“My breakfast is ready.”

Rollan chuckled, then smacked his lips. “The noodle soup’s pretty good.”

Ying smiled. “I know. It’s my mother’s own recipe.”

“I hope we get a bigger cabin than last time,” said Rollan as he gazed out at the ship.

“I just hope we get rooms of our own.” Conor sat on the beach while Briggan sniffed around the pebbles. His crook lay on the sand beside him. “No offense, but you snore.”

“I do not snore.”

Abeke laughed. “It’s like the trumpeting of a herd of elephants, Rollan.”

“Why didn’t you say anything?”

Abeke shrugged. “I kind of liked it. Reminds me of home.”

Rollan looked over to Meilin. “Is it that bad?”

“Hey, I’m not part of this discussion.” She rubbed her panda’s belly. “I just want to make sure Jhi’s had enough bamboo for the trip.”

Essix circled overhead. With one swoop she scared off a flock of seagulls, then she beat her wings and settled down at the edge of their circle. There was a fish in her beak.

“Fattening up yourself, eh?” Rollan asked.

The falcon set to the busy task of tearing and eating.

The ship was anchored a few hundred yards out. It was evening, but the captain had declared he wanted to set sail at low tide. Ying had been equally keen to get his letter to Greenhaven sooner rather than later.

A rowboat approached, a lantern hanging at the front. The boat bobbed over the breaking waves and the oarsmen jumped out to drag it up.

“That’s our cue,” said Conor. He gave Briggan’s furry cheeks a good shake. The wolf slobbered over his face. “Yuck.”

Then Briggan vanished, and the mark appeared on his arm. Conor gazed at it for a moment, then rolled down his sleeve. He collected his crook, moving it from hand to hand, before settling it in his left. He picked up his rucksack.

Meilin kissed Jhi, and a moment later the panda vanished to reappear as a tattoo on her own forearm. She pulled out her hairpin and retwisted her hair into a long braid before pushing the pin back. She slung a bag over her shoulder and joined Conor.

Uraza licked Abeke’s open palm and then, in a swirl of spots, formed an image on Abeke’s skin. The girl collected her bow and quiver. “Come on, Rollan.”

Rollan gazed over at Essix. “Well?”

The falcon beat her wings and was airborne. She rose almost vertically, soaring over the beach and toward the ship.

“Fine.” Essix could fly alongside.

Rollan patted his folded cloak, his bond token. He felt a gentle tremor through the material, as if it were anticipating the wind passing through its folds once more.

Essix shrieked from above, for all the joy of being free.

Rollan knew exactly how the falcon felt.

He gathered his rucksack and headed down the beach to his friends.

To all the fans who've followed Conor, Abeke, Meilin, and Rollan on their adventures—who uncovered the lost histories of the Great Beasts and collected talismans in the online game as the Keeper—thank you. This series has been very dear to us, and we hope it's meant something to you, too.

The journey wasn't always easy. Sometimes sad and scary things happened, just like in real life. But at the heart of this story is the belief that people from different places and cultures can come together for the good of all.

Even if we can't magically summon spirit animals to grant us superhuman powers, we can all be more than ourselves. It just takes courage and kindness.

By the Four Fallen,
The Greencloaks

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

Sarwat Chadda is a Londoner who's spent a lot of time abroad, from Vietnam to Venice and from Ghana to Guatemala. Not quite the length of Erdas, but not bad. In his life prior to writing, Sarwat was an engineer and worked on projects both high and subterranean. He's published ten novels, all filled with action, mythology, and high adventure, and managed to win an award or two in the process. He can think of no better way to spend the day than in the company of great heroes and dark villains.

You've read the book—now join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!

Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Have your ebook ready and enter the code to unlock huge
rewards!

NH3FHHRD4R

Turn the page for a sneak peek at the next adventure, written by #1 New York Times bestselling author Scott Westerfeld!

Javi

Next question,” Molly said. “How many miles of wire are in this airplane?”

“Um, a lot?”

“Put your brain to work, Perez. Estimate!”

Javier Perez sighed. “If I get close, will you stop bugging me with these questions?”

“Nope. You need the distraction.” Molly clutched her book of airplane trivia and grinned. “I’ve got at least fourteen hours’ worth. Enough for the whole flight!”

“You wanted to sit by her!” Anna said from the row behind, and Oliver laughed beside her.

Javi groaned, wishing the plane would take off so he could lean back and pretend to sleep.

Telling Molly that he was afraid of flying had been a terrible idea. Because that made it her job, as team leader, to distract him—with engineering problems, of course. At Robotics Club every afternoon, Molly always talked while she worked, explaining what she was doing, challenging others to do the same. For her, making robots wasn’t just a hobby, it was a conversation.

The funny thing was, the distraction was actually working. Once Javi's brain had latched onto her question, the plane became more than a huge unknown carrying him away from home for the first time ever. Now it was an engineering problem.

How many miles of wire? Javi thought.

The four members of Team Killbot, along with their adviser, Mr. Keating, were sitting in economy. Brooklyn Science and Tech had lots of rich people who donated money to the school, and when the team had qualified for the Robot Soccer World Championships, some millionaire had stepped up to pay travel costs.

But first class to Japan for five people? Nobody had that much money to give away.

Even so, this was what Mr. Keating called "fancy economy," designed for fourteen-hour flights. Javi's seat was surrounded by buttons and lights and a video screen. All of which were connected to wires, right?

He'd already tested the buttons on his armrest. They controlled the angle of his seat, a reading light, the screen. There was a button for summoning a flight attendant, and a rocker switch with volume symbols. There was even a little remote control for games (which also seemed to be a phone, in case you needed to call someone from halfway across the Arctic Circle).

Javi found himself wanting to strip it all down, to see those wires, motors, and gears out in the open. He'd been taking things apart as long as he could remember, starting when his mother had let him take apart her busted microwave when he was five years old.

He imagined the wires under the cabin floor, snaking up and around the curves of the chair. And another bright web above him, bringing power to all those lights and air blowers in the ceiling—

"Conjectures?" Molly prompted. "Conclusions?"

Javi's brain buzzed. Each seat would need at least a hundred feet of wire, and there were about five hundred people on the plane. That was ten miles right there, on top of the ailerons and engines, the cockpit crammed with gauges, the extra wires needed for the huge business class seats a few rows ahead.

Too much to calculate, so he multiplied his first guess by ten.

"In the whole plane, maybe a hundred miles of wire?"

“Not too bad.” Molly waved her book. “But it’s more like three hundred. A technical tour de force!”

“Okay, wow,” Javi said, though amazement was the surest route to more trivia questions. “It seems like a waste, using a machine this complicated to fly our dinky little robots to Tokyo.”

“The Killbots are not dinky,” Molly said. “They’re the reigning US champions of robot soccer, junior division!”

Javi shrugged. “May I remind you that the other team’s robots got broken in shipping? We lucked into this.”

“We would’ve won anyway.” Molly’s expression dared him to argue.

Javi wasn’t sure. He’d seen videos of the robots built by the unlucky finalists from New Mexico—scuttling four-legged scorpions that whacked the soccer ball with their tails. In stark contrast, the Brooklyn Killbots were toasters on wheels. Mindless bullies that swarmed the ball, knocking other players out their way.

“Like how five-year-olds play soccer,” one of the judges had muttered in the semifinals.

And there were, what, maybe twenty feet of wire in each Killbot?

Not exactly a technical tour de force.

Last night, Javi’s whole family had gathered for a send-off dinner: uncles, aunts, and cousins all telling him how proud they were. His mother had told stories of him helping on her superintendent rounds when he was little, fixing locks and faucets at age seven. But for the whole dinner he’d felt like a fraud.

What kind of engineer was afraid to get on an airplane?

“Next question,” Molly said. “How many Aero Horizon flights have ever crashed?”

He stared at her. Was she just trolling him now?

If building robots had taught Javi anything, it was that way too much could go wrong with machines. No matter how carefully he tested them, the Killbots were always doing unpredictable stuff in the middle of a match.

He thought about those three hundred miles of wire in the airplane, the millions of rivets and seals and screws, the engines and tanks full of flammable fuel. All those parts that could break, warp, fail, or explode.

“I’m going to go with ... two?” he said hopefully.

“Nope,” Molly said. “Zero!”

“Really?”

“Yep. No crashes in the whole fleet, in forty years.”

“Huh.” Javi felt a relieved smile reach his lips, and his irritation with Molly faded. Even when she was trolling him, she always had a plan. “Thanks.”

She shrugged, as if to say that his fears were forgotten. “Just enjoy the flight, Perez. We’re going to win for real this time.”

Javi gave her a fist to bump. “Team Killbot!”

Mr. Keating leaned forward from the row behind. “Um, guys. Maybe no more discussion of airplane crashes?”

“Actually,” Molly said, “we were discussing the total absence of airplane crashes.”

“Still,” Mr. Keating said firmly. “Some people are nervous about flying.”

“Not us engineers.” Molly smiled at Javi. “Next question ...”

“Last question,” Javi pleaded.

Molly looked like she was about to argue, but then a ping went through the cabin, and a voice announced that the doors were closing.

Javi swallowed. Last night, he had imagined himself jumping up and running off the plane when this moment came. But thanks to Molly’s distractions, he was managing to sit here quietly.

“Fire away,” he said.

“This is my favorite one.” Molly clutched the trivia book close, guarding the answer. “What do flight attendants call it when the oxygen masks drop down?”

Javi frowned. “There’s a name for that?”

“It’s secret flight attendant slang. Let me give you a hint: The oxygen sensor gets tripped, right? And suddenly all those rubber masks fall out of the ceiling. Everyone’s freaking out, screaming like animals. So what do flight attendants call it?”

“Um, a really bad day at work?”

“Nope.” Molly gave him a pleased smile. “They call it a ‘rubber jungle.’ Get it? Because everyone goes primal, and there’s all those masks hanging down like vines! And usually it’s just an accident, because of a broken sensor.”

Javi tried to smile back at her, but now he was thinking about those hundreds of masks up in the ceiling, each tightly wound in its little compartment, like snakes ready to spring out and start a panic.

Just one more thing that could go wrong.

Enter your code to
unlock huge rewards:
NH3FHHRD4R

Design your own spirit
animal!

Join the adventure at
Scholastic.com/SpiritAnimals!
Enter the world of Erdas, where YOU are one
of the rare few to summon a spirit animal.

Get the FREE Spirit Animals app
for tablet or phone.

SPIRIT ANIMALS

SPECIAL EDITIONS

Discover the Hidden Tales of Erdas!

There's more to explore in the Spirit Animals world! These Special Editions reveal the secrets of Erdas in ways you never saw coming...

scholastic.com/spiritanimals

SCHOLASTIC and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

Copyright © 2018 by Scholastic Inc.
All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920. SCHOLASTIC, SPIRIT ANIMALS, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

The publisher does not have any control over and does not assume any responsibility for author or third-party websites or their content.

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2017964209

ISBN 978-1-338-11671-7

First edition, May 2018

Cover illustration by Angelo Rinaldi
Cover design by Charice Silverman & Rocco Melillo
Art direction by Keirsten Geise
Metal frame: © caesart/Shutterstock
Wood texture: © CG Textures

e-ISBN 978-1-338-11672-4

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereafter invented, without the express written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.